

Text and Materials

A photograph showing the silhouettes of two people in a dark, circular tunnel. One person is standing and leaning over the other, who is sitting on the ground. The tunnel's interior is dark, while the opening at the end is brightly lit, creating a strong contrast. The tunnel walls are made of corrugated metal.

CLARKSON AND KEATING:
CRIMINAL LAW
Ninth Edition

SR Kyd,
T Elliott & MA Walters

SWEET & MAXWELL

Text and Materials

CLARKSON AND KEATING:
CRIMINAL LAW
Ninth Edition

SR Kyd,
T Elliott & MA Walters

SWEET & MAXWELL

CLARKSON AND KEATING
CRIMINAL LAW: TEXT AND MATERIALS

CLARKSON AND KEATING
CRIMINAL LAW: TEXT AND MATERIALS

NINTH EDITION

By

PROFESSOR SALLY KYD

Professor of Law, University of Leicester

DR TRACEY ELLIOTT

Lecturer in Law, University of Leicester

DR MARK WALTERS

Reader in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice, University of Sussex

SWEET & MAXWELL

THOMSON REUTERS

First Edition 1984
Reprinted 1986
Reprinted 1988
Second Edition 1990
Reprinted 1991
Reprinted 1993
Third Edition 1994
Reprinted 1994
Reprinted 1995
Fourth Edition 1998
Reprinted 1999
Reprinted 2000
Reprinted 2001 (twice)
Reprinted 2002
Fifth Edition 2003
Sixth Edition 2007
Seventh Edition 2010
Eighth Edition 2014
Ninth Edition 2017

Published in 2017 by Thomson Reuters trading as Sweet & Maxwell. Registered in England & Wales, Company No.1679046. Registered Office and address for service: 5 Canada Square, Canary Wharf, London, E14 5AQ.

For further information on our products and services, visit www.sweetandmaxwell.co.uk

A CIP catalogue record of this book is available from the British Library.

Thomson Reuters, the Thomson Reuters Logo and Sweet & Maxwell ® are trademarks of Thomson Reuters

Crown Copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller of the HMSO and the Queen's Printer for Scotland.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted, in any form or by any means, or stored in any retrieval system of any nature, without prior written permission, except for permitted fair dealing under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, or in accordance with the terms of a license issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency in respect of photocopying and/or reprographic reproduction. Application for permission for other use of copyright material including permission to reproduce extracts in other published works shall be made to the publishers. Full acknowledgment of author, publisher and source must be given.

©
S. Kyd
T. Elliott
M. Walters
2017

CONTENTS

Preface	v
Acknowledgments	vii
Table of Cases	xxvii
Table of Statutes	lxxvii
Table of Statutory Instruments	xciii
CHAPTER 1: CRIME AND PUNISHMENT
I. Introduction	1-001
II. What Conduct ought to be Criminal?	1-003
A. Introduction	1-003
B. Criteria for Criminalisation	1-004
1. Wrongful conduct	1-005
2. Is it necessary to employ the criminal law?	1-035
3. Is it permissible to criminalise the conduct?	1-049
III. Punishment	1-053
A. Retribution	1-054
1. Vengeance	1-055
2. Expiation	1-057
3. Just deserts	1-060
B. Deterrence	1-074
1. Individual deterrence	1-075
2. General deterrence	1-076
3. Educative deterrence	1-083
C. Incapacitation	1-088
D. Rehabilitation	1-101
E. Reparation	1-111
F. Combining the Theories	1-116
1. Who may be punished?	1-119
2. How severely do we punish?	1-122
3. What type of punishment?	1-136

G. Sentencing Guidelines	1-139
1. United States	1-142
2. England and Wales	1-147

CHAPTER 2: THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LIABILITY

I. Introduction	2-001
II. Actus Reus	2-003
A. Introduction	2-003
B. Constituent Elements of Actus Reus	2-006
1. An “act”	2-008
2. Legally relevant circumstances	2-070
3. Causation	2-071
III. Mens Rea	2-120
A. Blame and Responsibility	2-120
B. Blame and Mens Rea	2-129
C. Proof of Cognitive Mens Rea	2-137
D. Intention	2-141
1. Introduction	2-141
2. The law	2-142
3. Evaluation	2-167
E. Recklessness	2-185
1. Background	2-185
2. Law prior to G: two species of recklessness	2-186
3. Present law	2-202
4. Evaluation	2-207
F. Negligence	2-216
1. Introduction	2-216
2. Negligence as a basis of liability	2-217
3. Negligence and capacity	2-219
4. Should negligence be a basis for the attribution of criminal responsibility?	2-222

5. Conclusion	2-225
G. Levels of Culpability	2-226
IV. Relationship of Mens Rea to Actus Reus	2-236
A. Introduction	2-236
B. Coincidence of Actus Reus and Mens Rea	2-237
C. Transferred Malice	2-249
D. Mistake	2-257
1. Mistake as to element of actus reus	2-258
2. Mistake as to a defence element	2-263
3. Evaluation of the law	2-269
4. Mistake as to law	2-274

CHAPTER 3: STRICT LIABILITY AND CORPORATE CULPABILITY

I. Strict Liability	3-001
A. Introduction	3-001
B. The Law	3-002
1. The presumption of mens rea	3-003
2. Displacing the presumption	3-006
3. Defences to strict liability	3-021
4. Strict liability and the European Convention on Human Rights	3-025
5. Are strict liability offences justifiable?	3-031
6. Enforcement	3-046
7. Sentencing	3-047
8. Civil sanctions	3-050
9. Conclusion	3-052
II. Corporate Criminal Liability	3-054
A. Introduction	3-054
B. Corporate or Personal	3-058

Criminal Liability
C. The Law	3-062
1. Vicarious liability	3-063
2. Direct liability: the identification doctrine	3-070
D. Restructuring Corporate Criminal Liability	3-077
1. Aggregation doctrine	3-078
2. Reactive corporate fault	3-079
3. Corporate culture doctrine	3-082
4. Specific corporate offences	3-087
E. Death and Injury at Work: A Case Study in Criminal Corporate Liability	3-088
1. The law in action	3-089
2. Failings of the identification doctrine	3-092
3. Corporate manslaughter	3-096
4. Corporate liability for non-fatal injuries	3-133
F. Punishment of Corporations	3-137
1. Corporate manslaughter/health and safety offences causing death	3-138
2. Other corporate offences; other sentencing options	3-145

CHAPTER 4: GENERAL DEFENCES

I. Justification and Excuse	4-001
A. Introduction	4-001
B. Justifications	4-005
C. Excuses	4-014
D. Exemptions	4-029
E. Significance of Distinctions	4-034
II. Consent	4-044

	A. Introduction	4-044
	B. The Reality of Consent	4-045
	C. The Nature and Degree of Harm	4-051
	D. The Rationale of Consent as a Defence	4-070
	E. Reform Proposals	4-074
III.	Self-Defence	4-077
	A. Introduction	4-077
	B. Elements of self-defence	4-079
	1. Threat of unjustified harm	4-080
	2. Protected interest	4-086
	3. The necessity for any defensive action	4-091
	4. The amount of responsive force must be reasonable in the circumstances	4-096
	5. The duty to retreat	4-111
	6. The imminence of the threatened attack	4-115
	7. Excessive self-defence	4-120
IV.	Chastisement	4-128
V.	Duress and Necessity	4-131
	A. Introduction	4-131
	B. Duress by Threats	4-136
	1. Rationale of duress by threats as a defence	4-137
	2. Parameters of the defence	4-151
	C. Duress of Circumstances	4-200
	D. Duress and the Modern Slavery Act 2015	4-205
	1. The adult defence	4-208
	2. The under 18's defence	4-209
	3. The level of fortitude required	4-210
	4. Expanding duress to accommodate victims of	4-211

slavery and trafficking
E. Necessity	4-212
1. Distinction between necessity and duress of circumstances	4-213
2. The traditional approach of English law	4-214
3. Emergence of a new defence?	4-224
VI. Superior Orders	4-231
VII. Involuntary Conduct	4-238
A. Introduction	4-238
1. Narrow definition of involuntariness	4-239
2. Preceding fault	4-242
3. Cause of involuntariness	4-244
B. Insanity	4-245
1. Introduction	4-245
2. The law	4-249
C. Automatism	4-292
1. Introduction	4-292
2. Psychiatry's view of the automaton's true state of mind	4-294
3. That even if insanity is not an issue, the public interest may not be served by a complete acquittal	4-296
VIII Intoxication	4-299
A. Background	4-299
B. Drunken Intent	4-303
C. Intoxication as a "Defence"	4-304
D. Meaning of Voluntary Intoxication	4-307
E. Law on Voluntary Intoxication	4-311
1. Specific and basic intent	4-311
2. A partial "defence"?	4-334

3. Drunken mistake	4-335
F. Involuntary Intoxication	4-339
G. “Dutch Courage” Intoxication	4-343
H. Intoxication Can Cause Insanity or Diminished Responsibility	4-345
I. Reform of the Law	4-350
IX. Lack of Age	4-361
A. Introduction	4-361
B. Below the Age of Ten	4-363
C. Above the Age of Ten	4-364
X. Sundry Defences	4-365

CHAPTER 5: INCHOATE OFFENCES

I. Introduction	5-001
II. Attempt	5-002
A. Should there be a Law of Attempt?	5-002
B. Punishments of Attempts	5-006
C. The Law	5-024
1. Actus reus	5-024
2. Mens rea	5-049
III. Conspiracy	5-084
A. Introduction	5-084
B. Should there be a Law of Conspiracy?	5-085
C. Punishment of Conspiracies	5-090
D. The Law	5-093
1. Types of conspiracy	5-093
2. Common law conspiracies	5-094
3. Statutory conspiracy	5-100
IV. Encouraging or Assisting Crime	5-121
A. Introduction	5-121
B. Rationale of Liability and Reform	5-122
C. The Law	5-127
1. Common elements	5-128

2. Intentionally encouraging or assisting an offence	5-129
3. Encouraging or assisting an offence believing it will be committed	5-134
4. Encouraging or assisting offences believing one or more will be committed	5-137
5. Defences	5-144
6. Impossibility	5-149
7. Jurisdiction	5-150
8. Punishment	5-151
9. Conclusion	5-152
V. Double Inchoate Liability	5-153
VI. Endangerment Offences	5-154

CHAPTER 6: PARTICIPATION IN CRIME

I. Introduction	6-001
II. The Law	6-006
A. Principal Offenders	6-006
B. Secondary Parties	6-008
1. Distinct modes of participation?	6-008
2. Causation	6-010
3. Assistance and encouragement	6-013
4. Mens rea of accessories	6-022
5. Procuring	6-038
6. Reform proposals	6-041
III. The Limits of Accessorial Liability	6-050
A. No Principal Offender	6-050
B. Accessory can be Guilty of Graver Offence than the One Committed	6-058
C. Withdrawal of Accessories	6-062

D. Victims Cannot be Accessories	6-067
E. Accomplices and Transferred Malice	6-073
IV. Conclusion	6-077
A. Blameworthiness	6-078
B. Causing Harm	6-079
C. Lesser Liability and Punishment	6-086
CHAPTER 7: NON-FATAL OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON
I. Offences against the Person (Non-Sexual)	7-001
A. The Extent and Context of Violence	7-001
B. The Law	7-003
1. Introduction	7-003
2. Common assault and battery	7-004
3. Aggravated assaults	7-031
C. Evaluation	7-079
II. Sexual Offences	7-088
A. Introduction	7-088
1. The level of offending	7-089
2. Rape in context	7-095
3. What is rape?	7-100
B. The Law	7-105
1. Consent	7-105
2. Rape	7-132
3. Other non-consensual sexual offences	7-148
4. Child sex offences	7-157
C. Sentencing	7-165
D. Evaluation	7-167
CHAPTER 8: HOMICIDE
I. Introduction	8-001
A. The Level of Offending	8-001
B. Homicide in Context	8-002

II.	Actus Reus of Murder and Manslaughter	8-006
III.	Murder	8-008
	A. History	8-009
	1. Intent to kill	8-010
	2. Intent to cause grievous bodily harm	8-011
	3. Constructive malice	8-012
	B. Present Law	8-013
	C. Penalty for Murder	8-016
	D. Evaluation	8-022
	1. The grievous bodily harm rule	8-023
	2. Woollin test of intention	8-031
	3. Conclusion	8-043
IV.	Manslaughter	8-044
	A. Involuntary Manslaughter	8-045
	1. (Subjective) Reckless manslaughter	8-047
	2. Constructive or unlawful act manslaughter	8-048
	3. Gross negligence manslaughter	8-067
	4. Sentencing involuntary manslaughter	8-081
	5. Rationale and reform	8-083
	B. Voluntary Manslaughter	8-095
	1. Loss of control	8-096
	2. Diminished responsibility	8-134
	3. Killing in pursuance of a suicide pact	8-151
V.	Encouraging or Assisting Suicide	8-153
VI.	Infanticide	8-156
	A. The current position	8-156
	B. Is infanticide redundant?	8-160
VII.	Causing or Allowing the Death of a Child or Vulnerable Adult	8-164

VIII Vehicular Homicide	8-172
A. Causing Death by Dangerous Driving	8-174
1. Introduction	8-174
2. Rationale of law	8-175
3. The law	8-184
4. Sentencing	8-187
B. Causing Death by Careless Driving	8-188
C. Causing Death by Careless Driving when Under the Influence of Drink or Drugs	8-194
D. Causing Death by Unlicensed, Disqualified or Uninsured Driving	8-197
IX. Corporate Manslaughter	8-203
X. The Structure of Homicide Offences	8-204
A. Rationale of Distinction between Different Categories of Homicide	8-205
B. Greater Specificity	8-209
C. Basis of Distinctions	8-216
D. Unlawful Homicide—A Single Offence	8-224
CHAPTER 9: Offences Against Property
I. Introduction	9-001
A. The Level of Offending	9-002
B. The Sociological Background	9-004
C. The Legal Background	9-007
II. Theft	9-009
A. Extent and Context	9-009
B. The Legal Background	9-011
C. The Law	9-012
1. Definition	9-012
2. Appropriation	9-014
3. Property	9-047
4. Belonging to another	9-052

5. Dishonesty	9-084
6. Intention of permanent deprivation	9-108
III. Fraud	9-127
A. The Criminological Background	9-127
B. The Law Prior to the Fraud Act 2006	9-131
C. The Fraud Act 2006	9-136
1. Fraud	9-137
2. Offences ancillary to fraud	9-180
3. Obtaining services dishonestly	9-181
4. Conspiracy to defraud	9-197
IV. Making Off Without Payment	9-198
A. Introduction	9-198
B. The Law	9-199
1. Actus reus	9-201
2. Mens rea	9-207
3. Punishment	9-208
V. Other Property Offences	9-209
A. Sociological Background	9-210
B. The Legal Background	9-211
C. The Law	9-212
1. Robbery	9-213
2. Burglary and aggravated burglary	9-217
3. Handling stolen goods	9-229
VI. Conclusion	9-236
A. Underlying Rationale	9-237
B. Structure of Property Offences	9-238
Index	1301

PREFACE

The aim of this book is to examine the main principles and rules of the criminal law and to expose the theoretical bases upon which they are founded.

The criminal law is the backdrop to the operation of the whole criminal justice system. It informs the way in which victims, the public, the police and other law enforcement agencies, the CPS and judges and other court personnel react and operate. It is, therefore, inextricably linked to issues of criminal procedure, criminology, moral philosophy and penology. Fletcher has stated that “the criminal law should express the way we live”. It is a reflection of community values aimed at isolating the blameworthy who are deserving of punishment. Equally, it is a means of social control; it attempts to uphold, as well as reflect, these community values; it sets a standard, albeit at times a minimal one, of necessary compliance. In short, it is a set of moral commandments that are backed up by the legal threat of punishment. It thus follows that whether sanctions are imposed on the basis of desert or on utilitarian grounds, the rules of the criminal law and the punishment of offenders are the two sides of the same coin. A whole range of substantive issues—such as, whether “recklessness” should include “inadvertence”, whether one can justify the existence of offences of “strict liability”, how the boundaries of the law of “attempt” and “accessorial” crime should be drawn, and so on—are, in reality, issues relating to the justification of punishment in such cases. A true appreciation of the substantive criminal law must thus involve some understanding of the rationale of punishment and why conduct is criminalised—and it is in this context that we have sought to present the main rules of the law.

Like many other works in this field, this is a book on the actual rules of the criminal law. We have attempted to provide a full analysis of these main rules on the topics covered. But, in doing this, we have attempted the more ambitious task of using the law to extract, and develop, some fundamental ideas underlying the law. We have tried to explore, in the context of punishment, such issues as: the relationship between blame and harm, the criteria for identifying the blameworthy, the structure of offences in relation to each other and whether such structure fairly represents the differing wrongdoing involved, and the role of the general defences. In short, we have attempted to subject the criminal law to the beginnings of a philosophical analysis that can throw some light on the substantive rules.

The criminal law changes with great rapidity and this 9th edition reflects the developments that have occurred within the law in the past three years. In particular, the changes to the law on participation stemming from the case of Jogee, in which the Supreme Court stated that it was rectifying a “wrong turn” taken 30 years ago, has inevitably led to the relevant chapter being heavily edited to reflect these changes and provide analysis of the effect of the case. Developments to the law on defences, including to the general defence of duress are included: Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45 (statutory defence for victims of slavery and human trafficking); Brandford (“hearsay” duress); as well as the Supreme Court decision in Golds on the partial defence of diminished responsibility. Coverage is also given to new reform proposals such as the Law Commission’s Paper on non-fatal offences against the person, their Report on Unfitness to Plead, and to scholarly commentary published since the 8th edition on the full range of substantive issues.

We have been anxious to ensure that this book is accessible to, and easily digestible by, undergraduate and postgraduate students concerned with criminal law. We have approached our task, and included appropriate materials, with this concern very much in mind. We have tried to cover the range of competing views and present them in a discursive manner allowing the reader to make choices—while not being afraid to state our own preferences.

By now the format of this book should be familiar. It is neither a straight “textbook”, nor a “cases and materials” book. Instead, we have combined what we regard as the best features of both such styles—a book with the flow and coherence of a textbook thus providing the reader with guidance and direction, but one that also enables a substantial amount of original material from a diversity of sources to be absorbed. New for the 9th edition is a fresh look to the page layout, to make it more user-friendly in signalling what amounts to our own text, and what are the materials we have extracted from statute, case law and scholarly commentary. We would like to thank our publishers in assisting with this change, and hope our readers agree that it improves the look of the finished product.

We would like to lend a very special thank you to Professor Heather Keating. This is the first edition of Clarkson and Keating without Heather as co-author. She has spent over 30 years carefully crafting what has become one of the most detailed and critical criminal law text books available to students in England and Wales. Without her, this book would not contain the breadth and depth of knowledge on the study of crime that it does today. We are all very grateful that she has entrusted us with writing this, and what we hope will be many new editions to come. We wish her all the very best in her new adventures.

Similarly, although the other original author, Chris Clarkson is gone, he is certainly not forgotten. His words live on in much of the text that remains from earlier editions, and his philosophy can be seen throughout the book as a result, and in having been passed down through his teachings and mentoring of at least one of the current authors. (And she knows she had to mention him as this is the only part of new editions he now reads!)

Sally Kyd would like to thank her son Benjamin for putting up with her having to spend so much time working.

Tracey Elliott would like to thank her co-authors for their support and patience over the past year, particularly during her very stressful house move, and her parents and daughters (Naomi, Abigail and Hannah) for their help and support. She would also like to wish Foundry Chambers (from which she formerly practised when it was 9–12 Bell Yard) and all of her former colleagues, the very best of luck with their future endeavours.

Mark would like to thank his husband Daniel and his colleague Mary Lee for all of their help and support (including reading draft chapters) during the preparation of this new edition.

This book has been written with reference to the law as it stood on 31 March 2017.

S. R. KYD
T. ELLIOTT
M. A. WALTERS
March 2017

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Grateful acknowledgment is made to the following authors and publishers for permission to quote from their works:

Adler, Z.: “Rape—The Intention of Parliament and the Practice of the Courts” (1982) 45 M.L.R. 664. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

All England Law Reports reprinted by permission of LexisNexis material reproduced with the permission of RELX (UK) Limited, trading as LexisNexis Almond, Paul: Corporate Manslaughter and Regulatory Reform, (2013). Reprinted by permission of SCSC Amirthalingam, K.: “Caldwell Recklessness is Dead, Long Live Mens Rea’s Fecklessness” (2004) 67 M.L.R. 491. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

Andenaes, J.: “General Prevention” (1952) 43 J. Crim. L., C. & P.S. 176. Reprinted by special permission of Northwestern University School of Law, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology —: “The General Preventive Effects of Punishment” (1966) 114 U. Pa. L. Rev. 949. Reprinted by permission of The University of Pennsylvania Law School Antrobus, S.: “The Criminal Liability of Directors for Health and Safety Breaches and Manslaughter” [2013] Crim. L.R. 309. Sweet & Maxwell

Ashworth, A.: “Change Of Normative Position: Determining the Contours of Culpability in Criminal Law” (2008) 11 New Criminal Law Review 232. Reprinted by permission of University of California Press Journals

—: “Editorial, Insanity and Automatism: A Discussion Paper” [2013] Crim. L.R. 787. Sweet & Maxwell

—: “Ignorance of the Criminal Law, And Duties to Avoid It” (2011) 74 M.L.R. 1. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons —: “‘Manslaughter’: Generic or Nominate Offences?” In Clarkson, C.M.V. and Cunningham, S. (eds), Criminal Liability For Non-Aggressive Death (2008). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)

- : and Horder, J.: Principles of Criminal Law, 7th edn (2013).
Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : “Robbery Re-Assessed” [2002] Crim. L.R. 851. Sweet & Maxwell
- : Sentencing and Criminal Justice, 6th edn (2015). Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press
- : Sentencing and Penal Policy (1983). Orion Publishing Group
- : “The Scope of Liability for Omissions” (1989) 105 L.Q.R. 424.
Sweet & Maxwell
- : “Sexual Offences: Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.5—Rape of A Child Under 13—Defendant Under 18” [2008] Crim. L.R. 818. Sweet &
Maxwell
- : “Transferred Malice and Punishment for Unforeseen Consequences” in P.R. Glazebrook (ed.) Reshaping the Criminal Law
(1978). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Austin, J.: Lectures on Jurisprudence, 5th edn (1911) XVIII-XIX Vol 1
411–415. Thoemmes Press
- Bartle, R.: Administering Justice: Crime and the New Magistrate (1985), quoted from Nelken, D., “Criminal Law and Criminal Justice” in Dennis, I. (ed.), Criminal Law and Justice (1987). Sweet & Maxwell
- Beale, J.H.: “Retreat from a Murderous Assault” (1903) 16 Harv. L.
Rev. 567. Reprinted by permission of Harvard University Press
- Bentham, J.: “An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation” in Bentham and Mill, The Utilitarians (1961). Anchor Publishing
- Bottoms, A.E.: “An Introduction to the Coming Crisis” in Bottoms, A.E. and Preston, R.H., The Coming Penal Crisis (1980). Scottish Academic Press Ltd
- : “Morality, Crime, Compliance and Public Policy” in Bottoms A. and Tonry M., Ideology, Crime and Criminal Justice (2002). Willan Publishing
- Brady, J.: “Punishing Attempts” (1980) 63 The Monist 246. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press – Journals
- : “Recklessness, Negligence, Indifference and Awareness” (1980) 43
M.L.R. 381. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

- : “Strict Liability Offences: A Justification” (1972) 8 Crim. L. Bulletin 217. Sweet & Maxwell Braithwaite, J.: Crime, Shame and Reintegration (1989). Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press
- and Pettit, P.: Not Just Deserts: A Republican Theory of Criminal Justice (1990). By permission of Oxford University Press Brett, P.: Inquiry into Criminal Guilt (1963). Lawbook Co, part of Thomson Reuters Brownlee, I.D.: “Superior Orders—Time for a New Realism?” [1989] Crim. L.R. 396. Sweet & Maxwell
- Buchanan, A. and Virgo, G.: “Duress and Mental Abnormality” [1999] Crim. L.R. 517. Sweet & Maxwell
- Buxton, R.: “The Human Rights Act and the Substantive Criminal Law” [2000] Crim. L.R. 331. Sweet & Maxwell
- Card, R.: “Reform of the Law of Conspiracy” [1973] Crim. L.R. 674. Sweet & Maxwell Cardozo, B.N.: “Law and Literature” in Selected Writings (1947). Fallon Publications Chalmers, J. and Leverick F.: “Tracking the Creation of Criminal Offences” [2013] Crim. L.R. 543. Sweet & Maxwell
- Clarkson, C.M.V.: “Aggravated Endangerment Offences” (2007) 60 O.J.L.S. 278. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press – Journals
- : “Context and Culpability in Involuntary Manslaughter: Principle or Instinct?” in Ashworth, A. and Mitchell, B. (eds): Rethinking English Homicide Law (2000). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : “Corporate Manslaughter: Need for a New Offence?” in Clarkson, C.M.V. and Cunningham, S.R. (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Deaths (2008). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- : “Corporate Culpability” (1997) Web Journal of Current Legal Issues. Reprinted by permission of the Web Journal of Current Legal Issues
- : “General Endangerment Offences: The Way Forward?” (2005) 32(2) University of Western Australia Law Review 131. Reprinted by permission of University of Western Australia Law Review and C.M.V. Clarkson

- : Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (2005). Sweet & Maxwell
- : and Keating, H.M.: “Codification: Offences against the Person under the Draft Criminal Code” (1986) 50 J. Crim. L. 405. Reprinted by permission of SAGE Publications Ltd
- Clough, J.: Principles of Cybercrime (2010). Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press
- Coffee, J.: “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: An Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386. Reprinted with the kind permission of Professor J. Coffee Cohen, M.R.: “Moral Aspects of the Criminal Law” (1940) 49 Yale Law Journal 987. Reprinted by permission of the Yale Law Journal Company, Inc Colvin, E.: “Corporate Personality and Criminal Liability” (1995) 6 Criminal Law Forum 1. Reprinted by permission of Springer Science and Bus Media B.V.
- Cooper, J.: “The Sentencing Guidelines Council—a Practical Perspective” [2008] Crim. L.R. 277. Sweet & Maxwell
- Council of Europe, Liability of Enterprises for Offences, Recommendation No.R(88) 18 (1990). Reprinted by permission of the Council of Europe
- Cowley, D.: “The Retreat from Morgan” [1982] Crim. L.R. 198. Sweet & Maxwell
- Creach, D.L.: “Partially Determined Imperfect Self-Defense: The Battered Wife Kills and Tells Why” (1982) 34 Stan. L.R. 616. Reprinted by permission of the Stanford Law Review Cross, R.: “Reflections on Bratty’s Case” (1962) 78 L.Q.R. 236. Sweet & Maxwell
- : and Ashworth, A.: The English Sentencing System, 3rd edn (1981). Reprinted with the permission of Butterworths, a division of LexisNexis Butterworths Tolley Cunningham, S.: “Recklessness: being reckless and acting recklessly” (2010) 21 K.L.J. 445.
- Reprinted by permission of Taylor & Francis
- : (ed.) Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Deaths (2008). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- Dashwood, A.: “Logic and the Lords in Majewski” [1977] Crim. L.R.

532. Sweet & Maxwell

- Davis, M.: ‘‘Why Attempts Deserve Less Punishment than Complete Crimes’’, Law and Philosophy 5 (1986). Reprinted by permission of Springer Science and Bus Media B.V. Dennis, I.: ‘‘Duress, Murder and Criminal Responsibility’’ (1980) 96 L.Q.R. 208. Sweet & Maxwell —: ‘‘On Necessity as a Defence to Crime: Possibilities, Problems and the Limits of Justification and Excuse’’ (2009) Criminal Law and Philosophy 29. Reprinted with the permission of Springer Science and Bus Media B.V.
- : ‘‘Editorial: A Pointless Exercise’’ [2008] Crim. L.R. 507. Sweet & Maxwell
- Devlin, P.: Morals and the Criminal Law (reprinted in The Enforcement of Morals) (1965). Reprinted with the permission of Oxford University Press
- Dingwall, G.: ‘‘Intoxicated Mistakes and the Need for Self-Defence’’ (2007) M.L.R. 127 at 132. Reprinted with the permission of John Wiley and Sons
- Dressler, J.: Understanding Criminal Law (1987). M. Bender (Lexis Nexis)
- Duff, R.A.: Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (2007). Reprinted by permission of Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc
- : Criminal Attempts (1986). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability: Philosophy of Action and the Criminal Law (1990). Reprinted by permission of John Wiley & Sons Inc
- : ‘‘Intention, Mens Rea and the Law Commission Report’’ [1980] Crim. L.R. 147. Sweet & Maxwell
- : ‘‘Intentions Legal and Philosophical’’ (1989) 9 O.J.L.S. 76. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : ‘‘Perversions and Subversions of Criminal Law’’, in R.A. Duff et al, The Boundaries of the Criminal Law (2010). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : von Hirsch, A.: ‘‘Responsibility, Retribution and the Voluntary’’: A - Response to Williams'' [1997] C.L.J. 103. Reprinted with the permission of A. Duff and A. von Hirsch and Cambridge University Press

- : "Recklessness" [1980] Crim. L.R. 282. Sweet & Maxwell
- : "Theories and Policies Underlying Guidelines Systems" (2005) 105 Columbia Law Review 1162. Reprinted by permission of Columbia Law Review Association, Inc.
- : Trials and Punishments (1986). Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press
- : "Whose Luck Is It Anyway?" in C.M.V. Clarkson and S.R. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (2008). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- Dunford and Ridley A.: "No Soul To Be Damned, No Body To Be Kicked: Responsibility, Blame And Corporate Punishment" (1996) 24 International Journal of the Sociology of Law 1. Reprinted by permission of Elsevier
- Elliot, C. and de Than, C.: "Restructuring the Homicide Offences to Tackle Violence, Discrimination and Drugs in a Modern Society" (2009) 20 K.L.J. 69. Reprinted by permission of Taylor & Francis
- Ewing, A.C.: "A Study of Punishment II: Punishment as viewed by the Philosopher" (1943) 21 Can Bar Rev 102 at 116. Copyright © 1943 Can Bar Rev by A.C. Ewing Executive Advisory Committee on Sentencing in New York, Crime and Punishment in New York (1979). National Criminal Justice Referral Center
- Feinberg, J.: "The Expressive Function of Punishment" (1965) The Monist, Vol.49, No.3. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Harm to Others, Vol.1 (1984). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others, Vol.2 (1988). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Feldman, D.: Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn (2002). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Fine, R.P. and Cohen, G.M.: "Is Criminal Negligence a Defensible Basis for Penal Liability" (1967) 16 Buffalo L. Rev. 749. Reprinted by permission of Buffalo Law Review

Finnis, J.: “Intention and Side-effects” in Frey, R.G., and Morris, C.W. (eds), Liability and Responsibility (1991). Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press

Fisse, B.: “Recent Developments in Corporate Criminal Law and Corporate Liability to Monetary Penalties” (1990) 13 University of New South Wales Law Journal 1. Reprinted by permission of the University of New South Wales Law Journal —— and Braithwaite, J.: “The Allocation of Responsibility for Corporate Crime: Individualism, Collectivism and Accountability” (1988) 11 Sydney Law Review 468. Reprinted by permission of the Sydney Law Review and B. Fisse and J. Braithwaite Fitz-Gibbon, K.: “Replacing Provocation in England and Wales: Examining the Partial Defence of Loss of Control” (2013) Journal of Law and Society 280. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons Fletcher, G.P.: Rethinking Criminal Law (1978). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: “The Theory of Criminal Negligence: A Comparative Analysis”, 119 U. Pa. L. Rev. 401 (1971). Reprinted with the permission of the University of Pennsylvania Law School

Frankel, M.E.: Criminal Sentences: Law Without Order (1973). Hill and Wang, a division of Farrar, Strauss and Giroux, LLC

Frase, R.S.: “Sentencing Policy Development under the Minnesota Sentencing Guidelines” in von Hirsch, A., Ashworth, A. and Roberts, J. (eds), Principled Sentencing, 3rd edn (2009). Reprinted by permission of Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc Freeman, S.: “Criminal Liability and the Duty to Aid the Distressed”, (1994) 142 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1455. Reprinted by permission of University of Pennsylvania Law School

Gardner, J.: “Justifications and Reasons” in Simester, A.P. and Smith, A.T.H. (eds), Harm and Culpability (1996). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: “The Gist of Excuses” (1998) 1 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 575. Reprinted by permission of University of California Press – Journals Glazebrook, P.R.: “Thief or Swindler: Who Cares?” [1991] C.L.J. 389. Reprinted with the kind permission of Cambridge University Press Goff, R.: “The Mental Element in the Crime of Murder” (1988)

- 104 L.Q.R. 30. Sweet & Maxwell Goldstein, A. and Katz, J.: “Abolish the Insanity Defense’—Why Not?’ (1963) 72 Yale Law
 Journal 853. Reprinted by permission of The Yale Law Journal Company, Inc.
- : “Conspiracy to Defraud the United States” (1959) 68 Yale Law
 Journal 405. Reprinted by permission of The Yale Law Journal Company, Inc.
- : The Insanity Defense (1967). Reprinted by permission of Yale University Press Green, S.P.: 13 Ways to Steal a Bicycle: Theft Law in the Information Age (2012). Reprinted by permission of Harvard University Press, Copyright ©2012 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College
- : Lying, Cheating, and Stealing: A Moral Theory of White-Collar Crime (2006). Oxford University Press
- Griew, E.: “Dishonesty: The Objections to Feely and Ghosh” [1985]
 Crim. L.R. 341. Sweet & Maxwell
- Gross, H.: A Theory of Criminal Justice (1979). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Gusfield, J.R.: “On Legislating Morals: The Symbolic Process of Designating Deviance” 56 Cal. L. Rev. 54 (1968). Reprinted by permission of the California Law Review Hart, H.L.A. and Honoré,
 A.M.: Causation in the Law, 2nd edn (1985). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : “Immorality and Treason”, 62 The Listener 162–163 (July 30, 1959)
- : “Negligence, Mens rea and the Elimination of Responsibility” in Punishment and Responsibility (Essays in the Philosophy of Law) (1968). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : Punishment and Responsibility, Essays in the Philosophy of Law
 (1968). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : “Prolegomenon to the Principles of Punishment” in Punishment and Responsibility, Essays in the Philosophy of Law (1968).
 Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Heilmann, Y.K. and Watt, R.G.: Equally Protected? A Review of the Evidence on the Physical

- Punishment of Children (NSPCC Scotland, Children 1st, Barnardo's Scotland and the Children and Young People's Commissioner Scotland, 2015). NSPCC Hepburn, J.: "Occasional Property Crime", Meier, R. (ed.), Major Forms of Crime (1984). Reprinted by permission of SAGE College Herring, J.: "Victims as Defendants: When Victims Participate in Crimes against Themselves" in Reed A. and Bohlander M. (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- : "Mum's Not the Word: An Analysis of Section 5" in C.M.V. Clarkson and S.R. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (2008). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- : Palser, E.: "The Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter" [2007] Crim. L.R. 24. Sweet & Maxwell von Hirsch, A.: Doing Justice—The Choice of Punishments (Report of the Committee for the Study of Incarceration). Reprinted by permission of Andreas von Hirsch and Hill and Wang, a division of Farrar, Strauss and Giroux, LLC
- : and Ashworth, A.: "Extending Sentences for Dangerousness: Reflections on the Bottoms-Brownsword Model" in von Hirsch, A., Ashworth, A., and Roberts, J. (eds), Principled Sentencing, 3rd edn (2009). Reprinted by permission of Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc
- : and Jareborg, N.: "Gauging Criminal Harm: A Living-Standard Analysis" (1991) 11 O.J.L.S. 1. By permission of Andreas von Hirsch and Oxford University Press
- : and Roberts, J.V., "Legislating sentencing principles: the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 relating to sentencing purposes and the role of previous convictions" [2004] Crim. L.R. 639. Sweet & Maxwell
- : "Ordinal and Cardinal Desert" in von Hirsch, A. and Ashworth, A. (eds.), Principled Sentencing (1992). Reprinted by permission of Andreas von Hirsch and Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc ——: Past or Future Crimes: Deservedness and Dangerousness in the Sentencing of Criminals (1985). ©1985 by Rutgers, the State University. Reprinted by permission of Andreas von Hirsch and Rutgers University Press and Andreas von Hirsch ——: “Prediction of Criminal Conduct and Preventive Confinement of Convicted Persons” (1972) 21 Buffalo L. Rev. 717. Reprinted by permission of Andreas von Hirsch and Buffalo Law Review ——: and Ashworth, A.: Proportionate Sentencing. Reprinted by permission of Andreas von Hirsch and Oxford University Press

Hodge, J.: Alcohol and Violence (1993). Reprinted from: Taylor P.J. (ed.), Violence in Society. London: RCP, 1993. Reprinted by permission of Royal College of Physicians, London Hoggett, B.M.: Parents and Children: The Law of Parental Responsibility, 4th edn (1993). Sweet & Maxwell

Holmes, O.W.: The Common Law (1882). Reprinted by permission of Dover Publications Inc, New York

Honoré, A.M.: Responsibility and Fault (1999). Reprinted by permission of Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc

Horder, J.: Provocation and Responsibility (1992). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (2012). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: “Sobering Up? The Law Commission on Criminal Intoxication” (1995) 58 M.L.R. 534. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons ——: and McGowan, L.: “Manslaughter by Causing Another’s Suicide” [2006] Crim. L.R. 1035.

Sweet & Maxwell

——: “Transferred Malice and the Remoteness of Unexpected Outcomes from Intentions” [2006] Crim. L.R. 383. Sweet & Maxwell

Hughes, G.: “Criminal Omissions” (1958) 67 Yale Law Journal 590. Reprinted by permission of The Yale Law Journal Company, Inc

——: “Morals and the Criminal Law” (1962) 71 Yale Law Journal 662. Reprinted by permission of The Yale Law Journal Company, Inc

- Husak, D.: “Does Criminal Liability Require an Act” in Duff, R.A. (ed) Philosophy and the Criminal Law (1998). Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press
- : “The Criminal Law as Last Resort” (2004) 24 O.J.L.S. 207. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- The Independent: Extract from “My husband had the right to rape me”, 23 February 1990. Copyright The Independent Newspaper
- Johnson, P.: The Unnecessary Crime of Conspiracy (1973) 61 Cal. L. Rev. 1137. Reprinted by permission of the California Law Review Jones, T.H.: “Causation, homicide and the supply of drugs” (2006) 26 Legal Studies 139. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons
- Kadish, S.H.: “Excusing Crime” (1987) 75 Cal. L. Rev. 257. Reprinted by permission of The California Law Review
- : “The Crisis Of Overcriminalisation” 7 American Criminal Law Quarterly 17 (1968).
- Kaplan, J.: “The Role of Law in Drug Control” [1971] Duke Law Journal 1065. Published by Duke University School of Law
- Katz, L.: Bad Acts and Guilty Minds (1987). Reprinted by permission of The University of Chicago Press
- Kaveny, C.M. “Inferring Intention From Foresight” [2004] 120 L.Q.R. 81. Sweet & Maxwell Keating, H. and Bridgeman J.: “Compassionate Killings: The Case for a Partial Defence”, (2012) 75 M.L.R. 697. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons
- Kenny, A.: Freewill and Responsibility (1978). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- Lacey, N.: State Punishment: Political Principles and Community Values (1988). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- : The Hamlyn Lectures 2007, The Prisoners’ Dilemma: Political Economy and Punishment in Contemporary Democracies (2008)
- La Fave, W.R. and Scott, A.W.: Criminal Law, 2nd edn (1986). West Group, part of Thomson Reuters
- Lanham, D.: “Accomplices and Transferred Malice” (1980) 96 L.Q.R. 110. Sweet & Maxwell

——: “Accomplices, Principles and Causation” (1980) 12 Melbourne University Law Review 490.

Reprinted by permission of Melbourne University Law Review Association Inc

——: “Danger Down Under” [1999] Crim. L.R. 960. Sweet & Maxwell

——: “Larsonneur Revisited” [1976] Crim. L.R. 276. Sweet & Maxwell
Lawson, F.H. and Rudden, B.: The Law of Property (1982). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

Leavens, A.: “A Causation Approach to Criminal Omissions” (1988) 76 Cal. L. R. 547 (1988). Reprinted by permission of the California Law Review

Lewis, C.S.: “The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment” (1953) VI Res Judicatae 224

Lloyd-Bostock, S.: “The Ordinary Man, and the Psychology of Attributing Causes and Responsibility” (1979) 45 M.L.R. 143. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

Loughnan, A.: “Between Fairness and ‘Dangerousness’: Reforming the Law on Unfitness to Plead” (2016) Crim. L.R. 451. Sweet & Maxwell

Luckenbill, D.F.: “Murder and Assault” in Meier, R.F., Major Forms of Crime (1984). Reprinted by permission of SAGE Publications

Mackay, R.D.: Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (1995). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: “The New Diminished Responsibility Plea” In Reed A. and Bohlander M., Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (2011). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)

MacKenna, Sir B.: “Causing Death by Reckless or Dangerous Driving: A Suggestion” [1970] Crim. L.R. 67. Sweet & Maxwell

Macrory, R.: Regulatory Justice: Sanctioning in a Post-Hampton World (2006). Restorative Justice Council

McGregor, J.: Is it Rape? On Acquaintance Rape and Taking Women’s Consent Seriously (2005). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)

——: “Why When She Says No She Doesn’t Mean Maybe and She Doesn’t Mean Yes: A Critical Reconstruction of Consent, Sex and the Law” (1996) 2 Legal Theory 175.

Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press Mead, G.:

“Contracting into Crime: A Theory of Criminal Omissions” (1991)

11 O.J.L.S. 147. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

Model Penal Code: Extracts from Tentative Drafts Nos 4 (1955), 8 (1958)

and Model Penal Code Proposed Official Draft (1962). The American Law Institute (ALI). Reprinted with permission. All rights reserved.

Draft material does not represent the position of the ALI until it has been approved by the Council and membership of the ALI.

Morris, A.: Women, Crime and Criminal Justice (1987). Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons Inc Morris, N.: Madness and the Criminal Law 1982 by The University of Chicago Press. All rights reserved

—— and Howard, C.: Studies in Criminal Law (1964). Reprinted with permission by Oxford University Press

Morris, T. and Blom-Cooper, L.: A Calendar of Murder: Criminal

Homicide in England since 1957 (1964) Michael Joseph Publishers

Ltd. Dr Terence Morris and Louis Blom-Cooper 1964.

——: and Blom-Cooper, L.: With Malice Aforethought (2004). Reprinted

by permission of Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc

Murphy, D.J.I.: Customers and Thieves—An Ethnography of Shoplifting (1986). Gower Publishing, Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)

Norrie, A.: “A Critique of Criminal Causation” (1991) 54 M.L.R. 685.

Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

——: “After Woolin” [1999] Crim. L.R. 532. Sweet & Maxwell

——: “Oblique Intention and Legal Politics” [1989] Crim. L.R. 793.

Sweet & Maxwell

——: “Subjectivism, Objectivism and the Limits of Criminal Recklessness” (1992) 12 O.J.L.S. 45. Reprinted by permission of

Oxford University Press

Note, “The Conspiracy Dilemma: Prosecution of Group Crimes or Protection of Individual Defendants’’ (1948) 62 Harv. L. Rev. 276.

Reprinted by permission of Harvard University Press

O’Donovan, K.: ‘‘Defences for Battered Women Who Kill’’ (1991) 18 J.
Law And Society 219. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

Ormerod, D. and Fortson, R: ‘‘Serious Crime Act 2007: the Part 2
Offences’’ [2009] Crim. L.R. 389. Sweet & Maxwell

—: and K. Laird, ‘‘Jogee—Not The End Of A Legal Saga But The Start Of A New One?’’ [2016] Crim. L.R. 539. Sweet & Maxwell

—: Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (2015). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

—: and Taylor, R.: ‘‘The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007’’ [2008] Crim. L.R. 589. Sweet & Maxwell

—: ‘‘The Fraud Act 2006 – Criminalising Lying?’’ [2007] Crim. L.R.
193. Sweet & Maxwell

Packer, H.L.: ‘‘Mens Reas and the Supreme Court’’ (1962) Sup. Ct. Rev.
107. Copyright 1968

Herbert L. Packer. All rights reserved. Used by permission of the publisher, Stanford University Press, sup.org

—: The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1969). Used by permission of the publisher, Stanford University Press, sup.org

Padfield, N.: ‘‘Clean Water and Muddy Causation: Is Causation a Question of Law or Fact, or Just a Way of Allocating Blame?’’ [1995]
Crim. L.R. 683. Sweet & Maxwell Parry, D.L.: ‘‘Judicial Approaches to Due Diligence’’ [1995] Crim. L.R. 695. Sweet & Maxwell Pearce, F. and Tombs, S.: Toxic Capitalism: Corporate Crime and the Chemical Industry (1998). With kind permission of Professors Pearce and Tombs

Pedain, A.: ‘‘Intention and the Terrorist Example’’ [2003] Crim. L.R. 579.
Sweet & Maxwell Pickard, T.: ‘‘Culpable Mistakes and Rape:
Relating Mens Rea to the Crime’’, (1980) 30

University of Toronto Law Journal 75. Reprinted by permission of University of Toronto Press Incorporated Price, L.: ‘‘Finding Fault In Organisations—Reconceptualising The Role Of Senior Managers In Corporate Manslaughter’’ (2015) 35 (3) Legal Studies 40. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

Quick, O.L. and Wells, C.: “Getting Tough with Defences” [2006] Crim L.R. 514. Sweet & Maxwell

Roberts, J. (eds): Principled Sentencing, 3rd edn (2009). Reprinted by permission of Hart, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc Roberts, P.: “The Philosophical Foundations of Consent in the Criminal Law” (1997) 17(3) O.J.L.S. 389. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

Robinson, P.H.: Distributive Principles of Criminal Law: Who Should be Punished and How Much? (2008). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: Criminal Law Defences, Vol.2, 1984. West Group, part of Thomson Reuters

——: “Criminal Law Defenses: A Systematic Analysis” (1982) 82 Columbia Law Review 199. Reprinted by permission of Columbia Law Review Association, Inc

——: “Hybrid Principles for the Distribution of Criminal Sanctions” (1988) 82 Northwestern University Law Review 19. Reprinted by special permission of Northwestern University Law Review ——: and Darley J.M.: “Does Criminal Law Deter? A Behavioural Science Investigation” (2004) 24 O.J.L.S. 173. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

Rogers, J.: “Death, Drugs and Duties” [2009] Archbold News 6. Sweet & Maxwell Rosenhan, D.L.: “On Being Sane in Insane Places” (1973) 179 Science 250. Rumney, P. and Morgan-Taylor, M.: “Recognizing the Male Victim: Gender Neutrality and the Law of Rape” (1997) 26 Anglo-American Law Review 198. Reprinted with the permission of Philip Rumney

Schulhofer, S.: “Harm and Punishment: A Critique of emphasis on the results conduct in the Criminal Law” 122 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1497 (1974). Reprinted by permission of University of Pennsylvania Law School ——: Unwanted Sex: The Culture of Intimidation and the Failure of the Law (1998). Reprinted by permission of Harvard University Press Shute, S. and Horder, J.: “Thieving and Deceiving: What is the Difference?’’ (1993) 56 M.L.R. 548. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

——: “The Second Law Commission Consultation Paper on Consent: Something Old, Something

New, Something Borrowed: Three Aspects of the Project’’ [1996] Crim. L.R. 684. Sweet & Maxwell Simester, A.P.: Appraising Strict Liability (2005). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: and Sullivan, G.R. (eds): Harm and Culpability (1964). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press ——: and Sullivan, G.R.: “On the nature and Rationale of property offences” In R.A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes (2005). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press ——: “Intoxication is Never a Defence’’ [2009] Crim. L.R. 3. Sweet & Maxwell Simpson, A.W.B.: “The Butler Committee’s Report: The Legal Aspects’’ (1976) 16 British Journal of Criminology 175. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Smith, A.T.H.: “Error and Mistake in Law in Anglo-American Criminal Law’’ (1985) 14 Anglo- American Law Review 3.

——: “The Idea of Criminal Deception’’ [1982] Crim. L.R. 721. Sweet & Maxwell Smith, J.C.: “Commentary on Broome v Perkins’’ [1987] Crim. L.R. 272. Sweet & Maxwell Smith, K.J.M.: A Modern Treatise on the Law of Complicity (1991). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press

——: “Duress and Steadfastness: In Pursuit of the Unintelligible’’ [1999] Crim. L.R. 363. Sweet & Maxwell ——: and W. Wilson, “Impaired voluntariness and criminal responsibility: reworking Hart’s theory of excuses—the English judicial response’’ (1993) 13 O.J.L.S. 69. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Smith, P.F.: (ed.) Criminal Law: Essays in Honour of J.C. Smith (1986). With permission of LexisNexis

Spencer, J.R.: “The Sexual Offences Act 2003: (2) Child and Family Offences’’ [2004] Crim. L.R. 347. Sweet & Maxwell

Stanton-Ife, J.: “Strict Liability: Stigma and Regret’’ (2007) 27 O.J.L.S. 151. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Stark, F.: “It’s Only Words: On Meaning and Mens Rea’’ (2013) 72(1) C.L.J. 155. Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press Stephen,

- J.F.: A History of the Criminal Law of England (1883). Macmillan
- Stevenson, K. and Harris, C.: “Inaccessible and Unknowable: Accretion and Uncertainty in Modern Criminal Law” (2008) 29 Liverpool Law Review 247. Reprinted by permission of Liverpool Law Review
- Szasz, T.S.: “The Myth of Mental Illness” (1960) 15 American Psychologist 113. Reprinted by permission of American Psychological Association
- Tadros, V.: Criminal Responsibility (2005). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : “Rape without Consent” [2006] 26 O.J.L.S. 515. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- : “The Characters of Excuse” (2001) 21 O.J.L.S. 495. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Taylor, P.J.: (ed.) Violence in Society (1993). Reprinted by permission of Royal College of Physicians, London
- Taylor, R.: “The Model of Tolerance and Self-Restraint” in Reed A. and Bohlander M. (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)
- Temkin, J. and Ashworth A.: “The Sexual Offences Act 2003: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328. Sweet & Maxwell
- : and Krahe: Sexual Assault and the Justice Gap: A Question of Attrition (2008). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Tolmie, J.: “Alcoholism and Criminal Liability” (2001) 64 M.L.R. 688. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons
- Tonry, M.: Sentencing Matters (1996). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press
- Veltford, H. and Lee, G.: “The Coconut Grove Fire: A Study in Scapegoating” Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology XXXVIII (No.2 Clinical Supp 1943) 138. Published by American Psychological Association
- Walker, N.: Punishment, Danger and Stigma (1980). Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons
- Wasik, M.: “Abandoning Criminal Intent” [1980] Crim. L.R. 785. Sweet

& Maxwell

——: “Partial Excuses in the Criminal Law” (1982) 45 M.L.R. 516.
Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

——: “Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales—State Of the Art”
[2008] Crim. L.R. 253. Sweet & Maxwell

Weekly Law Reports, Queen’s Bench Division, Appeal Cases and King’s Bench Law Reports are reprinted with permission of The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales Weihofen, H.: “Retribution is Obsolete,” National Probation and Parole Association
News, XXXIX (1960) 1

White, R.W.: The Abnormal Personality (1948). Ronald Press

Williams, G.: “Recklessness Redefined” [1982] C.L.J. 252. Reprinted by permission of Cambridge University Press

——: “Temporary Appropriation should be Theft” [1981] Crim. L.R.
129. Sweet & Maxwell

——: Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (1983). Stevens & Sons Ltd

——: Textbook of Criminal Law, 3rd edn (2012). Sweet & Maxwell

——: The Mental Element in Crime (1965). Magnes Press Wilson, W: “A Rational Scheme of Liability for Participating in Crime” [2008] Crim.
L.R. 3. Sweet & Maxwell

——: “Dealing with Drug-induced Homicide” in C.M.V. Clarkson and S.R. Cunningham (eds) Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death
(2008). Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis)

——: “Doctrinal Rationality after Woolin” (1999) 62 M.L.R. 448.
Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

——: “Is Hurting People Wrong” 1992 Journal of Social Welfare and Family Law 388. Reprinted by permission of Routledge (an imprint of Taylor & Francis Ltd)

——: “Murder and the Structure of Homicide” in Ashworth, A. and Mitchell, B. (eds) Rethinking English Homicide Law (2000).
Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Woodley, M.:
“Bargaining Over Corporate Manslaughter—What Price A Life?”
(2013) 77(1) J. Of Crim. Law 33. SAGE Publications

Wootton, Baroness: Crime and the Criminal Law: Reflections of a Magistrate and Social Scientist, 2nd edn (1981). Stevens & Sons Ltd

Zedner, L.: “Reparation and Retribution: Are They Reconcilable?” (1994) 57 M.L.R. 228. Reprinted by permission of John Wiley and Sons

Zeitlin, L.R.: “A Little Larceny Can Do a Lot for Employee Morale”, Psychology Today (June 1974), 22–26, 64. Reprinted with Permission by Psychology Today 2010. www.psychologytoday.com

While every care has been taken to establish and acknowledge copyright, and contact the copyright owners, the publishers tender their apologies for any accidental infringement. They would be pleased to come to a suitable arrangement with the rightful owners in each case.

TABLE OF CASES

- A (Children) (Conjoined Twins: Medical Treatment) (No.1), Re; sub nom A (Children) (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation), Re [2001] Fam. 147; [2001] 2 W.L.R. 480; [2000] 4 All E.R. 961; (2001) 57 B.M.L.R. 1 CA (Civ Div) 2-160, 4-002, 4-054, 4-081, 4-082, 4-087, 4-131, 4-182, 4-213, 4-225, 4-226, 4-227
- A v Secretary of State for the Home Department; sub nom X v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2004] UKHL 56; [2005] 2 A.C. 68; [2005] 2 W.L.R. 87 1-047
- A v United Kingdom (1999) 28 E.H.R.R. 603 4-090
- A v United Kingdom [1998] 2 F.L.R. 959; [1998] 3 F.C.R. 597; (1999) 27 E.H.R.R. 611 ECHR 1-048, 4-128
- A v United Kingdom: Department of Health Press release, 8 November 2001 4-128
- Abbott v Queen, The [1977] A.C. 755; [1976] 3 W.L.R. 462; [1976] 3 All E.R. 140 PC (Trin) 4-139, 4-141, 4-190, 4-192, 4-199, 4-231, 6-077, 6-086
- Absolom, Times, September 14. 1983 9-050
- Achterdam (1911) E.D.L. 336 SA 2-024
- Adams v Queen, The [1995] 1 W.L.R. 52; [1995] B.C.C. 376; [1995] 2 B.C.L.C. 17; [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 295 PC (NZ) 5-097
- Advocate (HM) v Fraser (1878) 4 Couper 70 4-298
- Aintree University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust v James [2013] UKSC 67; [2014] A.C. 591; [2013] 3 W.L.R. 1299 4-054
- Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] A.C. 789; [1993] 2 W.L.R. 316; [1993] 1 All E.R. 821 HL 2-061, 4-051, 4-052, 4-053, 4-054

Albert v Lavin; sub nom Lavin v Albert [1982] A.C. 546; [1981] 3 W.L.R. 955; [1981] 3 All E.R. 878 HL	2-263, 4-093
Alexander v Dunn [2016] HCJAC 3; 2016 J.C. 125; 2016 S.L.T. 337 HCJ	4-243
Alphacell Ltd v Woodward [1972] A.C. 824; [1972] 2 W.L.R. 1320; [1972] 2 All E.R. 475 HL	2-079, 3-001, 3-064
Anderton v Burnside. See R. v Morris (David Alan) Anderton v Ryan; sub nom Chief Constable of Greater Manchester v Ryan [1985] A.C. 560; [1985] 2 W.L.R. 968; [1985] 2 All E.R. 355 HL	4-197, 5-074, 5-075, 5-077, 5-078, 5-081, 5-083, 9-021
Andrews v DPP; sub nom R. v Andrews [1937] A.C. 576; (1938) 26 Cr. App. R. 34 HL	2-186, 8-045, 8-049, 8-052, 8-053, 8-069
Andronicou v Cyprus (25052/94) (1998) 25 E.H.R.R. 491; 3 B.H.R.C. 389; [1998] Crim. L.R. 823 ECHR	4-094, 4-104
Ansell v Thomas [1974] Crim. L.R. 31 CA (Civ Div)	7-010
Appleby. See Att Gen's Reference (Nos.60, 62 and 63 of 2009), Re Arizona v Clarke (2006) 548 US 735	4-278
Assange v Sweden [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin); (2011) 108(44) L.S.G. 17	4-048, 7-127, 7-128
Att Gen v Able [1984] Q.B. 795; [1983] 3 W.L.R. 845; [1984] 1 All E.R. 277 QBD	6-009, 6-012, 6-029
Att Gen v Prior, Mackay and Gearty [2001] Crim.L.R.560	1-047, 4-253
Att Gen v Prior [2002] Jersey Law Reports 11	1-047
Att Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1974), Re [1974] Q.B. 744; [1974] 2 W.L.R. 891; [1974] 2 All E.R. 899 CA (Crim Div)	9-233
Att Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1975), Re [1975] Q.B. 773; [1975] 3 W.L.R. 11; [1975] 2 All E.R. 684 CA (Crim Div)	6-008, 6-009, 6-012, 6-038, 6-040, 6-049
Att Gen's Reference (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979), Re [1980] Q.B. 180; [1979] 3 W.L.R.	5-065, 9-126, 9-226

577; [1979] 3 All E.R. 143 CA (Crim Div) ...
Att Gen's Reference (No.4 of 1980), Re [1981] 1 W.L.R. 705; [1981] 2 All E.R. 617; (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 40 CA (Crim Div)	2-239
Att Gen's Reference (No.6 of 1980), Re [1981] Q.B. 715; [1981] 3 W.L.R. 125; [1981] 2 All E.R. 1057 CA (Crim Div)	4-069, 325
Att Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1983), Re [1985] Q.B. 182; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 686; [1984] 3 All E.R. 369 CA (Crim Div)	9-082, 9-083
Att Gen's Reference (No.2 of 1983), Re [1984] Q.B. 456; [1984] 2 W.L.R. 465; [1984] 1 All E.R. 988 CA (Crim Div)	4-102, 4-117
Att Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1985), Re [1986] Q.B. 491; [1986] 2 W.L.R. 733; [1986] 2 All E.R. 219; (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 70 CA (Crim Div)	9-061, 9-062, 9-079, 9-173
Att Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1992), Re [1993] 1 W.L.R. 274; [1993] 2 All E.R. 190; (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 298 CA (Crim Div)	5-037
Att Gen's Reference (No.2 of 1992), Re [1994] Q.B. 91; [1993] 3 W.L.R. 982; [1993] 4 All E.R. 683; (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 429 CA (Crim Div)	4-241
Att Gen's Reference (No.3 of 1992), Re [1994] 1 W.L.R. 409; (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 383; [1994] R.T.R. 122 CA (Crim Div)	2-070, 5-059, 5-060, 5-064
Att Gen's Reference (No.3 of 1994), Re [1998] A.C. 245; [1997] 3 W.L.R. 421; [1997] 3 All E.R. 936 HL	2-241, 2-251, 2-253, 2-254, 8-007, 8-026, 8-027, 8-065
Att Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1995), Re; sub nom R. v F; R. v B [1996] 1 W.L.R. 970; [1996] 4 All E.R. 21; [1996] 5 Bank. L.R. 173 CA (Crim Div)	2-277
Att Gen's Reference (No.3 of 1998), Re	4-258

[2000] Q.B. 401; [1999] 3 W.L.R. 1194; [1999] 3 All E.R. 40; [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 214 CA (Crim Div)
Att Gen's Reference (No.71 of 1998), Re; sub nom, R. v Anderson (Paul) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 369; [1999] Crim. L.R. 587 CA (Crim Div)	6-003
Att Gen's Reference (No.2 of 1999), Re [2000] Q.B. 796; [2000] 3 W.L.R. 195; [2000] 3 All E.R. 182; [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 207 CA (Crim Div)	3-075, 3-078, 3-095, 8-079
Att Gen's Reference (No.4 of 2000), Re; sub nom R. v GC [2001] EWCA Crim 780; [2001] 2 Cr. App. R. 22; [2001] R.T.R. 27; [2001] Crim. L.R. 578	2-257
Att Gen's Reference (No.62 of 2001) [2002] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 94	8-173
Att Gen's Reference (Nos 91, 119, 120 of 2002), Re [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. (S) 338	7-165
Att Gen's Reference (No.3 of 2003), Re [2004] EWCA Crim 868; [2005] Q.B. 73; [2004] 3 W.L.R. 451	2-206
Att Gen's Reference (No.4 of 2004), Re [2005] EWCA Crim 889; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 2810 ; [2005] Crim L.R. 799	7-071
Att Gen's Reference (Nos 3 and 4 of 2005), Re; sub nom R. v Crawley (Alexander Steven); R. v Llewellyn (David Stephen) [2005] EWCA Crim 574; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 98	5-079
Att Gen's Reference (No.86 of 2006), Re; sub nom R. v Julkowski (Jarek) [2006] EWCA Crim 3077; (2006) 103(44) L.S.G. 29; (2006) 150 S.J.L.B. 1468	7-165
Att Gen's Reference (No.111 of 2006), Re; sub nom R. v Hussain (Ghulam) [2006] EWCA Crim 3269; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 26	8-187
Att Gen's Reference (No.24 of 2008), Re; sub nom R. v Sanchez (Kelly Elizabeth)	8-019

[2008] EWCA Crim 2936; [2009] 3 All E.R. 839; [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 41 Att Gen's Reference (No.66 of 2008), Re; sub nom [2009] EWCA Crim 87; [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 63	7-098
Att Gen's Reference (Nos 7, 8 and 9 of 2009), Re; sub nom R. v McMorris (Rogel) R. v Raymond (Yusuf) [2009] EWCA Crim 1490; [2010] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 67	7-165
Att Gen's Reference (Nos 60, 62 and 63 of 2009), Re; R. v Cowles (Tom Andrew); R. v Cowles (Ben Kevin); R. v Roberts (Peter Jason); R. v Bryan (Thomas); R. v Appleby (Declan Paul) [2009] EWCA Crim 2693; [2010] Crim. L.R. 325	8-081
Att Gen's Reference (No.73 of 2012), Re [2012] EWCA Crim 2924; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 38; [2013] Crim. L.R. 440	8-019
Att Gen's Reference (No.16 of 2014) [2014] EWCA Crim 956 CA (Civ Div)	8-081
Att Gen's Reference (No.105 of 2014) [2014] EWCA Crim 2751; [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 45	7-162
Att Gen's Reference (No.142 of 2015) [2016] EWCA Crim 80; [2016] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 68	7-162
Att Gen for Jersey v Holley [2005] UKPC 23; [2005] 2 A.C. 580; [2005] 3 W.L.R. 29	8-122, 8-124, 8-126, 8-127, 8-129, 8-131, 8-133
Att Gen of Hong Kong v Nai Keung [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1339; (1987) 3 B.C.C. 403 PC (Hong Kong)	9-048
Att Gen of Northern Ireland v Gallagher (Patrick) [1963] A.C. 349; [1961] 3 W.L.R. 619; [1961] 3 All E.R. 299 HL	4-311, 4-319, 4-343, 4-345
Att Gen of Northern Ireland's Reference (No.1 of 1975), Re [1977] A.C. 105; [1976] 3 W.L.R. 235; [1976] 2 All E.R.	4-100

937 HL (NI)
B (A Child) v DPP; sub nom B (A Minor) v DPP [2000] 2 A.C. 428; [2000] 2 W.L.R. 452; [2000] 1 All E.R. 833 HL	2-261, 2-262, 3-002, 3-004, 3-005
B (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment), Re [1981] 1 W.L.R. 1421; 80 L.G.R. 107; (1981) 125 S.J. 608 CA (Civ Div)	4-052
B (A Minor) v DPP. See B (A Child) v DPP B v NHS Hospital Trust; B (Adult: Refusal of Medical Treatment), Re [2002] EWHC 429 (Fam); [2002] 2 All E.R. 449; [2002] 1 F.L.R. 1090,	4-052
B v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2005] EWCA Civ 929; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 3796	9-168
Ballenger v State, 210 Ga.App.627, 436 S.E. 2d 793 (1993)	1-087
Banda (1990) (3) S.A. 466	4-235
Banks (1873) 12 Cox C.C. 393	5-128
Barclays Bank Plc v Weeks, Legg and Dean [1999] Q.B. 309; [1998] 3 W.L.R. 656 CA (Civ Div)	9-151
Barnfather v Islington Education Authority; sub nom Barnfather v Islington LBC [2003] EWHC 418 (Admin); [2003] 1 W.L.R. 2318; [2003] E.L.R. 263	3-013, 3-027
Beckford v Queen, The [1988] A.C. 130; [1987] 3 W.L.R. 611; [1987] 3 All E.R. 425 PC (Jam)	2-265, 2-266, 2-272, 4-093, 4-115
Bedder v DPP [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1119; [1954] 2 All E.R. 801; (1954) 38 Cr. App. R. 133 HL	8-096, 8-124
Beghal v DPP [2013] EWHC 2573 (Admin); [2014] 2 W.L.R. 150	1-047
Bell. See DPP v Bell (Derek) Bellinger v Bellinger [2003] UKHL 21; [2003] 2 A.C. 467; [2003] 2 W.L.R. 1174	4-067
Benton v United States, 232 F.2d 341 (D.C. Cir.1956)	5-155

Bilton, Independent , December 20, 2005	4-268
Blakely v DPP; sub nom Blakely v Chief Constable of West Mercia; Sutton v DPP [1991] R.T.R. 405; [1991] Crim. L.R. 763; [1991] C.O.D. 443 DC	2-201, 6-040
Bland. See Airedale NHS Trust v Bland Board of Trade v Owen; sub nom R. v Owen (Henry Geoffrey); R. v Seth-Smith (Patrick Sidney) [1957] A.C. 602; [1957] 2 W.L.R. 351; [1957] 1 All E.R. 411 HL	5-098
Bolton Hospitals NHS Trust v O [2002] EWHC 2871 (Fam)	4-048
Booth v Crown Prosecution Service [2006] EWHC 192 (Admin); (2006) 170 J.P. 305; (2006) 170 J.P.N. 513	2-205
Bratty v Att Gen of Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386; [1961] 3 W.L.R. 965; [1961] 3 All E.R. 523 HL	4-001, 4-239, 4-264, 4-265, 4-266, 4-269, 4-297, 4-311
Brennan (Ian) v HM Advocate, 1977 J.C. 38; 1977 S.L.T. 151 HCJ	4-302, 8-146
Bromley (1992) 142 N.L.J. 116 Winchester Crown Ct	4-345
Broome v Perkins (1987) 85 Cr. App. R. 321; [1987] R.T.R. 321; [1987] Crim. L.R. 271 DC	4-239
Brown v State [2003] UKPC 10	6-018
Bubbins v United Kingdom (50196/99) (2005) 41 E.H.R.R. 24; [2005] Inquest L.R. 24 ECHR	4-094
Buckoke v Greater London Council [1971] Ch. 655; [1971] 2 W.L.R. 760; [1971] 2 All E.R. 254 CA (Civ Div)	4-132
Bullock v US, 122 F. 2d 213 9D.C. Cir. 1941	8-211
Burke v General Medical Council. See R. (on the application of Burke) v General Medical Council Burns (Craig John) v HM Advocate (Self Defence) 1995 J.C. 154; 1995 S.L.T. 1090; 1995 S.C.C.R.	4-092

532 HCJ
C (A Minor) v DPP; sub nom Curry v DPP [1996] A.C. 1; [1995] 2 W.L.R. 383; [1995] 2 All E.R. 43 HL	4-361
Callow v Tillstone (1900) 8 L.T. 411	6-006
Cambridgeshire and Isle of Ely CC v Rust [1972] 2 Q.B. 426; [1972] 3 W.L.R. 226; [1972] 3 All E.R. 232 DC	2-280
Campbell v United Kingdom (7511/76); Cosans v United Kingdom (7743/76) (1981) 3 E.H.R.R. 531 Eur Comm HR	4-012, 4-128
Carmichael v Boyle, 1985 S.L.T. 399; 1985 S.C.C.R. 58 HCJ Appeal	4-298
Cartledge v Allen [1973] Crim. L.R. 530 QBD	7-048
Cassady v Morris (Reg) (Transport) Ltd [1975] R.T.R. 470; [1975] Crim. L.R. 398 DC	6-016
Chan Man-Sin v Queen, The; sub nom Chan Man-Sin v Att Gen of Hong Kong [1988] 1 W.L.R. 196; [1988] 1 All E.R. 1; (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 303 PC (HK)	9-041, 9-045
Chan Wing Siu v R [1985] A.C. 168; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 677; [1984] 3 All E.R. 877 PC (HK)	6-018, 6-019, 6-028, 6-029, 6-030, 6-031, 6-032, 6-032, 6-037
Chandler (Terence Norman) v DPP; sub nom R. v Ch4ndler (Terence Norman) (No.1); R. v Pottle (Patrick Brian); R. v Allegranza (Helen); R. v Dixon (Ian Edward); R. v Hatton (Trevor Richard); R. v Randle (Michael Joseph) [1964] A.C. 763; [1962] 3 W.L.R. 694; [1962] 3 All E.R. 142 HL	2-129, 2-165
Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] Ch. 105; [1980] 2 W.L.R. 202; [1979] 3 All E.R. 1025 Ch D	9-058, 9-083
Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset v Shimmen (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 7;	2-196

[1986] Crim. L.R. 800 QBD
Chiu-Cheung v Queen, The [1995] 1 A.C. 111; [1994] 3 W.L.R. 514 PC (Hong Kong)	4-231
Christian v Queen, The; sub nom R. v Christian (Stevens Raymond) [2006] UKPC 47; [2007] 2 A.C. 400; [2007] 2 W.L.R. 120	2-277, 2-280
City of Sault Ste Marie (1978) 85 DLR (3d) 161	3-024
Cogden, unreported, 1950 (Australia)	4-238
Cole v Turner (1705) 6 Mod. 149, 87 E.R. 907	7-003
Coley (Scott) v Queen, The [2013] EWCA Crim 223	4-241, 4-243, 4-329
Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 W.L.R. 1172; [1984] 3 All E.R. 374; (1984) 79 Cr. App. R. 229 DC	7-023
Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis v Charles (Derek Michael); sub nom R. v Charles (Derek Michael) [1977] A.C. 177; [1976] 3 W.L.R. 431; [1976] 3 All E.R. 112 HL	9-144, 9-146
Commonwealth v Welansky, 316, Mass. 383, 55 N.E. 2d 902 (1944) Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts	2-071, 2-074, 2-077, 2-078, 2-085
Cooper v McKenna [1960] Q.L.R. 406	4-239
Corbett v Corbett [1971] P. 83; [1970] 2 W.L.R. 1306 PDAD	4-067
Corcoran v Anderton (1980) 71 Cr. App. R. 104; [1980] Crim. L.R. 385 DC	9-214
Corcoran v Whent [1977] Crim. L.R. 52 DC	9-008
Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom (13134/87) [1994] 1 F.C.R. 65; (1995) 19 E.H.R.R. 112 ECHR	4-128
Crawley and Llewellyn. See Att Gen's Reference (Nos 3 and 4 of 2005), Re; sub nom R. v Crawley (Alexander Steven); R. v Llewellyn (David Stephen)	9-048

Cresswell v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin)
Crown Prosecution Service v Brown [2007] EWHC 3274 (Admin)	4–189
Crown Prosecution Service v P; sub nom DPP v P [2007] EWHC 946 (Admin); [2008] 1 W.L.R. 1005; [2007] 4 All E.R. 628	4–361
D v DPP [2005] EWHC 967 (Admin); [2005] Crim. L.R. 962	7–029
Data Protection Registrar v Amnesty International (British Section) [1995] Crim. L.R. 633; [1995] C.O.D. 325 DC	2–201
Davey v Lee; Rigler v Lee [1968] 1 Q.B. 366; [1967] 3 W.L.R. 105; [1967] 2 All E.R. 423 QBD	5–028
Davidge v Bunnett [1984] Crim. L.R. 297 DC	9–073, 9–075
Davies, Times , 11 February, 2006	4–268
Davis v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2016] EWHC 38 (QB)	4–088, 4–093, 4–094
Devlin v Armstrong [1971] N.I. 13 CA (NI)	4–086, 4–116
Dhaliwal v DPP. See R. (on the application of Dhaliwal) v DPP DPP v Bailey [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 257; [1995] Crim. L.R. 313 PC (Jam)	4–087, 4–243
DPP v Bayer; DPP v Hart; DPP v Snook; DPP v Whistance [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin); [2004] 1 W.L.R. 2856; [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. 38	4–082
DPP v Beard [1920] A.C. 479; (1920) 14 Cr. App. R. 159; 12 A.L.R. 846 HL	4–311, 4–319, 4–345
DPP v Bell (Derek) [1992] R.T.R. 335; [1992] Crim. L.R. 176; (1992) 156 J.P.N. 461 DC	4–160, 4–189, 4–201
DPP v Camplin. See R. v Camplin (Paul) DPP v Chorley Justices [2006] EWHC 1796 (Admin)	4–135

DPP v Collins [2006] UKHL 40; [2006] 1 W.L.R. 2223; [2006] 4 All E.R. 602	3-005
DPP v Davis; DPP v Pittaway [1994] Crim. L.R. 600; (1995) 159 J.P.N. 194 QBD	4-154, 4-170, 4-189
DPP v Doot; sub nom R. v Doot (Robert Leroy); R. v Watts (James Wesley); R. v Fay (Michael Augustus); R. v Loving (Jeffrey Richard); R. v Shanahan (Thomas); R. v Shannahan (Thomas); DPP v Shanahan (Thomas); DPP v Watts (James Wesley); DPP v Fay (Michael Augustus); DPP v Loving (Jeffrey Richard) [1973] A.C. 807; [1973] 2 W.L.R. 532; [1973] 1 All E.R. 940 HL	5-120
DPP v Gomez (Edwin) [1993] A.C. 442; [1992] 3 W.L.R. 1067; [1993] 1 All E.R. 1 HL	9-025, 9-026, 9-027, 9-028, 9-029, 9-030, 9-032, 9-034, 9-041, 9-043, 9-045, 9-058, 9-089, 9-159
DPP v Green [2004] EWHC 1225 (QB)	7-067, 7-069
DPP v H. See DPP v Harper DPP v Harper; sub nom DPP v H [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1406; (1997) 161 J.P. 697; [1998] R.T.R. 200 QBD	3-021
DPP v Harris (Nigel) [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 170; (1994) 158 J.P. 896; [1995] R.T.R. 100 QBD	4-217
DPP v Huskinson (1988) 152 J.P. 582; (1988) 20 H.L.R. 562; [1988] Crim. L.R. 620 DC	9-074, 9-077
DPP v Jones [1990] R.T.R. 33; (1990) 154 J.P.N. 597 DC	4-189, 4-201
DPP v K (A Minor) [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1067; [1990] 1 All E.R. 331; (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 23 QBD	7-019, 7-025, 7-026
DPP v K [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 36; [1997] Crim. L.R. 121 DC	6-054
DPP v Kellett (1994) 158 J.P. 1138; [1994] Crim. L.R. 916; [1995] C.O.D. 32 QBD	4-333
DPP v Lavender (Melvyn) [1994] Crim. L.R. 297 DC	9-112

DPP v McFarlene [2002] EWHC 485 (Admin)	7-071
DPP v Morgan; sub nom R. v Morgan (William Anthony); DPP v McDonald; DPP v McLarty; DPP v Parker [1976] A.C. 182; [1975] 2 W.L.R. 913; [1975] 2 All E.R. 347 HL	2-218, 2-259, 2-262, 2-263, 2-264, 2-265, 2-270, 2-271, 4-044, 7-140
DPP v Mullally [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin)	4-189
DPP v Newbury (Neil); DPP v Jones (Robert) [1977] A.C. 500; [1976] 2 W.L.R. 918; [1976] 2 All E.R. 365 HL	6-034, 8-060, 8-061, 8-089
DPP v Nock; sub nom R. v Nock (David Michael); R. v Alford (Kevin Charles); DPP v Alford [1978] A.C. 979; [1978] 3 W.L.R. 57; [1978] 2 All E.R. 654 HL	5-070, 5-080, 5-118, 5-149
DPP v P&O European Ferries (Dover) Ltd (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 73	3-054, 3-095
DPP v Pal [2000] Crim. L.R 756 DC	7-071
DPP v Ramos [2000] Crim. L.R. 768; [2000] C.O.D. 287 DC	7-017
DPP v Ray; sub nom Ray v Sempers [1974] A.C. 370; [1973] 3 W.L.R. 359; [1973] 3 All E.R. 131 HL	9-144, 9-147
DPP v Santa-Bermudez; sub nom DPP v Santana-Bermudez [2003] EWHC 2908 (Admin); (2004) 168 J.P. 373; [2004] Crim. L.R. 471	2-043, 7-023
DPP v Shannon (David Charles) [1975] A.C. 717; [1974] 3 W.L.R. 155; [1974] 2 All E.R. 1009 HL	5-101
DPP v SJ (A Juvenile) [2002] EWHC 291	9-112
DPP v Smith (Jim); sub nom R. v Smith (Jim) [1961] A.C. 290; [1960] 3 W.L.R. 546; [1960] 3 All E.R. 161 HL	2-138, 2-139, 7-047, 8-011
DPP v Smith [2006] EWHC 94 (Admin); [2006] 1 W.L.R. 1571; [2006] 2 All E.R. 16; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 1	7-035, 9-051
DPP v Stonehouse [1978] A.C. 55; [1977]	5-028

3 W.L.R. 143; [1977] 2 All E.R. 909 HL DPP v Taylor (Keith Richard); DPP v Little [1992] Q.B. 645; [1992] 2 W.L.R. 460; [1992] 1 All E.R. 299; (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 28 QBD	7-004
DPP v Tomkinson [2001] EWHC Admin 182; [2001] R.T.R. 38	4-189, 4-201
DPP v Withers (Ian Douglas); sub nom R. v Withers (Ian Douglas); R. v Gearing (Helen); R. v Withers (Stuart Robert); R. v Withers (Helen); R. v Withers (Phyllis May) [1975] A.C. 842; [1974] 3 W.L.R. 751; [1974] 3 All E.R. 984; (1974) 60 Cr. App. R. 85; [1975] Crim. L.R. 95; (1974) 118 S.J. 862 HL	5-098
DPP v Woods [2002] EWHC 85 (Admin)	7-068, 7-067
DPP (Jamaica) v Bailey [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 257; [1995] Crim. L.R. 313 PC (Jam)	4-087
DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653; [1975] 2 W.L.R. 641; [1975] 1 All E.R. 913 HL	4-146, 4-149, 4-154, 4-159, 4-177, 4-190, 4-191, 4-194, 4-195, 6-009, 6-024, 6-077, 6-079, 6-086, 6-087, 8-081 5-137, 6-009, 6-027, 6-029
DPP of Northern Ireland v Maxwell; sub nom R. v Maxwell (James Charles); Maxwell v DPP of Northern Ireland [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1350; [1978] 3 All E.R. 1140; (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 128 HL
Dobson v General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp [1990] 1 Q.B. 274; [1989] 3 W.L.R. 1066; [1989] 3 All E.R. 927 CA (Civ Div)	9-024, 9-027, 9-062
Dowson v Northumbria Police [2010] EWHC 2612 (QB)	7-015
Drury v HM Advocate, 2001 S.L.T. 1013; 2001 S.C.C.R. 583 HCJ	8-038
Du Cros v Lambourne [1907] 1 K.B. 40, KBD	6-016
Dunbar v Plant [1998] Ch. 412; [1997] 3 W.L.R. 1261; [1997] 4 All E.R. 289 CA (Civ Div)	8-152

Eddy v Niman (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 237; [1981] Crim. L.R. 502 DC	9-023, 9-033
El-Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings Plc (No.1) [1994] 2 All E.R. 685; [1994] B.C.C. 143; [1994] 1 B.C.L.C. 464 CA (Civ Div)	3-074
Elitestone Ltd v Morris [1997] 1 W.L.R. 687; [1997] 2 All E.R. 513; (1998) 30 H.L.R. 266 HL	9-048
Elliott v C (A Minor) [1983] 1 W.L.R. 939; [1983] 2 All E.R. 1005; (1983) 77 Cr. App. R. 103 DC	2-198, 2-199, 2-200, 2-215, 2-221
Environment Agency (formerly National Rivers Authority) v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd; sub nom Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd v National Rivers Authority [1999] 2 A.C. 22; [1998] 2 W.L.R. 350; [1998] 1 All E.R. 481 HL	2-050, 2-079, 2-094, , 2- 095, 2-107, 2-108, 2-109, 3- 121
Environment Agency v Brook Plc Times 26 March 1998	2-095
Evans v Hughes [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1452; [1972] 3 All E.R. 412; (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 813 QBD	4-118
Evans v Serious Fraud Office [2015] EWHC 263 (QB); [2015] 1 W.L.R. 3595; [2015] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 223 QBD	9-173
Express Ltd (t/a Express Dairies Distribution) v Environment Agency [2003] EWHC 448 (Admin); [2004] 1 W.L.R. 579; [2003] 2 All E.R. 778	2-095
F (Mental Patient: Sterilisation), Re. See F v West Berkshire HA F v West Berkshire HA; sub nom F (Mental Patient: Sterilisation), Re [1990] 2 A.C. 1; [1989] 2 W.L.R. 1025; [1989] 2 All E.R. 545 HL	4-048, 4-054, 4-216
Fagan v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [1969] 1 Q.B. 439; [1968] 3	2-043, 2-243

W.L.R. 1120; [1968] 3 All E.R. 442 DC
Faulkner v Talbot [1981] 1 W.L.R. 1528;	7-023
[1981] 3 All E.R. 468; (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 1 DC
FHR European Ventures LLP v	9-061, 9-079
Mankarious [2013] EWCA Civ 17;
[2014] Ch. 1; [2013] 3 W.L.R. 466
Finch and Jardine unreported, 12-19	4-093
October 1982 CCC
Floyd v DPP; sub nom Floyd v Crown	9-066, 9-067
Prosecution Service [2000] Crim. L.R. 411 QBD
Frankland (Graham Ralph) v Queen, The;	2-139
Moore (Stephen Philip) v Queen, The [1987] A.C. 576; [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1251;
(1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 116 PC (IoM)
G v United Kingdom (37334/08)	3-029, 3-030
unreported 2011 ECHR
Galoo Ltd v Bright Grahame Murray	2-086
[1994] 1 W.L.R. 1360; [1995] 1 All E.R. 16; [1994] B.C.C. 319 CA (Civ Div)
Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v Att Gen of	3-006, 3-014
Hong Kong [1985] A.C. 1; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 437; [1984] 2 All E.R. 503 PC (HK)
Gardner v Akeroyd [1952] 2 Q.B. 743;	5-054
[1952] 2 All E.R. 306; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 169 DC
Germany v Kumar (No.1); sub nom	9-072, 9-078, 9-079
Kumar, Re [2000] Crim. L.R. 504 QBD
Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA	2-160, 4-049, 4-050, 4-216,
[1986] A.C. 112; [1985] 3 W.L.R. 830;	4-361, 6-029
[1985] 3 All E.R. 402 HL
Goldschmitt v State, 490 So.2d 123 (Fla. 1986)	1-087
Gollins v Gollins [1964] A.C. 644; [1963] 3 W.L.R. 176; [1963] 2 All E.R. 966 HL	2-149
Government of USA v Jennings. See R. v Governor of Holloway Prison Ex p. Jennings; sub nom United States v	2-276

Jennings Grant v Borg [1982] 1 W.L.R. 638; [1982] 2 All E.R. 257; (1982) 126 S.J. 311 HL
Great Western Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust v AA [2014] EWHC 132 (Fam)	3-139, 4-048
Gul v Turkey (22676/93) (2002) 34 E.H.R.R. 28 ECHR	4-094
H v Crown Prosecution Service [2010] EWHC 1374 (Admin), [2012] Q.B. 257	4-066
Halifax Plc v Curry Popeck [2008] EWHC 1692 (Ch)	9-151
Hampshire CC v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin); [2008] E.L.R. 260	3-021, 4-203
Handyside's Case (Dr) (1749) 3 East P.C. 652	9-051
Harris (Darren) v Queen, The [2013] EWCA Crim 223	4-271, 4-329
Harrow LBC v Shah [2000] 1 W.L.R. 83; [1999] 3 All E.R. 302; [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 457 QBD	3-012
Hart [1986] NZLR 48	2-089
Haughton v Smith; sub nom R. v Smith (Roger Daniel) [1975] A.C. 476; [1974] 2 W.L.R. 1; [1973] 3 All E.R. 1109 HL	5-028, 5-043, 5-069, 5-070, 5-071, 5-080, 5-082, 5-118
Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire; sub nom Haystead v DPP [2000] 3 All E.R. 890; [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 339; (2000) 164 J.P. 396 DC	7-004, 7-019, 7-026
Hayward (1833) 6 C. & P. 157	8-104
Hayward (1908) 21 Cox C.C. 692	2-087, 2-112, 2-119, 8-063, 8-099
Hensler, Re (1870) 11 Cox C.C. 570	2-007
Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 2 K.B. 142; [1948] 1 All E.R. 860; 64 T.L.R. 256 DC	9-054
Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 Q.B. 277; [1958] 2 W.L.R. 76; [1958] 1 All E.R. 193 QBD	3-021, 4-243, 4-292
HL Bolton Engineering Co Ltd v TJ Graham & Sons Ltd [1957] 1 Q.B. 159; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 804; [1956] 3 All E.R. 624 CA	3-071

Holdich v Lothian Health Board [2013] CSOH 197; 2014 S.L.T. 495; 2014 G.W.D. 10-182 CSOH	9-051
Holmes v DPP [1946] A.C. 588; (1946) 31 Cr. App. R. 123 HL	8-104
Holmes v Governor of Brixton Prison; sub nom Holmes, Re [2004] EWHC 2020 (Admin); [2005] 1 W.L.R. 1857; [2005] 1 All E.R. 490	9-133, 9-150
Hyam v DPP; sub nom R. v Hyam (Pearl Kathleen) [1975] A.C. 55; [1974] 2 W.L.R. 607; [1974] 2 All E.R. 41 HL	2-137, 2-142, 2-162, 2-169, 2-172, 2-175, 2-176, 2-177, 2-184, 4-319, 8-011, 8-013, 8-031, 8-032, 8-033, 8-034, 8-224
Idrees v DPP [2011] EWHC 624 (Admin)	9-148
IM v LM (Capacity to Consent to Sexual Relations) [2014] EWCA Civ 37	4-049
International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department; sub nom R. (on the application of International Transport Roth GmbH) v Secretary of State for the Home Department; Secretary of State for the Home Department v International Transport Roth GmbH [2002] EWCA Civ 158; [2003] Q.B. 728; [2002] 3 W.L.R. 344	3-030
Ivey v Genting Casinos UK Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club) [2016] EWCA Civ 1093; [2017] 1 W.L.R. 679; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 16 CA (Civ Div)	9-034
J (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment), Re [1991] Fam. 33; [1991] 2 W.L.R. 140; [1990] 3 All E.R. 930 CA (Civ Div)	4-052
J, Re [1992] 3 W.L.R. 521	4-050
Jaggard v Dickinson [1981] Q.B. 527; [1981] 2 W.L.R. 118; [1980] 3 All E.R. 716 DC	4-337, 4-338

Jason Prior v Att-Gen [2002] Crim. L.R. 728	4-277
JJC (A Minor) v Eisenhower; sub nom C (A Minor) v Eisenhower [1984] Q.B. 331; [1983] 3 W.L.R. 537; [1983] 3 All E.R. 230; (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 48 QBD	7-046
Johnson v DPP [2008] EWHC 509 (Admin)	7-071
Johnson v Phillips [1976] 1 W.L.R. 65; [1975] 3 All E.R. 682; [1976] R.T.R. 170 QBD	4-214
Johnstone (Justin Ames) v The Queen [2016] NZSC 83	5-038
Jones (Setting of Minimum Term), Re; sub nom R. v Jones (Neil); R. v Chandi (Amandeep Singh); R. v Multani (Hardeep Singh); R. v Khangura (Sukhjiwan Singh); R. v Dosanjh (Jaswinder Singh); R. v Ashman (Joseph Clifford); R. v Hobson (Mark); Chandi (Setting of Minimum Term), Re; Multani (Setting of Minimum Term), Re; Khangura (Setting of Minimum Term), Re; Dosanjh (Setting of Minimum Term), Re; Ashman (Setting of Minimum Term), Re; Hobson (Setting of Minimum Term), Re [2005] EWCA Crim 3115; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 19; [2006] Crim. L.R. 262	8-019
Jones v Brooks (1968) 52 Cr. App. R. 614; [1968] Crim. L.R. 498; (1968) 112 S.J. 745 DC	5-028
K W and H (Minors) (Consent to Medical Treatment [1993] 1 F.L.R. 845	4-050
Kaitamaki v Queen, The [1985] A.C. 147; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 137; [1984] 2 All E.R. 435 PC (NZ)	7-139
Kamara v DPP; R. v Kamara (Unisa Sallia); R. v Kamara (Moulai Moubarack); R. v Kamara (Frederick	5-093

Wasm); R. v John (Joseph Adewole); R. v John (Henry Olufemi); R. v Dauda (Joseph Bandabla); R. v Benjamin (Bianca); R. v Samura (Mohamed Lehai) [1974] A.C. 104; [1973] 3 W.L.R. 198; [1973] 2 All E.R. 1242 HL
Kaur v Chief Constable of Hampshire [1981] 1 W.L.R. 578; [1981] 2 All E.R. 430; (1981) 72 Cr. App. R. 359 DC	9-058
Kay v Butterworth (1945) 61 T.L.R. 452	4-243
Kebeline. See R. v DPP Ex p. Kebilene Kite, Independent , 9 December 1994	3-095
Knüller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP; sub nom R. v Knüller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd; Keen (Graham) v DPP; Stansill (Peter) v DPP; Hall (David) v DPP [1973] A.C. 435; [1972] 3 W.L.R. 143; [1972] 2 All E.R. 898 HL	5-099
Kosar v Bank of Scotland Plc t/a Halifax [2011] EWHC 1050 (Admin)	3-054
Kumar, Re. See Germany v Kumar (No.1) La Fontaine 11 A.L.R. 507	8-205
Large v Mainprize; Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food v Mainprize [1989] Crim. L.R. 213; [1989] C.O.D. 249 DC	2-201
Laskey v United Kingdom; Jaggard v United Kingdom; Brown v United Kingdom (1997) 24 E.H.R.R. 39 ECHR	1-047, 4-059
Lawrence v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; sub nom R. v Lawrence (Alan) [1972] A.C. 626; [1971] 3 W.L.R. 225; [1971] 2 All E.R. 1253 HL	9-013, 9-018
Le Barron v State, 32 Wis.2d 294; 145 N.W.2d 79 (1966)	5-042
Leach, Times , 15 January 1969	4-055
Lee Chun Chuen (alias Lee Wing-Cheuk) v Queen, The [1963] A.C. 220; [1962] 3 W.L.R. 1461; [1963] 1 All E.R. 73 PC (HK)	8-104

Lewin v Crown Prosecution Service. See R. (on the application of Lewin) v Crown Prosecution Service Lewis 124 Cal. 551, 57 Pac. 470 (1889)	2–114
Lewis v Lethbridge [1987] Crim. L.R. 59 DC	9–074, 9–075
Lewis v Trinidad and Tobago [2011] UKPC 15 PC (Trin & Tob)	8–118
Liangsiriprasert v United States [1991] 1 A.C. 225; [1990] 3 W.L.R. 606; [1990] 2 All E.R. 866 PC (HK)	5–120
Lim Chin Aik v R. [1963] A.C. 160; [1963] 2 W.L.R. 42; [1963] 1 All E.R. 223 PC (Sing)	3–010, 3–019
Lister & Co v Stubbs (1890) 45 Ch.D. 1 CA	9–061
Liu; Tan. See R. v Su Hua Liu; sub nom R. v Lun Xi Tan Logdon v DPP [1976] Crim. L.R. 121 DC	7–010
Low v Blease [1975] Crim. L.R. 513; (1975) 119 S.J. 695 DC	9–048
Luc Thiet Thuan v Queen, The [1997] A.C. 131; [1996] 3 W.L.R. 45; [1996] 2 All E.R. 1033 PC (HK)	8–124, 8–128
Lynch. See DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch MacAngus (Kevin) v HM Advocate; Kane (Michael Alexander) v HM Advocate [2009] HCJAC 8; 2009 S.L.T. 137; 2009 S.C.L. 408 HCJ	2–109, 2–111
Magee v Crown Prosecution Service [2014] EWHC 4089 (Admin); (2015) 179 J.P. 261 DC	4–336, 4–338
Malnik v DPP [1989] Crim. L.R. 451 DC	4–118
March v E&MH Stramare Pty 171 C.L.R. 506 HC (Aus)	2–086
Martin v State, 31 Ala. App. 334, 17 So. 2d 427 (1944), Alabama Court of Appeals	2–024
Masciantonio v R. (1995) 69 A.L.J.R. 598 744 Matudi v R. See R. v Matudi	5–101

(Misawki Kurawku) Mawji v Queen, The; Mawji (Laila Jhina) v Queen, The [1957] A.C. 126; [1957] 2 W.L.R. 277; [1957] 1 All E.R. 385 PC (EA)
Maxwell v DPP of Northern Ireland. See DPP of Northern Ireland v Maxwell
McAuliffe v R. (1995) 130 A.L.R. 26	554
McCall v McDowell, 1 Abb 212 Fed Cas. No.8673 (1867) (Circuit Court of California)	4-232
McCann v United Kingdom (A/324) (1996) 21 E.H.R.R. 97 ECHR	1-048, 4-094
McGhee (Colin) v Queen, The. See Coley (Scott) v Queen, The McMillan v Crown Prosecution Service [2008] EWHC 1457 (Admin); (2008) 172 J.P. 485; (2008) 172 J.P.N. 646	7-023
McNaughten Rules; McNaghten or McNaughton's Case, 8 E.R. 718; (1843) 10 Cl. & F. 200 HL	4-030, 4-247, 4-261, 4-262, 4-264, 4-265, 4-266, 4-271, 4-272, 4-273, 4-274, 4-275, 4-276, 4-277, 4-278, 4-347, 8-134
Meli (Thabo) v Queen, The [1954] 1 W.L.R. 228; [1954] 1 All E.R. 373; (1954) 98 S.J. 77 PC (Basutoland)	2-238, 2-239, 4-329
Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 2 A.C. 500; [1995] 3 W.L.R. 413; [1995] 3 All E.R. 918 PC (NZ)	3-073, 3-074, 3-075, 3-076
Merrit v Commonwealth, 164 Va. 653, 180 S.E. 395 (1935) (Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia)	5-050
Midland Bank v Cox McQueen [1999] Lloyd's Rep. Bank. 78; [1999] 1 F.L.R. 1002 ; [1999] P.N.L.R. 593 CA (Civ Div)	9-151
Mikolajczak v Poland [2013] EWHC 432 (Admin)	9-183
Milton v Crown Prosecution Service; sub nom Milton v DPP [2007] EWHC 532	2-221, 8-186

(Admin); [2008] 1 W.L.R. 2481; [2007] 4 All E.R. 1026; [2007] R.T.R. 43
Milton v DPP. See Milton v Crown Prosecution Service Moore v Regents of the University of California [1990] 271 Cal.Rptr 146	9–051
Moriarty v Brooks (1834) 6 C. & P. 684	7–046
Moynes v Cooper [1956] 1 Q.B. 439; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 562; [1956] 1 All E.R. 450 DC	9–081
MPC v Charles. See Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis v Charles (Derek Michael) Muhamad v R. See R. v Muhamad (Mithum) Mulcahy v Queen, The (1868) L.R. 3 H.L. 306 HL (UK-Irl)	5–093
Murphy (Charles) v HM Advocate [2016] HCJAC 118; 2017 S.L.T. 143; 2017 S.C.L. 176 HCJ	4–278
National Rivers Authority (Southern Region) v Alfred McAlpine Homes East Ltd [1994] 4 All E.R. 286; [1994] Env. L.R. 198; (1994) 158 J.P.N. 390 QBD	3–064, 3–065
National Rivers Authority v Yorkshire Water Services Ltd [1995] 1 A.C. 444; [1994] 3 W.L.R. 1202; [1995] 1 All E.R. 225 HL	2–079
NCB v Gamble [1959] 1 Q.B. 11; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 434; [1958] 3 All E.R. 203 DC	6–024, 6–029, 6–034
Neville v Mavroghenis [1984] Crim. L.R. 42 CA (Civ Div)	3–017
NHS Trust v Baby X [2012] EWHC 2188 (Fam)	4–052
Nicklinson v Ministry of Justice. See R. (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice Nicklinson v UK (2015) 61 E.H.R.R. SE7	4–228
Norris v United States [2008] UKHL 16; [2008] 1 A.C. 920; [2008] 2 W.L.R. 673	5–097
Odyssey Re (London) Ltd (formerly Sphere	3–074

Drake Insurance Plc) v OIC Run Off Ltd (formerly Orion Insurance Co Plc) (2000) 97(13) L.S.G. 42; (2000) 150 N.L.J. 430; (2000) 144 S.J.L.B. 142 CA (Civ Div)
O'Neill [2016] EWCA Crim 92	7-015
O'Sullivan v Fisher [1954] S.A.S.R. 33 (S.Aust)	2-024
OT, Re [2009] EWHC 633 (Fam)	4-052
Owens v H.M. Advocate (1946) S.C.(J.) 119	4-116
Oxford v Moss (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 183; [1979] Crim. L.R. 119 QBD	9-050
P v DPP [2012] EWHC 1657 (Admin); [2013] 1 W.L.R. 2335	9-214
Palmer (Sigismund) v Queen, The; Irving (Derrick) v Queen, [1971] A.C. 814; [1971] 2 W.L.R. 831; [1971] 1 All E.R. 1077 PC (Jam)	4-101, 4-102, 4-104, 4-122
Parry v DPP [2005] A.C.D. 64	7-072
Papachristos v Serious Fraud Office [2014] EWCA Crim 1863; [2015] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 88 CA (Crim Div)	5-101
Partington v Williams (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 220; [1977] Crim. L.R. 609; (1976) 120 S.J. 80. DC	5-070
People v Beardsley 150 Mich. 206; 113 N.W. 1128	2-032
People v Graham, 176 App.Div. 38, 162 N.Y.S., 334 (1916)	5-042
People v Keatley [1954] I.R. 12	4-086
Percy v DPP; sub nom DPP v Percy [2001] EWHC Admin 1125; (2002) 166 J.P. 93; [2002] Crim. L.R. 835	1-047
Perka v R. (1985) 13 D.L.R. 1	4-202, 4-225
Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Storkwain Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 903; [1986] 2 All E.R. 635; (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 359 HL	3-017, 3-046

Phillip v Queen, The; John v Queen, The [2007] UKPC 31	4-278
Pipe v DPP [2012] EWHC 1821 (Admin) QBD	4-216
Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWHC 2673 (Admin)	9-133
Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Assoc Ltd v Donoghue; sub nom Donoghue v Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Assoc Ltd; Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Assoc Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595; [2002] Q.B. 48; [2001] 3 W.L.R. 183	1-046
Posternobile Plc v Brent LBC, Times , 8 December 1997 DC	2-280
PostersNThings Ltd v United States, 511 US 513 (1994)	3-009
Powell v MacRae [1977] Crim. L.R. 571 DC	9-061, 9-062
Practice Direction (Sup Ct: Crime: Mandatory Life Sentences) (No.2) [2004] 1 W.L.R. 2551; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 8 Sup Ct	8-019
Practice Direction (Consolidated Practice Direction – Criminal Procedure Rules (2013))	9-229, 9-242
Pursell v Horn (1838) 112 E.R. 966	7-023
Qadir and Khan, Archbold News , 17 November 1997	5-039
Quinlan, Re (1976) 355 A. 2d 647	4-054
R (A Minor) (Wardship: Consent to Treatment), Re [1992] Fam. 11; [1991] 3 W.L.R. 592; [1992] 1 F.L.R. 190 CA (Civ Div)	4-050
R. v A (Complainant’s Sexual History); sub nom R. v A (No.2); R. v Y (Sexual Offence: Complainant’s Sexual History) [2001] UKHL 25; [2002] 1 A.C. 45; [2001] 2 W.L.R. 1546	1-046, 7-108, 7-109

R. v A [2010] EWCA Crim 1622; [2011] Q.B. 841; [2011] 2 W.L.R. 647	6-032
R. v A [2012] EWCA Crim 434; [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. 8; [2013] Crim. L.R. 240	4-140, 4-154, 4-175
R. v A (No.2). See R. v A (Complainant's Sexual History) R. v Abdul-Hussain (Mustafa Shakir); R. v Aboud (Saheb Sherif); R. v Hasan (Hasan Saheb Abdul); R. v Naji (Maged Mehdy); R. v Muhssin (Mohammed Chamekh); R. v Hoshan (Adnan) [1999] Crim. L.R. 570 CA (Crim Div)	4-133, 4-181, 4-182, 4-200, 4-203
R. v Abraham (Alan) [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1270; [1973] 3 All E.R. 694; (1973) 57 Cr. App. R. 799 CA (Crim Div)	4-077
R. v Adomako (John Asare); R. v Sullman (Barry); R. v Holloway (Stephen John); R. v Prentice (Michael Charles) [1995] 1 A.C. 171; [1994] 3 W.L.R. 288; [1994] 3 All E.R. 79 HL	1-047, 3-103, 3-113, 3-116, 8-047, 8-068, 8-075, 8-077, 8-078, 8-079, 8-080, 8-088, 8-167, 8-172, 8-173, 8-186
R. v AF [2009] EWCA Crim 1428	7-165
R. v Ahluwalia (Kiranjit) [1992] 4 All E.R. 889; (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 133; [1993] Crim. L.R. 63 CA (Crim Div)	4-119, 4-120, 8-104, 8-106, 8-148
R. v Ahmed [2013] EWCA Crim 1755	5-106
R. v Aitken (Thomas Adam); R. v Bennett (Simon Christopher); R. v Barson (Alan Robert) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1006; [1992] 4 All E.R. 541; (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 304, CMAC	4-068
R. v Alcindor unreported 19 October 1990 CCC	3-095
R. v Aldridge (Jonathan) [2006] EWCA Crim 1970	4-181
R. v Alford Transport Ltd; R. v Alford (James); R. v Payne (Alex Peter) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 326; [1999] R.T.R. 51; [1997] Crim. L.R. 745 CA (Crim Div)	6-016
R. v Ali (Israr) [2008] EWCA Crim 716	4-188

R. v Ali (Yasir Ifran) [2015] EWCA Crim 1279; [2015] 2 Cr. App. R. 33 CA (Crim Div)	7–131
R. v Allan (George Donald) [1965] 1 Q.B. 130; [1963] 3 W.L.R. 677; [1963] 2 All E.R. 897	6–014
R. v Allen (Christopher); sub nom R. v Allen [1985] A.C. 1029; [1985] 3 W.L.R. 107; [1985] 2 All E.R. 641 CA (Crim Div)	9–207
R. v Allen (Kevin) [1988] Crim. L.R. 698 CA (Crim Div)	4–243, 4–308
R. v Allen (Tony John) [2005] EWCA Crim 1344	2–150
R. v Allsop (Anthony Adward) (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 29; [1976] Crim. L.R. 738; (1976) 120 S.J. 635 CA (Crim Div)	5–097
R. v Altham (Lee) [2006] EWCA Crim 7; [2006] 1 W.L.R. 3287; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 8	4–204
R. v AMK (Property Management) [1985] Crim. L.R. 600 CA (Crim Div)	2–166
R. v Anderson (William Ronald) [1986] A.C. 27; [1985] 3 W.L.R. 268; [1985] 2 All E.R. 961 HL	5–112, 5–114, 5–115, 5–116
R. v Anderson [1995] Crim. L.R. 430 CA (Crim Div)	4–087
R. v Andrade [2015] EWCA Crim 1722; [2016] Crim. L.R. 424 CA	7–109
R. v Andrews (Christopher Kenneth) [2002] EWCA Crim 3021; [2003] Crim. L.R. 477	4–055, 8–054
R. v Antar [2004] EWCA Crim 2708; [2004] All E.R. (D) 412 (Oct)	4–171
R. v Antoine (Pierre Harrison) [2001] 1 A.C. 340; [2000] 2 W.L.R. 703; [2000] 2 All E.R. 208 HL	4–258, 8–137
R. v Anwar (Umar) [2016] EWCA Crim 551; [2016] 4 W.L.R. 127; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 23 CA (Crim Div)	6–036

R. v Arnold (Lydon Ewart) [1997] 4 All E.R. 1; [1997] Crim. L.R. 833 CA (Crim Div)	9-052, 9-064, 9-066, 9-077, 9-124
R. v Arobieke [1988] Crim. L.R. 314 CA (Crim Div)	8-053
R. v Ashman 175 E.R. 638; (1858) 1 F. & F. 88	7-047
R. v Asmelash (Dawit) [2013] EWCA Crim 157; [2014] Q.B. 103; [2013] 3 W.L.R. 1056	8-131
R. v Atakpu (Austin); R. v Abrahams (Alister Victor) [1994] Q.B. 69; [1993] 3 W.L.R. 812; [1993] 4 All E.R. 215 CA (Crim Div)	9-032, 9-043, 9-214
R. v Attwater (Mark Victor) [2010] EWCA Crim 2399; [2011] R.T.R. 12	4-096
R. v Augunas (Darius) [2013] EWCA Crim 2046	9-147, 9-156
R. v Austin (Alan Brian) [2011] EWCA Crim 345	5-101
R. v Awosika (Oluwabunmi) [2009] EWCA Crim 625	9-147
R. v Ayres (David Edward) [1984] A.C. 447; [1984] 2 W.L.R. 257; [1984] 1 All E.R. 619 HL	5-095
R. v Aziz [1993] Crim. L.R. 708 CA (Crim Div)	9-202
R. v B [2006] EWCA Crim 2945; [2007] 1 W.L.R. 1567; [2007] 1 Cr. App. R. 29	4-048, 7-126, 7-128
R. v B [2012] EWCA Crim 770; [2013] 1 W.L.R. 499; [2012] 3 All E.R. 1093	4-258
R. v B [2013] EWCA Crim 3; [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 36	2-219, 7-145
R. v Babbs (Richard John) [2007] EWCA Crim 2737	7-072
R. v Backshall (David Anthony) [1998] 1 W.L.R. 1506; [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 35; [1998] R.T.R. 423 CA (Crim Div)	4-217
R. v Bailey (John Graham) [1983] 1	4-243, 4-268, 4-320

W.L.R. 760; [1983] 2 All E.R. 503; (1983) 77 Cr. App. R. 76 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Bainbridge (Alan) [1960] 1 Q.B. 129; [1959] 3 W.L.R. 656; [1959] 3 All E.R. 200, CCA	6–025, 6–026
R. v Baker (Janet); R. v Wilkins (Carl) [1997] Crim. L.R. 497 CA (Crim Div)	4–154, 4–158
R. v Baker (Reece) [2016] EWCA Crim 1637 CA (Crim Div)	5–097
R. v Baker (Tony) (No.1); R. v Ward (Alan) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 335 CA (Crim Div)	4–180, 4–185, 4–187
R. v Baker [1994] Crim. L.R. 444 CA (Crim Div)	6–064
R. v Bala (Yilkyes Finok) [2016] EWCA Crim 560; [2017] Q.B. 430; [2016] 3 W.L.R. 1379; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 14 CA (Crim Div)	5–101
R. v Balfour Beatty Rail Infrastructure Services Ltd [2006] EWCA Crim 1586; [2007] Bus. L.R. 77; [2007] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 65	3–139
R. v Ball [1989] Crim. L.R. 730 CA (Crim Div)	8–061
R. v Balogun (Olalekan Tijani) [2016] EWCA Crim 174 CA (Crim Div)	9–099
R. v Bannister (Craig) [2009] EWCA Crim 1571; [2010] R.T.R. 4; (2009) 153(30) S.J.L.B. 30	2–221, 8–186
R. v Barnard (1979) 70 Cr. App. R. 28	5–119
R. v Barnes (Mark) [2004] EWCA Crim 3246; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 910; [2005] 2 All E.R. 113	4–048, 4–065
R. v Barot (Dhiren) [2007] EWCA Crim 1119; [2008] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 31; [2007] Crim. L.R. 741	5–084, 5–092
R. v Barrass (John Morris) [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 80	8–081, 8–082
R. v Barratt (Paul Henry); R. v Sheehan (Eugene Patrick) [1996] Crim. L.R. 495	5–088

CA (Crim Div)
R. v Batchelor (William Lucas) [2013] EWCA Crim 2638 CA (Crim Div)	4–180
R. v Bateman (Percy) (1927) 19 Cr. App. R. 8 CCA	8–068, 8–079
R. v Becerra (Antonio); R. v Cooper (John David) (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 212 CA (Crim Div)	6–062
R. v Beecham (1851) 5 Cox C.C. 181	9–114
R. v Beedall (Lee James) [2007] EWCA Crim 23; [2007] Crim. L.R. 910	7–109
R. v Beeton (Elizabeth) [2008] EWCA Crim 1421; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 46	7–097
R. v Belfon (Horace Adrian) [1976] 1 W.L.R. 741; [1976] 3 All E.R. 46; (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 59 CA (Crim Div)	2–168
R. v Bell (David) [1984] 3 All E.R. 842; [1985] R.T.R. 202; [1984] Crim. L.R. 685 CA (Crim Div)	2–199
R. v Bell (Debbie) [2014] EWCA Crim 1660 CA (Crim Div)	5–127
R. v Bennett (Christine) [1995] Crim. L.R. 877 CA (Crim Div)	4–311
R. v Bentham (Peter) [2005] UKHL 18; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 1057; [2005] 2 All E.R. 65; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 11	7–010, 9–051
R. v Betts and Ridley (1930) 22 Cr.App.R.148	6–013
R. v Bezzina (Anthony); R. v Codling (Sadie); R. v Elvin (Eric Everton) [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1057; [1994] 3 All E.R. 964; (1994) 99 Cr. App. R. 356 CA (Crim Div)	3–007
R. v Bhagwan (Dharam Singh); sub nom DPP v Bhagwan [1972] A.C. 60; [1970] 3 W.L.R. 501; [1970] 3 All E.R. 97; (1970) 54 Cr. App. R. 460 HL	5–084
R. v Billam (Keith) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 349; [1986] 1 All E.R. 985; (1986) 82 Cr. App. R. 347 CA (Crim Div)	7–165

R. v Billingham [1978] Crim. L.R. 553 Crown Ct (Newport, Gwent)	4-065
R. v Bingham [2013] EWCA Crim 823; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. 29 CA (Crim Div)	7-124
R. v Bird (Debbie) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 816; [1985] 2 All E.R. 513; (1985) 81 Cr. App. R. 110 CA (Crim Div)	4-113
R. v Birkin (Paul Abbey) (1988) 10 Cr. App. R. (S.) 303; [1988] Crim. L.R. 854 CA (Crim Div)	4-065
R. v Blackman (Alexander Wayne) [2017] EWCA Crim 325 CA (Crim Div)	8-149
R. v Blackshaw (Jordan Philip) [2011] EWCA Crim 2312; [2012] Cr. App. R. (S) 114	1-081, 5-127, 5-140
R. v Blake (Albert Philip) [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1167; [1997] 1 All E.R. 963; [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 209 CA (Crim Div)	3-007
R. v Bland (1987) 151 J.P. 857; [1988] Crim. L.R. 41; (1987) 151 J.P.N. 825 CA (Crim Div)	4-049, 6-014
R. v Blaue (Robert Konrad) [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1411; [1975] 3 All E.R. 446; (1975) 61 Cr. App. R. 271 CA (Crim Div)	2-113, 2-118, 2-119
R. v Bloxham (Albert John) [1983] 1 A.C. 109; [1982] 2 W.L.R. 392; [1982] 1 All E.R. 582 HL	9-046
R. v Bollom (Stephen Clayton) [2003] EWCA Crim 2846; [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 6	7-047
R. v Bonner (George Andrew); R. v Anderson (William); R. v Town (Michael Barry); R. v Town (Anthony Stuart) [1970] 1 W.L.R. 838; [1970] 2 All E.R. 97 (Note); (1970) 54 Cr. App. R. 257 CA (Crim Div)	9-058
R. v Boreman (Victor); R. v Byrne (Malcolm Matthew); R. v Byrne (Michael John) [2000] 1 All E.R. 307;	2-242

- [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 17; [2000] Crim. L.R. 409 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Bourne (Sydney Joseph) (1952) 36 Cr. App. R. 125, CCA 4–146, 6–051, 6–053
- R. v Bournewood Community and Mental Health NHS Trust Ex p. L; sub nom L, Re [1999] 1 A.C. 458; [1998] 3 W.L.R. 107; [1998] 3 All E.R. 289 HL 4–216
- R. v Bowen (Cecil) [1997] 1 W.L.R. 372; [1996] 4 All E.R. 837; [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 157 CA (Crim Div) 4–172, 4–175
- R. v Bowyer [2001] EWCA Crim 1835 4–065
- R. v Bowyer (2013). See R. v Dawes (Carlos) R. v Boyea (1992) 156 J.P. 505; [1992] Crim. L.R. 574; (1992) 156 J.P.N. 442 CA (Crim Div) 4–063, 4–069
- R. v Boyle (George); R. v Boyle (James) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 270; [1987] Crim. L.R. 111 CA (Crim Div) 5–032, 5–040
- R. v Bozickovic [1978] Crim. L.R. 686 Crown Ct (Nottingham) 5–066
- R. v Bradish (Liam Christopher) [1990] 1 Q.B. 981; [1990] 2 W.L.R. 223; [1990] 1 All E.R. 460; [1990] Crim. L.R. 723 CA (Crim Div) 3–017, 5–156
- R. v Brady (Philip) [2006] EWCA Crim 2413; [2007] Crim. L.R. 564 2–206, 7–019, 7–051, 7–055
- R. v Brandford (Olivia) [2016] EWCA Crim 1794; [2017] 4 W.L.R. 17; [2017] 2 All E.R. 43; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 14 CA (Crim Div) 4–154, 4–158, 4–159, 4–164, 4–170, 4–180, 4–188
- R. v Breaks and Huggan [1998] Crim. L.R. 349 9–077
- R. v Bree (Benjamin) [2007] EWCA Crim 804; [2008] Q.B. 131; [2007] 3 W.L.R. 600 7–116, 7–118
- R. v Briggs (Basil Ian) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 605; [1977] 1 All E.R. 475; (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 215 CA (Crim Div) 2–187

R. v Briggs (Linda Joan) [2003] EWCA Crim 3662; [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. 34; [2004] Crim. L.R. 495	9-032
R. v Bristol Magistrates Court Ex p. E [1999] 1 W.L.R. 390; [1998] 3 All E.R. 798; [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 144 DC	5-003
R. v Bristow (Terrence) [2013] EWCA Crim 1540	8-062, 8-173
R. v British Steel Plc [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1356; [1995] I.C.R. 586; [1995] I.R.L.R. 310 CA (Crim Div)	3-065
R. v Broad (Christopher); R. v Evans (Andrew John); R. v Winstone (Norman Adrian); R. v Harrop (Charles) [1997] Crim. L.R. 666 CA (Crim Div)	5-103
R. v Brockley (Frank) [1994] B.C.C. 131; [1994] 1 B.C.L.C. 606; (1994) 99 Cr.App. R. 385 CA (Crim Div)	3-007
R. v Brooks (Edward George); R. v Brooks (Julie Ann) (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 66; (1983) 2 Tr. L.R. 85; [1983] Crim. L.R. 188 CA (Crim Div)	9-201
R. v Brown (1983) 79 Cr.App.R.115	2-242
R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph); R. v Laskey (Colin); R. v Lucas (Saxon); R. v Carter (Christopher Robert); R. v Jaggard (Roland Leonard); R. v Cadman (Graham William) [1994] 1 A.C. 212; [1993] 2 W.L.R. 556; [1993] 2 All E.R. 75 HL	1-010, 1-013, 1-014, 1-015, 1-016, 1-024, 1-043, 1-044, 1-047, 4-044, 4-046, 4-055, 4-056, 4-060, 4-061, 4-064, 4-065, 4-067, 4-068, 4-069, 4-074, 4-076, 6-067, 6-069, 7-023 , 7-052, 7-079, 8-073
R. v Brown (Paul Brian) [2011] EWCA Crim 786	4-065
R. v Brown (Richard) [2013] UKSC 43; 2013] 4 All E.R. 860; [2013] N.I. 265	3-029
R. v Brown (Robert) [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 27	8-148
R. v Brown (Vincent) [1985] Crim. L.R. 212 CA (Crim Div)	9-222, 9-223
R. v Bryce (Craig Brian) [2004] EWCA	6-003, 6-006, 6-009, 6-012,

Crim 1231; [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 35	6-023
R. v Bryson [1985] Crim. L.R. 669 CA (Crim Div)	2-166
R. v Bunch (Martin John) [2013] EWCA Crim 2498; [2014] M.H.L.R. 331 CA (Crim Div)	8-146, 8-147
R. v Burgess (Barry Douglas) [1991] 2 Q.B. 92; [1991] 2 W.L.R. 1206; [1991] 2 All E.R. 769 CA (Crim Div)	4-266, 4-267, 4-268, 4-269, 4-272
R. v Burgess (Lee); R. v Byram (Jeffrey) [2008] EWCA Crim 516	2-110, 8-054
R. v Burke (Alisdair David) [1991] 1 A.C. 135; [1990] 2 W.L.R. 1313; (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 384 HL	2-166
R. v Burns (Dafydd John) (1974) 58 Cr. App. R. 364; [1975] Crim. L.R. 155 CA (Crim Div)	4-345
R. v Buzalek; R. v Schiffer [1991] Crim. L.R. 115; [1991] Crim. L.R. 116 CA (Crim Div)	9-095
R. v Byrne (Patrick Joseph) [1960] 2 Q.B. 396; [1960] 3 W.L.R. 440; [1960] 3 All E.R. 1; (1960) 44 Cr. App. R. 246 CCA	8-138, 8-139
R. v C [2009] UKHL 42; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 1786; [2009] 4 All E.R. 1033	4-049, 7-115
R. v C [2012] EWCA Crim 2034; [2013] Crim. L.R. 358	4-046
R. v C; R. v J [2007] EWCA Crim 1068	2-206
R. v Cairns (John) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 137; [2000] R.T.R. 15; [1999] Crim. L.R. 826 CA (Crim Div)	4-170, 4-203, 384
R. v Caldwell (James); sub nom Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis v Caldwell [1982] A.C. 341; [1981] 2 W.L.R. 509; [1981] 1 All E.R. 961 HL	2-191, 2-194, 2-196, 2-197, 2-198, 2-199, 2-200, 2-202, 2-203, 2-204, 2-205, 2-206, 2-207, 2-208, 2-210, 2-213, 2-215, 2-221, 2-223, 2-226, 4-313, 4-314, 4-316, 4-317, 4-327, 4-328, 4-330, 7-019, 7-053, 7-140, 8-079
R. v Calhaem (Kathleen Nell) [1985] Q.B.	6-011, 6-020

- 808; [1985] 2 W.L.R. 826; [1985] 2 All E.R. 226 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Campbell (Colin Frederick) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 255; [1987] Crim. L.R. 257 CA (Crim Div) 8–138
- R. v Campbell (Karl) [2009] EWCA Crim 2459; (2010) 174 J.P. 73 8–193
- R. v Campbell (Tony) (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 350; [1991] Crim. L.R. 268 CA (Crim Div) 5–035, 5–036, 5–040
- R. v Camplin (Paul); sub nom DPP v Camplin [1978] A.C. 705; [1978] 2 W.L.R. 679; [1978] 2 All E.R. 168 HL 8–096, 8–124, 8–125, 8–126, 8–128, 8–131, 8–133
- R. v Carey (Claire Anne); R. v Foster (Kelly Louise); R. v Coyle (Sinead Theresa) [2006] EWCA Crim 17; [2006] Crim. L.R. 842 8–063
- R. v Cato (Ronald Philip); R. v Morris (Neil Adrian); R. v Dudley (Melvin) [1976] 1 W.L.R. 110; [1976] 1 All E.R. 260; (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 41 CA (Crim Div) 2–085, 4–055, 8–054, 8–089
- R. v Chambers (William) [2008] EWCA Crim 2467 1–052
- R. v Chan-Fook (Mike) [1994] 1 W.L.R. 689; [1994] 2 All E.R. 552; (1994) 99 Cr. App. R. 147 CA (Crim Div) 7–034, 7–038, 8–030
- R. v Chargot Ltd (t/a Contract Services) [2008] UKHL 73; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 1; [2009] 2 All E.R. 645 HL 3–124
- R. v Charlson (Stanley) [1955] 1 W.L.R. 317; [1955] 1 All E.R. 859; (1955) 39 Cr. App. R. 37 4–297
- R. v Chelmsford Justices Ex p. Amos (JJ) [1973] Crim. L.R. 437 DC 5–128
- R. v Cheshire (David William) [1991] 1 W.L.R. 844; [1991] 3 All E.R. 670; (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 251 CA (Crim Div) 2–087, 2–100

R. v Chevannes (Justin Lee) [2009] EWCA Crim 2725	9-227
R. v Chinegwundoh (Harold) [2015] EWCA Crim 109; [2015] 1 W.L.R. 2818; [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. 26 CA (Crim Div)	4-258
R. v Chisam (Colin) (1963) 47 Cr. App. R. 130 CCA	4-116
R. v Choi (Beak Ken) [2015] EWCA Crim 1089; [2015] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 55 CA (Crim Div)	9-146
R. v Chrastny (Charlotte Barbara) (No.1) [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1381; [1992] 1 All E.R. 189; (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 283 CA (Crim Div)	5-101
R. v Church (Cyril David) [1966] 1 Q.B. 59; [1965] 2 W.L.R. 1220; [1965] 2 All E.R. 72; (1965) 49 Cr. App. R. 206, CCA	2-239, 2-240, 2-241, 4-329, 6-034, 8-052, 8-059, 8-061
R. v Ciccarelli [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. 15	7-129
R. v Clarence (Charles James) (1889) L.R. 22 Q.B.D. 23 CCR	7-025, 7-048, 7-049, 7-120
R. v Clark (Brian James) [2001] EWCA Crim 884; [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 14; [2001] Crim. L.R. 572	9-048, 9-124, 9-124
R. v Clarke (James) [1949] 2 All E.R. 448; (1949) 33 Cr. App. R. 216, Assizes (Leeds)	7-134
R. v Clarke (John Amos) [2005] EWCA Crim 3047; [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 132	8-173
R. v Clarke (May) [1972] 1 All E.R. 219; (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 225; (1971) 116 S.J. 56 CA (Crim Div)	4-270, 4-271
R. v Clarke (Victor Edward) [1996] Crim. L.R. 824 CA (Crim Div)	9-099
R. v Clarkson (David George); R. v Dodd (Walter John); R. v Carroll (Joseph Arthur) [1971] 1 W.L.R. 1402; [1971] 3 All E.R. 344; (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 445,	6-014, 6-023

CMAC

- R. v Clegg (Lee William) [1995] 1 A.C. 482; [1995] 2 W.L.R. 80; [1995] 1 All E.R. 334 HL 4-122, 4-123, 4-127, 4-231, 8-110
- R. v Clift (Leigh George) [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 15 8-015
- R. v Clinton (Jon-Jacques) [2012] EWCA Crim 2; [2013] Q.B. 1 8-118, 8-120, 8-132
- R. v Clouden [1987] Crim. L.R. 56 CA (Crim Div) 9-214
- R. v Clowes (Peter) (No.2); R. v Naylor (Peter John) [1994] 2 All E.R. 316. CA (Crim Div) 9-079
- R. v Cocker [1989] Crim. L.R. 740 CA (Crim Div) 8-104
- R. v Cocks (Eugene George) (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 79 CA (Crim Div) 9-110
- R. v Coffey [1987] Crim. L.R. 498 CA (Crim Div) 9-113
- R. v Cogan (John Rodney); R. v Leak (Michael Edward) [1976] Q.B. 217; [1975] 3 W.L.R. 316; [1975] 2 All E.R. 1059 CA (Crim Div) 6-052, 6-053, 6-055, 6-057, 6-060, 7-134
- R. v Cole [1993] Crim. L.R. 300 CA (Crim Div) 4-303
- R. v Cole [1994] Crim. L.R. 582 CA (Crim Div) 4-165, 4-177
- R. v Coleman (Anthony Neville) (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 159; (1992) 13 Cr. App. R. (S.) 508; [1992] Crim. L.R. 315 CA (Crim Div) 8-081
- R. v Coleman (Kenneth) [2013] EWCA Crim 544, [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 79 9-224, 9-225
- R. v Collier [1960] Crim. L.R. 204, Assizes 5-054
- R. v Collins (1864) 9 Cox C.C. 497 5-080
- R. v Collins (Stephen William George) [1973] Q.B. 100; [1972] 3 W.L.R. 243; [1972] 2 All E.R. 1105 CA (Crim Div) 9-219, 9-222, 9-223, 9-226
- R. v Concannon (John) [2002] Crim. L.R. 1-047

213 CA
R. v Coney (1881-82) L.R. 8 Q.B.D. 534 QBD	4-051, 6-014, 6-020
R. v Constanza (Gaetano) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 492; [1997] Crim. L.R. 576 CA (Crim Div)	7-018
R. v Conway (Francis Gerald) [1989] Q.B. 290; [1988] 3 W.L.R. 1238; [1988] 3 All E.R. 1025 CA (Crim Div)	4-133, 4-154, 4-162, 4-200
R. v Cooksley (Robert Charles); sub nom Att Gen's Reference (No.152 of 2002), Re; R. v Stride (Ian Paul); R. v Cook (Neil Terence); R. v Crump (Richard James) [2003] EWCA Crim 996; [2003] 3 All E.R. 40; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 18; [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 1	8-187
R. v Cooper (Dennis James) (1988) 10 Cr. App. R. (S.) 325 CA (Crim Div)	5-023
R. v Corbett (Christopher) [1996] Crim. L.R. 594 CA (Crim Div)	2-106
R. v Cornelius (Benjamin Jason) [2012] EWCA Crim 500	9-151
R. v Corran (Ben); R. v C; R. v Heard (Kevin Phillip); R. v Williams (Anthony Michael) [2005] EWCA Crim 192; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 73; [2005] Crim. L.R. 404	7-165
R. v Cort (Peter Laurence) [2003] EWCA Crim 2149; [2004] Q.B. 388; [2003] 3 W.L.R. 1300	4-048
R. v Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings Ltd [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 26	3-116, 3-139
R. v Cotterill (James Michael) [2007] EWCA Crim 526	4-065
R. v Coughlan (Joseph John) (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 11 CA (Crim Div)	5-101
R. v Coutts (Graham James) [2006] UKHL 39; [2006] 1 W.L.R. 2154; [2006] 4 All E.R. 353	8-047
R. v Cox (Paul Andrew) [1998] Crim. L.R.	7-017, 7-033

810 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Cox unreported, 18 September 1992	4-053
R. v Croft (William James) [1944] K.B. 295; (1944) 29 Cr. App. R. 169, CCA	6-064
R. v Cross (Adam Stuart) [2008] EWCA Crim 1194; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 34	7-083
R. v Cunningham (Anthony Barry) [1982] A.C. 566; [1981] 3 W.L.R. 223; [1981] 2 All E.R. 863; (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 253 HL	7-019, 7-029, 8-011, 8-013, 8-014, 8-227
R. v Cunningham (Roy) [1957] 2 Q.B. 396; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 76; [1957] 2 All E.R. 412, CCA	2-187, 2-191, 2-192, 2-201, 2-203, 2-205, 2-207, 7-053, 7-054
R. v D (Ian Malcolm) [1984] A.C. 778; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 186; [1984] 2 All E.R. 449 HL	4-049
R. v D [2005] EWCA Crim 1981	6-064
R. v D [2008] EWCA Crim 2557; [2009] Crim. L.R. 591	7-094
R. v Dadson (1850) 14 J.P. 754; 3 Car. & Kir. 148; 2 Den. 35, CCR	2-007, 4-091
R. v Dady (Marc) [2013] EWHC 475 (QB); [2013] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 300; [2013] C.T.L.C. 199 QBD	5-095
R. v Dagnall (Chris) [2003] EWCA Crim 2441; (2003) 147 S.J.L.B. 995	5-038
R. v Dalby (Derek Shaun) [1982] 1 W.L.R. 425; [1982] 1 All E.R. 916; (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 348 CA (Crim Div)	2-108, 8-064, 8-066
R. v Daley (Patricia Rose) [2010] EWCA Crim 2193	9-168
R. v Daniel (Gary Michael) (1988) 10 Cr. App. R. (S.) 341 CA (Crim Div)	5-023
R. v Davenport (Laurence Henry Christopher) [1954] 1 W.L.R. 569; [1954] 1 All E.R. 602; (1954) 38 Cr. App. R. 37 CCA	9-048
R. v Davies (1853) C.L.C. 326	4-252
R. v Davies (Peter John Brinley) [1975]	8-099

Q.B. 691; [1975] 2 W.L.R. 586; [1975] 1 All E.R. 890 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Davies (Tudor) [2008] EWCA Crim 980	9–144
R. v Davies [1991] Crim. L.R. 469 CA (Crim Div)	4–320
R. v Davis (1881) 14 Cox C.C. 563 Crown Ct	4–345
R. v Dawes (Carlos); R. v Bowyer; R. v Hatter [2013] EWCA Crim 322; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 947; [2013] 3 All E.R. 308	8–103, 8–104, 8–112, 8–113, 8–116
R. v Dawson (Brian); R. v Nolan (Stephen Thomas); R. v Walmsley (Ian) (1985) 81 Cr. App. R. 150; (1985) 149 J.P. 513; [1985] Crim. L.R. 383 CA (Crim Div)	8–061, 8–062
R. v Dawson and James (1976) 64 Cr. App. R. 170	9–214
R. v De Boise (Anthony Peter) [2014] EWCA Crim 1121 CA (Crim Div)	4–243
R. v Dear (Patrick) [1996] Crim. L.R. 595 CA (Crim Div)	2–115, 2–116, 2–119
R. v Deller (Charles Avon) (1952) 36 Cr. App. R. 184; (1952) 102 L.J. 679 CCA	2–007
R. v Denton (Stanley Arthur) (1987) 85 Cr. App. R. 246; [1987] R.T.R. 129; (1987) 84 L.S.G. 742 CA (Crim Div)	4–200
R. v Desmond, Barrett, Times, 28 April 1868	2–174
R. v Devonald (Stephen) [2008] EWCA Crim 527	7–124, 7–156
R. v Deyemi (Danny); R. v Edwards (Annie) [2007] EWCA Crim 2060; [2008] 1 Cr. App. R. 25; (2008) 172 J.P. 137	3–018
R. v Dhaliwal [2006] EWCA Crim 1139; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 24; [2006] Crim. L.R. 923	2–116, 2–117, 7–039, 8–030, 8–214
R. v Dhupar (Amy) [2015] EWCA Crim 2519 CA (Crim Div)	9–177
R. v Di Duca (David Lancelot) (1959) 43	4–347

Cr. App. R. 167 CCA
R. v Dias (Fernando Augusto) [2001] EWCA Crim 2986; [2002] 2 Cr. App. R. 5; [2002] Crim. L.R. 490	2-107, 2-108
R. v Dica (Mohammed) [2004] EWCA Crim 1103; [2004] Q.B. 1257; [2004] 3 W.L.R. 213; [2004] 3 All E.R. 593	4-047, 4-048, 4-062, 4-063, 4-069, 7-047, 7-050, 7-128
R. v Dietschmann (Anthony); sub nom R. v Deutschmann (Anthony) [2003] UKHL 10; [2003] 1 A.C. 1209; [2003] 2 W.L.R. 613	4-347, 4-348, 4-349, 8-147
R. v DJ; R. v D; R. v B; R. v LJ; R. v T [2007] EWCA Crim 3133	8-063
R. v Dodman (Darryl Philip) [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 338, CMAC	2-189
R. v Doring (Petra) [2002] EWCA Crim 1695; [2002] B.C.C. 838; [2003] 1 Cr. App. R. 9; [2002] Crim. L.R. 817	2-276
R. v Dougal [2005] Swansea Crown Ct	7-115, 7-116
R. v Doughty (Stephen Clifford) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 319; [1986] Crim. L.R. 625 CA (Crim Div)	8-099, 8-107, 8-115, 8-159
R. v Dove (Matthew Jonathon); R. v Chesterman (Thomas Stephen); R. v Davies (Gareth Anthony) [2005] EWCA Crim 1982	5-088
R. v Dowds (Stephen Andrew) [2012] EWCA Crim 281; [2012] 1 W.L.R. 2576; [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 34	4-347, 8-139, 8-147
R. v Downes (1875) 1 Q.B.D. 25; 40 J.P. 438; 13 Cox C.C. 111, CCR	2-032
R. v Doyle (Danny) [2010] EWCA Crim 119	4-046
R. v DPP; B v DPP [2007] EWHC 739 (Admin); (2007) 171 J.P. 404; (2007) 171 J.P.N. 738	9-214
R. v DPP Ex p. Kebilene; sub nom R. v DPP Ex p. Kebelene; R. v DPP Ex p. Boukemiche (Farid); R. v DPP Ex p. Soudi (Sofiane); R. v DPP Ex p.	3-024

- Rechachi (Fatah) [2000] 2 A.C. 326;
[1999] 3 W.L.R. 972; [1999] 4 All E.R.
801; [2000] 1 Cr. App. R. 275 HL
- R. v Drane (Paul) [2008] EWCA Crim 1746; [2009] Crim. L.R. 202 4-093
- R. v Dubar (David Nicholas) [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1484; [1995] 1 All E.R. 781; [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 280 CMAC 9-076, 9-077
- R. v Dudley (Leayon Davi) [2006] EWCA Crim 387; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 77 8-173, 8-187
- R. v Dudley and Stephens (1884) 14 Q.B.D. 273 QBD 4-042, 4-194, 4-202, 4-214, 4-217, 4-219, 4-221, 4-222, 4-223, 4-226, 4-230
- R. v Duffy [1949] 1 All E.R. 932 CCA 8-096, 8-105, 8-109, 8-114
- R. v Duguid (1906) 70 J.P. 294; [1906] 75 L.J. K.B. 470; 21 Cox C.C. 200 5-101
- R. v Durante (Reginald William) [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1612; [1972] 3 All E.R. 962; (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 708 CA (Crim Div) 4-325
- R. v Duru (Ignatius Chima)l R. v Asghar (Mohammed Mian); R. v Khan (Yaseen Rasool) [1974] 1 W.L.R. 2; [1973] 3 All E.R. 715; (1974) 58 Cr. App. R. 151 CA (Crim Div) 9-124
- R. v Dyke (Ian James); R. v Munro (Deborah Betty) [2001] EWCA Crim 2184; [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 30; [2002] Crim. L.R. 153 9-064
- R. v Dyson (1831) 7 C. & P 305n; 1 Lew C.C. 64 4-251
- R. v Eagleton (1855) 19 J.P. 546; (1855) Dears. C.C. 515; (1855) 6 Cox C.C. 559, CCR 5-025, 5-031, 5-033
- R. v Easom (John Arthur) [1971] 2 Q.B. 315; [1971] 3 W.L.R. 82 CA (Crim Div) 9-125, 9-126
- R. v Edwards [1991] Crim. L.R. 45 CA (Crim Div) 5-114
- R. v Egan (Michael) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 121; (1997) 35 B.M.L.R. 103; [1997]

Crim. L.R. 225 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Elbekkay [1995] Crim. L.R. 163 CA (Crim Div)	7–121
R. v Electric Gate Services Ltd [2009] EWCA Crim 1942 CA (Crim Div)	3–124
R. v Ellis (Ian); R. v Street (Edward James); R. v Smith (Gloria Marie) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 235; [1987] Crim. L.R. 44; (1986) 83 L.S.G. 2996 CA (Crim Div)	2–258
R. v Emery (Sally Lorraine) (1993) 14 Cr. App. R. (S.) 394 CA (Crim Div)	4–171
R. v Emmett (Stephen Roy), Times , 15 October 1999 CA (Crim Div)	4–061, 4–063, 4–069
R. v Evans (Chedwyn) [2016] EWCA Crim 452; [2016] 4 W.L.R. 169; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 13 CA (Crim Div)	7–109
R. v Evans (Eric) (No.2). See Evans v Serious Fraud Office R. v Evans (Eric) [2014] 1 W.L.R. 2817 CC (Cardiff)	5–097
R. v Evans (Gemma) [2009] EWCA Crim 650; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 1999; [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10	2–030, 2–031, 2–032, 2–037, 2–044, 2–045, 8–054, 8–075
R. v Ezeemo (Godwin Chukwnaenya) [2012] EWCA Crim 2064	3–007
R. v F Howe & Son (Engineers) Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R. 249; [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 37; (1999) 163 J.P. 359 CA (Crim Div)	3–138
R. v Fallon [1994] Crim. L.R. 519 CA (Crim Div)	2–150
R. v Faraj (Shwan) [2007] EWCA Crim 1033; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. 25; (2007) 104(21) L.S.G. 25	2–266, 4–093, 4–105
R. v Farooqi (Munir Ahmed) [2013] EWCA Crim 1649; [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 8; [2014] Crim. L.R. 239 CA (Crim Div)	4–135
R. v Farrance (Gordon Arthur) (1978) 67 Cr. App. R. 136; [1978] R.T.R. 225; [1978] Crim. L.R. 496 CA (Crim Div)	5–071

- R. v Feely (David) [1973] Q.B. 530; [1973] 2 W.L.R. 201; [1973] 1 All E.R. 341 CA (Crim Div) 9-087, 9-094, 9-095, 9-096, 9-100, 9-105
- R. v Fenton (Martin Charles) (1975) 61 Cr. App. R. 261; [1975] Crim. L.R. 712; (1975) 119 S.J. 695 CA (Crim Div) 4-347
- R. v Fernandes (Roland Anthony) [1996] 1 Cr. App. R. 175 CA (Crim Div) 9-110, 9-116
- R. v Field [1972] Crim. L.R. 435 CA (Crim Div) 4-118
- R. v Finlay (Paul Anthony) [2003] EWCA Crim 3868 2-107
- R. v Firth (1865-1872) L.R.1 C.C.R. 172 9-048
- R. v Fisher [2004] Crim. L.R. 938 4-146
- R. v Fitzmaurice (Robert) [1983] Q.B. 1083; [1983] 2 W.L.R. 227; [1983] 1 All E.R. 189 CA (Crim Div) 5-149
- R. v Flack (Perry) [2013] EWCA Crim 115; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 56 9-225
- R. v Flatt (David Sean) [1996] Crim. L.R. 576 CA (Crim Div) 4-171
- R. v Flattery (John) (1876-77) L.R. 2 Q.B.D. 410; (1887) 13 Cox C.C. 388 CCR 7-122
- R. v Forbes (Giles) [2001] UKHL 40; [2002] 2 A.C. 512; [2001] 3 W.L.R. 428 2-258
- R. v Ford (Kevin) [2005] EWCA Crim 1358; [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36; [2005] Crim. L.R. 807 5-023
- R. v Forman and Ford [1988] Crim. L.R. 677 Crown Ct 6-009, 6-016
- R. v Formhals (Allan) [2013] EWCA Crim 2624; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 2219; [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 35 CA (Crim Div) 9-144
- R. v Forrest (Nathan) [2014] EWCA Crim 308 9-148, 9-168
- R. v Forsyth (Elizabeth) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 299; [1997] Crim. L.R. 581 CA (Crim Div) 9-234
- R. v Fotheringham (William Bruce) (1989) 2-266, 4-327, 4-336

88 Cr. App. R. 206; [1988] Crim. L.R. 846 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Foxley (Caroline Ann) [2016] EWCA Crim 798 CA (Crim Div)	9–147
R. v Foye (Lee Robert) [2013] EWCA Crim 475	4–260, 8–138
R. v Franklin (1883) 15 Cox C.C. 163	8–049
R. v Franks (Jamie John) [2004] EWCA Crim 1241; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 13	8–173
R. v Fritschy [1985] Crim. L.R. 745 CA (Crim Div)	9–023, 9–025
R. v Fritzl (Jaqueline) [2011] EWCA Crim 1220	5–101
R. v Furby (Andrew) [2005] EWCA Crim 3147; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 8; [2006] Crim. L.R. 259	8–081
R. v G [2008] UKHL 37; [2009] 1 A.C. 92; [2008] 1 W.L.R. 1379	1–047, 3–013, 3–015, 3–027, 3–028, 7–160, 7–162
R. v G [2012] EWCA Crim 1756; [2013] Crim. L.R. 678	5–101
R. v G; R. v R [2003] UKHL 50; [2004] 1 A.C. 1034; [2003] 3 W.L.R. 1060	2–186, 2–203, 2–207, 4–313, 4–317, 4–330, 7–019, 8–077
R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472	4–154, 4–175
R. v Gallasso (Lesley Caroline) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 284	9–032
R. v Garg (Sudhanshu) [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 30	8–082
R. v Garner-Harris [2012] EWCA Crim 2996	5–127
R. v Gateway Foodmarkets Ltd [1997] 3 All E.R. 78; [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 40; [1997] I.C.R. 382 CA (Crim Div)	3–065
R. v Gayle (Mark Diego) [2008] EWCA Crim 1344	9–177
R. v Geddes (Gary William) (1996) 160 J.P. 697; [1996] Crim. L.R. 894; (1996) 160 J.P.N. 730 CA (Crim Div)	5–005, 5–038, 5–040
R. v George [1956] Crim. L.R. 52, Assizes (Lincoln)	7–154

R. v Georgiades (Michael) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 759; (1989) 89 Cr. App. R. 206; [1989] Crim. L.R. 574 CA (Crim Div)	4-117
R. v GG Plc [2008] UKHL 17; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 458; [2009] 2 All E.R. 738	5-097
R. v Ghosh (Deb Baran) [1982] Q.B. 1053; [1982] 3 W.L.R. 110; [1982] 2 All E.R. 689 CA (Crim Div)	9-096, 9-097, 9-098, 9-099, 9-100, 9-102, 9-104, 9-105, 9-107, 9-158, 9-194
R. v Ghulam (Habib) [2009] EWCA Crim 2285; [2010] 1 W.L.R. 891; [2010] 1 Cr. App. R. 12 CA (Crim Div)	4-257
R. v Giannetto (Robert Vincent) [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 1; [1996] Crim. L.R. 722; (1996) 140 S.J.L.B. 167 CA (Crim Div)	6-012
R. v Gibson (Richard Norman); R. v Sylveire (Peter Sebastian) [1990] 2 Q.B. 619; [1990] 3 W.L.R. 595; [1991] 1 All E.R. 439; (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 341 CA (Crim Div)	5-099
R. v Gilbert (Stephanie Rae) [2012] EWCA Crim 2392	9-152, 9-160
R. v Gilks (Donald) [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1341; [1972] 3 All E.R. 280; (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 734 CA (Crim Div)	9-058, 9-081, 9-095, 9-102
R. v Gill (Samuel James) [1963] 1 W.L.R. 841; [1963] 2 All E.R. 688; (1963) 47 Cr. App. R. 166, CCA	4-177
R. v Gilmartin (Anthony) [1983] Q.B. 953	9-144, 9-146
R. v Gilmour (Thomas Robert) [2000] N.I. 367; [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 407; [2000] Crim. L.R. 763 CA (Crim Div) (NI)	2-150
R. v Gittens (Charlesworth Alexander) [1984] Q.B. 698; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 327; [1984] 3 All E.R. 252 CA (Crim Div)	4-348
R. v Glover (Peter) [2008] EWCA Crim 1782	8-054
R. v Gnango (Armel) [2011] UKSC 59; [2012] 1 A.C. 827; [2012] 2 W.L.R. 17	2-097, 2-254, 4-051, 5-101, 5-148, 6-006, 6-068, 6-071, 6-072, 6-075
R. v Golding (David) [2014] EWCA Crim	4-048

- 889; [2014] Crim. L.R. 686 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Goldman (Terence) [2001] EWCA Crim 1684; [2001] Crim. L.R. 822 5–004, 5–128
- R. v Golds (Mark Richard) [2016] UKSC 61; [2016] 1 W.L.R. 5231; [2017] 1 All E.R. 1055 SC 8–141, 8–146
- R. v Goodfellow (Kevin) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 23; [1986] Crim. L.R. 468 CA (Crim Div) 8–079
- R. v Goodwin (Phillip) [1996] Crim. L.R. 262 CA (Crim Div) 9–058
- R. v Gore (Lisa Therese) (Deceased) [2007] EWCA Crim 2789; [2008] Crim. L.R. 388 8–157
- R. v Gotts (Benjamin) [1992] 2 A.C. 412; [1992] 2 W.L.R. 284; [1992] 1 All E.R. 832 HL 4–190, 4–196, 4–197
- R. v Governor of Brixton Prison Ex p. Levin; sub nom Levin (Application for a Writ of Habeas Corpus), Re [1997] A.C. 741; [1997] 3 W.L.R. 117; [1997] 3 All E.R. 289; [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 22; [1997] Crim. L.R. 891 HL 9–041
- R. v Governor of Holloway Prison Ex p. Jennings; sub nom United States v Jennings [1983] 1 A.C. 624; [1982] 3 W.L.R. 450; [1982] 3 All E.R. 104 HL 8–172
- R. v Governor of Pentonville Prison Ex p. Osman (No.1); sub nom Osman (No.1), Re [1990] 1 W.L.R. 277; [1989] 3 All E.R. 701; (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 281 QBD 9–041
- R. v Graham (Hemamali Krishna); R. v Bramich (David); R. v Price (Paul Graham); R. v Graham (Garry Allan); R. v Marsh (Terence Colin); R. v Ali (Sajid Pasha); R. v Kansal (Rupe Lal) [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 302; [1997] Crim. L.R. 340; 9–048, 9–124

(1996) 93(44) L.S.G. 29 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Graham (Paul Anthony) [1982] 1 W.L.R. 294; [1982] 1 All E.R. 801; (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 235 CA (Crim Div)	2-266, 4-165, 4-171
R. v Grant (Heather); sub nom R. (on the application of Grant) v DPP; Grant v DPP [2001] EWCA Crim 2611; [2002] Q.B. 1030; [2002] 2 W.L.R. 1409; [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 38; [2002] M.H.L.R. 41; [2002] Crim. L.R. 403; (2002) 99(3) L.S.G. 25	4-277
R. v Green (Barry Roland) [1992] Crim. L.R. 292 CA (Crim Div)	9-095, 9-097
R. v Green (Peter Donovan) [2002] EWCA Crim 1501	7-122
R. v Greenhof [1979] Crim. L.R. 108 Crown Ct (Huddersfield)	5-066
R. v Greenstein (Allan) [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1353; [1976] 1 All E.R. 1; (1975) 61 Cr. App. R. 296 CA (Crim Div)	9-096
R. v Gregory (Thomas Dennis) [2011] EWCA Crim 1712	4-203
R. v Gregory; R. v Mott [1995] Crim. L.R. 507 CA (Crim Div)	2-150
R. v Greig (Thomas Andrew) [2010] EWCA Crim 1183	9-146
R. v Gribby (Brendan Clifford) [2016] EWCA Crim 1847; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 18; [2017] Crim. L.R. 411 CA (Crim Div)	7-162
R. v Griffin [1993] Crim. L.R. 515 CA (Crim Div)	5-038
R. v Griffiths (1969) 49 Cr. App. R. 279	5-101
R. v Griffiths (Lee) [2012] EWCA Crim 2822; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 48; [2013] Crim. L.R. 436	8-019
R. v Groark (Paul) (A Juvenile) [1999] Crim. L.R. 669 CA (Crim Div)	4-311
R. v Grundy [1977] Crim. L.R. 543 CA	6-064

(Crim Div)

- R. v Gullefer (Ian John) [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1063; [1990] 3 All E.R. 882; (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 356 CA (Crim Div) 5-031, 5-032, 5-033, 5-035, 5-039, 5-040
- R. v Gurpinar (Mustafa) [2015] EWCA Crim 178; [2015] 1 W.L.R. 3442; [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. 31 CA (Crim Div) 8-103
- R. v Guthrie (Germaine) [2016] EWCA Crim 1633; [2016] 4 W.L.R. 185; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 27 CA (Crim Div) 7-109
- R. v H (Assault of Child: Reasonable Chastisement) [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 59 4-128
- R. v H (Karl Anthony); sub nom R. v H (Sexual Assault: Touching) [2005] EWCA Crim 732; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 2005; [2005] 2 All E.R. 859; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 9 7-151, 7-153, 7-154
- R. v H [2003] All E.R. (D) 293 4-259
- R. v H [2015] EWCA Crim 46 CA (Crim Div) 5-097
- R. v H unreported 2007 7-117
- R. v Hale (Robert Angus) (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 415; [1979] Crim. L.R. 596 CA (Crim Div) 9-233
- R. v Hales (Ricky); R. v Lancaster (Maxwell) [2005] EWCA Crim 1118 2-147, 2-150, 5-057
- R. v Hall (Peter Barnabas) [1973] Q.B. 496; [1972] 3 W.L.R. 974; [1973] 1 All E.R. 1 CA (Crim Div) 9-069, 9-070, 9-077, 9-078
- R. v Hallam [1995] Crim. L.R. 323 CA (Crim Div) 9-077
- R. v Halliday (1889) 61 L.T. 701 7-048
- R. v Hamer (Gareth) [2010] EWCA Crim 2053; [2011] 1 W.L.R. 528; [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. 3 CA (Crim Div) 9-011
- R. v Hamilton (Winston) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 54; (1991) 155 J.P. 264; [1990] Crim. L.R. 806 CA (Crim Div) 9-146
- R. v Hammond [1982] Crim. L.R. 611 9-204

- R. v Hammond (Dean Paul) [2013] EWCA Crim 2709 CA (Crim Div) 4-154
- R. v Hancock (Reginald Dean); R. v Shankland (Russell) [1986] A.C. 455; [1986] 2 W.L.R. 357; [1986] 1 All E.R. 646 HL 2-144, 2-145, 2-146, 2-175, 4-319, 5-056, 6-030, 8-013, 8-033, 8-039
- R. v Hardie (Paul Deverall) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 64; [1984] 3 All E.R. 848; (1985) 80 Cr. App. R. 157 CA (Crim Div) 4-243, 4-309
- R. v Harris (Paul Andrew) (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 28; [1976] Crim. L.R. 514 CA (Crim Div) 4-241, 5-028, 6-016, 9-144
- R. v Harris (Wayne Lee) [2009] EWCA Crim 434; [2010] Crim. L.R. 54 CA (Crim Div) 7-109
- R. v Harvey (Nadia Anne); sub nom R. v Harvey (Nadine Anne) [2009] EWCA Cri 469 4-092
- R. v Harvey unreported 3 August 2001 1-047
- R. v Hasan (Aytach); sub nom R. v Z [2005] UKHL 22; [2005] 2 A.C. 467; [2005] 2 W.L.R. 709 2-266, 4-131, 4-135, 4-150, 4-154, 4-164, 4-165, 4-170, 4-181, 4-186, 4-188, 4-197, 4-203
- R. v Hatter. See R. v Dawes (Carlos) R. v Hatton (Jonathan) [2005] EWCA Crim 2951; [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. 16; [2006] Crim. L.R. 353 2-266, 4-335
- R. v Hayes (Dennis Francis) [2002] EWCA Crim 1945; [2003] Crim. L.R. 48 4-303, 4-311
- R. v Hayes (John Allan) (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 82; [1977] Crim. L.R. 691 CA (Crim Div) 9-077
- R. v Hayes (Tom Alexander) [2015] EWCA Crim 1944; [2016] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 63; [2016] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 64 CA (Crim Div) 9-098
- R. v Heard (Lee) [2007] EWCA Crim 125; [2008] Q.B. 43; [2007] 3 W.L.R. 475 4-316, 4-318, 4-328, 4-331

R. v Heath (Patrick Nicholas) [2000] Crim. L.R. 109 CA (Crim Div)	4-180
R. v Hector (Joseph) (1978) 67 Cr. App. R. 224 CA (Crim Div)	5-065
R. v Hegarty [1994] Crim. L.R. 353 CA (Crim Div)	4-171
R. v Height (John); R. v Anderson (Malcolm) [2008] EWCA Crim 2500; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 117; [2009] Crim. L.R. 122	6-003, 8-019
R. v Hendy (Jason Geoffrey) [2006] EWCA Crim 819; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 33; [2006] M.H.L.R. 244	4-348
R. v Hennessy (Andrew Michael) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 287; [1989] 2 All E.R. 9; (1989) 89 Cr. App. R. 10 CA (Crim Div)	4-268
R. v Herber (Peter) [2014] EWCA Crim 519	9-048
R. v Herbert (1961) 25 Jo. C.L. 163	9-051
R. v Hichens [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. 26	4-084, 4-115
R. v Hilton (Peter Arnold) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 445; (1997) 161 J.P. 459; [1997] Crim. L.R. 761 CA (Crim Div)	9-041, 9-048, 9-124
R. v Hinks (Karen Maria) [2001] 2 A.C. 241; [2000] 3 W.L.R. 1590; [2000] 4 All E.R. 833 HL	9-028, 9-029, 9-032, 9-033, 9-034,, 9-045, 9-058, 9-159
R. v HM Coroner for East Kent Ex p. Spooner; R. v HM Coroner for East Kent Ex p. De Rohan (1987) 3 B.C.C. 636; (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 10; (1988) 152 J.P. 115 QBD	3-078, 3-093
R. v HM Coroner for West London Ex p. Gray; R. v HM Coroner for West London Ex p. Duncan [1988] Q.B. 467; [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1020; [1987] 2 All E.R. 129 DC	8-070, 8-079
R. v Hobson (Kathleen) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 31; (1998) 43 B.M.L.R. 181; [1997] Crim. L.R. 759 CA (Crim Div)	8-148
R. v Holden [1991] Crim. L.R. 478 CA	9-088

(Crim Div)
R. v Holland (1841) 2 Mood. & R. 351	2–114
R. v Hollinshead (Peter Gordon); R. v Griffiths (Kenneth David); R. v Dettlaff (Stefen) [1985] A.C. 975; [1985] 3 W.L.R. 159; [1985] 2 All E.R. 769 HL	5–098, 5–117
R. v Holtom (Colin Charles) [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 18	8–081, 8–082
R. v Hood (Kenneth) [2003] EWCA Crim 2772; [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 73	2–032, 2–049, 2–069
R. v Hopkins (Annette) [2011] EWCA Crim 1513; (2012) 123 B.M.L.R. 1; [2011] M.H.L.R. 357 CA (Crim Div)	1–047
R. v Hopley, 175 E.R. 1024; (1860) 2 F. & F. 202 QB	4–128
R. v Horne [1994] Crim. L.R. 584 CA (Crim Div)	4–171
R. v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court Ex p. K [1997] Q.B. 23; [1996] 3 W.L.R. 68; [1996] 3 All E.R. 719; [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 574 QBD	4–247
R. v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court Ex p. Siadatan; sub nom R. v Metropolitan Magistrate Ex p. Siadatan [1991] 1 Q.B. 260; [1990] 3 W.L.R. 1006; [1991] 1 All E.R. 324; (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 257 QBD	7–011
R. v Howard (Robert Lesarian) [1966] 1 W.L.R. 13; [1965] 3 All E.R. 684; (1966) 50 Cr. App. R. 56, CCA	4–049
R. v Howe (Kevin James) [2014] EWCA Crim 114; (2014) 158(8) S.J.L.B. 37	8–155
R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) R. v Bannister (John Derrick); R. v Burke (Cornelius James); R. v Clarkson (William George) [1987] A.C. 417; [1987] 2 W.L.R. 568; [1987] 1 All E.R. 771 HL	2–266, 4–010, 4–146, 4–150, 4–154, 4–170, 4–171, 4–180, 4–190, 4–194, 4–196, 4–199, 4–214, 4–222, 4–226, 4–231, 6–059, 6–060, 6–081, 6–086, 6–087
R. v Howe, 100 C.L.R. 448; 32 A.L.J.R.	4–121

- R. v Huckerby (Graham); R. v Power (James) [2004] EWCA Crim 3251 4-292
- R. v Hudson (Linda); R. v Taylor (Elaine) [1971] 2 Q.B. 202; [1971] 2 W.L.R. 1047; [1971] 2 All E.R. 244 CA (Crim Div) 4-131, 4-146, 4-154, 4-158, 4-178, 4-180, 4-181
- R. v Hughes (1841) 9 C. & P. 752 7-139
- R. v Hughes (Colin David) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 3 9-048
- R. v Hughes (Michael) [2013] UKSC 56; [2013] 1 W.L.R. 2461; [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 62-079, 2-085, 2-086, 2-087, 2-111, 2-119, 3-003, 3-005, 8-202
- R. v Humphreys 1965] 3 All E.R. 689; (1966) 130 J.P. 45 CC 6-052
- R. v Hurst (Marnie Michelle) [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 82 CA (Crim Div) 4-171
- R. v Hussain (Amar Tasaddiq) [2016] EWCA Crim 2092 CA (Crim Div) 5-084
- R. v Hussain (Iftikhar) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 416; [1981] 2 All E.R. 287; (1981) 72 Cr. App. R. 143 CA (Crim Div) 3-013, 3-019, 5-156
- R. v Hussain (Mohammed) [2008] EWCA Crim 1117 4-188
- R. v Hussey (Israel James) (1925) 18 Cr. App. R. 160; (1925) 89 J.P. 28 CCA 4-086
- R. v Husseyn (Ulus); sub nom R. v Hussein (Ulus) (1978) 67 Cr. App. R. 131; [1978] Crim. L.R. 219 CA (Crim Div) 5-065, 9-126
- R. v Hutchinson (Carl Paul) [2016] EWCA Crim 2145 CA (Crim Div) 5-127, 8-019
- R. v Hyam (Nicholas John) [1997] Crim. L.R. 439 CA (Crim Div) 8-014, 9-099
- R. v Hysa [2007] EWCA Crim 2056 7-118
- R. v Ibbotson (Christopher), Guardian, 20 January 2005; Independent, 22 December 2005 9-051
- R. v Ibrams (James David); R. v Gregory (Ian David) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 154 CA (Crim Div) 8-106

- R. v Inglis (Frances) [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] 1 W.L.R. 1110; [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 13 4-051, 8-019
- R. v Ingram [1975] Crim. L.R. 457 CA (Crim Div) 2-140
- R. v Inseal [1992] Crim. L.R. 35 CA (Crim Div) 4-347
- R. v Instan [1893] 1 Q.B. 450 CCR 2-034
- R. v Ireland (Robert Matthew); R. v Burstow (Anthony Christopher) [1998] A.C. 147; [1997] 3 W.L.R. 534; [1997] 4 All E.R. 225 HL 4-154, 7-004, 7-008, 7-012, 7-017, 7-018, 7-023, 7-024, 7-033, 7-038, 7-049, 7-051, 7-052
- R. v Ismail (Abokar Ahmed); sub nom R. v Ismail (Abokor Ahmed) [2005] EWCA Crim 397; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 88; [2005] Crim. L.R. 491 7-139, 7-165
- R. v Jackson (Leslie Joseph) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 77 CA (Crim Div) 8-047
- R. v Jackson (Robert Valentine) [2006] EWCA Crim 2380; [2007] 1 W.L.R. 1035; [2007] 1 Cr. App. R. 28 3-013, 3-048
- R. v Jackson, Golding and Jackson [1985] Crim. L.R. 442 CA (Crim Div) 5-110
- R. v James (Anthony David) (1997) 94(34) L.S.G. 27; (1997) 141 S.J.L.B. 206 CA (Crim Div) 2-201
- R. v James; R. v Karimi (Jamal) [2006] EWCA Crim 14; [2006] Q.B. 588; [2006] 2 W.L.R. 887; [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. 29 8-129
- R. v Janjua (Nadeem Ahmed); R. v Choudhury (Mifta) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 91; [1998] Crim. L.R. 675 CA (Crim Div) 7-047
- R. v Jefferson (Andrew Steven); R. v Skerritt (Joseph); R. v Readman (Paul Terrance); R. v Keogh (Desmond Anthony) [1994] 1 All E.R. 270; (1994) 99 Cr. App. R. 13; (1994) 158 J.P. 76 5-116

CA (Crim Div)
R. v Jenkins (Nathan) [2015] EWCA Crim 105; [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 70; [2015] R.T.R. 16 CA (Crim Div)	7-078
R. v Jennings [1990] Crim. L.R. 588 CA (Crim Div)	8-054
R. v JF [2015] EWCA Crim 351; [2015] 2 Cr. App. R. 5 CA (Crim Div)	6-034, 8-061
R. v Jheeta (Harvinder Singh) [2007] EWCA Crim 1699; [2008] 1 W.L.R. 2582; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. 34	7-123, 7-124, 7-126
R. v Jogee (Ameen Hassan) [2016] UKSC 8; [2016] 2 W.L.R. 681; [2016] 2 All E.R. 1 SC5-133,	6-007, 6-019, 6-020, 6-027, 6-028, 6-029, 6-034, 6-035, 6-036, 6-037, 6-043, 6-070
R. v Johnson (Dean) [2007] EWCA Crim 1978; [2008] Crim. L.R. 132; (2007) 104(37) L.S.G. 35	4-271
R. v Johnson (Lewis) 2016] EWCA Crim 1613; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 12; [2017] Crim. L.R. 216 CA (Crim Div)	6-037
R. v Johnstone (Robert Alexander); R. v Harrison (Richard James); R. v Mayron Multimedia Ltd; R. v Eley (Charles Thomas); R. v Ho (Toon Chin); R. v Croxson (Matthew Louis) [2003] UKHL 28; [2003] 1 W.L.R. 1736; [2003] 3 All E.R. 884; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 33	3-023
R. v Jones (1703) 91 Eng. Rep. 330	9-131
R. v Jones (Ian Anthony) [2007] EWCA Crim 1118; [2008] Q.B. 460; [2007] 3 W.L.R. 907	5-079
R. v Jones (John); R. v Smith (Christopher) [1976] 1 W.L.R. 672; [1976] 3 All E.R. 54; (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 47 CA (Crim Div)	9-223
R. v Jones (Kenneth Henry) [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1057; [1990] 3 All E.R. 886; (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 351 CA (Crim Div)	5-033
R. v Jones (Margaret); Swain v DPP;	4-096, 4-134, 4-158, 4-203,

Ayliffe v DPP; R. v Richards (Josh); R. v Pritchard (Philip); R. v Olditch (Toby); R. v Milling (Arthur Paul) [2006] UKHL 16; [2007] 1 A.C. 136; [2006] 2 W.L.R. 772; [2006] 2 All E.R. 741	4-217
R. v Jones (Peter) [1987] Crim. L.R. 701 CA (Crim Div)	2-248
R. v Jones (Terence); R. v Campbell (Michael); R. v Smith (Lee); R. v Nicholas (Victor); R. v Blackwood (Winston); R. v Muir (Ricky) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 375; [1987] Crim. L.R. 123 CA (Crim Div)	4-068
R. v Jordan (James Clinton) (1956) 40 Cr. App. R. 152, CCA	2-099, 2-102
R. v Joseph (Verna Sermanfure) [2017] EWCA Crim 36; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 33 CA (Crim Div)	4-205, 4-211
R. v Jouman (Bibi Shameera) [2012] EWCA Crim 1850	9-099
R. v JTB; R. v B; [2009] UKHL 20; [2009] 1 A.C. 1310; [2009] 2 W.L.R. 1088	4-361
R. v Julien (Thomas) [1969] 1 W.L.R. 839; [1969] 2 All E.R. 856; (1969) 53 Cr. App. R. 407 CA (Crim Div)	4-113
R. v K (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 82; (1984) 148 J.P. 410; [1983] Crim. L.R. 736 CA (Crim Div)	4-161
R. v K (Age of Consent: Reasonable Belief); sub nom Crown Prosecution Service v K (Age of Consent: Reasonable Belief) [2001] UKHL 41; [2002] 1 A.C. 462; [2001] 3 W.L.R. 471	2-262, 2-273, 3-005, 7-164
R. v K (Robert) [2008] EWCA Crim 1923	7-139
R. v Kai-Whitewind (Chaha'oh Niyol) [2005] EWCA Crim 1092; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 31; [2006] Crim. L.R. 348	8-161, 8-163
R. v Kamki [2013] EWCA Crim 2335	7-117
R. v Kanwar (Rena Louise) [1982] 1	9-234

- W.L.R. 845; [1982] 2 All E.R. 528;
 (1982) 75 Cr. App. R. 87 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Keane [2010] EWCA Crim 2514 4-078, 4-092, 4-115
- R. v Keen (Lisa Marie) [2008] EWCA
 Crim 1000 8-054
- R. v Kelly (Anthony Noel); R. v Lindsay
 (Neil) [1999] Q.B. 621; [1999] 2 W.L.R.
 384; [1998] 3 All E.R. 741 CA (Crim
 Div) 9-051
- R. v Kelly (Marlon) [2012] 1 Cr. App. R.
 (S.) 56 8-019
- R. v Kemp (Albert) [1957] 1 Q.B. 399;
 [1956] 3 W.L.R. 724; [1956] 3 All E.R.
 249, Assizes (Bristol) 4-263, 4-265
- R. v Kennedy (Simon) [1999] Crim. L.R.
 65 CA (Crim Div) 3-121, 2-107
- R. v Kennedy (Simon) [2007] UKHL 38; 2-045, 2-095, 2-106, 2-107,
 [2008] 1 A.C. 269; [2007] 3 W.L.R. 612 2-108, 2-109, 2-110, 2-111,
 2-118, 8-054, 8-055, 8-057,
 8-063, 8-064
- R. v Kenning (David Matthew); R. v
 Blackshaw (Paul James); R. v Fenwick
 (Paul Terrance) [2008] EWCA Crim
 1534; [2009] Q.B. 221; [2008] 3 W.L.R.
 1306 5-117
- R. v Khaleel (Mohamed) [2013] Crim. L.R.
 72 8-019
- R. v Khan (Mohammed Iqbal); sub nom R. 5-058, 5-059, 5-060, 5-064
 v Mohammed Iqbal Khan; R. v Faiz (Navaid); R. v Banga (Jaswinder Singh);
 R. v Dhokia (Mahesh) [1990] 1 W.L.R.
 813; [1990] 2 All E.R. 783; (1990) 91
 Cr. App. R. 29; [2009] Crim. L.R. 348
 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Khan (Rungzabe); R. v Khan (Tahir)
 [1998] Crim. L.R. 830 CA (Crim Div) 2-111
- R. v Khan (Uzma) [2009] EWCA Crim 2;
 [2009] 1 W.L.R. 2036; [2009] 4 All E.R.
 544; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 28 8-167, 8-168, 8-171
- R. v Kimber (David Michael) [1983] 1 4-044

- W.L.R. 1118; [1983] 3 All E.R. 316;
(1983) 77 Cr. App. R. 225 CA (Crim
Div)
- R. v Kime (Darren John) [1999] 2 Cr. App. 8-047
R. (S.) 3 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v King (Joseph) [2012] EWCA Crim 5-116
805
- R. v Kingston (Barry) [1995] 2 A.C. 355; 2-136, 4-328, 4-340, 4-341, [1994] 3 W.L.R. 519; [1994] 3 All E.R. 4-342
353 HL
- R. v Kitson (Herbert) (1955) 39 Cr. App. 4-214
R. 66m CCA
- R. v Klass (Kennedy Francis) [1998] 1 Cr. 9-227
App. R. 453; (1998) 162 J.P. 105; (1998)
162 J.P.N. 187 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Klineberg (Jonathan Simon); R. v 9-066, 9-070, 9-071, 9-078
Marsden (David) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R.
427; [1999] Crim. L.R. 417; (1998)
95(46) L.S.G. 34 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Knight (Neville Wayne) [2010] 2 Cr. 9-211
App. R. (S.) 84
- R. v Knowles (Ross) [2013] EWCA Crim 9-062, 9-173
646
- R. v Kohn (David James) (1979) 69 Cr. 9-048, 9-124
App. R. 395; [1979] Crim. L.R. 675 CA
(Crim Div)
- R. v Konzani (Feston) [2005] EWCA Crim 4-048, 4-062, 7-128
706; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 14; (2005) 149
S.J.L.B. 389
- R. v Kray (Ronald); R. v Kray (Reginald); 4-146
R. v Kray (Charles James); R. v
Whitehead (Cornelius John); R. v
Lambrianou (Christopher); R. v
Lambrianou (Anthony); R. v Bender
(Ronald); R. v Foreman (Frederick Gerald); R. v Barrie (John Alexander)
[1970] 1 Q.B. 125; [1969] 3 W.L.R. 831;
[1969] 3 All E.R. 941 CA (Crim Div)
- R. v Kwai (Abid Abu) [2013] EWCA 8-173, 8-187
Crim 2397

R. v Lahaye (Dean John) [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. 11	7-058
R. v Lamb (Charles Roland) (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 181; [1990] Crim. L.R. 522 CA (Crim Div)	2-200
R. v Lamb (Terence Walter) [1967] 2 Q.B. 981; [1967] 3 W.L.R. 888; [1967] 2 All E.R. 1282, CA (Crim Div)	2-208, 8-052, 8-053
R. v Lambert (Steven); R. v Jordan (Shirley); R. v Ali (Mudassir Mohammed) [2001] UKHL 37; [2002] 2 A.C. 545; [2001] 3 W.L.R. 206	8-138
R. v Lambert [2001] 2 Cr. App. R. 511	3-024
R. v Lambie (Shiralee Ann) [1982] A.C. 449; [1981] 3 W.L.R. 88; [1981] 2 All E.R. 776 HL	9-132
R. v Land (Michael) [1999] Q.B. 65; [1998] 3 W.L.R. 322; [1998] 1 All E.R. 403 CA (Crim Div)	3-013
R. v Lang (Christopher Michael) (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 50 CA (Crim Div)	7-105
R. v Lang (Stephen Howard); R. v D; R. v Edwards (Kyle Frederick); R. v Guidera (Michael); R. v Sheppard (James); R. v Collier (Edward); R. v Glave (Heathcliffe); R. v Armitage (Lewis); R. v Smith (Gary); R. v Wright (Robert); R. v Feihn (Steven); R. v Carasco (Charles); R. v Winters (Keith); R. v Abdi (Hassan) [2005] EWCA Crim 2864; [2006] 1 W.L.R. 2509; [2006] 2 All E.R. 410; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 3	1-100
R. v Lanham (Stephen); R. v Willis (Daniel) [2008] EWCA Crim 2450; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 105	1-082
R. v Lanphier (Tyler Phoenix) [2012] EWCA Crim 731	5-127
R. v Larkin (Henry) [1943] K.B. 174; [1943] 1 All E.R. 217; (1944) 29 Cr.	8-053, 8-060

- App. R. 18 CCA
- R. v Larsonneur (1933) 31 L.G.R. 253; 2-016, 2-017, 2-019, 2-020, (1933) 24 Cr.App.R.74 CA (Crim) 2-021, 2-024
- R. v Last (Emma); R. v Holbrook (Lee David); R. v Quillan (James Angus); R. v Quillan (Edward Steven); R. v Crane (Sara) [2005] EWCA Crim 106; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 64; [2005] Crim. L.R. 407 8-019
- R. v Latif (Khalid); R. v Shahzad (Mohammed Khalid) [1996] 1 W.L.R. 104; [1996] 1 All E.R. 353; [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 92 HL 2-092, 2-108, 2-118
- R. v Latimer (1886) L.R. 17 Q.B.D. 359 CCR 2-248, 2-251, 2-252, 2-255
- R. v Lawrence (Jerome) [2011] EWCA Crim 3129 4-065
- R. v Lawrence (Stephen Richard) [1982] A.C. 510; [1981] 2 W.L.R. 524; [1981] 1 All E.R. 974 HL 2-193, 2-196, 2-197, 2-198, 2-199, 2-200, 2-201, 2-202, 2-203, 2-206, 2-207, 2-208, 2-210, 2-213, 2-215, 2-221, 2-226, 2-231, 7-140, 8-067, 8-068, 8-070, 8-079, 8-174, 9-023, 9-024, 9-027, 9-028, 9-030, 9-032, 9-034, 9-035
- R. v Le Brun (John); sub nom R. v LeBrun (John) [1992] Q.B. 61; [1991] 3 W.L.R. 653; [1991] 4 All E.R. 673; (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 101 CA (Crim Div) 2-240, 2-241
- R. v Leahy [1985] Crim. L.R. 99 Crown Ct 6-075, 6-076
- R. v Lederman (Geoffrey) [2015] EWCA Crim 1308; [2016] R.T.R. 16 CA (Crim Div) 4-259
- R. v Leeson (John Anthony) [2000] 1 Cr. App. R. 233; (2000) 164 J.P. 224; [2000] Crim. L.R. 195 CA (Crim Div) 2-258
- R. v Lemon (Denis); sub nom Whitehouse v Gay News Ltd; Whitehouse v Lemon; R. v Gay News Ltd [1979] A.C. 617; [1979] 2 W.L.R. 281; [1979] 1 All E.R. 2-142, 3-013

898 HL
R. v Lewis [1970] Crim. L.R. 647 CA (Crim Div)	7-048
R. v Lichniak (Daniella Helen); sub nom R. (on the application of Lichniak) v Secretary of State for the Home Department; R. (on the application of Pyrah) v Secretary of State for the Home Department; R. v Pyrah (Glyn Edmund) [2002] UKHL 47; [2003] 1 A.C. 903; [2002] 3 W.L.R. 1834; [2002] 4 All E.R. 1122	8-016
R. v Lindo (Malachi Michael) [2016] EWCA Crim 1940 CA (Crim Div)	4-349
R. v Linekar (Gareth) [1995] Q.B. 250; [1995] 2 W.L.R. 237; [1995] 3 All E.R. 69; [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 49 CA (Crim Div)	7-122, 7-124
R. v Lion Steel Equipment Ltd unreported July 2012	3-128, 3-139, 3-144
R. v Lipman (Robert) [1970] 1 Q.B. 152; [1969] 3 W.L.R. 819; [1969] 3 All E.R. 410 CA (Crim Div)	4-302
R. v Litholetovs (Mihails) [2002] EWCA Crim 1154	5-032
R. v Lloyd (Derek William) [1967] 1 Q.B. 175; [1966] 2 W.L.R. 13; [1966] 1 All E.R. 107 (Note) CCA	8-142
R. v Lloyd (Sidney Douglas); R. v Bhuee (Ranjeet); R. v Ali (Mohammed) [1985] Q.B. 829; [1985] 3 W.L.R. 30; [1985] 2 All E.R. 661 CA (Crim Div)	9-110, 9-111, 9-114, 9-115
R. v Lockley (Richard George) [1995] Crim. L.R. 656 CA (Crim Div)	9-233
R. v Lockwood (1986) 2 B.C.C. 99333; [1986] Crim. L.R. 244 CA (Crim Div)	9-097
R. v Loukes (Noel Martyn) [1996] 1 Cr. App. R. 444; [1996] R.T.R. 164; [1996] Crim. L.R. 341 CA (Crim Div)	6-053, 6-055
R. v Lowe (Robert); sub nom R. v Robert	2-041, 8-050, 8-167

Lowe [1973] Q.B. 702; [1973] 2 W.L.R. 481; [1973] 1 All E.R. 805 CA
R. v Lowe, Times , 19 March 2005	4-268
R. v Luffman [2008] EWCA Crim 1739	6-012
R. v Lusher (Stuart Thomas) [2016] EWCA Crim 2055 CA (Crim Div)	4-243
R. v Lynsey (Jonathan Simon) [1995] 3 All E.R. 654; [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 667; (1995) 159 J.P. 437 CA (Crim Div)	7-004, 7-004, 7-023
R. v M [2003] All E.R. (D) 199	4-252
R. v M [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 10 ; [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 10	8-061, 8-063
R. v M (Richard) (A Juvenile). See R. v Marjoram (Richard) (A Juvenile) R. v MA [2012] EWCA Crim 1646	7-144
R. v Mackie (Robert) (1973) 57 Cr. App. R. 453; [1973] Crim. L.R. 438; (1973) 137 J.P.N. 203 CA (Crim Div)	2-104
R. v Mainwaring (Paul Rex); R. v Madders (Peter Clive) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 99 CA (Crim Div)	9-077
R. v Majewski (Robert Stefan) [1977] A.C. 443; [1976] 2 W.L.R. 623; [1976] 2 All E.R. 142 HL	2-203, 2-204, 4-311, 4-313, 4-314, 4-315, 4-316, 4-317, 4-319, 4-320, 4-321, 4-327, 4-328, 4-329, 4-330, 4-334, 4-335, 4-337, 4-338, 4-352, 4-355, 4-357, 4-359
R. v Malcherek (Richard Tadeusz); R. v Steel (Anthony) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 690; [1981] 2 All E.R. 422; (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 173 CA (Crim Div)	2-085, 2-102
R. v Malone (Thomas Patrick) [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 447; [1998] Crim. L.R. 834 CA (Crim Div)	7-105
R. v Mandair (Singh Mandair) [1995] 1 A.C. 208; [1994] 2 W.L.R. 700; [1994] 2 All E.R. 715 HL	7-049, 7-058
R. v Marcantonio (Robert) [2016] EWCA Crim 14; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 9; [2016]	4-257

M.H.L.R. 252 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Marison (Lee John) [1997] R.T.R. 457; [1996] Crim. L.R. 909; (1996) 93(29) L.S.G. 29 CA (Crim Div)	4-243
R. v Marjoram (Richard) (A Juvenile); sub nom R. v M (Richard) (A Juvenile) [2000] Crim. L.R. 372 CA (Crim Div)	2-106
R. v Mark (Alan James); R. v Nationwide Heating Services Ltd [2004] EWCA Crim 2490	8-077
R. v Marks (Errington Lloyd) [1998] Crim. L.R. 676 CA (Crim Div)	6-027, 8-096
R. v Marsh (William) [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 67; (1996) 160 J.P. 721; [1997] R.T.R. 195 CA (Crim Div)	3-005
R. v Marshall (Adrian John); R. v Coombes (Robert Peter); R. v Eren (Biol) [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 282; (1998) 162 J.P. 489; [1999] Crim. L.R. 317 CA (Crim Div)	9-112, 9-124
R. v Marshall (Collette Frances) [2009] EWCA Crim 2076	9-177
R. v Martin (1881) 8 Q.B.D. 54	7-024, 7-025
R. v Martin (Anthony Edward) [2001] EWCA Crim 2245; [2003] Q.B. 1; [2002] 2 W.L.R. 1	4-105, 4-108
R. v Martin (Colin) [1989] 1 All E.R. 652; (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 343; (1989) 153 J.P. 231 CA (Crim Div)	2-266, 3-021, 4-201, 4-027, 4-132, 4-154, 4-162, 4-165
R. v Martin (David Paul) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 42; (2000) 164 J.P. 174; [2000] Crim. L.R. 615 CA (Crim Div)	2-266, 2-268, 4-170
R. v Martin (Derek Paul) [2013] EWCA Crim 1986	9-147, 9-162, 9-168
R. v Martin [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 332	4-258
R. v Matthews (Darren John); R. v Alleyne (Brian Dean) [2003] EWCA Crim 192; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 30	2-152, 2-153, 2-157
R. v Matthews (Mark Anthony) [2003] EWCA Crim 813; [2004] Q.B. 690; [2003] 3 W.L.R. 693; [2003] 2 Cr. App.	3-023

R. 19
R. v Matudi (Misawki Kurawku); sub nom R. v Matudi (Misanki Kuranku) [2003] EWCA Crim 697; [2003] E.H.L.R. 13; [2003] Env. L.R. D13	3–020
R. v Mba [2006] EWCA Crim 624; [2006] All E.R. (D) 73 (Jan)	5–093
R. v McAllister (Geoffrey Victor) [1997] Crim. L.R. 233 CA (Crim Div)	7–114
R. v McCaffery (Ryan Bernard) [2014] EWCA Crim 2550 CA (Crim Div)	5–127
R. v McCreadie (Malcolm) (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 143	9–048
R. v McDavitt [1981] Crim. L.R. 843 CA (Crim Div)	9–202
R. v McDermott (Joseph Mark) [2008] EWCA Crim 1713	9–144
R. v McDonough (Bernard Joseph Gerrard) (1963) 47 Cr. App. R. 37; (1962) 106 S.J. 961, CCA	5–149
R. v McEneff (Karen) [2014] EWCA Crim 1633 CA (Crim Div)	9–223
R. v McHugh (Christopher John) (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 335 CA (Crim Div)	9–072
R. v McInnes (Walter) [1971] 1 W.L.R. 1600; [1971] 3 All E.R. 295; (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 551 CA (Crim Div)	4–113
R. v McKay [1957] A.L.R. 648; [1957] V.R. 560	4–121
R. v McKay (Peter James) [2015] EWCA Crim 2098; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 1 CA (Crim Div)	4–243
R. v McKechnie (Roy Maurer); R. v Gibbons (Erroll Anthony); R. v Dixon (Andrew Tony) (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 51; [1992] Crim. L.R. 194 CA (Crim Div)	2–087, 2–112
R. v McKenning (Zara Louise) [2008] EWCA Crim 2301; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R.	7–097

(S.) 106
R. v McKenzie (Michael Anthony) [2011] EWCA Crim 1550	4-258
R. v M'Loughlin (1838) 8 C. & P. 635	7-046
R. v McNally (Justine) [2013] EWCA Crim 1051	4-046, 4-048, 7-125, 7-126, 7-128
R. v McPhillips (1990) 6 BNIL (NI)	5-114
R. v MD [2004] EWCA Crim 1391	2-150, 2-151
R. v Meachen (David Nigel) [2006] EWCA Crim 2414	4-064, 4-069
R. v Meeking (Caroline) [2013] R.T.R. 4	8-053
R. v Mehta (Subhash) [2012] EWCA Crim 2824	5-101
R. v Mellor (Gavin Thomas) [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 245; [1996] Crim. L.R. 743 CA (Crim Div)	2-101
R. v Mendez (Reece) [2010] EWCA Crim 516	6-010, 6-030, 6-032
R. v Mercer (Mark John) (Retrial) [2001] EWCA Crim 638	6-009
R. v Meredith [1973] Crim. L.R. 253 Crown Ct (Manchester)	9-057
R. v Merlin Attractions Operations Ltd [2012] EWCA Crim 2670; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36 CA (Crim Div)	3-141
R. v Millard and Vernon [1987] Crim. L.R. 393 CA (Crim Div)	5-054
R. v Millberry (William Christopher); R. v Lackenby (Ian Stuart); R. v Morgan (Paul Robert) [2002] EWCA Crim 2891; [2003] 1 W.L.R. 546; [2003] 2 All E.R. 939; [2003] 1 Cr. App. R. 25; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 31	7-164, 7-165
R. v Miller (James) [1983] 2 A.C. 161; [1983] 2 W.L.R. 539; [1983] 1 All E.R. 978 HL	2-002, 2-029, 2-042, 2-045, 2-064, 2-198, 2-244, 2-245, 2-246, 2-248
R. v Miller (Peter) [1954] 2 Q.B. 282; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 138; [1954] 2 All E.R. 529; (1954) 38 Cr. App. R. 1 Assizes (Winchester)	7-034, 7-134

R. v Miller (Scott William); R. v Miller (Lindsey Ann) [2006] EWCA Crim 2391	4-252
R. v Miller [2010] EWCA Crim 1578; [2011] Crim. L.R. 79 CA (Crim Div)	7-094
R. v Millward (Neil Frederick) [1985] Q.B. 519; [1985] 2 W.L.R. 532; [1985] 1 All E.R. 859 CA	2-276
R. v Millward (Sidney Booth) (1994) 158 J.P. 1091; [1994] Crim. L.R. 527 CA (Crim Div)	6-053
R. v Mir, Independent , 23 May 1994 CA (Crim Div)	2-201
R. v Misra (Amit); R. v Srivastava (Rajeev) [2004] EWCA Crim 2375; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21; [2005] Crim. L.R. 234	1-047, 2-134, 8-077, 8-078, 8-079, 8-080
R. v Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 850	9-110, 9-112
R. v Mitchell (Frank) [1999] Crim. L.R. 496	6-064
R. v Mitchell (Laura); R. v Ballantyne (Henry) [2008] EWCA Crim 2552; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 31; [2009] Crim. L.R. 287	6-064
R. v Mitchell (Ronald James) [1983] Q.B. 741; [1983] 2 W.L.R. 938; [1983] 2 All E.R. 427; (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 293 CA (Crim Div)	2-085, 2-248, 2-276, 8-064, 8-065
R. v M(M) unreported Woolwich Crown Ct	4-064
R. v Mohan (John Patrick) [1976] Q.B. 1; [1975] 2 W.L.R. 859; [1975] 2 All E.R. 193 CA (Crim Div)	2-150, 5-052, 5-054
R. v Mokrecovas (Andrius) [2001] EWCA Crim 1644; [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 20; [2001] Crim. L.R. 911 CA (Crim Div)	7-109
R. v Moloney (Alistair Baden) [1985] A.C. 905; [1985] 2 W.L.R. 648; [1985] 1 All E.R. 1025 HL	2-143, 2-144, 2-145, 2-146, 2-151, 2-152, 2-168, 2-175, 4-319, 5-056, 5-057, 6-030, 8-008, 8-013, 8-031, 8-032, 8-033
R. v Montague (Damian John) [2013] EWCA Crim 1781	6-009

R. v Montila (Steven William) [2004] UKHL 50; [2004] 1 W.L.R. 3141; [2005] 1 All E.R. 113 HL	5-062
R. v Moore and Dorn [1975] Crim. L.R. 229 CA (Crim Div)	2-239
R. v Morhall (Alan Paul) [1996] A.C. 90; [1995] 3 W.L.R. 330; [1995] 3 All E.R. 659 HL	8-124, 8-128, 8-131
R. v Morris (Clarence Barrington) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 386; (1997) 94(43) L.S.G. 29; (1997) 141 S.J.L.B. 231 CA (Crim Div)	7-039
R. v Morris (Daryl Howard) [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. 9	4-096
R. v Morris (David Alan); sub nom Anderton v Burnside [1984] A.C. 320; [1983] 3 W.L.R. 697; [1983] 3 All E.R. 288 HL	9-008, 9-019, 9-020, 9-023, 9-024, 9-025, 9-026, 9-027, 9-028, 9-045, 9-060
R. v Morrison (Lawrence Andrew) (1989) 89 Cr. App. R. 17 CA (Crim Div)	7-060
R. v Moses and Ansbro [1991] Crim. L.R. 617 CA (Crim Div)	5-098
R. v Moss (Pamela Jane) [2013] EWCA Crim 1554	9-173
R. v Motley (Gary) (1978) 66 Cr. App. R. 274 CA (Crim Div)	1-081
R. v Mowatt (Sidney Linton) [1968] 1 Q.B. 421; [1967] 3 W.L.R. 1192; [1967] 3 All E.R. 47 CA (Crim Div)	7-053, 7-054, 7-060
R. v Moyle (Peter Geoffrey) [2008] EWCA Crim 3059; [2009] Crim. L.R. 586; (2009) 173 C.L. & J. 63	4-251
R. v Muhamad (Mithum); sub nom: R. v Muhamed (Mithun) [2002] EWCA Crim 1856; [2003] Q.B. 1031; [2003] 2 W.L.R. 1050; [2003] B.P.I.R. 110	3-026, 3-045
R. v Murphy (Michael Anthony) [2007] EWCA Crim 2810	4-115
R. v Murphy (William Francis) [1980] Q.B.	2-231

434; [1980] 2 W.L.R. 743; [1980] 2 All E.R. 325 CA (Crim Div)
R. v N [2007] EWCA Crim 3479	4-170, 4-181
R. v Nabina (Fizeal) [2000] Crim. L.R. 481 CA (Crim Div)	9-132
R. v Naini (Jamshid Hashemi) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 398 CA (Crim Div)	5-120
R. v Nash (Denis Arthur) [1999] Crim. L.R. 308 CA (Crim Div)	5-032
R. v Nash (Lee) (1991) 155 J.P. 709; [1991] Crim. L.R. 768; (1991) 155 J.P.N. 522 CA (Crim Div)	7-019
R. v Nedrick (Ransford Delroy) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1025; [1986] 3 All E.R. 1; (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 267 CA (Crim Div)	2-145, 2-146, 2-151, 2-152, 2-155, 2-166, 7-061, 8-013, 8-032
R. v Nelson (Gary) [2013] EWCA Crim 30; [2013] 1 W.L.R. 2861; [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 30	5-003
R. v Ness unreported Crown Ct	4-197
R. v Ngan (Sui Soi) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 331; (1997) 94(33) L.S.G. 27 CA (Crim Div)	9-041
R. v Nicklin (David John) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 403; [1977] 2 All E.R. 444; (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 205 CA (Crim Div)	9-234
R. v Norman (Leslie) [2008] EWCA Crim 1810; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 13; [2008] M.H.L.R. 206	4-258
R. v Notman [1994] Crim. L.R. 518 CA (Crim Div)	2-085
R. v Nursing (Ligaya) [2012] EWCA Crim 2521; [2013] 1 W.L.R. 1031	1-047
R. v O [2008] EWCA Crim 738; (2008) 105(13) L.S.G. 30	7-165
R. v O'Brien (Edward Vincent) [1974] 3 All E.R. 663 Crown Ct (Bristol)	7-134
R. v O'Connor [1991] Crim. L.R. 135 CA (Crim Div)	4-335
R. v O'Driscoll (James) (1986) 8 Cr. App.	9-211

R. (S.) 121; [1986] Crim. L.R. 701 CA (Crim Div)
R. v O’Flaherty (Errol Carlton); R. v Ryan (Phillip Junior); R. v Toussaint (Mitchell Paris) [2004] EWCA Crim 526; [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 20; [2004] Crim. L.R. 751	6–064, 6–065
R. v O’Grady (Patrick Gerald) [1987] Q.B. 995; [1987] 3 W.L.R. 321; [1987] 3 All E.R. 420 CA (Crim Div)	2–266, 4–335, 4–336
R. v O’Hadhmaill [1996] Crim. L.R. 509 CA (Crim Div)	5–111
R. v O’Toole (Michael) [1987] Crim. L.R. 759 CA (Crim Div)	5–051
R. v O’Toole (Robert John) (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 206; [1974] R.T.R. 88 CA (Crim Div)	4–214
R. v Oatridge (Gaynor) (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 367; [1992] Crim. L.R. 205 CA (Crim Div)	4–093
R. v Olugboja (Stephen) [1982] Q.B. 320; [1981] 3 W.L.R. 585; (1981) 73 Cr.App. R. 344 CA (Crim Div)	7–105, 7–114, 7–131
R. v Oosthuizen (Lee) [2005] EWCA Crim 1978; [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 73; [2005] Crim. L.R. 979	1–147
R. v Orr (Patrick Neale) [2016] EWCA Crim 889; [2016] 4 W.L.R. 132; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 32 CA (Crim Div)	4–257
R. v Ortiz (Fernando) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 173 CA (Crim Div)	4–160, 4–161
R. v Osborn (1919) 84 J.P. 63	5–032
R. v Oversby, unreported, 1991	4–059
R. v Owen (Jason) [2009] EWCA Crim 2259	8–169
R. v Owino (Nimrod) [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 128; [1995] Crim. L.R. 743 CA (Crim Div)	4–103
R. v Oye [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 11	4–110
R. v P&O European Ferries (Dover) Ltd	3–054

- (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 72; [1991] Crim. L.R. 695, Central Crim Ct
- R. v P; sub nom R. v A [2005] EWCA Crim 1960 4-068
- R. v Pace (Martin Edward) [2014] EWCA Crim 186; [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 34; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 2867 5-059, 5-060, 5-064, 5-108
- R. v Page (Cyril Edward); R. v Maher (Gerrard Martin); R. v Stewart (David Ian) [2004] EWCA Crim 3358; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 37; (2005) 149 S.J.L.B. 26 9-245
- R. v Pagett (David Keith) (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 279; [1983] Crim. L.R. 393 CA (Crim Div) 2-085, 2-096, 2-097, 2-102, 2-106, 2-111, 2-118
- R. v Paine (Nicholas) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 36 CMAC 3-007
- R. v Parker (Daryl Clive) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 600; [1977] 2 All E.R. 37; (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 211 CA (Crim Div) 2-187, 2-188
- R. v Parmenter (Philip Mark) (No.1) [1991] 2 W.L.R. 408; [1991] 2 All E.R. 225; (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 68 CA (Crim Div) 7-041, 7-054
- R. v Patel (Sophia); Bava (Amrit); Patel (Pravin); R. v Mewaswala (Yusuf) [2009] EWCA Crim 67; [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 67; [2009] Crim. L.R. 466 5-120
- R. v Patnaik, L.T.L. unreported, February 1 2000 5-038
- R. v Pearman (Stephen Dennis) (1985) 80 Cr. App. R. 259; [1985] R.T.R. 39; [1984] Crim. L.R. 675 CA (Crim Div) 5-055
- R. v Pembliton (Henry) (1872-75) L.R. 2 C.C.R. 119; (1874) 12 Cox 607 CCR 2-248, 2-251, 2-255
- R. v Penner (Steven Henry) [2010] EWCA Crim 1155; [2010] Crim. L.R. 936 CA (Crim Div) 4-135
- R. v Pennock (Angela) [2014] EWCA Crim 598; [2014] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 CA (Crim Div) 9-173, 9-178

- R. v Peters (Benjamin); R. v Campbell (Shantelle Jamie); R. v Palmer (Daniel Roy) [2005] EWCA Crim 605; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 101; [2005] Crim. L.R. 492 8-019
- R. v Phillips (Ben) [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 67 8-054
- R. v Pigg (Stephen) [1983] 1 W.L.R. 6; [1983] 1 All E.R. 56; (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 79 HL 5-057, 7-140
- R. v Piper (Geoffrey Kenneth) [2007] EWCA Crim 2151; [2008] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 91 7-124
- R. v Pitham (Charles Henry); R. v Hehl (Brian Robert) (1977) 65 Cr. App. R. 45; [1977] Crim. L.R. 285 CA (Crim Div) 9-039, 9-040
- R. v Pittwood (1902) 19 T.L.R. 37 2-040
- R. v Podola (Guenther Fritz Erwin) [1960] 1 Q.B. 325; [1959] 3 W.L.R. 718; [1959] 3 All E.R. 418 CCA 4-251, 4-253
- R. v Pommell (Fitzroy Derek) [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 607; (1995) 92(27) L.S.G. 32; (1995) 139 S.J.L.B. 178 CA (Crim Div) 4-189, 4-202
- R. v Pond [1984] Crim. L.R. 164 CA (Crim Div) 5-051
- R. v Porceddu (Stefano) [2004] EWCA Crim 1043 4-311
- R. v Pordage [1975] Crim. L.R. 575 CA (Crim Div) 4-303, 4-320
- R. v Povey (Clive Richard); R. v McGeary (John); R. v Pownall (Clifton Christopher); R. v Bleazard (Daniel) [2008] EWCA Crim 1261; [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 42; (2009) 173 J.P. 109 1-082
- R. v Powell (Anthony Glassford); R. v English (Philip); R. v Daniels (Antonio Eval) [1999] 1 A.C. 1; [1997] 3 W.L.R. 959; [1997] 4 All E.R. 545 HL 6-018, 6-019, 6-028, 6-030, 6-031, 6-032, 6-036
- R. v Preddy (John Crawford); R. v Slade (Mark); R. v Dhillon (Rajpaul Singh) 9-048, 9-124

- [1996] A.C. 815; [1996] 3 W.L.R. 255;
[1996] 3 All E.R. 481 HL
- R. v Price (Ronald William) (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 409; [1990] Crim. L.R. 200 CA (Crim Div) 9–095, 9–099, 9–157
- R. v Prince (1875) 2 C.C.R. 178 4–086
- R. v Pritchard (1836) 7 Car. & P. 303 4–251, 4–257
- R. v Purcell (Frank) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 45; [1986] Crim. L.R. 466 CA (Crim Div) 2–166, 7–060
- R. v Qosja (Robert) [2016] EWCA Crim 1543; [2017] 1 W.L.R. 311; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 17 CA (Crim Div) 7–016
- R. v Quayle; A-G’s Reference (No.2 of 2004) [2005] EWCA Crim 1415; [2006] 1 All E.R. 988; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 3642; [2005] 2 Cr.App.R. 527 4–134, 4–154, 4–203, 4–204
- R. v Quick (William George); R. v Paddison (William) [1973] Q.B. 910; [1973] 3 W.L.R. 26; [1973] 3 All E.R. 347 CA (Crim Div) 4–037, 4–242, 4–243, 4–268, 4–292, 6–052
- R. v Quinn (Phillip) [2015] EWCA Crim 428 CA (Crim Div) 9–168
- R. v R (2008). See R. v Robson R. v R (Amer). See R. v Ramzan (Amer) 514 R. v R (Rape: Marital Exemption) [1992] 1 A.C. 599; [1991] 3 W.L.R. 767; [1991] 4 All E.R. 481 HL 7–134, 7–135
- R. v R (Stephen Malcolm) (1984) 79 Cr. App. R. 334; (1985) 149 J.P. 89 CA (Crim Div) 2–199
- R. v Rahman (Islamur); R. v Ali (Liaquat); R. v Amin (Anjum Nisa); R. v Akram (Kamer) [2008] UKHL 45; [2009] 1 A.C. 129; [2008] 3 W.L.R. 264 6–030, 6–031
- R. v Rai (Thomas) [2000] 1 Cr. App. R. 242; (2000) 164 J.P. 121; [2000] Crim. L.R. 192 CA (Crim Div) 9–147
- R. v Ramchurn (Jayant) [2010] 2 Cr. App. R. 3 8–140, 8–142

R. v Ramzan (Amer); R. v V (Abolghasem); R. v L (Abraham); R. v S (Imran); R. v C (James); R. v O (Claire); R. v M (Faisal Jamil) [2006] EWCA Crim 1974; [2007] 1 Cr. App. R. 10; [2007] Crim. L.R. 79	5–106
R. v Ransford (1874) 13 Cox C.C. 9; 31 L.T. 488 CCR	5–032
R. v Rao [1972] Crim. L.R. 451 CA (Crim Div)	9–093
R. v Raphael (Jermaine) [2008] EWCA Crim 1014; [2008] Crim. L.R. 995	9–111, 9–113
R. v Rashford (Nicholas) [2005] EWCA Crim 3377; [2006] Crim. L.R. 547	4–078, 4–091
R. v Razoq (Adil) [2012] EWCA Crim 674	9–157, 9–168
R. v Reed (Nicholas) [1982] Crim. L.R. 819 CA (Crim Div)	5–111
R. v Reid (John Joseph) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 793; [1992] 3 All E.R. 673; (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 391 HL	2–194, 2–201, 2–203, 2–207, 2–213, 2–215, 2–223, 8–174
R. v Reigate Justices Ex p. Counsell (1984) 148 J.P. 193 DC	7–034
R. v Richards (Isabelle Christina) [1974] Q.B. 776; [1973] 3 W.L.R. 888; [1973] 3 All E.R. 1088 CA (Crim Div)	6–058, 6–059, 6–060, 6–081
R. v Richardson (Jack Virgil); R. v Sheppard (Dionne); R. v Abery (Lee Alan); R. v Little (Liam John); R. v Poel (Karel); R. v Robertson (Karen Ann) [2006] EWCA Crim 3186; [2007] 2 All E.R. 601; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36; [2007] R.T.R. 29	8–187, 8–192
R. v Richardson (Nigel John) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 392; [1999] Crim. L.R. 494 CA (Crim Div)	4–068, 4–336
R. v Richens (Andrew Ronald) [1993] 4 All E.R. 877; (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 43; [1993] Crim. L.R. 384 CA (Crim Div)	8–104
R. v Riddell (Tracey) [2017] EWCA Crim 413 CA (Crim Div)	4–087, 4–200

R. v Rimmington (Anthony); R. v Goldstein (Harry Chaim) [2005] UKHL 63; [2006] 1 A.C. 459; [2005] 3 W.L.R. 982	2-277, 5-095
R. v Ripley (Samuel) [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 19 CA (Crim Div)	8-173
R. v Rizvi (Zafar); R. v Chisti (Pirzada) [2003] EWCA Crim 3575	5-103
R. v Roach (Daniel) [2011] EWCA Crim 918	9-124
R. v Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd; R. v Millar (Robert) [1970] 2 Q.B. 54; [1970] 2 W.L.R. 541; [1970] 1 All E.R. 577 CA	3-054
R. v Roberts (David Geraint); R. v George (Graham Harold) [1997] R.T.R. 462; [1997] Crim. L.R. 209 CA (Crim Div)	6-055
R. v Roberts (Kenneth Joseph) (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 95; [1972] Crim. L.R. 27; (1971) 115 S.J. 809 CA (Crim Div)	2-103, 7-033, 7-042
R. v Roberts (Mark) [2016] EWCA Crim 71; [2016] 1 W.L.R. 3249; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 14 CA (Crim Div)	1-099
R. v Roberts (William) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 117; [1986] Crim. L.R. 188 CA (Crim Div)	7-134, 9-099
R. v Roberts [1990] Crim. L.R. 122 CA (Crim Div)	8-130
R. v Robertson (Mark) [2006] EWCA Crim 1289 CA (Crim Div)	9-097
R. v Robinson (Harry) [1915] 2 K.B. 342; (1916) 11 Cr. App. R. 124, CCA	5-028, 5-032
R. v Robinson [1977] Crim. L.R. 173 CA (Crim Div)	9-214
R. v Robinson-Pierre (Symieon) [2013] EWCA Crim 2396	2-027, 2-028, 3-021
R. v Robson; sub nom R. v R [2008] EWCA Crim 619; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 713; [2008] 2 Cr. App. R. 38	5-003, 5-153, 5-156
R. v Rodger (Andrew); R. v Rose (Keith)	4-154

John) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 143 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Roe (Thomas Patrick) 4 [2008] EWCA Crim 2946	4-127
R. v Rogers (Philip) [2007] UKHL 8; [2007] 2 A.C. 62; [2007] 2 W.L.R. 280 HL	7-064, 7-067, 7-071
R. v Rogers (Stephen) 2003] EWCA Crim 945; [2003] 1 W.L.R. 1374; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 CA (Crim Div)	2-108
R. v Rook (Adrian) [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1005; [1993] 2 All E.R. 955; (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 327 CA (Crim Div)	6-064
R. v Rose (1884) 15 Cox C.C. 540	4-093
R. v Rostron (Terry) [2003] EWCA Crim 2206	9-054
R. v Rothery (Henry Michael) (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 231; [1976] R.T.R. 550; [1976] Crim. L.R. 691 CA (Crim Div)	9-051
R. v Rowley (Michael) [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1020; [1991] 4 All E.R. 649; (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 95 CA (Crim Div)	5-032, 5-040
R. v Ruffell (Stephen David) [2003] EWCA Crim 122; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 53	2-037
R. v Ruzic (2001) S.C.C.24 Sup Ct of Canada	4-147
R. v Ryan (Lee Bernard) (1996) 160 J.P. 610; [1996] Crim. L.R. 320; (1996) 160 J.P.N. 696 CA (Crim Div)	9-222
R. v Ryan [2013] S.C.C. 3	4-165
R. v S (Satnam); R. v S (Kewal) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 149; [1985] Crim. L.R. 236 CA (Crim Div)	7-140
R. v S [2014] EWCA Crim 2648; [2016] M.H.L.R. 65 CA (Crim Div)	4-258
R. v S [2012] EWCA Crim 389; [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3081; [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 31 CA (Crim Div)	4-203
R. v S Ltd; R. v L Ltd [2009] EWCA Crim	4-213

- 85; [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 11; [2009] Crim. L.R. 723
- R. v Sadique (Omar) [2011] EWCA Crim 2872; [2012] 1 W.L.R. 1700; [2012] 2 All E.R. 793 5-140
- R. v Sadique (Omar) (No.2) [2013] EWCA Crim 1150; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 986; [2013] 4 All E.R. 924 5-121, 5-127, 5-140, 5-141, 5-152
- R. v Safi (Ali Ahmed); R. v Ghayur (Abdul); R. v Shah (Taimur); R. v Showaib (Mohammed); R. v Mohammidy (Nazamuddin); R. v Shohab (Abdul); R. v Ahmadi (Reshad); R. v Safi (Mahammad Nasir); R. v Kazin (Mohammed) [2003] EWCA Crim 1809; [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. 14; [2003] Crim. L.R. 721 4-158, 4-170
- R. v Saik (Abdulrahman) [2006] UKHL 18; [2007] 1 A.C. 18; [2006] 2 W.L.R. 993 5-063, 5-089, 5-103, 5-104, 5-105, 5-106, 5-107, 5-108, 5-109, 5-111, 5-116
- R. v Sakavickas (Rolandas); R. v Reichwald (Stephen Howard) [2004] EWCA Crim 2686; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 857; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 36 5-103
- R. v Salih (Guner) [2007] EWCA Crim 2750; [2008] 1 W.L.R. 2627; [2008] 2 All E.R. 319 4-119
- R. v Salisbury [1976] V.R. 452 7-024, 7-049
- R. v Sansom (Alec James); R. v Williams (Thomas Richard); R. v Smith (Nicholas James); R. v Wilkins (Joseph Herbert) [1991] 2 Q.B. 130; [1991] 2 W.L.R. 366; [1991] 2 All E.R. 145; [1991] Crim. L.R. 126 CA (Crim Div) 5-120
- R. v Sardar (Anis Abid) [2016] EWCA Crim 1616; [2017] 1 W.L.R. 917; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 15 CA (Crim Div) 5-084
- R. v Sargent [1975] 60 Cr. App. R. 74 1-087
- R. v Saunders (Gabrielle Yinka) [2012] 9-150

- EWCA Crim 1380; [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. (S) 26
- R. v Saunders (Ian) [1985] Crim. L.R. 230; (1985) 82 L.S.G. 1005 CA (Crim Div) 7-047
- R. v Saunders and Archer (1573) 2 Plwden 473; 75 E.R. 706 (Warwick Assizes) 6-074, 6-075
- R. v Savage (Susan); sub nom DPP v Parmenter (Philip Mark); R. v Parmenter (Philip Mark) (No.1) [1992] 1 A.C. 699; [1991] 3 W.L.R. 914; [1991] 4 All E.R. 698 HL 4-069, 7-019, 7-024, 7-041, 7-042, 7-048, 7-052, 7-053, 7-054
- R. v Scarlett (John) [1993] 4 All E.R. 629; (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 290; [1994] Crim. L.R. 288 CA (Crim Div) 4-102, 4-103, 4-104, 8-049, 8-058
- R. v Scott (Valerie) (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 164; [1979] Crim. L.R. 456; (1978) 122 S.J. 523 CA (Crim Div) 5-101
- R. v Secretary of State for the Home Department Ex p. Venables; R. v Secretary of State for the Home Department Ex p. Thompson [1998] A.C. 407; [1997] 3 W.L.R. 23; [1997] 3 All E.R. 97 HL 4-362
- R. v Seymour (Edward John) [1983] 2 A.C. 493; [1983] 3 W.L.R. 349; [1983] 2 All E.R. 1058 HL 2-201
- R. v SH [2010] EWCA Crim 1931; [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. 14; [2011] Crim. L.R. 649 7-071
- R. v Shadrokh-Cigari (Hamid) [1988] Crim. L.R. 465 CA (Crim Div) 9-061, 9-083
- R. v Shannon (James Russell) (1980) 71 Cr. App. R. 192; [1980] Crim. L.R. 438; (1980) 124 S.J. 374 CA (Crim Div) 4-102
- R. v Sharp (David Bruce) [1987] Q.B. 853; [1987] 3 W.L.R. 1; [1987] 3 All E.R. 103 CA (Crim Div) 4-184
- R. v Sharpe [1857] Dears & B. 160 9-051
- R. v Shayler (David Michael) [2002] UKHL 11; [2003] 1 A.C. 247; [2002] 2 W.L.R. 754 4-133, 4-154, 4-163, 4-164, 4-181, 4-203, 4-213

R. v Sheehan (Michael); R. v Moore (George Alan) [1975] 1 W.L.R. 739; [1975] 2 All E.R. 960; (1974) 60 Cr. App. R. 308 CA (Crim Div)	4-303
R. v Shepherd (1862) 26 J.P. 101; Le & Ca. 147; 31 L.J.M.C .102; (1862) 9 Cox C.C. 123	2-032
R. v Shepherd (Martin Brian) (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 47; [1987] Crim. L.R. 686 CA (Crim Div)	4-150
R. v Shillam (Wayne Lee) [2013] EWCA Crim 160	5-101
R. v Shivpuri (Pyare) [1987] A.C. 1; [1986] 2 W.L.R. 988; [1986] 2 All E.R. 334 HL	5-077, 5-083
R. v Shortland (Malena Iris) [1996] 1 Cr. App. R. 116 CA (Crim Div)	4-157
R. v Silverman (Michael John) (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 213; (1987) 151 J.P. 657; [1987] Crim. L.R. 574 CA (Crim Div)	9-145, 9-146
R. v Simcox [1964] Crim. L.R. 402 CCA	8-142
R. v Simmonds (Derek) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 18; [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 218; [1999] R.T.R. 257 CA (Crim Div)	8-180
R. v Sinclair (James); R. v Johnson (Brian); R. v Smith (Ian) [1998] EWCA Civ 2590, (1998) 148 N.L.J.1353	2-032, 2-036
R. v Singh (Gulbir Rana) [2003] EWCA Crim 3712	5-103
R. v Singh (Gurphal) [1999] Crim. L.R. 582 CA (Crim Div)	8-079
R. v Singh (Harbans) [2011] EWCA Crim 2992	5-101
R. v Siracusa (Francesco); R. v di Carlo (Francesco); R. v Monteleone (Filippo); R. v Luciani (Antonio) (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 340; [1989] Crim. L.R. 712 CA (Crim Div)	5-103, 5-116
R. v Sirat (Mohammed) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 41; [1986] Crim. L.R. 245 CA (Crim	5-153

Div)
R. v Skidmore (Graeme) [2008] EWCA Crim 1464; [2009] Crim. L.R. 42	5-088
R. v Skipp [1975] Crim. L.R. 114 CA (Crim Div)	9-023, 9-025
R. v Slack (Martin Andrew) [1989] Q.B. 775; [1989] 3 W.L.R. 513; [1989] 3 All E.R. 90 CA (Crim Div)	6-019
R. v Slimmings (Richard Gareth) [1999] Crim. L.R. 69 CA (Crim Div)	2-255
R. v Slingsby (Simon) [1995] Crim. L.R. 570 Crown Ct	4-064, 4-069
R. v Small (Adrian Anthony) (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 170; [1988] R.T.R. 32; [1987] Crim. L.R. 777 CA (Crim Div)	9-088
R. v Smith (David Raymond) [1974] Q.B. 354; [1974] 2 W.L.R. 20; [1974] 1 All E.R. 632; CA (Crim Div)	2-258, 2-275
R. v Smith (Joseph) [2014] EWCA Crim 1941 CA (Crim Div)	5-059
R. v Smith (KA) [1983] Crim. L.R. 739 Crown Ct	8-159
R. v Smith (Michael Andrew) [2011] EWCA Crim 66; [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. 30; [2011] Crim. L.R. 719 CA (Crim Div)	9-048
R. v Smith (Morgan James) [2001] 1 A.C. 146; [2000] 3 W.L.R. 654; [2000] 4 All E.R. 289 HL	8-099, 8-109, 8-124, 8-126, 8-128, 8-129, 8-131, 8-133
R. v Smith (Thomas Joseph) [1959] 2 Q.B. 35; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 623; [1959] 2 All E.R. 193, CMAC	2-085, 2-098, 2-102
R. v Smith [1979] Crim. L.R. 251 Crown Ct (Birmingham)	2-032
R. v Spratt (Robert Michael) [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1073; [1991] 2 All E.R. 210; (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 362 CA (Crim Div)	7-019, 7-041, 7-042
R. v St George (1840) 9 C. & P. 483; 173 E.R. 921	7-010

R. v St Regis Paper Co Ltd [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 14	3-076
R. v Steane (Anthony Cedric) [1947] K.B. 997; [1947] 1 All E.R. 813; 63 T.L.R. 403, CCA	2-158, 2-159, 2-161, 2-165
R. v Steele (Peter Edward) (1977) 65 Cr. App. R. 22; [1977] Crim. L.R. 290 CA (Crim Div)	5-156, 7-134
R. v Steele [1993] Crim. L.R. 298 CA (Crim Div)	5-156
R. v Stephens (Jerry); R. v Mujuru (Sandra) [2007] EWCA Crim 1249; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. 26; [2008] Crim. L.R. 54	8-168
R. v Stephenson (Brian Keith) [1979] Q.B. 695; [1979] 3 W.L.R. 193; [1979] 2 All E.R. 1198 CA (Crim Div)	2-191, 2-203, 2-231
R. v Stewart (James) [2009] EWCA Crim 593; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 2507; [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 30	4-349, 8-147
R. v Sticklen (Daniel John) [2013] EWCA Crim 615 CA (Crim Div)	9-225
R. v Stone (John Edward); Dobinson (Gwendoline) [1977] Q.B. 354; [1977] 2 W.L.R. 169 CA (Crim Div)	2-032, 2-035, 2-062, 2-063, 2-066, 8-070, 8-075, 8-079, 8-167
R. v Stones (James) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 156; (1989) 89 Cr. App. R. 26; (1989) 86(1) L.S.G. 38 CA (Crim Div)	9-238
R. v Storey (Paul Edwin); R. v Fuat (Mustafa); R. v Duignan (James Patrick) [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1045; [1973] 3 All E.R. 562; (1973) 57 Cr. App. R. 840 CA	1-081
R. v Stranney (Andrew Paul) [2007] EWCA Crim 2847; [2008] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 104; [2008] Crim. L.R. 238	7-051
R. v Stringer (Ian Bryan) [2011] EWCA Crim 1396; [2012] Q.B. 160; [2011] 3 W.L.R. 1243 CA (Crim Div)	6-009, 6-012, 6-013
R. v Stringer (Matthew) [2008] EWCA Crim 1222	2-153

R. v Stringer (Neil Bancroft); R. v Banks (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 13; [1991] Crim. L.R. 639 CA (Crim Div)	6-007
R. v Stubbs (Kevin John) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 53; (1988) 10 Cr. App. R. (S.) 97; [1988] Crim. L.R. 389 CA (Crim Div)	4-303
R. v Su Hua Liu; sub nom R. v Lun Xi Tan [2006] EWCA Crim 3321; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 12; (2006) 150 S.J.L.B. 1535	8-171
R. v Suchedina (Hasnain) [2007] Crim. L.R. 301	5-106
R. v Sullivan (Melvin Terrence); R. v Elener (Derek); R. v Elener (Barry); R. v Gibbs (Martin Godwin) [2004] EWCA Crim 1762; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 3; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 67	8-019
R. v Sullivan (Patrick Joseph) [1984] A.C. 156; [1983] 3 W.L.R. 123; [1983] 2 All E.R. 673 HL	4-264, 4-266, 4-268, 4-269, 4-298
R. v Suski (Dariusz Tomasz) [2016] EWCA Crim 24; [2016] 4 W.L.R. 48; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 3 CA (Crim Div)	5-101
R. v Sutton (Terence) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1086; [1977] 3 All E.R. 476; (1978) 66 Cr. App. R. 21 CA (Crim Div)	4-049, 7-023
R. v T [1990] Crim. L.R. 256 Crown Ct	4-292
R. v Taaffe (Paul Desmond) [1984] A.C. 539; [1984] 2 W.L.R. 326; [1984] 1 All E.R. 747 HL	2-258, 5-080
R. v Tabassum (Naveed); sub nom R. v Tabassum (Navid) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 328; [2000] Lloyd's Rep. Med. 404; [2000] Crim. L.R. 686 CA (Crim Div)	7-122, 7-124
R. v Tait [1993] Crim. L.R. 538 CA (Crim Div)	6-015
R. v Tandy (Linda Mary) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 350; [1989] 1 All E.R. 267; (1988) 87 Cr. App. R. 45 CA (Crim Div)	4-347, 8-147

R. v Taran [2006] All E.R. (D) 173	7-142
R. v Tarasov (Valodia) [2016] EWCA Crim 2278 CA (Crim Div)	2-106
R. v Taylor (Jack) [2016] UKSC 5; [2016] 1 W.L.R. 500; [2016] 4 All E.R. 617 SC	2-119, 3-005
R. v Taylor (Robert John) [2001] EWCA Crim 1044; [2002] Crim. L.R. 205	5-103
R. v Taylor (Ross Gordon) (1983) 5 Cr. App. R. (S.) 241; [1983] Crim. L.R. 758 CA (Crim Div)	7-165
R. v Taylor (Shaun Keith); R. v Harrison (J); R. v Taylor (D) [1998] Crim. L.R. 582 CA (Crim Div)	6-009
R. v Testouri (Adel Ben) [2003] EWCA Crim 3735; [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 4; [2004] Crim. L.R. 372	5-101
R. v Thomas, Independent , 21 November 2009	4-268
R. v Thompson (1851) 16 Q.B. 832; 15 J.P. 484; 20 L.J.M.C. 173 CCR	5-101
R. v Thompson (Simon Jonathan) [2014] EWCA Crim 2892 CA (Crim Div)	8-149
R. v Thornton (Sara Elizabeth) (No.1) [1992] 1 All E.R. 306; (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 112; [1992] Crim. L.R. 54 CA (Crim Div)	4-119
R. v Toleikis (Donald) [2013] EWCA Crim 600 CA (Crim Div)	9-054
R. v Tolson (Martha Ann) (1889) L.R. 23 Q.B.D. 168 CCR	2-258, 2-259, 2-262, 2-275
R. v Tooley (1709) Fost. 312, 315, 2 Ld. Raym; 11 Mod 250, 88 E.R. 1020	4-086
R. v Toothill (Peter Kendall) [1998] Crim. L.R. 876 CA (Crim Div)	5-032
R. v Tosti (Andre); R. v White (Peter) [1997] Crim. L.R. 746 CA (Crim Div)	5-029, 5-032
R. v Towers (1874) 12 Cox C.C. 530	2-087
R. v TS [2008] EWCA Crim 6	7-144
R. v Turner (Frank Richard) (No.2) [1971]	9-056, 9-057, 9-059

1 W.L.R. 901; [1971] 2 All E.R. 441; (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 336 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Turner (Ruth Louise) [2013] EWCA Crim 1206	9–173
R. v Twaite (Timothy) [2010] EWCA Crim 2973, [2011] 1 W.L.R. 1125	9–168
R. v Tyrell. See R. v Tyrrell R. v Tyrrell; sub nom R. v Tyrell [1894] 1 Q.B. 710 CCR	5–148, 6–067
R. v Valderrama-Vega [1985] Crim. L.R. 220 CA (Crim Div)	4–160
R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745; [2015] 3 W.L.R. 109 CA (Crim Div)	9–178
R. v van Dao (Vinh) [2012] EWCA Crim 1717	4–135, 4–154, 4–211
R. v Van Dongen (Anthony Gerrard) (Appeal against Conviction); R. v Van Dongen (Mitchell) (Appeal against Conviction) [2005] EWCA Crim 1728; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 38; [2005] Crim. L.R. 971	8–122
R. v Velumyl [1989] Crim. L.R. 299 CA (Crim Div)	9–123
R. v Venna (Henson George) [1976] Q.B. 421; [1975] 3 W.L.R. 737; [1975] 3 All E.R. 788 CA (Crim Div)	2–140, 4–314, 7–019, 7–028
R. v Vickers (John Willson) [1957] 2 Q.B. 664; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 326; [1957] 2 All E.R. 741 CCA	8–011
R. v Vinall (George Alfred) [2011] EWCA Crim 2652, [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 29	9–112, 9–126, 9–214
R. v Vincent [2001] 2 Cr. App. R. 150	9–205
R. v W [2007] EWCA Crim 1251; [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. 31; [2008] Crim. L.R. 138	4–172, 4–197
R. v W [2015] EWCA Crim 559	7–131
R. v W Stevenson & Sons (A Partnership) [2008] EWCA Crim 273	3–054
R. v Waas (Jay) [2015] EWCA Crim 1259	9–147

CA (Crim Div)
R. v Wacker (Perry) [2002] EWCA Crim 1944; [2003] Q.B. 1207; [2003] 2 W.L.R. 374; [2003] 1 Cr. App. R. 22	3–103, 8–073
R. v Wain (Peter) [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 660 CA (Crim Div)	9–074, 9–075, 9–076
R. v Walker (John Charles); R. v Hayles (William) (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 226; [1990] Crim. L.R. 44 CA (Crim Div)	2–150, 5–056, 5–057
R. v Walkington (Terence John) [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1169; [1979] 2 All E.R. 716; (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 427 CA (Crim Div)	5–065, 5–066, 9–224
R. v Waller [1991] Crim. L.R. 381 CA (Crim Div)	5–156
R. v Waqanika (Joeli) [2014] EWCA Crim 902 CA (Crim Div)	9–177
R. v Warburton-Pitt (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 135	2–201
R. v Warner (Brian William) (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 93 CA (Crim Div)	9–110
R. v Waters (Sian) [2015] EWCA Crim 402 CA (Crim Div)	9–113, 9–214
R. v Watling (Mark) [2012] EWCA Crim 2894; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 37	5–127
R. v Watson (Clarence Archibald) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 684; [1989] 2 All E.R. 865; (1989) 89 Cr. App. R. 211 CA (Crim Div)	2–087, 8–061, 8–062
R. v Webb (George Hugh) [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 61	8–149
R. v Webster (Peter David) [2006] EWCA Crim 415; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 6; [2006] R.T.R. 19	6–016, 6–040
R. v Wells (Marc Martin); R. v Kail (Tony Nicholas); R. v Hone (Susan) [2015] EWCA Crim 2; [2015] 1 W.L.R. 2797; [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. 27 CA (Crim Div)	4–258
R. v Welsh (1869) 11 Cox C.C. 336	8–124
R. v Welsh [1974] R.T.R. 478 CA (Crim	9–051

Div)
R. v Welsh (Colin Christopher) [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 68	8–148
R. v Wenman (Joseph William) [2013] EWCA Crim 340	9–144
R. v West London Coroner Ex p. Gray. See R. v HM Coroner for West London Ex p. Gray R. v Wheeler (Stephen Godfrey) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 279 CA (Crim Div)	9–046
R. v Wheeler (Stephen) [2014] EWCA Crim 2706 CA (Crim Div)	5–059
R. v Wheelhouse [1994] Crim. L.R. 756 CA (Crim Div)	6–053
R. v White (Anthony Alan) [2014] EWCA Crim 714; [2014] 2 Cr. App. R. 14; [2014] Crim. L.R. 747 CA (Crim Div)	9–168
R. v White (Anthony Delroy) [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1352	7–071
R. v White (John) [1910] 2 K.B. 124; (1910) 4 Cr. App. R. 257, CCA	2–007, 2–084
R. v Whitefield (Arthur Armour) (1984) 79 Cr. App. R. 36; [1984] Crim. L.R. 97; (1983) 80 L.S.G. 3077 CA (Crim Div)	6–064
R. v Whitehouse (Arthur) [1977] Q.B. 868; [1977] 2 W.L.R. 925; [1977] 3 All E.R. 737 CA (Crim Div)	6–067
R. v Whybrow (Arthur George) (1951) 35 Cr. App. R. 141; (1951) 95 S.J. 745, CCA	5–051, 5–060
R. v Whyte (Ese Etenyin) [1987] 3 All E.R. 416; (1987) 85 Cr. App. R. 283 CA (Crim Div)	4–102
R. v Widdowson (Stanley) (1986) 82 Cr. App. R. 314; [1986] R.T.R. 124; [1986] Crim. L.R. 233 CA (Crim Div)	9–189
R. v Wiggins (Zaro Pierre) [2012] EWCA Crim 885	9–227
R. v Wilby (Christopher Keith) [2007] EWCA Crim 2823; [2008] 1 Cr. App. R.	8–031

- (S.) 98
- R. v Wilcocks (Callum Paul) [2016] EWCA Crim 2043; [2017] 4 W.L.R. 39; [2017] 1 Cr. App. R. 23 CA (Crim Div) 4–260, 8–138
- R. v Willer (Mark Edward) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 225; [1987] R.T.R. 22 CA (Crim Div) 4–200
- R. v Williams (Barry Anthony); R. v Davis (Frank O’Neill) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 380; [1992] 2 All E.R. 183; (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 1 CA (Crim Div) 2–105, 2–118, 8–061
- R. v Williams (Gladstone) [1987] 3 All E.R. 411; (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 276; [1984] Crim. L.R. 163; (1984) 81 L.S.G. 278 CA (Crim Div) 2–001, 2–264, 2–265, 2–266, 2–273, 4–077, 4–086, 4–093, 4–094, 4–119, 4–170
- R. v Williams (Hywell Rhys); R. v Williams (Margaret Elizabeth) [1953] 1 Q.B. 660; [1953] 2 W.L.R. 937; [1953] 1 All E.R. 1068, CCA 9–123
- R. v Williams (Jason John) [2010] EWCA Crim 2552 2–085, 8–202
- R. v Williams (Owen Richard) [1923] 1 K.B. 340; (1924) 17 Cr. App. R. 56 CCA 7–122
- R. v Williams (Raymond) [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 72 CA (Crim Div) 8–089, 8–090 , 8–091, 8–092
- R. v Williams [2001] 1 Cr. App. R. 362` 9–048
- R. v Williams; R. v Lamb [1995] Crim. L.R. 77 CA (Crim Div) 9–077
- R. v Willoughby (Keith Calverley) [2004] EWCA Crim 3365; [2005] 1 W.L.R. 1880; [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 29 3–103, 8–053, 8–075
- R. v Wills (Graham George) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 297 CA (Crim Div) 9–076
- R. v Wilson (Alan Thomas) [1997] Q.B. 47; [1996] 3 W.L.R. 125; [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 241 CA (Crim Div) 4–060, 4–061, 4–062, 4–064
- R. v Wilson (Clarence George); R. v Jenkins (Ronald Patrick); R. v Jenkins (Edward John) [1984] A.C. 242; [1983] 7–024, 7–048, 7–058

3 W.L.R. 686; [1983] 3 All E.R. 448 HL
R. v Windle (Francis Wilfred) [1952] 2 Q.B. 826; [1952] 2 All E.R. 1; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1344, CCA	4-271, 415
R. v Winter (Robert Michael) [2008] EWCA Crim 3; [2008] Crim. L.R. 971; (2008) 152(4) S.J.L.B. 29	7-109
R. v Wood (Clive) [2008] EWCA Crim 1305; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 496; [2008] 3 All E.R. 898; [2008] 2 Cr. App. R. 34	4-349, 8-147
R. v Wood (Maurice) (1979) 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 34 CA (Crim Div)	9-247
R. v Wood (Peter) [2002] EWCA Crim 832	9-090, 9-099
R. v Woodman (George Eli) [1974] Q.B. 754; [1974] 2 W.L.R. 821; [1974] 2 All E.R. 955 CA (Crim Div)	9-054
R. v Woodrow (1846) 15 M. & W. 404; 153 E.R. 907 (Exch.)	3-001
R. v Woods (Natalie Frances) [2011] EWCA Crim 1305	9-173
R. v Woods (Walter) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 312; [1982] Crim. L.R. 42 CA (Crim Div)	4-327
R. v Woollin (Stephen Leslie) [1999] 1 A.C. 82; [1998] 3 W.L.R. 382; [1998] 4 All E.R. 103 HL	2-145, 2-146, 2-151, 2-152, 2-155, 2-156, 2-159, 2-160, 2-162, 2-165, 2-166, 2-167, 2-172, 5-056, 5-057, 5-131, 6-035, 7-061, 8-013, 8-022, 8-030, 8-031, 8-032, 8-045, 8-047, 8-209
R. v Woolven (Johnathan Robert) (1983) 77 Cr. App. R. 231; [1983] Crim. L.R. 623 CA (Crim Div)	9-157
R. v Wright (Nathan) [2007] EWCA Crim 3473	7-117
R. v Wright (Shani Ann) [2000] Crim. L.R. 510 CA (Crim Div)	4-161
R. v Wright (Steven) [2003] EWCA Crim 1732; [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 4	8-173
R. v Wuyts (Nicholas Charles) [1969] 2	4-217

Q.B. 474; [1969] 3 W.L.R. 1; [1969] 2 All E.R. 799 CA (Crim Div)
R. v Yaman (Tolga) [2012] EWCA Crim 1075	4-104
R. v Yaqoob (Mohammed) [2005] EWCA Crim 2169	8-079
R. v Young (Kerry Rena) [2005] EWCA Crim 2963	8-006
R. v Zerei (Samuel Michael) [2012] EWCA Crim 1114	9-112, 9-214
R. v Zhang (Shanjil) [2007] EWCA Crim 2018	7-129
R. (on the application of A) v Snaresbrook Crown Court [2001] All E.R. (D)	9-045
R. (on the application of Axon) v Secretary of State for Health [2006] EWHC 37 (Admin); [2006] Q.B. 539; [2006] 2 W.L.R. 1130	4-049
R. (on the application of Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London [2007] EWCA Civ 617; [2007] Inquest L.R. 163; (2007) 104(28) L.S.G. 26	4-087, 4-088, 4-094, 4-104
R. (on the application of Burke) v General Medical Council [2005] EWCA Civ 1003; [2006] Q.B. 273; [2005] 3 W.L.R. 1132; [2005] 2 F.L.R. 1223	2-161
R. (on the application of Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin); [2016] Q.B. 862; [2016] 2 W.L.R. 1303 DC	4-078, 4-088, 4-106, 4-107
R. (on the application of Countryside Alliance) v Att Gen; R. (on the application of Derwin) v Att Gen; R. (on the application of Friend) v Att Gen [2007] UKHL 52; [2008] 1 A.C. 719; [2007] 3 W.L.R. 922	1-047
R. (on the application of Dhaliwal) v DPP. See Dhaliwal v DPP; R. (on the application of Dhaliwal) v DPP R. (on	4-048, 7-127

the application of F) v DPP [2013] EWHC 945 (Admin); [2014] 2 W.L.R. 190
R. (on the application of Gray) v Aylesbury Crown Court [2013] EWHC Admin 500	2-221
R. (on the application of Juncal) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2008] EWCA Civ 869; [2008] M.H.L.R. 193	4-277
R. (on the application of Lewin) v Crown Prosecution Service; sub nom Lewin v Crown Prosecution Service [2002] EWHC 1049 (Admin)	8-079
R. (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38; [2014] 3 W.L.R. 200	4-051, 4-228, 4-230, 8-155
R. (on the application of Pretty) v DPP [2001] UKHL 61; [2002] 1 A.C. 800; [2001] 3 W.L.R. 1598	4-051, 8-155, 8-155
R. (on the application of Purdy) v DPP [2009] UKHL 45; [2009] 3 W.L.R. 403; [2009] 4 All E.R. 1147; [2010] 1 Cr. App. R. 1	4-051, 8-155
R. (on the application of Ricketts) v Basildon Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 2358 (Admin)	9-054
R. (on the application of Singh) v Stratford Magistrates' Court [2007] EWHC 1582 (Admin); [2007] 1 W.L.R. 3119; [2007] 4 All E.R. 407	4-247
R. (on the application of T) v DPP [2003] EWHC 266 (Admin); [2003] Crim. L.R. 622	7-034
R. (on the application of Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education and Employment; sub nom Williamson v Secretary of State for Education and Employment [2005] UKHL 15; [2005] 2 A.C. 246; [2005] 2 W.L.R. 590	4-130
RA v United Kingdom (Admissibility)	4-175

(73521/12) (2016) 63 E.H.R.R. SE5 ECtHR
Rabey [1980] S.C.R. 513 (Canada)	4–130, 4–292
Rafferty v R. [2007] EWCA Crim 1846; [2008] Crim. L.R. 218	2–093
Rantsev v Cyprus (25965/04) (2010) 51 E.H.R.R. 1; 28 B.H.R.C. 313 ECtHR	4–205
Read v Coker (1853) 13 C.B. 850	7–010
Repouille v United States, 165 F. 2d 152 (2d Cir. 1947)	8–213, 8–226
Richmond upon Thames LBC v Pinn & Wheeler Ltd, Times , 14 February 1989	3–054
Robinson v Queen, The [2011] UKPC 3	6–015
Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (RSPCA) v C; sub nom R. (on the application of Royal Society for the Protection of Animals) v C [2006] EWHC 1069 (Admin); (2006) 170 J.P. 463; (2006) 170 J.P.N. 262	2–221
Royall v The Queen (1991) 65 A.L.J.R. 451	2–078
Ruddock v The Queen [2016] UKPC 7	6–028
Ruse v Read [1949] 1 K.B. 377; [1949] 1 All E.R. 398; 65 T.L.R. 124 DC	4–321
S (Adult: Refusal of Treatment), Re [1993] Fam. 123; [1992] 3 W.L.R. 806; [1992] 4 All E.R. 671 Fam Div	4–048
S v De Blom 1977 (3) S.A. 513	2–280
Salabiaku v France (A/141-A) (1991) 13 E.H.R.R. 379 ECHR	3–026, 3–027
Salzman v United States, 405 F.2d 358 (1968)	4–347
SC v United Kingdom (60958/00) [2005] 1 F.C.R. 347; (2005) 40 E.H.R.R. 10; 17 B.H.R.C. 607 ECHR	4–252
Schiavo, Re (2003) 851 So.2d 182	4–054
Scott v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; sub nom R. v Scott (Anthony Peter) [1975] A.C. 819; [1974]	5–096, 5–097

3 W.L.R. 741; [1974] 3 All E.R. 1032 HL
Scott v Sheppherd (1773) W. Black 892	7-024
Seaboard Offshore Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1994] 1 W.L.R. 541; [1994] 2 All E.R. 99; [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 589 HL	3-065
Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Hart [1982] 1 W.L.R. 481; [1982] 1 All E.R. 817; [1982] Crim. L.R. 583 DC	2-277
Serious Fraud Office v Evans [2014] EWHC 3803 (QB); [2015] 1 W.L.R. 3526; [2015] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 59 QBD	5-097
Serious Fraud Office v XYZ Ltd [2016] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 509 CC	3-148
Shaw v DPP; sub nom R. v Shaw (Frederick Charles) [1962] A.C. 220; [1961] 2 W.L.R. 897; [1961] 2 All E.R. 446 HL	5-099
Sheldrake v DPP; Att Gen's Reference (No.4 of 2002), Re [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 A.C. 264; [2004] 3 W.L.R. 976	3-024
Sherras v De Rutzen [1895] 1 Q.B. 918 QBD	3-017
Shorty (1950) S.R. 280	2-237, 2-241
Simpson v Peat [1952] 2 Q.B. 24; [1952] 1 All E.R. 447; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 469 QBD	2-200, 8-190
Smith v Chief Superintendent of Woking Police Station (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 234; [1983] Crim. L.R. 323 QBD	7-011
Southern Water Authority v Pegrum (1989) 153 J.P. 581; [1989] Crim. L.R. 442; (1989) 153 J.P.N. 578 DC	2-079
Southwark LBC v Williams; Southwark LBC v Anderson [1971] Ch. 734; [1971] 2 W.L.R. 467; [1971] 2 All E.R. 175 CA (Civ Div)	4-214, 4-215
St George's Healthcare NHS Trust v S; R. v Collins Ex p. S (No.1) [1998] 3 W.L.R.	4-048

936; [1998] 3 All E.R. 673; [1998] 2 F.L.R. 728 CA (Civ Div)
Staples v United States, 511 US 600 (1994) Supreme Ct of the United States	3-009
Stapleton v R (1952) 86 C.L.R. 358	4-271
Starglade Properties Ltd v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314; [2011] Lloyd's Rep. F.C. 102	9-034
State v Green 470 S.W.2d 565 (1971)	4-212
State v Hernandez, 311 N.W.2d 478 (Minn. 1981)	1-142
State v Hoyt, 128 N.W. 2d 645, 21 Wis. 2d 284 (1964) Supreme Ct of Wisconsin	8-123
State v Mitchell, 170 Mo. 633, 71 S.W. 175 (1902)	5-082
State v Sikora 44 N.J. 453, 210 A. 2d. 193 (1965), NJ	2-125
State v Tally (1894) 102 Ala. 25	6-081
Stevens v Gourley, 141 E.R. 752; (1859) 7 C.B. N.S. 99 CCP	9-224
Stevens v R. [1985] L.R.C. (Crim)	5-034
Stingel v The Queen (1990) 171 C.L.R. 312	8-118
Storkwain. See Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Storkwain Ltd Stubing v Germany [2013] 1 F.L.R. 107	1-024
Superintendent of Belchertown State School v Saikewicz, 370 N.E. 2d 417	4-054
Surujpaul v Queen, The; sub nom, R. v Surujpaul [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1050; [1958] 3 All E.R. 300; (1958) 42 Cr. App. R. 266 PC (BG)	6-050
Sutcliffe, Times , 30 April 1981	8-226
Sutherland and Morris v United Kingdom [1998] E.H.R.L.R. 117	1-046
SW v United Kingdom (A/355-B); sub nom SW v United Kingdom (20166/92); CR v United Kingdom [1996] 1 F.L.R. 434; (1996) 21 E.H.R.R. 363; [1996] Fam. Law 275 ECHR	7-135

Sweet v Parsley [1970] A.C. 132; [1969] 2 W.L.R. 470; [1969] 1 All E.R. 347 HL	2–259
T v United Kingdom (24724/94); V v United Kingdom (24888/94) [2000] 2 All E.R. 1024 (Note); (2000) 30 E.H.R.R. 121; 7 B.H.R.C. 659 ECHR	4–252
Tak 1988 NSWLR 226	2–036
Taylor v Granville [1978] Crim. L.R. 482 DC	7–034
Taylor’s Central Garages (Exeter) v Roper [1951] 2 T.L.R. 284	9–155
Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass [1972] A.C. 153; [1971] 2 W.L.R. 1166; [1971] 2 All E.R. 127 HL	3–071, 3–074
Tesco Supermarkets Plc v Brent LBC [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1037; [1993] 2 All E.R. 718 DC	3–065
Theedom v Nourish Training Ltd (t/a CSP Recruitment) [2016] EWHC 1364 (QB); [2016] I.R.L.R. 866 QBD	9–173
Thomas v R. (1937) 59 C.L.R. 278	2–270
Thornton v Mitchell [1940] 1 All E.R. 339 KBD	6–055
Tomkinson. See DPP v Tomkinson Transco Plc v HM Advocate (No.1), 2004 J.C. 29; 2004 S.L.T. 41; 2004 S.C.C.R. 1 HCJ	3–074
Troughton v Metropolitan Police [1987] Crim. L.R. 138 QBD	9–206
Tuberville v Savage (1669) 1 Mod.Rep. 3; 86 E.R. 684	7–009, 7–010
Tuppen v Microsoft Corp Ltd, Times , 15 November 2000 QBD	7–015
Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] UKHL 12; [2002] 2 A.C. 164; [2002] 2 W.L.R. 802; [2002] 2 All E.R. 377	9–034
Tyrer v United Kingdom (1978) Eur.Ct. Series A vol.26 ECJ	4–012
United Arab Emirates v Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R.	9–144, 9–146, 9–148, 9–149, 9–168

3419; [2013] Lloyd’s Rep. F.C. 254
United States v Calley, 22 U.S.M. C.A. 534 (1973) (US Court of Military Appeals)	4–234
United States v Dotterweich, 320 US (1943) 277 Supreme Ct of the United States	3–035
United States v Hinckley, Criminal No.81, 306 US Dr.Ct. for the District of Columbia, 525 F. Supp.1342, Nov. 17, 1981	4–278, 4–287
United States v Holmes, 26 Fed. Cas. 360 (1842), Circuit Court, Eastern District, Pennsylvania	4–220
United States v Kinder (1953) A.C.M. 7321, 14 C.M.R. 742	4–233
United States v Knowles, 26 Fed.Cas. 801 (No.15, 540) (N.D. Cal. 1864), District Court, Northern District California	2–039, 2–047
United States v Sarao [2016] Lloyds Rep FC 339 (Magistrates’ Court)	9–150
United States v Quarles, 350 U.S. II (1955)	4–233
United States v United States Gypsum (438) US 422	2–178
Vehicle Inspectorate v Nuttall; sub nom Secretary of State for Transport v Nuttall (t/a Redline Coaches); Wing v Nuttall; Nuttall v Vehicle Inspectorate [1999] 1 W.L.R. 629; [1999] 3 All E.R. 833; [1999] R.T.R. 264 HL	2–048, 2–189
Verrier (Ronald Ernest) v DPP [1967] 2 A.C. 195; [1966] 3 W.L.R. 924; [1966] 3 All E.R. 568 HL	5–091
Viro v R (1976-78) 141 C.L.R. 88; 52 A.L.J.R., Aus HC	4–121
Vivendi SA v Richards [2013] EWHC 3006 (Ch)	9–034
Voros v Hungary [2012] EWHC 518 (Admin)	9–149
W (A Minor) (Medical Treatment: Court’s Jurisdiction), Re; sub nom J (A Minor)	4–050

(Consent to Medical Treatment), Re [1993] Fam. 64; [1992] 3 W.L.R. 758; [1992] 4 All E.R. 627 CA (Civ Div)
Wai Yu-Tsang v Queen, The [1992] 1 A.C. 269; [1991] 3 W.L.R. 1006; [1991] 4 All E.R. 664 PC (HK)	5-098
Walters v Lunt [1951] 2 All E.R. 645; (1951) 35 Cr. App. R. 94; (1951) 115 J.P. 512 DC	6-052
Warner v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; sub nom R. v Warner (Reginald Charles) [1969] 2 A.C. 256; [1968] 2 W.L.R. 1303; [1968] 2 All E.R. 356 HL	3-013
Washington University v Catalona (2007) 490 F. 3d 667 (8th Circuit) 831(Ct of Appeals)	9-051
Welham v DPP; sub nom R. v Welham (Robert John) [1961] A.C. 103; [1960] 2 W.L.R. 669; [1960] 1 All E.R. 805 HL	5-098
Wheatley v Commissioner of Police of the British Virgin Islands [2006] UKPC 24; [2006] 1 W.L.R. 1683; [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 21	9-045, 9-091
Whitehouse (alias Savage) (1941) 1 W.W.R. 112	6-062
Wilcox v Jeffery [1951] 1 All E.R. 464; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 706; (1951) 115 J.P. 151 DC	6-014
Williams v Phillips (1957) 121 J.P. 163	9-054
Williams v Williams (1852) 20 Ch. D. 657	9-051
Wilson v Pringle [1987] Q.B. 237; [1986] 3 W.L.R. 1; [1986] 2 All E.R. 440 CA (Civ Div)	7-023
Wings Ltd v Ellis [1985] A.C. 272; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 965; [1984] 3 All E.R. 577 HL	3-043
Winterwerp v Netherlands (A/33) (1979- 80) 2 E.H.R.R. 387 ECHR	4-277
Winzar v Chief Constable of Kent, Times ,	2-022, 2-023, 2-024

28 March 1983 DC
Wood v Richards; sub nom Woods v Richards (1977) 65 Cr. App. R. 300; [1977] R.T.R. 201; [1977] Crim. L.R. 295 DC	4-214
Woolmington v DPP [1935] A.C. 462; (1936) 25 Cr. App. R. 72 HL	3-023, 4-001, 4-260
Wright (1603) Co.Lit.f. 127 a-b	4-055, 6-071
Writtle v DPP [2009] EWHC 236 (Admin); (2009) 173 J.P. 224; [2009] R.T.R. 28 DC	4-135
Wyatt, Re [2006] EWHC 319 (Fam)	4-052
X v Netherlands (A/91) (1986) 8 E.H.R.R. 235 ECtHR	3-029
X, Re [2003] J.C.A. 050	9-051
Yearworth v North Bristol NHS Trust [2009] EWCA Civ 37; [2010] Q.B. 1; [2009] 3 W.L.R. 118	9-051, 9-051
Yip Chiu-Cheung v Queen, The [1995] 1 AC 111; [1994] 3 W.L.R. 514; [1994] 2 All E.R. 924 PC (HK)	5-115
Zainal Abidin b Ismail [1987] 2 M.L.J. 741	5-071
Zecevic v DPP (Victoria) (1987) 162 C.L.R. 645; 71 A.L.R. 641 HC Aus	4-121

TABLE OF STATUTES

1623 Infanticide Act (c.27)	8-157
1800 Criminal Lunatics Act (c.94)	4-247
1861 Accessories and Abettors Act (c.94)	8-154
s.8	2-140, 6-003, 6-006, 6-008, 6-009, 6-032, 6-038, 6-042
1861 Malicious Damage Act (c.97)	2-191
1861 Offences Against the Person Act (c.100)	3-074, 3-076, 2-247, 4-056, 4-194, 5-155, 6-041, 7-076
s.5	8-044
s.9	5-150
s.18	2-140, 2-166, 2-255, 4-194, 4-197, 4-207, 4-311, 4-313, 4-318, 4-320, 4-334, 4-362, 5-133, 7-038, 7-049, 7-052, 7-057, 7-058, 7-059, 7-060, 7-061, 7-062, 7-074, 7-076, 7-079, 7-128, 8-015, 8-155
s.20	2-134, 3-076, 4-047, 4-048, 4-055, 4-056, 4-065, 4-069, 4-092, 4-207, 4-264, 4-311, 4-313, 4-320, 4-326, 4-334, 4-336, 7-002, 7-024, 7-038, 7-041, 7-044, 7-048, 7-049, 7-050, 7-051, 7-052, 7-053, 7-054, 7-056, 7-058, 7-067, 7-074, 7-076, 7-078, 7-079, 7-128
s.21	7-084
s.22	7-084
s.23	2-108, 7-053, 7-084, 8-054
s.24	7-084
s.28	7-084

s.29	7-084
s.30	7-084
s.34	8-061
s.35	7-078
s.36	7-086
s.37	7-086
s.38	2-276, 4-313, 7-031
s.47	1-010, 2-119, 4-055, 4-056, 4-057, 4-060, 4-064, 4-069, 4-128, 4-326, 7-002, 7-004, 7-008, 7-012, 7-017, 7-036, 7-038, 7-040, 7-041, 7-042, 7-043, 7-052, 7-054, 7-056, 7-079, 7-084
s.58	7-031, 8-007
1863 Wills Act (c.44)
s.20	7-025
1868 Poor Law (Amendment) Act (c.122)
s.37	2-032
1883 Explosive Substances Act (c.3)
s.4	4-117
(1)	5-155
1883 Trial of Lunatics Act (c.38)
s.2	4-264
1911 Protection of Animals Act (c.27)	2-221
s.1(a)	2-221
1911 Official Secrets Act (c.28)	4-156
s.1	2-164
1913 Forgery Act (c.27)
ss.8-10	4-217
1916 Larceny Act (c.50)	9-007, 9-031, 9-211
s.1(1)	9-018
s.33(1)	6-052
1919 Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act (c.92)

s.3	5-121
1922 Infanticide Act (c.18)
s.5(1)	8-157
1925 Criminal Justice Act (c.86)
s.47	4-157
1929 Infant Life (Preservation) Act (c.34)
s.1	8-007
1930 Road Traffic Act (c.43)
s.28	9-120
1933 Children and Young Persons Act (c.12)
s.1	8-167
(1)	2-041
(2)(a)	2-029
s.44(1)	4-364
s.50	4-361
s.53(1)	4-362
1938 Infanticide Act (c.36)	8-158, 8-162
s.1	8-156, 8-157, 8-159, 8-162
(1)	8-156, 8-157
(2)	8-156, 8-157
1946 Statutory Instrument Act (c.36)
s.3(2)	2-277
1951 Rivers (Prevention of Pollution) Act (c.64)
s.2(1)(a)	3-001
1952 Magistrates' Courts Act (c.55)
s.19	7-031
Sch.1	7-031
1953 Prevention of Crime Act (c.14)
s.1	4-118, 8-054
1956 Road Traffic Act (c.67)	8-172
1956 Sexual Offences Act (c.69)	2-259
s.1	2-259

(2)	7-140
(b)	7-140
s.5	7-157
s.6	7-157
s.12	7-136
s.14	4-049, 7-149, 7-157
(1)	2-262, 3-005
(2)	2-262
s.15	7-149, 7-157
1957 Homicide Act (c.11)	8-013, 8-124, 8-152
s.1	8-012
s.2	4-347, 4-348, 8-095, 8-137, 8-138, 8-140, 8-144, 8-146, 8-147, 8-162
(1)	8-137, 8-139
(b)	8-141
(c)	8-144
(1A)	8-137, 8-139, 8-140
(1B)	8-137, 8-144
(2)	4-001, 4-260
(3)	8-137
s.3	8-095, 8-097, 8-099, 8-103, 8-111, 8-114, 8-122, 8-124, 8-127, 8-128
s.4	8-151, 8-154
(1)	8-151
(3)	8-151
1959 Obscene Publications Act (c.66)	5-099
1960 Indecency with Children Act (c.33)
s.1(1)	2-261, 3-004
1961 Suicide Act (c.60)	8-154, 8-155
s.1	4-051
s.2	1-040, 4-056, 8-153, 8-155

(1)	8-153
(1A)	8-153
(1B)	8-153
(1C)	8-153
(4)	8-155
1963 Children and Young Persons Act (c.37)
s.16	4-361
1964 Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act (c.64)
s.1	3-013
1964 Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act (c.84)
s.1	4-247, 4-273, 4-277
s.4(5)	4-257
s.4A	4-258
(4)	4-257
s.5	4-258, 4-273
(2)(b)	4-345
(3)	4-258, 4-273
1965 Dangerous Drugs Act (c.15)
s.5(b)	3-003
1965 Murder (Abolition of the Death Penalty) Act (c.71)	8-016
1967 Criminal Law Act (c.58)	5-004, 6-006
s.1	8-012
s.2	8-012
s.3	2-264, 4-078, 4-084, 4-096
(1)	4-096, 4-365
s.6	7-004
(3)	7-052, 7-058
1967 Criminal Justice Act (c.80)
s.8	2-142, 2-144, 2-145, 2-

	146, 2-192, 2-204
1967 Abortion Act (c.87)
s.1	8-007
1968 Criminal Appeal Act (c.19)	2-260
s.2(1)	2-259
1968 Firearms Act (c.27)
s.1	3-013, 4-117
s.4	4-117
s.5(1)(a)	4-202
s.16	4-117
ss.16-22	5-155
s.17(2)	4-365, 7-010
s.19	5-154
s.20	5-154
s.25	2-217
1968 Trade Descriptions Act (c.29)	3-043
s.11(2)	3-071
s.24	3-071
1968 Theft Act (c.60)	9-007, 9-008, 9-011, 9-018, 9-060, 9-086, 9-093, 9-117, 9-131, 9-211
s.1	2-006, 2-140, 4-203, 4-321, 9-031, 9-035, 9-082, 9-096, 9-108, 9-112, 9-233
(1)	9-012, 9-018, 9-024, 9-025, 9-026, 9-027, 9-031, 9-094, 9-110
(2)	9-027, 9-088, 9-092
s.2	9-013, 9-031, 9-087, 9-090, 9-096, 9-146, 9-157
(1)	9-027, 9-031, 9-087, 9-096
(a)	2-007, 9-020, 9-030, 9-031, 9-057, 9-088, 9-157, 9-158
(b)	9-026, 9-160
(c)	9-090
(2)	9-087, 9-091, 9-096

s.3	9-008, 9-013, 9-014, 9-027, 9-031
(1)	9-014, 9-015, 9-017, 9-018, 9-020, 9-025, 9-027, 9-030, 9-031, 9-033, 9-046
(2)	9-014, 9-020, 9-027, 9-046
s.4	9-013, 9-031, 9-041, 9-047, 9-050, 9-051
(1)	9-047, 9-047, 9-048
(2)	9-032, 9-047, 9-048
(a)	9-047, 9-048
(b)	9-047, 9-048
(c)	9-047, 9-048
(2)-(4)	9-032
(3)	9-032, 9-047, 9-048
(4)	9-032, 9-047, 9-048
s.5	9-013, 9-031, 9-034, 9-052, 9-077
(1)	9-008, 9-031, 9-053, 9-059, 9-061, 9-066, 9-081, 9-083
(2)	9-008, 9-063, 9-064
(3)	9-065, 9-066, 9-068, 9-069, 9-073, 9-074, 9-075, 9-076, 9-077, 9-078, 9-079, 9-081, 9-124
(4)	9-031, 9-035, 9-080, 9-081, 9-082, 9-083
s.6	9-013, 9-031, 9-108, 9-109, 9-112, 9-116, 9-120
(1)	9-109, 9-110, 9-111, 9-112, 9-125
(2)	9-109, 9-110, 9-116
s.7	9-011
s.8	4-322, 4-338, 5-036, 9-213, 9-214
(1)	9-213

(2)	9-211, 9-213
s.9	4-322, 9-217, 9-218, 9-220, 9-225
(1)	9-217
(a)	9-126, 9-218, 9-221, 9-225, 9-226, 9-227
(b)	9-039, 9-218, 9-221, 9-227
(2)	9-217, 9-218, 9-225, 9-226
(3)	9-217
(4)	9-211, 9-224
s.10	9-217, 9-217, 9-218, 9-227, 9-238
(1)	9-217
(2)	9-211, 9-217, 9-228
s.11	9-120
(1)	9-026
s.12	4-334, 9-120
(1)	9-026
s.12A	2-119, 3-005, 8-202, 9-120
(2)	9-120
s.13	9-026, 9-048, 9-049
s.15	9-032, 9-032, 9-096, 9-131, 9-133, 9-145
(1)	9-025, 9-145
s.15A	9-131
s.16	9-131, 9-133
s.20(2)	9-131
(3)	9-048
s.21	9-233
s.21A	8-172
s.22	4-323, 5-004, 5-069, 9-039, 9-230, 9-231, 9-233, 9-234
(1)	9-042, 9-230

(2)	9-211, 9-230
s.24	9-233
(2)	9-233
(3)	5-069, 9-233
s.24A(8)	9-233
s.34(1)	9-032
(2)(b)	9-233
1968 Medicines Act (c.67)	3-050, 8-054
Pt III	3-017
Pt V	3-017
Pt VI	3-017
s.45(2)	3-017
s.46(1)	3-017
(2)	3-017
(3)	3-017
s.58	3-017
(2)(a)	3-017
ss.63-65	3-017
s.67	8-054
s.121	3-017
1968 Transport Act (c.73)
s.96(11A)	2-048
1969 Tattooing of Minors Act (c.24)	9-191
1969 Family Law Reform Act (c.46)
s.8	4-050
(3)	4-050
1969 Children and Young Persons Act (c.54)
s.4	4-361
s.12AA	4-363
1970 Merchant Shipping Act (c.21)
s.55	3-093
1971 Misuse of Drugs Act (c.38)	1-032, 8-055

s.5(3)	3-024
s.28(2)	3-024
(3)	3-024
Sch.2	1-032
1971 Criminal Damage Act (c.48)	2-192, 2-193, 2-203, 2-205, 2-207, 4-157, 5-155, 9-007
s.1	2-193, 2-198, 2-204, 5-063
(1)	2-042, 2-191, 2-196, 2-198, 2-203, 2-204, 2-231, 2-232, 2-258, 4-314, 4-336, 5-104, 5-109
(2)	2-070, 2-191, 2-192, 2-203, 4-197, 4-314, 4-315, 5-051, 5-059, 5-060, 5-103, 5-104, 5-105, 5-106, 5-107, 5-111, 5-155, 5-157, 8-053
(b)	4-315, 4-317
(3)	2-042, 8-053
s.2(2)(a)	2-275
(5)	2-275
s.5(2)	4-336, 4-337
(b)	4-158, 4-217
(3)	4-336, 4-337, 4-338
1971 Immigration Act (c.77)
s.24(1)(b)	2-276
1972 Road Traffic Act (c.20)
s.1	2-193
s.2	2-193
s.3	2-193
s.6(1)	5-071, 6-038
s.99(b)	4-201
1972 Criminal Justice Act (c.71)
s.36	5-065, 9-082
1974 Health and Safety at Work etc Act (c.37)	3-089, 3-090, 3-124

s.2(1)	3-089
ss.2-4	5-155
ss.2-6	3-090
ss.2-7	2-041
s.3(1)	3-141
s.33	3-124
s.37	3-128
(1)	3-061
s.40	3-116
s.42	3-144
1974 Control of Pollution Act (c.40)	3-050
1976 Companies Act (c.69)
s.13(5)	2-277
1976 Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act (c.82)	7-140
s.2	7-107
s.6A	7-140
1977 Patents Act (c.37)
s.30	9-048
1977 Criminal Law Act (c.45)	5-088, 5-093, 5-094, 5-099
s.1	5-062, 5-063, 5-090, 5-093, 5-100, 5-114
(1)	5-063, 5-117
(a)	5-098
(b)	5-117
(2)	5-114
s.1A	5-120
s.2(1)	6-069
(2)(a)	5-101
(b)	5-101
(c)	5-101
s.3	5-091
(1)	5-090

(3)	5-090
s.5	5-093
(2)	5-094
(3)	5-099
(7)	5-153
(8)	5-101
ss.6-7	9-048
s.50(1)	2-193, 8-174
1978 Interpretation Act (c.30)
Sch.1
para.1	5-003
1978 Theft Act (c.31)
s.1	9-007, 9-008, 9-131, 9-191 9-131, 9-133, 9-181, 9-183
(2)	9-191
s.2	9-133, 9-194
(1)(a)	9-131
(b)	9-131
(c)	9-131
s.3	9-079, 9-199, 9-203, 9-205, 9-206, 9-207, 9-208
(1)	9-199
(2)	9-199
(3)	9-199
1978 Protection of Children Act (c.37)
s.1(1)(a)	1-003, 4-049
(c)	3-013
1979 Customs and Excise Management Act (c.2)
s.170(1)(b)	5-077
(2)	2-258
1980 Magistrates' Courts Act (c.43)
s.22	9-242
s.22A	9-011, 9-242

(7)	9-011
s.44	6-003
1981 Forgery and Counterfeiting Act (c.45)	9-007
s.4	9-162
s.16(2)	4-217
s.17	5-155
1981 Criminal Attempts Act (c.47)	5-024, 5-029, 5-031, 5-032, 5-033, 5-035, 5-037, 5-067, 5-072
s.1	5-058, 5-060, 5-062, 5-063, 5-072, 5-074
(1)	5-029, 5-030, 5-033, 5-040, 5-049, 5-054, 5-061, 5-074, 5-077
(2)	5-064, 5-073, 5-074, 5-077
(3)	5-061, 5-064, 5-073, 5-074, 5-078
(b)	5-078
(4)	5-003, 5-004, 5-074, 5-124, 5-153
(a)	5-153
(b)	5-004
s.4(1)	5-004, 5-006
(3)	5-029, 5-030
s.5(1)	5-004
s.6(1)	5-066
s.9	5-155
1981 Wildlife and Countryside Act (c.69)	9-048
s.13	9-048
Sch.8	9-048
1982 Civil Aviation Act (c.16)
s.60	2-201

s.61	2-201
1982 Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (c.30)
s.15	4-059
1982 Criminal Justice Act (c.48)	1-075
1983 Representation of the People Act (c.2)	1-051
1983 Mental Health Act (c.20)	4-257, 4-272
s.12	4-272
s.37	8-148
s.41	8-148
1984 Telecommunications Act (c.12)
s.43(1)	7-015
1984 Road Traffic Regulation Act (c.27)
s.87	4-217
1984 Data Protection Act (c.35)
s.5	2-201
1984 Child Abduction Act (c.37)
s.1	4-203
(1)	5-038
1985 Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act (c.38)	1-040
1986 Insolvency Act (c.45)	3-012, 3-045
Pt IX Ch.VI	3-012
s.352	3-012
s.356(2)	3-012
s.362(1)	3-012, 3-026
(a)	3-012, 3-026
1986 Public Order Act (c.64)	4-326
s.4	7-011, 7-015
s.4A	7-015
s.5	1-047, 7-015
s.6(5)	4-326
s.18(1)	5-121

1987 Banking Act (c.22)
s.3(1)	2-277
1987 Criminal Justice Act (c.38)
s.1	9-002
s.12	5-090, 5-095
1987 Consumer Protection Act (c.43)
s.39	3-023
1988 Merchant Shipping Act (c.12)
s.31	3-065
1988 Malicious Communications Act (c.27)
s.1	1-034
(1)	7-015
1988 Criminal Justice Act (c.33)
s.36	1-147
s.39	7-004, 7-031
s.40	7-031
(3)	7-004
s.93C(2)	5-103
s.123	1-075
s.134	7-085
s.139	3-023
s.160	1-003
1988 Copyright, Designs and Patents Act (c.48)
s.107	9-050
s.198	9-050
1988 Road Traffic Act (c.52)	2-193, 3-089, 5-155, 8-184
s.1	2-006, 5-155, 6-055, 8-174, 8-202
s.1A	3-134, 7-075, 7-076, 7-078
(1)	7-075
(3)	7-076
s.2	2-006, 2-232, 8-178, 8-184

s.2A	2-221, 6-055, 7-075, 7-076, 8-184
(1)	8-184
(2)	8-184
(3)	2-006, 8-184, 8-186
(4)	8-184
s.2B	2-086, 8-189, 8-202
s.3	2-217, 5-155, 8-190, 8-192
s.3ZA	2-221, 8-191
(1)	8-191, 8-194
(2)	8-191, 8-194
(3)	8-191, 8-194
s.3ZB	2-085, 2-086, 3-003, 8-198, 8-202
s.3ZC	2-085, 8-199, 8-202
s.3ZD	7-075
s.3A	8-194, 8-202
(1)(b)	8-196
s.4	5-155
(1)	9-051
s.5(1)(a)	4-189
s.5A	8-196
s.6(4)	2-029
s.7(6)	4-365
s.22A(1)(b)	8-053
s.170(4)	4-336
1988 Road Traffic Offenders Act (c.53)
s.24	8-172
Sch.2	7-078
1989 Official Secrets Act (c.6)
s.1(1)	4-163
1989 Children Act (c.41)	4-038
s.31(2)	4-363

Sch.12 para.23	4-363
1990 Food Safety Act (c.16)	3-022, 3-050
s.21	2-217
(1)	3-022
1990 Computer Misuse Act (c.18)
s.1	9-050
1990 Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act (c.37)
s.37(1)(a)	8-008
1990 Environmental Protection Act (c.43)
s.60	9-054
1991 Football (Offences) Act (c.19)	1-003
1991 Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act (c.25)	4-248, 4-257, 4-258, 4-259, 4-273, 4-292, 4-345
s.1	4-272
s.2	4-257
1991 Road Traffic Act (c.40)	2-193, 2-232, 8-174, 8-184
1991 Criminal Justice Act (c.53)	1-060, 1-082, 1-148, 9-225, 9-238
s.26	9-011
s.68	4-364
s.70(1)	4-364
s.72	4-361
Sch.8	4-364
1991 Water Resources Act (c.57)
s.85(1)	2-094, 3-064
1991 Dangerous Dogs Act (c.65)	1-003, 3-050
s.1(7)	4-333
s.3(1)	2-027, 3-021, 5-155
(4)	2-027
1993 Criminal Justice Act (c.36)	8-174
s.52	1-003, 2-217
s.67(1)	8-194
1994 Trade Marks Act (c.26)

s.92	9-050
1994 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act (c.33)	4-362
s.32	7-105
s.142	7-135, 7-136
1994 Drug Trafficking (c.37)
s.49(2)	5-103
1995 Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act (c.46)
s.41	4-361
s.51A	4-278
1996 Police Act (c.16)
s.89	7-031, 7-086
1996 Law Reform (Year and a Day Rule) Act (c.19)
s.1	8-006
s.2	8-006
(3)	8-006
1996 Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act (c.25)
Pt 1	4-135
s.6C	4-135
1996 Education Act (c.56)
s.444(1)	3-021, 4-203
s.548	4-130
1996 Theft (Amendment) Act (c.62)	9-131
1997 Firearms (Amendment) Act (c.5)	1-003
1997 Protection from Harassment Act (c.40)	7-015, 7-016, 7-052
s.1(1)	2-217, 7-015, 7-016
s.1A	7-015
s.2	3-054, 7-015
(1)	2-217
s.2A	7-016

(3)	7-016
s.4	7-016
(1)	7-015
s.4A	7-016
(1)	7-016
(2)	7-016
(3)	7-016
s.5	4-258
s.7(5)	3-054
1997 Crime (Sentences) Act (c.43)	1-082
1998 Data Protection Act (c.29)	2-201
1998 School Standards and Framework Act (c.31)
s.131	4-130
1998 Crime and Disorder Act (c.37)	7-002, 7-004, 7-063, 7-074, 7-086
ss.8-15	4-363
s.28	7-066, 7-070
(1)	7-066, 7-071
(a)	1-083, 7-067, 7-066, 7-068, 7-069, 7-072
(b)	7-066
(2)	7-071
(3)	7-067
(4)	7-071
s.29	7-002, 7-063, 7-063, 7-074
(1)(c)	7-071
(3)	7-004
s.30	7-063
s.31	7-063
s.32	7-063
s.34	4-361
s.37	4-364

s.61	4-362
s.62	4-362
s.66ZA	4-362
ss.80-81	1-147
1998 Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act (c.40)
s.5(1)	5-120
1998 Human Rights Act (c.42)	1-004, 1-046, 1-047, 1-048, 4-128, 4-130 8-155
s.3	7-108
(1)	1-046
s.4	3-024
s.19	1-046
1999 Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act (c.23)	4-259, 7-107
s.34	7-091
s.41	7-107
ss.41(3)(c)	7-108
ss.41-43	7-107
2000 Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act (c.6)	1-082
ss.1ZA	1-113
ss.16-32	1-113
s.90	4-364
s.91	4-364
s.111	9-211, 9-218
Sch.1	1-113
2000 Terrorism Act (c.11)
s.11(1)	2-017
(2)	2-017
s.58(1)(b)	5-155
Sch.7	1-047
2000 Postal Services Act (c.26)

s.84	9-120
2000 Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act (c.44)
s.1	1-046
2001 Criminal Justice and Police Act (c.16)
ss.1-11	9-011, 9-245
2001 Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act (c.24)
s.23	1-047
s.39	7-002, 7-063, 7-074
s.80(7)	2-206
2001 Children Act (Ireland) (c.24)
s.52	4-361
2002 Land Registration Act (c.9)
s.29	9-151
Sch.3	9-151
2002 Proceeds of Crime Act (c.29)	5-103, 9-007
Pt 7	5-060
s.327	5-060, 5-062, 5-063
s.340(3)	5-060, 5-062
2002 Enterprise Act (c.40)
s.188	5-097
2003 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act (asp 7)
s.51	4-130
2003 Communications Act (c.21)
s.127	1-034
2003 Fireworks Act (c.22)	3-050
2003 Local Government Act (c.26)
s.120	4-059
2003 Female Genital Mutilation Act (c.31)	1-040
s.1	4-067
2003 Extradition Act (c.41)	9-146
2003 Sexual Offences Act (c.42)	2-218, 2-235, 2-272, 2-273,

	2-282, 3-015, 4-049, 6-067, 4-207, 4-316, 4-326, 7-088, 7-105, 7-115, 7-133, 7-138, 7-139, 7-142, 7-146, 7-131, 7-165, 7-167
s.1	4-044, 4-328, 7-119, 7-132, 7-140, 7-154
(1)	2-006, 2-262
(2)	2-219, 7-142
(4)	7-132
ss.1-4	7-115, 7-119
s.2	7-119 , 7-148, 7-154, 7-166
(4)	7-149
s.3	4-316, 7-119, 7-149, 7-150, 7-151, 7-152, 7-156, 7-166
(2)	7-154
(4)	7-151
s.4	7-119, 7-155
(4)	7-156
(5)	7-156
s.5	3-027, 3-028, 3-029, 7-157, 7-159, 7-160, 7-161, 7-162
ss.5-7	4-049
ss.5-8	7-163
s.6	7-156, 7-157, 7-159
s.7	7-159, 7-166
s.8	5-080, 7-159
s.9	7-159, 7-161, 7-163
ss.9-12	2-262, 7-159
s.10	7-159
s.11	7-159
s.12	7-159
s.13	7-159, 7-160, 7-161
s.14	5-003, 7-159

s.15	5-155, 7-157, 7-159
s.15A	7-159
ss.16-19	7-157
ss.25-26	7-157
s.30	4-049, 7-115
ss.30-41	4-049, 7-115
s.62	5-005, 5-038
s.63	1-024, 9-218
s.64	1-024
s.67	4-258
s.74	4-046, 7-110, 7-111, 7-116, 7-123, 7-124, 7-126, 7-127, 7-168
s.75	7-110, 7-123, 7-129, 7-129, 7-131, 7-142
(2)(d)	7-115
(f)	7-129
s.76	4-048, 7-110, 7-123, 7-124, 7-126, 7-142
(2)(a)	7-122, 7-123, 7-124, 7-126 , 7-127
(b)	7-124
s.78	7-153, 7-154
(9)	7-151
s.79(2)	7-139
(9)	7-139
Sch.6 para.17	9-218
2003 Criminal Justice Act (c.44)	1-099, 1-100, 1-109, 1-113, 1-133, 1-147, 1-148, 4-127, 5-023, 8-019, 8-021, 8-187, 8-205, 9-211
s.100	7-107
s.142	1-082, 1-132, 1-134
(1)	1-129, 1-130

(c)	1-109
(d)	1-099
s.143(1)	1-134, 8-081
(2)	1-099
s.145	7-063
s.146	7-002, 7-063, 7-086
s.148(1)	1-109
(2)(a)	1-109
s.152(2)	1-134
s.153(2)	1-135
s.164	1-148
(3)	3-139
s.177(1)	1-109
s.224(2)	1-100
ss.224-236	1-099
s.225(1)(b)	1-100
(2)(b)	1-100
(3)	1-099
s.226(1)(b)	1-100
s.229	1-100
s.269	4-051, 4-197, 8-016, 8-205
s.270	8-019
s.285(3)	8-174
(4)	8-194
s.320	5-099
Sch.15	1-100
Sch.21	4-140, 4-197, 8-016, 8-017, 8-018, 8-019, 8-148, 8-149, 8-216, 8-226
para.4	6-003, 8-017, 8-216
(2)	8-019
para.5	6-003, 8-017

(2)	8-019
Para.5A	8-017
para.6	8-017
para.7	8-017
para.8	8-018
para.9	8-018
para.10	8-018, 8-019
(a)	8-019
(b)	8-019
(d)	8-019
para.11	8-018, 8-019
(e)	4-127
(f)	4-051
2004 Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act (c.28)	4-248, 4-257, 4-273, 8-164
s.5	2-068, 2-218, 8-006, 8-165, 8-167, 8-168, 8-169, 8-170, 8-171, 8-204
(1)	7-047, 7-086, 8-165
(d)	8-167, 8-168, 8-171
(7)	8-165
s.22	4-257
s.24	4-258
s.33	1-113
2004 Human Tissue Act (c.30)
s.32	9-051
(9)(c)	9-051
2004 Children Act (c.31)
s.58	4-128, 4-130
2004 Civil Partnership Act (c.33)	5-101
Sch.27	5-101
2004 Hunting Act (c.37)	1-003, 1-047
2005 Mental Capacity Act (c.9)	1-047, 4-054, 4-054, 4-216,

	4-253
s.1(4)	4-048
s.2	4-048
s.3	4-049
(1)	4-255
s.4	4-054
(6)	4-054
s.5	4-048
2005 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act (c.15)
s.1	9-002
s.110	8-012
2005 Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act (c.16)
s.4	1-003
2006 Racial and Religious Hatred Act (c.1)
	1-047
2006 Terrorism Act (c.11)
s.5	1-052, 5-001
2006 Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Act (c.13)
s.15	3-050
s.18	3-050
s.21	3-050
2006 Criminal Justice Act (c.26)
s.129	4-361
2006 Health Act 2006 (c.28)	1-083
2006 Fraud Act (c.35)	1-003, 5-093, 5-096, 9-007, 9-032, 9-034, 9-037, 9-078, 9-079, 9-124, 9-131, 9-135, 9-136, 9-144, 9-148, 9-157, 9-180, 9-197, 9-233, 9-250, 9-048, 9-062, 9-137, 9-138, 9-148, 9-242
s.1	9-138
(1)	9-138

(2)	9-138
(3)	9-137
s.2	9-140, 9-151, 9-162, 9-166, 9-168, 9-192, 9-205
(1)	9-140
(2)	9-140, 9-151
(3)	9-140, 9-149
(4)	9-140, 9-144
(5)	9-140, 9-150
s.3	9-165, 9-165, 9-168
s.4	9-062, 9-170, 9-176, 9-177, 9-178
(1)	9-170
(2)	9-170
s.5	9-141, 9-161, 9-162
(1)	9-161
(2)	9-161
(3)	9-161
(4)	9-161
s.6	9-180
s.7	9-180
s.11	9-182, 9-183, 9-190, 9-193
(1)	9-182
(2)	9-182
(3)	9-182
2006 Animal Welfare Act (c.45)
s.4	2-221
2006 Road Safety Act (c.49)	2-085, 2-086, 8-172, 8-187, 8-188, 8-189, 8-190, 8-191, 8-197
2007 Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act (c.19)	3-057, 3-088, 3-096, 3-097, 3-110, 3-133, 3-134, 3-138, 3-139, 3-146, 8-203

s.1	3-097, 3-105
(1)	3-097
(a)	3-097, 3-121
(b)	3-097
(2)	3-100
(3)	3-105, 275
(4)(b)	3-112
(c)	3-105
s.2	3-102
(1)	3-102
(5)	3-102, 8-075
(6)	3-103
s.3(1)	3-103
ss.3-7	3-101, 3-103, 3-104
s.4	3-103
s.5(1)	3-103
(2)	3-103
(3)	3-103
s.8	3-114, 3-116
(1)	3-114
(2)	3-114, 3-115
(3)	3-114, 3-117
(b)	3-115
(4)	3-114
s.9	3-143
(1)	3-143
(5)	3-143
s.10	3-143
(1)	3-143
s.11	3-101
s.17	3-123
s.18	3-127, 3-128

(1)	3-127
s.19	3-122
s.20	3-125, 3-134
s.21(1)	2-086
s.22	3-101
Sch.1	3-101
2007 Serious Crime Act (c.27)	5-088, 5-101, 6-015, 6-027, 6-041, 6-042, 6-085, 8-154
Pt 2	5-115, 5-121, 5-127, 5-128, 5-144, 5-149, 5-152, 6-042
s.5(8)	5-101
s.44	5-101, 5-128, 5-129, 5-131, 5-133, 5-134, 5-135, 5-136, 5-142, 5-146, 5-151, 5-153, 6-003, 6-042
(1)	5-129
(2)	5-129, 5-131
ss.44-46	5-117, 5-150, 6-003
s.45	5-063, 5-130, 5-134, 5-135, 5-136, 5-139, 5-140, 5-141, 5-142, 5-146, 5-151, 6-003
(b)(i)	5-142
s.46	5-127, 5-130, 5-138, 5-140, 5-141, 5-142, 5-143, 5-151, 5-152, 6-003
(1)	5-138
s.47	5-128, 5-132
(1)	5-132
(2)	5-144
(5)	5-136, 5-140
(a)	5-133, 5-133
(b)	5-133
(6)	5-149
(7)(a)	5-133
(8)	5-128

s.48(3)	5-139
s.49(1)	5-144
(2)	5-133, 5-135
(4)	5-135, 5-153
(7)	5-149
s.50	5-115, 5-145
s.51	5-101, 5-147, 5-148, 6-067, 6-069, 6-071
s.52(1)	5-150
(2)	5-150
s.53	5-150
s.55	5-129, 5-134
(5)	5-138
s.58	5-151
(2)	5-151
(3)	5-151
(4)	5-142
(5)	5-142, 5-151
(7)	5-142, 5-151
s.59	5-127
s.65(1)	5-128
(2)	5-128
(b)	5-128
(3)	5-128
s.66	5-128
s.67	5-130
Sch.3	5-135, 5-139,, 5-153
Sch.4	5-150
para.1	5-150
para.2	5-150
para.3	5-150
Sch.14	5-153

2007 Legal Services Act (c.29)
s.181	1-003
2007 UK Borders Act (c.30)
s.22	7-031
2008 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act	2-273, 4-078, 4-093
(c.4)
s.17	1-100
s.63	1-024
(6)	1-024
(7)	1-024
s.75(5A)	4-107
s.76	4-078, 4-085, 4-096, 4-097, 4-099, 4-104, 4-105, 4-108, 4-115, 4-117, 4-120, 4-127
(1)	4-097
(b)	4-104
(2)	4-097
(3)	2-266, 4-093, 4-097, 4-104, 4-106, 4-113
(4)	4-093, 4-097
(5)	2-266, 4-093, 4-097, 4-335
(5A)	4-090, 4-097, 4-105, 4-106, 4-107, 8-110
(6)	4-097, 4-104, 4-105, 4-106
(6A)	4-097, 4-106, 4-113
(7)	4-097, 4-104
(8)	4-097
(8A)	4-097
(8B)	4-098
(8C)	4-098
(8D)	4-098
(8E)	4-098
(8F)	4-098
(9)	4-078, 4-098

(10)	4-098
(b)	4-086
2008 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act (c.13)	3-050, 3-053, 3-081, 3-146, 3-148
s.39	3-051
s.42	3-051
s.46	3-051, 3-081
s.50	3-051, 3-081
s.52(2)	3-051
s.54	3-051
s.62	3-050
Sch.5	3-051
Sch.6	3-050
Sch.7	3-050
2009 Coroners and Justice Act (c.25)	8-095, 8-102, 8-110, 8-129, 8-138, 8-139, 8-142, 8-154, 8-157
s.52	4-347, 8-137, 8-141
s.54	4-127, 4-172, 8-102
(1)	8-102, 748
(a)	8-104
(c)	8-119, 8-122, 8-124, 8-131, 8-132
(2)	8-102, 8-105
(3)	8-102, 8-116, 8-119, 8-131, 8-132
(4)	8-102, 8-104, 8-116
(5)	8-102, 8-103, 8-116
(6)	8-102, 8-103, 8-116
(7)	8-102
s.55	8-103, 8-108
(1)	8-108

(2)	8-108
(3)	4-127, 8-108, 8-119
(4)	8-108, 8-118, 8-119
(a)	8-108
(b)	732
(5)	8-108
(6)	8-108, 737
(c)	8-119
(7)	8-108
s.56	8-103, 728
s.57	8-156
s.59	8-153
s.62	1-003, 1-024
s.118	1-147
s.120(2)	1-147
s.124	1-153
s.125(1)	1-147
s.127	1-153
s.130	1-153
Sch.15	1-147
2010 Bribery Act (c.23)	3-087
s.2	9-062
s.7	3-087
2010 Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act (asp 13)
s.52	4-361
s.168	4-278
2011 Parliamentary Voting System and Constituencies Act (c. 1)
Sch.4	1-051
2011 Charities Act (c.25)
s.115	9-064

2012 Protection of Freedoms Act (c.9)
s.111(1)	7-016
2012 Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act (c.10)	1-099, 4-362, 8-019, 8-183, 9-245
Pt 1	3-004
Pt 3	1-099
s.123(a)	1-099
s.135	4-362
s.143	3-134
(2)	7-075
s.144	9-048
s.148	4-098
Sch.1
Para.1(1)(b)	3-004
2013 Crime and Courts Act (c.22)	3-148, 4-121
Pt 1	9-002
s.15	9-002
s.43	4-078, 4-098
s.56	8-196
Sch.8	9-002
Sch.17	3-148
Pt 2	3-148
para.5	3-148
2013 Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act (c.30)
s.11	5-101
Sch.3 Pt 1	5-101
2014 Anti-Social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act (c.12)
s.176(3)	9-011, 9-242
2015 Criminal Justice and Courts Act (c.2)	8-200
s.20	2-218
s.21	3-135, 3-136

s.23	3-136
s.27(2)	8-216
s.29	2-085
(1)	7-075
2015 Serious Crime Act (c.9)
s.67	7-157
s.76	7-002, 7-085
2015 Modern Slavery Act (c.30)	4-205
s.1	4-208
s.3	4-208
s.45	4-206, 4-207, 4-208, 4-210, 4-211
(1)	4-207
(2)	4-207, 4-208
(3)	4-207, 4-208
(a)	4-208
(4)	4-207
(5)	4-208, 4-210
Sch.4	4-207
paras 1-4	4-207
para.7	4-207
para.14	4-207
para.15	4-207
para.33	4-207
2016 Psychoactive Substances Act (c.2)	1-034

TABLE OF STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

1920 Aliens Order (SR&O 1920/448) art.1(3)(g)	2-016
art.18(1)(b)	2-016
1939 Defence (General) Regulations (SR&O 1939/927)
reg.2A	2-158
1955 Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations (SI 1955/990)
reg.68	6-024
reg.104	6-024
1980 Air Navigation Order (SI 1980/1965)	2-201
art.45
1985 Sea Fishing (Enforcement of Community Control Measures) Regulations (SI 1985/487)
reg.3(2)	2-201
1992 Excise Goods (Holding, Movement, Warehousing and REDS) Regulations (SI 1992/3135)	1-052
1996 Products of Animal Origin (Import and Export) Regulations (SI 1996/3124)
reg.21	3-020
reg.37	3-020
2000 Pollution Prevention and Control (England and Wales) Regulations (SI 2000/1973)
reg.32	3-076
(1)	3-076
2001 Tobacco Products Regulations (SI	1-052

2001/1712)
2004 Uranium Enrichment Technology (Prohibition of Disclosure) Regulations (SI 2004/1818) reg.2(2)	2-206
2008 Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 (Amendment) Order (SI 2008/3130) art.2(2)(a)	1-032
2016 Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions (SI 2016/362) reg.5(3)-(6) Sch.14	4-217 4-217

Chapter 1

Crime and Punishment

I. Introduction

1-001

An attempt to comprehend the rules of criminal law must involve some understanding of the function of those rules. It would, of course, be possible simply to list the rules relating to various offences, e.g. murder, rape, and attempt, but such a stark outline would not be particularly illuminating. The student of criminal law must be in a position to evaluate such rules and answer important questions that have profound impacts on individual freedom. Key amongst these questions are, why does the State criminalise certain conduct and how does society ensure that individuals abide by the rules it prescribes? It is only through this critical investigation that the student can answer many of the other questions that will arise during the study of criminal law, such as: why do we regard murder as more serious than manslaughter, when in both cases the victim has been killed? In rape does, or should, it make any difference whether the “rapist” had an honest belief that his victim was consenting? Why do we hold someone liable for attempted murder if no harm has been caused to the victim, because, say, the gun was defective and could never have injured anyone? Should such a person be held liable? These and numerous other fundamental questions that will be posed in the course of this book cannot be answered, and the present rules and reform proposals cannot be evaluated, without understanding the objective of these rules.

The function of the criminal law is to lay down a set of standards of what is permissible or not. It is a method of social control, a framework specifying the parameters of acceptable behaviour. The same is, of course, true of all law and indeed of ethical systems such as morality and religion. For example, the law of contract details how and when a contract comes into existence and stipulates the sanction for failing to comply with these rules (the contract may be void) or for failing to perform one's obligations under the contract (one may be liable for damages). These rules are designed to ensure compliance therewith and the sanctions are those deemed most appropriate to ensure such compliance.

Similarly, the criminal law is a series of rules, with its own set of sanctions, aimed at controlling behaviour. What distinguishes the criminal law from other mechanisms of social control, and from other branches of law, is the sanction that is employed to back up the rules, namely, stigmatic punishment. If you steal property, the law of property (concerned with regulating property rights) might say that the "transaction" is void and you do not become the owner of the property. The criminal law, on the other hand, provides its own special sanction: if you steal property you are liable to be sent to prison for a maximum of seven years. The convicted thief is subjected to the shame and censure of public punishment.

Of course, one must not assume from this that the criminal law (or any other mechanism of social control) will operate perfectly. At all stages of the process, from criminalisation to punishment, there is scope for the mechanism to falter. It may well be that there are groups in society powerful enough to prevent the criminalisation of behaviour that otherwise appears to be a prime candidate for such treatment. An enormous number of crimes are never reported to the police; many persons who offend go undetected, are not prosecuted or not punished. The entire criminal justice system is riddled with discretion which tends to give the system the appearance of incoherence, but it is our view that, as a backdrop against which all these decisions must be made, there is a system of criminal law that is capable of internal consistency and it is that system that will be explored in this book.

In order to make sense of the criminal law and of the substantive rules that make up the whole, it is important to establish a framework. First, what conduct should be prohibited by the criminal law? If one accepts that one of the objects of the criminal law is to prevent people unjustifiably being deprived of their property, why should it be theft (a criminal offence) if you take property away from someone, but only breach of contract (generally, not a criminal offence) if you take their property pursuant to a contract without performing your obligations under that contract? If one understands why theft is criminalised, but breach of contract is not, one can begin to understand how theft should be defined so as to distinguish it from breach of contract. The substantive rules can start making sense (or be seen to be in need of reform to the extent they do not make sense).

Secondly, why do we punish those who break the rules of the criminal law? In the above theft example, why is the property law sanction not sufficient? Who do we punish and how much punishment should be imposed? Do we punish people simply because they deserve punishment or because we wish to make an example of them in order to deter others and so on? Again, the answer to these questions will often provide the key to an understanding of the rules themselves. For example, should duress be a defence in the criminal law, and if so, to what crimes? If punishing largely for desert reasons, such a defence should be available as a person subjected to duress is blameless and does not deserve punishment. On the other hand, if deterrence is seen as the main rationale of punishment, perhaps there ought to be no defence of duress, or it should not be available for the most serious crimes. A person subjected to duress might need the threat of punishment as a deterrent against giving in to the threat. In short, the structure of the substantive rules of the criminal law will depend on the view taken as to the purposes of punishment; the issue is of more fundamental importance than whether an individual judge happens to stress deterrence or retribution when sentencing. Understanding the rationale of punishment will enable us to understand, evaluate, criticise and suggest reforms of those substantive rules.

It is these two crucial questions that are the subject of this first chapter.

II. What Conduct Ought to be Criminal?

A. INTRODUCTION

1-003

What conduct should be criminalised? We seem content to leave some “wrongful” conduct to morality or religion: for example, telling lies as to why an essay has not been completed on time. Other such conduct is left to the law of tort, for example, telling lies about other people so as to damage their reputation, or to the law of contract, for example, deliberately not performing one’s obligations under a contract. On the other hand, if we tell a lie as a result of which another person gives us property, we commit the crime of fraud, contrary to the Fraud Act 2006. Is there any principle explaining why the last form of conduct is criminalised but not the others? Why, in a competitive capitalist society, is insider dealing (using privileged information to buy and sell shares on the stock exchange) a criminal offence?¹ On what basis was the decision made to make possession of indecent photographs of children a criminal offence as well as the taking of them?² Similar questions can be addressed to many areas of human conduct, but, in an attempt to sharpen the focus of this section, we shall lay particular emphasis on the laws relating to sado-masochism between consenting adults.

It must be conceded at the outset that many, if not most, decisions to criminalise conduct are simply a response either to pressure groups or to perceived public opinion. This is well illustrated by the campaign to criminalise the possession of most handguns—even those held in sports clubs—in the wake of the Dunblane massacre where one man, armed with a handgun, shot and killed 16 children. A combination of factors—an organised campaign by a pressure group comprising parents of the children, a well-orchestrated press crusade, and a Government and an opposition party preparing for a general election with both determined to demonstrate a toughness against crime—conspired to ensure the speedy passage of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 through Parliament. The creation of numerous other offences over the past two decades can be accounted for in the same way. For example, the alleged rise in football hooliganism led to the Football (Offences) Act 1991 which creates the offences of throwing missiles, indecent or racist chanting and going on to the playing area at designated football matches. As a result of several highly publicised cases of fighting dogs severely injuring people, the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 creates various offences relating to breeding, selling or allowing such dogs to be in public places without a muzzle and lead. In short, there has been an alarming tendency on the part of the Government, in particular, to adopt the view that if there is a problem, an instant panacea is to be found by criminalising the conduct in question. In 2008, it was reported that the Labour Government had, since its election in 1997, created 3,605 new criminal offences, one for almost every day it had been in power.³ Some of these had been well publicised, such as the offence of hunting wild mammals with dogs under the Hunting Act 2004. Others, however, are offences which pass into existence almost unnoticed, such as the offence of repairing vehicles on a road⁴ or wilfully pretending to be a barrister (undergraduate mooters beware!).⁵ In 2010, the Coalition Government expressed a commitment to prevent the proliferation of unnecessary new criminal offences and established a “Criminal Offences Gateway”, which requires that proposals to create new offences receive clearance from the Secretary of State for Justice, who will approve such proposals only where he is satisfied that the proposed offences are necessary.⁶ In addition, the Ministry of Justice pledged to publish figures relating to the numbers of offences created. The most recent figures show that for the 12 months ending May 2014, 280 new criminal offences were created.⁷ However, this may well be an underestimation. For instance, Chalmers and Leverick have suggested that, in the year 2010–2011, 1,760 criminal offences were created, compared with just 174 as recorded by the Ministry for that year⁸—indicating that the Government has a long way to go before it meets its commitment.⁹

This “frenzied approach to law-making” has led some commentators to assert that it is not possible to find any unifying thread explaining the content of the criminal law.¹⁰ However, occasionally a more principled debate emerges. For instance, in the 1950s, the Wolfenden Committee¹¹ which investigated offences of homosexuality and prostitution sought to provide a theoretical framework against which the decision to criminalise conduct should be made. More recently, the Law Commission undertook a similar task in examining the extent to which consent should be a defence to various activities such as sado-masochism and various types of fighting. The aim of this section is to explore whether there are any principles that ought to inform a debate on whether conduct should be criminalised or decriminalised.

B. CRITERIA FOR CRIMINALISATION

1-004

It is common to assert that there are two conditions that need to be satisfied before criminalisation of conduct is justified:

- (i) The conduct must be wrongful.
- (ii) It must be necessary to employ the criminal law to condemn or prevent such conduct.¹²

Since 2000, there has been a third condition:

- (iii) It must be permissible to criminalise the activity. Criminalisation of the conduct must not contravene the European Convention on Human Rights brought into force in the UK by the Human Rights Act 1998.

1. Wrongful conduct

1-005

Conduct should not be prohibited unless it can be regarded as wrongful. There is, however, no agreement as to the criteria for establishing wrongfulness. Three main theoretical approaches have developed over several hundred years that attempt to answer this question. First, there is the view that conduct is wrongful if it is immoral (legal moralism). Secondly, many assert that conduct is only wrongful if it causes harm or serious offence to others (the harm principle or liberalism). Thirdly, there are those who assert that conduct is wrongful if it causes harm to others or to the actor (paternalism). Each of these competing views will be discussed in turn.

(i) Legal moralism

1–006

Few would deny that the criminal law has a moral content¹³; many actions prohibited by the criminal law, such as theft and violence to the person, are undoubted moral wrongs. Even in the absence of a prohibitory law, a large majority would still feel that the actions were deeply wrong. Immoral conduct is something that offends against the community spirit. In a secular age, it need have no special religious connotations at all; immorality is not necessarily the same thing as sin, which has a religious connotation.¹⁴ It is, however, no simple matter to define what it means for something to be “morally wrong”. Honoré asserts that morality is:

“... concerned with conduct that has a significant impact on other people, and perhaps also animals, individually or collectively, and with the restraints on behaviour that we should accept because of this. Moral criticism assesses behaviour in the light of its impact on others. It excludes purely self-regarding behaviour. Moreover, since we live in groups and communities, and belong to states and other political entities, the central core of morality is concerned with how to co-exist and co-operate with others. The core of morality is, in a broad sense, political.”¹⁵

1–007

Moreover, one needs to be alert to the difficulties inherent in ascertaining moral opinion. Not only does moral opinion change over time but:

“[t]o assume a common culture or a normative consensus in American society (for example) as in most modern societies, is to ignore the deep and divisive role of class, ethnic, religious, status, and regional culture conflicts which often produce widely opposing definitions of goodness, truth, and moral virtue.”¹⁶

Leaving aside the problem of defining morality, one must still question the nature of the relationship between immorality and the criminal law. Is it just historical coincidence that both should operate so often in the same fields of activity or is it possible to state some more definite relationship?

1-008

HYMAN GROSS, A THEORY OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE (1979), PP.13-15:

“It seems obvious that those crimes of violence, theft and destruction that stand as paradigms of crime and comprise the core of any penal code are also moral wrongs. Everyone has a right to be free of such harm inflicted by others, and when murder, rape, arson, assault or larceny is committed there is also a moral wrong since a moral duty to refrain from doing harm to others has been breached. The right to be free of such harm does not have its origin in law but in a general consensus on the rights enjoyed by any member of society, or even by any person, no matter how he lives. This consensus is a more fundamental element of society even than the law, and for that reason the violation of such a right is a moral wrong and not simply a legal wrong.

But beyond the most obvious crimes, legions of others are on the books for the reason that doing what is prohibited (or failing to do what is required) makes life hazardous or unpleasant. Members of the public are entitled to live and to work in safety and to enjoy life in public places without fear, disquiet or embarrassment ... these rights are also moral rights and not simply legal rights, since entitlement to the security and freedom that they represent is a matter of fundamental social consensus and not a matter simply of legal enactment.

Other crimes that are not common crimes are morally wrong for a different reason. Income tax fraud or draft evasion seem to place an unfair burden on others or deprive others of what is due to them.”¹⁷

HERBERT L. PACKER, THE LIMITS OF
THE CRIMINAL SANCTION (1969),
PP.262-264:

“Leaving aside for the moment what we mean by immoral, we may discern an analogy between the requirement of culpability in the individual case and a limiting criterion for the legislative invocation of the criminal sanction: only conduct generally considered ‘immoral’ should be treated as criminal. Several reasons support this prudential limitation. To begin with, the principles of selection we use in determining what kinds of undesirable conduct to treat as criminal should surely include at least one that is responsible to the basic character of the criminal sanction, i.e. its quality of moral condemnation. To put it another way, we should use the strengths of the sanction rather than ignore or undermine them. If the conduct with which the original sanction deals is already regarded as being morally wrong, the processes of the criminal law have, so to speak, a ‘leg up’ on the job. This is a matter partly of public attitude and partly of the morale maintained by those who operate the criminal process. The way to keep those processes running at peak efficiency is to ensure that those who operate them are convinced that what they are doing is right. The surest way to persuade them that what they are doing is right is to have them act only against what they think is wrong. If the criminal sanction is widely used to deal with morally neutral behaviour, law enforcement officials are likely to be at least subconsciously defensive about their work, and the public will find the criminal law a confusing guide to moral, or even acceptable, behaviour. [Packer then dismisses the argument that the criminal law can be used to shape people’s views on immorality, and continues]: ... The question remains: whose morality are we talking about? It is easy to slide into the assumption that somewhere in society there is an authoritative body of moral sentiment to which the law should look. That assumption becomes particularly dangerous ... when it is used to buttress the assertion that the immorality of a given form of conduct is a sufficient condition for declaring the conduct to be criminal. But when one is talking about immorality as a necessary condition for invocation of the criminal sanction, the inquiry should simply be whether there exists any significant body of dissent from the proposition that the conduct in question is immoral. Is there a social group that will be alienated or offended by making (or keeping) the conduct in question criminal? If there is, then prudence dictates caution in employing the criminal sanction. We can sum up this prudential limitation as follows: the criminal sanction should ordinarily be limited to conduct that is viewed, without significant social dissent, as immoral. The calendar of crimes should not be enlarged beyond that point and, as views about morality shift, should be contracted.”

1–010

We are left with what appears to be a tautological quandary. That is to say, the determination is circular: immoral conduct is conduct that is considered by the vast majority of people to be immoral.

Let us consider the example of sado-masochistic encounters between consenting adults to understand how legal moralism is applied in practice. In Brown,¹⁸ the House of Lords was called upon to decide whether consent to sado-masochistic acts could be a defence to charges of assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.47. By a majority of three to two it was decided that consent was no defence to such charges. Lord Lowry (in the majority) argued that:

“[w]hat the appellants are obliged to propose is that the deliberate and painful infliction of physical injury should be exempted from the operation of statutory provisions the object of which is to prevent or punish that very thing, the reason for the proposed exemption being that both those who will inflict and those who will suffer the injury wish to satisfy a perverted and depraved sexual desire. Sado-masochistic homosexual activity cannot be regarded as conducive to the enhancement or enjoyment of family life or conducive to the welfare of society.”¹⁹

Lord Templeman (also in the majority) is more direct with his moral indignation:

“Society is entitled and bound to protect itself against a cult of violence. Pleasure derived from the infliction of pain is an evil thing. Cruelty is uncivilised.”²⁰

1–011

Finally, Lord Mustill (in the minority) was of the view:

“that whatever the outsider might feel about the subject matter of the prosecutions—perhaps horror, amazement or incomprehension, perhaps sadness—very few could read even a summary of the other activities without disgust.”²¹

Even if one accepts that the House of Lords is in tune with current morality, does this mean that one is bound to criminalise sado-masochistic conduct? Or must there be additional harms associated with the conduct before it can be lawfully prohibited? In relation to the latter, some commentators have argued in the negative, asserting that it is possible to pinpoint more precisely the relationship between the criminal law and morality. Indeed, they believe that not only is immorality a necessary condition for invocation of the criminal sanction, but that it is a sufficient one. It is not necessary to search for further justification (harm, enforceability etc) before the criminal law can be brought into action; the fact that the conduct is morally wrong is enough.²² This view is epitomised by such statements by James Fitzjames Stephen as “[h]ow can the State or the public be competent to determine any question whatever if it is not competent to decide that gross vice is a bad thing? I do not think the State ought to stand bandying compliments with pimps”.²³

Graphic though this picture is, the view that immorality is a sufficient condition is now likely to be couched in more qualified terms.

PATRICK DEVLIN, MORALS AND THE CRIMINAL LAW (REPRINTED IN THE ENFORCEMENT OF MORALS) (1965),
PP.7–8, 14–17:

1–012

“I think it is clear that the criminal law as we know it is based upon moral principle. In a number of crimes its function is simply to enforce a moral principle and nothing else. The law, both criminal and civil, claims to be able to speak about morality and immorality generally. Where does it get its authority to do this and how does it settle the moral principles which it enforces? Undoubtedly, as a matter of history, it derived from Christian teaching. But I think that the strict logician is right when he says that the law can no longer rely on doctrines in which citizens are entitled to disbelieve. It is necessary therefore to look for some other source ... I have framed three interrogatories addressed to myself to answer.

- (1) Has society the right to pass judgment at all on the matters of morals? Ought there, in other words, to be a public morality, or are morals always a matter for private judgment?
- (2) If society has the right to pass judgment, has it also the right to use the weapon of the law to enforce it?
- (3) If so, ought it to use that weapon in all cases or only in some: and if only in some on what principles should it distinguish? ...

[Lord Devlin then explained that a public morality is one of the vital ingredients of a society, and that the State has the right to safeguard anything that is essential to its existence. In other words, he answered the first two questions affirmatively.]

In what circumstances the State should exercise its power is the third of the interrogatories I have framed. But before I get to it I must raise a point which might have been brought up in any one of the three. How are the moral judgments of society to be ascertained ... It is surely not enough that they should be reached by the opinion of the majority; it would be too much to require the individual assent of every citizen. English law has evolved and regularly uses a standard which does not depend on the counting of heads. It is that of the reasonable man. He is not to be confused with the rational man. He is not expected to reason about anything and his judgment may be largely a matter of feeling ... for my purpose I should like to call him the man in the jury box ...

Immorality then, for the purpose of the law, is what every right-minded person is presumed to consider immoral. Any immorality is capable of affecting society injuriously and in effect to a greater or lesser extent it usually does: this is what gives the law locus standi. It cannot be shut out. But—and this brings me to the third question—the individual has a locus standi too; he cannot be expected to surrender to the judgment of society the whole conduct of his life. It is the old familiar question of striking a balance between the rights and interests of society and those of the individual ... there must be toleration of the maximum individual freedom that is consistent with the integrity of society. Nothing should be punished by the law that does not lie beyond the limit of tolerance. It is not nearly enough to say that a majority dislike a practice: there must be a real feeling of reprobation ... I do not think one can ignore disgust if it is deeply felt and not manufactured. Its presence is a good indication that the bounds of toleration are being reached ...

[B]efore a society can put a practice beyond the limits of tolerance there must be a deliberate judgment that the practice is injurious to society ... We should ask ourselves in the first instance whether, looking at it calmly and dispassionately, we regard it as a vice so abominable that its mere presence is an offence. If that is the genuine feeling of the society in which we live, I do not see how society can be denied the right to eradicate it.”

1-013

Criminal sanctions, according to Devlin, should be determined by the deep disgust (dispassionately felt) of the right-minded person, or, more accurately, they should depend upon the law-maker's interpretation of the likelihood of the right-minded person being deeply disgusted.

Devlin's criteria are easily applied to many crimes, such as murder and rape. Other crimes such as theft would also undoubtedly be regarded as immoral and generally attract “the real feeling of reprobation”, even if not “disgust”.

This thesis becomes more difficult when applied to Devlin's own example of homosexuality. (He was responding to the Wolfenden Report, which had recommended decriminalising homosexual acts between consenting adult males in private.) According to Devlin, although “some people sincerely believe that homosexuality is neither immoral nor unnatural”,²⁴ there is nevertheless a collective judgment against it, and a deep feeling of disgust towards it.²⁵ But Hughes questions this use of “depth of disgust” as an appropriate yardstick and suggests that:

“It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that proper inquiry might reveal that, while the ordinary man contemplates homosexual behaviour with aversion and distaste, the knowledge of this practice by others does not disgust him so deeply as Lord Devlin suspects.”²⁶

Hughes’ comment exposes an immediate problem with Devlin’s exposition of legal moralism, which is that what one person may find disgusting may not be felt to the same degree, or at all, by the next person. Returning to our previous example of sado-masochism, was it just a coincidence that the activities in Brown took place during homosexual encounters? It has been pointed out that prostitutes regularly receive beatings as part of their sexual encounters, even if the types of sado-masochistic activities described in Brown are often different. The implication for some commentators is that, despite all the window-dressing that talk of “harm” provides, this was really a case about the immorality of certain types of perceivably disgusting homosexual encounters.²⁷

Whether one accepts such an argument or not, the result of the wide ruling in Brown is that most such violent encounters must be regarded as illegal if actual bodily harm results. It is irrelevant whether sexual pleasure is involved as consent is no defence. Some have applauded this conclusion.

WILLIAM WILSON, “IS HURTING PEOPLE WRONG?” [1992] J. OF SOCIAL WELFARE AND FAM. LAW
388, 393, 395:

1-014

“[Brown] should be treated, not as a test case for sexual freedom but for the idea that even a tolerant, pluralistic society must enforce one fundamental residual moral value. Quite simply, it may be argued, hurting people is wrong, and this is so whether the victim consents or not, and whether the purpose is to fulfil a sexual need, to induce a state of euphoric narcosis, punish an errant child ...

How is the balance between freedom and coercion to be drawn? Is the public interest to be secured, in other words, by allowing citizens absolute licence to pursue their own conceptions of the good life, which we take to be the basic moral premise upon which coercion is to be ordered? Or is it to be restricted in order to achieve some more valuable public good, namely societal cohesion and public order? ... [A] fundamental building block in our moral society is the social taboo against the infliction of injury on another. Remove this building block and not only do sensibilities stand to be damaged but, over time, perhaps our very commitment to the sanctity of life. To reduce this fundamental moral issue to an issue about the presence or absence of consent may be to miss what is really at stake, namely our humanity, as presently conceived. If sadism is allowable, if consented to, then it is consent rather than moral conviction which polices the barrier between a society of would-be sadists and the kind of society most of us would like to inhabit.”²⁸

1-015

A line has to be drawn between that which society will allow, or turn a blind eye to, or condemn informally and that which it will condemn by means of the criminal law. One yardstick offered by Devlin is the depth of disgust. Another, offered by Wilson, is that of autonomy being “trumped” where the activity is against the “public interest”. In the case of Brown, Lord Mustill dissented on the issue of where this line should be drawn.

R. V BROWN [1994] 1 A.C. 212
(HOUSE OF LORDS)

1-016

LORD MUSTILL:

“When proposing that the conduct is not rightly so charged I do not invite your Lordships’ House to endorse it as morally acceptable. Nor do I pronounce in favour of a libertarian doctrine specifically related to sexual matters ... What I do say is that these are questions of private morality; that the standards by which they fall to be judged are not those of the criminal law; and that if these standards are to be upheld the individual must enforce them upon himself according to his own moral standards, or have them enforced against him by moral pressures exerted by whatever religious or other community to whose ethical ideals he responds. The point from which I invite your Lordships to depart is simply this, that the state should interfere with the rights of an individual to live his or her life as he or she may choose no more than is necessary to ensure a proper balance between the special interests of the individual and the general interests of the individuals who together comprise the population at large. Thus, whilst acknowledging that very many people, if asked whether the appellants' conduct was wrong, would reply, 'Yes, repulsively wrong', I would at the same time assert that this does not in itself mean that the prosecution of the appellants ... is well-founded."

1-017

However, according to the law as it now stands, boxing, for example, stands one side of the line, while sado-masochism falls on the other.²⁹

What can be concluded at this stage is that Lord Devlin's yardstick is not a sound basis upon which to take decisions to criminalise, especially if cloaked behind a mask of public interest. Not only may it be a thin disguise for the criminalisation of immorality simpliciter³⁰ (as advocated by Stephen more than a century ago) but the criteria employed are too limited. One cannot, as Lord Devlin has done, throw rationality completely to the winds in order to replace it with the reasonable man's disgust—which, as Hart points out, may be based on "ignorance, superstition or misunderstanding".³¹ Instead:

"the examination of existing law and the debate about proposed laws should be conducted by making as explicit a statement as is possible of the values that the law is designed to protect, by a careful investigation of the harm done to those values by the conduct prohibited or which it is sought to prohibit, and by a careful consideration of the probable efficacy of legal prohibition. In this debate the prevalence of feelings of disgust or revulsion in the community is one factor to be considered and no more than that."³²

In other words, whilst moral wrongdoing (with all its attendant difficulties of identification) may be a necessary condition for the imposition of the criminal law, it ought not to be a sufficient

one. This has led Duff to call for a move towards a “modest legal moralism”.³³

R. A. DUFF, “PERVERSIONS AND SUBVERSIONS OF CRIMINAL LAW” IN
R. A. DUFF, THE BOUNDARIES OF THE CRIMINAL LAW (2010), PP.89–90,
107–108:

1–018

“To say that the criminal law is concerned with wrongs (with moral wrongs) is to espouse some form of Legal Moralism ... For the negative Legal Moralist, wrongdoing is a necessary condition of criminal liability and punishment. We should not criminalize conduct that is not in some relevant way morally wrongful, nor impose criminal liability on those who are not morally culpable, but the wrongfulness of the conduct and the culpability of its agent do not give us positive reason to criminalize it: the practice’s ‘general justifying aim’ does not include ensuring the conviction and punishment of the morally guilty. For the positive Legal Moralist, by contrast, the moral wrongfulness of the conduct and its agent’s culpability give us positive reason to criminalize it: a central purpose of criminal law as a distinctive mode of legal regulation is to define, and provide for the formal condemnation and punishment of, various kinds of wrongdoing ...

A positive Legal Moralist must hold that we have reason to criminalize any public wrong: any such wrong is our collective business; we have reason to call its perpetrator to answer for it and to censure him as a wrongdoer. That is not yet to say, however, that we have conclusive reason to do so: quite apart from the fact that the costs, both material and moral, of enforcing the criminalization of a public wrong might be so great, and the chances of doing it justly and effectively so small, that we should not on balance seek to criminalize it, we might have two other kinds of reason for not criminalizing a public wrong.

First, some public wrongs are too trivial to justify the attention of the criminal law: even if a better system of criminal justice than our own was able to provide appropriately modest, non-oppressive procedures and punishments for minor offences, some wrongs are too minor to warrant even that much formal attention. For just one example, there are kinds of incivility that we may display to each other in public places (barging rudely along a crowded street, for instance) that constitute civic wrongs, and that merit comment from others, but that it would be absurd to think of criminalizing; that is why any sane system of criminal law recognizes a de minimis principle.

Second, however, there might be kinds of public wrong that cause or threaten serious harm, but that we should not criminalize because it is more important to ensure that the harm is repaired or paid for, and to allocate the costs of such repair or compensation justly, than to call those who cause it to public, criminal account; and, perhaps, because criminalizing the conduct would hinder the attempt to allocate its costs fairly—if, for instance, those who caused the harm would then be less likely to admit their responsibility for it. In such cases we would see reason to prefer something more like a civil-law than a criminal-law response ...”

(ii) Liberalism: the harm and offence principle

1–019

A basic tenet of liberalism is that respect must be shown to the principle of individual autonomy—the notion that people possess free will and must be allowed, to the maximum extent possible, to make free choices. The liberal contends that although we may view others’ behaviour as repugnant, the autonomy of an individual to do as he pleases must remain paramount. In its purest form, liberalism dictates that the State should therefore only intervene to restrict autonomy when it is necessary to prevent conduct that is more harmful to others than the restriction of liberty is to the individual.

1–020

THE LAW COMMISSION, CONSENT IN
THE CRIMINAL LAW (CONSULTATION
PAPER NO.139, 1995) APPENDIX C
PARA.C.85:

“The liberal and the moralist disagree fundamentally about the value of autonomy. The liberal can agree with the moralist that the world would be a better place with less of this evil in it, and the liberal might even set about trying to reduce the evil by argument, persuasion, exhortation and/or education of the young. But she will not use the criminal law to this end because she accords primacy to the value of autonomy and the mutually reinforcing ideals of value pluralism and toleration. Given the diversity of human needs, tastes and talents there must be a diversity of eligible life-styles, careers and options to give everybody a fair chance of living a fulfilling, stimulating and enjoyable life. Some of these life-styles will be incompatible or even mutually contradictory, but the liberal will demand that each should extend to the others a degree of tolerance and respect, within the limits set by the harm and offence principles. The liberal asserts that her political theory is the most appropriate for a multicultural and pluralistic society.”

H. L. A. HART, “IMMORALITY AND TREASON” 62 THE LISTENER 162–163
(30 JULY 1959):

1–021

“The Wolfenden Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution recommended by a majority of 12 to 1 that homosexual behaviour between consenting adults in private should no longer be a criminal offence. One of the Committee’s principal grounds for this recommendaton was expressed in its report in this way: ‘There must remain a realm of private morality and immorality which in brief and crude terms is not the law’s business.’ I shall call this the liberal point of view: for it is a special application of those wider principles of liberal thought which John Stuart Mill formulated in his essay on Liberty. Mill’s most famous words, less cautious perhaps than the Wolfenden Committee’s were:

‘The only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community against his will is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant. He cannot rightfully be compelled to do or forbear ... because in the opinion of others to do so would be wise or even right.’

[This approach to criminalisation appears on first inspection to be of sound reasoning. It offers a clear and concise basis upon which decisions to restrict individual liberty should be based. However, upon closer scrutiny a number of limitations are exposed] ...

Mill’s formulation of the liberal point of view may well be too simple. The grounds for interfering with human liberty are more various than the single criterion of ‘harm to others’ suggests: cruelty to animals or organizing prostitution for gain do not, as Mill himself saw, fall easily under the description of harm to others. Conversely, even where there is harm to others in the most literal sense, there may well be other principles limiting the extent to which harmful activities should be repressed by law. So there are multiple criteria, not a single criterion, determining when human liberty may be restricted. Perhaps this is what Sir Patrick means by a curious distinction which he often stresses between theoretical and practical limits. But with all its simplicities the liberal point of view is a better guide than Sir Patrick to clear thought in the proper relation of morality to the criminal law: for it stresses what he obscures—namely, the points at which thought is needed before we turn popular morality into criminal law.

No doubt we would all agree that consensus of moral opinion on certain matters is essential if society is to be worth living in. Laws against murder, theft, and much else would be of little use if they were not supported by a widely diffused conviction that what these laws forbid is also immoral. So much is obvious. But it does not follow that everything to which the moral vetoes of accepted morality attach is of equal importance to society; nor is there the slightest reason for thinking of morality as a seamless web: one which will fall to pieces carrying society with it, unless all its emphatic vetoes are enforced by law. Surely even in the face of the moral feeling that is up to concert pitch—the trio of intolerance, indignation, and disgust—we must pause to think. We must ask a question at two different levels which Sir Patrick never clearly enough identifies or separates. First, we must ask whether a practice which offends moral feeling is harmful, independently of its repercussion on the general moral code. Secondly, what about repercussion on the moral code? Is it really true that failure to translate this item of general morality into criminal law will jeopardize the whole fabric of morality and so society?

We cannot escape thinking about these two different questions merely by repeating to ourselves the vague nostrum: ‘This is part of public morality and public morality must be preserved if society is to exist.’ Sometimes Sir Patrick seems to admit this, for he says in words which both Mill and the Wolfenden Report might have used, that there must be the maximum respect for individual liberty consistent with the integrity of society. Yet this, as his contrasting examples of fornication and homosexuality show, turns out to mean only that the immorality which the law may punish must be generally felt to be intolerable. This plainly is no adequate substitute for a reasoned estimate of the damage to the fabric of society likely to ensue if it is not suppressed.”

Defining harm

1-022

An immediate problem with the harm principle is that one needs a careful definition of the word harm. A trader who sets up a legitimate business in competition with another can severely harm that other person by taking away all their business but, in a capitalist society where business competition is encouraged, this can hardly constitute the sort of harm that ought to be criminalised. A common distinction is between primary and secondary harms.

J. KAPLAN, “THE ROLE OF THE LAW
IN DRUG CONTROL” [1971] DUKE L.J.
1065, 1065–1068:

1-023

“Typically the use of the law to prevent conduct which harms only the actor himself is distinguished from the use of the law as a means of preventing the individual from harming others, including society at large. In practice, however, this is not an easy distinction to draw, for there are few actions in which one can engage that threaten harm only to himself.

The purest example of laws aimed at such conduct are the statutes which require the driver of a motorcycle to wear a protective helmet. It is true that one can argue that the helmet really protects others, since it shields the motorcyclist from thrown pebbles which might make him lose control and injure innocent pedestrians or automobile drivers. Though this approach makes the problem easier, it is disingenuous. As a result, many courts and commentators have refused to take it and have assumed that the helmet protects only the cyclist himself.

Though the helmetless cyclist does not expose others to any appreciable physical danger, he does drive in a society that is committed to preventing people from dying of their injuries. Thus, rather than allowing the cyclist to die unnecessarily, society is prepared to undertake the enormous expense of treating him until he either expires or recovers. In Professor Robert Bartel's apt phrase, the helmetless cyclist exposes others to 'public ward' harm—the danger of having to treat him should he not be killed outright. It is on this theory that society feels it has the right to demand that he do his share to protect himself.

The expense and inconvenience that the helmetless driver may cause does not, however, stop at public ward harm. Insofar as his failure to wear a helmet results in his own injury, he may force society to assume the cost of his neglected responsibilities to others. Here the issue cannot be avoided by saying that it is all society's fault for not letting him die in the street at minimal cost, because his responsibilities must still be fulfilled. As an emotional matter, moreover, non-support justifications for laws which attempt to prevent self-harming conduct often command considerably more power than do public ward justifications. Thus, despite the enormous public ward justifications for halting alcohol abuse, one of the most powerful Prohibitionist posters contained a drawing of a saloon with a father drinking at the bar while his clean, but poorly dressed little daughter stood in the doorway saying, 'Father, Father, please come home. Mother needs you.' The same public interest which underlies non-support laws, then, can also justify helmetless cyclist laws—at least in the case of those who owe someone a support obligation.

In addition to the public ward and non-support justifications for forbidding conduct which on first glance would appear to harm only the actor, a further justification exists which might be called the 'modelling' justification. Modelling is the psychological term for the process by which one repeats a type of behaviour one sees in others. Modelling of behaviour may thus occur where the watcher first learns that the behaviour which he had thought impossible can indeed be performed; where the watcher, by observing, learns how to do it; where he simply gets the idea from watching; or where he, for any one of many reasons, imitates the action. It is true, of course, that the same values which underlie the freedom of communication may interfere with preventing the harm caused by modelling. The individual who models the helmetless cyclist does so without coercion, and, apart from the indirect harms discussed, he harms only himself. Nevertheless, where those persons society tries to protect from modelling are children, the fact that the helmetless cyclist in a causal sense may have caused the modelling, which in turn might lead to injury, may be very significant. Children are regarded as much more likely than adults to model dangerous conduct, and we certainly acknowledge a greater responsibility to protect them from harm.

The final justification by which some may find social harm in conduct which appears to harm only the actor might be called the ‘categorical imperative’ justification. This relies on the fact that although an act might harm only the actor if performed by relatively few people, it could cause harm to everyone if it were performed by almost all. This justification is not heard in the helmetless cyclist case, but it is heard with respect to some sexual and drug laws.”

1-024

If one were to apply the distinction made by Kaplan between harms which may be referred to as primary (involving direct harm to others) and secondary (involving indirect harm to others) to the examples we have employed before, theft would clearly belong to the former category; it causes harm to others and can be criminalised on that basis. But what of our example of sado-masochistic activities between consenting adults? Those involved in such activities would argue that no primary harm is caused, since participants not only consent to physical pain but positively desire it. However, it could be argued that secondary harm is caused; one might wish to employ Kaplan’s “modelling” and “categorical imperative” justifications. Similar arguments were in fact raised in the case of *Brown*³⁴ where it was alleged that a young man had been corrupted by being introduced into the sado-masochistic ring. In other words, the potential, if not the reality, for harm to others existed.³⁵

Kaplan's "modelling" justification can be seen in operation more recently in relation to the offence of "extreme pornography" under the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.63. This provision criminalises the possession (not the production or supply) of pornography that is deemed to be "extreme" due to its portrayal of one of a number of acts listed in s.63(7)³⁶ and which "is grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise of an obscene character".³⁷ At first glance this test seems to indicate that the Government, in choosing to create this new offence, did so on the basis of legal moralism.³⁸ However, McGlynn and Rackley suggest that an offence of possessing extreme pornography could be justified under the harm principle, and identify "cultural harm" as a type of harm that such criminalisation might seek to prevent.³⁹ "Cultural harm", they assert, is "a concept of harm which moves beyond arguments of immediate cause and effect".⁴⁰ Ultimately, the harm that allowing the possession of extreme pornography threatens to cause is that it might "contribute to a climate in which sexual violence is not taken seriously".⁴¹ McGlynn and Rackley are of the opinion that the Government's purpose in enacting the legislation "should have been about changing the cultural and social environment in which sexual violence is marginalised, in which rape conviction rates are at an all-time low and in which pornography is becoming (if possible) even more ubiquitous". Whilst the Government's original consultation paper⁴² justified its proposals on this ground, amongst others, following opposition from "arch liberals" the proposals were amended and the Government "[u]ltimately ... fell back on the easy tradition of the conservative-moralistic and disgust-based arguments which consume the [Obscene Publications Act]".⁴³

In Brown, the majority stressed yet other relevant harms. Lord Jauncey stated that:

"it would appear to be good luck rather than good judgment which has prevented serious injury from occurring. Wounds can easily become septic if not properly treated, the free flow of blood from a person who is HIV positive or who has AIDS can infect another and an inflicter who is carried away by sexual excitement or by drink or drugs could very easily inflict pain and injury beyond the level to which the receiver had consented ... When considering the public interest potential for harm is just as relevant as actual harm.”⁴⁴

1-025

What this discussion suggests is that the distinction between primary and secondary harms does not provide us with a basis for making decisions as to whether to criminalise conduct. Not only may it be a front for the criminalisation of immorality simpliciter but also it does not enable us to answer which (if any) secondary harms should be prohibited by the criminal law. Just as no-one today argues that all immoral acts ought to be criminal, so no-one argues that all secondary harms ought to be criminal. “The obvious secondary harm resulting from such almost universally performed acts as over-eating or poor nutrition is the reductio ad absurdum of such arguments”.⁴⁵

One of the most sophisticated efforts at defining the harm and offence principle is that provided by Joel Feinberg in a series of books, spanning four volumes, entitled The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law.

JOEL FEINBERG, THE MORAL LIMITS OF THE CRIMINAL LAW: HARM TO OTHERS (1984), PP.33, 34, 36, 215– 216:

1-026

“Harm ... [means] the thwarting, setting back, or defeating of an interest ... One’s interests ... consist of all those things in which one has a stake ... Only setbacks of interests that are wrongs, and wrongs that are setbacks to interest, are to count as harms in the appropriate sense ...

‘This interpretation thus excludes set-back interests produced by justified or excused conduct (‘harms’ that are not wrongs) ... A harm in the appropriate sense then will be produced by morally indefensible conduct that not only sets back the victim’s interest, but also violates his right ...

Minor or trivial harms are harms despite their minor magnitude and triviality, but below a certain threshold they are not to count as harms for the purposes of the harm principle, for legal interference with trivia is likely to cause more harm than it prevents ...

Where the kind of conduct in question ... does create a danger to some degree, legislators employing the harm principle must use various rules of thumb as best they can:

- a. the greater the gravity of a possible harm, the less probable its occurrence need be to justify prohibition of the conduct that threatens to produce it;
- b. the greater the probability of harm, the less grave the harm need be to justify coercion;
- c. the greater the magnitude of the risk of harm, itself compounded out of gravity and probability, the less reasonable it is to accept the risk;
- d. the more valuable (useful) the dangerous conduct, both to the actor and others, the more reasonable it is to take the risk of harmful consequences ...
- e. the more reasonable the risk of harm (the danger), the weaker is the case for prohibiting the conduct that creates it.”

Causing serious offence

1-027

Harm as it is understood by Feinberg refers to the set back of personal interests and to the violation of individual rights. However, within this conceptualisation of harm Feinberg also speaks of causing “serious offence” to others. For serious offence to come within the harm principle, Feinberg argues that it must be so intense that it would be felt by an “average” or “reasonable” person, and that the offence is caused by witnessing the offensive conduct which is not easily avoidable.

JOEL FEINBERG, THE MORAL LIMITS OF THE CRIMINAL LAW: OFFENSE TO OTHERS (1985), PP.1-2, 26:

1-028

“It is always a good reason in support of a proposed criminal prohibition that it would probably be an effective way of preventing serious offense (as opposed to injury or harm) to persons other than the actor, and that it is probably a necessary means to that end ...

The offense principle requires that the disliked state of mind ... be produced wrongfully by another party ... [It is necessary] to weigh, in each main category and context of offensiveness, the seriousness of the offense caused to unwilling witnesses against the reasonableness of the offender’s conduct. The seriousness of the offensiveness would be determined by (1) the intensity and durability of the repugnance produced, and the extent to which repugnance could be anticipated to be the general reaction of strangers to the conduct displayed or represented (conduct offensive only to persons with an abnormal susceptibility to offense would not count as very offensive); (2) the ease with which unwilling witnesses can avoid the offensive displays; and (3) whether or not the witnesses have willingly assumed the risk of being offended either through curiosity or the anticipation of pleasure ...

These factors would be weighed as a group against the reasonableness of the offending party’s conduct as determined by (1) its personal importance to the actors themselves and its social utility generally, remembering always the enormous social utility of unhampered expression (in those cases where expression is involved); (2) the availability of alternative times and places where the conduct in question would cause less offense; (3) the extent, if any, to which the offense is caused with spiteful motives. In addition, the legislature would examine the prior established character of various neighbourhoods, and consider establishing licensed zones in areas where the conduct in question is known to be already prevalent, so that people inclined to be offended are not likely to stumble on it to their surprise ...

[Feinberg argues that the law should not treat offence as if it was as serious as harm and, where possible, should use other modes of regulation such as injunctions or licensing procedures (p.3).]”

THE LAW COMMISSION, CONSENT IN
THE CRIMINAL LAW (CONSULTATION PAPER NO.139, 1995), APPENDIX C

PARA.C.41:

“Liberals support the offence principle because some forms of offence can be so extreme and protracted that they unacceptably infringe the autonomy of unwilling observers and are therefore, on liberal principles, legitimate candidates for criminalisation. The liberal is, however, extremely cautious in using the criminal law to this end and will only endorse an offence principle that is properly qualified and carefully circumscribed. The reason is clear; since just about every conceivable activity might give offence to somebody, everybody's autonomy would be severely and unacceptably curtailed if the criminal law routinely targeted offensive conduct ... The liberal, at any rate, will only countenance criminalising offence which is extreme and unavoidable, and this can never be said of activity which takes place in private.”

1-029

It follows that while picking one's nose in public might be an offence to sensibility,⁴⁶ it could never, using Feinberg's criteria, amount to serious offence. On the other hand, if one were travelling on a bus and the passengers in the seat directly opposite perform mutual fellatio or cunnilingus to climax accompanied by sound effects,⁴⁷ it could be argued that the test of serious offence is made out.

The critical definition of harm and offence is that it involves a wrongful set-back to another's interests. Whether conduct is wrongful is ultimately to be based on moral judgments. Accordingly, if a victim consents to injury or the risk of injury, as is the case with sado-masochistic beatings, that person has not been wronged and so has not been harmed. Similarly, the legitimate businessperson has not wronged the competitor and so no harm has been caused.

(iii) Legal paternalism

1-030

Legal paternalism involves allowing the criminal law to be used to protect a person from harm to themselves. Legal paternalists argue that the law is entitled to interfere with a person's autonomy for his own good and to enhance their welfare. If it were established that consuming certain drugs was harmful to the person concerned, the paternalist would criminalise the sale and possession of such drugs. The legal paternalist is, however, only interested in enhancing the interests that a person actually has and not in protecting interests that they ought to have. As Roberts puts it:

“So a paternalist in my sense may interfere with another person's self-regarding actions in order to protect those interests which the other would recognise as authentically his (e.g. his interests in continued life and bodily security) but not for the sake of interests the other disowns (e.g. his (moral) interest in not having gay sex).”⁴⁸

There are, however, a number of problems with a paternalistic approach.

THE LAW COMMISSION, CONSENT IN
THE CRIMINAL LAW (CONSULTATION
PAPER NO.139, 1995), APPENDIX C
PARA.C.63:

1-031

“[T]he paternalist argues from a philosophical slippery slope and is at constant risk of taking a tumble. The fact is that many of us make life-style choices which do not promote our immediate or long-term interests. Smoking certainly falls into this category of choices: for the paternalist it should be a clear target for criminalisation. But the point goes much further. If (as seems plausible) a balanced, healthy diet and regular exercise would be in every person's interests, the paternalist has a reason for criminalising fatty foods and sedentary life-styles. Risk-taking without good reason would also be ruled out. Sky-diving, mountaineering and most contact sports would have to be criminalised. In principle, the paternalist seems to be committed to using the criminal law to turn us all into super-fit, clean-living 'spartans' whether we like it or not.”

Despite this,⁴⁹ the Law Commission has proposed, in relation to sado-masochistic activities, that the law be based on an approach “redolent of a paternalism that is softened at the edges”.⁵⁰ Accordingly, while people should be generally entitled to make choices for themselves and consent to injury, even fairly serious injury, they should not be permitted to consent to seriously disabling injury. Because people have interests in their physical health, the normal functioning of their bodies and in avoiding intense pain or grotesque disfigurement, the Law Commission takes the view that anybody who consents to seriously disabling injury “has made a mistake and that to be really disabled is against his or her interests”.⁵¹ An exception is, however, proposed in relation to activities that are “very widely regarded as beneficial”⁵² such as surgery and risky sports. By allowing people to consent to a range of injuries in sado-masochism, the Law Commission clearly regards its paternalistic view as being softened in favour of liberalism. However, by not allowing people to consent to seriously disabling injuries in the course of sado-masochism while not criminalising the same injuries in the course of, say, boxing, it is possible to assert that in reality the Law Commission has adopted a stance of paternalism hardened at the edges by legal moralism.

It is also the case that paternalism is used inconsistently as a justification for the control of certain drugs. One might expect that drugs offences be classed in seriousness according to the harm that they might potentially cause the user and/or any secondary victims. Studies of the harmfulness of drugs have shown that this is not in fact how the criminal law operates. The Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 categorises prohibited drugs in three classes A, B and C.⁵³ Possession and supply of such drugs are prohibited, with the maximum sentence for such offences depending upon the class of drug involved.⁵⁴ Examples of those drugs falling within Class A are heroin and cocaine, whilst amphetamines (speed) are Class B. Cannabis, having been temporarily downgraded to Class C, has again been reclassified as a Class B drug.⁵⁵

TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE, DRUG CLASSIFICATION: MAKING A HASH OF
IT? FIFTH REPORT OF SESSION 2005– 06 (2006), P.3:

1–033

“With respect to the ABC classification system, we have identified significant anomalies in the classification of individual drugs and a regrettable lack of consistency in the rationale used to make classification decisions. In addition, we have expressed concern at the Government’s proclivity for using the classification system as a means of ‘sending out signals’ to potential users and society at large—it is at odds with the stated objective of classifying drugs on the basis of harm and the Government has not made any attempt to develop an evidence base on which to draw in determining the ‘signal’ being sent out.”

1–034

Evidence provided to the committee suggests, for example, that magic mushrooms, currently classed as a Class A drug, are far less harmful than other drugs in the same category. Official statistics suggest that only one person died from taking such drugs between the years 1993 and 2000; the drugs are thought not to be addictive, and that it is estimated that one would need to consume one’s own body weight in magic mushrooms for the dose to be lethal.⁵⁶ In comparison, some drugs which are not even prohibited under law may be more harmful; though the production and sale of so-called “legal highs” has now been criminalised.⁵⁷ Alcohol and tobacco were ranked by some as being as harmful as the Class A drugs of LSD and ecstasy, and it has been estimated that together alcohol and tobacco cause “approximately 40 times the total number of deaths from all illegal drugs combined”.⁵⁸ If drugs offences are to be justified in terms of paternalism surely they should bear some relation to the degree of harm they actually cause.

Whilst paternalism has been subjected to much criticism, the harm principle has also been criticised in recent years for failing to curb the expansion of the criminal law,⁵⁹ and it may be seen as being both under inclusive, “since it cannot—or cannot without serious distortion—capture kinds of conduct that clearly should be criminalized”,⁶⁰ and over-inclusive, “in that it renders ‘criminalizable’ at least in principle, kinds of conduct that should not be criminalized”.⁶¹ There is potential for the principle to be used to justify highly intrusive state intervention into the private life of individuals, for example it might be seen as justifying the criminalisation of parents who cause harm or a risk of harm to their children’s health by failing to have them immunised, or smoking at home, or feeding them excessive quantities of calorie-dense food.⁶² Feinberg has suggested that, in the case of offensive conduct and speech, there is a particular danger of overcriminalisation because of the tendency of law-makers to overreact to it.⁶³ Stanton-Ife has also argued that the manner in which the harm principle accounts for crimes in general, in terms of interests, fails adequately to explain the gravity of some particularly horrific crimes, because it “has the effect of shoehorning all crimes into one box”,⁶⁴ regarding the victims of crime as those whose interests have been violated, when the reality is that the victims of horrific crimes “have been violated themselves”.⁶⁵

2. Is it necessary to employ the criminal law?

1–035

Whichever of the above views is adopted as the correct basis upon which to justify the determination that conduct is wrongful, most commentators accept that this is merely a minimal or necessary, but not a sufficient, condition for criminalisation. Assuming the conduct in question is adjudged to be wrongful, there is a further condition to be established. It must be necessary to use the criminal law to condemn and try to prevent the wrongful conduct. In other words, the criminal law should be used as a measure of “last resort”.

DOUGLAS HUSAK, “THE CRIMINAL LAW AS LAST RESORT” (2004) 24
O.J.L.S. 207, 211–212:

“Why not require the state to have a compelling interest for each criminal law it enacts? The standards applicable to infringements of fundamental rights (like speech) should be invoked whenever persons become subject to punishment. This theory would require the law in question to be necessary to achieve a compelling government purpose. In other words, the government’s objective must be essential, and the law must be the least restrictive means to attain it. To qualify as the least restrictive means, the law must be narrowly tailored to serve the compelling state interest. The requirement of narrow tailoring has two dimensions. First, criminal laws should not be over inclusive, proscribing instances of conduct beyond those that serve the compelling state interest. Next, criminal laws should not be under inclusive, and must apply equally to each instance of conduct the state has the same compelling interest to proscribe. The state must treat us as equals in protecting our interest not to be punished; it should not punish some while sparing others if it has the same compelling reason to punish both. Of course, this theory cannot be implemented without criteria to decide which state interests are compelling; attempts to identify these interests are bound to generate enormous dispute. Moreover, since the law must be necessary to achieve the compelling government purpose, the state objective must be more difficult to attain without resorting to punishment. This latter requirement, it would seem, expresses the last resort principle. A criminal statute cannot be necessary to accomplish a purpose if other means could do so more easily.”⁶⁶

Husak is building upon the work of others here, in particular that of Packer, who listed the following as conditions to be met before the criminal law can be applied.

HERBERT L. PACKER, THE LIMITS OF
THE CRIMINAL SANCTION (1969),
PP.267-272:

“Goals of Punishment:

To begin with, there is the obvious point that unless at least one utilitarian mode of prevention is likely to be served by employing the criminal sanction against a particular form of conduct, we had better forget about it. Sneezing in church is a relatively uncontroversial example ... [A] utilitarian case for defining conduct as criminal can best be made in situations where both deterrence and incapacitation are effective: where people are relatively likely to be deflected by the possibility of being caught and where punishment is likely to prevent the commission of further crimes. There are many situations in which the two are not correlated and ... very few in which they are ...

Remoteness and Triviality:

The conduct proscribed by any criminal code can be ranked in a hierarchy of remoteness from the ultimate harm that the law seeks to prevent. We prohibit the sale of liquor to an intoxicated person to lessen the likelihood that he will drive while drunk (an offense), crash into another car (an offense), injure an occupant of the other car (an offense), or cause the death of someone in the other car (an offense). There we have a spectrum of remoteness ranging from the illegal sale of liquor to manslaughter. Similarly, we make it an offense to possess tools specially adapted for burglary so that we may reduce the incidence of burglary (an offense), and thereby reduce the incidence of further offences, such as larceny, robbery, rape, and even murder, that can ensue from burglary. Mayhem or murder might not be intended by most burglars, but they are nonetheless possible results of the confrontation between burglar and victim.

One of the most delicate problems in framing criminal proscriptions is to locate the point farthest removed from the ultimate harm apprehended at which meaningful preventive intervention can take place. If dangerous conduct can be deterred and dangerous persons identified well short of the point at which the danger becomes acute, so much the better. Or so it seems. Actually, increasing the radius of the criminal law in the interest of early intervention is a very risky business. The first question in every case is, or should be: how high is the probability that the preparatory conduct, if not inhibited by the threat of criminal punishment, will result in an ultimate harm of the sort that the law should try to prevent? A related consideration is whether the preparatory conduct is itself socially useful, or at least neutral, so that its proscription or curtailment might unduly inhibit people from doing what they should otherwise be free to do. To put the issue in terms that are familiar in the law, is the risk substantial and is it justifiable? ...

Still another consideration relates to the problem of enforcement. By and large, the further removed the conduct in question is from the ultimate harm apprehended, the more difficult it is going to be to detect the occurrence of the conduct and to apprehend people who engage in it. Considerations of maximizing personal freedom and of minimizing the strain on law enforcement combine, then, to suggest considerable caution in the progression towards the remote end of the spectrum.

An example that is amusing because it is so extreme is a recent action of the New York City Council. At the urgent request of the Fire Commissioner, the Council voted to make it a criminal offense, punishable by a hundred-dollar fine, a thirty-day jail term or both, to smoke in bed in a hotel, motel, or other place of public abode. A subsidiary provision required that a notice to that effect be displayed by the proprietor of every place covered by the ban. Now, nobody doubts that a great many serious and sometimes fatal accidents are caused by people's smoking in bed and that it would be a far better thing if people did not smoke in bed. But consider the impossibility of enforcing such a prohibition without the most detailed kind of surveillance. Consider the invasions of privacy that such surveillance would entail. And, enforcement problems aside, consider the effect of announcing that such commonly engaged in conduct has now become criminal. One wonders what was accomplished by the criminal prohibition that would not equally well be accomplished by requiring hotels to display in each room a notice warning about the danger. Alternatively, the solution might have been to make it criminal to cause a fire by smoking in bed, regardless of the amount of harm done. That kind of prohibition would at least have been enforceable, whether or not it was enforced. As it is, given the well-known relationship between intoxication and fires resulting from smoking in bed, I suppose travellers should be grateful that the City Council did not go one step further and make it a crime to go to bed drunk in a New York hotel.

The idea of a criminal conviction no longer inspires the awe that it once did, because of the tendency of legislative bodies (like the New York City Council in this example) to prescribe criminal penalties simply as a means of expressing their disapproval of conduct. This tendency results in two kinds of triviality: triviality of object and triviality of intention. By triviality of object I mean the selection of behaviour for which the regular imposition of criminal punishment is disproportionate. By triviality of intention I mean an attitude of indifference or cynicism on the part of legislators toward the actual enforcement of the proscriptions they vote for. Both forms of triviality should be carefully avoided. A rational legislator should not vote to subject previously legal conduct to criminal proscription unless he is prepared to say, first, that the conduct being proscribed is so threatening to important social interests that he is willing to see people who engage in it subjected to criminal punishment and, second, that he expects law enforcement to devote adequate resources to detecting, apprehending, and convicting violators. The two will tend in most cases to be complementary ... [Such trivial offences should be decriminalised and made ‘civil offences’ or ‘infractions.’].”

1-039

Packer then identifies further conditions that need to be taken into account when making the “ultimate decision” about criminalisation. In addition to what has been said so far, we need to avoid the possibility of creating a “crime tariff”⁶⁷; by this he means that the demand for the illegalised activity or product may be so inelastic that rather than reducing the incidence of the activity, it merely drives it underground and forces the price up. The provision of illegal abortions and the sale of narcotics are cases in point. The same may well be true of sado-masochistic activities.

We may finally consider dangers pointed to by both Packer⁶⁸ and Kadish (in the context of a discussion of sexual crimes) which are all too likely to materialise if conduct is criminalised (or not decriminalised) without careful investigation.

SANFORD KADISH, “THE CRISIS OF OVERCRIMINALISATION” (1967) 374
ANNALS 157, 159–162:

1-040

“But law enforcement pays a price for using the criminal law ... [to enforce morality]. First, the moral message communicated by the law is contradicted by the total absence of enforcement; for while the public sees the conduct condemned in words, it also sees in the dramatic absence of prosecutions that it is not condemned in deed. Moral adjurations vulnerable to a charge of hypocrisy are self-defeating no less in law than elsewhere. Second, the spectacle of nullification of the legislature's solemn commands is an unhealthy influence on law enforcement generally. It tends to breed a cynicism and an indifference to the criminal-law processes which augment tendencies towards disrespect for those who make and enforce the law, a disrespect which is already widely in evidence. In addition:

'Dead letter laws, far from promoting a sense of security, which is the main function of the penal law, actually impair that security by holding the threat of prosecution over the heads of people whom we have no intention to punish.'⁶⁹

Finally, these laws invite discriminatory enforcement against persons selected for prosecution on grounds unrelated to the evil against which these laws are purportedly addressed, whether those grounds be

'the prodding of some reform group, a newspaper-generated hysteria over some local sex crime, a vice drive which is put on by the local authorities to distract attention from defects in their administration of the city government.' ..."

1-041

In returning to the example of sado-masochism it may be useful at this point to summarise Packer's criteria.

HERBERT L. PACKER, THE LIMITS OF
THE CRIMINAL SANCTION (1969),
P.296:

1-042

"(1) The conduct is prominent in most people's view of socially threatening behaviour, and is not condoned by any significant segment of society.

(2) Subjecting it to the criminal sanction is not inconsistent with the goals of punishment.

- (3) Suppressing it will not inhibit socially desirable conduct.
- (4) It may be dealt with through even-handed and non-discriminatory enforcement.
- (5) Controlling it through the criminal process will not expose that process to severe qualitative or quantitative strains.
- (6) There are no reasonable alternatives to the criminal sanction for dealing with it.⁷⁰

These criteria can be used in making up a kind of priority list of conduct for which the legislature might consider invoking the criminal sanction.”

1-043

What conclusions are to be drawn about the example of sado-masochism used throughout this section? In Brown, the activities all took place with the consent of the passive partners. Was it appropriate to invoke the criminal law? The majority felt that the public interest took over at the point of actual bodily harm. Consent can thus only operate as a defence to a narrow range of activities involving minimal harm. They largely dealt with the matter as one of violence. But, surely, “violence” presupposes something that is against the will of the recipient. The whole approach of the majority amounts to little more than pure moralism. The piercing of genitals for sexual purposes is apparently unlawful. Ear-piercing and cosmetic body piercing is lawful.⁷¹ As has been commented: “Eroticism makes a difference”.⁷² The minority, on the other hand, dealt with the matter as one of private sexual morality and felt that it was only when grievous bodily harm had been caused that consent should be no defence.

Ultimately, it would seem it is impossible to answer questions such as whether sado-masochism ought to be criminalised without taking a moral stance on the subject, even if one starts out from the position that conduct ought only to be criminalised if it is “wrongful”.

R. A. DUFF, ANSWERING FOR CRIME: RESPONSIBILITY AND LIABILITY IN
THE CRIMINAL LAW (2007), PP.130– 132:

1–044

“[A] standard liberal response [to the House of Lords decision in Brown] would be to argue that whether or not the physical injuries were inflicted constituted harm, the ‘victims’ were not wronged. ‘Volenti non fit iniuria’: consent might not negate harm, but it negates the wrongfulness that criminalisation requires. A ‘bold’ liberal would stick to this principle, however serious the physical harm involved: if someone who is rationally competent truly gives informed consent to what another does to him, he is not wronged, and the conduct therefore cannot legitimately be criminalised. However, as one imagines cases involving progressively more serious physical (or psychological) harms, even quite bold liberals tend to become uneasy, and find it harder to insist that consent should always preclude criminalisation.

What grounds such unease is not, I suspect, just the degree of seriousness of the physical injuries caused, but a conception of the meaning of the actions that deliberately inflict them: if the point of the action is to inflict extreme pain or serious injury, or to degrade and humiliate others in a ritual of torture, consent surely cannot legitimate it. I might consent to be treated in ways that degrade or deny my humanity; but that does not render the treatment other than wrongful. That is why a more plausible argument for acquitting the Brown defendants would appeal not simply to consent (whilst implicitly admitting that the ‘victims’ were harmed), but to the meaning of the actions in their context: although to the ignorant outsider their activities look like exercises in degradation and humiliation, we should realise that this way of finding sexual gratification is, within that sub-culture, a way in which the participants express their love and respect for each other. But such an argument abandons the Harm Principle, and moves onto the Legal Moralists’ ground. For the argument is that the Brown defendants’ conduct is worthy at least of our moral respect: it is oriented towards morally legitimate ends (mutual sexual pleasure); it is informed by morally admirable values (love and respect); even if the means by which those ends are pursued and those values are expressed are unusual, and to others' eyes shocking, when understood in their particular context they lose their morally shocking character. The argument is thus also that their conduct is not harmful: for it fulfils, rather than setting back, the interests of those involved. We need not accept it for ourselves, or approve of it; we may still think it wrong. But we should not see it as meriting public condemnation, since it does not violate the values of mutual respect and concern by which our collective life as a polity is supposedly structured.

A liberal might be tempted to argue that the morality or otherwise of such conduct should not be what is at issue: as consensual sexual activity, it is a matter of 'private' morality which is, 'in brief and crude terms, not the law's business'.⁷³ The argument just offered was meant to show that this quick liberal response is inadequate. To show that we have no good reason to criminalise such conduct, according to the Harm Principle, we must show either that it is not harmful or that, though harmful, it is not wrongful. To show that it was not harmful we must attend, I have suggested, to its moral significance as an aspect of mutually respectful sexual relationships—which brings to bear a moralised conception of harm. To show that it was not wrongful we cannot, I have suggested, simply appeal to consent, but must look at the substantive character of the conduct, and in particular at whether it must count as degrading or dehumanizing.”

1-045

Arguably, Duff's position that conduct should be criminalised only if it is wrongful, and that wrongful conduct includes that which is “degrading or dehumanizing”, brings us no closer to finding a workable test which would allow us to determine whether a particular activity ought to be criminalised or not, since it depends on the moral view taken on whether such activity is “dehumanizing” or not. However, his discussion brings us to the almost inevitable conclusion that no single theory can dictate the content of the criminal law:

“Instead of trying to find some single concept or value that will capture the essence of crime or the essential characteristic in virtue of which crimes are properly punished we should opt for a pluralism that recognises a diversity of reasons for criminalisation.”⁷⁴

3. Is it permissible to criminalise the conduct?

1-046

Even assuming the above criteria have been met, namely that the conduct is regarded as “wrongful” and it is thought “necessary” to invoke the powers of the criminal law to condemn the activity, there is a final hurdle to be overcome before the conduct should be declared (or remain) criminal. Such criminalisation must not contravene the European Convention on Human Rights which was made directly applicable in English law by the Human Rights Act 1998.

These provisions operate in two ways. First, any new Bill proposing to criminalise conduct must be accompanied by a statement by the Minister responsible that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the Convention.⁷⁵

Secondly, it is possible that existing criminal offences are structured in such a way as to offend the provisions of the ECHR. For example, the European Commission has found that it was a contravention of art.8 (respect for private life) and art.14 (non-discrimination) to have different ages of consent for heterosexuals and homosexuals.⁷⁶ This led to a change of English law, rendering the age of consent the same for all persons.⁷⁷ Under the Human Rights Act 1998, courts are obliged to interpret all legislation “so far as it is possible to do so” in a manner that is compatible with Convention rights.⁷⁸ Courts are thus mandated to interpret legislation to achieve this result if possible, but they are not permitted to legislate (in the sense of rewriting statutory provisions):

“if it is necessary in order to obtain compliance to radically alter the effect of the legislation this will be an indication that more than interpretation is involved.”⁷⁹

While every effort must be made to interpret provisions to ensure compatibility, if this is not possible then, as “a measure of last resort”,⁸⁰ the High Court and appellate courts may make a declaration of incompatibility. While this does not affect the actual validity of the incompatible legislation, there is an obligation to bring the law into conformity with the Convention since otherwise the UK will not meet its obligations under art.1 of the Convention “to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms” set out in the Convention.

1-047

Similarly, courts are obliged to ensure compatibility between the common law and the Convention even if this involves courts having to override previous authority. While English courts have displayed some reluctance to go down this route, increasingly challenges to established authorities are being mounted. For example, in *Misra*⁸¹ the Court of Appeal was faced with the argument that certain aspects of a leading House of Lords’ decision, Adomako,⁸² were incompatible with the Convention. While rejecting this argument on its merits, the Court of Appeal clearly regarded itself as having such a power. A court in Jersey has actually exercised this power in holding that the common law defence of insanity is incompatible with the ECHR.⁸³

While the importance of the ECHR cannot be over-estimated, it must be conceded that its impact on the substantive criminal law (as opposed to criminal procedure, evidence and sentencing) has, to date, been somewhat limited. For example, art.8 provides a right to respect for private life. Prima facie, one might think that the decision in Brown would be incompatible with this: all the sado-masochistic activities in this case were consensual and in private. If a right to private life is to mean anything, it ought to encompass persons expressing their sexuality in the privacy of their own homes. Indeed, the decision in Brown was challenged on this basis in the European Court of Human Rights in Laskey.⁸⁴ However, the European Court, while conceding that there was a violation of the right to respect for private life in art.8(1), nevertheless ruled that criminalisation in cases involving “violence” was justifiable under art.8(2) which permits invasions of privacy if it is “necessary in a democratic society ... for the protection of health or morals”.

To date, despite the fact that the Convention applies directly in English law, there is little evidence of English judges adopting a less moralistic/paternalistic stance.⁸⁵ The English courts have held, for example, that art.6 is “not concerned with the fairness of provisions of substantive law” and that Contracting States are free “to choose how to define the essential elements of an offence”.⁸⁶ Further, legislation passed since the coming into force of the Human Rights Act suggests that the Act has failed to produce a more liberal effect on law-making, and that a moralistic stance persists. When the ban on hunting was being debated in Parliament various bodies, such as the Countryside Alliance, argued that any such ban would breach human rights and be incompatible with the Convention. The Bill was passed, however, and the Court of Appeal has since confirmed that the Hunting Act 2004 does not breach art.8 (right to respect for private life), art.11 (right to freedom of assembly and association), or art.1 of Protocol 1 (right to property).⁸⁷ One of the difficulties of implementing the Human Rights Act is that often Parliament and the courts will have to weigh the rights of would-be perpetrators of crime against those of would-be victims. For example, the Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2006 creates, amongst others, an offence of publishing or distributing written material which is threatening with intent to stir up religious hatred. Such an offence must balance the risk of harm caused by religious hatred and freedom of religion against freedom of expression (art.10). It is yet to be confirmed by the courts that this balance has been struck.

It is more often the procedural law, rather than substantive criminal law, which is confirmed as falling foul of the Human Rights Act. The example of detention without trial for suspected terrorists is a salient example of the Government introducing laws to satisfy public demand without applying time-honoured principles of justice that existed long before the Human Rights Act was passed. Whilst procedural law is beyond the scope of this book this example does show, at least, that the courts now have a power that they are willing to exercise in making a declaration of incompatibility against laws passed by Parliament.⁸⁸

The Human Rights Act clearly has a proscriptive effect on criminalisation, in that conduct should not be criminalised if this would breach one of the rights contained within the ECHR. It has been suggested, furthermore, that the Human Rights Act might also have a prescriptive effect on judicial decision-making. Rogers notes that there is a line of authority from the European Court of Human Rights supporting the claim that the substantive criminal law is subject to the doctrine of positive obligations, meaning that the law must be effective in deterring threats to fundamental rights.⁸⁹ Thus, not only must the law not breach rights by criminalising conduct, it must also avoid breaching those rights by failing to deter individuals who threaten the rights of third parties. For example, in ensuring the right to life (art.2), an effective law of self-defence must be clear on the degree of force permissible⁹⁰ and, in guaranteeing the right to be free from inhuman or degrading treatment (art.3), the parameters of any lawful defence of chastisement available to parents who assault their children must clearly be defined.⁹¹ However, this interpretation of the duties under the ECHR arguably has a minimal contribution to make to the determination of whether criminalisation of particular conduct is justified, since if it is recognised that a right needs to be protected under the Convention, the question which remains to be answered is whether it is necessary to use the criminal law (rather than some other mechanism) to realise such protection.⁹²

The precise effect of the Convention and the nature of the various challenges to the substantive criminal law will be explored in the relevant sections of this book, particularly in relation to the structure of the defences to criminal liability which is the area that seems most likely to be affected. For present purposes, it is sufficient to conclude that while the test of permissibility of criminalisation under the ECHR could provide some check on unbridled moralism, the ultimate decision as to whether any particular criminalisation is justifiable will remain to be determined by the other criteria considered above. Stevenson and Harris argue that J. S. Mill's harm principle is, as a benchmark for criminalising conduct, implicit in the ECHR. Whilst this may not be beyond doubt, they identify a fundamental, overarching problem resulting from the legislature's tendency to create new offences with little regard for a set of criteria such as that laid-out by Packer: that of "accretion".

KIM STEVENSON AND CANDIDA HARRIS, “INACCESSIBLE AND UNKNOWNABLE: ACCRETION AND UNCERTAINTY IN MODERN CRIMINAL LAW” (2008) 29 LIVERPOOL L. REV. 247, 258:

1-049

“This inexorable spread of criminal liability has the practical consequence of reducing the effectiveness of the law. In the computing world this type of accretion is known as ‘bloatware’. As development progresses, the project, which may start as a simple and even elegant program, acquires more bells and whistles, more complexity, and more quantitative functionality (‘It can do this! It can do that!’). But all this is achieved at the expense of stability and qualitative functionality in terms of ease of use. The process of legislative accretion has resulted in criminal law and the criminal justice system becoming similarly bloated. One of the most serious consequences is the injection of extreme uncertainty into the domain. In software terms, such uncertainty could be the bug which causes the system to fail, equally in criminal justice terms it has already infected its integrity.”

1-050

The tendency for legislation to be enacted in a piecemeal fashion, with many offences being created, amended and repealed by Statutory Instrument, also means that it can be difficult to ascertain what the current law is, because the law cannot be found in a single document or place.

JAMES CHALMERS AND FIONA LEVERICK, “TRACKING THE CREATION OF CRIMINAL OFFENCES” [2013] CRIMINAL L. REV. 543, 549–550:

“Some criminal offences are created by remarkably inaccessible and tortuous forms of legislative drafting. Consider, for example, the Parliamentary Voting System and Constituencies Act 2011, which made provision for the Alternative Vote referendum. Schedule 4 of that Act provided that various provisions of the Representation of the People Act 1983, including many criminal offences, should apply in respect of the referendum. However, Sch.4 also listed a whole series of ‘modifications’—amendments or substitutions of entire provisions—which should apply to the 1983 Act for this purpose. The consequence is that trying to work out exactly what electoral offences existed as a result of the 2011 Act is an extremely cumbersome process. There is no amended text of the 1983 Act available, because the 2011 Act did not actually amend the 1983 Act—it merely created a modified zombie version of the 1983 Act for a limited time. Anyone seeking to understand the offences created must read the two statutes side by side, substituting words and provisions where appropriate ... this particular drafting technique seems to contribute little to the requirements of accessibility or fair notice. Similar difficulties arise with complex provisions which cross-refer to European Union provisions, and which give no indication on their own face of exactly what conduct is prohibited.”

On occasions, the labyrinthine and complex nature of modern legislation may mean that lawyers and even eminent judges find it difficult to ascertain what the law is.⁹³ In Chambers,⁹⁴ the defendant appealed against a confiscation order of £61,120 imposed when he was convicted of being knowingly concerned in the smuggling of cigarettes into the UK without paying excise duty. The Court of Appeal only discovered at the eleventh hour that the Excise Goods Regulations 1992, which had been relied upon by the prosecution as establishing the legal requirement to pay duty, had in fact been superseded by the Tobacco Products Regulations 2001, and had not applied to tobacco products for over five years. Allowing the appeal, Toulson LJ observed that:

“To a worryingly large extent, statutory law is not practically accessible today, even to the courts whose constitutional duty it is to interpret and enforce it.”⁹⁵

If the criminal law is to avoid its own version of “bloatware” the legislature’s current run of “binge law-making”⁹⁶ needs to be curbed. It is difficult, however, to apply any of the criteria set out earlier in this chapter without some consideration for what the criminal justice system is trying to achieve in punishing those who breach the law.

III. Punishment

1-053

If the criminal law is to have any real bite it must be underpinned by an effective enforcement mechanism that is backed by a framework of sanctions aimed at compelling compliance. These sanctions must be distinguishable from other legal remedies if they are to give criminal law its distinct character, and if they are to help fulfil the key aim of the State to prevent harmful, offensive and/or immoral conduct.

The key distinguishing characteristics of the criminal sanction is that it is intended to serve as a form of punishment. There are two main schools of thought that underpin justifications for punishing those who commit criminal offences: (i) retributivist; and (ii) consequentialist.⁹⁷ Both retributivist and consequentialist theories of punishment have long histories. Retributivist theories became popular in the 18th century and, although falling out of fashion during the mid-1990s, made a resurgence in the latter part of the 20th century; remaining a cornerstone of the criminal justice system today. “Retribution”, as a basis for punishment, is strongly associated with the work of Kant and Hegel, both of whom asserted that criminal offenders are moral agents who are deserving of punishment. “The annulment of the crime is retribution”⁹⁸ and is the symbolic restoration of the wrong committed. Retribution is therefore backward looking in that it seeks to punish the wrong doer in order to restore the balance or moral equilibrium that is disturbed by an offence.⁹⁹

Consequentialist theories, on the other hand, are forward looking to the consequences of punishment. The theories of “deterrence”, “incapacitation”, and “rehabilitation” (described more fully below) have been associated with philosophers such as Cesare Beccaria and Jeremy Bentham who have argued that any form of punishment should achieve a “greater good”—namely crime reduction.

In addition to these theories of punishment is a relatively new purpose of sentencing which although not in itself a justification for punishing someone is nonetheless now an important means through which the State can respond to criminal wrongdoing—that of reparation. We therefore turn to a discussion of reparation later in this chapter.

A. RETRIBUTION

1–054

The word “retribution” is used in several senses. Sometimes it is employed to indicate either vengeance or expiation, but more commonly today it refers to giving offenders their “just deserts” and/or using punishment as a system of censure.

1. Vengeance

J. F. STEPHEN, A HISTORY OF THE
CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND VOL.II
(1883), PP.81–82:

1–055

“[T]he infliction of punishment by law gives definite expression and a solemn ratification and justification to the hatred which is excited by the commission of the offence ... The criminal law thus proceeds upon the principle that it is morally right to hate criminals, and it confirms and justifies that sentiment by inflicting upon criminals, punishments which express it ... I am also of opinion that this close alliance between criminal law and moral sentiment is in all ways healthy and advantageous to the community. I think it highly desirable that criminals should be hated, that the punishments inflicted upon them should be so contrived as to give expression to that hatred.”

This desire for vengeance supposedly operates at two levels. First, it is asserted that punishment satisfies the victim's (or relatives' and friends') desire for vengeance and the State is merely exacting vengeance on their behalf to prevent private retaliation.

Secondly, it is asserted that there is a public need for vengeance. It is argued that there is an instinctive demand which is active in every human being to retaliate. This reaction is not only understandable but desirable as a socially acceptable outlet for our aggressions. If there were no punishment our aggressions would become repressed to the point when they might break out in an anti-social manner.¹⁰⁰ Such views find little serious support today and have been alleged to "represent the breakdown of human intelligence, as well as good will. It shows perhaps the ugliest phase of our human nature".¹⁰¹

2. Expiation

According to this view, the offender must be made to work off his guilt; they must be purified through suffering. This is regarded as a species of retribution in that the offender is "paying his debt" owed to society and, in so doing, becomes reconciled with that society. The focus is on the past crime; the attempt is to wipe the slate clean.

These ideas stem largely from the religious influences on our culture, but some would argue that there is a deeper psychological explanation underlying an offender's need for expiation. From the time we are children we are conditioned to expect punishment when we have done wrong. Guilt is a state of tension which gives rise to a need for the removal of this tension. We are conditioned to expect this relief through punishment. The most famous illustration of this form of punishment comes from Dostoyevsky's Crime and Punishment in which Raskolnikov, after committing a brutal murder, becomes obsessed with feelings of guilt and eventually gives himself up as the only means of coming to terms with himself and achieving peace of mind.

While society might offer an offender the opportunity of expiation, it cannot insist or demand it as the will or desire for true expiation must proceed from the defendant himself. One is not necessarily dealing with true expiation of sin. Society simply deems the offender to have purged his guilt by punishment. A modern advocate of this penance theory is Duff.¹⁰²

R. A. DUFF, “THEORIES AND POLICIES UNDERLYING GUIDELINES SYSTEMS”
(2005) 105 COLUMBIA L. REV. 1162, 1182–1183:

1–058

“The aim ... is that the offender should come to understand, and so to repent, that wrong as a wrong both against the individual victim (where there was one) and against the wider political community to which they both belong ...

Central to this richer purpose is an attempt to turn the offender’s punishment from a purely one-way process of communication from polity to offender into a two-way process in which there is then a communication back from the offender to the victim and the community: What is to be communicated is a kind of symbolic apology, which is given material and thus more forceful expression by the penal ‘hard treatment’ that the offender undergoes.”

Duff’s views have, however, attracted criticism.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH AND ANDREW
ASHWORTH, PROPORTIONATE
SENTENCING (2005), P.94:

1–059

“[T]he offender has no choice but to undergo such deprivations; treating the expiatory pains of punishment as a kind of enforced apology thus raises the problem of compulsory attitudinizing—which may be viewed as a form of demeaning treatment ... [T]here remains the key question of whether this is a proper function of the state. Perhaps an abbot may be entitled to impose penances designed to make erring novices expiate their sins. But why may the state do the same to its citizens in a free society?”

3. Just deserts

1-060

Over the last two decades “theories” of punishment such as deterrence and rehabilitation have come under increasing attack both by academics and law-makers.¹⁰³ The view that has fast gained ascendancy is that people who have broken the law deserve to be punished.¹⁰⁴ The idea is simple: he who harms must be harmed in return. In other words, the harmer gets his “just deserts”. In this way, we are according such persons respect as autonomous and responsible human beings who have chosen to commit a crime and must therefore face the consequences of their decisions.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, DOING JUSTICE—THE CHOICE OF PUNISHMENTS (REPORT OF THE
COMMITTEE FOR THE STUDY OF INCARCERATION) (1976), PP.45-49:

1-061

“In everyday thinking about punishment, the idea of desert figures prominently. Ask the person on the street why a wrongdoer should be punished, and he is likely to say that he ‘deserves’ it ...

To say someone ‘deserves’ to be rewarded or punished is to refer to his past conduct, and assert that its merit or demerit is reason for according him pleasant or unpleasant treatment. The focus on the past is critical. That a student has written an outstanding paper is grounds for asserting that he deserves an award; but that the award will yield him or others future benefits (however desirable those might be) cannot be grounds for claiming he deserves it. The same holds for punishment: to assert that someone deserves to be punished is to look at his past wrongdoing as reason for having him penalized. This orientation to the past distinguishes desert from the other purported aims of punishment—deterrence, incapacitation, rehabilitation—which seek to justify the criminal sanction by its prospective usefulness in preventing crime.”

C. S. LEWIS, “THE HUMANITARIAN THEORY OF PUNISHMENT” (1953) VI
RES JUDICATAE 224:

1-062

“[T]he concept of Desert is the only connecting link between punishment and justice. It is only as deserved or undeserved that a sentence can be just or unjust ... There is no sense in talking about a ‘just deterrent’ or a ‘just cure.’ We demand of a deterrent not whether it is just but whether it will deter. We demand of a cure not whether it is just but whether it succeeds. Thus when we cease to consider what the criminal deserves and consider only what will cure him or deter others, we have tacitly removed him from the sphere of justice altogether: instead of a person, a subject of rights, we now have a mere object, a patient, a ‘case’.

The distinction will become clearer if we ask who will be qualified to determine sentences ... [if] sentences are no longer held to derive their propriety from the criminal’s deservings ... [S]o long as we are thinking in terms of Desert, the propriety of the penal code, being a moral question, is a question on which every man has the right to an opinion, not because he follows this or that profession, but because he is simply a man, a rational animal enjoying the Natural Light. But all this is changed when we drop the concept of Desert ...

The Humanitarian theory, then, removes sentences from the hands of jurists whom the public conscience is entitled to criticize and places them in the hands of technical experts whose special sciences do not even employ such categories as rights or justice ...

[T]he Humanitarian theory wants simply to abolish Justice and substitute Mercy for it. This means that you start being ‘kind’ to people before you have considered their rights, and then force upon them supposed kindnesses which they in fact had a right to refuse, and finally kindnesses which no one but you will recognise as kindnesses and which the recipient will feel as abominable cruelties. You have overshot the mark. Mercy detached from Justice, grows unmerciful.”

There are two main strands to this just-deserts thinking.

(i) Just deserts as eliminating an unfair advantage

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, DOING JUSTICE—THE CHOICE OF PUNISHMENTS (REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE FOR THE STUDY OF INCARCERATION) (1976), pp.45–49:

1–063

“A useful place to begin is with Kant’s explanation of deserved punishment, which he based on the idea of fair dealing among free individuals. To realise their own freedom, he contended, members of society have the reciprocal obligation to limit their behaviour so as not to interfere with the freedom of others. When someone infringes another’s rights, he gains an unfair advantage over all others in the society—since he has failed to constrain his own behaviour while benefitting from other persons’ forbearance from interfering with his rights. The punishment—by imposing a counterbalancing disadvantage on the violator—restores the equilibrium: after having undergone the punishment, the violator ceases to be at advantage over his non-violating fellows As Herbert Morris puts it in a recent restatement of the Kantian argument:

‘A person who violates the rules has something others have—the benefits of the system [of mutual non-interference with others’ rights]—but by renouncing what others have assumed, the burdens of self-restraint, he has acquired an unfair advantage. Matters are not even until this advantage is in some way erased Justice—that is punishing such individuals—restores the equilibrium of benefits and burdens.’” (“Persons and Punishment” (1968) 52 The Monist 475, 478)

1–064

According to this view, by committing a crime, offenders have gained an unfair advantage over all others who have “toed the line” and restrained themselves from committing crime. They are “free riders” who have failed to observe the moral constraints that others have accepted.¹⁰⁵ Punishment is necessary to take away the benefits gained. Social equilibrium must be restored. Offenders deserve punishment in order to destroy their unfair advantage. Finnis describes the advantage as one of “indulging a (wrongful) self-preference, of permitting himself an excessive freedom in choosing” which, in turn, is punished so that “the criminal has the disadvantage of having his wayward will restricted in its freedom by being subjected to the representative ‘will of society’ (the ‘will’ which he disregarded in disregarding the law)”.¹⁰⁶

Jean Hampton, in a variation on this theme, argues that crime involves the infliction of a moral injury; the victim is diminished in value. Punishment is necessary “to vindicate the value of the victim”.¹⁰⁷ The defendant by committing the crime is asserting an unjustified superiority over the victim which must be nullified through punishment.

The concept of just deserts has, however, attracted criticism.

JOHN BRAITHWAITE AND PHILIP PETTIT, NOT JUST DESERTS: A REPUBLICAN THEORY OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE (1990), PP.158–159:

1–065

“A first objection to this justification for punishment is that law-abiding conduct is not always burdensome and crime is not always advantageous. The rapist might contract syphilis or the burglar break a leg. The conspiracy or the attempted murder might fail. Is the crime to be punished even though no benefits accrued?

The benefits and burdens theorist has a reply to this. He can say that it is self-restraint which is the burden, and unrestricted liberty the benefit that criminals gain by eschewing self-restraint. But is the self-restraint of not committing murder really a burden to our law-abiding readers?

Even under conditions of unrestricted liberty most of us have no interest in or attraction to committing murder, and so the burden is no actual inconvenience. On the contrary, one influential view is that educating ourselves to adopt a moral character which abhors evil makes us 'better off' ...

[It has been argued that] the burden of self-restraint still does limit options ... and to have choice is better than not having it ... Is it a burden in this sense that you are unable to fly to Mars tomorrow? The point we would stress is that some burdens have practical significance for people and some do not. It seems a weak basis for locking people up that they renounced burdens which are not felt to be burdens by most law-abiding citizens."

NICOLA LACEY, STATE PUNISHMENT:
POLITICAL PRINCIPLES AND COMMUNITY VALUES (1988), PP.24–
26:

1-066

“[Desert theories do not give] very clear practical guidance about the fair measure of punishment in particular cases. What actual punishment would forfeit a set of rights equivalent to those violated by a rapist, a petty thief, a reckless driver? As in the case of the law of the talion and the culpability principle, resort to arguments from conventionally agreed, customary or consequence-based penalty scales seem hard to avoid. Secondly, real difficulties have been raised about the social contract tradition itself; in what sense can a fictitious agreement generate obligations for real people? Furthermore, these views are dependent for their force on the existence of a fair set of rules. This is not fatal in itself, but the criteria which dictate that there is indeed a just equilibrium which can be restored are not generated by the forfeiture of rights or unfair advantage principles alone. The views do pre-suppose an independent account of what counts as an unfair advantage and a just equilibrium.

Finally, it seems legitimate to ask whether the metaphorical ideas of restoring relationships of justice or moral equilibria outweigh the obvious disvalues attached to the suffering and other costs of punishment. Do these theories really ignore such costs completely? If not, what weight do they accord to them? In what real sense does punishment ‘restore the right’? Do these theories really remove the mystery attaching to the original, simple desert principle, or are they, too, a form of moral alchemy? Or, in trying to avoid the mystery, do they not collapse into versions of utilitarian or other consequentialist justification? Even the more sophisticated versions barely rise above the level of metaphor, and leave us with the suspicion that the idea of desert cannot be distinguished from a principle of vengeance or the unappealing assertion that two wrongs somehow make a right.”

1–067

According to these criticisms, it appears that “just deserts” theory struggles to stand up to critical and theoretical scrutiny. Of particular concern to critics is that the harming of wrongdoers in order to rebalance the social equilibrium, rather than putting right the wrongs committed, simply doubles the amount of harm that is now inflicted. Perhaps, then, a more cogently formed justification for retribution can be found in the need for public censure and denunciation.

(ii) Just deserts as censure or denunciation

1–068

While some just deserts theorists claim that desert is in itself the only purpose of punishment in that “punishing the guilty achieves something good—namely, justice”,¹⁰⁸ others argue that punishment based on desert is necessary to express disapproval and censure of the conduct and the offender.¹⁰⁹

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, DOING JUSTICE—THE CHOICE OF PUNISHMENTS (REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE FOR THE STUDY OF INCARCERATION) (1976), PP.45–49:

1–069

“[The theory relating to eliminating an unfair advantage] does not explain why that deprivation should take the peculiar form of punishment. Punishment differs from other purposefully inflicted deprivations in the moral disapproval it expresses: punishing someone conveys in dramatic fashion that his conduct was wrong and that he is blameworthy for having committed it. Why, then, does the violator deserve to be punished, instead of being made to suffer another kind of deprivation that connotes no special moral stigma?

To answer this question it becomes necessary, we think, to focus specifically on the reprobation implicit in punishment and argue that it is deserved. Someone who infringes the rights of others, the argument runs, does wrong and deserves blame for his conduct. It is because he deserves blame that the sanctioning authority is entitled to choose a response that expresses moral disapproval; namely, punishment. In other words, the sanction ought not only to deprive the offender of the ‘advantage’ obtained by his disregard of the rules (the Kantian explanation); but do so in a manner that ascribes blame (the reprobative explanation).”

JOEL FEINBERG, “THE EXPRESSIVE FUNCTION OF PUNISHMENT” (1965)
49(3) THE MONIST 397–423:

1–070

“[P]unishment is a conventional device for the expression of attitudes of resentment and indignation, and of judgments of disapproval and reprobation, on the part either of the punishing authority himself or of those ‘in whose name’ the punishment is inflicted. Punishment, in short, has a symbolic significance largely missing from other kinds of penalties.

Consider the standard international practice of demanding that a nation whose agent has unlawfully violated the complaining nation’s rights should punish the offending agent. For example, suppose that an airplane of nation A fires on an airplane of nation B while the later is flying over international waters. Very likely high authorities in nation B will send a note of protest to their counterparts in nation A demanding, among other things, that the transgressive pilot be punished. Punishing the pilot is an emphatic, dramatic, and wellunderstood way of condemning and thereby disavowing his act. It tells the world that the pilot had no right to do what he did, that he was on his own in doing it, that his government does not condone that sort of thing. It testifies thereby to government A's recognition of the violated rights of government B in the affected area and, therefore, to the wrongfulness of the pilot's act. Failure to punish the pilot tells the world that government A does not consider him to have been personally at fault. That in turn is to claim responsibility for the act, which in effect labels that act as an 'instrument of deliberate national policy' and hence an act of war. In that case either formal hostilities or humiliating loss of face by one side or the other almost certainly will follow. None of this scenario makes any sense without the clearly understood reprobative symbolism of punishment. In quite parallel ways punishment enables employers to disavow the acts of their employees (though not civil liability for those acts), and fathers the destructive acts of their sons."

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, MINUTES OF EVIDENCE, NINTH DAY, 1 DECEMBER
1949, MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED BY THE RT. HON. LORD JUSTICE
DENNING, 207:

1-071

"Punishment is the way in which society expresses its denunciation of wrongdoing: and, in order to maintain respect for law, it is essential that the punishment inflicted for grave crimes should adequately reflect the revulsion felt by the great majority of citizens for them. It is a mistake to consider the objects of punishment as being deterrent or reformatory or preventive and nothing else. If that were so, we should not send to prison a man who was guilty of motor manslaughter, but only disqualify him from driving; but would public opinion be content with this? The truth is that some crimes are so outrageous that society insists on adequate punishment, because the wrong-doer deserves it, irrespective of whether it is a deterrent or not ... In my view the ultimate justification of any punishment is, not that it is a deterrent, but that it is the emphatic denunciation by the community of a crime.”

ANDREW VON HIRSCH AND ANDREW
ASHWORTH, PROPORTIONATE
SENTENCING (2005), PP.17–18:

1–072

“A central reason for such a blaming response concerns penal censure’s role as moral communication to the act’s perpetrator. The punishment conveys to the actor a certain critical normative message concerning his conduct: for example, that he has culpably harmed or risked harming someone, and is disapproved of for having done so. This message treats him as a moral agent—that is, an agent capable of moral deliberation. He is being confronted with disapproval in virtues of the wrongfulness of his conduct, and not solely in order to produce preventive or other societal benefits that such censure might achieve ...

Penal censure also has the role of addressing third parties—namely, members of the public. Unlike blame in everyday contexts, the criminal sanction announces in advance that specified categories of conduct are punishable. Because the prescribed sanctions are of a kind that express disapprobation, this conveys the message that the conduct is deemed reprehensible.”

1–073

The role of censure is thus to ensure that the offender recognises the immorality of his actions. Simultaneously, his punishment provides a message to the victim and to society more broadly that his conduct has caused harm and that he is at fault for this. Denunciation theory can also serve to educate the public by reaffirming social values and reinforcing inhibitions against crime. Von Hirsch and Ashworth argue that any preventive effects of public censure must only be seen as complementing retribution and not as a primary justification for punishment. The utilitarian benefits of this theory, termed educative deterrence, will be discussed in the next section. There are two main advantages to punishment based on just deserts. First, it means that limits are placed on state power in that excessive exemplary or incapacitative sentences become unacceptable. Secondly, it should reduce unjustifiable sentencing disparity in that two offenders committing the same crime will receive similar punishments, irrespective of race, culture or background. These are matters to which we shall return towards the end of this chapter.

B. DETERRENCE

1-074

Unlike retributive theories, deterrent theories are forward looking in that they are concerned with the consequences of punishment; their aim is to reduce further crime by the threat or example of punishment. Deterrence is commonly thought to operate at three levels.¹¹⁰

1. Individual deterrence

1-075

Deterrent theories seek to discourage crime. In the case of individual deterrence¹¹¹ it is hoped that the experience of punishment will be so unpleasant that the offender will not reoffend. The task of the sentencer is to look to the future and select the sentence which is likely to have most impact on the individual. In the case of some offenders, no punishment at all may be necessary as the risk of the convicted person reoffending may be minimal. In other cases, the required sentence may be very severe.

It is often said that every time a crime is committed the theory of deterrence is weakened; it is an argument that has some force when applied to the reoffender. One can argue that a reconviction reveals the failure of the previous sentence. However, it is notoriously difficult to measure and assess this.¹¹² The one-year proven reconviction rate for the year of 2014 was 25.6%.¹¹³ In terms of the deterrent effect of punishment the figures do not read well:

“adult offenders with 11 or more previous offences have a higher reoffending rate than those with no previous offences—45.2% compared to 7.5%.”¹¹⁴

This data could be read as suggesting that each time an offender is convicted and punished he or she is more likely to go on to reoffend. Punishment may, therefore, have the opposite effect to that which is intended. Such a conclusion is supported by a recent study in the Netherlands of 696 inmates who had been released from prison for approximately six months.¹¹⁵ The researchers measured the “remembered severity” of imprisonment, controlling for the length of time served. They found that inmates who served longer periods of imprisonment seemed to recall their imprisonment as less aversive than those serving shorter periods. That is to say, the longer the inmates spent in prison the less likely they were to recall their experience as severely negative. The authors conclude that “to the extent that the length of imprisonment affects its recollected aversiveness at all, it does so in the opposite direction than traditional deterrence research presumes”.¹¹⁶

Despite the Ministry of Justice’s own discouraging statistics and research such as that conducted in the Netherlands, successive governments have remained doggedly committed to increasing punishments as a means of deterring reoffending. They argue that what is needed is an even more severe penalty than that merited by the present offence at an early stage in the defendant’s criminal career to have a strong deterrent effect. Indeed, this kind of approach was encapsulated in the much discussed “short, sharp shock” that imposed detention centre orders on young offenders under the Criminal Justice Act 1982.¹¹⁷ Alternatively, the sentence should be increased higher for persistent offenders after each offence is committed until a point is reached at which the penalty will deter the offender. Even if research established (and almost all indications are to the contrary¹¹⁸) that such measures were more effective in preventing recidivism, there is the problem of whether it is just to impose a more severe punishment than that merited by the offence (discussed further below).

2. General deterrence

Under this theory, it is the threat of punishment that deters people from committing crimes. At the legislative level, Parliament lays down penalties to threaten those who might contemplate crime. At the sentencing level, offenders are punished in order that others will be discouraged from committing crimes; this punishment is held up as an example of what will happen if others engage in similar activities. Jeremy Bentham was a key proponent of general deterrence.¹¹⁹ Bentham started from the position that all punishment is pain and as such should be avoided. However, punishment should be used where it can produce a greater benefit to society than the pain that such punishment will inflict on the individual offender. This costs benefits analysis is based on the idea of “utility”. Utility is understood as the minimisation of pain and suffering and the maximisation of pleasure. Bentham argued that in calculating the costs and benefits of our actions we assess a number of factors including the intensity of pain and pleasure but also the certainty or uncertainty of the benefit/pain occurring. Based upon this, Bentham argued that we can devise social policies which maximise pleasure and minimise pain in society. When this theory is applied to punishment we see punishment is only justified by the good consequences that will be returned to society. Yet to a large extent, the theory of general deterrence simply assumes that people will be deterred from committing crime by the threat of a certain level of punishment. Is this assumption justifiable?

J. ANDENAES, “THE GENERAL
PREVENTIVE EFFECTS OF PUNISHMENT” (1966) 114 U. PA. L.
REV. 949, 960–970:

“Reports on conditions of disorganisation following wars, revolution or mutinies provide ample documentation as to how lawlessness may flourish when the probability of detection, apprehension and conviction is low. In these situations, however, many factors work together. The most clear cut examples of the importance of the risk of detection itself are provided by cases in which society functions normally but all policing activity is paralyzed by a police strike or a similar condition. For example, the following official report was made on lawlessness during a 1919 police strike, starting at midnight on July 31st, during which nearly half of the Liverpool policemen were out of service: 'In this district the strike was accompanied by threats, violence and intimidation on the part of lawless persons. Many assaults on the constables who remained on duty were committed. Owing to the sudden nature of the strike the authorities were afforded no opportunity to make adequate provision to cope with the position. Looting of shops commenced about 10pm on August 1st, and continued for some days. In all about 400 shops were looted. Military were requisitioned, special constables sworn in, and police brought from other centers.' (Mannheim, Social Aspects of Crime in England Between the Wars, 156–157 (1940).)

A somewhat similar situation occurred in Denmark when the German occupation forces arrested the entire police force in September 1944. During the remainder of the occupation period all policing was performed by an improvised unarmed watch corps, who were ineffective except in those instances when they were able to capture the criminal red handed. The general crime rate rose immediately, but there was a great discrepancy between the various types of crime. The number of cases of robbery increased generally in Copenhagen during the war, rising from ten per year in 1939 to ten per month in 1943. But after the Germans arrested the police in 1944, the figure rose to over a hundred per month and continued to rise. Larcenies reported to the insurance companies quickly increased tenfold or more. The fact that penalties were greatly increased for criminals who were caught and brought before the courts did not offset the fact that most crimes were going undetected. On the other hand, crimes like embezzlement and fraud, where the criminal is usually known if the crime itself is discovered, do not seem to have increased notably.

The involuntary experiments in Liverpool and Copenhagen showed a reduction in law obedience following a reduction of risks. Examples of the opposite are also reported—the number of crimes decreases as the hazards rise. Tarde mentions that the number of cases of poisoning decreased when research in chemistry and toxicology made it possible to discover with greater certainty the causes as well as the perpetrator of this type of crime. (Tarde, Penal Philosophy 476 (1912)). A decline in bank robberies and kidnappings in the United States is reported to have followed the enactment of federal legislation which increased the likelihood of punishment (Taft, Criminology 322, 361 (rev. ed. 1950)).”

1-078

This belief that punishment can deter crime assumes that actors are rational beings who calculate the risks involved in their actions. They can calculate the chances of being apprehended and punished (taking into account the amount of punishment) and can weigh this against the benefits to them in committing the crime. What is important to note here is that punishment in and of itself may not always be enough to deter the rational offender, but rather it is the degree of risk that is attached to being caught, combined with the penalty which is then attached to the crime, which will ultimately determine whether someone chooses to offend. However, as various criminologists have pointed out, many offenders will not think “rationally” before taking such risks.

PAUL ROBINSON AND JOHN M. DARLEY, “DOES CRIMINAL LAW DETER? A BEHAVIOURAL SCIENCE INVESTIGATION” (2004) 24 OXFORD J. OF LEGAL STUDIES 173, 179, 184, 185, 192-3:

1-079

“Available evidence suggests that potential offenders as a group are people who are less inclined to think at all about the consequences of their conduct or to guide their conduct accordingly. They often are risk-seekers, rather than risk-avoiders, and as a group are more impulsive than the average. Further, conduct decisions commonly are altered by alcohol and drug intake. In Anderson’s sample, an astounding 66 per cent of those interviewed reported that ‘recent drug use’ contributed to the commission of the crime.

There are a number of other temporary states of mind that are likely to drive out rational considerations of punishment, such as desires for revenge or retaliation, and suddenly-induced rages or angers, the duration of which can extend from minutes to days. Other states of mind can be in place for longer durations and also can induce flawed reasoning. For instance, paranoia—feelings that others are immediate and overwhelming threats—is known to cycle over the course of months. When it is acute, it is likely that the degree of threat felt will override considerations of the deterrent weight of possible punishments. The grandiose component of manic-depression, which occurs when the manic-depressive cycles into the manic phase, can give the person experiencing it a feeling of incredible brilliance that is likely to cause him to underestimate the likelihood of the not-so-brilliant forces of law ever catching and convicting him.

Consider this picture of the effect of reduced probability of punishment in light of the known rates of arrest and conviction for various crimes. The overall average of conviction for criminal offences committed is 1.3 per cent ...

We suspect that most citizens would be shocked at how low the punishment rates are, which suggests that the perception of detection rates tends to be higher than the rates actually are. Luckily for deterrence, people tend to overestimate the occurrence of rare events. This error is useful because it is the perceived rate of punishment rather than the actual rate that counts for deterrent effect. Probably the best summary is that the average person's perception of punishment rates is low, but at least higher than the reality.

But, and again, the group of persons who are the most likely offenders—those who have already committed an offence will account for the majority of future crimes—have a greater incentive than other people to learn the actual punishment rates. Thus, the career criminals—just the persons at whom we would wish to aim our deterrent threat of punishment—are the persons most likely to realize how low the punishment rates really are and, therefore, to perceive a lower chance of punishment than non-crime prone people.

There is also some evidence that many offenders tend to overestimate their own ability to avoid the mistakes that have led to others like them being caught ...

The net effect is that most criminals do not think they will be caught and punished. In [one] study when asked about the risk of being caught, it was found that:

‘76 percent of active criminals and 89 percent of the most violent criminals either perceive no risk of apprehension or have no thought about the likely punishments for their crimes.’

[With regard to the amount of punishment affecting deterrence]: Potential offenders may come from social groups in which the threat of stigma for being convicted as a felon may not be as high as it is for other persons. In fact, for many offenders, conviction and imprisonment may lead to very little if any loss of status and respect in the communities within which they function. Similarly, it is likely that potential offenders as a group live a more deprived existence than the average person, and thus the threat of prison, with its provision for meals and shelter, is not so worse an alternative to their current existence as it would be for the more well-to-do person.

Our ultimate conclusion, which we think the evidence strongly supports, is that the threat of punishment amount under current practices is at best unpredictable and at worst unreliable in modulating the threatened amount of punishment.”

1-080

Research into the behaviour of criminals supports many of the points made in the preceding extract. For example, Gill’s research, based on interviews with commercial robbers, concluded that few of them thought there was a high chance of being caught. The less organised and amateurish robbers did not plan their crimes, acted impulsively and gave no thought to being caught or to the consequences of their actions. On the other hand, the more organised and professional robbers planned to minimise the risks and concluded there was a low chance of apprehension.¹²⁰ Wright and Decker’s American research into burglary found that most burglars in their sample perceived themselves, when committing the offence, to be “in a situation of immediate need” and “consciously refused to dwell on the possibility of getting caught”.¹²¹ Similar English research confirms that most burglars are not rational calculators but act on the spur-of-the-moment.¹²²

Research into the effectiveness of punishment as a deterrent also provides little support to advocates of deterrence theory. For instance, an international review of empirical evidence into marginal deterrence¹²³ by Doob and Webster found that “sentence severity has no effect on the level of crime in society”.¹²⁴ Even research into the use of most severe of punishments—that of the death penalty—has found no reliable evidence that it reduces homicide rates.¹²⁵ Moreover, a major Cambridge-based analysis of research asserted that increasing sentence severity could actually have “possible counterproductive effects relating to reduced differential disincentives against the most serious crimes of violence” and could cause “destigmatisation of punishment if severe sanctions are very widely employed”.¹²⁶

Moral objections to deterrence theory

1–081

In addition to the empirical objections to the effectiveness of punishment as a deterrent, there is the fundamental moral objection that deterrent sentencing involves using a person as a means to an end. Punishing people to deter others—rather than punishing them for what they have done—is not showing respect for their autonomy. If sentencing for deterrent reasons only, one becomes free to impose any sentence as long as it is felt to be an effective deterrent. In the past, this has led to the imposition of exemplary sentences. For example, exemplary sentences were imposed in the early 1970s to prevent the sudden increase of muggings of elderly people¹²⁷ and to contain football hooliganism in the late 1970s.¹²⁸ More recently, enhanced sentences were used for many of those convicted of offences during the 2011 London Riots in an attempt to deter future incidents of social unrest. In supporting the use of such sentences Lord Judge CJ in Blackshaw stated:

“Those who deliberately participate in disturbances of this magnitude, causing injury and damage and fear to even the most stout-hearted of citizens, and who individually commit further crimes during the course of the riots are committing aggravated crimes. They must be punished accordingly, and sentences should be designed to deter others from similar activity.”¹²⁹

However, over the past few decades there has been an increasing acceptance that such sentences are unjust:

“When you punish a man in terrorem, make of him an ‘example’ to others, you are admittedly using him as a means to an end: someone else’s end. This, in itself, would be a very wicked thing to do ... Why, in Heaven’s name, am I to be sacrificed to the good of society in this way?—unless, of course, I deserve it?”¹³⁰

1–082

As a consequence of research findings suggesting the ineffectiveness of deterrence and because of these principled objections, in the late 1980s deterrence, as a purpose of punishment, began to fall out of favour. The White Paper preceding the Criminal Justice Act 1991 concluded that

“it is unrealistic to construct sentencing arrangements on the assumption that most offenders will weigh up the possibilities in advance and base their conduct on rational calculation.”¹³¹

The 1991 Act followed this by outlawing exemplary sentences and, subject to exceptions, endorsing the concept of desert. However, since then much legislation,¹³² debate and rhetoric¹³³ about sentencing has been based on deterrence. This culminated in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.142 which expressly endorses deterrence as a one of the five purposes of punishment. During the 2000s, the proliferation of knife crime and the theft of lead both led the courts to impose longer sentences for the purposes of deterrence.¹³⁴ The Court of Appeal has, however, warned that sentencing judges should refer to statistics to support their view that a particular crime is prevalent, justifying the imposition of a longer sentence in the hope that the trend can be reversed.¹³⁵

Whatever the “evidence”, successive governments have believed (or think the electorate believe) in the effectiveness of punishment as a deterrent. It is unfortunate that such thinking is not informed by the distinction, referred to above, between absolute deterrence (few doubt that punishment in general does have a broad deterrent effect for at least some crimes) and marginal deterrence where evidence that increasing the severity of punishments has an increased deterrent effect is noticeably lacking.

3. Educative deterrence

1–083

Under the theory of general deterrence, a person who is contemplating committing a crime is deterred by the positive threat that he will suffer the same punishment as others have suffered. However, punishment can have a more profound subconscious effect on society. Over a period of time in the community, punishment of criminals builds up the habit of not breaking the law. It creates unconscious inhibitions against committing crimes and thus serves to educate the public as to the proper distinction between good and bad conduct. Every time someone is punished for theft the public morality that theft is wrong is strengthened and our habit of not stealing is reinforced. If suddenly nobody were to be punished for theft and this state of affairs were to endure for a considerable period of time, our inhibitions against stealing and our moral view that theft was wrong would start breaking down. The criminal law and the punishment that flows from breaking it, play an important role in supporting and shaping positive social mores. Take, for example, the banning of smoking in bars and restaurants in 2007 by the Health Act 2006. The ban quickly left smokers out in the cold, and within just a few years the social acceptability of smoking in public plummeted. Platt's longitudinal qualitative review of the impact of the legislation found that "there were shifts in attitudes from initial resentment to acceptance of the changes [to] a growing perception of the personal, health and environmental benefits of smoke free".¹³⁶

The introduction of hate crime offences (examined later in Ch.7) in the latter part of the 20th century can also be said to be an attempt to change attitudes through targeted criminalisation; in this case challenging pervasive identity-based prejudices. These new aggravated offences carry enhanced penalties where an offender is motivated, or where he demonstrates, racial or religious hostility during the commission of an offence. Over a period of time, the acceptability of public displays of such hostilities, it is argued, will be reduced as the unacceptability of such behaviours begins to penetrate the public conscience.¹³⁷ If this is true, the role of deterrence may in fact prove to be a powerful means of social control.

A. E. BOTTOMS, “MORALITY, CRIME, COMPLIANCE AND PUBLIC POLICY”
IN A. E. BOTTOMS AND M. TONRY, IDEOLOGY, CRIME AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE (2002), P.25:

1–084

“[I]n a more differentiated society rather than prohibitions arising out of positive morality, they may on occasion not reflect positive morality at all, but rather may be imposed by those in power in the hope of securing obedience through deterrent calculation. Even in such a case, however, sometimes (though not always) the fact of the prohibition, and citizens’ evolving response to it, can influence the development of a new strand of positive morality. Something very like this seems to have occurred in relation to drinking and driving: in Britain there is now substantially greater moral disapproval of such behaviour than was the case thirty or so years ago when it was first made a criminal offence.”¹³⁸

J. ANDENAES, “GENERAL
PREVENTION” (1952) 43 J. CRIM. L., C. & P.S. 176, 179–181:

1–085

“Later theory puts much stress on the ability of penal law to arouse or strengthen inhibitions of another sort. In Swedish discussion the moralising—in other words the educational—function has been greatly stressed. The idea is that punishment as a concrete expression of society’s disapproval of an act helps to form and to strengthen the public’s moral code and thereby creates conscious and unconscious inhibitions against committing crime. Unconscious inhibitions against committing forbidden acts can also be aroused without appealing to the individual's concepts of morality. Purely as a matter of habit, with fear, respect for authority or social imitation as connecting links, it is possible to induce favourable attitudes toward this or that action and unfavourable attitudes toward another action. We find the clearest example of this in the military, where extended inculcation of discipline and stern reaction against breach thereof can induce a purely automatic, habitual response—not only where obeying specific orders is concerned, but also with regard to general orders and regulations ...

... To the lawmaker, the achievement of inhibition and habit is of greater value than mere deterrence. For these apply in cases where a person need not fear detection and punishment, and they can apply without the person even having knowledge of the legal prohibition.”

JOHN BRAITHWAITE, CRIME, SHAME
AND REINTEGRATION (1989), PP.77– 79:

1-086

“Community-wide shaming is necessary because most crimes are not experienced within the average household. Children need to learn about the evil of murder, rape, car theft, and environmental pollution offenses through condemnation of the local butcher or the far away image on the television screen ...

Essentially, societal processes of shaming do three things:

1. They give content to a day-to-day socialization of children which occurs mainly through induction. As we have just seen, shaming supplies the morals which build consciences. The evil of acts beyond the immediate experience of children is more effectively communicated by shaming than by pure reasoning.
2. Societal incidents of shaming remind parents of the wide range of evils about which they must moralize with their children. Parents do not have to keep a checklist of crimes, a curriculum of sins, to discuss with their offspring. In a society where shaming is important, societal incidents of shaming will trigger vicarious shaming within the family so that the criminal code is eventually more or less automatically covered. Of course societies which shame only half-heartedly run a risk that the full curriculum of crimes will not be covered. Both this point and the last one could be summarized in another way by saying that public shaming puts pressure on parents, teachers and neighbours to ensure that they engage in private shaming which is sufficiently systematic.

3. Societal shaming in considerable measure takes over from parental socialization once children move away from the influence of the family and the school. Put another way, shaming generalizes beyond childhood principles learnt during the early years of life.

This third principle is about the ‘criminal law as a moral eye-opener’ as Andenaes calls it. As a child, I may have learnt the principle that killing is wrong, but when I leave the familiar surroundings of the family to work in the unfamiliar environment of a nuclear power plant, I am taught by a nuclear safety regulatory system that to breach certain safety laws can cost lives, and so persons who breach them are treated with a comparable level of shame. The principle that illegal killing is shameful is generalized. To the extent that genuine shame is not directed against those who defy the safety rules, however, I am liable to take them much less seriously. Unfortunately, societal shaming processes often do fail to generalize to organizational crime.

Recent years in some Western societies have seen more effective shaming directed at certain kinds of offenses—drunk driving, occupational health and safety and environmental offenses, and political corruption, for example. This shaming has for many adults integrated new categories of wrongdoing (for which they had not been socialized as children) into the moral frameworks pre-existing from their childhood.

While most citizens are aware of the content of most criminal laws, knowledge of what the law requires of citizens in detail can be enhanced by cases of public shaming. Through shaming directed at new legal frontiers, feminists in many countries have clarified for citizens just what sexual harassment, rape within marriage, and employment discrimination mean. Social change is increasingly rapid, particularly in the face of burgeoning technologies which require new moralities of nuclear, environmental and consumer safety, responsible use of new technologies of information exchange and electronic funds transfer, ethical exploitation of new institutions such as futures exchanges, and so on. Shaming is thus particularly vital in sustaining a contemporarily relevant legal and moral order.”

1-087

In the US, these ideas have been pushed to the limit by the introduction of “shaming penalties”. For example, persons convicted of drunken driving have been required to put special bumper stickers on their cars,¹³⁹ or wear a pink fluorescent bracelet,¹⁴⁰ publicising their conviction. One woman was made to place an advertisement in her local paper stating that she bought drugs in front of her children.¹⁴¹

This theory should be contrasted with the retributive theory of denunciation. The theories are similar in that punishment, under both theories, is performing a symbolic, expressive function—but there is an important difference between them. The idea of denunciation, as with all retributive theories, is not concerned with the effects of punishment. It is not a forward-looking theory aimed at preventing crime. Rather, it is concerned with the relation of the punishment to the past event, the crime. It is concerned that there be a relationship between the gravity of the offence and the degree of censure or denunciation. The educative theory, on the other hand, is exclusively forward looking, as are all deterrent theories. Punishment is used as a means of preventing crime and maintaining obedience to the law.

The educative theory rests upon an important premise, namely, that public morality and inhibitions against committing crimes are created and/or preserved by the regular punishment of others. This is a difficult premise to test although some research suggests a clear link between criminality and moral assessments of behaviour. For instance, Kaufmann asked a group of subjects to evaluate the morality of certain behaviour (failing to rescue a drowning man). Some subjects were told that this behaviour was criminal; others were told that there was no duty to rescue. The former group judged the inaction more harshly than the latter group.¹⁴² Similarly, Walker and Marsh discovered that subjects stated that their disapproval of not wearing a seatbelt would increase when this became an offence.¹⁴³ Clearly most laws are designed to have some symbolic or expressive function. The point asserted here (and so difficult to validate—although one’s intuitions do indicate some plausibility to the claim) is that punishment (or at least the real possibility thereof) pursuant to criminal liability is what gives the law its sting.¹⁴⁴

C. INCAPACITATION

1–088

There are two types of incapacitation: collective and selective. Collective incapacitation refers to a strategy of incapacitating large numbers of “would be” offenders in order to decrease crime levels overall. Selective incapacitation aims to identify and incapacitate certain types of offenders who are most likely to re-offend. This approach entails determining which offenders are the most dangerous. This is normally done by looking at a person’s past behaviours and predicting whether he is likely to re-offend. In the case of Sargent,¹⁴⁵ Lawton LJ acknowledged:

“that there are some offenders for whom neither deterrence nor rehabilitation works. They will go on committing crimes as long as they are able to do so. In those cases the only protection which the public has is that such persons should be locked up for a long period.”

Such protective sentencing aims to render the criminal incapable of committing more crimes; it thus “incapacitates” the offender. The particular punishment chosen at one stage in our penal history might have been the death penalty, severance of limbs or deportation to a colony. Today it is likely to be imprisonment, although other community measures such as a curfew order or disqualification from driving can also be viewed as incapacitative sentences. In countries such as France, Sweden, Denmark and Poland, and in some states in the US, chemical castration can be used to incapacitate sex offenders, although some of these jurisdictions require the offender to consent to the procedure.¹⁴⁶ The real hallmark of an incapacitative sentence, however, is that it is likely to be longer or more severe than that which would normally be imposed for the offence.

There is much public support for the view that there are cases where society needs protection¹⁴⁷ and that it is permissible to incarcerate dangerous offenders who pose a threat to society for longer than non-dangerous offenders committing the same offence. Further, research has revealed that a significant amount of crime is being committed by relatively few persons, for example those on bail, and so “a policy of selective incapacitation aimed at such ‘career criminals’ promises a high yield of crime prevention for a low investment of resources”.¹⁴⁸

There are, however, significant objections to incapacitative sentencing. First, such a practice can only be justified (if at all) if predictions of dangerousness are accurate.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, “PREDICTION OF CRIMINAL CONDUCT AND PREVENTIVE CONFINEMENT OF CONVICTED PERSONS” (1972) 21
BUFFALO L. REV. 717, 735–736:

1–089

“What makes violence so particularly difficult to predict is not merely its rarity, but its situational quality. Deterministic models to the contrary notwithstanding, violence generally is not a quality which inheres in certain ‘dangerous’ individuals: it is an occurrence which may erupt—or may not—in certain crisis situations. Whether it does erupt, whether it is reported, whether the perpetrator is apprehended and punished depends upon a wide variety of fortuitous circumstances, largely beyond the actor’s control. Not only the actor’s proclivities, but the decisions of other individuals—the victim, the bystanders, the police, the magistrate—may determine whether an act of violence occurs and whether it comes to be included in the criminal statistics.”

1–090

The substantial literature that has developed on the subject of prediction is in broad agreement that for every three persons predicted to commit violent offences, only one will do so. It has become common to refer to those who do not reoffend as “false positives” and for most commentators this is taken to mean that a false prediction of dangerousness was made. However, that view has been challenged by Norval Morris. He argues that if an unexploded bomb were found in the early post-war days in London and then safely defused no-one would talk about it subsequently as if it had not been dangerous simply because it had not caused any damage. He thinks there is no difference in principle between the analogy of the bomb and dangerous people: “In sum, that the person predicted as dangerous does no future injury does not mean that the classification was erroneous”.¹⁴⁹

NIGEL WALKER, PUNISHMENT, DANGER AND STIGMA (1980), PP.98– 99:

1–091

“[In challenging the anti-protectionist’s view] ... let us accept that in our present state of partial ignorance any labelling of the individual as a future perpetrator of violence is going to be mistaken in the majority of cases. Does it follow that it is wrong to apply this label? Only if we swallow two assumptions. One is that it is morally wrong to make mistakes of this kind. Everyone would agree that it is regrettable; but if the decision is taken with good intentions, and one has done one’s best, with the available information, to minimise the percentage of mistaken detentions, is it morally wrong? Only if we swallow the second assumption—namely the anti-protectionist’s insistence that our overriding objective must be to minimise the total number of mistaken decisions, treating a mistaken decision to detain as exactly equal to a mistaken decision to release. The anti-protectionist is using two neat rhetorical tricks at once. By referring to mistaken detentions and mistaken releases simply as ‘mistakes,’ he is implying that they all count the same; and by glossing over the difference between ‘regrettable’ and ‘morally wrong,’ he is implying that it is our moral duty to go for the smallest number of mistakes irrespective of their nature.

To put this point in concrete terms, suppose that you have in custody three men who have done serious violence to more or less innocent victims. Suppose too that the best actuarial information you can get tells you that one of them—but not which one—will do more violence if released. The anti-protectionist is saying that it is your moral duty to release all three instead of continuing to detain all three because release will involve only one mistaken decision instead of two mistaken decisions. Yet the one mistaken release would mean injury or death to someone, while the two mistaken detentions would mean something quite different: the continued deprivation of freedom for three men of whom an unidentifiable two would not do anybody injury if released.”¹⁵⁰

1–092

Most other commentators, however, have greater difficulty justifying the continued incarceration of offenders when predictions are so inaccurate and when many of the most useful predictors are controversial. Beyond the obvious factors of number and type of previous convictions, other considerations might be indicative of future offending. However, to include predictors such as sex, race, age, intelligence, educational attainments etc would be unacceptable as “factors which are beyond the offender’s control and not logically related to culpability”.¹⁵¹

The second central objection to incapacitative sentences is that, even if predictions were accurate, it is wrong in principle to punish someone for what they might do in the future. Such a practice amounts to a radical departure from the constraints of just deserts under which punishment should be proportionate to the seriousness of the current offence committed.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, PAST OR FUTURE CRIMES (1985), P.11:

1–093

“Advocates of the desert model opposed the use of individual prediction in sentencing as a matter of principle, not merely because of such forecasts' tendency to error. Their objection to predictive sentencing was simply that it led to undeserved punishments and would do so even if the false-positive rate could be reduced. The use of predictions, accurate or not, meant that those identified as future recidivists would be treated more severely than those not so identified, not because of differences in the blameworthiness of their past conduct, but because of crimes they supposedly would commit in future. It was felt that punishment, as a blaming institution, was warranted only for past culpable choices and could not justly be levied for future conduct. Unless the person actually made the wrongful choice he was predicted to make, he ought not to be condemned for that choice—and hence should not suffer punishment for it.”

1-094

Most commonly, predictions of dangerousness are based on previous convictions (along, often, with psychiatric reports). The objection to this is that the offender has already been punished for the past crimes and so this amounts to punishing them again for these offences.

For some, the need to protect the public outweighs such objections. The Floud Report on Dangerous Offenders¹⁵² took it “as axiomatic that the public is entitled to the protection of a special sentence”¹⁵³ against grave harm and recommended a special sentencing framework of sentencing for dangerous offenders. This was done by a utilitarian balancing of risks argument: the harm done to the convicted offender in being punished longer than is deserved is outweighed by the prospect of harm done to the public should the offender be released at an earlier time. In short, where there is a risk of grave harm to potential victims, the rights of such victims should prevail over the rights of a convicted offender. To make such arguments, however, is to enter onto a slippery slope in terms of due process and the criminal law.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH AND ANDREW ASHWORTH, “EXTENDING SENTENCES FOR DANGEROUSNESS: REFLECTIONS ON THE BOTTOMS-BROWNSWORD

MODEL” IN A. VON HIRSCH, A.
ASHWORTH AND J. ROBERTS (EDS)
PRINCIPLED SENTENCING, 3rd EDN
(2009), PP.86–87:

1–095

“To view the state’s law-enforcement duties as ‘rights’ which victims hold against the state—which may then be ‘balanced’ against the offender’s moral entitlement not to be treated unfairly—would reduce the entire analysis into a form of cost-benefit reckoning. An offender’s entitlement to fair treatment then could readily be ‘trumped’ by crime-prevention concerns, because these now could be redenominated as purported ‘rights’ of potential victims. It could be argued, for example, that the proof-beyond-reasonable-doubt standard in criminal trials be diluted—because this might promote a victim’s ‘right’ not to be victimised by actually guilty individuals who could be acquitted under the higher standard and might go out to commit further crimes. It ought not be permissible to dilute important requirements of fairness so easily.”

1–096

It is, however, possible to justify attaching weight to previous convictions within a retributive framework. There are two views here that are employed by just deserts theorists. First, under the principle of “cumulative sentencing”, persistent offenders can be regarded as more blameworthy because they have failed to learn lessons from previous convictions and ensuing punishments. They have persisted in criminal behaviour after being specifically warned and punished. Under this view, there should be no ceiling to the possible punishment. With each repeated defiance of the law, the offender is more blameworthy and deserving of greater punishment. Roberts compares recidivist offending with premeditated offending.

JULIAN V. ROBERTS, “REVISITING THE RECIDIVIST SENTENCING

PREMIUM”, IN A. VON HIRSCH, A. ASHWORTH AND J. ROBERTS (EDS), PRINCIPLED SENTENCING, 3rd EDN (2009), PP.153–154, 157:

1–097

“The existence of a number of prior convictions changes our evaluation of the mental state of the offender at the time of the commission of the crime. He or she approaches the fresh offence having been charged, convicted and sentenced, possibly on many occasions. Awareness of this previous legal censure should recall the individual to respect the law; the offender who reoffends is therefore similar to the offender who plans the offence. Both are worthy of a greater degree of moral reprobation to reflect their enhanced level of culpability. The conduct of the premeditated offender and the repeat offender both represent a more marked departure from acceptable conduct.

...

To conclude, although previous convictions are excluded from a consideration of the seriousness of the offence, they should enter the sentencing equation through the determination of the offender’s level of culpability. It is patently unreasonable to ignore a characteristic such as previous offending that practitioners, victims, offenders and the community regard as highly relevant to the determination of sentence. The best solution to this stand-off between theory and practice involves recognising the relevance of previous convictions to offender blameworthiness (and consequently sentence severity), and then constraining their influence on the determination of sentence.”

An alternative way of justifying, in terms of desert, extra weight attaching to previous convictions is the theory of “progressive loss of mitigation”.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, SENTENCING AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE, 6th EDN (2015), PP.211–212:

“The argument ... is based on the idea of a lapse and tolerance ... [and] the idea of giving someone a ‘second chance’. So the justification for the discount for first offenders rests partly on recognition of human fallibility, and partly on respect for people’s ability to respond to the censure expressed in the sentence. The justification for the gradual losing of that mitigation on second and third convictions is that the ‘second chance’ has been given and not taken: the offender ought to forfeit the tolerance, and its associated sentence discount, because the subsequent criminal choices show insufficient response to the public censure. In principle, therefore, the second offence deserves greater censure than the first ... and the third offence may be censured fully.”

While this latter theory has its attractions, it is unlikely to be politically acceptable as it would involve treating an offender with 30 previous convictions the same as one with three or four convictions. Indeed, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 prefers the “cumulative sentencing” approach to the “progressive loss of mitigation” model. Section 143(2) provides that all related, recent previous convictions must be treated as aggravating factors in assessing the seriousness of the current offence.¹⁵⁴

The danger of this whole approach is that these theories can be seized upon as providing an intellectual justification for increasing sentencing severity within a desert framework when in reality, the previous convictions are simply being used as predictors of future reoffending or dangerousness. For example, the Halliday Report endorsed the notion that persons with previous convictions deserve, in retributive terms, greater punishment but then added that this “coincidentally” enabled the risk of reoffending to be taken into account. The Report then suggested that levels of punishment could be adjusted up or down by “plus or minus 100 per cent”.¹⁵⁵ Such an approach is not compatible with any desert-based theory permitting weight to be attached to previous convictions.

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 states that one of the purposes of sentencing is “the protection of the public”.¹⁵⁶ Sections 224–236 set out the key provisions for sentencing “dangerous offenders”.

Prior to 2012, the courts could impose a sentence of imprisonment based on the grounds of public protection (commonly referred to as IPPs).¹⁵⁷ These indeterminate sentences included a set minimum term after which release depended on the Parole Board's judgement that it was safe to release the offender. The indefinite nature of IPPs meant that they were highly controversial instruments of the law and after much resistance from human rights advocates they were subsequently repealed by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012.¹⁵⁸ However the Act is not retrospective, meaning that thousands of prisoners already serving IPPs continue to be imprisoned for an indefinite period of time. In Roberts,¹⁵⁹ 13 prisoners appealed to the Court of Appeal on the basis that the court should reconsider the assessments made by sentencing judges (made between 2005–2008) in light of changes to the law and that a term of imprisonment had been reached¹⁶⁰ that was so excessive and disproportionate that it amounted to inhumane treatment under the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms art.3, or that it amounted to arbitrary detention under art.5. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal noting that rectification of any injustice in the operation of the appellants' sentences was a matter for the Parole Board, and any further changes to the regime of IPPs to rectify any unfairness (especially in relation to the scope for rehabilitation) was a matter for Parliament to consider.

1–100

While the repeal of indeterminate sentences is to be welcomed there remains essentially two “tough” determinate sentences for offenders classified as “dangerous”. First, a sentence of life imprisonment must be imposed if the offender has committed a “serious offence”¹⁶¹ carrying a maximum of life imprisonment and “the court considers that the seriousness of the offence [or offences] ... justify the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment for life”.¹⁶² Secondly, an extended sentence may be imposed where a “specified offence”¹⁶³ has been committed. This involves the offender serving the deserved sentence plus an “extension period” during which the offender is subject to licence.¹⁶⁴

These provisions depend on a risk assessment that the offender is dangerous. The court must be of the opinion that there is a “significant risk to members of the public of serious harm occasioned by the commission by him of further specified offences”.¹⁶⁵ The Criminal Justice Act 2003 introduced a presumption of dangerousness if the offender had one previous conviction for a specified offence (a provision akin to the “three strikes and you’re out” legislation found in many states in the US). However, recent changes to the Act¹⁶⁶ have moved away from a presumption of dangerousness, with the courts endorsing the view that imprisonment for public protection should be seen as a last resort.¹⁶⁷ Although this change in approach is to be welcomed it is still the case that these provisions relating to dangerous offenders, taken as a whole, are deeply disturbing. As suggested earlier in this section, they breach a fundamental principle of justice in that offenders are receiving sentences longer than they deserve. If this were justifiable (which we doubt), it could only be on the basis that there is a reliable prediction that the offender presents a “vivid danger”¹⁶⁸ to others. As seen, there is no empirical evidence suggesting that such reliable predictions can be made. Previous convictions, pre-sentence and psychiatric reports provide no firm basis for concluding that a person is so dangerous as to justify an incapacitative sentence.

D. REHABILITATION

1–101

Punishment with the aim of reforming or rehabilitating the offender has constituted one of the most ambitious developments in penal theory. The aim is to secure conformity, not through threat (which is the more limited object of deterrence) but through some inner positive motivation on the part of the individual. The process has been described as “improving [the offender’s] ... character so that he is less often inclined to commit offences again even when he can do so without fear of the penalty”.¹⁶⁹ The source of the change in motivation or improvement in behaviour has been variously described but remains one of the ambiguities of the concept of reform.

The origins of the rehabilitative ideal are inextricably linked with the humanitarian movement for prison reform and many who defend the ideal stress the importance of offender welfare. Advocates of rehabilitation asserted that a more humane response to criminality would help to soften strict “law and order” attitudes.¹⁷⁰ The great penal reformers of the 18th century, Beccaria, Bentham, Eden and Romilly, all supported a system of punishment which combined deterrent with rehabilitative features. It was their belief, however, that rehabilitation could come from punishment itself—by, for example, a period of solitude which would induce remorse, repentance and, in turn, reform. Indeed, the first penitentiary in the US was created by the Quakers in Philadelphia in 1793 in order that prisoners could pay “penance” for their sins and thereby become “cleansed”.¹⁷¹ The object was to make offenders “better persons” capable of being reintegrated into society (rather than simply purging their sins and thereby repaying their debt to society, which is the more limited object of expiation). When, towards the end of the 19th century the aim of rehabilitation became (with deterrence) part of official penal policy in this country, there was more than an element of this thinking present in the measures taken.

Whilst it soon became clear that, far from making “better individuals”, solitude had a severely damaging impact upon offenders, the belief that reform should be a concomitant of punishment continued to hold sway for the first half of the 20th century at least. The moral or religious exhortations to improve were gradually replaced by the behavioural sciences and medicine. In the post-war period, criminality came to be viewed as an illness that was caused by psychiatric, psychological and social conditions. As more was learned about the antecedents of human conduct it was hoped that therapeutic measures could be designed which would reform the offender’s behaviour.

H. WEIHOFEN, “RETRIBUTION IS OBSOLETE,” NATIONAL PROBATION AND PAROLE ASSOCIATION NEWS,
XXXIX (1960) 1, 4:

“Crime and criminal responsibility are not mere interesting abstractions for the amusement of philosophers dreaming up metaphysical constructs. Crime is a reality, an ever present danger which in some cases is literally a matter of life and death.

The voices of ignorance and hate are loud enough now to shout down almost every effort to improve criminal administration by substituting rational for irrational solutions, a rehabilitative for a punitive approach. The rationale of these programs calls for understanding the sociological, economic and cultural sources of criminality, the psychology of criminals and our reactions to criminality. This is too sophisticated for the single-minded devotees of punishment ...

I resent the apostles of punishment-for-its-own-sake arrogating to themselves words like ‘moral’ and ‘justice’ and implying in consequence that those who scorn their metaphysics are amoral or at least unconcerned with moral values. Surely the feeling of concern for the offender as a human being; the desire to save him from a criminal career and to help him redeem himself as a member of the human family; the even wider concern to prevent others from falling into criminality by searching out the influences and conditions that produce those frustrating and embittering defeats, degradations and humiliations of the human spirit that turn a man against his fellow men; the effort, therefore, to give men those advantages that will help them to keep their feet on the right path—better education, more healthful dwellings, readier aid for casualties of sickness, accident and failures of employment—surely all of this is not a less moral ideal than that which knows only one measure of morality, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

Half a century ago, Winston Churchill said, in the House of Commons:

‘The mood and temper of the public with regard to the treatment of crime and criminals is one of the most unfailing tests of the civilisation of any country. A calm, dispassionate recognition of the rights of the accused, and even of the convicted criminal against the State—a constant heart searching by all charged with the duty of punishment—a desire and eagerness to rehabilitate in the world of industry those who have paid their due in the hard coinage of punishment: tireless efforts towards the discovery of curative and regenerative processes: unfailing faith that there is a treasure, if you can only find it, in the heart of every man. These are the symbols which, in the treatment of crime and criminals mark and measure the stored-up strength of a nation.’

Yes; and I would add, these are the sign and proof of its morality.”

1-103

Rehabilitative sentencing involves a focus on the individual offender’s needs ensuring that the sentence, or programme within a sentence, will help change the offender’s behaviour, attitude and responses. A number of non-custodial measures were introduced in the 1960s and 1970s, such as community service orders, about which rehabilitative claims were made—although the introduction of such measures was perhaps more influenced by a desire to reduce the prison population.

However, despite the attractiveness of the idea of rehabilitating offenders so that they would not wish to reoffend, the 1970s saw a major decline in the rehabilitative ideal. As can be seen from the following extracts, criticism has taken many forms. The gist of the case against the rehabilitative ideal is as follows. First, it is highly interventionist and paternalistic, ultimately giving the State the power to try to alter the character and personality of the offender. Apart from raising images of a “Clockwork Orange” society and presenting grave human rights concerns, it also means that judges, who are trained in law and not psychiatry, are not the most appropriate persons to carry out the task of sentencing. This would be best left to “experts” (psychiatrists etc). Such ideas were condemned as removing the requirement of justice from sentencing.

The second casualty of the rehabilitative ideal is proportionality. Instead of looking to the past—to the offence committed—the sentencer is only concerned with the future needs of the offender. The sentence should be chosen which has the best chance of bringing about the desired change; thus the principle of treating like cases in a like manner has little part to play. Proportionality links punishment to the seriousness of the offence whereas under the rehabilitative ideal there are few like cases. There ought, in theory at least, to be complete individualisation of sentences—the sentences should depend, not on the offence, but on the offender. This, of course, inevitably leads to widespread sentencing disparity which breaches a fundamental principle of justice that people be accorded equal treatment before the law. It also leads in some cases to excessively long sentences being passed to allow time for rehabilitation.¹⁷²

Finally, research began to question whether rehabilitative programmes actually work. In an influential article in 1974, Martinson concluded that “with few and isolated exceptions, the rehabilitative efforts that have been reported so far have had no appreciable effect on recidivism”.¹⁷³ Initially such attacks were deflected by the argument that the criminal justice system was not truly committed to rehabilitation; often it was sacrificed completely to other competing ideals (such as deterrence), or that appropriate means had yet to be found to have the desired impact upon the defendant.

Whether rehabilitation has been successful is normally measured by studies of recidivism, few of which lent much support to the idea that rehabilitation works for the majority of offenders. However, there were some studies concentrating on treatment strategies for specific categories of offenders which revealed some success and, indeed, Martinson wrote an article in 1979 in which he partially recanted on his earlier views.¹⁷⁴ Nevertheless, the notion that “nothing works” had entered the psyche of penologists and that, coupled with ethical concerns about the treatment model, led to a demand that punishment be more firmly linked to just deserts.

A. E. BOTTOMS, “AN INTRODUCTION TO ‘THE COMING CRISIS’” IN A. E. BOTTOMS AND R. H. PRESTON, THE COMING PENAL CRISIS (1980), PP.1–3:

1–104

“First, and the dominant factor in much current penal consideration, comes the collapse of the rehabilitative ideal ... A succession of negative research reports has—with a few exceptions which do not seriously disturb the conclusion—suggested that different types of treatment make little or no difference to the subsequent reconviction rates of offenders ... As the Serota Report (ACPS 1977) succinctly put it:

‘A steadily accumulating volume of research has shown that, if reconviction rates are used to measure the success or failure of sentencing policy, there is virtually nothing to choose between different lengths of custodial sentence, different types of institutional regime, and even between custodial and non-custodial treatment; (para.8).’

But the objections to the treatment (or rehabilitation) ethic have not been solely based on empirical demonstrations of lack of efficacy. Strong theoretical objections have also been raised, perhaps most influentially in the American Friends Service Committee’s (1971) Struggle for Justice, which argued that there was:

‘compelling evidence that the individualised-treatment model, the ideal towards which reformers have been urging us for at least a century, is theoretically faulty, systematically discriminatory in application, and inconsistent with some of our most basic concepts of justice (p.12).’

What lies behind these claims?

- (i) ‘Theoretically faulty’—because, it can be claimed, the treatment model implies that criminal behaviour has its roots in the deficiencies of the individual and his upbringing, and that if these are remedied, the crime rate will be cut; but this medical analogy is inappropriate, and crime is far more a result of the overall organization of society than of the deficiencies of the individual.
- (ii) ‘Systematically discriminatory’—because the treatment model typically takes more severe coercive action in cases of ‘unsatisfactory’ home circumstances or ‘dubious’ moral background; but these judgments are made by middle-class workers who unwittingly but systematically discriminate against the poor and the disadvantaged, and in favour of the ‘good’ homes of the privileged.
- (iii) ‘Inconsistent with justice’—because judgments involving the liberty of the individual are made (in the name of ‘casework’ or whatever) on the basis of extremely impressionistic evidence which is usually not revealed to the offender, and which he cannot therefore challenge; and the result may be, for example, that some will serve long sentences for trivial crimes because their 'attitudes have not improved,' while others convicted of serious crime but who have allegedly 'responded' are let out.

Underneath criticisms like these, it will be noted, lies a fundamental conviction by the critics as to the essentially coercive nature of the rehabilitative ideal ... Many adherents of the ideal blinded themselves as to this coerciveness, in the false belief that benevolent intentions preclude a coercive result."

M. COHEN, "MORAL ASPECTS OF THE CRIMINAL LAW" (1940) 49 YALE L.J.
987, 1012–1014:

1–105

"The growing belief in education and in the healing powers of medicine encourages people to suppose that the delinquent may be re-educated to become a useful member of society. Even from the strictest economic point of view, individual men and women are the most valuable assets of any society. Is it not better to save them for a life of usefulness rather than punish them by imprisonment which generally makes them worse after they leave than before they entered?

There are, however, a number of highly questionable assumptions back of this theory which need to be critically examined.

We have already had occasion to question the assumption that crime is a physical or mental disease. We may now raise the question whether it is curable and if so at what cost to society? Benevolent social reformers are apt to ignore the amount of cold calculating business shrewdness among criminals. Some hot-blooded ones may respond to emotional appeal; but they are also likely to back-slide when opportunity or temptation comes along. Human beings are not putty that can be remolded at will by benevolent intentions ... The analogy of the criminal law to medicine breaks down. The surgeon can determine with a fair degree of accuracy when there is an inflamed appendix or cancerous growth, so that by cutting it out he can remove a definite cause of distress. Is there in the complex of our social system any one cause of crime which any social physician can as readily remove on the basis of similarly verifiable knowledge?

Let us abandon the light-hearted pretension that any of us know how all cases of criminality can be readily cured, and ask the more modest and serious question: to what can criminals be re-educated or re-conditioned so that they can live useful lives? It would indeed be illiberal dogmatism to deny all possibility and desirability of effort along this line. Yet we must keep in mind our human limitations.

If the causes of crime are determined by the life of certain groups, it is foolish to deal with the individual as if he were a self-sufficient and self-determining system. We must deal with the whole group to which he naturally belongs or gravitates and which determines his morale. Otherwise we have to adapt him completely to some other group or social condition, which is indeed a very difficult problem in social engineering.

And here we must not neglect the question of cost. When we refer to any measure as impracticable, we generally mean that the cost is too great. There is doubtless a tremendous expense in maintaining our present system of punishment. But this expense is not unlimited. Suppose that fiendish perpetrators of horrible crimes on children could be reformed by being sent first for several years to a special hospital. Will people vote large funds for such purposes when honest law-abiding citizens so oft en cannot get adequate hospital facilities?"

C. S. LEWIS, "THE HUMANITARIAN
THEORY OF PUNISHMENT" (1953) VI
RES JUDICATAE 224:

1-106

"[O]nly the psychotherapist can tell us what is likely to cure. It will be in vain for the rest of us, speaking simply as men, to say, 'but this punishment is hideously unjust, hideously disproportionate to the criminal's deserts.' The experts with perfect logic will reply 'but nobody was talking about deserts. No one was talking about punishment in your archaic vindictive sense of the word ... Here are the statistics proving that this other treatment cures. What is your trouble?’ ...

To be ‘cured’ against one’s will and cured of states which we may not regard as a disease is to be put on a level with those who have not yet reached the age of reason or those who never will: to be classed with infants, imbeciles, and domestic animals. But to be punished however severely, because we have deserved it, because we ‘ought to have known better,’ is to be treated as a human person.”

1-107

Von Hirsch has suggested that much of the true appeal of rehabilitative ideology lies in the fact that its advocates were able both to have their cake and eat it:

“[I]t offered both therapy and restraint. One did not have to assume that all criminals were redeemable but could merely hope that some might be. Therapy could be tried on apparently amenable defendants, but always with a fail-safe: the offender who seemed unsuitable for, or unresponsive to, treatment could be separated from the community.”¹⁷⁵

Despite these concerns, the rehabilitative ideal has undergone something of a revival over the last two decades with the catchphrase “what works” replacing the gloom of “nothing works” that had dominated the previous decade.¹⁷⁶ Various programmes have been introduced for offenders who have received both custodial and non-custodial sentences. Apart from drug and alcohol programmes, there has been a growing implementation of cognitive-behavioural programmes: these focus on training offenders in decision-making and problem-solving, management of emotions (such as anger-management), negotiation skills and critical reasoning with offenders being encouraged to reflect on the consequences of their actions. Programmes also include various educational and life-skills courses, such as ones aimed at improving literacy and numeracy, designed to improve offenders’ chances of employment. New statistical techniques of meta-analysis (aggregating findings from a number of smaller studies) have been employed and are revealing some success for these programmes particularly in relation to certain types of offenders.¹⁷⁷ For example, in the US, a number of different programmes of varying effectiveness are used in dealing with drug offenders.

PAUL H. ROBINSON, DISTRIBUTIVE PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LAW: WHO SHOULD BE PUNISHED AND HOW MUCH? (OXFORD, 2008), PP.103–105:

1–108

“Prisoners incarcerated for drug offenses represent a large proportion of all inmates ... Drug use is also linked to the commission of violent crimes, property crimes, and public disorder offenses ... Given the implications of drug use and dependency, successful drug rehabilitation programs could offer the hope of significantly reducing recidivism (and, if extended to potential offenders, might avoid the original offending).

Programs for persons coping with addiction include among others: drug courts, pharmacological treatment, outpatient drug treatment, residential drug treatment, and prison-based therapeutic community treatment.

...

Perhaps the most promising response to ending drug use and related criminality is the therapeutic community approach. This model functions by establishing a ‘community’ to help individuals overcome substance abuse. Treatment generally occurs in stages at a drug-free residential facility, with an emphasis on both the use of group therapy and individual self-help. The principle is to use the peer-reinforcement power of the community of individuals in recovery as well as that of staff to facilitate the learning and assimilation of substance-free social norms. In the prison setting, the therapeutic community approach begins with removing participants from the general prison population to undergo intensive addiction therapy. Ideally, the in-prison treatment is followed by therapy coupled with work release in the transitional, pre-release phase, and then monitoring and therapy in the post-release after-release phase. A best-practice model established in Delaware found significant improvements in both the likelihood of being drug free and re-arrest free after five years for those who completed a therapeutic community program ... Even with the positive outcomes, however, nearly 50 per cent of the aftercare group would be expected to be rearrested within five years, but this is compared with nearly 75 per cent of those receiving no treatment. Thus, while reductions in recidivism can be achieved, the recidivism rates for such offenders remain high.”

1-109

In the UK, there has been a greater commitment to evidence-based initiatives and research during the 2000s. In 2001, The Halliday Report strongly endorsed the “What Works” strategies and programmes and estimated that they could lead to a reduction in the overall reconviction rate of 5 to 15% on the basis that “some things can work for some people, provided the right programmes are selected and implemented properly”.¹⁷⁸

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 expressly states that one of the purposes of sentencing is “the reform and rehabilitation of offenders”.¹⁷⁹ When a community sentence is passed, a range of “requirements” may be made as a community order: for example an unpaid work requirement, a drug rehabilitation requirement or a supervision requirement.¹⁸⁰ Such requirements must be tailored to ensure they are the “most suitable for the offender”.¹⁸¹ However, such rehabilitative sentences may only be imposed within the confines of the just deserts principle of proportionality on the basis that the offence is “serious enough to warrant such a sentence”.¹⁸² More recently the legislation has been amended so as to “include in the order at least one requirement imposed for the purpose of punishment” or “a fine”.¹⁸³ Such provisions indicate that retribution must remain the central purpose of sentencing.

NORVAL MORRIS AND COLLIN
HOWARD, STUDIES IN CRIMINAL LAW
(1964), PP.175–176:

1-110

“[P]ower over a criminal’s life should not be taken in excess of that which would be taken were his reform not considered as one of our purposes. Let the maximum of his punishment be never greater than that which would be justified by the other aims of our system of criminal justice. Within the term of that sentence, let us utilise our reformatory skills to assist him towards social readjustment, but never put forward the possibility of reforming him to justify an extension of power over him. The jailer in a white coat with a degree in a behavioural science remains a jailer.”

E. REPARATION

1–111

Though not strictly a theory of punishment, reparation is now of significant importance to any discussion about crime and punishment. This is because the use of reparation as a sentencing purpose, and more generally as a means of responding to offending, has proliferated within England and Wales over the past 10–15 years. Its growth is a reflection of a movement towards including victims more centrally within the criminal justice process. Critics of conventional methods of criminal justice have argued that the system fails to respond adequately to the needs of victims, offenders and local communities. Traditionally, the commission of an offence has been viewed as a violation against the State which, as representative of society, must punish the offender. Victims and other community members are often involved in the criminal process merely as sources of evidence, such as prosecution witnesses. Nils Christie has argued that the State has, in effect, appropriated conflict from those which are most affected by it.¹⁸⁴ Rather than those directly impacted by an offence helping to resolve the harms it causes, legal professionals are tasked with prosecuting offenders and administering what they consider to be “deserved” punishment.

Reparation, on the other hand, is concerned with the restoration of harms caused by crime. It is intrinsically linked to what is now commonly referred to as “restorative justice” (RJ), a contemporary theory and practice of justice which developed within Western jurisdictions from the late 1970s.¹⁸⁵ There is no single definition of RJ, but many advocates assert that it is based on the premise that crime is a wound to human relations which requires convalescence. This is best achieved by those most affected by the offence, including the victim, the offender and other community members. Howard Zehr explains that:

“Crime is a violation of people and relationships. It creates obligations to make things right. Justice involves the victim, the offence, and the community in a search for solutions which promote repair, reconciliation, and reassurance.”¹⁸⁶

1-112

In order to restore harm the offender must first take responsibility for his actions. Part of the restorative process is the facilitation of inclusive dialogue which involves the (reintegrative) shaming of the offender. Braithwaite asserts:

“Because shaming is a participatory form of social control, compared with formal sanctioning which is more professionalized than participatory, shaming builds consciences through citizens being instruments as well as targets of social control. Participation in expressions of abhorrence toward the criminal acts of others is part of what makes crime an abhorrent choice for us ourselves to make.”¹⁸⁷

Social condemnation is expressed both via the offender’s active participation in a restorative intervention and through the disapproval which is conveyed by the community participants in restorative meetings. The “stakeholders” of an offence (i.e. the victim, offender and their community supporters) help the offender to understand the hurt and suffering that he has caused. Maxwell and Morris explain that such a process is likely to induce feelings of remorse which are the result of “empathy or understanding the effects on victims”.¹⁸⁸ In turn it is argued that the offender is less likely to reoffend because he will have seen first-hand the direct impacts of his actions.

One of the first formal introductions of RJ within the criminal justice system was implemented by the Thames Valley Police during the mid-1990s. Using the Australian Wagga Wagga model of RJ, the police implemented a new restorative cautioning scheme as a means of disposing of minor offences.¹⁸⁹ This involved a script being used by police officers who facilitated victimoffender mediations (VOM). Meetings involved direct dialogue between victims and offenders who came together to discuss the impacts of the offence and how best the offender can make good the harm he has done. The use of restorative justice practices by other police services has quickly proliferated, with the vast majority of the 43 police services across England and Wales now using some form of restorative justice.¹⁹⁰

1–113

Restorative justice is also used within the Youth Justice System¹⁹¹ as well as for adults by probation services and within some prisons.¹⁹² A popular measure used by practitioners within these parts of the justice system is the family group conference (conferencing). Conferencing involves the participation of victims, offenders and their community supporters in a direct meeting that aims to find restoration for all involved. Conferences, like VOM, are facilitated by restorative practitioners who create safe spaces for participants to talk about their experiences of victimisation. The stakeholders decide together how the offender should repair any harms caused. Meetings often end with the parties signing a “reparation agreement” which outlines the undertakings which have been agreed.

The growing body of empirical evidence for RJ has provided positive findings on its effectiveness, particularly in relation to victim satisfaction with conferencing. Studies conducted in Australia, England and the US, many of which have used control groups comparing restorative conferencing with the court process, have found higher satisfaction levels amongst victims when compared to court.¹⁹³ Furthermore, the emotional traumas caused by crime, such as fear, anger and anxiety, have also been shown to reduce more significantly post RJ. Yet while these findings are encouraging, studies that have examined the effect of RJ on reoffending rates have produced findings that are far from unequivocal. For example, although some studies have shown reductions in reoffending rates for certain violent offences, other studies have found little to no difference in reoffending levels between court processes and RJ; with some research suggesting that RJ may even increase recidivism.¹⁹⁴

The increased emphasis that is now placed on restoring harm (as against punishing offenders) has resulted in “reparation” becoming one of the five prescribed sentencing purposes as set out in the Criminal Justice Act 2003. This means that sentencers can consider the purpose of restoring harm when determining an appropriate penalty for every defendant that comes before them. More recently, the Government has outlined a vision that RJ should become accessible for victims at “all stages of the criminal justice system”.¹⁹⁵ Indeed, the Code of Practice for Victims of Crime now states that victims are entitled to receive information on Restorative Justice from the police, including how they can take part.¹⁹⁶ Judges also have the power to defer sentence for a restorative meeting to take place between the victim and offender before sentencing.¹⁹⁷

It is yet unknown to what extent the use of RJ between conviction and sentencing will affect the sentencer’s use of other theories of punishment. Indeed, many criminologists have questioned whether RJ can ever be used in conjunction with theories of punishment which focus on harming offenders as a means of resolving crime—it being considered antithetical to the restorative ideal. Others have, however, suggested that RJ can be reconciled with the current system of retribution. In particular, the act of repairing can in itself be conceived as a form of punishment due to the fact that it requires the offender to make amends while restricting his freedom to do as he pleases.

L. ZEDNER, “REPARATION AND RETRIBUTION: ARE THEY RECONCILABLE?” (1994) 57 M.L.R.
228, 248–249 AND 250:

1–114

“[I]t might be argued that both reparation and retribution derive their ‘authority’ from the offence itself and impose penalties according to the seriousness of the particular crime. Unlike the utilitarian aims of general deterrence or rehabilitation which import wider notions of societal good, both retribution and reparation exclude (or nearly exclude) consideration of factors beyond the particular offence. The offender's personal history, the social or economic causes of crime or the need to prevent future offending (all of which extend the limits of intrusion by the state under deterrent or rehabilitative theories) are here deemed irrelevant. As such, both retributive and reparative justice, it is said, impose strict constraints on the intrusion of the state into the lives of offenders. This apparent congruity is not, however, as close as it first seems. The seriousness of the offence is set according to two different sets of criteria. Retribution demands punishment proportional primarily to the intent of the offender, whereas reparative justice derives its 'proportionality' from the harm inflicted on the victim. Whilst intent is generally focused on outcomes, and intent and harm may thus coincide, the two may point to very different levels of gravity. If reparation and retribution were to be wholly reconciled, then it would be necessary to devise a measure which integrated intent and harm in setting offence seriousness. A greater difficulty still is that, if reparative justice is to be more than a criminal analogue to civil damages, then it should go beyond the offence itself to enquire about its wider social costs and the means to making them good ...

The danger, however, is that the attempt to accommodate reparative justice to the rationale of punishment so perverts its underlying rationale as to strip it of much of its original appeal, not least its commitment to repairing ruptured social bonds. We are accustomed to seeing criminal justice as the repressive arm of the state, but might it not better be conceived as one end of a continuum of practices by which social order is maintained? Punishment has a very limited ability to control crime and, to the extent that it is disintegrative, it inflicts further damage on society. Given that the high profile 'law and order policies' ... have done little to stem spiralling crime figures, perhaps it is time to explore the integrative potential of reparative justice on its own terms."

1-115

Whether RJ will become a main focus within criminal justice or simply a practice which operates at the periphery of the system may well depend on whether society accepts the use of reparation on its own merits. However, there are a number of difficulties that the theory and practice of RJ is yet to get to grips with which may yet limit its application. One concern is that many restorative practices pivot around the concept of “community”. The notion of community has been ill-defined leaving its exact meaning elusive. Many questions arise such as, how do we locate any given community? When should community members be invited to participate in restorative processes? How should they participate? Can a broad concept such as “community” ever be consistently applied to criminal offences?¹⁹⁸ Linked to these issues are concerns relating to the legitimacy of victims and community members determining how an offender will repair the harms of crime. For instance, Ashworth questions whether the expansion of RJ practices will encroach upon the right of the offender to be sentenced by an independent and impartial tribunal.¹⁹⁹ These issues are yet to be resolved and it is therefore far from clear to what extent RJ will shape the future of criminal justice in England and Wales.

F. COMBINING THE THEORIES

1–116

It is difficult to make any sense of the above competing “theories” until one knows precisely what question they are trying to answer. Building on the work of Hart²⁰⁰ one can distinguish four separate questions:

1. What is the purpose of punishment?
2. Who may be punished?
3. How much punishment should be imposed?
4. What type of punishment should be imposed?

Many commentators have attempted to combine both retributive and utilitarian considerations in answering these questions. One approach, exemplified by Hart, is that a distinction needs to be drawn between two issues. First, one needs to ascertain what the purpose of the whole institution of punishment is; Hart called this “the general justifying aim” and the justification for this was to be found in utilitarian considerations. In short, the reason why we have an institution of punishment is because we want to reduce crime. However, there is a second separate issue of “distribution”: this relates to the second two questions above, namely, who to punish and how much punishment? According to Hart the question of distribution should be answered in retributive terms. Only persons who have committed criminal offences deserve punishment and the amount of punishment should be proportionate to the seriousness of the crime. According to this approach, one could say that the aim of the institution of punishment was, for example, deterrence but one would not be justified in punishing innocent people (say, the children of the offender) purely because this might be an effective deterrent. Punishment can only be justified in a particular case on the retributive basis that it is deserved.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), P.419:

1-117

“The analogy that comes to mind is the distinction between justifying the income tax as a whole and justifying the imposition of burdens on particular taxpayers. The justification of the system as a whole is raising revenue for the government; the justification of burdens on particular taxpayers is (roughly) the taxpayer’s relative ability to pay. It would obviously be improper to interweave these two levels of justification and justify the denial of claim for a charitable deduction on the ground of the claimant’s relative ability to pay. Similarly, if the justification for the criminal law as a whole is the isolation of dangerous offenders, it is improper to decide particular cases by appealing to the alleged offender’s relative dangerousness.”

1-118

One could advocate such a “dualist”²⁰¹ approach but, instead of accepting Hart’s views, one could argue, for instance, that the aim of the institution of punishment is desert but that one needs utilitarian justifications to punish in individual cases.²⁰² Much of this chapter has been devoted to answering the first question: what is the purpose of punishment? Nothing further need be added here. The focus of the remainder of this section is on whether a dualist approach is justifiable and, if so, how matters of distribution of punishment should be determined. In assessing this it is helpful to examine the above three distributive questions separately.

1. Who may be punished?

H. L. A. HART, “PROLEGOMENON TO THE PRINCIPLES OF PUNISHMENT”, IN PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (1968), PP.11–13, 21–24:

1–119

“The root question to be considered is, however, why we attach the moral importance which we do to retribution in Distribution ...

The standard example used by philosophers to bring out the importance of retribution in Distribution is that of a wholly innocent person who has not even unintentionally done anything which the law punishes if done intentionally. It is supposed that in order to avert some social catastrophe officials of the system fabricate evidence on which he is charged, tried, convicted and sent to prison or death. Or it is supposed that without resort to any fraud more persons may be deterred from crime if wives and children of offenders were punished vicariously for their crimes. In some forms, this kind of thing may be ruled out by a consistent sufficiently comprehensive utilitarianism. Certainly expedients involving fraud or faked charges might be very difficult to justify on utilitarian grounds ... [Such an approach] would awaken such apprehension and insecurity that any gain from the exercise of these powers would by any utilitarian calculation be offset by the misery caused by their existence. But official resort to this kind of fraud on a particular occasion in breach of the rules and the subsequent indemnification of the officials responsible might save many lives and so be thought to yield a clear surplus of value. Certainly vicarious punishment of an offender’s family might do so and legal systems have occasionally resorted to this ... In extreme cases many might still think it right to resort to these expedients but we should do so with the sense of sacrificing an important principle. We should be conscious of choosing the lesser of two evils, and this would be inexplicable if the principle sacrificed to utility were itself only a requirement of utility ...

It is clear that like all principles of Justice it (punishment) is concerned with the adjustment of claims between a multiplicity of persons. It incorporates the idea that each individual person is to be protected against the claim of the rest for the highest possible measure of security, happiness or welfare which could be got at his expense by condemning him for a breach of the rules and punishing him. For this a moral licence is required in the form of proof that the person punished broke the law by an action which was the outcome of his free choice, and the recognition of excuses is the most we can do to ensure that the terms of the licence are observed. Here perhaps, the elucidation of this restrictive principle should stop. Perhaps we (or I) ought simply to say that it is a requirement of Justice, and Justice simply consists of principles to be observed in adjusting the competing claims of human beings which (i) treat all alike as persons by attaching special significance to human voluntary action and (ii) forbid the use of one human being for the benefit of others except in return for his voluntary actions against them ...

We may look upon the principle that punishment must be reserved for voluntary offences from two different points of view. The first is that of the rest of society considered as harmed by the offence (either because one of its members has been injured or because the authority of the law essential to its existence has been challenged or both). The principle then appears as one securing that the suffering involved in punishment falls upon those who have voluntarily harmed others: this is valued, not as the Aim of punishment, but as the only fair terms on which the General Aim (protection of society, maintenance of respect for law, etc.) may be pursued.

The second point of view is that of society concerned not as harmed by the crime but as offering individuals including the criminal the protection of the laws on terms which are fair, because they not only consist of a framework of reciprocal rights and duties, but because within this framework each individual is given a fair opportunity to choose between keeping the law required for society's protection or paying the penalty. From the first point of view the actual punishment of a criminal appears not merely as something useful to society (General Aim) but as justly extracted from the criminal who has voluntarily done harm; from the second it appears as a price justly extracted because the criminal had a fair opportunity beforehand to avoid liability to pay."

This dualist approach has been criticised on the basis that confining retribution to the issue of distribution of punishment amounts to a down-grading of its importance.²⁰³ It has been further suggested that the whole dualist enterprise is flawed.

NICOLA LACEY, STATE PUNISHMENT:
POLITICAL PRINCIPLES AND COMMUNITY VALUES (1988), pp.51–
52:

1–121

“All these hybrid theories proceed on the assumption that there are genuinely separate questions to be answered: ... It seems to be true ... that rules themselves contain their own conditions of application. No sensible system has rules and then fails to apply them: prima facie, the reasons for having the rules generate the reasons for applying them in individual cases. This seems to indicate that the principle of distribution, if one is (as it seems to be) needed, must come in at the first stage: a principle of distribution is inevitably contained within or at least envisaged by the general justifying aim of the rules. And if the general justifying aim is straightforwardly utilitarian, the project of grafting on a separate distributive principle, begins to look deeply problematic, for utilitarianism does not, as its critics sometimes claim, lack such a principle. It rather embodies criteria of distribution which are vulnerable to serious objection. It is necessary, then, to identify an alternative general justifying aim which incorporates or is consistent with an acceptable distributive principle, rather than to separate different questions and give different answers to them. Conversely, I think it can be argued that a justification for institutions of punishment must include a justification for their actual use in individual cases, and that the individual question is in some ways primary: can any single infliction of punishment ever be justified? The mere fact that such an infliction is according to rules does not seem to generate any additional justification in itself. In justifying a system of rules, we generally assume that those rules will be applied: therefore the justification which we seek must also justify the application of the rules. For these reasons it is my belief that the ... Hartian distinction does not really withstand close analysis.”²⁰⁴

Lacey's approach is, however, dependent on the "general justifying aim" itself embodying effective criteria of "distribution". To assess this let us briefly consider the utilitarian response to the problem of punishing the innocent. Why not punish an innocent person if, say, it would be an effective deterrent? The answer here is that such punishment could never in fact be an effective deterrent as punishment would become a lottery and there would be no special disincentive to would-be offenders. Punishing the innocent would cause suffering to the victim, general insecurity, disrespect for the law and could encourage the guilty person to reoffend. In short, such punishment would cause more evil than it prevented and thus could not be justifiable.

Further, even if the "general justifying aim" did embody criteria of distribution, why would they be any better than those yielded by the concept of just deserts, which, as demonstrated in the Hart extract above, provides fair, consistent and just results?

2. How severely do we punish?

1-122

The amount of punishment imposed again depends on the rationale for the imposition of that punishment. Let us start with the utilitarian view of punishment. How would a utilitarian determine the amount of punishment to be imposed for a particular offence? If it were thought necessary, for example, for reasons of deterrence, could extreme sentences be imposed that bore no relationship to the seriousness of the crime? Could one give life sentences for parking on double yellow lines if this were thought to be an effective deterrent? Could one give life sentences to persons who repeatedly stole milk bottles from doorsteps if this would prevent the recurrence of the crime?

The classic answer to this question is still that provided by Jeremy Bentham, that all punishment is evil and ought only to be imposed to achieve some greater good—and, accordingly, one should only impose the minimum punishment necessary to achieve that objective.

JEREMY BENTHAM, "AN

INTRODUCTION TO THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALS AND LEGISLATION”,
CH.13, IN BENTHAM AND MILL, THE UTILITARIANS (1961), PP.162, 166:

1-123

“The general object which all laws have, or ought to have, in common, is to augment the total happiness of the community; and therefore, in the first place, to exclude, as far as may be, every thing that tends to subtract from that happiness: in other words, to exclude mischief.

But all punishment is mischief: all punishment in itself is evil. Upon the principle of utility, if it ought at all to be admitted, it ought only to be admitted in as far as it promises to exclude some greater evil.

It is plain, therefore, that in the following cases punishment ought not to be inflicted.

1. Where it is groundless: where there is no mischief for it to prevent, the act not being mischievous upon the whole.
2. Where it must be inefficacious: where it cannot act so as to prevent the mischief.
3. Where it is unprofitable; or too expensive: where the mischief it would produce would be greater than what it prevented.
4. Where it is needless: where the mischief may be prevented, or cease of itself, without it: that is, at a cheaper rate ...

Now the evil of the punishment divides itself into four branches, by which so many different sets of persons are affected. 1. The evil of coercion or restraint: or the pain which it gives a man not to be able to do the act, whatever it be, which by the apprehension of the punishment he is deterred from doing. This is felt by those by whom the law is observed. 2. The evil of apprehension: or the pain which a man, who has exposed himself to punishment, feels at the thought of undergoing it. This is felt by those by whom the law has been broken, and so feel themselves in danger of its being executed upon them. 3. The evil of sufferance: or the pain which a man feels, in virtue of the punishment itself, from the time when he begins to undergo it. This is felt by those by whom the law is broken, and upon whom it comes actually to be executed. 4. The pain of sympathy, and the other derivative evils resulting to the persons who are in connection with the several classes of original sufferers just mentioned.”

1–124

Accordingly, the utilitarian reason why we do not punish parking on a double yellow line with life imprisonment is that it is thought that the aim of deterrence can be effectively achieved at a lower cost—and crime must be prevented as economically in terms of the suffering of the offender as possible. Further, such an extreme sentence would undoubtedly attract public sympathy for the offender and thus:

“instead of reaffirming the law and intensifying men’s consciousness that the kind of act punished is wrong, will have the opposite effect of casting discredit on the law and making the action of the law-breaker appear excusable or even almost heroic.”²⁰⁵

The problem with this approach is that while it might explain why preposterous sentences cannot be imposed for minor crimes, it does not necessarily prohibit exemplary sentences whereby one person is given a longer sentence than is deserved. Desert theory is emphatic here: the crime itself provides the necessary guidance as to the amount of punishment necessary. The punishment must be proportionate to the crime; it must “fit” the crime. Desert theorists, such as von Hirsch, argue that punishment must be proportionate to the seriousness of the crime in order to reflect an appropriate degree of censure.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, PAST OR FUTURE CRIMES (1985), PP.35–36:

1–125

“The requirement of proportionate punishment is derived directly from the censuring implications of the criminal sanction. Once one has created an institution with the condemnatory connotations that punishment has, then it is a requirement of justice, not merely of efficient law enforcement, to punish offenders according to the degree of reprehensibility of their conduct. Disproportionate punishments are unjust not because they are ineffectual or possibly counterproductive, but because the state purports to condemn the actor for his conduct and yet visits more or less censure on him than the gravity of that conduct warrants.

... As long as the state continues to respond to violence, theft, or fraud, or similarly noxious conduct through the institution of the criminal sanction, it is necessarily treating those whom it punishes as wrongdoers and condemning them for their conduct. If it thus condemns, then the severity of the state's response ought to reflect the degree of blameworthiness, that is, the gravity, of actors' conduct.

This argument uses a commonly understood concept, employed in everyday life: the notion of censure. The idea is that once one has established a condemnatory institution to respond to criminal acts, one ought then to allocate its sanctions in a manner that comports with the reprehensibility of those acts."

How does one determine what level of punishment is proportionate to the seriousness of the crime?

ANDREW VON HIRSCH, "ORDINAL AND CARDINAL DESERT", IN A. VON
HIRSCH AND A. ASHWORTH (EDS),
PRINCIPLED SENTENCING (1992),
PP.209–210:

1–126

"One must distinguish between ordinal and cardinal magnitudes of punishment: That is, between (1) the question of how defendants should be punished relative to each other, and (2) the question of what absolute severity levels should be chosen to anchor the penalty scale ...

For modern desert theory, this distinction is critical. Advocates of desert-oriented sentencing such as myself do not assert that desert is determinative for all purposes. Rather, our claim is a more restricted one, to wit: desert is a determinative principle in deciding ordinal magnitudes, but only a limiting principle in deciding cardinal magnitudes. To see what this means in practice, consider the crime of burglary. The issues of ordinal magnitude deal with how a particular burglary should be penalized compared to other burglaries and to other more or less serious crimes. When desert theorists assert that desert is a determining principle here, they mean that the ordering of penalties must meet the following two requirements. The first is the requirement of parity: criminal conduct of equal seriousness should be punished equally, with deviations from such equality permitted only where special circumstances alter the harm or culpability—that is, the degree of blameworthiness—of the defendant’s conduct. The other is that of rank ordering: penalties should be ranked and spaced to reflect the ranking and spacing in degree of seriousness among crimes. What desert theorists object to is deciding these questions of comparative punishments on grounds other than the blameworthiness of the defendant’s conduct: for example, to punish a particular burglar more severely than other burglars not because his particular crime is any worse but because he is a worse risk or because giving him a higher-than-usual punishment would make him an example to others.

To espouse this view does not, however, require one to hold that desert is determinative in deciding cardinal magnitudes. Here, rather, most modern desert theorists—certainly I—would admit that desert is a limiting principle only. I do not claim to know precisely how tough or lenient a sentencing scale should be, but only that punishments beyond certain levels of harshness or leniency are undeserved.”

1–127

A final, but critical, issue remains. Must one punish to the exact extent dictated by the seriousness of the crime, or does the concept of just deserts merely provide a ceiling beyond which punishment is undeserved?

The strict Kantian response is that the offender must be punished to that extent, no more and no less, which is necessary to destroy the unfair advantage gained from committing the crime. A failure to punish the offender, either at all, or to the extent necessary to eliminate the advantage gained, would not restore social equilibrium and would amount to society endorsing the criminal’s acts and thus becoming participants in it. It would further involve failing to treat the criminal as a responsible human being who deserves the consequences of their actions.

On the other hand, drawing on the approach advocated by Hart earlier in this section, it could be that the concept of just deserts should only specify the maximum possible penalty beyond which punishment is undeserved.²⁰⁶ Within a permissible range, punishment is deserved—one is justified in punishing—but one has a choice as to the severity of the punishment, that choice being informed by all the circumstances of the offence and perhaps even by utilitarian considerations. In short, within a range set by desert principles, the precise allocation of punishment could be determined on a utilitarian basis. This approach, sometimes called limited or negative retributivism, was endorsed by the Halliday Report²⁰⁷ which proposed that desert should provide a “punitive envelope”²⁰⁸ indicating a permissible range of sentence. No sentence outside that range would be permissible. However, once the “envelope was opened”, the actual sentence imposed, within the defined limits, would depend on utilitarian considerations. Within the range the sentencer would select the punishment that would most closely serve the purpose of crime reduction (and reparation) in the individual case. This would involve an assessment of the likelihood of reoffending and the measures most likely to reduce that risk.²⁰⁹

NICOLA LACEY, STATE PUNISHMENT:
POLITICAL PRINCIPLES AND
COMMUNITY VALUES (1988), pp.54–
55:

1–128

“The idea that desert furnishes the state with a non-conclusive reason to punish raises the question of what types of extra reasons must be adduced in order to produce a justification of particular acts of punishment. On some accounts, apparently non-utilitarian factors are appealed to—factors such as fairness and justice. But it is clear that the most obvious candidates are utilitarian reasons such as prevention, deterrence, avoidance of private vengeance and so on. It is important to note that on most weak retributivist views desert operates not only as the central justification but also as a limit on the amount of punishment: the only function of the consequentialist considerations is to add an element which provides the sufficient reason for some punitive action. On this view, consequentialism cannot tell us whom to punish or how much to punish; it merely defeats the argument from the pointlessness of purely retributive punishment. The difficulty here is that these utilitarian arguments do purport to provide not just an explanation of when we may exercise our right or power of punishment, but actually to make it right for us to punish. According to utilitarianism, it is right to punish wherever such an action maximises the aggregate of pleasure over pain. It is thus hard to see how it is that the weak retributive principle fails to become redundant. In addition, it is not clear whether the desert argument is intended to apply to the design of institutions and the utilitarian one to individual acts of punishment ... If this were so, we would be invited to endorse the unattractive vision of a legal system based on a principle of desert, in which individual acts of punishment were left to judicial discretion which should be exercised on the basis of consequentialist reasoning, or else of a system in which the legislator made utilitarian generalisations in framing the rules which were nevertheless primarily based on considerations of desert.”

1-129

As Lacey makes clear, sentencing cannot be left to unfettered judicial discretion. Justice demands that like cases be treated alike. There needs to be an organising principle to structure and control such discretion. The Halliday Report made some effort in this direction—but was ultimately flawed for two reasons. First, the limits of permissible punishment based on desert were overly influenced by the existence of previous convictions.²¹⁰ This leaves too broad a band within which punishment is “deserved”. Secondly, once the envelope has been opened, utilitarianism takes complete control and there is insufficient guidance as to the relationship between the various utilitarian considerations. Halliday’s recommendations were not adopted in their entirety, but instead a potential problem with the ensuing Criminal Justice Act 2003 is that s.142(1) lists multiple purposes of sentencing.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT 2003

s.142(1):

1–130

“Purposes of sentencing

Any court dealing with an offender in respect of his offence must have regard to the following purposes of sentencing—

- (a) the punishment of offenders,
- (b) the reduction of crime (including its reduction by deterrence),
- (c) the reform and rehabilitation of offenders,
- (d) the protection of the public,
- (e) the making of reparation by offenders to persons affected by their offences.”

1–131

No relative weighting or ranking of these purposes is provided, creating the danger that different sentencers might pick and choose and prioritise different sentencing purposes, in turn creating the potential for sentencing disparity. Von Hirsch and Roberts have criticised what they see as a return to the “‘smorgasbord’ approach to sentencing aims”.²¹¹

ANDREW VON HIRSCH AND JULIAN V. ROBERTS, “LEGISLATING SENTENCING PRINCIPLES: THE PROVISIONS OF THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT 2003 RELATING TO SENTENCING PURPOSES AND THE ROLE OF PREVIOUS CONVICTIONS” [2004] CRIM. L.R. 639 AT 642:

1–132

“Section 142 lists [deserved] punishment, deterrence, incapacitation, rehabilitation, and reparation to victims as aims which the judge must consider in each sentencing case. It does not indicate what priority should be observed among these various aims.

The recent penological literature does not support this new emphasis on crime-preventive aims in sentencing; indeed, the leading English authorities on sentencing continue to endorse an emphasis on proportionality in imposing criminal sentences. The initiative has come, instead, from the Home Office. Developing measures to prevent crime and reduce re-offending has for years been part of the Government’s criminal justice policy strategy. It is not surprising therefore that these ideas have permeated the area of sentencing and finally reached the statute book. Starting with claims made by Mr Jack Straw while shadow Home Secretary, senior Home Office officials have asserted their increasing impatience with a proportionality standard for sentencing, and recommended that greater weight be given in sentencing to crime prevention concerns. In part, such officials’ stated reasons reflect concern with assuaging public opinion.”

This listing approach to sentencing purposes has also received more direct criticism from within the House of Commons.

HOUSE OF COMMONS JUSTICE COMMITTEE, SENTENCING
GUIDELINES AND PARLIAMENT:
BUILDING A BRIDGE, HC 715, JULY
2009, PARA.66:

1–133

“The five aims of sentencing set out in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 are neither internally coherent nor consistently applied. It is not clear whether the aims are intended to be a hierarchical list or a menu to be combined differently in different cases. It is not clear how the purposes of sentencing relate to, or should be reflected in, sentencing guidelines. As a result, the public, criminal justice organisations, victims, sentencers and the Government all have different expectations as to what sentencing is trying to achieve—suggesting that someone, inevitably, will be disappointed.”

1-134

The Government’s rather weak response to this was that:

“It would be, in the Government’s view, inadvisable and counterproductive to attempt to prioritise the purposes of sentencing in a manner which would be incompatible with the flexible nature set out in the statute. The balancing of the criteria is a case-specific decision for the sentencer to make.”²¹²

Despite the breadth of conflicting sentencing purposes provided in s.142 of the Act, there are various other provisions which can be read as preserving an emphasis on proportionality in sentencing. The first of these is s.143(1) which states that:

“In considering the seriousness of any offence, the court must consider the offender’s culpability in committing the offence and any harm which the offence caused, was intended to cause or might foreseeably have caused.”

Section 152(2) also states that:

“The court must not pass a custodial sentence unless it is of the opinion that the offence ... was so serious that neither a fine alone nor a community sentence can be justified for the offence.”

1-135

Following this is s.153(2), which reads, in part, as follows:

“[T]he custodial sentence must be for the shortest term (not exceeding the permitted maximum) that in the opinion of the court is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence ...”

Together these sections suggest that retribution, and with it the principle of proportionality, is the dominant purpose of sentencing in England and Wales. In fact, the Sentencing Guidelines Council has since confirmed that the principle of proportionality is to remain the touchstone of sentencing in England and Wales.²¹³

3. What type of punishment?

1–136

Once a determination is made about how much punishment is warranted, the courts must then decide what method of punishment ought to be employed. This is yet another complex decision that sentencers must make.

PAUL H. ROBINSON, “HYBRID PRINCIPLES FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF CRIMINAL SANCTIONS” (1988) 82 NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY L. REV. 19, 34–36:

1–137

“The [next] issue, concerning the method of sanction, is distinguishable from the distribution of amount. Two offenders may merit the same amount of sanction yet different methods of sanctioning may be suitable for imposing that amount. These two issues—how much for whom and what method—are not only functionally distinguishable but also may properly be subject to different distributive principles.

Each of the distributive purposes may treat the different issues differently. Effective crime control can be furthered through a variety of mechanisms—by setting the amount or the method of sanction, as well as by setting enforcement and prosecution patterns and expenditures. Satisfaction of desert concerns, by contrast, depends almost exclusively on the amount issue—who receives how much; the method issue (as well as the resource allocation issues) is generally not relevant.

The desert requirement of a proper ordinal ranking of offenders by overall blameworthiness, for example, concerns the ranking of amounts of sanction. As long as the ordinal ranking is correct, the method by which each amount is imposed is not relevant to desert. If one month in the state prison is the punitive equivalent to five months of weekends in the local jail, then desert is satisfied even if the more blameworthy offender gets probation, with a condition of seven months of weekends in jail, while the less blameworthy offender goes to prison for one month. It is critical, of course, that the sanction equivalencies be properly set. Some empirical research has been done on perceptions of relative seriousness of sanctions, but the work is still in its infancy.

With an estimate of equivalencies, one can construct a sentencing system that allows independent determination of the amount and method issues. The principles governing the ‘amount’ issue can generate total ‘sanction units’ for each offender, which can then be allocated to a particular sanctioning method or combination of methods according to a different set of ‘method’ principles. As long as the issues can be effectively segregated in practice, one can develop a hybrid distributive principle for governing the amount of sanction that is different from the principle used to determine the method of sanction. One could, for example, emphasize desert in determining the amount of sanction, but ignore it in determining the method. The selection of method could be made to maximize pure utilitarian concerns without infringing desert interests—a precious no-loss, all-win opportunity.

The separation of amount and method issues has other important collateral advantages. For example, unwarranted disparity in sentencing primarily concerns disparity in amount, rather than disparity in method. Thus, one might significantly reduce judicial sentencing discretion on the amount issue, in order to reduce disparity among judges, yet maintain broad judicial discretion on the method issue. As long as the total ‘sanction units’ for an offender are satisfied and the sanction equivalencies are properly set, it does not matter what method or methods an individual judge selects; the punitive ‘bite’ will be the same.”

1-138

According to this analysis, within a desert framework, decisions as to the type of punishment can be based on utilitarian considerations. For instance, when imposing a (deserved) community sentence involving a community order the court should normally obtain a pre-sentence report and then decide which requirements to impose and should indicate the purposes to be achieved thereby. For example, a court could impose a supervision requirement or an alcohol treatment requirement aimed at the rehabilitation of the offender. Alternatively, a curfew requirement, an exclusion requirement or a prohibited activity request could be imposed aimed at protecting the public.

G. SENTENCING GUIDELINES

1-139

Until the rise of the just deserts movement, sentencers were generally free to impose whatever sentence they deemed appropriate—up to the maximum permitted. In England there were, however, constraints: a “tariff” was developed by the judges which broadly indicated a range of sentences for “normal cases” and defendants had a right of appeal where an excessive penalty beyond the tariff was imposed. It is interesting to contrast this with the position in the US where the just deserts movement began its revival. Judicial sentencing discretion there was virtually unlimited and in a majority of states no appeal against sentence was permitted.

Such broad discretionary powers meant several things in both jurisdictions. Different judges could impose different sentences for different reasons without having to give any explanation in open court. For example, some judges could impose a sentence for deterrent reasons but other judges in similar cases could sentence offenders in order to rehabilitate them. Even the same judge was not always consistent in sentencing. There was no agreement among judges as to what criteria ought to be taken into account in the sentencing decision and what weight ought to be given to factors such as previous convictions, age, good family, perceived future dangerousness, whether the accused pleaded guilty and other such matters. Criticism of this lack of consistency was speedily met with the response that sentences were individualised; they were tailored to meet the needs of the defendant and therefore consistency in punishments for similar crimes was not to be expected. The result was widespread sentencing disparity with similar cases being treated differently.

In England, a 1979 study on sentencing practice in the magistrates’ court revealed sometimes wide disparities in the use of fines and imprisonment:

“Almost all clerks and chairmen emphasised the necessity for the establishment and maintenance of a consistent policy in their own individual courts but this concern did not extend to maintaining consistency with their neighbours. It was more important, they believed, that the decision taken by the courts should be determined by the particular characteristics of the offenders coming before it and of the district it served than that wider consistency be achieved at the expense of sensitivity.”²¹⁴

Even more startling evidence of sentencing disparity began to emerge from the US.

MARVIN E. FRANKEL, CRIMINAL SENTENCES—LAW WITHOUT ORDER (1973), PP.21–22:

1–140

“Take, for instance, the case of two men we received last spring. The first man had been convicted of cashing a cheque for $58.40. He was out of work at the time of his offence, and when his wife became ill and he needed money for rent, food and doctor’s bills, he became the victim of temptation. He had no prior criminal record. The other man cashed a cheque for $35.20. He was also out of work and his wife had left him for another man. His prior record consisted of a drunk charge and a non-support charge. Our examination of these two cases indicated no significant differences for sentencing purposes but they appeared before different judges and the first man received 15 years in prison and the second man 30 days ...

In one of our institutions a middle-aged credit union treasurer is serving 117 days for embezzling $24,000 in order to cover his gambling debts. On the other hand, another middle-aged embezzler with a fine past record and a fine family is serving 20 years, with 5 years probation to follow.”

1–141

Another consequence of judges sentencing for a mixture of reasons, many of them utilitarian, was that excessively long sentences were being imposed in some cases. In particular, the rationale of exemplary sentencing resulted in some persons receiving sentences in excess of those imposed on others committing similar crimes.

One final point about the pre-just deserts era ought to be borne in mind. Offenders sent to prison were entitled to remission of their sentence (for good behaviour in prison) and to release on parole after a specified period. The decision as to whether to release someone on parole was highly discretionary and effectively amounted to a prisoner being sentenced a second time—but this time behind closed doors. This meant that when two offenders received the same sentence for the same crime, one could be released far sooner than the other. This, of course, could lead to even greater disparity.

It was a combination of all these factors that provided fertile soil for the growth of the just deserts movement. The agenda was set: judicial discretion had to be controlled; sentencing disparity had to be eliminated: this would necessarily involve eliminating disproportionately long sentences; there needed to be “truth in sentencing”: equal sentences imposed in open court had to mean the same thing for different offenders. The concept of just deserts with its liberal emphasis on justice involving like cases being treated alike was the obvious facilitator. However, it was clearly not enough simply to embrace the concept of just deserts and reduce the importance of utilitarian considerations. Different judges could have different conceptions of what sentence was deserved in any particular case. What was needed was a mechanism for ensuring that judicial discretion was controlled by forcing judges to sentence in accordance with agreed and objective standards of desert. The response in many states in the US was sharp and dramatic. In England, it has been slower and somewhat different. Let us consider the developments in each country in turn.

1. United States

1–142

In the US, a significant number of states²¹⁵ have developed numerical sentencing guidelines under which judicial discretion is retained, but specific criteria or guidelines are developed to structure and control the exercise of that discretion. The legislature continues to set maximum terms. A specialised body, usually referred to as a Sentencing Commission, is created to establish sentencing guidelines within these broad statutory boundaries. These guidelines are generally based on two factors: the severity of the offence and the offender's prior criminal history. Offences are ranked in order of their seriousness and the Commission specifies a limited number of aggravating and mitigating circumstances which increase or decrease the severity of the offence. Factors relating to the offender's prior criminal history include previous convictions, prior incarcerations and whether the person was on parole or probation at the time the offence was committed. For each combination of offence and offender, including a consideration of aggravating or mitigating circumstances, the guidelines provide a narrow sentencing range. The sentencing judge is expected to impose a sentence within this range, but if there are special circumstances not adequately taken into account by the guidelines, there may be a departure from the guidelines; reasons for the departure must be given and the sentence then becomes automatically subject to appellate review.

Under such schemes the sentence imposed on an offender is the sentence that will actually be served (except for "good time" reductions). Accordingly, there is no necessity for a Parole Board. The role of the Sentencing Commission is viewed as crucial. Unlike the legislature, such a body has the time and expertise to establish guidelines on the basis of careful study of existing sentencing practices; it can periodically alter these guidelines on the basis of on-going experience; theoretically, it is removed from partisan politics; it is a publicly accountable body; and its rule-making is on record and open to public scrutiny.

The best known example of such guidelines is to be found in Minnesota (Figure 1). The italicised numbers within each grid denote the presumptive sentencing range in months within which a sentence may be imposed without it being deemed a departure.²¹⁶ All felony offences are assigned an appropriate level of severity. The offences listed on the grid are examples of frequently occurring offences within each severity level. The offender’s criminal history score is computed by assigning points to previous convictions (one-half point for each previous conviction at levels 1–2; one point for each previous conviction at levels 3–5; one-and-a-half points for convictions at levels 6–8; and two points for convictions at levels 9–11), custody status at the time of the offence (e.g. if the offender was on probation), prior misdemeanour record and prior juvenile record. Cumulative points may accrue on a single occasion when offenders are sentenced concurrently for more than one offence.²¹⁷

The presumptive sentence for cases contained in the shaded cells should be “stayed” (delayed until some future date; if the offender complies with imposed conditions until that date, the case is discharged²¹⁸). The presumptive sentence for cases contained in cells above and to the right of the solid line should be “executed” (served immediately).

The presumptive penalty may be departed from in cases involving “substantial and compelling circumstances”. The Sentencing Guidelines provide a non-exclusive list of mitigating factors (e.g. that the victim was the aggressor in the incident) and aggravating factors (e.g. that the victim was particularly vulnerable due to age or infirmity) that may be used as reasons for departure. They are also explicit that race, sex, employment and social factors may not be used as reasons for departure. Parole is abolished and replaced by a specified reduction (up to onethird off) for good behaviour in prison.

Figure 1 Minnesota Sentencing Guidelines Grid, Effective 1 August 2016

Sentencing Guidelines Grid

1–143

Presumptive sentence lengths are in months. Italicised numbers within the grid denote the discretionary range within which a court may sentence without the sentence being deemed a departure. Offenders with stayed felony sentences may be subject to local confinement.

CRIMINAL HISTORY SCORE

SEVERITY LEVEL OF CONVICTION OFFENSE (Example offenses listed in italics)		0	1	2	3	4	5	6 or more
Murder, 2nd Degree (intentional murder; drive-by-shootings)	11	306 261–367	326 278–391	346 295–415	366 312–439	386 329–463	406 346–480 ₂	426 363–480 ₂
Murder, 3rd Degree Murder, 2nd Degree (unintentional murder)	10	150 128–180	165 141–198	180 153–216	195 166–234	210 179–252	225 192–270	240 204–288
Assault, 1st Degree	9	86 74–103	98 84–117	110 94–132	122 104–146	134 114–160	146 125–175	158 135–189
Agg. Robbery, 1st Degree; Burglary, 1st Degree (w/ Weapon or Assault)	8	48 41–57	58 50–69	68 58–81	78 67–93	88 75–105	98 84–117	108 92–129
Felony DWI; Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult	7	36	42	48	54 46–64	60 51–72	66 57–79	72 62–84 _{2,3}
Assault, 2nd Degree Burglary, 1st Degree (Occupied Dwelling)	6	21	27	33	39 34–46	45 39–54	51 44–61	57 49–68
Residential Burglary; Simple Robbery	5	18	23	28	33 29–39	38 33–45	43 37–51	48 41–57

Nonresidential Burglary	4	12 ¹	15	18	21	24 21– 28	27 23– 32	30 26– 36
Theft Crimes (Over $5,000)	3	12 ¹	13	15	17	19 17– 22	21 18– 25	23 20– 27
Theft Crimes ($5,000 or less) Check Forgery ($251-$2,500)	2	12 ¹	12 ¹	13	15	17	19	21 18– 25
Assault, 4th Degree Fleeing a Peace Officer	1	12 ¹	12 ¹	12 ¹	13	15	17	19 17– 22

1 12¹=One year and one day

Presumptive commitment to state imprisonment. First-degree murder has a mandatory life sentence and is excluded from the Guidelines under Minn. Stat. § 609.185. See s.2.E, for policies regarding those sentences controlled by law.

Presumptive stayed sentence; at the discretion of the court, up to one year of confinement and other non-jail sanctions can be imposed as conditions of probation. However, certain offenses in the shaded area of the Grid always carry a presumptive commitment to state prison. See ss.2.C and 2.E.

2 Minn. Stat. § 244.09 requires that the Guidelines provide a range for sentences that are presumptive commitment to state imprisonment of 15% lower and 20% higher than the fixed duration displayed, provided that the minimum sentence is not less than one year and one day and the maximum sentence is not more than the statutory maximum. See s.2.C.1-2.

3 The stat. max. for Financial Exploitation of Vulnerable Adult is 240 months; the standard range of 20% higher than the fixed duration applies at CHS 6 or more. (The range is 62–86.)

1–144

These guidelines appear to have been tolerably successful in reducing disparity. In 2015, the durational departure rate²¹⁹ was 13.9%.²²⁰ This can, of course, be justified. Justice not only demands that like cases be treated alike, but that different cases be treated differently. It is inevitable that in reducing all serious crimes to only 11 categories over-generalised solutions are imposed and fine-tuning has to be achieved on a case-by-case basis which involves departing from the presumptive penalty.

However, it should be noted that these guidelines are only applicable for more serious crimes for which a prison sentence of at least one year's imprisonment may be imposed. They do not apply to non-custodial sentences or to lesser crimes. This is a common approach in the US although a few states, such as Tennessee, have developed guidelines for all sentences.²²¹ It is, of course, immensely difficult to subject non-custodial sentences—and the choices to be made between them—to numerical guidelines. Nevertheless, it is a major criticism of the Minnesota Guidelines that for all lesser crimes the potential for sentencing disparity continues.

Further, it must be recalled that the guidelines only deal with the control of discretion at the sentencing stage of the criminal justice process. Inevitably, since the introduction of the guidelines much discretion has been shifted to the prosecutor who, through the use of plea bargaining, can agree to a reduced charge. Such practices are effectively determining the sentence in most cases. This means that offenders are not being sentenced for the crime they committed, but rather for the crime to which they have pleaded guilty.²²² This, coupled with an apparent tendency on the part of prosecutors to insist that offenders plead guilty to a number of charges so that their offender score is raised,²²³ can lead to disparity and injustice being removed to an earlier and less visible stage of the process.

Another problem with numerical guidelines in the US is that they often co-exist alongside “three strikes and you’re out” laws and other mandatory sentences which effectively trump the guidelines. The result can be significant sentencing disparity.

Finally, a very real danger of implementing such a guideline system must be emphasised. In Minnesota the original guidelines were introduced in 1980 with the avowed and laudable aim of reducing prison populations. Such guidelines are, however, amenable to hijack by penal populists intent on increasing penalties. This has occurred in Minnesota where the presumptive penalties have been increased twice since their inception. In 1989, after several highly-publicised homicides and considerable legislative pressure, the Sentencing Commission doubled several initial penalties: for example, the presumptive penalty for aggravated robbery was increased from 24 to 48 months. At the same time, it doubled the number of points accorded to prior convictions thereby again increasing the potential for, and duration of, imprisonment. The result was an increase in the incarceration rate.²²⁴

R. A. DUFF, “THEORIES AND POLICIES UNDERLYING GUIDELINES SYSTEMS”
(2005) 105 COLUMBIA L. REV. 1162,
1173–1174:

1–145

“Numerical sentencing guideline schemes ... will be unable to capture relevant differences between individual cases, and will fail to do substantive justice to or between individual offenders. Such schemes will lump together under the same offence category individual offences that vary significantly in their character and seriousness; they will assign the same criminal history score to offenders whose relevant characteristics, culpability and prospects vary significantly; in addition, what they define as ‘the same sentence’ (a specified number of months or years in prison) will encompass what are in their substantive character and impact vastly different punishments. They will thus appear to do justice, by treating ‘like’ cases ‘alike’. But they will achieve that appearance only by imposing artificial definitions of likeness on offences, offenders and sentences.”²²⁵

MICHAEL TONRY, SENTENCING MATTERS (1996), PP.13–24:

1–146

“The irony of ‘just deserts’ is that it backfired. The overriding aim was to make sentencing principled and fair ... If indeterminate sentencing sometimes produced racial and class disparities, other unwanted disparities, and sentences grossly out of proportion to the crimes of which offenders were convicted, there was much to be said for proposals to scale the severity of punishments to the seriousness of crimes and thereby to satisfy the first tenet of equal treatment to: ‘treat like cases alike’. In practice the effect was to focus attention solely on offenders’ crimes and criminal records, to the exclusion of ethically important differences in their circumstances, and thereby to fail the second tenet of equal treatment to ‘treat different cases differently.’

Reduced to their core elements, just desert theories are based on the intuitively powerful idea that punishment should be deserved, the empirical premise that most people agree about the comparative seriousness of crimes, and the proposal that crimes be ranked in order of their seriousness and punishments proportioned to those rankings ... In practice, however, while most academic proponents of desert theories favor overall reduction in the severity of punishments, the result has been both to make punishment more severe and to create disparities as extreme as any that existed under indeterminate sentencing.

... [B]ecause desert theories place primary emphasis on linking deserved punishments to the severity of crimes, in the interest of treating like cases alike, they lead to disregard of other ethically relevant differences between offenders—like their personal backgrounds and the effects of punishment on them and their families—and thereby often treat unlike cases alike ...

Just deserts, sometimes characterized as expressing a ‘principle of proportionality’, is sound in theory but defective in practice. In an ideal world in which all citizens have equal opportunities for self-realization and material advancement, the idea that deserved punishments can be calibrated precisely to the offender’s culpability, and that punishments should be apportioned accordingly, has much to commend it. Somewhat awkwardly for desert theories, however, ours is a world that in a number of respects falls short of the ideal.

... In just deserts principle, two offenders who commit the same offense and have similar criminal records deserve the same penalty. If applicable guidelines specify a two-year prison sentence, both should receive it. If one, however, is unemployed and has no permanent residence, and the other works and supports a family, many people will want to treat them differently. Partly, this is because the second seems more stable, more integrated into society, and somehow more worthy. Partly also, and equally important, it is because the second offender’s spouse and children—who have committed no crime—will also suffer ...

Judges, prosecutors, and other officials make decisions about whole people, and not about generic offenders who have committed offence X and have criminal history Y. Not surprisingly, they often feel moved to take the individual offender's circumstances into account in deciding what to do.

Another defect ... [is that in] objective terms, punishments that technically are the same may be very different. A 'generic' two-year prison sentence ... may range from time spent in a crowded, fear-ridden maximum security prison under lockup twenty-three hours per day to confinement under electronic monitoring in the offender's home, with medium and minimum security prisons, forestry camps, and halfway houses in between. All count as two years' deprivation of liberty, but all offenders and most observers see them as vastly different.

In subjective terms as well, two years' imprisonment in a single setting will have very different meanings to different offenders who have committed the same crime. Two years' imprisonment in a maximum security prison may be a rite of passage for a Los Angeles gang member. For an attractive, effeminate twenty-year-old, it may mean the terror of repeated sexual victimization. For a forty-year-old head of household, it may mean the loss of a job and a home and a family. For the unhealthy seventy-year-old, it may be a death sentence.

... By offering policy makers a rationale for sentencing that reduced relevant considerations to two that can be scaled on the axes of grids, [just desert theories] reified three-dimensional defendants into two-dimensional abstractions. When policy makers think of abstractions rather than people, it is easy to respond to an electoral opponent's possible 'soft on crime' accusations by voting to increase sentences or to establish mandatory penalties ... If a two-dimensional grid is chalked on to a legislative committee's blackboard, it takes little effort to erase numbers and replace them with higher ones."

2. England and Wales

1-147

There have been significant responses in England and Wales to sentencing disparity. First, since 1989 the Attorney-General has been able to refer an unduly lenient sentence, imposed by the Crown Court, to the Court of Appeal which has the power to increase that sentence.²²⁶ A disparate sentence can be an unduly light one as well as an unduly heavy one and so this right of appeal does go some way towards the elimination of unwarranted disparity. However, it is only Crown Court sentences (and not ones from magistrates' courts), and only sentences imposed for "indictable only" offences, that are referable. These account for fewer than 20% of sentences imposed in the Crown Court.²²⁷ Nevertheless, between 60 and 80 sentences are reviewed by the Court of Appeal for undue lenience each year and 88% of these are found to be unduly lenient.²²⁸

Secondly, in an attempt to structure sentencing discretion in the Crown Court, the Court of Appeal in the 1970s started handing down guideline judgments. These have usually occurred when a number of appeals have been heard at the same time and the Court of Appeal has taken the opportunity to make generalised statements about sentencing for that type of offence.

There are now guideline judgments dealing with a wide range of offences. There is evidence that some of these decisions resulted in sharp increases in sentencing levels.²²⁹ Further, it is uncertain to what extent these guideline judgments have helped control sentencing disparity. The problem was that guideline judgments, while helpful in indicating starting points for the severity of sentences, and in listing aggravating and mitigating circumstances, were insufficiently precise, in mathematical terms, as to how much sentences could be increased or decreased.²³⁰ Further, such judgments tended to concentrate on the more serious crimes with the result that there was insufficient guidance for cases dealing with less serious crimes where non-custodial sentences were likely.

In response to such criticisms a Sentencing Advisory Panel was established in 1999.²³¹ Its function was to give advice to the Court of Appeal which was obliged to have regard to these views and, if practicable or at the next appropriate opportunity, include guidelines in its judgment.

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 set up a new body, the Sentencing Guidelines Council, which was empowered to issue "definitive guidelines" based on advice provided by the Sentencing Advisory Panel. In 2009, the Sentencing Guidelines

Council and the Sentencing Advisory Panel were subsumed into a single body called the Sentencing Council.²³² The Council is made up of eight “judicial” and six “non-judicial” members, selected by the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Chancellor, respectively.²³³ The Council is entrusted with preparing draft guidelines with the requirement to consult with the Lord Chief Justice and House of Commons Justice Select Committee before producing definitive guidelines. The Council’s guidelines may be general in nature or limited to a particular category of offence or offender.²³⁴ In passing any sentence the courts “must ... follow any sentencing guideline ... unless the court is satisfied that it would be contrary to the interests of justice to do so”.²³⁵ The Council has issued definitive guidelines, amongst others, on the following matters: fundamental principles for measuring the seriousness of offences; the new sentences in the Criminal Justice Act 2003; discounts for guilty pleas; manslaughter by reason of provocation; robbery; sexual offences; assaults on children and child cruelty; failure to surrender to bail; assaults; breach of anti-social behaviour orders; causing death by driving; theft and burglary offences; attempted murder; fraud; corporate manslaughter and health and safety offences causing death; and youth sentencing. The importance of courts having regard to these guidelines was stressed in *Oosthuizen*²³⁶: the guidelines must be brought to the sentencer’s attention; the sentencer must have regard to them but it did “not necessarily follow that in every case a guideline will be followed”.

1–148

The Sentencing Council also publishes definitive guidelines for sentencing in magistrates’ courts,²³⁷ having taken over responsibility for such guidelines from the Magistrates’ Association. The duty on judges to have regard to sentencing guidelines now applies equally to magistrates for the first time. It should be noted that magistrates deal with around 97% of all criminal cases, and although one often thinks of imprisonment as the “normal” punishment for criminal offences, in magistrates’ courts the penalty applied in around 75% of cases is a fine.²³⁸ A major question for sentencers has been whether fines should try to be allocated to ensure equality of financial impact on offenders of different means. A £100 fine for someone of considerable means will not have the same impact as it would do on someone surviving on income support, for example. Raine and Dunstan note that in trying to achieve this goal of equality of financial impact, or “equity”, sentencers may find that they come into conflict with the additional, and perhaps more important, goals of proportionality (the just deserts requirement that the penalty fit the crime) and consistency in sentencing (minimising disparity in sentencing in two similar cases).²³⁹ The unit fine scheme under the Criminal Justice Act 1991 was one initiative that tried to ensure equality of impact but was extremely complex and was abandoned after the media reported apparent disparities and disproportionate sentences.²⁴⁰ However, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.164 has tried to continue the spirit of the unit fines system, in that it requires sentencers to take account of both offenders’ financial means and offence seriousness in setting fine levels. The Sentencing Council’s website now provides a “fine calculator” which is designed to “assist magistrates and judges in calculating the total financial penalty in a case”.²⁴¹

There will always be tension between the need to ensure that sentencers can do justice without their discretion becoming unduly fettered and the desire to discourage disparity in sentencing. These reforms constitute a major step towards ensuring consistency in sentencing. The Sentencing Council has taken a “narrative” approach in producing its guidelines for indictable offences, tending to consist of a first part discussing the features of the offence and factors that might increase or decrease its seriousness, and a second part which is set out in the form of a table, assigning a sentencing range to different levels of offence seriousness.²⁴² The approach to be taken by sentencers has been carefully set out in the guidelines, explaining the factors to be taken into account in a step-by-step methodology. Sentencers should start with looking at offence seriousness, the starting point for sentencing under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, by assessing culpability of the offender and harm caused or threatened by the offence. This should lead the sentencer to identify a “starting point” for the sentence. Consideration should then be given to any mitigating or aggravating factors, to either move up or down the sentencing “range” from the starting point. Although the range is set to try to encourage consistency in sentencing, it is possible for a sentence to be passed outside the range laid down in the guidelines. Once a provisional sentence has been arrived at, sentencers should then look at whether that sentence should be reduced due to offender mitigation (e.g. whether the offender has shown remorse) or a guilty plea. Unlike sentencing grids, such as those used in Minnesota, definitive guidelines produced by the Sentencing Council do not provide an automatic increase in sentence for previous convictions. However, the Sentencing Council notes that previous convictions may take a sentence beyond the sentencing range provided.²⁴³ Apart from the question, discussed above, of whether offenders with previous convictions deserve longer sentences than first-time offenders, this ability to increase a prison sentence based on past behaviour may contribute to a practical problem that has recently reached crisis point: that of overcrowding in prisons. The size of the problem, examined in a report by Lord Carter,²⁴⁴ can be summarised by reference to the fact that since the mid-1990s the prison population in England and Wales has increased by 60%, resulting in England and Wales having the second highest prison population per capita in prison capacity in Western Europe.²⁴⁵ To help remedy the situation, Carter recommended that in addition to the building of more prisons, including three “Titan” prisons,²⁴⁶ the Government should look to create a new, more structured, sentencing framework with a Sentencing Commission akin to those found in the US. The advantage of such frameworks is that they allow for the efficient management of prison places.

R. S. FRASE, “SENTENCING POLICY DEVELOPMENT UNDER THE MINNESOTA SENTENCING GUIDELINES” IN A. VON HIRSCH, A. ASHWORTH AND J. ROBERTS (EDS) PRINCIPLED SENTENCING, 3rd EDN (2009), P.275:

“Guidelines sentencing remains sufficiently predictable to permit accurate forecasts of resource impacts, and the Commission and the Legislature take these forecasts seriously and tailor their proposals to limit State and local resource impacts. As a result, the State’s prison population, although growing rapidly, has grown more slowly than in many other States over the past 26 years and has almost always remained within rated capacity.”

1–150

Following on from the Carter Report, a Sentencing Commission Working Group, chaired by Gage LJ, was established to explore the viability of a structured framework overseen by a Sentencing Commission, and issued a consultation paper,²⁴⁷ followed by a report,²⁴⁸ in 2008. Having visited Minnesota and North Carolina, the Working Group expressed the view that it was:

“conscious that the specific design of the USA sentencing grids, particularly the way that account is taken of previous criminal history, is overly formulaic and mechanistic to an extent that is inimical to our tradition of judicial discretion. However, the greater predictability and consistency that may be achieved by a structured sentencing framework makes it worthy of consideration.”²⁴⁹

Such a move would certainly not be welcomed by all, however. Wasik notes that the advantages of the English approach are that sentencing guidelines are able to focus on generic sentencing issues rather than just offence-specific guidelines and that the Sentencing Council is able to resist political pressure and media hype.²⁵⁰ Wasik concedes that although sentencing grids such as those in Minnesota allow for a more effective management of the prison population, this is at the expense of judges’ discretion, allowing little leeway either side of the presumptive numerical sentence, and argues that the objective of the Sentencing Council is preferable; that is: “uniformity of approach, not uniformity of outcome”.²⁵¹

Not all are convinced that the Sentencing Council’s guidelines provide the right balance between sentencing discretion and a structured approach. Cooper has argued that much of the guidance has become rhetoric:

“Aware, as any conscientious and realistic tribunal is, of the desirability of rendering their judgments less vulnerable to appeal, judges and advocates use the guidelines, not as helpful signposts to a proper disposal, but rather as fireproofing for any subsequent appeal. Box-ticking has tended to replace a careful consideration of the individual and pertinent facts of the case.”²⁵²

1–151

A more fundamental objection to Carter’s suggestion to import the idea of a Sentencing Commission from America is noted by Wasik:

“There is a deep irony in importing lessons on prison policy from a country where the sentenced custodial population is running at a rate of about 750 per 100,000, five times as high as in England and Wales (148) and 10 times the rate of imprisonment in much of the rest of Europe.”²⁵³

He points out that better models for reducing prison population can be found in Scandinavia. Work by Lacey similarly highlights the stark reality that the US is the last country one ought to take as a model for society’s use of the prison system. She takes a rather different view of the increasing prison population, in essence attributing the higher rates of incarceration in the UK and the US compared to countries within Scandinavia, northern Europe and Japan, to the electoral systems and market economies of those countries.

NICOLA LACEY, THE HAMLYN
LECTURES 2007, THE PRISONERS’
DILEMMA: POLITICAL ECONOMY AND PUNISHMENT IN CONTEMPORARY DEMOCRACIES (2008), P.76:

1–152

“To sum up, in liberal market economies with majoritarian electoral systems, particularly under conditions of relatively low trust in politicians, relatively low deference to the expertise of criminal justice professionals, and a weakening of the ideological divide between political parties as they become increasingly focused on the median voter and correspondingly less able to make commitments to a stable party base, the unmediated responsiveness of politics to popular opinion in the adversarial context of the two-party system makes it harder for governments to resist a ratcheting up of penal severity.”

1–153

Lacey’s proposal for reducing the prison population and the tendency towards social exclusion which punishment produces is that criminal justice policy ought to be removed from party politics altogether and placed in the hands of an independent body. She recognises that this suggestion may seem “impossibly utopian”²⁵⁴ but arguably such a move would not be inconsistent with the introduction of an American-style Sentencing Commission, depending on how such a body would operate. An alternative way to minimise the effects of party politics might be to require sentencing guidelines to be placed before Parliament in their entirety for parliamentary approval. This approach has been advocated by the New Zealand Law Commission,²⁵⁵ and was considered by the Sentencing Commission Working Group, the members of which were in disagreement as to its merits. Although controversial, Lacey’s proposal to remove sentencing from politics altogether, as opposed to increasing the input of politicians by involving Parliament as a whole, would surely be a more effective way of controlling the prison population and could be the solution to the problem Carter was entrusted with addressing.

Despite the lack of a Sentencing Commission within England and Wales, the Sentencing Council does have several duties which may have the effect of controlling imprisonment rates. First, the Council must produce a resource assessment when issuing any draft or definitive guidelines.²⁵⁶ This will assess the likely impact of the guidelines on prison places and the provision of probation services. In addition to this, the Council’s annual report must include an assessment of the effect which any changes in the sentencing practice of courts are having or are likely to have on prison places and the provision of probation services.²⁵⁷ This is not quite the Sentencing Commission envisaged by Carter, since the Council continues to work on an ad hoc, or “penny numbers”²⁵⁸ basis, with the Lord Chancellor and Court of Appeal given the option of proposing that sentencing guidelines be prepared in relation to specific offences or sentencing matters.²⁵⁹ It will not involve the systematic ranking of all existing offences in order of seriousness, something which Ormerod notes would be a massive task.²⁶⁰ It was the prospect of such a lengthy exercise that prompted the Sentencing Commission Working Group to abandon the idea of a grid-like framework and American-style Sentencing Commission.²⁶¹

It is a major theme of this book that all offences should be structured and labelled to reflect a hierarchy of seriousness. The extent to which seriousness should be reflected in the substantive law or left to the sentencing stage (being regulated by sentencing guidelines) is a crucial matter. It is to these issues of substantive law—and the relationship between that law and sentencing—that the remainder of this book is devoted.

1 Criminal Justice Act 1993 s.52.

2 Possession of indecent photos of children was made a criminal offence by the Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.160; the taking of such photos was made a criminal offence under the Protection of Children Act 1978 s.1(1)(a). The Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.62 prohibits the possession of prohibited images of children (pornographic images that are grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise of an obscene character).

3 The Independent 4 September 2008.

4 Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005 s.4.

5 Legal Services Act 2007 s.181.

6 Ministry of Justice, Criminal Offences Gateway Guidance (2011) at <http://www.justice.gov.uk/downloads/legislation/criminal-offences-gateway-guidance.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].

7 Ministry of Justice, Revision: New Criminal Offences, England and Wales 1 June 2009–31 May 2014: Statistics Bulletin (2015).

8 Ministry of Justice, New Criminal Offences England and Wales 1 June 2009–31 May 2011 Statistics Bulletin (2011).

9 J. Chalmers and F. Leverick, “Tracking the Creation of Criminal Offences” [2013] Crim. L.R. 543–560. They suggest that the Ministry of Justice figures for that year substantially underestimate the number of new offences created. cf. J. Chalmers and F. Leverick, “Scotland: Twice as Much Criminal Law as England” [2013] 17 Edin.

- L.R. 376–381.
- 10 N. Lacey, “Contingency and Criminalisation” in Ian Loveland (ed), The Frontiers of Criminality. Modern Legal Studies (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995).
 - 11 Report of the Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution (1957).
 - 12 H. Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (California: Stanford University Press, 1968).
 - 13 Some theorists, adopting a conflict view of society, would argue that the criminal law represents nothing more than the vested interests of the powerful, e.g. R. Quinney, The Social Reality of Crime (Boston: Little, Brown and Co, 1970).
 - 14 G. Hughes, “Morals and the Criminal Law” (1962) 71 Yale L.J. 662, 666–669.
 - 15 T. Honoré, “The Dependence of Morality on Law” (1993) 13 O.J.L.S. 1, 2.
 - 16 J. R. Gusfield, “On Legislating Morals: The Symbolic Process of Designating Deviance” (1968) 56 Cal. L. Rev. 54, 55–56.
 - 17 Gross argues further that committing a crime is necessarily a moral wrong because it involves violating a “solemn promise to live according to the rules” of society. However, we are here concerned with the content of these rules and their relationship to morality.
 - 18 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212. The facts and an extract from the case are given at 315–318.
 - 19 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 255.
 - 20 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 237.
 - 21 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 256–257.
 - 22 See D. Scoccia, “In Defense of ‘Pure’ Legal Moralism” (2013) 7 Crim. Law and Philos. 513.
 - 23 J. Fitzjames Stephen, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity (New York: Holt & Williams, 1873), p.125.
 - 24 P. Devlin, Morals and the Criminal Law (reprinted in The Enforcement of Morals) (1965), p.8.
 - 25 In 1987 it was estimated that 74% of the population regarded homosexual relations as “always” or “mostly” wrong (S. Harding, “Trends in Permissiveness” in Jowell, Witherspoon and Brook (eds), British Social Attitudes, the 5th Report (Aldershot: Gower, 1988), p.36. However, by 2012 that figure had fallen to 28% (British Social Attitudes, 30th Report, 2013) at <http://www.bsa.natcen.ac.uk/latest-report/british-social-attitudes-30/personal-relationships/homosexuality.aspx> [Accessed March 2017].
 - 26 G. Hughes, “Morals and the Criminal Law” (1962) 71 Yale L.J. 662, 676–678.
 - 27 L. Bibbings and P. Alldridge accuse their Lordships of being homophobic: “Sexual Expression, Body Alteration, and the Defence of Consent” (1993) J. Law & Soc. 356, 358. cf. S. Cowan, “Criminalizing SM: Disavowing the Erotic, Instantiating Violence”, in R. A. Duff, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011), Ch.4.
 - 28 cf. D.J. Baker, “The Moral Limits of Consent as a Defence in the Criminal Law” (2009) 12 New Crim. L. Rev. 93–121, who suggests that the consent of the participants in Brown was not sufficient to override the harm inflicted on the participants because it violated their dignity as human beings and that the criminalisation of the defendants in that case was prima facie fair because their - actions were “wrongfully harmful in the objective sense” (as 101, see also 117–118).

- 29 See below, paras 4-056–4-059.
- 30 For a defence of Lord Devlin, see E. V. Rostow, “The Enforcement of Morals” [1960] C.L.J. 174 where he suggests that Lord Devlin so qualifies his central conditions with cries for tolerance, etc. that the gap between him and his critics is very small.
- 31 H. L. A. Hart, “Immorality and Treason” 62 The Listener 163 (30 July 1959).
- 32 Hughes, “Morals and the Criminal Law” (1962) 71 Yale L.J. 662, 682. He points out that this approach will still contain elements of irrationality but that it is better than the “throwing the baby out with the bath water” (Hart, “Immorality and Treason”, 62 The Listener 163) approach of Devlin.
- 33 R. A. Duff, “Towards a Modest Legal Moralism” (2014) 8 Crim. Law and Philos. 217; See also R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2007), Chs 4–6; M. S. Moore, Placing Blame: A Theory of Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1997). Duff has described himself as a “positive Legal Moralism”: R. A. Duff, “Perversions and Subversions of Criminal Law” in R.A. Duff, The Boundaries of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2010), p.91. cf. M. Thorburn, “Constitutionalism and the Limits of the Criminal Law” in R.A. Duff, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011), Ch.5, for a critique of Moore and Duff’s approaches to legal moralism.
- 34 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212.
- 35 cf. The “risk of harm” test relied on in relation to the regulation of pornography: V. E. Munro and J. Scoular, “Harm, Vulnerability, and Citizenship: Constitutional Concerns in the Criminalization of Contemporary Sex Work” in R. A. Duff, The Constitution of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2013), Ch.3.
- 36 The acts are: an act which threatens a person’s life; an act which results, or is likely to result, in serious injury to a person’s anus, breasts or genitals; an act which involves sexual interference with a human corpse; and a person performing an act of intercourse or oral sex with an animal (whether dead or alive).
- 37 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.63(6). cf. the offence of possession of prohibited images of children created by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.62, which uses the same terminology.
- 38 cf. the Sexual Offences Act 2003 ss.63 and 64, which criminalise consensual incest between adults. It has been argued that legal moralism lies behind these offences, rather than any clear harm related or public interest justification: T. Hömle, “Consensual Adult Incest: A Sex Offence?” [2014] 76 New Crim. L. Rev. 76; J. R. Spencer, “Incest and Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights” (2013) 72 C.L.J. 5. cf. Stubing v Germany [2013] 1 F.L.R. 107.
- 39 C. McGlynn and E. Rackley, “Criminalising Extreme Pornography: A Lost Opportunity” [2009] Crim. L.R. 245.
- 40 McGlynn and Rackley, “Criminalising Extreme Pornography: A Lost Opportunity” [2009] Crim. L.R. 245, 257.
- 41 McGlynn and Rackley, “Criminalising Extreme Pornography: A Lost Opportunity” [2009] Crim. L.R. 245, 257.
- 42 Home Office Consultation Paper: On the Possession of Extreme Pornographic Material (2005).
- 43 McGlynn and Rackley, “Criminalising Extreme Pornography: A Lost Opportunity” [2009] Crim. L.R. 245, 257, 258. See also, E. Rackley and C. McGlynn, “Prosecuting

- the Possession of Extreme Pornography: A Misunderstood and Mis-Used Law” [2013] Crim. L.R. 400–405. cf. P. Johnson, “Law, Morality and Disgust: The Regulation of ‘Extreme Pornography’ in England and Wales” (2010) 19 Social & Legal Studies 147–163, who argues that: “The morality test in section 63, enables a ‘measurement’ of harm to be made that is more appropriate to the aims of the legislation. It provides a flexible way to continually pose the crucial question that underpins the justification for the legislation: ‘is the private possession of these images harmful to the moral values of society?’”, at 154–155.
- 44 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 245–246.
- 45 J. Kaplan, “The Role of the Law in Drug Control” [1971] Duke Law Journal 1065, 1068.
- 46 H. Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (New York: OUP, 1979), p.120.
- 47 J. Feinberg, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others (New York: OUP, 1985), p.12. cf. A. P. Simester and A. von Hirsch, Crimes, Harms and Wrongs: On the Principles of Criminalization (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2011), pp.97–107.
- 48 P. Roberts, “The Philosophical Foundations of Consent in the Criminal Law” (1997) 17(3) O.J.L.S. 389, 394.
- 49 “Appendix C: Consent and the Criminal Law: Philosophical Foundations” was specially commissioned by the Law Commission and written by Paul Roberts. While reproducing his advice, the Law Commission felt itself unable to adopt the approach he favours (para.2.1).
- 50 “Appendix C: Consent and the Criminal Law: Philosophical Foundations” para.2.15.
- 51 “Appendix C: Consent and the Criminal Law: Philosophical Foundations” para.2.18.
- 52 “Appendix C: Consent and the Criminal Law: Philosophical Foundations” para.2.18.
- 53 Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 Sch. 2.
- 54 For offences of possession, Class A drugs attract a maximum sentence of 7-years’ imprisonment, for Class B drugs the maximum sentence is 5 years and for Class C drugs it is 2 years.
- 55 Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 (Amendment) Order 2008 (SI 2008/3130) art.2(2)(a) (in force from 26 January 2009).
- 56 House of Commons Science and Technology Committee, Drug Classification: Making a Hash of It?, Fifth Report of Session 2005–06 (2006), p.27. For further discussion of the criminalisation of magic mushrooms, see C. Walsh, “Magic Mushrooms and the Law” [2005] Crim. L.R. 773–783.
- 57 Psychoactive Substances Act 2016.
- 58 House of Commons Science and Technology Committee, Drug Classification: Making a Hash of It?, Fifth Report of Session 2005–06 (2006), p.47. See P. R. Ferguson, “‘Smoke gets in your eyes ...’ the criminalisation of smoking in enclosed public places, the harm principle and the limits of the criminal sanction” (2011) 3 Legal Studies 259–278, who argues that the risk of harm to nonsmokers from passive smoking is preferable as a justification for this criminalisation to legal paternalism.
- 59 B. E. Harcourt, “The Collapse of the Harm Principle” (1999) 90 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 109. cf. Thorburn, “Constitutionalism and the Limits of the Criminal Law”, in R. A. Duff, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011).
- 60 R. A. Duff, “Introduction: The Boundaries of the Criminal Law” in R. A. Duff, The Boundaries of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2010), p.20.

- 61 R. A. Duff, “Introduction: The Boundaries of the Criminal Law” in R. A. Duff, The Boundaries of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2010), p.20.
- 62 Nuffield Council on Bioethics, Public Health: Ethical Issues (2007), para.5.39; T. Elliott, “Pursued by the ‘fat police’? The obesity ‘epidemic’ and the criminal law”, in A. M. Viens, J. Coggon and A. Kessel, Criminal Law, Philosophy and Public Health Practice (Cambridge: CUP, 2013), Ch.6.
- 63 J. Feinberg, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others (Oxford: OUP, 1985), p.5. See, e.g. the use which has been made of the Malicious Communications Act 1988 s.1 and the Communications Act 2003 s.127, to prosecute “trolls”, who send offensive or provocative messages via social media. The CPS, in its Guidelines on Prosecuting Cases Involving Communications Sent via Social Media (2013) at http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/a_to_c/communications_sent_via_social_media/ [Accessed March 2017] has indicated that prosecutions under the Malicious Communications Act 1988 s.1 and the Communications Act 2003 s.127 should only be brought where the communication in question is grossly offensive: “Just because the content expressed in the communication is in bad taste, controversial or unpopular, and may cause offence to individuals or a specific community, this is not in itself sufficient reason to engage the criminal law”.
- 64 J. Stanton-Ife, “Horrific Crime” in R. A. Duff, The Boundaries of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2010), Ch.6 p.162.
- 65 Stanton-Ife, “Horrific Crime” in R. A. Duff, The Boundaries of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2010), Ch.6 p.162.
- 66 See also: D. Husak, Overcriminalization: The Limits of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2008); D. Husak, “Reservations about Overcriminalization” (2011) 14 New Crim. L. Rev.97. cf. N. Jareborg, “Criminalisation as a Last Resort (Ultima Ratio)” (2004–2005) 2 Ohio State J. of Crim. Law 521.
- 67 Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (California: Stanford University Press, 1968), pp.277–282.
- 68 Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (California: Stanford University Press, 1968), pp.282–295.
- 69 Although female circumcision was prohibited by the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985 (later repealed and replaced by the Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003), until 2014 there had been no prosecution in England and the practice nevertheless continued. Keir Starmer, a former DPP, has suggested that this failure of the law to achieve its goals was because investigating authorities took the wrong approach to gathering the necessary evidence to support a prosecution: “We sat back and waited for a girl to walk into a police station”: L. Bannerman and F. Gibb, “Britain urged to take tougher line on female mutilation” The Times 23 January 2014. The DPP finally announced the first prosecution (of a doctor) under the 2003 Act on 12 March 2014: First Prosecutions for Female Genital Mutilation at http://www.cps.gov.uk/news/latest_news/first_prosecutions_for_female_genital_mutilation/ [Accessed March 2017]. cf. the position in relation to those who assist terminally ill relatives to travel to the Dignitas Clinic in Switzerland to commit assisted suicide. Strictly speaking, their conduct amounts to the offence of assisting suicide under the Suicide Act 1961 s.2 (see below, paras 8-151–8-155), but no prosecution has yet been brought in such a case: http://www.cps.gov.uk/publications/prosecution/assisted_suicide.html [Accessed April 2017].
- 70 Whilst Packer identified the need for criminal law to achieve utilitarian goals as a determinative factor in applying this criterion, Husak notes that there may often be

- alternatives to the criminal law in preventing a particular conduct or harm. However, Husak notes that punishment for crimes additionally has an expressive function in stigmatising conduct we wish to censure. It is this latter function which will often determine whether it is necessary to employ the criminal law: D. Husak, “The Criminal Law as Last Resort” (2004) 24 O.J.L.S. 207.
- 71 See below, para.4-056.
- 72 L. Bibbings and P. Alldridge, “Sexual Expression, Body Alteration, and the Defence of Consent” (1993) 20 J. Law & Soc. 356 at 362. cf. S. Cowan, “Criminalizing SM: Disavowing the Erotic, Instantiating Violence” in R. A. Duff, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011).
- 73 The Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution (Wolfenden Committee), The Report of the Departmental Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution (London, HMSO, 1957) para.61.
- 74 R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart, 2007), p.139.
- 75 Human Rights Act 1998 s.19: this applies to all Bills and not only those creating criminal offences.
- 76 Sutherland v United Kingdom [1998] E.H.R.L.R. 117.
- 77 Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000 s.1.
- 78 Human Rights Act 1998 s.3(1).
- 79 Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Assoc Ltd v Donoghue [2002] Q.B. 48.
- 80 R. v A (No.2) [2002] 1 A.C. 45.
- 81 R. v Misra (Amit) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21.
- 82 R. v Adomako (John Asare) [1995] 1 A.C. 171. In R. v Nursing (Ligaya) [2013] 1 W.L.R. 1031, the Court of Appeal held that the offence of wilful neglect of an adult lacking capacity under the Mental Capacity Act 2005 was sufficiently certain (cf. R. v Hopkins (Annette) [2011] EWCA Crim 1513; (2012) 123 B.M.L.R. 1).
- 83 Att-Gen v Jason Prior [2001] Jersey Law Reports 146. See Mackay and Gearty [2001] Crim. L.R. 560. This position was doubted by the Court of Appeal in Jersey (Att-Gen v Prior [2002] Jersey Law Reports 11) and it has not been followed in Guernsey (R. v Harvey unreported 3 August 2001). See Mackay [2002] Crim. L.R. 728 and Law Commission, Insanity and Automatism: Supplementary Material to the Scoping Paper (2012), paras 5.34–5.35, and C.70–73.
- 84 Laskey v United Kingdom (1997) 24 E.H.R.R. 39.
- 85 Recourse to the European Court of Human Rights is still retained if all domestic remedies have been exhausted (ECHR art.34).
- 86 R. v G [2003] 1 Cr. App. R. 23. See also R. v G [2009] 1 A.C. 92 (discussed in Ch.3 paras 3-028–3-029), followed in Brown [2013] UKSC 43; Concannon [2002] Crim. L.R. 211. J. Arkinstall and C. O’Brien, “Table of Cases under the Human Rights Act” [2002] E.H.R.L.R. 364 provides a comprehensive list of English cases under the Human Rights Act 1998: in only one of the cases cited was there a successful challenge under the Act (Percy [2001] EWHC Admin 1125 concerned with the Public Order Act 1985 s.5).
- 87 R. (on the application of) Countryside Alliance v Att-Gen [2006] EWCA Civ 817 upheld by the House of Lords: [2007] UKHL 52; [2007] 1 A.C. 719.

- 88 The House of Lords, e.g. made a declaration of incompatibility in relation to the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 s.23 (detention without trial for suspected terrorists) on the basis that it was found to be in breach of the right to liberty provided in the ECHR art.5: A (FC) (Appellants) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (Respondent) [2004] UKHL 56. cf. Beghal v DPP [2015] UKSC 49; [2016] A.C. 88: The power to stop, question and detain a person at a port or border under the Terrorism Act 2000 Sch.7, not incompatible with ECHR art.8; See further, A. Ashworth, “A Decade of Human Rights in Criminal Justice” [2014] Crim. L.R. 325–337.
- 89 J. Rogers, “Applying the Doctrine of Positive Obligations in the European Convention on Human Rights to Domestic Substantive Criminal Law in Domestic Proceedings” [2003] Crim. L.R. 690.
- 90 McCann v United Kingdom (1996) 21 E.H.R.R. 97.
- 91 A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 E.H.R.R. 611.
- 92 Minkinen has argued that there are not 2 questions to answer here (i.e. whether the criminalisation is necessary under the last resort principle and whether it is permissible under the ECHR). Instead he argues that the last resort principle should be recognised as a legal principle, which requires that laws must be drafted in accordance with constitutional rights (including the ECHR) and in doing so all alternatives to criminalisation as the solution to a social harm must first be properly examined and verifiably ruled out before criminalisation is allowed: “‘If Taken in Earnest’: Criminal Law Doctrine and the Last Resort” (2006) 45 Howard J. 521.
- 93 In addition, certain criminal statutes create offences which are extremely vague and broad and/or which may be regarded as preinchoate in that they criminalise conduct which falls short of the “more than merely preparatory” conduct required for an attempt (see below, Ch.5). e.g. the Terrorism Act 2006 s.5, makes it an offence for a person, “with intent to commit an act of terrorism or to assist another to do so, to engage in ‘any conduct in preparation for giving effect to’ that intention”. As Ashworth and Zedner observe: “The conduct may therefore be perfectly normal and non-dangerous of itself—buying a map, a railway timetable or a computer manual may fulfil the actus reus”: A. Ashworth and L. Zedner, “Just Prevention: Preventive Rationales and the Limits of the Criminal Law”, in R. A. Duff and S. Green, Philosophical Foundations of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011), Ch.13 p.285. Where offences are drafted in such a fashion, considerable reliance must be placed upon prosecutorial discretion in relation to the decision to charge, and this may add further uncertainty to the law. See J. Rogers, “The Role of the Public Prosecutor in Applying and Developing the Substantive Criminal Law” in R. A. Duff, The Constitution of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2013), Ch.4 and J. Hodgson and V. Tadros, “The Impossibility of Defining Terrorism” (2013) 16 New. Crim. L.R. 526.
- 94 R. v Chambers (William) [2008] EWCA Crim 2467. cf. A. Ashworth, “Ignorance of the Criminal Law and Duties to Avoid it” [2011] 74 M.L.R. 1–26.
- 95 Chambers [2008] EWCA Crim 2467 at [64].
- 96 J. R. Spencer, “The Drafting of Criminal Legislation: Need it be so Impenetrable?” (2008) 67(3) C.L.J. 585–605.
- 97 Also referred to as utilitarian theories of punishment. A consequentialist seeks to achieve a consequence at any price; a utilitarian sets a price on the achievement of that goal: in this context, only the minimum amount of punishment thought necessary to achieve the consequence can be justified.
- 98 G. W. F. Hegel, Hegel’s Philosophy of Right, T. M. Knox (trans.) (Oxford: OUP, 1967), para.101.

- 99 For an overview of retributivist rationales, see S. Easton and C. Piper, Sentencing and Punishment: The Quest for Justice (Oxford: OUP, 2016).
- 100 E. W. Puttkammer, Administration of Criminal Justice (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953).
- 101 M. R. Cohen, “Moral Aspects of the Criminal Law” (1940) 49 Yale L.J. 987, 1025.
- 102 R. A. Duff, Punishment, Communication and Community (New York: OUP, 2001).
- 103 For a good bibliography, see A. von Hirsch, A. Ashworth and J. Roberts, Principled Sentencing, 3rd edn (Oxford: Hart, 2009).
- 104 The Criminal Justice Act 1991 was largely based on this philosophy. Over the past 30 years a significant number of states in the US have undertaken major sentencing reforms based primarily on just deserts thinking. The public tends to view this as the rationale of punishment: J. M. Walker and N. Hough, Public Attitudes to Sentencing (Aldershot: Gower, 1988), pp.185–186.
- 105 H. Morris, “Persons and Punishment” (1968) 52 The Monist 475.
- 106 J. Finnis, “The Restoration of Retribution” (1971) 32 Analysis 131.
- 107 J. Hampton, “Correcting Harms versus Righting Wrongs: The Goal of Retribution” (1992) 39 U.C.L.A. Law Rev. 1659, 1686.
- 108 M. S. Moore, “The Moral Worth of Retribution” in E. Schoeman (ed), Responsibility, Character, and the Emotions: New Essays in Moral Philosophy (Cambridge: CUP, 1987).
- 109 A. von Hirsch, Past or Future Crimes: Deservedness and Dangerousness in the Sentencing of Criminals (Boston: Rutgers University Press, 1985), p.52.
- 110 Absolute deterrence may be considered a fourth level. However, as it applies to the criminal justice system in its entirety, as against an individual theory of punishment, it is not discussed in detail in this chapter. We simply note here that absolute deterrence is the theory that by having a body of criminal laws and a justice system which enforces those laws people will be deterred from committing crimes. It is almost impossible to test the plausibility of this theory as it would require the abolition of the criminal justice system of England and Wales in order to test whether an increase in crime occurs. As we will see, there are similarities between absolute deterrence and that which is viewed as educative.
- 111 Sometimes referred to as “specific deterrence”.
- 112 N. Walker and N. Padfield, Sentencing: Theory, Practice and Law, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 1996), pp.79–95.
- 113 Ministry of Justice, Proven Re-offending Statistics Quarterly Bulletin January to December 2014, England and Wales (2016).
- 114 Ministry of Justice, Proven Re-offending Statistics Quarterly Bulletin January to December 2014, England and Wales (2016), p.4.
- 115 E. A. C. Raaijmakers, J. W. de Keijser, P. Nieuwbeerta and A. J. E. Dirkzwager “Why longer prison terms fail to serve a specific deterrent effect: an empirical assessment on the remembered severity of imprisonment” 23 (2017) Psychology, Crime & Law 32.
- 116 E. A. C. Raaijmakers, J. W. de Keijser, P. Nieuwbeerta and A. J. E. Dirkzwager “Why longer prison terms fail to serve a specific deterrent effect: an empirical assessment on the remembered severity of imprisonment” 23 (2017) Psychology, Crime & Law 32, p.49.

- 117 Abolished by the Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.123.
- 118 This was the main reason for the abolition of detention centre orders (C. Emmins and G. Scanlan, The Criminal Justice Act 1988 (New York: Hyperion Books, 1988), p.101).
- 119 J. Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (London: Pickering, 1823).
- 120 M. Gill, Commercial Robbery (London: Blackstone Press, 2000), p.106.
- 121 P. T. Wright and S. H. Decker, Burglars on the Job: Streetlife and Residential Break-ins (Northeastern, 1994), pp.61, 137.
- 122 T. Bennett and R. Wright, Burglars on Burglary (Aldershot: Gower, 1984).
- 123 Whether increasing the severity of a punishment affects the prevalence of an offence.
- 124 A. Doob and C. Webster, "Sentence Severity and Crime: Accepting the Null Hypothesis" (2003) 30 Crime and Justice: A Review of Research 143. See also, Home Office, Making Punishments Work: Report of a Review of the Sentencing Framework for England and Wales (Halliday Report), (2001).
- 125 R. Hood and C. Hoyle, The Death Penalty: A World Wide Perspective (Oxford: OUP, 2015).
- 126 A. von Hirsch, Criminal Deterrence and Sentence Severity, (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 1999), pp.41, 48.
- 127 e.g. R. v Storey (Paul Edwin) (1973) 57 Cr. App. R. 840.
- 128 e.g. R. Motley (Gary) (1978) 66 Cr. App. R. 274.
- 129 R. v. Blackshaw [2011] EWCA Crim 2312 at [4].
- 130 C. S. Lewis, "The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment" (1953) VI Res Judicatae 224.
- 131 Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public (1990) Cmnd.965, para.2.8.
- 132 e.g. the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 containing minimum sentences for burglars and drug-dealers upon a third conviction (since repealed by the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000).
- 133 D. M. Kahan, "The Secret Ambition of Deterrence" (1999) 113 Harv. L. Rev. 413 argues that in general "the real value of deterrence—its secret ambition—is to quiet illiberal conflict between contending cultural styles and moral outlooks"; the rhetoric of deterrence is a liberal ploy to defuse or suppress contentious moral issues; it is a cover-up: "the real significance of liberal theory [relating to deterrence] lies not in what it says but in what it stops us from saying" pp. 415–416.
- 134 R. v Lanham (Stephen) [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 105; R. v Povey [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 42.
- 135 Povey [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 42.
- 136 S. Platt, A. Amos, C. Godfrey, C. Martin, D. Ritchie, M. White, K. Hargreaves and G. Highet, Evaluation of smoke free England: a longitudinal, qualitative study (2009) Report to the Department of Health. Public Health Research Consortium, p.8.
- 137 M. Walters, "Conceptualizing 'hostility' for hate crime law: minding 'the minutiae' when interpreting section 28(1)(a) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998" (2014) 34(1) O.J.L.S 47. Though note that huge spikes in recorded hate crimes are often observed after "trigger events", such as the EU Referendum in June 2016.
- 138 See, however, the research cited in P. Robinson and J. Darley, "Does Criminal Law

- Deter? A Behavioural Science Investigation” (2004) 24 O.J.L.S. 177 indicating that the deterrent effect of many drink/driving laws has been temporary (199).
- 139 Goldschmitt v State 490 So. 2d 123 (Fla. 1986).
- 140 Ballenger v State 210 Ga. App. 627, 436 S.E. 2d 793 (1993).
- 141 The Guardian 4 February 1997.
- 142 H. Kaufmann, “Legality and Harmfulness of a Bystander’s Failure to Intervene as Determinants of Moral Judgment” in J. R. Macaulay and L. Berkowitz (eds), Altruism and Helping Behaviour: Social Psychological Studies of Some Antecedents and Consequences (New York: New York Academic Press, 1970).
- 143 N. Walker and C. Marsh, “Do Sentences Affect Public Disapproval?” (1984) 24 Brit. J. Criminol. 27.
- 144 Contra N. Walker and C. Marsh, “Do Sentences Affect Public Disapproval?” (1984) 24 Brit. J. Criminol. 27 who concluded that public disapproval of conduct was not influenced by severity of punishment.
- 145 R. v Sargeant (1975) 60 Cr. App. R. 74.
- 146 A. Chrisafis, “Killing puts ‘castration’ on French agenda” The Guardian 3 September 2009.
- 147 J. M. Walker and N. Hough, Public Attitudes to Sentencing: Surveys From Five Countries (Aldershot: Gower, 1988), pp.178–179.
- 148 R. A. Duff and D. Garland, A Reader on Punishment (Oxford: OUP, 1994), p.239.
- 149 N. Morris, “On ‘Dangerousness’ in the Judicial Process” (1982) Record of Assn of the Bar of the City of New York 102, 115.
- 150 For a critique of Walker’s views, see D. Wood, “Dangerous Offenders and the Morality of Protective Sentencing” [1988] Crim. L.R. 424, 425–429.
- 151 M. Tonry, “Prediction and Classification: Legal and Ethical Issues” in D. M. Gottfredson and M. Tonry (eds), Prediction and Classification: Criminal Justice Decision Making (Chicago: University of Chicago Press Journals, 1987), p.397.
- 152 J. Floud and W. Young, Dangerousness and Criminal Justice (London: Heineman, 1981).
- 153 J. Floud, “Dangerousness and Criminal Justice” (1982) 22 Brit. J. Criminol. 213, 220.
- 154 See A. von Hirsch and J. Roberts, “Legislating Sentencing Principles: the Provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Relating to Sentencing Purposes and the Role of Previous Convictions” [2004] Crim. L.R. 639.
- 155 Halliday Report (2001).
- 156 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.142(1)(d).
- 157 Previously prescribed under the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.225(3).
- 158 Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 c.10 Pt 3 c.5 s.123(a).
- 159 R. v Roberts [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 14.
- 160 Each applicant had reached the original minimum term that had been set.
- 161 A “serious offence” is a specified offence that is punishable by life imprisonment or by a determinate sentence of 10 years or more (Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.224(2)).
- 162 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.225(2)(b).
- 163 As listed under the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.15.

- 164 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.226(1)(b).
- 165 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.225(1)(b), Guidelines on the assessment of dangerous can be found in s.229. Guidance on how to approach this issue was also given in R. v Lang (Stephen Howard) [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 3.
- 166 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.17, amending the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.229.
- 167 D. A. Thomas, “Commentary on Att-Gen’s Reference (No.55 of 2008)” [2009] Crim. L.R. 221.
- 168 A. E. Bottoms and R. Brownsword, “The Dangerousness Debate after the Floud Report” (1982) 22 Brit. J. Criminol. 229.
- 169 N. Walker “Punishing, Denouncing or Reducing Crime” in P. R. Glazebrook (ed), Reshaping the Criminal Law (London: Stevens, 1978), p.393.
- 170 See, e.g. F. T. Cullen and K. E. Gilbert, Reaffirming Rehabilitation (Cincinnati: Anderson Publishing Co, 1982).
- 171 See C. Walker, Crime and Punishment in Great Britain (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1968), pp.134–138, and N. Morris, The Future of Imprisonment (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974).
- 172 R. Cross, Punishment, Prison and the Public (London: Stevens, 1971).
- 173 R. Martinson, “What Works?” (1974) Public Interest 35. Martinson’s article has been misquoted as stating that “nothing works”. See also, D. Lipton, R. Martinson and J. Wilks, The Effectiveness of Correctional Treatment (New York: Praeger, 1975).
- 174 R. Martinson, “New Findings, New Views: A Note of Caution Regarding Sentencing Reform” (1979) 7 Hofstra L. Rev. 243.
- 175 A. von Hirsch, Past or Future Crimes (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1987), p.5.
- 176 See, generally, M. Tonry, “Obsolescence and Immanence in Penal Theory and Policy” (2005) 105 Col. L.R. 1233.
- 177 J. McGuire (ed), What Works: Reducing Reoffending (Chichester: John Wiley, 1995); P. Raynor, “Community Penalties, Probation, and Offender Management” in M. Maguire, R. Morgan and R. Reiner (eds), The Oxford Handbook of Criminology, 5th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2012); Parliamentary All-Party Penal Affairs Group, Changing Offending Behaviour—Some Things Work (1999).
- 178 Halliday Report (2001), paras 1.49, 1.50.
- 179 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.142(1)(c).
- 180 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.177(1).
- 181 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.148(2)(a). Some of the requirements that can be imposed are not rehabilitative in their aim: for example, a prohibited activity requirement or a curfew requirement.
- 182 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.148(1).
- 183 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.177(1)(2A).
- 184 N. Christie, “Conflicts as Property” (1977) 17 Brit. J. Criminol. 1.
- 185 Christie, “Conflicts as Property” (1977) 17 Brit. J. Criminol. 1. Though it is often claimed that the RJ is rooted to ancient and/or indigenous practices of justice, see G. Maxwell and A. Morris, Families, Victims and Culture: Youth Justice in New Zealand (Wellington, Institute of Criminology, Victoria University of Wellington and

- Social Policy Agency, 1993).
- 186 H. Zehr, Changing Lenses: A New Focus for Crime and Justice (Scottsdale, Pennsylvania: Herald Press, 1990), p.181.
- 187 John Braithwaite, Crime, Shame and Reintegration (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989), p.80.
- 188 G. Maxwell and A. Morris, “The Role of Shame, Guilt, and Remorse in Restorative Justice Processes for Young People”, in E. Weitekamp and H. Kerner (eds), Restorative Justice: Theoretical Foundations (Cullompton, Devon: Willan Publishing, 2002) pp.280–281.
- 189 C. Hoyle, R. Young and R. Hill, Proceed with Caution: An Evaluation of the Thames Valley Police Initiative in Restorative Cautioning (York: Joseph Rowntree Foundation, 2002).
- 190 Criminal Justice Joint Inspection (CJJI), Facing Up to Offending: Use of Restorative Justice in the Criminal Justice System (London: HMIC, HMI Probation, HMI Prisons and the HMCPSI, 2012), p.15.
- 191 e.g. Referral Orders, see the Powers of the Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 ss.16–32 and Sch.1.
- 192 Referral Orders, see the Powers of the Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 ss.16–32 and Sch.1.
- 193 L. Sherman and H. Strang, Restorative Justice: The Evidence (London: The Smith Institute, 2007).
- 194 Sherman and H. Strang, Restorative Justice: The Evidence (2007).
- 195 Ministry of Justice, Restorative Justice Action Plan for the Criminal Justice System (2012), p.5.
- 196 Ministry of Justice, Code of Practice for Victims of Crime (2015). Pursuant to the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.33. The House of Commons Justice Committee’s recent inquiry into RJ reported that “[w]e agree in principle that restorative justice should be available for all types of offence ... We recommend a rigorous system be introduced to improve compliance with the police’s requirement to inform victims about restorative justice ... [and] [w]e recommend that the Ministry of Justice, when publishing its Action Plan progress report, provide an explanation of how they envisage restorative justice taking place across the criminal justice system.” House of Commons, Justice Committee, Restorative Justice: Fourth Report of Session 2016-17 (London: House of Commons, 2016), pp.30–31.
- 197 Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 s.1ZA.
- 198 A. Crawford, “The State, Community and Restorative Justice: Heresy, Nostalgia and Butterfly Collecting” in L. Walgrave (ed), Restorative Justice and the Law (Cullompton, Devon: Willan Publishing, 2002).
- 199 A. Ashworth, “Responsibilities, Rights and Restorative Justice” (2002) 42 Brit. J. Criminol. 578.
- 200 “Prolegomenon to the Principles of Punishment” in H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969), p.1.
- 201 D. Wood, “Retribution, Crime Reduction and the Justification of Punishment” (2002) 22 O.J.L.S. 301.
- 202 A. H. Goldman, “The Paradox of Punishment” (1979) 9 Philosophy and Public Affairs 42.

- 203 Wood, “Retribution, Crime Reduction and the Justification of Punishment” (2002) 22 O.J.L.S. 301, 307.
- 204 For a similar argument, see J. Braithwaite and P. Pettit, Not Just Deserts. A Republican Theory of Criminal Justice (New York: OUP, 1992), p.167.
- 205 A. C. Ewing, “A Study of Punishment II: Punishment as Viewed by the Philosopher” (1943) 21 Can. B. Rev. 102, 116.
- 206 N. Morris, Punishment, Desert and Rehabilitation (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1976).
- 207 Halliday Report (2001).
- 208 Halliday Report (2001), para.2.39.
- 209 Halliday Report (2001), para.2.31. See E. Baker and C. M. V. Clarkson, “Making Punishments Work? An Evaluation of the Halliday Report on Sentencing in England and Wales” [2002] Crim. L.R. 81.
- 210 Halliday Report (2001), pp.39–40.
- 211 A. von Hirsch and J. V. Roberts, “Legislating Sentencing Principles: The Provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Relating to Sentencing Purposes and the Role of Previous Convictions” [2004] Crim. L.R. 639, 642.
- 212 Ministry of Justice, Government Response to the Justice Select Committee’s Report: “Sentencing Guidelines and Parliament: Building a Bridge” Cmnd.7716 (2009), p.7.
- 213 Sentencing Guidelines Council, Overarching Principles: Seriousness (2004). See further discussion below on the role of the sentencing guidelines.
- 214 R. Tarling and M. Weatheritt, Sentencing Practice in Magistrates’ Courts (H.O.R.S. No.56, 1979), p.45. See also N.A.C.R.O., The Real Alternative (1989), pp.10–17; J. Corbett, “Magistrates’ Courts Clerks’ Sentencing Behaviour: An Experimental Study”, in S. Lloyd-Bostock and D. Pennington (eds), The Psychology of Sentencing (Oxford: Centre for Socio-Legal Studies, 1987), p.205; and Liberty, Unequal before the Law; Sentencing in Magistrates’ Courts in England and Wales 1981–1990 (1992).
- 215 For a full list of these states, see R. S. Frase, “State Sentencing Guidelines: Diversity, Consensus and Unresolved Policy Issues” (2005) 105 Col. L.R. 1190.
- 216 Originally, this range was much narrower; it was expanded in 2004: R. H. Wandall, “Equality by Numbers or Words: A Comparative Study of Sentencing Structures in Minnesota and in Denmark” (2006) 17 Criminal Law Forum 1, 13, 35. 217 State v Hernandez 311 N.W. 2d 478 (Minn. 1981).
- 218 Almost 80% of prison sentences are in fact stayed: Frase, “State Sentencing Guidelines: Diversity, Consensus and Unresolved Policy Issues” (2005) 105 Col. L.R. 1190, 1214.
- 219 This is where the court orders a sentence with a duration that is other than the presumptive fixed duration or range in the appropriate cell on the applicable Grid.
- 220 Minnesota Sentencing Guidelines Commission, Sentencing Practices: Annual Summary Statistics for Felony Offenders (2016), p.59 at http://mn.gov/msgc-stat/documents/reports/2015/UPDATED_2_2_2017_2015_MSGC_Annual_Summary_Data_Rej [Accessed March 2017].
- 221 Frase, “State Sentencing Guidelines: Diversity, Consensus and Unresolved Policy Issues” (2005) 105 Col. L.R. 1190.
- 222 The United States Sentencing Commission initially sought to introduce guidelines allowing offenders to be sentenced according to the real crime they committed rather than the one for which they admitted guilt. The Commission was, however, ultimately forced to abandon such a scheme because of difficulties of establishing the “real” crime (United States Sentencing Commission, 2001 Federal Sentencing Guideline Manual, A.4(a)).

- 223 M. Tonry, “Sentencing Guidelines and Sentencing Commissions—the Second Generation” in K. Pease and M. Wasik (eds), Sentencing Reform: Guidance or Guidelines (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1987), p.39.
- 224 Frase, “State Sentencing Guidelines: Diversity, Consensus and Unresolved Policy Issues” (2005) 105 Col. L.R. 1190.
- 225 See also R. H. Wandall, “Equality by Numbers or Words: A Comparative Study of Sentencing Structures in Minnesota and in Denmark” (2006) 17 Criminal Law Forum 1.
- 226 Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.36.
- 227 S. Shute, “Who Passes Unduly Lenient Sentences? How Were They Listed?: A Survey of Att-Gen’s Reference Cases, 1989–1997” [1999] Crim. L.R. 603.
- 228 Shute, “Who Passes Unduly Lenient Sentences? How Were They Listed?: A Survey of Att-Gen’s Reference Cases, 1989–1997” [1999] Crim. L.R. 603.
- 229 R. Ranyard, B. Heberton and K. Pease, “An Analysis of a Guideline Case as Applied to the Offence of Rape” (1994) 33 Howard J.C.J. 203, 215.
- 230 Ranyard, Heberton and Pease, “An Analysis of a Guideline Case as Applied to the Offence of Rape” (1994) 33 Howard J.C.J. 203, 208–209.
- 231 Crime and Disorder Act 1998 ss.80–81.
- 232 Established under the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.118.
- 233 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 Sch.15.
- 234 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.120(2)
- 235 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.125(1).
- 236 R. v Oosthuizen (Lee) [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 73.
- 237 Sentencing Council, Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines at <http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/news/item/revise-magistrates-court-sentencing-guidelines-published/> [Accessed March 2017]
- 238 J. Raine and E. Dunstan, “How Well do Sentencing Guidelines Work?: Equity, Proportionality and Consistency in the Determination of Fine Levels in the Magistrates’ Courts of England and Wales” (2009) 48 The Howard Journal 13, 15.
- 239 Raine and Dunstan, “How Well do Sentencing Guidelines Work?: Equity, Proportionality and Consistency in the Determination of Fine Levels in the Magistrates’ Courts of England and Wales” (2009) 48 The Howard Journal 13, 15.
- 240 Raine and Dunstan, “How Well do Sentencing Guidelines Work?: Equity, Proportionality and Consistency in the Determination of Fine Levels in the Magistrates’ Courts of England and Wales” (2009) 48 The Howard Journal 13, 15.
- 241 See <https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/fine-calculator/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 242 A. Ashworth, “Techniques for Reducing Sentencing Disparity” in A. von Hirsch, A. Ashworth and J. Roberts (eds) Principled Sentencing, 3rd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2009).
- 243 Research has found that in a significant number of cases (46% of 222 offences of assault, sexual assault and robbery), sentencers imposed a sentence outside the

- guideline ranges for the levels of offence seriousness described: Sentencing Commission Working Group, Crown Court Sentencing Survey, July 2008.
- 244 Lord Carter, Securing the Future: Proposals for the Efficient and Sustainable Use of Custody in England and Wales (2007).
- 245 Only Spain has a higher rate of imprisonment. G. Berman and A. Dar, Prison Population Statistics (2013).
- 246 Large prisons to house approximately 2,500 prisoners per prison (Carter, Securing the Future: Proposals for the Efficient and Sustainable Use of Custody in England and Wales (2007), p.38.
- 247 Sentencing Commission Working Group, A Structured Sentencing Framework and Sentencing Commission: Consultation Paper (2008).
- 248 Sentencing Commission Working Group, Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales: An Evolutionary Approach (2008).
- 249 Sentencing Commission Working Group, Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales: An Evolutionary Approach (2008), para.1.7.
- 250 M. Wasik, “Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales—State of the Art” [2008] Crim. L.R. 253, 254.
- 251 Wasik, “Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales—State of the Art” [2008] Crim. L.R. 253, 259.
- 252 J. Cooper, “The Sentencing Guidelines Council—a Practical Perspective” [2008] Crim. L.R. 277, 280.
- 253 Wasik, “Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales—State of the Art” [2008] Crim. L.R. 253, 263.
- 254 Lacey, The Hamlyn Lectures 2007, p.195.
- 255 W. Young and C. Browning, “New Zealand’s Sentencing Council” [2008] 4 Crim L.R. 287. However, in New Zealand sentencing guidelines do not require positive approval by Parliament. Rather, the guidelines will automatically come into force unless they are disallowed by negative resolution within a specified period.
- 256 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.127.
- 257 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.130.
- 258 A. Ashworth, Oral Evidence taken before the Justice Committee on the Sentencing Commission, 14 October 2008, HC (2007–08) 1095-I, Q 37, quoted in House of Commons Justice Committee, Sentencing Guidelines and Parliament: building a bridge, HC 715, (2009), para.350.
- 259 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.124
- 260 D. Ormerod, Editorial [2008] Crim. L.R. 413.
- 261 Sentencing Commission Working Group, Sentencing Guidelines in England and Wales: An Evolutionary Approach (2008), para.3.11. Note that the Law Commission has established a project to create a New Sentencing Code for England and Wales. The aim of the project is to create a single sentencing statute which brings all of the existing legislation governing sentencing into one place. The Code will not replace sentencing guidelines but instead will consolidate existing sentencing legislation and work alongside the guidelines produced by the Sentencing Council. See, Law Commission, Sentencing law in England and Wales Legislation currently in force (Full Consultation Paper) (2015).

Chapter 2

The General Principles of Criminal Liability

I. Introduction

2-001

The criminal law is an institution of blame and punishment. Blame is attached to the defendant's conduct and if that conduct violates the law she is punished for it (whether for retributive or deterrent, etc reasons). However, in what circumstances are we to blame someone for her conduct, and blame her to a degree sufficient to justify the imposition of punishment? And in what circumstances can someone's actions be said to have violated the law?

Generally, the law is concerned with punishing harmful actions that are committed in circumstances or in conditions in which we can fairly blame the perpetrator of the actions. This is, of course, only a general proposition. Not all acts that are criminal cause an obvious harm. With the crime of attempt, for instance, no actual harm has been caused. Similarly, criminal liability is often imposed in circumstances where many feel that no blame can be attached to the actor. Thus, in crimes of strict liability a person who has acted to the best of her ability can be punished if, albeit inadvertently, she violates a statute making certain conduct criminal. The question of whether such conduct, which either involves no obvious harm or is generally perceived to involve no blameworthiness, should be punishable will be considered later in this book.

Let us return to the general proposition which can be broken down into two limbs:

1. Harmful conduct: Sometimes “conduct” can in itself be forbidden on the basis that it constitutes or threatens a harm. Alternatively, it is conduct that causes a harmful result that is forbidden by the criminal law. The word “conduct” is here used in its broadest sense to encompass an omission to act or even a state of affairs. The law has developed a short-hand term, actus reus, to describe this.
2. Committed in conditions in which we can fairly blame the actor: The problem here is to determine the indicators of blame. It is widely accepted that two such indicators exist:
 - (a) Mens rea. Some would only blame those who acted with a subjective mental element (for example, intending to kill). Others would blame those whose actions objectively failed to conform to a set standard. Either way, the law has developed a short-hand term, mens rea, to describe this.¹
 - (b) Absence of defence. A defendant might have committed an actus reus and have mens rea but, because of the circumstances, we might not wish to hold her liable and punish her. She might have a valid defence in that she acted, say, in self-defence or under duress.

One way of interpreting this is that the constituent ingredients of a crime are three-fold: actus reus, mens rea and the absence of a valid defence.²

There are, however, other modes of analysing the constituent elements of a crime. Glanville Williams, for instance, argued that all elements of a crime are divisible into either actus reus or mens rea and that the actus reus requirement includes absence of defence.³ Others argue that mens rea means blameworthiness in the sense of mental element (or, possibly, negligence) plus absence of defence.⁴

This divergence of views can be illustrated simply. The crime of murder is defined as the “unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought”. The constituent elements of this crime can be analysed in three ways:

- (1) There are three elements—the actus reus of killing a human being, the mens rea of malice aforethought, and the requirement of unlawfulness indicating the absence of any defence.

- (2) The actus reus is unlawfully killing a human being; the requirement of unlawfulness (absence of defence) is part of the actus reus.⁵ The mens rea requirement is malice aforethought.
- (3) The actus reus is killing a human being. The mens rea is the element of blameworthiness which encompasses both the malice aforethought and the unlawfulness (absence of defence) requirement.

2-002

The possible importance of these different modes of analysis will be discussed later but, for the moment, the fact that there are these very different modes of analysis serves to emphasise an important point. The terms actus reus and mens rea are no more than tools that are useful in the exposition of the criminal law. Dividing crime into its constituent elements in this way should be no more than a matter of analytical convenience.⁶ Whether defendants are to be convicted should depend on important principles aimed at deciding whether their conduct deserves condemnation as criminal; such questions should not be answered by reference only to definitions of actus reus and mens rea. Questions of policy should not be determined by reference to definition and terminology.⁷

In Miller, Lord Diplock disapproved of such terminology:

“My Lords, it would I think be conducive to clarity of analysis of the ingredients of a crime that is created by statute, as are the greater majority of criminal offences today, if we were to avoid bad Latin and instead to think and speak about the conduct of the accused and his state of mind at the time of that conduct, instead of speaking of actus reus and mens rea.”⁸

In this book we have chosen to disregard Lord Diplock’s command. We shall analyse crimes in terms of actus reus, mens rea and absence of defence. We do this for the simple reason that as long as one appreciates that these terms are no more than tools, they are tools that can usefully aid the clear exposition of the rules of criminal law. Further, they have been so much part of the criminal law vocabulary for hundreds of years, and still are, that many of the cases to be discussed in this book would be highly confusing, if not totally meaningless, without some understanding of the orthodox meaning of these terms.

In this chapter, we shall consider the primary basis of criminal liability in terms of actus reus and mens rea. For the sake of clarity the discussion of the general defences has been reserved for a separate chapter.

II. Actus Reus

A. INTRODUCTION

2-003

To many people, evil thoughts, desires and intentions are as reprehensible as evil deeds and, if we had the means to detect such criminal propensities, we would be justified in punishing such persons. The law, however, is not concerned with punishing people for thinking evil thoughts or having evil intentions.⁹ The law will not interfere unless there has been some conduct, some physical manifestation of the evil intention.¹⁰ Some crimes only require the slightest manifestation: in conspiracy, for example, all that is needed is an agreement to commit a crime. However, minimal as it might be, this agreement is nevertheless a physical manifestation of the evil intention; it is conduct and can form the basis of an actus reus.

Why does the law insist upon an actus reus as a prerequisite of criminal liability? One obvious reason is the desire to avoid punishment of thoughts alone:

”[t]here can hardly be anyone who has never thought evil. When a desire is inhibited it may find expression in fantasy; but it would be absurd to condemn this natural psychological mechanism as illegal.”¹¹

Further, in addition to it being morally inappropriate to punish mere intentions, there is doubt as to whether people have sufficient control over their thoughts to be held responsible for them.¹²

A. GOLDSTEIN, “CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD THE UNITED STATES”
(1959) 68 YALE L.J. 405, 405–406:

2–004

“[The notion of not punishing evil intentions alone] expresses today, as it did three centuries ago, the feeling that the individual thinking evil thoughts must be protected from a state which may class him as a threat to its security. Rooted in scepticism about the ability either to know what passes through the minds of men or to predict whether antisocial behaviour will follow from antisocial thoughts, the act requirement serves a number of closely-related objectives: it seeks to assure that the evil intent of the man branded a criminal has been expressed in a manner signifying harm to society; that there is no longer any substantial likelihood that he will be deterred by the threat of sanction; and that there has been an identifiable occurrence so that multiple prosecution and punishment may be minimized.”

2–005

As seen above, a mere agreement to commit a crime is regarded as a sufficient manifestation of evil intentions to constitute the actus reus of conspiracy; similarly, mere words of instruction or encouragement are sufficient to render one liable for aiding and abetting a crime. Whether these ought to be regarded as a sufficient manifestation of evil intentions to justify the imposition of criminal liability is a question to be considered later.

B. CONSTITUENT ELEMENTS OF ACTUS REUS

2–006

The actus reus of every crime is different. The actus reus of theft is the appropriation of property belonging to another¹³ and the actus reus of rape is the penetration of the vagina, anus or mouth of another person who does not consent to the penetration.¹⁴

With all crimes the actus reus is the external element of the crime—the objective requirement necessary to constitute the offence. Crimes can be divided into two categories and the essential elements of an actus reus depend on which of these two species of crime one is dealing with. First, there are crimes, known as conduct crimes, where the only external element required is the prohibited conduct itself. Thus, the actus reus of the offence of dangerous driving is simply driving a mechanically propelled vehicle on a road or other public place.¹⁵ No consequence of that dangerous driving need be established.¹⁶ Secondly, there are other crimes, known as result crimes, where the external elements of the offence require proof that the conduct caused a prohibited result or consequence. Thus, the actus reus of the offence of causing death by dangerous driving is causing the “death of another person by driving a mechanically propelled vehicle dangerously on a road or other public place”.¹⁷ Here it is necessary to establish that the dangerous driving caused the forbidden consequence specified in the actus reus, namely, the death of another person.

Conduct crimes provide a good illustration of the criminal law punishing offenders who have caused no obvious harm. However, it can be argued that in the above example there is a harm, namely causing danger to other road users. If this is indeed a harm, it is clearly a lesser harm than actually killing another road-user. Should this difference be reflected by differing penalties for the two offences? Or should one proceed on the basis that as the forbidden conduct is the same in both offences, the result (death) could be entirely fortuitous, thus not reflecting upon the driver’s responsibility and consequently the two offences should carry the same penalty? This is an issue to which we shall return later in the book.

2–007

From the above it can be seen that both conduct crimes and result crimes have two elements in common: (1) both require an “act” or conduct, i.e. driving; and (2) both require that the act be carried out in defined legally relevant circumstances, i.e. on a road or other public place. If the same act of driving the car occurred in a private field, the actus reus of the offence would not be made out. It is only dangerous driving on a road or other public place that is prohibited. Similarly, the actus reus of theft requires that the property “belong to another”. In the absence of this circumstance, for example, if the property is owned by the would-be thief, the actus reus of the crime is not made out. Just as mens rea may or may not be required for the act and for the consequences in result crimes, liability may similarly depend upon whether the accused has the required mental state in relation to the legally defined relevant circumstances. So, in theft, if the defendant honestly believes that she is the owner of the property, there would be no mens rea in relation to a vital element of the actus reus.¹⁸

With result crimes it is necessary to establish an additional third element, namely, that the act caused the prohibited consequence, for example, caused the death of another person. If poison is put into the drink of another person with intent to kill that person who subsequently dies with the drink found beside him, liability for murder cannot exist unless it was the poison that caused the death. If the deceased had died of a heart attack, the only possible charge would be attempted murder.¹⁹

Putting these elements together, it is common to find an actus reus described as:

- (1) an “act”;
- (2) committed in legally relevant circumstances; and
- (3) (for result crimes) causing the prohibited result.

One final point needs to be made by way of introduction. Whilst many crimes are so defined that the defendant may be convicted on the basis of the actus reus alone without need for proof of mens rea (crimes of so-called strict liability), the converse is not true. There must always be an actus reus for liability to be at issue at all. If, for example, in an alleged case of theft, the property already belongs to the person taking it, then despite any intention to steal, the actions cannot amount to the crime of theft. Similarly, where a defendant persuades another to purchase his car by representing that it is free from encumbrances, believing he is lying, he cannot be found guilty of fraud if it turns out that it was in fact free from encumbrances.²⁰ The defendant has unwittingly told the truth; the car was his to sell and his dishonest state of mind counts for nothing. The fact that a defendant believes he has committed an actus reus is not enough. The actus reus must be proved objectively to exist.

We are now in a position to examine in greater detail the requirements of an actus reus.

1. An “act”

(i) The act must be voluntary

2–008

The distinction between an act and any accompanying mental element required by the law for the imposition of liability has already been drawn. Thus, if we define murder as killing when there is an intention to kill or cause serious harm we can readily accept the acquittal of someone whose claim that it was all a dreadful accident is accepted by the courts. But the circumstances of the accident might lead us to very different conclusions about the basis of the acquittal. If the defendant claims that the accident lay in thinking the weapon was an imitation one rather than a real one, then this translates into a denial of mens rea; the defendant did not have the necessary intention to kill or cause serious harm. However, if the defendant claims to have shot the victim as a result of stumbling down some icy steps, the “accident” here appears to be of a more fundamental kind. The act itself seems defective. Punishment seems inappropriate—even if we were dealing with a crime where no mental element was required (crimes of strict liability). The difficulty lies in trying to pin-point the defect. The law has generally shied away from identifying why it is inappropriate to punish in such circumstances beyond affirming that acts must be “voluntary”. Instead, it has been left to academic lawyers and philosophers to explore what this means.

JOHN AUSTIN, LECTURES ON JURISPRUDENCE (5TH EDN) (XVIII– XIX) VOL.I 411–415:

2–009

“Certain movements of our bodies follow invariably and immediately our wishes and desires for those same movements. Provided, that is, that the bodily organ be sane, and the desired movement be not prevented by any outward obstacle ... These antecedent wishes and these consequent movements, are human volitions and acts (strictly and properly so-called) ... And as these are the only volitions, so are the bodily movements by which they are immediately followed the only acts or actions (properly so-called). It will be admitted on the mere statement, that the only objects which can be called acts are consequences of volitions. A voluntary movement of my body, or a movement which follows a volition, is an act. The involuntary movements which (for example) are the consequences of certain diseases, are not acts.”

2-010

We are asked, therefore, to divide the human act into two elements: the desire for the muscular movement and the movement itself. In the case of the defendant who kills another as a result of falling down some steps, there would be no accountability for the harm done because of the absence of a willed or desired muscular movement. However, this breakdown of human behaviour has been fiercely criticised. Hart points out that, described in these terms, it cannot apply to omissions (where to speak of the necessity for a willed failure to move one's muscles is not only clumsy but an inaccurate reflection of the law).²¹ Furthermore, such an analysis does not reflect the reality of our movements.

H. L. A. HART, PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (1968), PP.101-102:

2-011

“[A] desire to contract our muscles is a very rare occurrence: there are no doubt some special occasions when it would be quite right to say that what we are doing is contracting our muscles, and that we have a desire to do this. An example of this is what we may do under instruction in a gymnasium. The instructor says ‘lift your right hand and contract the muscles of the upper arm.’ If we succeed in doing this

(and it is not so easy) it would be quite appropriate to say we desired to and did contract our muscles ... [But] when we shut a door, or when we hit someone, or when we fire a gun at a bird, these things are done without any previous thought of the muscular movements involved and without any desire to contract the muscles ... The simple but important truth is that when we deliberate and think about actions, we do so not in terms of muscular movements but in the ordinary terminology of actions.”

GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, THE MENTAL ELEMENT IN CRIME (1965), PP.17–18:

2–012

“[O]ne cannot by introspection, identify a conscious exercise of will previous to movement. Indeed, one cannot always find an exercise of will at all. Many acts are performed unthinkingly; not only a reflex like dropping a hot poker but much of the routine of life, such as shaving, eating, walking. We seem to switch on an ‘automatic pilot’ for many of the familiar tasks we perform; yet we are undoubtedly acting. Even when we make a conscious decision and act to carry it out, the act is something different from the preceding deliberation.”

2–013

In this statement Williams, in accordance with many commentators, tacitly upholds the distinction drawn in English law between mens rea and actus reus. But other critics of the willed movement principle do not. Welzel,²² a German philosopher, argued that the causal theory upon which this principle, and much of the criminal law rests, is misconceived. He does not accept that there are a set of desires which cause the movements to occur. Instead, he favours a view of acting that looks to the actor’s goal. The distinction between a bodily movement and an “act” lies not in any preceding will but in the purpose of the actor—what she was seeking to achieve. According to this philosophical stance, not only is it wrong to divide up the act, as Austin and his supporters do, but to divide any mental state from its act would be equally invalid. The two, he would claim, are inextricably linked and are incapable of separate analysis.

More representative of the standard approach is the view of Williams that:

“Notwithstanding these difficulties of definition everyone understands the proposition that an act is something more than bodily movement—for bodily movement might occur in tripping and falling, which would not be described as an act.”²³

Broad consensus does seem to exist that it would be unjust to punish in these situations, despite the harm done. Those who feel that the willed movement analysis is unhelpful argue that what is missing is an ability to control one’s actions. In no real sense are the actions “his”²⁴ and, therefore, criminal liability is inappropriate. At this point, however, the consensus breaks down. Some commentators argue that involuntariness:

“is best analysed as representing a spectrum or continuum of potentially excusing conditions running from total incapacitation or involuntariness, as in sleep-walking or muscular spasm, to cases say of (concussion-induced) confusion. These conditions are all reducible to an absence of fault and therefore, ... share the same underlying rationale of other excusing conditions such as duress, provocation and diminished responsibility.”²⁵

In short, a person whose actions are classified as involuntary can be afforded a type of defence called an excuse and can be exempted from criminal liability. The essence of an excuse is that the actor is blameless. If it were the actor’s own fault that the involuntary conduct occurred, the law will not excuse that conduct. If the reason that the person fell down the stairs was that she was extremely drunk, we are entitled to say that carrying a loaded gun in that state of intoxication is culpable conduct and, accordingly, the resultant death or injury ought not to be excused.

2-014

Other commentators, however, argue that in cases of involuntary conduct the absence of “the ordinary link between mind and behaviour”,²⁶ is more fundamental than that involved when, for example, duress is pleaded. The defendant who shoots another because there is a gun pointed at her partner’s head accepts that she has done it, but pleads that she lacked any real opportunity to do otherwise. The defendant who shoots another as a result of falling down steps denies authorship. There is a complete denial of basic responsibility and the defendant is afforded an exemption.²⁷ The defendant has done no wrong; there is nothing to excuse.²⁸

Whatever the theoretical basis of the exemption from liability, the law has tended to describe these cases of involuntariness as involving a defence of automatism. The precise nature and effect of this defence depends on a variety of circumstances surrounding the involuntary conduct. Accordingly, detailed consideration of this exemption from liability based on involuntariness is best left to Ch.4 where defences are considered.

(ii) Status offences

2–015

The requirement that there must be an act and that this involves voluntary human conduct has caused particular problems in the context of what are known as “status offences” or “situational liability”.

A crime can be defined in such a manner that no conduct is required, but the crime is committed when a certain state of affairs exists or the defendant is in a certain condition or is of a particular status. The following notorious case is a classic example of this.

R. V LARSONNEUR (1933) 24 CR. APP.
R. 74 (COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL):

2–016

A French subject was permitted to land in the UK subject to certain conditions endorsed on her passport. These conditions were subsequently varied by a condition requiring her to depart from the UK not later than a certain date. On that date she went to the Irish Free State. An order for her deportation from the Irish Free State was made by the executive authorities of that country, and she was subsequently brought back to Holyhead in the custody of the Irish Free State police, who then handed her over to the police of the UK, by whom she was detained. She was convicted on a charge that she “being an alien to whom leave to land in the United Kingdom has been refused was found in the United Kingdom”, contrary to the Aliens Order 1920 arts 1(3)(g) and 18(1)(b). She appealed against her conviction.

MARSTON GARSIA, FOR THE APPELLANT:

“For an alien to whom leave to land has been refused to commit an offence under art.18(1)(b) of the Order three elements are necessary:

- i. the alien must land in the United Kingdom;
- ii. such landing must be contrary to art.1 of the Order;
- iii. the alien, having so landed in the United Kingdom, must be found therein.

Therefore the mere fact of being found in the United Kingdom after the time limited for her departure therefrom had expired was not in itself an offence, unless it could be proved in addition that she landed in the United Kingdom in contravention of art.1. Here the evidence showed that she had not landed at all, but that she had been landed by a superior force over which she had no control. Having thus come to be found in the United Kingdom, she was not guilty of any offence under art.18(1)(b).”

J. F. EASTWOOD, FOR THE CROWN:

“The whole point is whether the appellant was found within the United Kingdom; how she got here makes no difference at all. The word ‘found’ was used deliberately in the section so that if any alien who had no right to be here is here an offence is committed. By reason of art.1(4) of the Order she falls within the same category as one who had originally been prohibited from landing.”

HEWART, LCJ:

“[T]he appellant is an alien. She has a French passport, which bears [a] statement ... [requiring] ‘departure from the United Kingdom not later than March 22, 1933.’ ... In fact, the appellant went to the Irish Free State and afterwards, in circumstances which are perfectly immaterial, so far as this appeal is concerned, came back to Holyhead. She was at Holyhead on April 21, 1933, a date after the day limited by the condition on her passport.

In these circumstances, it seems to be quite clear that art.1(4) of the Aliens Order, 1920 ... applies. The article is in the following terms:

‘... An alien who fails to comply with any conditions so attached or varied, and an alien who is found in the United Kingdom at any time after the expiration of the period limited by any such conditions, shall for the purposes of this Order be deemed to be an alien to whom leave to land has been refused.’

The appellant was, therefore, on April 21, 1933, in the position in which she would have been if she had been prohibited from landing by the Secretary of State and, that being so, there is no reason to interfere with the finding of the jury. She was found here and was, therefore, deemed to be in the class of persons whose landing had been prohibited by the Secretary of State, by reason of the fact that she had violated the condition on her passport. The appeal, therefore, is dismissed and the recommendation for deportation remains.”

Appeal dismissed

2-017

What is objectionable about convictions for status offences such as that in Larsonneur is that the defendant's actions are involuntary. There is nothing objectionable about the offence per se in Larsonneur and had Larsonneur brought herself voluntarily into the UK her conviction would have aroused no comment. It was the involuntary nature of her forced entry that provoked the controversy. In short, status offences are not objectionable if the defendant has control over the status. It would be wrong to have an offence of having a common cold but, as Husak argues, it could be justifiable to have an offence of having a beard, as this is a process over which one has control.²⁹ Under the Terrorism Act 2000 s.11(1) it is a criminal offence to belong to a proscribed organisation such as ISIS. This provision is not aimed merely at prohibiting the “act” of joining the proscribed organisation; it applies equally to those who joined before the date of commencement of the Act. This looks as though it is punishing persons for the mere status of being members of ISIS.

However, s.11(2) provides a defence if one became a member before the organisation was proscribed and if one has not taken part in any of its activities while the organisation is proscribed. Thus, what is being punished in reality is a status over which there is control—evidenced by action (i.e. either joining the proscribed organisation after the date of commencement of the Act or, if one joined before then, taking part in its activities).

DOUGLAS HUSAK, “DOES CRIMINAL LIABILITY REQUIRE AN ACT” IN ANTONY DUFF (ED), PHILOSOPHY AND THE CRIMINAL LAW (1998), PP.75, 77–79:

2–018

“[P]ersons typically have control over their choices, and persons are responsible and deserve punishment only for those states of affairs over which they exercise control. I submit that the absence of control, and not the absence of action, establishes the outer boundary of deserved punishment and responsibility. I claim, in other words, that what I will call the control requirement should be substituted for the act requirement as a necessary condition of criminal liability and deserved punishment ... The core idea behind the control requirement is that a person lacks responsibility for those states of affairs he or she is unable to prevent from taking place or obtaining. If the state of affairs for which he is responsible is an action, he must have been able not to perform that action. If the state of affairs is a status, he must have been able not to have that status ... I propose to explicate control in terms of what it is reasonable to expect of persons. A person lacks control over a state of affairs and neither is nor ought to be criminally liable for it if it is unreasonable to expect him or her to have prevented that state of affairs from obtaining ...

[T]he issue of whether an agent has control over a state of affairs admits of degrees ... and one person may have more control over the same kind of state of affairs than another person ... [L]ess control is needed before responsibility is imposed for an especially bad state of affairs than for a not-so-bad state of affairs.”

Following this reasoning, status offences are only unjustifiable if the person had no control over their status. However, as seen earlier when examining involuntary conduct, the general requirement of voluntariness can be dispensed with if it was the defendant's own fault that her actions were involuntary, for example, if she chose to get very drunk. So, too, liability for a status offence becomes justifiable if it was the defendant's own fault she got into that status or were in that situation. It has even been argued that the decision in Larsonneur was justifiable because it was her own fault that she was in the situation of being an illegal immigrant.

DAVID LANHAM, "LARSONNEUR REVISITED" [1976] CRIM. L.R. 276, 278-280:

"[The defence of physical compulsion is] not an absolute defence. It may, at least with regard to certain types of crime, be defeated if the defendant has been at fault in bringing about the situation which has exposed him to compulsion ... It is the thesis of this paper that Miss Larsonneur was probably the author of her own misfortune and that the fact that at the last moment she was acting under compulsion was properly regarded as affording her no defence ... Miss Larsonneur's recorded confession is worth quoting: ...

'A short time ago my sister Mrs McCorry came to see me in France and invited me to visit her in London. On my arrival my sister introduced me to a Frenchman named René, who was living with her, and also introduced me to an Englishman named Harold Brown. René and Brown said they would arrange a marriage for me with an Englishman and they later introduced me to a man named George Drayton. We tried to get married at Guildford but the police stopped the marriage. They took my French passport from me but returned it the same day, telling me that the Home Office had ordered me to leave the country at once. Brown and René told me not to worry as they were going to get legal advice.

Next day I went to Ireland with Brown. We travelled as Mr & Mrs Wiggins. Brown said he had seen a solicitor, and that if I went to Ireland I would be in order. I naturally believed him. René and Drayton also travelled to Ireland, but not with us. There were difficulties in Ireland about marrying and eventually the police told me to leave Ireland by April 17. I wanted to leave Ireland at once, but René and Brown told me that everything would be alright (sic.), and that they were trying to find an Irish priest willing to marry us. I think it terrible that I should be the only one to suffer.’”

2-021

It is difficult to see that this justifies the decision in Larsonneur. What is meant by the defendant being “at fault”? Surely the fault must be related in some way to the offence charged. In our earlier example of the drunken person carrying a gun and falling down the stairs, it is legitimate to assert that the ensuing results were the fault of the defendant. The fault of getting drunk while in possession of a gun and any offence committed with that gun are clearly connected. Trying to go through a marriage of convenience (not an unlawful act) is not connected in the same way to the offence committed by Larsonneur.

WINZAR V CHIEF CONSTABLE OF KENT, THE TIMES 28 MARCH 1983,
CO/1111/82 (LEXIS) (QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT)

2-022

The defendant was brought on a stretcher to hospital. The doctor discovered that he was merely drunk and asked him to leave. He was later seen slumped on a seat in the corridor and so the police were called. They removed him to the roadway, “formed the opinion he was drunk”, and placed him in their car parked nearby. He was charged with being found drunk in a highway and convicted.

ROBERT GOFF LJ:

“Does the fact that the Appellant was only momentarily on the highway and not there of his own volition, prevent his conviction of the offence of being found drunk in a highway? ...

In my judgment, looking at the purpose of this particular offence, it is designed ... to deal with the nuisance which can be caused by persons who are drunk in a public place. This kind of offence is caused quite simply when a person is found drunk in a public place or in a highway ... [A]n example ... illustrates how sensible that conclusion is. Suppose a person was found as being drunk in a restaurant or a place of that kind and was asked to leave. If he was asked to leave, he would walk out of the door of the restaurant and would be in a public place or in a highway of his own volition. He would be there of his own volition because he had responded to a request. However, if a man in a restaurant made a thorough nuisance of himself, was asked to leave, objected and was ejected, in those circumstances, he would not be in a public place of his own volition because he would have been put there either by a gentleman on the door of the restaurant, or by a police officer, who might have been called to deal with the man in question. It would be nonsense if one were to say that the man who responded to the plea to leave could be said to be found drunk in a public place or in a highway, whereas the man who had been compelled to leave could not.

This leads me to the conclusion that a person is 'found to be drunk in a public place or in a highway,' within the meaning of those words as used in the section, when he is perceived to be drunk in a public place. It is enough for the commission of the offence if (1) a person is in a public place or a highway, (2) he is drunk, and (3) in those circumstances he is perceived to be there and to be drunk. Once those criteria have been fulfilled, he is liable to be convicted of the offence of being found drunk in a highway. Finally, I turn to the question: Does it matter if the Appellant was only momentarily in the highway? In my judgment, it makes no difference. A man may be perceived to be drunk in the highway for five minutes, for one minute or for ten seconds. However short the period of time, if a man is perceived to be drunk in a highway, he is guilty of the offence under the section. Of course, if the period of time is very short, the penalty imposed may be minimal; indeed in such circumstances a police officer, using his discretion, may think it unnecessary to charge the man. The point is simply that the offence is committed if a person is perceived to be drunk in a public place or in the highway. Once that criterion is fulfilled, then the offence is committed."

Again it could be argued that it was Winzar's "fault" he was in that situation. The report does not make it clear how he got to be taken to the hospital. Presumably he must have been found drunk in some other public place, or have summoned medical assistance when he was only drunk and not in need of medical attention.

A different approach to a similar problem was adopted by the Supreme Court of Alabama.

MARTIN V STATE 31 ALA. APP. 334,
17 SO. 2D 427 (1944) (ALABAMA COURT OF APPEALS)

SIMPSON J:

"Appellant was convicted of being drunk on a public highway, and appeals. Officers of the law arrested him at his home and took him onto the highway where he allegedly committed the proscribed acts, viz. manifested a drunken condition by using loud and profane language. The pertinent provisions of our statute are:

'Any person who, while intoxicated or drunk, appears in any public place where one or more persons are present, ... and manifests a drunken condition by boisterous or indecent conduct, or loud and profane discourse, shall, on conviction be fined' (Code 1940 Title 14 s.20).

Under the plain terms of this statute a voluntary appearance is presupposed. The rule has been declared, and we think it sound, that an accusation of drunkenness in a designated public place cannot be established by proof that the accused, while in an intoxicated condition, was involuntarily and forcibly carried to that place by the arresting officer.

Conviction of appellant was contrary to this announced principle and in our view, erroneous. It appears that no legal conviction can be sustained under the evidence, so, consonant with the prevailing rule, the judgment of the trial court is reversed and one here rendered discharging appellant.”³⁰

Can this case be reconciled with Larsonneur and Winzar on the basis that Martin was arrested in his own home and therefore could not in any way be blamed for his resultant situation?

HERBERT L. PACKER, THE LIMITS OF
THE CRIMINAL SANCTION (1969),
PP.78–79:

2–025

“There is a strong tradition in Anglo-American law of treating certain kinds of status, such as vagrancy, as criminal. To be a person ‘without visible means of living who has the physical ability to work, and who does not seek employment, nor labor when employment is offered him’ (in the words of a now-repealed California statute) may perhaps be characterized as engaging in a kind of omissive conduct: but common sense rebels at the use of the word ‘conduct’ to describe a condition that does not ‘take place’ but rather exists without reference to discrete points of time. It must be acknowledged that when the law makes the status of vagrancy or the status of ‘being a common drunkard’ (that phrase redolent of Elizabethan England) a criminal offense, it is departing from the restriction to conduct. Laws of this sort are in fact very much on the way out. Courts are giving them a helpful push on the road to oblivion ...

Offenses of status can best be understood as embodiments of the preventive ideal at a time when the criminal law offered no alternatives. Their demise is the result, whatever the rubric under which it is accomplished, of the development of alternatives that have permitted us the previously unavailable luxury of recognizing that such offenses are anomalies in the criminal law. There has always been pressure to rid the community of people who are perceived as dangerous, threatening, or merely odd. That pressure, until fairly recently, has had to find its outlet almost entirely in the criminal law. But the extraordinary expansion of the concept of illness, and especially of mental illness, that has taken place during the last century has furnished us another set of outlets. Now we can afford to insist on the doctrinal purity from which crimes of status represent so marked a lapse.”

2-026

It has been argued that status offences could be regarded as contrary to the ECHR art.6(1).³¹ The best approach would be to focus on the voluntariness of the defendant’s actions. On this basis the question is simply whether Larssonneur, Winzar and Martin had control over their status or, even if they did not, whether it was their own fault that they allowed themselves to get into that status. It is only this approach that is likely to be regarded as compatible with the ECHR.

2-027

R. v ROBINSON-PIERRE [2013] EWCA
CRIM 2396 (COURT OF APPEAL,
CRIMINAL DIVISION)

Police arrived at the defendant’s house with a search warrant and without prior warning broke open the front door of the house, after which the defendant’s dog attacked the officers, both inside and later outside the house. The defendant was convicted of being the owner of a dog which caused injury while dangerously out of control in a public place, contrary to Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 s.3(1) and (4). He appealed against his conviction on the basis that the offence does not allow conviction of an owner who did not by his act or omission cause the dog to be in a public place or cause the dog to become dangerously out of control.

PITCHFORD LJ:

“38. Professor Ormerod recognises ... a category of offences in which the actus reus is represented by a state of affairs. In such a case there is no act or omission by, or state of mind of, the defendant that must be established, merely the existence of the prohibited state of affairs ... Professor Ormerod concludes that:

‘As a matter of principle, even “state of affairs” offences ought to require proof that D either caused the state of affairs or failed to terminate it or to act in order to do so when it was within his control and possible to do so.’

This is a view that will have many supporters. However, we have no doubt that the supremacy of Parliament embraces the power to create ‘state of affairs’ offences in which no causative link between the prohibited state of affairs and the defendant need be established. The legal issue is not, in our view, whether in principle such offences can be created but whether in any particular enactment Parliament intended to create one.

...

42. On analysis of section 3, we do not consider that it was Parliament’s intention to create an offence without regard to the ability of the owner (or someone to whom he had entrusted responsibility) to take and keep control of the dog. There must, in our view, be some causal connection between having charge of the dog and the prohibited state of affairs that has arisen. In our view, section 3 (1) requires proof by the prosecution of an act or omission of the defendant (with or without fault) that to some (more than minimal) degree caused or permitted the prohibited state of affairs to come about.

...

46. It seems to us that had the jury been directed to consider whether any act or omission of the appellant had made a more than minimal contribution to the presence of the dog in a public place, dangerously out of control, it is likely they would have concluded that he did by his failure to make any attempt after its escape to take the dog under his control before it entered a public place. However, the learned judge ... did not direct the jury to consider the issue. ... In these circumstances the appellant ... was not given the opportunity to meet an assertion that by his act or omission after the escape from the house he caused or contributed to the prohibited state of affairs. We cannot in these circumstances be sure that the verdicts of the jury were safe.”

Appeal allowed

2-028

In this case, the Court of Appeal, whilst finding that the offence of being the owner of a dangerous dog did in fact require an act or omission on the part of the dog owner in contributing to the state of affairs of the dog being out of control in public place, came to that conclusion not on the grounds of principle, but through an analysis of the statute. The implication is that if Parliament chooses to word an offence in such a way as to make a defendant liable irrespective of his control, or lack thereof, over the situation, it is free to do so. However, on principled grounds, that cannot be right.

(iii) Omissions

2-029

Most crimes are committed by positive action and thus the requirement of an “act” will usually be met by a positive act. However, in certain circumstances a failure to act may be deemed to constitute the requisite “act”. A failure to act may result in the imposition of criminal liability in two situations.

1. In conduct crimes, the failure to act may itself, without more, constitute the crime. This usually occurs in statutory crimes which are specifically defined in terms of an omission to act, for example, failing to provide for a child in one’s care³² or failing to provide a specimen of breath under the breathalyser legislation.³³
2. In result crimes, the failure to act may contribute towards the harm specified in the offence and may thus, in certain circumstances, be deemed the requisite “act” for the purposes of the offence. This will only be so if the actor is under a duty to act. For example, a father would be under a duty to rescue his child drowning in a shallow pool; his failure to act would constitute the requisite “act” of the crime of homicide. However, a stranger could with impunity watch the same child drowning. There is no general duty to act in English law. As Lord Diplock stated in Miller: “The conduct of the parabolical priest and Levite on the road to Jericho may have been indeed deplorable, but English law has not so far developed to the stage of treating it as criminal”.³⁴

Thus, criminal liability in these cases is completely dependent upon the existence of a duty to act. It is to this, and other related problems, that we now turn.

(a) Duty to act

2-030

Whether there is a duty to act is a question of law. The judge must direct the jury that if they find certain facts established, there will or will not be a duty to act. For example, in Evans (below) the victim was supplied with heroin (by her half-sister) which she self-injected and died of heroin poisoning. It was a matter of fact for the jury whether it was the defendant who supplied the drugs. If the jury were satisfied that she did supply the drugs, then, as a matter of law, she was under a duty to act.

R. V EVANS [2009] 2 CR. APP. R. 10
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION)

2-031

Lord Judge CJ:

“45. In some cases, such as those arising from a doctor/patient relationship where the existence of the duty is not in dispute, the judge may well direct the jury that a duty of care exists. Such a direction would be proper. But if, for example, the doctor were on holiday at the material time, and the deceased asked a casual question over a drink, it may well be that the question whether a doctor/patient relationship existed, and accordingly whether a duty of care arose, would be in dispute. In any cases where the issue is in dispute, and therefore in more complex cases, and assuming that the judge has found that it would be open to the jury to find that there was a duty of care, or a duty to act, the jury should be directed that if facts a + b and/or c or d are established, then in law a duty will arise, but if facts x or y or z were present, the duty would be negated.”

It is not entirely certain when a duty to act will arise.³⁵ However, it is generally thought that the following situations, while their parameters are not clearly defined, will give rise to a duty to act.

1. Special relationship

This special relationship may be professional or familial. A doctor owes a duty to their patients. There may also be a duty to act where there is a close family relationship. Parents are under a duty to aid their small children; husbands and wives are under a duty to aid each other.³⁶

In Downes,³⁷ a parent, being a member of a religious sect called the Peculiar People, who believed in prayer rather than in medicine, failed to call a doctor for his sick child who died. Downes was convicted of manslaughter.³⁸ It is not entirely certain what relationships possess the “features of familial duty or responsibility”.³⁹ In Evans, it was held that while a mother owed such a duty to her nearly 17-year-old daughter, no such duty was owed by the daughter’s half-sister.⁴⁰

It used to be asserted that the reason for the imposition of a duty of care in such cases was that the blood or marriage relationship was so strong as to generate a legal duty to preserve life. In the US decision of People v Beardsley,⁴¹ for instance, it was held that a man owes no duty to act to aid his “week-end mistress”, as distinguished from his wife. However, such a rationale can no longer be accepted. The true reason for the existence of a duty in such cases must be the interdependence that springs from shared family life or close communal living.⁴² In such a situation, one comes to rely on the other members of the family and it is this reliance and expectation of assistance, if necessary, that generates the duty to act, rather than any blood or marriage tie. In Shepherd,⁴³ it was held that no duty to act is owed by a parent to her 18-year-old “entirely emancipated” daughter. In such a case there would not be the same expectation of assistance as with a dependent child. Accordingly, it is suggested that separated spouses owe no duty to each other, and with other relatives it is not a question of blood or marriage relationship but the assumption of responsibility that generates the reliance and expectation of assistance and hence the legal duty to act. In Stone, Lane LJ did allude to the fact that the victim “was a blood relation of the appellant” but it is clear from his ensuing comments that the true basis of the duty to act was the fact that the appellant had taken the victim into his home and assumed responsibility for her.⁴⁴

2. Assumption of responsibility

2-033

If the defendant assumes responsibility towards another or voluntarily assumes a duty towards another, then she becomes under a legal duty to act.

R. V INSTAN [1893] 1 Q.B. 450 (COURT FOR CROWN CASES RESERVED)

2-034

The defendant lived with her 73-year-old aunt. The aunt, who had been healthy until shortly before her death, developed gangrene in her leg. During the last 12 days of her life she could not fend for herself, move about or summon help. Only the defendant knew of her state and gave her aunt no food and did not seek medical assistance. The defendant was charged with manslaughter and was convicted.

LORD COLERIDGE CJ:

“We are all of the opinion that this conviction must be affirmed. It would not be correct to say that every moral obligation involves a legal duty; but every legal duty is founded on a moral obligation. A legal common law duty is nothing else than the enforcing by law of that which is a moral obligation without legal enforcement. There can be no question in this case that it was the clear duty of the prisoner to impart to the deceased so much as was necessary to sustain life of the food which she from time to time took in, and which was paid for by the deceased’s own money for the purpose of the maintenance of herself and the prisoner; it was only through the instrumentality of the prisoner that the deceased could get the food. There was, therefore, a common law duty imposed upon the prisoner which she did not discharge.

Nor can there be any question that the failure of the prisoner to discharge her legal duty at least accelerated the death of the deceased, if it did not actually cause it. There is no case directly in point; but it would be a slur upon and a discredit to the administration of justice in this country if there were any doubt as to the legal principle, or as to the present case being within it. The prisoner was under a moral obligation to the deceased from which arose a legal duty towards her; that legal duty the prisoner has wilfully and deliberately left unperformed, with the consequence that there has been an acceleration of the death of the deceased owing to the non-performance of that legal duty.”

Conviction affirmed

2-035

In Stone,⁴⁵ the defendants took the anorexic and infirm sister of one of them into their home. She failed to look after herself or feed herself properly and eventually died. The defendants were held to have assumed a responsibility by taking her into their home and so were under a legal duty either to summon help or to care for her.

R. V SINCLAIR [1998] EWCA CRIM
2590 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION)

2-036

Sinclair and his friend, the deceased, visited a flat owned by Johnson in order to buy methadone from another man there. Needles and syringes were available in the flat. Sinclair and the deceased each injected themselves with the methadone at 2.30pm. The deceased became unconscious. Sinclair remained with him for much the afternoon and night. Both he and Johnson took limited and ineffectual remedial action such as pouring water over the deceased (and Johnson administered a saline solution) but an ambulance was only called at 6.30am the following morning. The deceased was certified dead on arrival at hospital. Sinclair and Johnson were convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

ROSE LJ:

“[Counsel for the defendant] referred to a decision of the New South Wales Supreme Court in Tak 1988 NSWLR 226 which emphasised, as a pre-condition for a legal duty of care to arise, the need for the disabled person to be secluded by the defendant to prevent others from affording aid ...

So far as Johnson is concerned, there is no English authority in which a duty of care has been held to arise, over a period of hours, on the part of a medically unqualified stranger. Beardsley and Tak Tak are both persuasive authorities pointing away from the existence of any such duty, although we do not accept in the light of Stone and Dobinson, that the concept of seclusion is, in English law, a necessary prerequisite to the existence of a legal duty of care. But Johnson did not know the deceased. His only connection with him was that he had come to his house and there taken methadone and remained until he died. Others were coming and going in the meantime. The fact that Johnson had prepared and administered to the deceased saline solutions does not, as it seems to us, demonstrate on his part a voluntary assumption of a legal duty of care rather than a desultory attempt to be of assistance. In our judgment, the facts in relation to Johnson were not capable of giving rise to a legal duty of care ...

Sinclair was in a different position. The evidence was that he was a close friend of the deceased for many years and the two had lived together almost as brothers. It was Sinclair who paid for and supplied the deceased with the first dose of methadone and helped him to obtain the second dose. He knew that the deceased was not an addict. He remained with the deceased throughout the period of his unconsciousness and, for a substantial period, was the only person with him. In the light of this evidence, there was in our judgment material on which the jury properly directed, could have found that Sinclair owed the deceased a legal duty of care.

[The appeal was, however, allowed on the ground that a fuller direction on causation should have been given: as to whether acceleration of the moment of death was other than minimal.]”

Appeal allowed

2-037

This case was cited with approval in Ruffell.⁴⁶ The appellant and the deceased took drugs together which led to the death of the latter. The Court of Appeal approved the trial judge’s reasoning that there was a sufficient nexus between the parties to give rise to a duty of care because:

“the deceased was a guest of the appellant in the appellant’s family home and he was a friend ... that had taken upon himself the duty of trying to revive him.”

In Evans (where the deceased died of heroin poisoning) it was held that merely placing her in a recovery position, putting her to bed and taking turns to check if she was alright would not be sufficient to amount to an assumption of responsibility.⁴⁷ However, it was added that in certain circumstances there could be a voluntary assumption of responsibility where the defendant does acts which “led the victim, or others, to become dependent on him to act”.⁴⁸

GEOFFREY MEAD, “CONTRACTING INTO CRIME: A THEORY OF CRIMINAL OMISSIONS” (1991) 11 O.J.L.S. 147, 168:

2-038

“The presence of an undertaking oft en gives rise to other reasons for the presence of a duty ... If D has given an undertaking he may be in the best position to avert the harm. I shall refer to this as the ‘Best Position’ argument. This may be for one or more of the following reasons. First, he is more likely to be aware that a person may be in a position of peril and in need of assistance. He will know of the vulnerability of the victim in a way that others may not. Second, he may be more capable of carrying out the required task than will a third party. We might assume that, in most cases where D undertakes to do a particular thing, he feels he has the ability to do it, whereas a third party, who has not given such an undertaking will not necessarily possess the required skills to do what is needed in order to avert danger to V. The third point is that if other people are aware of the undertaking they might feel it unproductive for them to get involved as well. They might reasonably think that they would simply get in the way and hinder the proper completion of the task in question.”

2-039

The real problem in these cases is one of determining the circumstances in which a person can be said to have undertaken a duty towards another. A ship captain would be liable for failing to pick up a seaman, or a passenger, who had fallen overboard.⁴⁹ Depending on the circumstances of employment, an employer could be liable for failing to aid her endangered employee. And as LaFave and Scott assert:

“If two mountain climbers, climbing together, are off by themselves on a mountainside, and one falls into a crevass, it would seem that the nature of their joint enterprise, involving a relationship of mutual reliance, ought to impose a duty upon the one mountaineer to extricate his imperilled colleague. So also if two people, though not closely related, live together under one roof, one may have a duty to act to aid the other who becomes helpless.”⁵⁰

Following this, in Beardsley if the parties had lived together or embarked on a dangerous joint enterprise together, as opposed to an adulterous weekend, the defendant would probably have been held to have assumed a duty to act. Again, as suggested before, it ought to be a question of whether, because of the relationship or the circumstances or both together, the parties rely on assistance from each other. Sinclair is explicable on this basis. While Johnson was effectively in as good a position as Sinclair to render aid (following Mead’s Best Position argument), it was the closeness of the relationship between Sinclair and the deceased and their embarking on the enterprise of procuring drugs together that would have led the deceased to rely on assistance from Sinclair. Although at his house, Johnson was a stranger. There would not have been the same reliance on, and expectation of, assistance from him.

3. Contractual duty

2-040

A duty to assist others may arise out of a contract. A lifeguard employed at a swimming pool to ensure the safety of swimmers cannot sit idly by while a swimmer is drowning.

In Pittwood,⁵¹ a railway gate-keeper, who was employed to keep a gate shut whenever a train was passing, was held liable for manslaughter when he forgot to shut the gate with the result that a train hit a hay-cart crossing the railway line and killed a man.

Again, the basis of the duty in these cases is not so much the contract itself, but rather the fact that the contract is evidence of an assumption of responsibility creating an expectation in the mind of others that the defendant will act. The public expect railway gate-keepers to act and close the gates of railway crossings when trains are approaching. It is their reliance on this fact that creates the duty to act. The fact that the railway gate-keeper has been contracted to perform these duties is merely strong evidence that he has assumed these responsibilities. It is submitted that the position would be no different if, during a strike, a volunteer offered (without any contract) to perform these duties. The fact that he has undertaken this responsibility would cause the public to rely upon him performing these tasks. On this basis, this whole category (along with the first category above) simply becomes a species of the second category, namely the assumption of responsibility.

4. Statutory duty

2-041

A failure to act may in itself, without more, constitute a criminal offence. Failing to provide for a child in one's care is a criminal offence contrary to the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.1(1), even if this failure to act causes no further harm. Similarly, the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 ss.2-7 imposes duties on employers to operate a safe working environment. A specific penalty is provided for breach of this duty irrespective of whether any other harm results. However, unlike breaches of common law duties, a breach of a statutory duty will not always constitute the necessary "act" for the purpose of an ulterior offence if further harm results from the breach of duty. In Lowe,⁵² a man neglected his nine-week-old daughter by failing to call for a doctor when she became ill. He was charged with neglecting the child contrary to the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.1(1) and with manslaughter. One way in which manslaughter can be committed is by committing an unlawful act that is dangerous and causes death (constructive manslaughter). It was held that the requirement of an unlawful act was not satisfied by an omission. Phillimore LJ stated:

“We think there is a clear distinction between an act of omission and an act of commission likely to cause harm. Whatever may be the position in regard to the latter it does not follow that the same is true of the former. In other words if I strike a child in a manner likely to cause harm it is right that if the child dies I may be charged with manslaughter. If, however, I omit to do something with the result that it suffers injury to health which results in its death, we think that a charge of manslaughter should not be an inevitable consequence, even if the omission is deliberate.”

This case provides an interesting illustration of the reluctance of the English courts to impose criminal liability for omissions to act. Phillimore LJ is suggesting that there needs to be a higher degree of blameworthiness for crimes committed through omission than for crimes where there has been a positive act of commission and so an omission will not suffice for constructive manslaughter because this species of manslaughter⁵³ only requires a relatively low degree of culpability. Similarly, if a worker were to die as a result of an employer’s breach of statutory duty the employer would not be liable for constructive manslaughter because, as the Law Commission has noted, Parliament, in creating this duty, has provided a specific and limited punishment for its breach.⁵⁴ This approach is only justifiable if positive acts are regarded as “worse” than omissions.⁵⁵

5. Creation of a dangerous situation

R. v MILLER [1983] 2 A.C. 161 (HOUSE OF LORDS)

2-042

One night while squatting in someone else’s house, the appellant lit a cigarette and then lay down on a mattress in one of the rooms. He fell asleep before he had finished smoking the cigarette and it dropped onto the mattress. Later he woke up and saw that the mattress was smouldering. He did nothing about it; he merely moved to another room and went to sleep again. The house caught fire. The appellant was rescued and subsequently charged with arson, contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1) and (3). At this trial, he submitted that there was no case to go to the jury because his omission to put out the fire, which he had started accidentally, could not in the circumstances amount to a sufficient actus reus. The judge ruled that once he had discovered the mattress was smouldering the appellant had been under a duty to act. The appellant was convicted. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction on the ground that his whole course of conduct constituted a continuous actus reus. On appeal, to the House of Lords:

LORD DIPLOCK:

“I see no rational ground for excluding from conduct capable of giving rise to criminal liability, conduct which consists of failing to take measures that lie within one’s power to counteract a danger that one has oneself created, if at the time of such conduct one’s state of mind is such as constitutes a necessary ingredient of the offence ...

I cannot see any good reason why, so far as liability under criminal law is concerned, it should matter at what point of time before the resultant damage is complete a person becomes aware that he has done a physical act which, whether or not he appreciated that it would at the time when he did it, does in fact create a risk that property of another will be damaged; provided that, at the moment of awareness, it lies within his power to take steps, either himself or by calling for the assistance of the fire brigade if this be necessary, to prevent or minimise the damage to the property at risk.

Let me take first the case of the person who has thrown away a lighted cigarette expecting it to go out harmlessly, but later becomes aware that, although he did not intend it to do so, it has, in the event, caused some inflammable material to smolder and that unless the smoldering is extinguished promptly, an act that the person who dropped the cigarette could perform without danger to himself or difficulty, the inflammable material will be likely to burst into flames and damage some other person’s property. The person who dropped the cigarette deliberately refrains from doing anything to extinguish the smoldering. His reason for so refraining is that he intends that the risk which his own act had originally created, though it was only subsequently that he became aware of this, should fructify in actual damage to that other person's property; and what he so intends, in fact occurs. There can be no sensible reason why he should not be guilty of arson. If he would be guilty of arson, having appreciated the risk of damage at the very moment of dropping the lighted cigarette, it would be quite irrational that he should not be guilty if he first appreciated the risk at some later point in time but when it was still possible for him to take steps to prevent or minimise the damage ...

The recorder, in his lucid summing up to the jury ... told them that the accused having by his own act started a fire in the mattress which, when he became aware of its existence, presented an obvious risk of damaging the house, became under a duty to take some action to put it out. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction, but its ratio decidendi appears to be somewhat different from that of the recorder. As I understand the judgment, in effect it treats the whole course of conduct of the accused, from the moment at which he fell asleep and dropped the cigarette on to the mattress until the time the damage to the house by fire was complete, as a continuous act of the accused, and holds that it is sufficient to constitute the statutory offence of arson if at any stage in that course of conduct the state of mind of the accused, when he fails to try to prevent or minimise the damage which will result from his initial act, although it lies within his power to do so, is that of being reckless whether property belonging to another would be damaged.

My Lords, these alternative ways of analysing the legal theory that justifies [the] decision ... provoked academic controversy. Each theory has distinguished support. Professor J. C. Smith espouses the 'duty theory' (see [1982] Crim.L.R.526 at 528); Professor Glanville Williams ... now prefers that of the continuous act (see [1982] Crim.L.R.773). When applied to cases where a person has unknowingly done an act which sets in train events that, when he becomes aware of them, present an obvious risk that property belonging to another will be damaged, both theories lead to an identical result; and since what your Lordships are concerned with is to give guidance to trial judges in their task of summing up to juries, I would for this purpose adopt the duty theory as being the easier to explain to a jury; though I would commend the use of the word 'responsibility,' rather than 'duty' which is more appropriate to civil than to criminal law, since it suggests an obligation owed to another person, i.e. the person to whom the endangered property belongs, whereas a criminal statute defines combinations of conduct and state of mind which render a person liable to punishment by the state itself ...

[A] suitable direction to the jury would be: that the accused is guilty of the offence under s.1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 if, when he does become aware that the events in question have happened as a result of his own act, he does not try to prevent or reduce the risk of damage by his own efforts or if necessary by sending for help from the fire brigade, and [if he has the appropriate mens rea at the time of failing to act].”

Appeal dismissed

2-043

Lord Diplock’s reasoning is to be welcomed. We all bear a responsibility for our actions, even if those actions are unintentional. They are our actions. Where others are placed in danger from these actions, they expect us to “do something”. They would rely on us to provide reasonable assistance, even if that only amounts to summoning help. Further, “the person who creates a danger may be more aware than others of the existence of the danger, and ought not feel a reluctance to intervene that may be felt by others”.⁵⁶ Accordingly, we should be under a duty to act when we become aware of the danger. On this basis, it is irrelevant whether the defendant’s initial actions involved any fault. Thus if, as in Fagan v MPC,⁵⁷ the defendant accidentally parks his car with a wheel resting on a policeman’s foot, we would surely be justified in saying that the defendant had assumed a responsibility (to get off the foot); his initial action would raise an expectation on the part of the police officer that he would act. He is under a duty to act.

It is, however, difficult to determine the precise circumstances in which a duty can be said to arise because of the creation of a “dangerous situation”. In DPP v Santana-Bermudez,⁵⁸ the defendant stated that he had no needles on him and was then searched by a police officer. The police officer put her fingers in the defendant’s pocket and was pierced by a hypodermic needle. On a charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm it was stated by the Court of Appeal that the defendant had created a dangerous situation by having the needles in his pocket and not telling the police officer they were there. This provided an evidential basis that he was under a duty and had breached that duty.

R. v EVANS [2009] 2 CR. APP. R. 10
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION)

2-044

The appellant, Gemma Evans, supplied her half-sister, Carly, with drugs. Carly became very ill. The appellant, knowing this, took ineffectual steps to care for her. Carly died from heroin poisoning. The appellant was convicted of manslaughter by gross negligence and appealed.

LORD JUDGE:

“20 The question in this appeal is not whether the appellant may be guilty of manslaughter for having been concerned in the supply of the heroin which caused the deceased’s death. It is whether, notwithstanding that their relationship lacked the features of familial duty or responsibility which marked her mother’s relationship with the deceased, she was under a duty to take reasonable steps for the safety of the deceased once she appreciated that the heroin she procured for her was having a potentially fatal impact on her health.

21 When omission or failure to act are in issue two aspects of manslaughter are engaged ... The second arises when the defendant has created a dangerous situation and when, notwithstanding his appreciation of the consequent risks, he fails to take any reasonable preventative steps ... [His Lordship then discussed Miller and other authorities, including the drug supply cases of Khan and Sinclair.]

31 ... The duty necessary to found gross negligence manslaughter is plainly not confined to cases of a familial or professional relationship between the defendant and the deceased. In our judgment, ... for the purposes of gross negligence manslaughter, when a person has created or contributed to the creation of a state of affairs which he knows, or ought reasonably to know, has become life threatening, a consequent duty on him to act by taking reasonable steps to save the other's life will normally arise ...

34 The judge ... directed the jury that they had heard that the appellant

‘did perform some acts to assist Carly during the evening of 2nd May, in particular she and her mother placed Carly in the recovery position and they took turns to look to see if she was alright. However, I direct you that as a matter of law there is nothing in that course of conduct which is capable of amounting to an acceptance or an assumption by Gemma Evans of responsibility for Carly so as to give rise to a duty of care. In the present case, the only matter which in law is capable of giving rise to a duty of care owed by Gemma Evans to Carly Townsend would be if Gemma Evans did, on this occasion, as the prosecution allege, act as an intermediary, giving the drugs to Carly ...’

35 In relation to the circumstances in which a duty of care might arise in this case, these observations must be seen in their context, which is that the only issue of fact which the jury had to decide was the supply issue. Unless the jury was sure of this fact, the remaining undisputed areas of appellant's involvement ... would, on the judge's directions, have been insufficient for the purposes of gross negligence manslaughter. Without her involvement in the supply of heroin, the jury was directed that there was no duty on the appellant to act even after she became aware of the serious adverse effect of the drug taking on Carly. If on the other hand she was so involved, that fact, taken with the other undisputed facts would, and on our analysis of the relevant principles did give rise to a duty on the appellant to act. In law the judge's directions about the ingredients of gross negligence manslaughter, as applied to this case, were correct.

36 We would merely record that the judge's direction that a duty to act did not arise from a voluntary assumption of risk by the appellant may have been appropriate in this case, but it would not be of universal application where, for example, a voluntary assumption of risk by the defendant had led the victim, or others, to become dependent on him to act.”

Appeal dismissed

When precisely does the duty to act arise in these cases where a dangerous situation has been created? One view is that it arises on the initial creation of the dangerous situation. This would mean that the duty arose in Miller when the fire was accidentally started⁵⁹ and in Evans when the drugs were supplied. However, this view is no longer tenable because, as will be seen later in this chapter when causation is discussed, the victim's self-injection of the drugs breaks the causal chain.⁶⁰ Accordingly, as is clear from the dicta above in both Miller and Evans, the duty only arises when the defendant realises that her acts have created a dangerous situation. In Miller, Lord Diplock refers to the duty arising when the defendant "becomes aware that the events in question have happened as a result of his own act". This is echoed in Evans when it is stated that the duty arises "once she appreciated that the heroin she procured for her was having a potentially fatal impact on her health".⁶¹ On this basis, if a drug-supplier sells drugs to a client and then leaves the scene before the client self-injects, the supplier will not be under any duty to act. As Rogers points out:

"Professional drug suppliers ... now have every incentive not even to associate with their clients after supplying the drug ... So the burden of the duty of care in Evans will fall more typically upon those close friends or family members who supply the drug and then stay with the victim ... Any policy based reasoning which accepts that the dealer, who knowingly supplies potentially lethal drugs for profit, should not be guilty of any form of manslaughter when a client dies—but which tolerates the punishment of anyone else who was involved with the victim—is seriously flawed."⁶²

In Evans, it was added that the duty arises when the defendant "knows, or ought reasonably to know" that the state of affairs has become life-threatening. The italicised words are obiter as the defendant in Evans was well aware that her sister's life was in danger. For many crimes, such as arson in Miller, a defendant who did not himself appreciate the danger would lack mens rea and so not be liable in any event. But for crimes that can be committed negligently or through gross negligence as was the case in Evans, the italicised words become important. It can be argued that it would be inappropriate to impose a duty to action a person who was completely unaware of the fact that she had created a dangerous situation. The opposing view is that if the dangers are obvious, the defendant should not escape liability simply because she did not appreciate that fact. If negligence (or gross negligence) suffices for the crime, then negligence should also suffice in determining whether a duty to act has arisen.

(b) Performance of duty

2-046

Assuming that the defendant is under a duty to act, how much danger, inconvenience or expense must she undergo in order to fulfil that duty and avoid criminal liability?

UNITED STATES V KNOWLES, 26 FED.
CAS. 801 (No.15, 540) (N.D. CAL.
1864) (DISTRICT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT CALIFORNIA)

2-047

The defendant was captain of the American ship Charger when a seaman, Swainson, accidentally fell into the sea and drowned. The defendant was charged with manslaughter on the ground that death had been caused by his wilful omission to rescue Swainson when it was his duty to do so.

FIELD, CIRCUIT JUSTICE (charging jury):

“Now, in the case of a person falling overboard from a ship at sea, whether a passenger or seaman, when he is not killed by the fall, there is no question as to the duty of the commander. He is bound, both by law and by contract, to do everything consistent with the safety of the ship and of the passengers and crew, necessary to rescue the person overboard, and for that purpose to stop the vessel, lower the boats, and throw to him such buoys or other articles which can be readily obtained, that may serve to support him in the water until he is reached by the boats and saved. No matter what delay in the voyage may be occasioned, or what expense to the owners may be incurred, nothing will excuse the commander for any omission to take these steps to save the person overboard, provided they can be taken with a due regard to the safety of the ship and others remaining on board. Subject to this condition, every person at sea, whether passenger or seaman, has a right to all reasonable efforts of the commander of the vessel for his rescue, in case he should by accident fall or be thrown overboard. Any neglect to make such efforts would be criminal, and if followed by the loss of the person overboard, when by them he might have been saved, the commander would be guilty of manslaughter ...

If you are satisfied that the fall was not immediately fatal, the next inquiry will be whether Swainson could have been saved by any reasonable efforts of the captain, in the then condition of the sea and weather. That the wind was high there can be no doubt. The vessel was going at the time, at the rate of twelve knots an hour; it had averaged, for several hours, ten knots an hour. A wind capable of propelling a vessel at that speed would, in a few hours, create a strong sea. To stop the ship, change its course, go back to the position where the seaman fell overboard, and lower the boats, would have required a good deal of time, according to the testimony of several witnesses. In the meanwhile, the man overboard must have drifted a good way from the spot where he fell. To these considerations, you will add the probable shock and consequent exhaustion which Swainson must have experienced from the fall, even supposing that he was not immediately killed.

It is not sufficient for you to believe that possibly he might have been saved. To find the defendant guilty, you must come to the conclusion that he would, beyond a reasonable doubt, have been saved if proper efforts to save him had been reasonably made, and that his death was the consequence of the defendant's negligence in this respect. Beside the condition of the weather and sea, you must also take into consideration the character of the boats attached to the ship. According to testimony of the mate, they were small and unfit for a rough sea."

The jury returned a verdict of acquittal

VEHICLE INSPECTORATE V NUTTALL
[1999] 1 W.L.R. 629 (HOUSE OF

The defendant, an owner of a coach business, did not examine charts produced by tachographs installed in his vehicles and was convicted of permitting his drivers to contravene various requirements of the Transport Act 1968 s.96(11A).

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH:

“This offence of permitting is a crime of omission which arises from the duty to act and involves the failure to perform that duty. What actual conduct will amount to the offence of permitting will be a question of fact depending on the circumstances of the particular case. For example, an employer whose employees are always, to his knowledge, back in the yard within the required time need not carry out the same checks as one whose employees are sent out on longer journeys which will necessitate the taking of breaks if the Regulations are not to be infringed. Such an employer must certainly carry out some checks ... The test of reasonableness must be applied objectively having regard to the relevant circumstances which will vary from case to case. But it is not a question of the employer doing what he thinks is reasonable. He must do whatever is involved in taking the reasonable steps to prevent breaches. It is an objective not a subjective criterion. If he does not perform his duty, he has committed the actus reus of the offence ...

The employer is under a positive duty to take the steps which an employer can reasonably take to detect and prevent breaches. He is not required to do the impossible; but he is not at liberty to omit to take those reasonable steps.”

In Hood,⁶³ the defendant delayed three weeks in summoning medical assistance for his wife who had accidentally fallen and broken several bones which ultimately led to her death. The fact that the wife did not want to go to hospital and could herself have called for assistance did not affect the fact that the husband had breached his duty—although these factors were relevant to sentencing.

(c) Distinguishing positive acts from omissions

2-050

The distinction between positive acts and omissions is crucial as criminal liability will only be imposed for the latter if a duty to act can be established. However, it is not always clear whether one is dealing with a positive act or an omission. For example, if a road worker digs a deep hole in the road and then forgets to place a cover over it with the result that a child falls in the hole and is killed, has the death been caused by the positive act of digging the hole or the omission to cover the hole?

Katz has suggested that the test for distinguishing an act from an omission should be as follows: “if the defendant did not exist, would the harmful outcome in question still have occurred in the way it did?”.⁶⁴ On this test, the road worker is clearly acting as their existence is critical to the causing of death. On the other hand, there is an omission where the stranger fails to rescue the drowning child because the child would still have died even if the stranger had not existed. In Environmental Agency v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd,⁶⁵ a company maintained a diesel oil tank on its premises. An outlet from the tank, governed by a tap, had no lock. A vandal opened the tap causing pollution to a river. The House of Lords held that “maintaining a tank of diesel is doing something” and therefore amounted to a positive act. This is consistent with Katz’s theory. If the company had not existed, the pollution would never have occurred.

(d) Omissions and causation

2-051

When a mother fails to rescue her drowning child, how can her inactivity be said to cause the death of the child? Hogan has written:

“[T]here is no way you can cause an event by doing nothing ... to prevent it. If grandma’s skirts are ignited by her careless proximity to the gas oven, the delinquent grandson cannot be said to have killed her by his failure to douse her ... To say to the child, ‘You have killed your grandmother’ would simply be untrue.”⁶⁶

This view cannot be tenable. When we examine causation we shall see that many actions could potentially be classed as “causes” of consequences. When the child drowns in the pool with the mother watching and doing nothing, we could say that the causes of the child’s death were the following: that the child was in the park and was taken near the pool, that the child fell in the pool, that there was sufficient water in the pool for him to drown, that he could not swim, that his lungs filled with water, or that his mother did not rescue him when she could easily have done so. Hart and Honoré, in the leading work on causation, argue that in selecting a cause from a list such as this, one will count as causes those things or events that are a deviation from normal or required behaviour: “when such man-made normal conditions are established, deviation from them will be regarded as exceptional and so rank as the cause of harm”.⁶⁷ In our list there are two exceptional occurrences: the child fell in the pool and the mother failed to rescue him. Both are deviations from what might be expected and can thus be held to be causes of the death of the child.

ARTHUR LEAVENS, “A CAUSATION APPROACH TO CRIMINAL OMISSIONS” (1988) 76 CAL. L. REV. 547, 572–575:

2–052

“[I]t seems at first inappropriate to apply commonsense causation analysis to an individual’s failure to engage in particular conduct. If one focuses solely on the circumstances of an omission at the time directly preceding the harm, the omission often appears not to have affected the at rest state of affairs. For example, a person sitting in the park while a nearby flower dies from lack of water is usually not considered to have caused the plant’s demise, even if a full watercan sits nearby ...

The difficulty in conceptualizing an omission as a causal force is that omissions do not seem to fit within the parameters of the physical cause and effect model. In the physical paradigm, there is a direct and identifiable chain of events through which the actor can readily be seen as intervening and changing what existed before. In cases of omission, however, the actor does not physically alter the status quo, but rather appears simply to permit the preexisting state of affairs to continue. Without direct physical involvement in the causal process leading to a particular result, an ommitter seems no more causally responsible for the result than anyone else ...

Such a view of causation is flawed because its inquiry is too limited. It depends on a definition of the status quo as the existing physical state of affairs at the precise time of the omission, much as if we took a picture of the scene at the moment before the omission and then compared it to a similar picture taken immediately thereafter, searching for a change in circumstances physically attributable to the omissive conduct. Our everyday notions of causation, however, are not so limited because we understand that the status quo encompasses more than the physical state of affairs at a given time. Indeed, in everyday usage the status quo is taken to include expected patterns of conduct, including actions designed to avert certain unwanted results. When, for example, a driver parks a car on a steep hill, it is normal to set the parking brake and put the car in gear. If the driver forgets to do so and the car subsequently rolls down the hill, smashing into another car, we would say that the failure to park properly was a departure from the status quo. This failure, not the visibly steep hill or the predicate act of pulling the car to the curb, was the cause of the collision.

Once we realize that a particular undesirable state of affairs can be avoided by taking certain precautions, we usually incorporate these precautions into what we see as the normal or at rest state of affairs. A failure to engage in the preventive conduct in these cases can thus be seen as an intervention that disturbs the status quo. When such a failure to act is a necessary condition (a 'but for' cause) of a particular harm, then that failure fairly can be said to cause that harm. In the above example, the driver's failure to park the car in a proper manner caused the accident as surely as if he had actually driven his car into the other ...

[W]e do expect certain persons to engage in particular types of preventive conduct as a matter of routine. Because of this expectation, we perceive any failure of those persons to take prescribed actions as a departure from normality. While we do not see the bystander's failure to water the flower as the cause of its withering away, we take a different view of such a failure by the park's gardener. We expect that the gardener will take reasonable steps to prevent the flower's demise, that is, his preventive conduct represents normality. A departure from that status quo—his failure to water—is thus more than a necessary condition of the flower’s death: it causes that result every bit as much as the act of an intruder pulling the plant from its soil.

Of course, society’s expectation of particular preventive conduct could be described as merely another formulation of ‘duty.’

A ‘duty’ sufficient to support criminal sanctions must be founded on both an empirically valid expectation that persons in similar circumstances will act to prevent a harm—the probability aspect of normality—and also a deeply ingrained common understanding that society relies on that individual to prevent the harm—the normative aspect of normality. Thus parents have a ‘duty’ to prevent harm to their children because empirically, almost all parents act this way, and normatively, our society would consider it reprehensible if they did not. It is this combination of deviance—departing from a pattern of regular performance—and reprehensibility—being blameworthy—that makes us conclude that failure to act caused the harm.”

2–053

Following this reasoning, it is only those who are under a duty to act, according to the rules examined above, who can be said to cause a result through their failure to act. This conclusion has important implications in the next section where we consider whether there should be a general duty to act.

(e) A general duty to act?

2–054

It is often asserted that liability for omissions ought not to be restricted to those cases where there is a legal duty to act, as currently defined. The person who sees a strange child drowning in a shallow pool of water and neglects to rescue him when she could have easily done so with no danger to herself, has killed that child as surely as if she had held the child’s head under the water and ought to be punished to the same extent. If one of the objects of the criminal law and punishment is to stimulate socially approved conduct then the imposition of criminal liability in such cases would encourage people to act in situations such as these.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, “THE SCOPE OF LIABILITY FOR OMISSIONS” (1989)
105 L.Q.R. 424, 430–432:

2–055

“Individuals tend to place a high value on interpersonal contacts, relationships, mutual support and the fulfilment of obligations, and a society which values collective goals and collective goods may therefore provide a wider range of worthwhile opportunities for individual development ... The counter-argument to the conventional view is thus that a duty to co-operate with or to assist others should not be ruled out ab initio by an asocial and falsely restricted view of individual autonomy ...

Individuals need others, or the actions of others, for a wide variety of tasks which assist each one of us to maximise the pursuit of our personal goals. A community or society may be regarded as a network of relationships which support one another by direct and indirect means ...

... It follows that there is a good case for encouraging co-operation at the minimal level of the duty to assist persons in peril, so long as the assistance does not endanger the person rendering it ...

... The foundation of the argument is that a level of social co-operation and social responsibility is both good and necessary for the realisation of individual autonomy ... Each member of society is valued intrinsically, and the value of one citizen’s life is generally greater than the value of another citizen’s temporary freedom. Thus it is the element of emergency which heightens the social responsibility in ‘rescue’ cases, and which focusses other people’s vital interests into a ‘deliberative priority,’ and it is immediacy to me that generates my obligation. The concepts of immediacy and the opportunity of help (usually because of physical nearness) can thus be used to generate, and to limit the scope of, the duty of assistance to those in peril.”

SAMUEL FREEMAN, “CRIMINAL LIABILITY AND THE DUTY TO AID THE

DISTRESSED” (1994) 142 UNIVERSITY
OF PENNSYLVANIA L. REV. 1455, 1489:

2-056

“Given ... the significant fact that each of us is about as likely to benefit from this duty as to be inconvenienced by it, the political argument for the legalization of a duty to aid the distressed is that it promotes a common good, namely the safety and security of all persons in society. Since each person is sufficiently likely to benefit from this legal duty at some crucial point in their lifetime, it is a collectively rational legal constraint.”

2-057

Feinberg argues that any person in peril becomes one’s neighbour for the purposes of the moral exhortation “love thy neighbour” and is therefore owed a duty:

“When it comes to aiding the imperiled, all people who happen to find themselves in a position to help—all who have by chance wandered into the vicinity, or ‘portable neighborhood,’ of the imperiled party—are his ‘neighbours,’ with reciprocal dependencies, expectations, duties, and claims.”⁶⁸

GRAHAM HUGHES, “CRIMINAL OMISSIONS” (1958) 67 YALE L.J. 590, 626, 634:

2-058

“But a view of moral responsibility is surely outmoded which imposes liability on the father who does not warn his child of the precipice before him, but not on a stranger who neglects to warn the child ... The law often lags a half century or so behind public mores, but the spectacle cannot be lightly entertained in a field of this importance. The duty to take active steps to save others, and a liability for homicide in the absence of such action, could well be based on the defendant's clear recognition of the victim's peril plus his failure to take steps which might reasonably be taken without risk to himself to warn or protect the victim ...

Conventional criticisms of the imposition of a duty to rescue are usually based on objections to compelling one man to serve another, to creating a fear of prosecution which might cause citizens to interfere officiously in the affairs of others, and to the feasibility of imposing liability on a crowd of spectators all of whom had knowledge of the peril but were too selfish to intervene. These objections, however, do not seem to have much merit. To the first, the reply may be made that the evil of interfering with individual liberty by compelling assistance is much outweighed by the good of preserving human life. The second is a speculation which would be difficult to support. The third point appears to pose a real difficulty, but it is no different from a situation which commonly occurs in offenses of commission. In a riot, for example, it is difficult if not impossible to bring all the participants to book, but this has never been considered an obstacle to trial and punishment of those who can be reached. If a crowd of spectators stands by and watches a child drown in shallow water, nothing seems objectionable in trying and punishing all who can be tracked down and cannot show a reasonable excuse. To think that such an example of selfish group inertia could exist in our society is distressing, but, if it did, there would be every reason for invoking the criminal law against it."

2-059

There are many arguments as to why English law should not introduce a general duty to act. The central argument relates to individual liberty and autonomy.⁶⁹ Our freedom should only be restricted insofar as it is necessary to prevent persons causing harm to others. Further:

"the criminal law should recognise an individual's choices rather than allowing liability to be governed by chance, and the obligation to assist someone in peril may be thrust upon a chance passer-by, who may well prefer not to become involved at all."⁷⁰

It is further argued that the imperilled stranger has no right to be rescued and therefore the defendant is under no duty to rescue.⁷¹

These arguments are fortified by the claim that it is basic to our morality that it is worse to, say, shoot or drown a victim than merely to look the other way when he is drowning. As Fletcher puts it:

“The difference between killing and letting die, between creating a risk, and tolerating a risk, is one of the principles that sets the framework for assessing moral responsibility.”⁷²

This point is underlined by Moore: “Drowning [a child] makes the world a worse place, whereas not preventing its drowning only fails to improve the world”.⁷³

LEO KATZ, BAD ACTS AND GUILTY MINDS (1987), P.145:

2-060

“[T]he consequences of an omission are generally less certain than those of an act. Holding somebody’s head under water is more likely to kill him than not throwing him a life vest.

But there is a deeper, moral, reason why killing-by-omission offends us less than killing-by-commission. Compare these two situations. (1) Bert will die unless Berta gives him one of her kidneys. Berta is ailing and doesn’t want to risk an operation. So she lets Bert die. (2) Berta will die unless Bert gives her his only kidney. She kills Bert and takes his kidney. In both 1 and 2 Berta brings about Bert’s death to assure her own survival; in 1 she does it by an omission, in 2 by an act. Why are we less offended by her conduct in 1 than 2? Because in 1 she simply holds on to her own kidney, whereas in 2 she appropriates somebody else’s kidney. We value personal autonomy and Berta’s conduct in 2 offends against that value, while her conduct in 1 doesn’t. Our sentiments about every other case of omission can be understood by analogizing it to these two cases. The person who fails to prevent harm that would occur even if he didn’t exist simply fails to give away something he owns. The person who brings about harm that wouldn’t occur if he didn’t exist takes away something owned by someone else. Both persons may be callous, but only the latter offends our sense of personal autonomy.”

2-061

Husak suggests the reason why it is worse to kill than to let die is because the defendant has more control in the former than in the latter situation:

“persons generally exercise far less control over what happens as a result of their omission than as a result of their positive actions. Control over a consequence is typically exercised by positive action.”⁷⁴

English law has endorsed this view that it is worse to kill than to “let die”. In Airedale NHS Trust v Bland, the House of Lords ruled that in certain circumstances it was lawful for doctors to let a patient die but it was illegal actively to bring a patient’s life to an end:

“So to act is to cross the Rubicon which runs between on the one hand the care of the living patient and on the other hand euthanasia—actively causing his death to avoid or to end his suffering. Euthanasia is not lawful at common law.”⁷⁵

Additionally, there are many objections of a more practical nature to any idea of introducing a general duty to act. If a large crowd watches someone drown, would they all be liable? How much help need be given? After dragging a drowning person from the sea, would one be under a duty to provide mouth-to-mouth resuscitation (irrespective of risk of disease) and then drive the rescued person to the nearest hospital if necessary? How much danger would the rescuer be expected to risk? What if the rescuer’s efforts exacerbated the situation and worsened the plight of the imperilled person? Might not such a law be counterproductive in that fear of being forced to intervene might keep people away from places where they might be called upon to help?

A final objection to any attempt to introduce a general duty to act is that it will not usually be possible to establish causation in situations other than those where at present there is a duty to act.

R. v STONE AND DOBINSON [1977] 1
Q.B. 354 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION)

2-062

The facts appear from the judgment of Geoffrey Lane LJ.

GEOFFREY LANE LJ:

“[The two appellants were convicted of manslaughter and now appeal against conviction. Stone and his housekeeper/mistress, Dobinson, admitted Stone’s younger sister, Fanny, aged 61, to their household].

[Fanny] was eccentric in many ways. She was morbidly and unnecessarily anxious about putting on weight and so denied herself proper meals. She would take to her room for days ...

[T]here can be no doubt that Fanny’s condition over the succeeding weeks and months must have deteriorated rapidly. By July 1975 she was, it seems, unable or unwilling to leave her bed and, on July 19, the next-door neighbour, Mrs Wilson, gallantly volunteered to help the female appellant to wash Fanny. She states:

‘On July 19 Mrs Dobinson and I went to Fanny’s room in order to clean her up. When I went into the room there was not a strong smell until I moved her. Her nightdress was wet and messed with her own excreta and the dress had to be cut off. I saw her back was sore; I hadn’t seen anything like that before. I took the bedclothes off the bed. They were all wet through and messed. And so was the mattress. I was there for about two hours and Mrs Dobinson helped. She was raw, her back, shoulders, bottom and down below between her legs. Mrs Dobinson appeared to me to be upset because Fanny had never let her attend to her before. I advised Mrs Dobinson to go to the social services.’

Emily West, the licensee of the local public house, the Crossed Daggers, gave evidence to the effect that during the whole of the period, from July 19 onwards, the appellants came to the public house every night at about 7 pm The appellant Dobinson was worried and told Emily West that Fanny would not wash, go to the toilet or eat or drink. As a result Emily West immediately advised Dobinson to get a doctor and when told that Fanny's doctor lived at Doncaster, Emily West suggested getting a local one. It seems that some efforts were made to get a local doctor, but the neighbour who volunteered to do the telephoning (the appellants being incapable of managing the instrument themselves) was unsuccessful.

On August 2, 1975 Fanny was found by Dobinson to be dead in her bed. The police were called. On arrival they found there was no ventilation in the bedroom ... Under the bed was an empty polythene bucket. Otherwise there was no food, washing or toilet facilities in the room. There was excrement on the bed and floor. It was a scene of dreadful degradation.

The pathologist, Dr Usher, gave evidence that the deceased was naked, emaciated, weighing five stone and five pounds, her body ingrained with dirt, lying in a pool of excrement ... There was a tidemark of excreta corresponding with the position in which her body was lying. At the mortuary, Dr Usher found the deceased's body to be ulcerated over the right hip joint and on the underside of the left knee; in each case the ulceration went down to the bone. There were maggots in the ulcers ... Such ulcers could not have been produced in less than two or three weeks ... Her stomach contained no food products but a lot of bile stained fluid. She had not eaten recently. He found no natural disease. The disinclination to eat was a condition of anorexia nervosa which was not a physical condition but a condition of the brain or mind. She had been requiring urgent medical attention for some days or even weeks. He said:

'If two weeks prior to my seeing the body she had gone into hospital there is a distinct possibility that they may have saved her; and three weeks earlier the chances would have been good. If her condition on July 19 was no worse than that described by Mrs Wilson, then her survival would have been probable.' ...

The prosecution alleged that in the circumstances the appellants had undertaken the duty of caring for Fanny who was incapable of looking after herself, that they had, with gross negligence, failed in that duty, that such failure caused her death and they were guilty of manslaughter ...

[Counsel for the appellant] suggests that the situation here is unlike any reported case. Fanny came to this house as a lodger. Largely, if not entirely due to her own eccentricity and failure to look after herself or feed herself properly, she became increasingly infirm and immobile and eventually unable to look after herself. Is it to be said, asks [counsel for the appellant] rhetorically, that by the mere fact of becoming infirm and helpless in these circumstances she casts a duty on her brother and the appellant Dobinson to take steps to have her looked after or taken into hospital? The suggestion is that, heartless though it may seem, this is one of those situations where the appellants were entitled to do nothing; where no duty was cast upon them to help, any more than it is cast upon a man to rescue a stranger from drowning, however easy such a rescue might be.

This court rejects that proposition. Whether Fanny was a lodger or not she was a blood relation of the appellant Stone; she was occupying a room in his house; the appellant Dobinson had undertaken the duty of trying to wash her, of taking such food to her as she required. There was ample evidence that each appellant was aware of the poor condition she was in by mid-July. It was not disputed that no effort was made to summon an ambulance or the social services or the police despite the entreaties of Mrs Wilson and Mrs West. A social worker used to visit Cyril. No word was spoken to him. All these were matters which the jury were entitled to take into account when considering whether the necessary assumption of a duty to care for Fanny had been proved.

This was not a situation analogous to the drowning stranger. They did make efforts to care. They tried to get a doctor; they tried to discover the previous doctor. The appellant Dobinson helped with the washing and the provision of food. All these matters were put before the jury in terms which we find it impossible to fault. The jury were entitled to find that the duty had been assumed. They were entitled to conclude that once Fanny became helplessly infirm, as she had by July 19, the appellants were, in the circumstances, obliged either to summon help or else to care for Fanny themselves.”

Appeal dismissed

2-063

If there were a general duty to act in English law, would Mrs Wilson (whose daughter was a nurse) and even Emily West be charged with manslaughter? If either of them had summoned medical assistance then Fanny's life might have been saved.

The answer here must be in the negative. It is possible to hold that Stone and Dobinson caused Fanny's death because it was their deviation from an expected norm that stands out as exceptional among the candidates for causation. The inactions of Mrs Wilson and Emily West do not stand out as wholly exceptional. Fanny was dependent and reasonably relied upon Stone and Dobinson. It is this reliance that generates a duty on their part to take care of her. It is the breach of this duty that stands out as a "deviation" and thus a cause. On the other hand, Fanny did not rely on Mrs Wilson or Emily West any more than she would have relied on a passing milkman who happened to become aware of her situation. This lack of reliance means that Mrs Wilson and Emily West will not be held to have assumed a responsibility towards Fanny under the present law. Their failure to act will not stand out as exceptional or a deviation from the norm. They did not cause her death.

Does this thesis, which would be fatal to any argument in favour of a general duty to act, apply in all cases? It will be recalled that Leavens, in an earlier extract,⁷⁶ used the example of a person sitting on a park bench watching a flower die from lack of water even though a full water can was nearby. We would not say that that person caused the death of the flower. As she was under no duty to water the flower, her failure to act was unexceptional. But we would say that the park's gardener caused the death of the flower if he failed to water it. Because of his duty (by contract), his failure becomes significant; it represents a marked alteration of the status quo and can count as a cause.

What of the mother and the stranger who fail to rescue the child from the shallow pool of water? It has been argued that there is no difficulty in establishing a causal link in both these cases.⁷⁷ In one sense, the actions of both did cause the death of the child: but for their failures to act, the child would have survived. But, again, it is the mother's failure that stands out as the more significant cause of death. Like the appellants in Stone and Dobinson the mother has a special responsibility to the child. It is the failure to exercise this responsibility that is "exceptional" or a significant "deviation" from the expected and thus the substantial cause of the death. It is the existence of this duty that converts a mere cause into a legally sufficient cause. The stranger has no special responsibility towards the child and, therefore, while his omission might be morally deplorable, it is not “exceptional” in the same sense as when the mother fails to save her own child.

2-064

Another way of expressing this is that a cause alters the status quo. The status quo is something that exists, “including expected patterns of conduct”,⁷⁸ whether we are there or not. A mother has a special relationship towards her drowning child. That relationship becomes part of the status quo. Her failure to act alters the status quo and is thus a cause of the result. The stranger’s failure to act has no impact on the status quo. Events simply take their normal (but tragic) course; the stranger’s acts do not count as a legal cause of the consequence.

Thus, to summarise, it would be pointless to impose a general duty to act as the only people who could be held responsible in terms of causation would be those who owed duties to their victims under one of the recognised heads. It is only because of the special relationship, the assumption of duty, etc. that causation is established. Without this pre-existing duty the causative link between the inactivity and the ensuing consequence would be too remote.⁷⁹

In discussing whether there ought to be a general duty to act we have, until now, assumed that the purpose of such a general duty is that a breach thereof constitutes the requisite “act” for the purposes of some ulterior offence—for example, a failure to rescue becomes the requisite act for the purposes of a homicide offence. It is, however, not necessary to go as far as this. The law could still issue its moral directive that people must render assistance to others, but avoid all problems of causation and mens rea, by the creation of separate offences imposing limited and complete liability for a failure to act. A failure to act would render one liable for this separate offence. In the US, the state of Vermont has such a provision.

12 VT. STAT. ANN. S.519.

(EMERGENCY MEDICAL CARE):

2-065

“(a) A person who knows that another is exposed to grave physical harm shall, to the extent that the same can be rendered without danger or peril to himself or without interference with important duties owed to others, give reasonable assistance to the exposed person unless that assistance or care is being provided by others.

(b) A person who provides reasonable assistance in compliance with subsection (a) of this section shall not be liable in civil damages unless his acts constitute gross negligence or unless he will receive or expects to receive remuneration. Nothing contained in this subsection shall alter existing law with respect to tort liability of a practitioner of the healing arts for acts committed in the ordinary course of his practice.

(c) A person who wilfully violates subsection (a) of this section shall be fined not more than $100.00.”⁸⁰

2-066

If such a provision were part of English law then defendants such as Stone and Dobinson could have been charged with this offence instead of manslaughter. Some might argue that this would have been preferable: in moral terms one can condemn Stone and Dobinson for neglecting Fanny; but can we really condemn them morally for killing Fanny?⁸¹ Of course, if such a provision were introduced in England, without more, Stone and Dobinson would have been guilty of both this offence and manslaughter, their duty to act being now statutory in addition to the other grounds giving rise to their duty. It would need to be made clear whether such a new provision was replacing the possibility of any criminal liability for an ulterior offence or not. Where there is a duty under one of the already established heads, there is a strong case for continuing to impose criminal liability for the ulterior offence. The mother who watches her young child drown in the shallow pool ought arguably to be liable for manslaughter (at least) and not merely liable for a lesser offence of failing to act. This would, of course, leave unresolved the problem of whether defendants like Stone and Dobinson should simply be charged with the new statutory offence or whether they should be charged with manslaughter on the basis that they have breached one of the existing categories of duty. Similar questions are raised in relation to recent proposals to create an offence of failing to report suspected child abuse, applicable to professionals.⁸² If a teacher suspected that one of her pupils was being abused at home, and failed to report her suspicions to the authorities, would she then be liable for manslaughter if that child subsequently died as a result of such abuse?

R. A. DUFF, ANSWERING FOR CRIME:
RESPONSIBILITY AND LIABILITY IN
THE CRIMINAL LAW (2007), P.113:

2-067

“When the law does criminalise failures to prevent harm, it should normally distinguish them from active harm-doings, as distinct and lesser offences: it can do this either by criminalising only the failure to act, without assigning criminal responsibility for the actual harm, or by distinguishing omissive from active responsibility for the harm.”

2-068

One offence which ignores Duff’s suggestion is that of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult in one’s household.⁸³ This offence, discussed in Ch.8, can be committed either through a positive act, or through an omission, but in either case the penalty is a maximum of 14 years’ imprisonment. Ashworth suggests that many people may be unaware of the existence of this offence and of the duty that arises, leading to rule-of-law concerns.⁸⁴ If the law is to be effective in enforcing moral duties that arise, the existence of such offences needs to be effectively communicated to members of the public. That becomes a particular issue where the legislature chooses to create a large number of offences criminalising omissions. Ashworth reports that 42 (26%) of the offences created by primary legislation in 2005 are offences of omission.⁸⁵

(f) Punishment of omissions

2-069

Under English law, once liability for an offence has been established, one is liable to any punishment up to the maximum, regardless of whether one's "act" consisted of positive action or an omission to act. This approach can be defended: the harm is the same in both cases and sometimes it is difficult to distinguish between acts of commission and omissions to act.

On the other hand, it can be argued that omissions ought on principle to be punished less severely than positive acts and that this lesser level of punishment should be clearly articulated. One of the views considered earlier was that it was worse to "kill" than to "let die". If this were accepted, it should be reflected at the punishment level. In Hood a sentence for gross negligence manslaughter was reduced on the ground, inter alia, that the offence was one of "pure omission".⁸⁶ Adopting such an approach could have the advantage of encouraging the courts to be less inflexible in their attitude towards the imposition of criminal liability based on omissions.

2. Legally relevant circumstances

2-070

It was seen earlier in this chapter that the traditional definition of an actus reus involves: (1) an act (2) committed in legally relevant circumstances, (3) that (for result crimes) causes the prohibited consequence. An example is the crime of causing death by dangerous driving which requires that the defendant caused the death by dangerously driving a mechanically propelled vehicle on a road or other public place. The act of dangerous driving must be committed in the legally relevant circumstance that it was on a road or other public place and it must have caused death.

For most crimes it is not important whether an element of an offence is classified as being part of the act or as a legally relevant circumstance or as a consequence. For example, in the above offence it makes no difference whether the requisite act is "driving a mechanically propelled vehicle" or whether the act is driving a vehicle in the legally relevant circumstance of it being mechanically propelled. However, for some crimes a different mens rea is required for different elements of the actus reus and for these crimes it is important to be able to distinguish between acts, circumstances and consequences. For example, the crime of attempting to commit the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2) requires the defendant to attempt to commit criminal damage being reckless as to whether life would be endangered. As will be seen in Ch.5, for attempted crime the defendant must intend the consequence but can be reckless as to surrounding circumstances. Whether the offence element of “whether the life of another would be thereby endangered” is a legally relevant circumstance or a consequence becomes a critical issue.⁸⁷

3. Causation

(i) Introduction

COMMONWEALTH V WELANSKY 316
MASS. 383, 55 N.E. 2D 902 (1944)
(SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS):

2-071

On the evening of 28 November 1942 a fire broke out at the New Cocoanut Grove, a nightclub in Boston. The fire quickly spread throughout the crowded premises. Panic resulted and nearly 500 people died of burns, smoke inhalation, or injuries suffered in the attempt to escape. Who caused the death of these people?⁸⁸ There were several candidates for blame:

1. The waiter, Stanley Tomaszewski

A prankster had turned off a light bulb set in a decorative palm tree. A bartender ordered Stanley, a 16 year old boy, to light the bulb. He got a stool, lit a match in order to see the bulb and turned the bulb in its socket. The flame of his match ignited the artificial palm tree which in turn speedily ignited a low cloth ceiling near it. Did Stanley cause the death of the 500 victims? Initially he was blamed by the local press, but as other “scapegoats” were found, he was exonerated from blame and treated with ‘near adulation’ and started receiving ‘fan letters.’ But for the next 28 years Stanley received abusive telephone calls in the middle of the night and his life was threatened “hundreds of times by people who blame me for the fire”.⁸⁹

2. The prankster

The prankster who turned off the light bulb was also blamed initially in the press, but as his identity was never discovered, his condemnation was shortlived. Can he be said to have caused the death of the victims?

3. Public officials

The week before, the Fire Department had inspected the Coconut Grove and approved it as safe, despite the fact that there was a lack of adequate fire-exits and that highly inflammable materials were used throughout the nightclub and, in particular, in the decorative palm tree and in the low cloth ceiling. Did the particular fire inspector cause the deaths?

The local press also blamed other public officials. They condemned the Fire Commissioner on the basis that he was responsible for his subordinate’s performance of duty. They castigated a Captain in the Police Department who was inside the club at the time of the fire on inspection duties for not enforcing the law against over-crowding. Even the mayor was blamed for appointing such “negligent” and “lax” heads of departments and because he had taken no action to adopt a new building code that had been in the hands of the City Council for the previous four years. Did any of these public officials cause the deaths?

4. The owners

The nightclub was owned and run by Barnett Welansky. In decorating and equipping the club he had used defective wiring and installed the inflammable decorations. There were insufficient exit doors and some of these doors were kept locked. At the time of the fire Barnett Welansky was confined in hospital with a serious illness—his brother James Welansky and an employee, Jacob Goldfine, ‘assumed some of [his] duties at the night club, but made no change in methods.’⁹⁰ To what extent can it be said that the death of the victims was caused by Barnett Welansky or by his two delegates?

The result

Barnett Welansky and his two delegates were charged with manslaughter. The two delegates were acquitted by the jury, but Barnett Welansky was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not less than twelve years and not more than 15 years. Welansky's appeal was dismissed. Thus both the trial court and the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts clearly found that Barnett Welansky caused the death of the victims of the fire. After serving three years of his sentence, Welansky, who was suffering from terminal cancer and was not expected to live for more than another year, was granted a full and complete pardon by the Governor of Massachusetts.

It is interesting to contrast the views expressed in two of the many letters addressed to the Governor prior to his granting a pardon.

(i) "If Welansky was guilty of manslaughter in connection with the terrible deaths resulting from the Cocoanut Grove fire, then it was a technical guilt and nothing more. Certainly, in those circumstances, the sentence that was imposed upon him by the court was much too severe ... It may well be true that in appropriate cases, such as criminals whom the public would have a right to fear if they were released, that the criminal's health should not be taken into consideration, but in this particular case where there was no intention to do harm in the first place, but through a succession of misfortunes a man has been found guilty of manslaughter only from a technical point of view and not otherwise, [he is deserving of a pardon.]"⁹¹

(ii) "I vehemently oppose any pardon for Barnett Welansky whose criminal reconstruction of the Cocoanut Grove building sacrificed 492 human beings. I am a close relative of one of the victims. This horrible holocaust was a civic disgrace. It would become even more unspeakable were this man to be freed. In his petition for premature freedom, Welansky claims illness—says he wants to spend the rest of his days with his family. I recall 492 persons (one in particular) who wanted to live out their lives with their families. They are dead. He also disclaims guilt because he was at home the night of the fire.

Guiltless? He accepted guilt when he criminally flouted the building laws in callously renovating his nightclub and did not have the work done according to the plans which he had had okayed.

He evaded the law when he employed a young fellow to do some electrical wiring and knew that his worker did not have the proper license to do this work. Has it been absolutely proven that faulty wiring did not cause this fire? Although he was not present he knew that his illegally reconstructed club was open for public attendance the night of the fire.

Governor Tobin, consider the fact of locked exits in a place of public patronage. Hundreds died because a locked exit barred their way to the street's safety. These facts are on public record. They also are hideous facts burning deeply into the hearts of hundreds of heartbroken families."⁹²

H. VELTFORD AND G. LEE, "THE COCOANUT GROVE FIRE: A STUDY IN SCAPEGOATING" (NO.2 CLINICAL SUPP; 1943) JOURNAL OF ABNORMAL
AND SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY XXXVIII, 138:

2-072

"The people [of Boston] felt some person or persons must be held responsible; attaching responsibility to mere laws or to the panic provided neither sufficient outlet for their emotions nor opportunity for punishment ...

Significantly, newspapers and public alike overlooked the fact that the panic created by the fire must have been largely responsible for the great loss of life. In spite of statements by officials immediately after the fire, the people were not ready to accept the fact that 'the Boston tragedy was due in part to a psychological collapse.' To the extent that they ignored this fact, the blame that the newspapers and public placed on various persons involved in the fire was disproportionate to their responsibility.”

SALLY LLOYD-BOSTOCK, “THE ORDINARY MAN, AND THE PSYCHOLOGY OF ATTRIBUTING CAUSES AND RESPONSIBILITY” (1979)
42 M.L.R. 143, 155–156:

2–073

“Walster (‘Assignment of Responsibility for an Accident’ (1963) 3, 1 Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 73–79) ... found that people attributed more responsibility for an accident (in which a car parked unbraked ran down a hill) as the severity of the consequence increased. She formulated a version of what has become known as ‘the defensive attribution hypothesis’. Chance happenings over which the individual has no control (and, hence, no responsibility) are threatening. Therefore, when faced with an accident with serious consequences, an individual will seek to attribute responsibility to somebody in order to protect himself from acknowledging that the accident could happen to anyone, including himself. The need to protect himself in this way will increase with increasing severity of outcome ...

Often more than one kind of responsibility may be attributed in relation to the same event. For example, a Sunday Times article (13 April 1977) after describing at some length the circumstances surrounding the collision between two jumbo jets at Santa Cruz airport in Tenerife, concluded by attributing responsibility—‘Blame for the world’s worst aviation tragedy will no doubt be apportioned in time. One name will certainly not feature in any official inquest however: Antonio Cubillo. It is he who, no matter how indirectly, must shoulder responsibility for what happened at Santa Cruz.’ (Cubillo was leader of the movement which claimed responsibility for a bomb at Las Palmas airport. As a result of the bomb, aircraft, including those in the accident, were diverted to Santa Cruz, overloading the airport.) This illustrates a number of interesting things about reactions to disasters and attributing responsibility for them in newspapers. The writers recognise that it will differ from other attributions, and that Antonio Cubillo’s causal contribution will in other contexts be insufficient grounds. It is a non-legal attribution of responsibility, but even if nobody quarrelled with it in this context, it is clearly not the everyday answer to the question ‘who is responsible for the crash?’, nor does it exemplify the common-sense principles on which questions about remoteness of causes, etc. are decided.

The fact that everyday judgments are related to everyday purposes and consequences must be a major limitation on the usefulness of comparisons between legal and ordinary common-sense notions of cause and fault.”

(ii) Approaches to causation

2–074

In cases such as the Cocoanut Grove fire, how does the law determine which of several candidates actually caused the result? How far does the chain of causation extend? Welansky did not start the fire. Why was he liable for the resultant deaths? If the waiter had deliberately started the fire, would Welansky still have been liable or would the chain of causation have then been broken? While attempts have been made to discover a metaphysical rationale for the law’s rules on causation,⁹³ the more usual approach is that legal doctrines are shaped by other considerations and do not map metaphysical causal reality.⁹⁴ What are these other considerations?

There are three approaches that can be adopted in relation to the problem of causation.

(a) “Policy” approach

2–075

There are no underlying general principles of causation. Judges simply resort to considerations of “policy” to determine whether a particular defendant caused the specified harm.

H. L. A. HART AND TONY HONORÉ,
CAUSATION IN THE LAW, 2ND EDN
(1985), PP.103–104:

“For writers of the first school ‘policy’ is just a name for an immense variety of considerations which do weigh and should weigh with courts considering the question of the existence or extent of responsibility. No exhaustive enumeration can be given of such factors and no general principles can be laid down as to how a balance should be struck between them. Policy, on this interpretation, is atomized: the courts must focus attention on the precise way in which harm has eventuated in a particular case, and then ask and answer, in a more or less intuitive fashion, whether or not on these particular facts a defendant should be held responsible. The court’s function is to pass judgments acceptable to society for their time and place on these matters, and general policies can never take the place of judgment. Edgerton says:

‘It neither is nor should be possible to extract rules which cover the subject (of legal cause) and are definite enough to solve cases ... The solution ... depends upon a balancing of considerations which tend to show that it is or is not reasonable or just to treat the act as the cause of the harm ... these considerations are indefinite in number and in value and incommensurable’ (Legal Cause, (1924) U.Pa.L.R. 211).”

Norrie argues that any “principles” that might exist require “constant supplementation by policy considerations to reach decisions in individual cases” because causation can only be explained by taking into account the social context within which people act.⁹⁵

In holding that Welansky caused the death of the victims of the Cocoanut Grove fire, were the judges (and jury) simply giving effect to their conceptions of justice, expediency or “policy”? In deciding who to prosecute, are prosecutors to be guided by the same considerations of “policy”? Is such an ad hoc approach acceptable? It must be remembered that, apart from crimes of strict liability, criminal liability does not necessarily follow from a finding that causation is established. Some mens rea or culpability must also be found to exist. If policy considerations are to affect legal decisions, should they not be reserved for the mens rea assessment, or is it unrealistic to divorce policy considerations from any one aspect of a crime?

(b) Mens rea approach

2-078

There are two strands to the argument here. The first is that causation will generally be established if the defendant has mens rea. It is often stated (for example, in the Hart and Honoré extract below) that an intended consequence can never be too remote. Because recklessness (or gross negligence) could be attributed to Welansky, causation could be established. The alternative analysis (theoretically quite different, but similar in effect) is that because of the doctrine of mens rea and the test of responsibility, principles of causation are unnecessary in the criminal law. Any factual cause can be held to be the legal cause because actual liability will be limited to those who have mens rea:

“Under the modern conception of mens rea no hardship can result from any finely drawn investigation of causes, since the more remote the cause the greater the difficulty of proving that the accused person intended or realised what the effect of it would be.”⁹⁶

In Welansky, the prankster’s action of switching off the light bulb was a cause of the fire and subsequent deaths, but as mens rea could never be attributed to him, there was no point in prosecuting him. On the other hand, because Welansky was blameworthy he was prosecuted and convicted. Under these views all the “real work” is done by the doctrine of mens rea. Either the rules on causation are shaped by the existence of mens rea, or, alternatively, no rules on causation are necessary. All that is needed, in either case, is a simple proposition that the defendant’s act must have been a cause in the sense that without it the ultimate harm would not have occurred (known as the sine qua non rule or “but for” causation: but for the prankster turning off the bulb, the fire would never have started and the patrons would not have died).

2-079

There are problems with these approaches. How can they be adopted when dealing with crimes of strict liability? Clearly, the first view that causation is only established if there is a “blameable” cause⁹⁷ is problematic. Particularly when dealing with strict liability offences, the courts have tended to emphasise that whether causation is established is a question of fact and not law.⁹⁸ It has been argued that this amounts to an invitation to juries and magistrates only to find causation established if the defendant was blameworthy:

“By delegating the question of causation to the finders of fact, the courts are able to avoid the rigours of strict liability. The device allows both courts and Parliament to bury their heads in the sand, and to avoid any reassessment of the role of strict liability in criminal law. The courts undermine the rigidity of the strict liability rules by allowing juries to introduce a judgmental or culpability element into their decision-making on causation.”⁹⁹

However, in *Environment Agency v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd*¹⁰⁰ it was expressly stated that causation may be established even though the defendant did not intend the harm and was not even negligent; any other approach would defeat the object of strict liability legislation. Under the second view, causation would be established on a simple “but for” basis in all cases regardless of how far removed the act was from the result. Such an approach would be unacceptable and does not represent the law. While it is arguable that causation is more easily established in cases of strict liability, it is nevertheless clear that legal rules of causation do exist. As stated in Environment Agency v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd: “while liability is strict ... it is not an absolute liability in the sense that all that has to be shown is that the polluting matter escaped from the defendant’s land”.¹⁰¹ In *Alphacell v Woodward*¹⁰² it was indicated that causation depended on a “proper attribution of responsibility”. While “responsibility” in this context should not be confused with culpability, it is clear that more than “but for” causation needs to be established. This was most recently confirmed by the Supreme Court in the case of Hughes,¹⁰³ extracted below.

Even in cases where mens rea is established, there are problems with these approaches to causation.¹⁰⁴ The result would be that Welansky, because he had mens rea (as defined in that case), would still have been liable even if the waiter, Stanley, had deliberately started the fire with the intention of killing everyone in the nightclub. Would such a result be acceptable? If these views are correct, is it right that all liability should turn on such a nebulous and elusive concept as mens rea? It might well be thought better to clarify and strengthen the rules on causation which could lead to a diminution of the importance of the doctrine of mens rea.

(c) Hart and Honoré's quest for general principles

2-080

Not satisfied with the above approaches, attempts have been made to formulate general principles of causation that could be applicable in all cases. Hart and Honoré provide the most influential such attempt, derived from our common sense notions of causation.

Events do not have single “causes”, but only occur when there is a combination of a complex set of conditions. We might identify the dropping of a lighted cigarette in a waste-paper basket as the cause of a fire but in reality this leads to a fire only if certain other conditions are satisfied: there must be oxygen in the air, there must be combustible material in the waste-paper basket, and so on. Each of these conditions is equally necessary if a fire is to be started. How are we to select one of this complex set of conditions as the cause?

H. L. A. HART AND TONY HONORÉ,
CAUSATION IN THE LAW, 2ND EDN
(1985), PP.29, 33-34, 42, 77-80, 326,
340-341:

2-081

“Human action in the simple cases, where we produce some desired effect by the manipulation of an object in our environment, is an interference in the natural course of events which makes a difference in the way these develop ... Common experience teaches us that, left to themselves, the things we manipulate, since they have a 'nature' or characteristic way of behaving, would persist in states or exhibit changes different from those which we have learnt to bring about in them by our manipulation. The notion that a cause is essentially something which interferes with or intervenes in the course of events which would normally take place, is central to our commonsense concept of cause ...

[I]n distinguishing between causes and conditions two contrasts are of prime importance. These are the contrasts between what is abnormal and what is normal in relation to any given thing or subject-matter, and between a free deliberate human action and all other conditions ...

(a) Abnormal and normal conditions

... In the case of a building destroyed by fire 'mere conditions' will be factors such as the oxygen in the air, the presence of combustible material or the dryness of the building ... These factors are, of course, just those which are present alike both in the case where such accidents occur and in the normal cases where they do not; and it is this consideration that leads us to reject them as the cause of the accident, even though it is true that without them the accident would not have occurred ... such factors do not 'make the difference' between disaster and normal functioning, as ... the dropping of a lighted cigarette [does] ...

(b) Voluntary action

... [A] voluntary human action intended to bring about what in fact happens, and in the manner in which it happens, has a special place in causal inquiries; not so much because this, if present among a set of conditions required for the production of the effect, is often treated as the cause (though this is true), but because, when the question is how far back a cause shall be traced through a number of intervening causes, such a voluntary action very often is regarded both as a limit and also as still the cause even though other later abnormal occurrences are recognized as causes ...

[However in certain cases even when an actor intends to achieve a result (and that result occurs), the chain of causation between the actor's conduct and the result might be broken.]

Tracing consequences

... A hits B who falls to the ground stunned and bruised by the blow; at that moment a tree crashes to the ground and kills B. A has certainly caused B's bruises but not his death ...

The connexion between A's action and B's death ... would naturally be described in the language of coincidence. 'It was a coincidence: it just happened that, at the very moment when A knocked B down, a tree crashed at the very place where he fell and killed him.' ... We speak of a coincidence whenever the conjunction of two or more events in certain spatial still (1) is very unlikely by ordinary standards and (2) is for some reason significant or important, provided (3) that they occur without human contrivance and (4) are independent of each other ...

In the present case the fall of the tree just as B was struck down within its range satisfies the four criteria for a coincidence which we have enumerated. First, though neither event was of a very rare or exceptional kind, their conjunction would be rated very unlikely judged by the standards of ordinary experience. Secondly, this conjunction was causally significant for it was a necessary part of the process terminating in B's death. Thirdly, this conjunction was not consciously designed by A; had he known of the impending fall of the tree and hit B with the intention that he should fall within its range B's death would not have been the result of any coincidence. A would certainly have caused it. The common-sense principle that a contrived conjunction cannot be a coincidence is the element of truth in the legal maxim (too broadly stated even for legal purposes) that an intended consequence cannot be too 'remote'. Fourthly, each member of the conjunction in this case was independent of the other; whereas if B had fallen against the tree with an impact sufficient to bring it down on him, this sequence of physical events, though freakish in its way, would not be a coincidence and in most contexts of ordinary life, as in the law, the course of events would be summarized by saying that in this case, unlike that of the coincidence, A's act was the cause of B's death, since each stage is the effect of the preceding stage. Thus, the blow forced the victim against the tree, the effect of this was to make the tree fall and the fall of the tree killed the victim.

One further criterion in addition to these four must be satisfied if a conjunction of events is to rank as a coincidence and as a limit when the consequences of the action are traced ... An abnormal condition existing at the time of a human intervention is distinguished both by ordinary thought and, with a striking consistency, by most legal systems from an abnormal event or conjunction of events subsequent to that intervention; the former, unlike the latter, are not ranked as coincidences or 'extraneous' causes when the consequences of the intervention come to be traced. Thus A innocently gives B a tap over the head of a normally quite harmless character, but because B is then suffering from some rare disease the tap has, as we say, 'fatal results'. In this case A has caused B's death though unintentionally. The scope of the principle which thus distinguishes contemporaneous abnormal conditions from subsequent events is unclear; but at least where a human being initiates some physical change in a thing, animal, or person, abnormal physical states of the object affected, existing at the time, are ranked as part of the circumstances in which the cause 'operates'. In the familiar controlling imagery these are part of 'the stage already set' before the 'intervention'.

... Just how unlikely must a conjunction be to rank as a coincidence, and in the light of what knowledge is likelihood to be assessed? The only answer is: 'very unlikely in the light of the knowledge available to ordinary men.'

... [S]o in criminal law courts have often limited responsibility by appealing to the causal distinctions embedded in ordinary thought, with their emphasis on voluntary interventions and abnormal or coincidental events as factors negating responsibility.

Voluntary conduct

The free, deliberate, and informed intervention of a second person, not acting in concert with the first, and intending to bring about the harm which in fact occurs or recklessly courting it, is normally held to relieve the first actor of criminal responsibility. One must distinguish, however, the situation where the first actor's conduct was sufficient in the existing circumstances to bring about the harm (... the case for holding the first actor responsible despite the voluntary intervention of the second is naturally much stronger) ... from that where it was not sufficient without the intervention of the second actor (... here most decisions relieve the first actor of responsibility) ...

Abnormality

The basic principle here is that a physical state or event, even if subsequent to the act of the defendant, does not negative causal connection if it is normal or usual in the context. In criminal as in civil law a conjunction of events amounting to a coincidence is held to negative causal connection.”

2-082

A central problem with this analysis is that everything depends on one’s definition of “normal”, “abnormal” and “voluntary”. As Norrie says:

“Thus, individuals are held to be causes until something abnormal intervenes, but what is abnormal depends upon social perception, and therefore upon a socio-political label being stuck upon it. Similarly, causation stretches as far as the new voluntary act of a third party, but what is meant by voluntary can be as narrow or as broad as one likes, depending upon how much one is prepared to recognise the social character of the lives of individuals.”¹⁰⁵

(iii) The law’s response

2-083

In order to establish causation for the purposes of criminal liability it is necessary that there be both factual and legal causation. Most of the cases have concerned homicide and offences against the person and so discussion here will be primarily (but not exclusively) limited to these areas. The problems of causation in relation to omissions and participation in crime are discussed when dealing with those topics.

(a) Factual causation

2-084

The defendant’s actions must be a sine qua non (or “but for” cause) of the result. “But for” the defendant striking the victim, she would not have died. In White,¹⁰⁶ the defendant put cyanide in his mother’s drink with intent to kill her. She had a heart attack and died before she had drunk any of the poisoned mixture. The defendant had not caused her death. His actions were not even a “but for” cause of her death.

(b) Legal causation

We have seen, however, that there may be a wide range of “but for” causers. For example, in Welansky, the waiter, the prankster and Welansky all satisfied this test. The law, in selecting those who are causally responsible, insists that the defendant’s actions be the “operative”,¹⁰⁷ “substantial”,¹⁰⁸ “beyond the de minimus range”,¹⁰⁹ or “proximate”,¹¹⁰ cause of the prohibited consequence; they must “contribute significantly” to the result.¹¹¹ The problem with these terms is their elasticity. They can be made as broad or narrow as one likes and essentially take one no further in the quest for principles of causation.

The creation of a new statutory homicide offence of causing death by driving whilst unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured¹¹² has highlighted the need for legal causation to be established, and confirmed that factual “but for” causation is insufficient on its own to establish liability. The offence is a constructive crime, and has been described as “a rare example of double strict liability”¹¹³ in that to be liable no mens rea is needed to be proved either in relation to the underlying offence of driving without a licence or insurance, nor in relation to the causing of death. In the case of Williams,¹¹⁴ the Court of Appeal held that no blameworthy driving was required to be proved; it was enough that the defendant was driving without insurance and had been involved in a fatal collision. The result of this decision was that the Court of Appeal interpreted Parliament’s intention to be that any sine qua non (“but for”) connection between the defendant’s illicit driving and the deceased’s death would suffice as a legally sufficient cause of the death,¹¹⁵ and that criminal liability could arise in situations where the defendant would not be found liable for the death under civil law. It was not long before this interpretation of the law was put to the test in front of the Supreme Court.

R. v HUGHES [2014] 1 CR. APP. R. 6
(SUPREME COURT):

The defendant, who did not have a full driving licence and was uninsured, was driving his camper van in a faultless manner when he collided with a car coming in the opposite direction which had veered onto the wrong side of the road. The driver of the car, who had taken a significant quantity of heroin, was over-tired, and had been driving erratically for some time, died from his injuries. The defendant was charged with two counts of causing the death of another person by driving a motor vehicle on a road while uninsured and otherwise than in accordance with a licence, contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1988s.3ZB. At trial, the Crown accepted that there was nothing that the defendant could have done to avoid the collision. On a preliminary point, the judge ruled that the defendant had not committed either offence because he had not caused the death of the car driver. However, the Court of Appeal allowed the Crown's appeal, holding that it was not an element of the offence that the defendant's driving had to exhibit any fault contributing to the accident and that it was enough that the defendant was uninsured, or without a full licence, and that his vehicle had been involved in the fatal collision and that, therefore, the trial should resume. The defendant appealed.
--

LORD HUGHES and LORD TOULSON:

“23 The law has frequently to confront the distinction between ‘cause’ in the sense of a sine qua non without which the consequence would not have occurred, and ‘cause’ in the sense of something which was a legally effective cause of that consequence. The former, which is often conveniently referred to as a ‘but for’ event, is not necessarily enough to be a legally effective cause. If it were, the woman who asked her neighbour to go to the station in his car to collect her husband would be held to have caused her husband's death if he perished in a fatal road accident on the way home. In the case law there is a well recognised distinction between conduct which sets the stage for an occurrence and conduct which on a common sense view is regarded as instrumental in bringing about the occurrence. There is a helpful review of this topic in the judgment of Glidewell LJ in Galoo Ltd v Bright Grahame Murray [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1360. Amongst a number of English and Commonwealth cases of high authority, he cited, at 1373–1374, the judgment of the High Court of Australia in March v E & MH Stramare Pty Ltd (1991) 171 C.L.R. 506 at 515, in which Mason CJ emphasised that it is wrong to place too much weight on the ‘but for’ test to the exclusion of the ‘common sense’ approach which the common law has always favoured, and that ultimately the common law approach is not susceptible to a formula.

24 In the earlier s.3ZB case of Williams the principal focus of the argument was the defendant's submission that the new offence under s.3ZB depended on proof of some fault in the driving of the defendant. That submission failed in large part because of the simultaneous creation by the 2006 Act of the second new offence of causing death by careless driving by inserting s.2B into the 1988 Act ... In the present case, as in that of Williams, there is no suggestion that there was anything which the defendant either did or omitted to do in the driving of the car which contributed to the least extent to the fatality. The driving of the two defendants was, no doubt, a 'but for' cause of the death. It set the scene or provided the background to, or occasion for, the fatal collision. But that does not resolve the question whether it was a legally effective cause.

25 By the test of common sense, whilst the driving by Mr Hughes created the opportunity for his car to be run into by Mr Dickinson, what brought about the latter's death was his own dangerous driving under the influence of drugs. It was a matter of the merest chance that what he hit when he veered onto the wrong side of the road for the last of several times was the oncoming vehicle which Mr Hughes was driving. He might just as easily have gone off the road and hit a tree, in which case nobody would suggest that his death was caused by the planting of the tree, although that too would have been a sine qua non.

26 This is a statute creating a penal provision, and one of very considerable severity. The offence created is a form of homicide. To label a person a criminal killer of another is of the greatest gravity. The defendant is at risk of imprisonment for a substantial term ... It is undoubtedly open to Parliament to legislate to create a harsh offence or penalty, just as it is open to it to take away fundamental rights, but it is not to be assumed to have done so unless that interpretation of its statute is compelled, and compelled by the language of the statute itself. The rule of construction which applies to penal legislation, and, a fortiori, to legislation which carries the penalty of imprisonment, is not identical to, but is somewhat analogous to, the principle of statutory interpretation known as the principle of legality.

27 ... [T]he gravity of a conviction for homicide, for which the sentence may be a term of imprisonment, is such that if Parliament wishes to displace the normal approach to causation recognised by the common law, and substitute a different rule, it must do so unambiguously. Where, as here, Parliament has plainly chosen not to adopt unequivocal language which was readily available, it follows that an intention to create the meaning contended for by the Crown cannot be attributed to it.

...

35 The certified question in this case asks:

‘Is an offence contrary to section 3ZB of the Road Traffic Act 1988, as amended by section 21(1) of the Road Safety Act 2006, committed by an unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured driver when the circumstances are that the manner of his or her driving is faultless and the deceased was (in terms of civil law) 100% responsible for causing the fatal accident or collision?’

36 For the reasons set out, enquiry into apportionment of liability in civil terms is not appropriate to a criminal trial. But it must follow from the use of the expression ‘causes death ... by driving’ that s.3ZB requires at least some act or omission in the control of the car, which involves some element of fault, whether amounting to careless/inconsiderate driving or not, and which contributes in some more than minimal way to the death. It is not necessary that such act or omission be the principal cause of the death. In which circumstances the offence under s.3ZB will then add to the other offences of causing death by driving must remain to be worked out as factual scenarios are presented to the courts. In the present case, the agreed facts are that there was nothing which Mr Hughes did in the manner of his driving which contributed in any way to the death. It follows that the Recorder of Newcastle was correct to rule that he had not in law caused the death by his driving. The appeal should be allowed and that ruling restored.”

Appeal allowed

Before examining the cases further, it might be helpful to set out some preliminary propositions.

1. General propositions

2-087

1. The defendant’s actions need not be the scientific or medical cause of the result. In McKechnie,¹¹⁶ the defendant hit the victim over the head with a television set. These injuries prevented doctors operating on the victim's duodenal ulcer. The medical cause of death was a burst duodenal ulcer. The defendant was nevertheless held to have legally caused that death.

2. One can cause death or other injury by fright or shock without touching one's victim. For example, in Watson,¹¹⁷ a burglar entered a house and verbally abused the elderly householder who died of a heart attack shortly afterwards. The burglar was held to have caused the death of the householder.
3. The defendant must "take his victim as he finds him". In Hayward,¹¹⁸ the defendant chased his wife into the street. She fell down and he kicked her arm. She died. Medical evidence established that she had a persistent thyruus gland and such persons could die from a combination of fright or strong emotion and physical exertion. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter. This proposition will be explored further in due course.
4. The defendant's actions need not be the sole cause of the consequence. In Hughes the principal cause of the deceased's death was his own dangerous driving:

"if the driving of Mr Hughes was a cause of the death at all, this is the familiar case of concurrent causes. There are many examples of two or more concurrent causes of an event, all effective causes in law. A road traffic accident is one of the commoner cases, for such events are only too often the result of a combination of acts or omissions on the part of two or more persons. Where there are multiple legally effective causes, whether of a road traffic accident or of any other event, it suffices if the act or omission under consideration is a significant (or substantial) cause, in the sense that it is not de minimis or minimal. It need not be the only or the principal cause."¹¹⁹

In several of the medical cases, shortly to be discussed, the defendant attacked a victim who then received negligent treatment. As stated in Cheshire: 'the accused's acts need not be the sole cause or even the main cause of death, it being sufficient that his acts contributed significantly to that result'.¹²⁰ In such cases it is possible for both the original attacker and the doctors to be found to have caused the death. The civil law concept of contributory negligence plays no role in the criminal law rules on causation.

5. A novus actus interveniens will break the chain of causation. A novus actus interveniens is an intervening act or event that takes over as the new “operative” cause, relegating the defendant’s actions to the realms of the history of the case. This point needs more detailed explanation.

2. Novus actus interveniens

2-088

After the defendant has acted, some other act or event or omission could occur which might have the potential to break the chain of causation. This can be a natural event, the act of a third party, or an act of the victim. In these cases, the problem is whether this intervening act or event is so significant as to become the new sole cause of the result.

Two general principles can be stated at the outset. First, as seen above in the Hart and Honoré extract, a voluntary (“free, deliberate and informed”) act by a third party will normally break the chain of causation. Secondly, with regard to acts of the victim or natural events, only those acts or events that are “daft or unexpected” and not reasonably foreseeable will break the chain of causation. These principles, and whether they are reconcilable, can now be examined in more depth.

(a) Natural events

2-089

What is the position if the defendant attacks a victim and leaves him unconscious in a field where he is struck by lightning and killed? The rule here is that if the supervening natural event (being struck by lightning) is not reasonably foreseeable, it will break the chain of causation. As Hart and Honoré state, in the extract above, such an event is a “coincidence”.

On the other hand, if the supervening natural event is reasonably foreseeable, the causal chain will not be broken. In *Hart*¹²¹ the defendant attacked a victim and left her unconscious on a beach below the high-water mark where she was drowned by the incoming tide. Such an event was reasonably foreseeable and the defendant was held to have caused the death of the victim.

(b) Human intervention

2-090

It is useful here to distinguish between the actions of a third party and actions by the victim.

(i) Acts of third party

2-091

It will be recalled that, according to Hart and Honoré, causation cannot be traced through the voluntary action of a third party. The free, deliberate and informed intervention of a third party breaks the chain of causation. For example, if I stab my victim who is lying in the street dying and you come along and shoot the victim killing him instantly, your action will break the chain of causation. However, if you merely kick the victim, accelerating death by a matter of seconds, your “voluntary action” will not break the causal chain. The issue is one of determining the circumstances in which the voluntary action of a third party will be so significant as to break the causal chain.

R. v LATIF [1996] 2 CR. APP. R. 92
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-092

The defendant was charged with importing controlled drugs into the country. In fact, the drugs were knowingly brought in by a customs officer acting with a paid informant, Homi.

LORD STEYN:

“The general principle is that the free, deliberate and informed intervention of a second person, who intends to exploit the situation created by the first, but is not acting in concert with him, is held to relieve the first actor of criminal responsibility. For example, if a thief had stolen the heroin after Shahzad delivered it to Honi, and imported it into the United Kingdom, the chain of causation would plainly have been broken. The general principle must also be applicable to the role of the customs officers in this case. They acted in full knowledge of the content of the packages. They did not act in concert with Shahzad. They acted deliberately for their own purposes whatever those might have been. In my view consistency and legal principle do not permit us to create an exception to the general principle of causation to take care of the particular problem thrown up by this case.”

Appeal dismissed (as defendants were guilty of an attempt to commit the offence)

RAFFERTY V R. [2007] EWCA CRIM 1846:

2-093

The appellant and two others seriously assaulted and the robbed the victim on a beach. The appellant took the victim’s debit card and went to try to draw money from a cashpoint machine. While he was away, the others dragged the victim into the sea where he drowned. The appellant was convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

HOOPER LJ:

“[40] ... Hart and Honore ... [wrote]:

‘The free deliberate and informed intervention of a second person, who intends to exploit the situation created by the first, but is not acting in concert with him, is normally held to relieve the first actor of criminal responsibility.’ ...

[43] ... [T]he judge gave the following direction on novus actus interveniens [that the jury had to be sure]:

‘that the drowning of [the victim] by [the others] was not such a new and intervening act in the chain of events, which was so completely different from the injuries for which Rafferty was responsible, that it overwhelmed those injuries and destroyed any causal connection between them and the death of [the victim].’

[44] We have reached the conclusion that no jury could properly conclude that the drowning of [the victim] by [the others] was other than a new and intervening act in the chain of events.”

Appeal allowed

This principle that the free, deliberate and informed intervention of a third party breaks the causal chain was not applied in the following much-criticised House of Lords' decision.

ENVIRONMENT AGENCY V EMPRESS
CAR CO (ABERTILLERY) LTD [1999] 2
A.C. 22 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-094

The appellant company maintained a diesel oil tank on its premises. An outlet from the tank was governed by a tap which had no lock. An unknown person (probably a vandal) opened the tap causing the oil to run into a river. The company was convicted of causing polluting matter to enter controlled waters contrary to the Water Resources Act 1991 s.85(1).

LORD HOFFMANN:

“[O]ne cannot give a commonsense answer to a question of causation for the purpose of attributing responsibility under some rule without knowing the purpose and scope of the rule ...

What, therefore, is the nature of the duty imposed by s.85(1)? ... It is immediately clear that the liability imposed is strict: it does not require mens rea in the sense of intention or negligence. Strict liability is imposed in the interests of protecting controlled waters from pollution ...

... [T]o frame the question as ‘who or what caused the result under consideration’ is wrong and distracting, because it may have more than one right answer. The question is whether the defendant caused the pollution. How is foreseeability a relevant factor to consider in answering this question? ... [T]he question is not whether the consequences ought to have been foreseen; it is whether the defendant caused the pollution. And foreseeability is not the criterion for deciding whether a person caused something or not. People often cause things which they could not have foreseen.

The true commonsense distinction is, in my view, between acts and events which, although not necessarily foreseeable in the particular case, are in the generality a normal and familiar fact of life, and facts or events which are abnormal and extraordinary ... There is nothing unusual about people putting unlawful substances into the sewage system and the same, regrettably, is true about ordinary vandalism. So when these things happen, one does not say: that was an extraordinary coincidence, which negated the causal connection between the original act of accumulating the polluting substance and its escape ... On the other hand, the example I gave of the terrorist attack would be something so unusual that one would not regard the defendant's conduct as having caused the escape at all ...

I shall try to summarise the effect of this discussion ...

(2) The prosecution need not prove that the defendant did something which was the immediate cause of the pollution: maintaining tanks, lagoons or sewage systems full of noxious liquid is doing something, even if the immediate cause of the pollution was lack of maintenance, a natural event or the act of a third party.

(3) When the prosecution has identified something which the defendant did, the justices must decide whether it caused the pollution. They should not be diverted by questions like 'What was the cause of the pollution?' or 'Did something else cause the pollution?' Because to say that something else caused the pollution (like brambles clogging the pumps or vandalism by third parties) is not inconsistent with the defendant having caused it as well.

(4) If the defendant did something which produced a situation in which the polluting matter could escape but a necessary condition of the actual escape which happened was also the act of a third party or a natural event, the justices should consider whether the act or event should be regarded as a normal fact of life or something extraordinary. If it was in the general run of things a matter of ordinary occurrence, it will not negative the causal effect of the defendant's acts, even if it was not foreseeable that it would happen to that particular defendant or take that particular form. If it can be regarded as something extraordinary, it will be open to the justices to hold that the defendant did not cause the pollution.

(5) The distinction between ordinary and extraordinary is one of fact."

Appeal dismissed

This decision has received a hostile reception on the basis that while the test laid down in this case (ordinary v extraordinary events) is the correct test for natural events (such as brambles clogging the pumps), it is not the appropriate test for the voluntary actions of third parties: the acts of the vandal should have been held to have caused the pollution to the river.

However, the decision is perhaps understandable in policy terms. The offence here was one of strict liability. Many offences are deliberately made ones of strict liability to ensure that persons and companies take every precaution to prevent the harm occurring. Such persons are under a legal duty to guard against the harm that is caused, albeit by another; this includes taking steps to prevent deliberate interventions by third parties. This decision has been followed in other strict liability cases. In Environment Agency v Brook Plc,¹²² it was held that leakage of pollution caused by a latent fault in a seal was a rare but ordinary fact of life. Although the bursting of the seal was unforeseeable, it was not an extraordinary event breaking the causal chain. In Express Ltd (t/a Express Dairies Distribution) v Environment Agency,¹²³ it was held that a vehicle tyre blow out, while rare, was an event in the “ordinary run of things”. Lord Hoffmann’s use of the term “extraordinary” in the context of third party acts or natural events was approved.

However, it is doubtful whether this reasoning should apply to non-strict liability offences. Lord Hoffmann has stated, extra-judicially, that the voluntary intervention rule should be applied to crimes where fault is required; it is only where liability is strict that the wider rule endorsed in Empress is appropriate.¹²⁴ Such a limitation has now been introduced by the House of Lords’ decision of Kennedy (No.2) (extracted and discussed below) which strongly reaffirms the free, deliberate and informed intervention principle and arguably restricts Empress to offences of strict liability or, even more narrowly, to “cases of pollution and environmental crimes”.¹²⁵

The voluntary intervention test involves a determination of whether the act of the third party is “free, deliberate and informed”.

R. V PAGETT (1983) 76 CR. APP. R.
279 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-096

The appellant shot at police officers who were attempting to arrest him for various serious offences. He had a girl with him and against her will used her body to shield himself from any retaliation by the officers. The officers returned the appellant's fire; three of their bullets hit the girl; she died from these wounds. The appellant was convicted of manslaughter and appealed to the Court of Appeal.

GOFF LJ:

“[One of the] specific points raised on behalf of the appellant ... [was that] the learned judge ... ought to have held that the appellant had not in the circumstances of this case caused the death of the deceased. The learned judge, in directing himself upon the law, ought to have held that where the act which immediately resulted in a fatal injury was the act of another party, albeit in legitimate self-defence, then the ensuing death was too remote or indirect to be imputed to the original aggressor ...

[I]t was pressed upon us by [counsel for the appellant] that there either was, or should be, a ... rule of English law, whereby, as a matter of policy, no man should be convicted of homicide (or, we imagine, any crime of violence to another person) unless he himself, or another person acting in concert with him, fired the shot (or, we imagine, struck the blow) which was the immediate cause of the victim's death (or injury).

No English authority was cited to us in support of any such proposition, and we know of none. So far as we are aware, there is no such rule in English law; and ... we can see no basis in principle for any such rule in English law ...

In our judgment, the question whether an accused person can be held guilty of homicide, either murder or manslaughter, of a victim the immediate cause of whose death is the act of another person must be determined on the ordinary principles of causation ...

In cases of homicide, it is rarely necessary to give the jury any direction on causation as such ... Even where it is necessary to direct the jury's minds to the question of causation, it is usually enough to direct them simply that in law the accused's act need not be the sole cause, or even the main cause, of the victim's death, it being enough that his act contributed significantly to that result. Occasionally, however, a specific issue of causation may arise. One such case is where although an act of the accused constitutes a causa sine qua non of (or necessary condition for) the death of the victim, nevertheless the intervention of a third person may be regarded as the sole cause of the victim's death, thereby relieving the accused of criminal responsibility. Such intervention, if it has such an effect, has often been described by lawyers as a novus actus interveniens ...

Professors Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law ... consider the circumstances in which the intervention of a third person, not acting in concert with the accused, may have the effect of relieving the accused of criminal responsibility. The criterion which they suggest should be applied in such circumstances is whether the intervention is voluntary, i.e. whether it is 'free, deliberate and informed'. We resist the temptation of expressing the judicial opinion whether we find ourselves in complete agreement with that definition; though we certainly consider it to be broadly correct and supported by authority. Among the examples which the authors give of non-voluntary conduct, which is not effective to relieve the accused of responsibility, are two which are germane to the present case, viz. a reasonable act performed for the purpose of self-preservation, and an act done in performance of a legal duty.

There can, we consider, be no doubt that a reasonable act performed for the purpose of self-preservation, being of course itself an act caused by the accused's own act, does not operate as a novus actus interveniens ... Now one form of self-preservation is self-defence; for present purposes, we can see no distinction in principle between an attempt to escape the consequences of the accused's act, and a response which takes the form of self-defence. Furthermore, in our judgment, if a reasonable act of self-defence, against the act of the accused causes the death of a third party we can see no reason in principle why the act of self-defence, being an involuntary act caused by the act of the accused, should relieve the accused from criminal responsibility for the death of the third party ...

The principles which we have stated are principles of law ... It follows that where, in any particular case, there is an issue concerned with what we have for convenience called novus actus interveniens, it will be appropriate for the judge to direct the jury in accordance with these principles.

... [I]t is for the judge to direct the jury with reference to the relevant principles of law relating to causation, and then to leave it to the jury to decide, in the light of those principles, whether or not the relevant causal link has been established.”

Appeal dismissed

2-097

In this case, the self-defensive actions of the police were regarded as “involuntary” and so did not constitute a “free, deliberate and informed” intervention and, accordingly, did not break the causal chain. The fact that they were acting negligently¹²⁶ was not relevant. What, though, of a case in which two gunmen engaged in a shoot-out causes the death of an innocent member of the public who happens to be passing by? Could it be said that not only the first gunman, from whose weapon the fatal shot was fired, but also his adversary at whom he was shooting, caused the death? According to the dissenting judgment of Lord Kerr in Gnango, the answer is no: by returning fire the second gunman does not “cause” the first gunman to fire again; the first gunman’s act of firing another shot is a free, deliberate and informed act breaking the chain of causation between the second gunman’s—engagement in the shoot-out, and the passer-by’s death.¹²⁷ Unlike the police officers in Pagett, the gunman in Gnango was not acting involuntarily as it was his choice to fire the first shot in an act of aggression. As will be seen later, the second gunman was, however, found liable for murder in this case.¹²⁸

In several of the leading cases it has been action on the part of doctors, often acting negligently, that has been alleged to be a novus actus interveniens.

R. v SMITH [1959] 2 Q.B. 35 (COURTS MARTIAL APPEAL COURT):

During a fight in a barracks the appellant twice stabbed the victim, Private Creed, with a bayonet. He appealed against his conviction for murder on the ground, inter alia, that the summing up by the judge-advocate on the question of causation was defective.

LORD PARKER CJ:

“The second ground concerns a question of causation. The deceased man in fact received two bayonet wounds, one in the arm and one in the back. The one in the back, unknown to anybody, had pierced the lung and caused haemorrhage. There followed a series of unfortunate occurrences. A fellow-member of his company tried to carry him to the medical reception station. On the way he tripped over a wire and dropped the deceased man. He picked him up again, went a little further, and fell apparently a second time, causing the deceased man to be dropped on to the ground. Thereafter he did not try a third time but went for help, and ultimately the deceased man was brought into the reception station. There, the medical officer, Captain Millward, and his orderly were trying to cope with a number of other cases ... and it is clear that they did not appreciate the seriousness of the deceased man’s condition or exactly what had happened. A transfusion of saline solution was attempted and failed. When his breathing seemed impaired, he was given oxygen and artificial respiration was applied, and, in fact, he died after he had been in the station about an hour, which was about two hours after the original stabbing. It is now known that, having regard to the injuries which the man had in fact suffered, his lung being pierced, the treatment that he was given was thoroughly bad and might well have affected his chances of recovery. There was evidence that there is a tendency for a wound of this sort to heal and for the haemorrhage to stop. No doubt his being dropped on the ground and having artificial respiration applied would halt or at any rate impede the chances of healing. Further, there were no facilities whatsoever for blood transfusion, which would have been the best possible treatment. There was evidence that, if he had received immediate and different treatment, he might not have died. Indeed, had facilities for blood transfusion been available and been administered, Dr Camps, who gave evidence for the defence, said that his chances of recovery were as high as 75 per cent.

In these circumstances Mr Bowen [counsel for the appellant] urges that not only was a careful summing-up required but that a correct direction to the court would have been that they must be satisfied that the death of Private Creed was a natural consequence and the sole consequence of the wound sustained by him and flowed directly from it. If there was, says Mr Bowen, any other cause, whether resulting from negligence or not, if, as he contends here, something happened which impeded the chance of the deceased recovering, then the death did not result from the wound. The court is quite unable to accept that contention. It seems to the court that if at the time of death the original wound is still an operating cause and a substantial cause, then the death can properly be said to be the result of the wound, albeit that some other cause of death is also operating. Only if it can be said that the original wounding is merely the setting in which another cause operates can it be said that the death does not result from the wound. Putting it in another way, only if the second cause is so overwhelming as to make the original wound merely part of the history can it be said that the death does not flow from the wound ...

Mr Bowen placed great reliance on ... Jordan ... The court is satisfied that Jordan's case was a very particular case depending on its exact facts ...

In the present case ... a man is stabbed in the back, his lung is pierced and haemorrhage results; two hours later he dies of haemorrhage from that wound; in the interval there is no time for a careful examination, and the treatment given turns out in the light of subsequent knowledge to have been inappropriate and, indeed, harmful. In those circumstances no reasonable jury or court could, properly directed, in our view possibly come to any other conclusion than that the death resulted from the original wound.”

Appeal dismissed

R. v JORDAN (1956) 40 CR. APP. R.
152 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION):

The appellant stabbed the deceased who died some days later in hospital. Jordan, who had been convicted of murder, sought to adduce further medical evidence on appeal to the effect that the wound was not the cause of death.

HALLET J:

“There were two things other than the wound which were stated by these two medical witnesses to have brought about death. The stab wound had penetrated the intestine in two places, but it was mainly healed at the time of death. With a view to preventing infection it was thought right to administer an antibiotic, terramycin.

It was agreed by the two additional witnesses that that was the proper course to take, and a proper dose was administered. Some people, however, are intolerant to terramycin, and Beaumont was one of those people. After the initial doses he developed diarrhoea, which was only properly attributable, in the opinion of those doctors, to the fact that the patient was intolerant to terramycin. Thereupon the administration of terramycin was stopped, but unfortunately the very next day the resumption of such administration was ordered by another doctor and it was recommenced the following day. The two doctors both take the same view about it. Dr Simpson said that to introduce a poisonous substance after the intolerance of the patient was shown was palpably wrong. Mr Blackburn agreed.

Other steps were taken which were also regarded by the doctors as wrong—namely, the intravenous introduction of wholly abnormal quantities of liquid far exceeding the output. As a result the lungs became waterlogged and pulmonary oedema was discovered. Mr Blackburn said that he was not surprised to see that condition after the introduction of so much liquid, and that pulmonary oedema leads to broncho-pneumonia as an inevitable sequel, and it was from broncho-pneumonia that Beaumont died.

We are disposed to accept it as the law that death resulting from any normal treatment employed to deal with a felonious injury may be regarded as caused by the felonious injury ... It is sufficient to point out here that this was not normal treatment. Not only one feature, but two separate and independent features, of treatment were, in the opinion of the doctors, palpably wrong and these produced the symptoms discovered at the post-mortem examination which were the direct and immediate cause of death, namely, the pneumonia resulting from the condition of oedema which was found ...

We feel no uncertainty at all that, whatever direction had been given to the jury and however correct it had been, the jury would have felt precluded from saying that they were satisfied that death was caused by the stab wound.”

Conviction quashed

R. v CHESHIRE (1991) 93 CR. APP. R.
251 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-100

The appellant shot the deceased in the leg and stomach. As part of his treatment in hospital a tracheotomy tube was placed in his windpipe. Some two months later, at a time when his wounds were no longer threatening his life, his windpipe became obstructed and he died. This was due to a narrowing of the windpipe where the tracheotomy had been performed—a rare but not unknown complication. At the appellant’s trial for murder evidence was given that the medical treatment had been negligent. The trial judge directed the jury that only recklessness, and not negligence, could break the causal chain. He was convicted of murder and appealed.

BELDAM LJ:

“[Causation] is a question of fact for the jury, but it is a question of fact to be decided in accordance with legal principles explained to the jury by the judge ...

In the criminal law the jury ... will we think derive little assistance from figures of speech more appropriate for conveying degrees of fault or blame in questions of apportionment ... [W]e think such figures of speech are to be avoided in giving guidance to a jury on the question of causation ...

[W]hen the victim of a criminal attack is treated for wounds or injuries by doctors or other medical staff attempting to repair the harm done, it will only be in the most extraordinary and unusual case that such treatment can be said to be so independent of the acts of the accused that it could be regarded in law as the cause of the victim's death to the exclusion of the accused's acts ...

[T]he accused's acts need not be the sole cause or even the main cause of death it being sufficient that his acts contributed significantly to that result. Even though negligence in the treatment of the victim was the immediate cause of his death, the jury should not regard it as excluding the responsibility of the accused unless the negligent treatment was so independent of his acts, and in itself so potent in causing death, that they regard the contribution made by his acts as insignificant.

It is not the function of the jury to evaluate competing causes or to choose which is dominant provided they are satisfied that the accused's acts can fairly be said to have made a significant contribution to the victim's death. We think the word 'significant' conveys the necessary substance of a contribution made to the death which is more than negligible ...

[W]e think that the judge erred when he invited the jury to consider the degree of fault in the medical treatment rather than its consequences, [but] we consider that no miscarriage of justice has actually occurred. Even if more experienced doctors than those who attended the deceased would have recognised the rare complication in time to have prevented the deceased's death, that complication was a direct consequence of the appellant's acts, which remained a significant cause of his death."

Appeal dismissed

R. v MELLOR [1996] 2 CR. APP. R.
245 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-101

The appellant was charged with the murder of an elderly man who, after being attacked, died in hospital two days later. It was alleged that negligence by the hospital staff broke the chain of causation. The appellant was convicted and appealed.

SCHIEMANN LJ:

“The immediate cause of death was broncho-pneumonia which, upon the evidence, was brought on directly by the injuries inflicted by the appellant. Those injuries were certainly the cause of death. Probably if the appellant had been administered sufficient oxygen in time, the broncho-pneumonia would not have been fatal, and therefore the failure to administer sufficient oxygen could be regarded as a cause of death. It was asserted on behalf of the appellant, and supported by expert evidence, that the failure to administer sufficient oxygen in time amounted to negligence or incompetence ...

In homicide cases, where the victim of the alleged crime does not die immediately, supervening events will occur which are likely to have some causative effect leading to the victim’s death; for example, a delay in the arrival of the ambulance, a delay in resuscitation, the victim’s individual response to medical or surgical treatment, and the quality of medical, surgical and nursing care. Sometimes such an event may be the result of negligence or mistake or bad luck. It is a question of fact and degree in each case for the jury to decide, having regard to the gravity of the supervening event, however caused, whether the injuries inflicted by the defendant were a significant cause of death.

The onus on the Crown is to make the jury sure that the injuries inflicted by the defendant were a significant cause of death. However, the Crown have no onus of establishing that any supervening event was not a significant cause of death or that there was no medical negligence in the deceased’s treatment.

... In appropriate cases the jury can be told that there may be a number of significant causes leading to a victim’s death. So as long as the Crown proves that the injuries inflicted by the defendant were at least a significant, if not the only, cause of death that will be sufficient to prove the nexus between injury and death ...

In our judgment, it is undesirable in most cases for juries to be asked to embark upon the question of whether medical negligence as a significant contributory cause of death has been negated because it diverts the jury from the relevant question, namely, has the accused’s act contributed significantly to the victim’s death?”

The effect of these decisions is that the actions of medical practitioners will (almost) never break the causal chain. It is irrelevant that the doctors were negligent or even reckless. It will require a “most extraordinary and unusual case” (Cheshire) for this to occur. Perhaps Jordan was such a case. The original wound had almost healed and had become part of the background. The victim was effectively killed by the administration of a drug to which he was known to be allergic. However, even on these facts subsequent cases have been careful to confine Jordan as being a “very exceptional”¹²⁹ case. Indeed, it is difficult to see that Jordan is really different from some of the other cases. In Smith, the victim’s treatment was “thoroughly bad”. In Jordan it was “palpably wrong”. In Smith, the victim had a 75% chance of recovery had he received proper medical treatment. In Jordan, the victim’s wounds had almost healed. Hart and Honoré argue that abnormal contingencies constitute a “coincidence” and break the chain of causation. It is difficult to see that the treatment in Jordan was an abnormal contingency, but that this was not the case in Smith. Of course, it could be argued that the victim in Jordan died from the drugs prescribed by the doctors whereas in Smith he died from loss of blood caused by the stab wound inflicted by the defendant. This cannot be the explanation. The victim in Cheshire did not die from his wounds. He died because the doctors inserted a tracheotomy tube in his windpipe and were negligent in their subsequent treatment. Why was this not an abnormal contingency?

The picture that starts to emerge is that Hart and Honoré’s “abnormal contingency” and “coincidence” are hollow concepts that can be interpreted as the courts see fit. In short, all these “principled tests” provide no more than a veil under which decisions are ultimately based on policy considerations. With a National Health Service hard pressed for funds the courts are not going to exempt violent assailants from liability because their victims did not receive the best treatment—except in what can be regarded as very exceptional cases such as Jordan.

Are these cases consistent with the now dominant principle that a “free, deliberate and informed” intervention by a third party (the doctors) will break the causal chain? Ashworth has argued that “doctors work under pressure, occasionally having to make rapid decisions, but they are trained and trusted to exercise clinical judgment in these circumstances. Doctors are under a duty to treat patients, but they surely do so voluntarily”.¹³⁰

However, the better view is that the doctors, in most of these cases, were simply performing their duty to their patients and so their actions cannot count as sufficiently free or voluntary to break the causal chain (although it is hard to see why this did not apply to the doctors in Jordan). “Voluntariness” here does not mean literal voluntariness. In Pagett the court accepted the examples given by Hart and Honoré of non-voluntary conduct which included “a reasonable act ... done in performance of a legal duty”. The actions of the doctors can be brought within this: doctors owe a legal duty to their patients. Whether their actions constitute a “reasonable act” in the discharge of that duty is obviously a context-sensitive issue in which the pressures of hardworked doctors operating in an under-funded National Health Service must be taken into account.

(ii) Acts of victim

(a) Victim escaping

R. v ROBERTS (1972) 56 CR. APP. R. 95 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-103

A girl who was a passenger in the appellant’s car injured herself by jumping out of the car while it was in motion. Her explanation was that the appellant had made sexual advances to her and was trying to pull her coat off. The appellant was convicted of an assault occasioning actual bodily harm. He appealed on the ground, inter alia, that causation had not been established.

STEPHENSON LJ:

“The test is: Was it the natural result of what the alleged assailant said and did, in the sense that it was something that could reasonably have been foreseen as the consequence of what he was saying or doing? As it was put in one of the old cases, it had got to be shown to be his act, and if of course the victim does something so 'daft', in the words of the appellant in this case, or so unexpected, not that this particular assailant did not actually foresee it but that no reasonable man could be expected to foresee it, then it is only in a very remote and unreal sense a consequence of his assault, it is really occasioned by a voluntary act on the part of the victim which could not reasonably be foreseen and which breaks the chain of causation between the assault and the harm or injury."

Appeal dismissed

R. v MACKIE (1973) 57 CR. APP. R.
453 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-104

A three-year-old boy whom the appellant was looking after fell downstairs while running away in fear of being ill-treated by the appellant. The boy died. The appellant appealed against conviction for manslaughter.

STEPHENSON LJ:

"The victim was a child of three and regard must be had to his age in considering whether his reaction was well-founded or well-grounded on an apprehension of immediate violence (in the language of the old cases appropriate to adults) and therefore reasonably to be expected ... [T]he issue is whether the boy 'over-reacted' in a way which the appellant could not reasonably be expected to have foreseen ... At the end of the summing-up the judge came back to these questions in suggesting what the vital points might be: First, was the boy in fear of Mackie? Secondly, did that cause him to try to escape? Thirdly, if he was in fear, was that fear well-founded?"

Appeal dismissed

R. v WILLIAMS AND DAVIS (1992) 95

CR. APP. R. 1 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-105

The appellants gave a lift to a hitch-hiker and allegedly tried to rob him. The hitch-hiker jumped from the moving car (travelling about 30 mph) and died from head injuries caused by falling into the road. The appellants were convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

STUART-SMITH LJ:

“There must be some proportionality between the gravity of the threat and the action of the deceased in seeking to escape from it ... [T]he deceased’s conduct ... [must] be something that a reasonable and responsible man in the assailant’s shoes would have foreseen ... [T]he nature of the threat is of importance in considering both the foreseeability of harm to the victim from the threat and the question whether the deceased’s conduct was proportionate to the threat, that is to say that it was within the ambit of reasonableness and not so daft as to make it his own voluntary act which amounted to a novus actus interveniens and consequently broke the chain of causation. It should of course be borne in mind that a victim may in the agony of the moment do the wrong thing ...

The jury should consider two questions: first, whether it was reasonably foreseeable that some harm, albeit not serious harm, was likely to result from the threat itself; and, secondly, whether the deceased’s reaction in jumping from the moving car was within the range of responses which might be expected from a victim placed in the situation which he was. The jury should bear in mind any particular characteristic of the victim and the fact that in the agony of the moment he may act without thought and deliberation ...

In our judgment the failure of the judge to give any direction on causation was a misdirection and the conviction on this count must be quashed.”

Appeals allowed

2-106

In Corbett,¹³¹ the defendant assaulted a drunk, mentally-handicapped man who, in the course of running away, fell into a gutter where he was struck by a passing car and killed. The Court of Appeal approved the trial judge's direction that the issue was whether the victim's reaction was within the foreseeable range and, in assessing this, they had to decide whether this was something that might be expected as a reaction of somebody in that state. While the test of foreseeability allows account to be taken of the victim's situation and characteristics, this is not true of defendants. In Marjoram,¹³² it was stated that the test of reasonable foresight is purely objective and so no account could be taken of the age or sex or any other characteristics of the defendant—otherwise, where two defendants with different characteristics acted together, one might be held to have caused the result but not the other. The test does not require that the victim's act is an immediate response to the defendant's threat. In Tarasov,¹³³ even where there was a gap in time between the threat and the victim's act (in this case of jumping out of a bathroom window ninety minutes after the initial assault), the defendants could be found to have caused the victim's death, provided that the victim acted as a result of fear of being hurt in a further attack.

Are these cases consistent with the rule that the “free, deliberate and informed” intervention of a third party will break the chain of causation? One view is that this rule does not apply to the actions of victims as they are not “third parties”. Such an argument seems implausible and would be inconsistent with the now leading House of Lords' decision of Kennedy (No.2), which is discussed below. The better view is that these cases are consistent with the “free, deliberate and informed” intervention rule. The fear of the victims in these cases was such that they had no real choice but to do as they did. It will be recalled that one of Hart and Honoré's examples of non-voluntary conduct, approved in Pagett, was a “reasonable act performed for the purpose of self-preservation” such as an act by the victim in attempting to escape from the violence of the defendant.

(b) Drugs supplied to victim

What is the position if the defendant supplies drugs to another who injects herself and dies? Will the act of self-injection constitute a voluntary intervening act, breaking the chain of causation? In Kennedy (No.1),¹³⁴ this view was rejected and it was held that the supplier could be regarded as having caused the death of the person self-injecting the drugs. However, in Dias,¹³⁵ it was held that the injector has a choice whether to inject and so this can break the causal chain. In Finlay,¹³⁶ it was held that causation can be established on such facts as the defendant was a “joint principal in V’s act”. In this case, the Empress principles were applied: only if the acts of the injector were “extraordinary” would the causal chain be broken. Kennedy (No.1) and Finlay have now been overruled by the following decision.

R. v KENNEDY (NO.2) [2008] 1 A.C. 269 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–108

The appellant prepared a “hit” of heroin for the deceased and gave him the syringe ready for injection. The deceased injected himself and returned the syringe to the appellant who left the room. The injection resulted in the death of the deceased. The appellant was convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL:

“2 The question certified by the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) for the opinion of the House neatly encapsulates the question raised by this appeal:

‘When is it appropriate to find someone guilty of manslaughter where that person has been involved in the supply of a class A controlled drug, which is then freely and voluntarily self-administered by the person to whom it was supplied, and the administration of the drug then causes his death?’ ...

14 The criminal law generally assumes the existence of free will. The law recognises certain exceptions, in the case of the young, those who for any reason are not fully responsible for their actions, and the vulnerable, and it acknowledges situations of duress and necessity, as also of deception and mistake. But, generally speaking, informed adults of sound mind are treated as autonomous beings able to make their own decisions how they will act, and none of the exceptions is relied on as possibly applicable in this case. Thus D is not to be treated as causing V to act in a certain way if V makes a voluntary and informed decision to act in that way rather than another. There are many classic statements to this effect. In his article 'Finis for Novus Actus?' [1989] CLJ 391, 392, Professor Glanville Williams wrote:

'I may suggest reasons to you for doing something; I may urge you to do it, tell you it will pay you to do it, tell you it is your duty to do it. My efforts may perhaps make it very much more likely that you will do it. But they do not cause you to do it, in the sense in which one causes a kettle of water to boil by putting it on the stove. Your volitional act is regarded (within the doctrine of responsibility) as setting a new "chain of causation" going, irrespective of what has happened before.'

In chapter XII of Causation in the Law, 2nd ed (1985), p 326, Hart & Honoré wrote:

'The free, deliberate, and informed intervention of a second person, who intends to exploit the situation created by the first, but is not acting in concert with him, is normally held to relieve the first actor of criminal responsibility.'

This statement was cited by the House with approval in R v Latif [1996] 1 WLR 104, 115. The principle is fundamental and not controversial.

15 Questions of causation frequently arise in many areas of the law, but causation is not a single, unvarying concept to be mechanically applied without regard to the context in which the question arises. That was the point which Lord Hoffmann, with the express concurrence of three other members of the House, was at pains to make in Environment Agency (formerly National Rivers Authority) v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 22. The House was not in that decision purporting to lay down general rules governing causation in criminal law. It was construing, with reference to the facts of the case before it, a statutory provision imposing strict criminal liability on those who cause pollution of controlled waters. Lord Hoffmann made clear that common sense answers to questions of causation will differ according to the purpose for which the question is asked; that one cannot give a common sense answer to a question of causation for the purpose of attributing responsibility under some rule without knowing the purpose and scope of the rule; that strict liability was imposed in the interests of protecting controlled waters; and that in the situation under consideration the act of the defendant could properly be held to have caused the pollution even though an ordinary act of a third party was the immediate cause of the diesel oil flowing into the river. It is worth underlining that the relevant question was the cause of the pollution, not the cause of the third party's act.

16 The committee would not wish to throw any doubt on the correctness of the Empress Car case. But the reasoning in that case cannot be applied to the wholly different context of causing a noxious thing to be administered to or taken by another person contrary to section 23 of the 1861 Act ...

18 ... If the conduct of the deceased was not criminal he was not a principal offender, and it of course follows that the appellant cannot be liable as a secondary party. It also follows that there is no meaningful legal sense in which the appellant can be said to have been a principal jointly with the deceased, or to have been acting in concert. The finding that the deceased freely and voluntarily administered the injection to himself, knowing what it was, is fatal to any contention that the appellant caused the heroin to be administered to the deceased or taken by him ...

20 [Counsel for the appellant] relied on R v Rogers [2003] 1 WLR 1374 ... The relevant finding was that the defendant physically assisted the deceased by holding his belt round the deceased's arm as a tourniquet, so as to raise a vein in which the deceased could insert a syringe, while the deceased injected himself. It was argued in support of his appeal to the Court of Appeal that the defendant had committed no unlawful act for purposes of either count. This contention was rejected. The court held that it was unreal and artificial to separate the tourniquet from the injection. By applying and holding the tourniquet the defendant had played a part in the mechanics of the injection which had caused the death. There is, clearly, a difficult borderline between contributory acts which may properly be regarded as administering a noxious thing and acts which may not. But the crucial question is not whether the defendant facilitated or contributed to administration of the noxious thing but whether he went further and administered it. What matters, in a case such as R v Rogers and the present, is whether the injection itself was the result of a voluntary and informed decision by the person injecting himself. In R v Rogers, as in the present case, it was. That case was, therefore, wrongly decided ...

24 It is possible to imagine factual scenarios in which two people could properly be regarded as acting together to administer an injection. But nothing of the kind was the case here. As in R v Dalby [1982] 1 WLR 425 and R v Dias [2002] 2 Cr App R 96 the appellant supplied the drug to the deceased, who then had a choice, knowing the facts, whether to inject himself or not. The heroin was, as the certified question correctly recognises, self-administered, not jointly administered. The appellant did not administer the drug. Nor, for reasons already given, did the appellant cause the drug to be administered to or taken by the deceased.

25 The answer to the certified question is: ‘In the case of a fully-informed and responsible adult, never.’”

Appeal allowed

2–109

The restriction of Empress to its particular context (strict liability offences of pollution) is to be welcomed. Further, it is clear that the general rule, confirmed in Latif, that a voluntary intervention will break the causal chain is accepted.¹³⁷ Cases where the defendant and the deceased are acting in concert are regarded as exceptions to the general principle.¹³⁸ The following is an example of such an exceptional case.

R. v BURGESS; BYRAM [2008] EWCA
CRIM 516 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2–110

SIR IGOR JUDGE:

“12 If a defendant may be convicted on the basis that the fatal dose was jointly administered, then it follows that he is not automatically entitled to be acquitted if the deceased rather than the defendant physically operated the plunger on the syringe and caused the drug to enter his body. In the present case there was evidence which might reasonably have lead a jury to conclude that this appellant had indeed jointly participated in the administration of the fatal dose of heroin. From the interviews as they developed, it emerged that he supplied the deceased with the heroin, which he, the appellant, drew into the syringe ... He did not hand the syringe to the deceased but he took it and the needle to the deceased's arm, where he found an appropriate vein. He laid the tip of the needle against the skin of the deceased above that vein. It is not clear from the interview that he ever in fact let go of the syringe, but on his account the deceased depressed the plunger. Having done so, the appellant assisted in the physical withdrawal of the plunger from the deceased's arm ...

13 ... [O]n his own account, it would have been open to the jury to convict the appellant on the basis identified by Lord Bingham of Cornhill in Kennedy."

2-111

It has been suggested that Kennedy (No.2) is inconsistent with the victim escape cases where, if the victim's actions are reasonably foreseeable, he will not break the causal chain. In most drug-supply cases it is reasonably foreseeable that the drugs will be taken. That is why they are supplied.¹³⁹

It was argued earlier that the "free, deliberate and informed" intervention rule, endorsed in Kennedy (No.2), is reconcilable with the "reasonable foresight" test employed in the escape cases. In escaping from an assailant, the reasonably foreseeable actions of a victim can be regarded as involuntary (a point accepted in Pagett). In cases such as Kennedy (No.2), however, while it was reasonably foreseeable that the victim would inject the drugs, that injection was a voluntary act and, where there is a conflict between the two rules (the reasonable foresight rule and the voluntary intervention rule), the latter should trump the former. However, there are difficulties applying this reasoning in all drug-supply cases. If a drug addict, deprived of drugs, injects the drugs supplied, it seems implausible to argue that this is the product of a free, informed and voluntary choice. Possibly, the only sensible solution is that the drug-taker's actions should normally be regarded as voluntary unless it was not free and informed because of age, mental condition or improper pressure or influence.¹⁴⁰ In *Khan*¹⁴¹ a 15-year-old prostitute victim took heroin for probably the first time:

“there must be some doubt ... [whether her actions] should have been regarded as truly capable of consenting to the risks inherent in heroin use; her assumption of risk ... ‘seems at the borderline of voluntariness’.”¹⁴²

Such an approach would be consistent with the policy and fair-labelling arguments that drug-suppliers ought generally to be labelled and punished as drug-suppliers and not as manslaughterers. In cases with facts such as Kennedy (No.2) the general rule should be that the recipient “has a choice”. This is not an instance of non-voluntary conduct coming within the examples given by Hart and Honoré and approved in Pagett. Ultimately, it should be for the jury, applying the voluntary intervention test, to determine whether this was a voluntary choice breaking the chain of causation.

Beyond cases of drug supply, the courts seem to have demonstrated some inconsistency in the way in which voluntariness might be interpreted. It was held in Hughes that the deceased's own dangerous driving did not break the chain of causation as he “did not voluntarily and deliberately kill himself; he drove dangerously and without thought and as a result caused the collision in which he died”.¹⁴³ It is not clear that the Supreme Court interpreted the test correctly in applying Kennedy (No.2) in a context other than drug supply here. Given that the deceased in Kennedy itself did not take a conscious decision to commit suicide, only to take the risk involved in self-injecting heroin without necessarily giving any thought to the outcome, it is not clear why the decision of the deceased in Hughes to take the risk of driving after taking heroin should not act in an equivalent way to break the causal chain.¹⁴⁴

(c) Other victim action/inaction/condition

There have been cases where the victim has refused medical treatment and consequently died. Such cases have been treated as manifestations of the principle that one must “take one’s victim as one finds him”. In *Hayward*¹⁴⁵ and McKechnie,¹⁴⁶ it was held that if a victim had a physical weakness (a thyruus gland and a duodenal ulcer respectively) which hastened death following an assault, the defendant could not claim a break in causation merely because a healthy victim might not have died. In the following cases this principle was applied to the psychological condition of the victim. The defendant must “take his victim as he finds him in mind as well as in body”.

R. v BLAUE (1975) 61 CR. APP. R. 271
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2–113

The appellant stabbed a woman piercing her lung. She refused to have a blood transfusion as it was contrary to her religious beliefs as a Jehovah’s Witness. The surgeon advised her that without the transfusion she would die. Medical evidence established that with the transfusion she would have survived. She died and the appellant was convicted of manslaughter (on grounds of diminished responsibility). He appealed on the ground that causation was not established.

LAWTON LJ:

“Maule J’s direction to the jury reflected the common law’s answer to the problem. He who inflicted an injury which resulted in death could not excuse himself by pleading that his victim could have avoided death by taking greater care of himself. See Hale, Pleas of the Crown (1800 edn) pp.426–428. The common law in Sir Matthew Hale’s time probably was in line with contemporary concepts of ethics. A man who did a wrongful act was deemed morally responsible for the natural and probable consequences of that act. [Counsel for the appellant] ... asked us to remember that since Sir Matthew Hale’s day the rigour of the law relating to homicide has been eased in favour of the accused. It has been—but this has come about through the development of the concept of intent, not by reason of a different view of causation ...

The physical cause of death in this case was the bleeding into the pleural cavity arising from the penetration of the lung. This had not been brought about by any decision made by the deceased girl but by the stab wound.

[Counsel for the appellant] ... tried to overcome this line of reasoning by submitting that the jury should have been directed that, if they thought the girl's decision not to have a blood transfusion was an unreasonable one, then the chain of causation would have been broken. At once the question arises—reasonable by whose standards? Those of Jehovah's Witnesses? Humanists? Roman Catholics? Protestants of Anglo-Saxon descent? The man on the Clapham omnibus? But he might well be an admirer of Eleazar who suffered death rather than eat the flesh of swine ... or of Sir Thomas More who, unlike nearly all his contemporaries, was unwilling to accept Henry VIII as Head of the Church in England. Those brought up in the Hebraic and Christian traditions would probably be reluctant to accept that these martyrs caused their own deaths.

As was pointed out to ... [counsel for the appellant] in the course of argument, two cases, each raising the same issue of reasonableness because of religious beliefs, could produce different verdicts depending on where the cases were tried ... It has long been the policy of the law that those who use violence on other people must take their victims as they find them. This in our judgment means the whole man, not just the physical man. It does not lie in the mouth of the assailant to say that his victim's religious beliefs which inhibited him from accepting certain kinds of treatment were unreasonable. The question for decision is what caused her death. The answer is the stab wound. The fact that the victim refused to stop this end coming about did not break the causal connection between the act and death."¹⁴⁷

Appeal dismissed

Other cases have concerned victims who, in a state of anguish or fear as a result of the defendant's attack, have committed suicide. In the US case of Lewis,¹⁴⁸ the defendant shot the deceased in the abdomen—a wound that would have caused death in an hour. The deceased, however, cut his own throat and died within five minutes. The court conceded that the defendant would nevertheless be liable if the self-inflicted knife wound could be causally connected to the defendant's gunshot wound, i.e. if it was self-inflicted because of grief or pain or through a desire to shield the defendant. Temple J stated:

“But, if the deceased did die from the effect of the knife wound alone, no doubt the defendant would be responsible, if it was made to appear ... that the knife wound was caused by the wound inflicted by the defendant, in the natural course of events. If the relation was causal, and the wounded condition of the deceased was not merely the occasion upon which another cause intervened, not produced by the first wound, or related to it in other than in a causal way, then the defendant is guilty of a homicide. But, if the wounded condition only afforded an opportunity for another unconnected person to kill, the defendant would not be guilty.”

Lewis is a decision from the US. Would it be followed here?

R. v DEAR [1996] CRIM. L.R. 595
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION) (LEXIS TRANSCRIPT, 14
MARCH 1996):

2-115

The appellant slashed the victim repeatedly with a Stanley knife. The victim died two days later. The defence was that the deceased committed suicide either by reopening his wounds or, the wounds having reopened themselves, by failing to take steps to stop the bleeding. The trial judge directed the jury that causation was established if the victim did what he did because of the wounds and would not have done so unless he had been wounded. The chain of causation would only be broken if the victim acted only for some reason unconnected to the attack on him, for example, shame at his own prior conduct (it was alleged that the victim had sexually interfered with the appellant's daughter). The appellant was convicted of murder and appealed.

ROSE LJ:

“[Counsel for the appellant argues that] ‘voluntary’ suicide ... is a novus actus interveniens. A suicide where the deceased can be taken to know and understand the nature of his act, and thus exercise a choice, is a novus actus, even if it follows upon an attack upon the victim ...

[E]ven assuming that there was evidence of suicide, through shame or some other reason unrelated to the defendant's conduct ... this did not ... render inaccurate ... the direction which the judge gave on causation ...

The correct approach in the criminal law is ...: were the injuries inflicted by the defendant an operating and significant cause of death? That question, in our judgment, is necessarily answered, not by philosophical analysis, but by common sense according to all the circumstances of the particular case.

In the present case the cause of the deceased's death was bleeding from the artery which the defendant had severed. Whether or not the resumption or continuation of that bleeding was deliberately caused by the deceased, the jury were entitled to find that the defendant's conduct made an operative and significant contribution to the death."

Appeal dismissed

2-116

Smith commented on this case that if:

"the wounds were effectively healed when D took the Stanley knife to himself, it is not so clear that the wounds were an operating and substantial cause of death. Arguably, it was then the same as if he had cut his throat or blown his brains out."¹⁴⁹

In R. v Dhaliwal,¹⁵⁰ a woman who had been subjected to various forms of abuse committed suicide. In the Court of Appeal it was stated obiter that "at least arguably" the defendant's violence could be regarded as the cause of her death.

JEREMY HORDER AND LAURA MCGOWAN, "MANSLAUGHTER BY CAUSING ANOTHER'S SUICIDE" [2006]

“When a relationship is characterised by persistent domestic abuse (especially in the kind of cultural and religious context to be found in Dhaliwal), the experience of living with the abuse is liable to affect the victim’s decision-making processes, and to influence the range and character of actions she regards as legitimate, inevitable or natural ...

There has been strong support for an approach to causation in which the destructive effect domestic abuse has on the victim’s autonomy can be regarded as rendering the defendant criminally responsible for the victim’s suicide ...

It might be that a decision on the part of a victim of abuse to commit suicide is best explained, in straightforward causal terms, by a depressive condition induced by the abuse ... [H]is abuse triggered the operation of a special vulnerability of the victim. On our account, however, the causal link between the abuse and the suicide can be (lack of) freedom-based, and need not be based on a victim’s special vulnerability. An abuse-based controlling influence can, in this context, make a decision to commit suicide something that the victim was not truly free to avoid, because other avoiding actions were in practical terms ruled out by the effect of that influence.”

“Victim condition” cases such as Blaue are straightforward applications of Hart and Honoré’s “abnormal condition” exception. The “abnormality” of the victim does not break the chain of causation. However, there is a problem in these cases where the defendant is held to take his victim as he finds him. In Blaue, the victim’s physical or mental condition is counted as an “abnormal condition” and thus unable to rank as a coincidence. But in the cases of victims escaping from attackers, such as Roberts and Mackie, the victim’s psychological make-up that might have induced flight from the defendant is disregarded and insistence is placed on such actions being reasonable, likely or foreseeable. Perhaps this was simply because there was no evidence of the victims suffering from any particular psychological condition. However, what if the victim, because of an established pre-existing neurotic condition, grossly over-reacts to a minor assault: for example, jumps from the 10th floor of a building because the defendant placed his arm around her shoulder? Under the Blaue principle the defendant must take his victim as he finds her and causation is established. Under the Roberts principle such a victim's action could probably be viewed as "daft" and so break the causal chain. How can this divergence of approach be explained?

Perhaps the best way of resolving this issue is by recognising the centrality of the "free, deliberate and informed" intervention test endorsed in Kennedy (No.2). If the victim's suicide or leaping from a moving car was voluntary it breaks the chain of causation. This was the solution adopted in Pagett, Latif and Kennedy (No.2) for determining whether the actions of a third person (or the victim) constituted a novus actus interveniens. Horder and McGowan offer this same solution in cases where an abused woman commits suicide. In relation to cases where the victim is escaping from the violence of the defendant, the courts, in assessing whether the response is reasonable have taken account of any particular idiosyncrasies of the victim. In Blaue, the issue is whether it is reasonably foreseeable that a Jehovah's Witness would refuse a blood transfusion. This was the approach approved in Williams and Davis where it was held that, in assessing whether the victim's response in jumping out of the car was reasonably foreseeable one had to bear in mind "any particular characteristic of the victim". In Corbett, the issue was whether the reaction of a victim "in that state" was foreseeable. This test enables the victim's condition or characteristics to be taken into account and provides some indication of whether the victim's actions were voluntary or not. If it were reasonably foreseeable that the person with the neurotic condition would jump from the building, that victim's actions can be regarded as involuntary. (The defendant, in this example, would not be liable for the resultant death as there would be no relevant culpability.)

On the other hand, in cases where there is no evidence of any particular characteristics or mental condition, such as Roberts, the test is simply whether the response is reasonable. The fact that a victim with particular characteristics does an act that is reasonably foreseeable is, in such cases, indicative that that act was “involuntary”. In Blaue, it was reasonably foreseeable that a Jehovah’s Witness would refuse a blood transfusion. Because of her religion she had no choice. Most Jehovah Witnesses would do the same; that is why such a reaction is reasonably foreseeable and can be regarded as involuntary. On the other hand, if a person, not being a Jehovah’s Witness refused a blood transfusion in similar circumstances, in the absence of any medical explanation this could not be regarded as reasonably foreseeable which indicates that the decision was a voluntary one breaking the chain of causation. Again, ultimately, it is for the jury, having been properly directed as to the application of the voluntary intervention test, to determine whether such a decision amounted to a voluntary choice breaking the chain of causation.

(iv) Conclusion

2–119

It is interesting that, leaving aside the medical and strict liability judgments, many of the problem cases discussed above involved constructive manslaughter,¹⁵¹ which is a species of crime where no mens rea is required as to the final result. Hughes similarly involved a constructive homicide offence.¹⁵² The other leading case, Roberts, involved the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.47 which, as another constructive crime, also does not require mens rea as to the result. This tends to lend some credence to the view that principles of causation are subservient to those of mens rea. Where there is clear mens rea as to the result, problems of causation will not be allowed to intrude. (Dear is an exception here.) But, where one is dealing with constructive crime, the job cannot be left to mens rea and it is in this area that “principles”, such as they are, have started emerging. However, even in these, and certainly in the other cases, it would be a mistake to ignore the role of policy: for example, the policy of not allowing medical treatment to break the chain of causation or the policy of respecting a victim’s religious beliefs in Blaue.

It must be remembered that most of the defendants in the above cases could have been charged with, or found guilty of, lesser offences. Pagett was convicted of possession of a firearm, kidnapping and attempted murder. Kennedy was convicted of supplying a Class A drug to another. McKechnie was charged, in the alternative, with causing grievous bodily harm with intent. Blaue could have been convicted of attempted murder, Hayward of assault, Hughes of driving whilst uninsured and unlicensed, and so on. Welansky could have been found guilty of a violation of safety regulations. Policy considerations dictated that they all be blamed and punished for something, but the question is: what were the policy considerations that dictated they be found liable for homicide offences, as opposed to these lesser offences? It is interesting how much importance has been attached to the resulting harm as opposed to the more immediate “wrongdoing” of the defendant. Whether this approach is justifiable is one of the main themes of the next chapter.

III. Mens Rea

A. BLAME AND RESPONSIBILITY

2-120

The normal consequence of a criminal conviction is punishment. The offender is subjected to censure and blame. Blame and censure are only appropriate if the offender was morally responsible for his behaviour. We do not blame animals, small children and the insane that have caused a harm because we do not hold them responsible. In a liberal society where political freedom is valued, people must be free from criminal liability and punishment unless they “voluntarily” break the law¹⁵³ in the sense of doing something that they can properly acknowledge as wrongdoing.¹⁵⁴ A morally responsible agent is one who understands the social norms to which he is subject¹⁵⁵ and can understand and accept responsibility for wrongdoing (whether or not this is associated with feelings of guilt). Such an agent can understand the “communicative enterprise of punishment”¹⁵⁶ in a way that young children and the insane cannot. The state may use its coercive powers against citizens who lack responsibility (for example, imposing tax on the purchase of goods¹⁵⁷), but the use of its censuring powers of punishment in such cases would not be consistent with the demands of political freedom. There would be no freedom in a state that chose to punish persons with green eyes. In short, the link between responsibility and criminal liability is one of the hallmarks of a free society.

How is responsibility assessed? There are two main theories: the capacity theory and the character theory.¹⁵⁸

Under the capacity theory, the necessary attributes are knowledge, reason and control (which include the capacity to make choices).¹⁵⁹

H. L. A. HART, PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY: ESSAYS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW (1968), P.152:

2–121

“What is crucial is that those whom we punish should have had, when they acted, the normal capacities, physical and mental, for doing what the law requires and abstaining from what it forbids, and a fair opportunity to exercise these capacities. Where these capacities and opportunities are absent, as they are in different ways in the varied cases of accident, mistake, paralysis, reflex action, coercion, insanity etc., the moral protest is that it is morally wrong to punish because ‘he could not have helped it’ or ‘he could not have done otherwise’ or ‘he had no real choice’.”

2–122

According to this traditional view, because the defendant could choose to do otherwise we are entitled to hold her morally blameworthy and to punish her. Because it is difficult to say that the mentally disordered defendant could have done otherwise she is exonerated from blame and punishment.¹⁶⁰

This capacity theory can be applied to crimes of recklessness and negligence.

ANTONY DUFF AND ANDREW VON HIRSCH, “RESPONSIBILITY,

RETRIBUTION AND THE 'VOLUNTARY': A RESPONSE TO WILLIAMS" [1997] C.L.J. 103, 109– 110:

2–123

“We might do better to focus on the notion of rational agency. By this, we mean not action that is in fact guided by good reasons; but action which is in principle susceptible to being guided by reasons, done by an agent who would be capable of recognising whether such reasons are good ones ... [I]t seems to us to be the best way to try to capture the idea of moral responsibility which is appropriate to ascriptions of criminal liability: what we condemn the agent for is a failure to recognise, to accept, or to be adequately motivated by, reasons for action (those offered by the law) which were within his grasp.”

2–124

There have been many challenges to this notion that people are free or autonomous agents capable of rational action and free choice. The argument here is that this conception of individuals as autonomous, self-determined beings ignores the social context within which people operate. As Norrie puts it: “while we feel in control of what we say or do, we sometimes appear only to speak the parts bequeathed to us by history and context”.¹⁶¹ An extension of this argument is known as determinism. According to this view, all human action is the result of preceding events and conditions (environmental, biological or even chemical). All actions are “determined” and freedom of will is a myth. Under this view, a person cannot be held responsible for something that she was inevitably going to do. In the following decision, the court was faced with just such a determinist argument.

STATE V SIKORA 44 N.J. 453, 210 A.
2D. 193 (1965) (SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY):

2–125

The defendant, Sikora, was charged with murder and produced psychodynamic evidence that as a result of his genetic makeup and upbringing he was incapable of exercising free will.

FRANCIS J:

“In appearing as a witness, Dr Galen indicated his function was to help the court understand ‘the dynamics of what happened to this man with his particular history at this particular time in his life.’ ... Basically Dr Galen’s thesis is that man is a helpless victim of his genes and his lifelong environment; that unconscious forces from within dictate the individual’s behaviour without his being able to alter it ...

In short the doctor opined that the circumstances to which Sikora had been subjected imposed on his personality disorder a stress that impaired or removed his ability consciously to premeditate or weigh a design to kill. The tension was so great that he could handle it only by an automatic reaction motivated by the predetermined influence of his unconscious. Plainly the doctor meant that Sikora’s response was not a voluntary exercise of his free will ...

For protection of society the law accepts the thesis that all men are invested with free will and capable of choosing between right and wrong. In the present state of scientific knowledge that thesis cannot be put aside in the administration of the criminal law. Criminal blameworthiness cannot be judged on a basis that negates free will and excuses the offence, wholly or partially, on opinion evidence that the offender’s psychological processes or mechanisms were such that even though he knew right from wrong he was predetermined to act the way he did at that time because of unconscious influences set in motion by the emotional stresses then confronting him. In a world of reality such persons must be held responsible for their behaviour ...

Criminal responsibility must be judged at the level of the conscious. If a person thinks, plans and executes the plan at that level, the criminality of his act cannot be denied, wholly or partially, because although he did not realise it, his conscious was influenced to think, to plan and to execute the plan by unconscious influences which were the product of his genes and his lifelong environment ... If the law were to accept such a medical doctrine ... the legal doctrine of mens rea would all but disappear from the law ... Criminal responsibility, as society now knows it, would vanish from the scene, and some other basis for dealing with the offender would have to be found.”

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.801–802:

2–126

“It is difficult to resolve [the issue of determinism and responsibility] except by noting that we all blame and criticise others, and in turn subject ourselves to blame and criticism, on the assumption of responsibility for our conduct. In order to defend the criminal law against the determinist critique, we need not introduce freighted terms like ‘freedom of the will.’ Nor need we ‘posit’ freedom as though we were developing a geometric system on the basis of axioms. The point is simply that the criminal law should express the way we live. Our culture is built on the assumption that, absent valid claims of excuse, we are accountable for what we do. If that cultural presupposition should someday prove to be empirically false, there will be far more radical changes in our way of life than those expressed in the criminal law.”

TONY HONORÉ, RESPONSIBILITY AND FAULT (1999), PP.135–137:

2–127

“It is sometimes said that determinism, if true, is irrelevant to the moral and legal responsibility of human agents. But can this be the case, given that intelligent people have been and are concerned to show that the things that go wrong in our society are better tackled by eliminating the causes of wrongdoing than by punishing, censuring or isolating the wrongdoers?

To avoid a superficial discussion of a complex issue, I assume that it makes sense to treat people as the authors of and hence responsible for their actions ...

The worry remains that, though it may make sense to treat people as responsible for their conduct, if human actions are caused by circumstances, people are not really responsible for what they do. However beneficial it may be to treat them as if they were, to do so is to resort to a salutary lie. And salutary lies stop being salutary when the deception is revealed. Are people's actions in fact caused by their hereditary make-up and external circumstances? No one can be sure. Though valuable work has been done by psychologists, neurologists and sociologists the precise regularities involved, if they exist, await discovery ... Even so, we tend to assume that something determines people's decisions. That nothing determined them would imply that they were not merely unpredictable but inexplicable: a belief that would be truly alarming.

Should this disturb us? It seems that even 'strong psychophysical explanations' bordering on psychological laws are compatible with the notions of choice, decision, action and intention to which we are committed when we treat people as responsible. To suppose, as a working hypothesis, that our decisions are determined does not make it implausible or illogical to treat ourselves as the authors of our actions when we judge ourselves and others as social beings. How far back is it rational to go in tracing causes must depend on the purpose for which we want to get at the cause of something that has gone wrong. This must also apply to the causes of human conduct. It is rational to treat people as the authors of their actions in the context of a system of responsibility that we regard as valuable both for individuals and for society as a whole. To treat human action as a stopping point beyond which causal inquiries are not ordinarily pursued is sensible and indeed indispensable."

2-128

The alternative conception of responsibility is one based upon the character of the defendant:

"Actions for which we hold a person fully responsible are those in which her usual character is centrally expressed. The finding of a mental element such as intention or recklessness on the character model provides an important piece of evidence from which the existence of character responsibility may be inferred, given that single acts do not always indicate settled dispositions."¹⁶²

Thus, we would hold responsible a person who makes unreasonable mistakes because such behaviour manifests an undesirable character trait of practical indifference to others. On the other hand, a person who acts under duress is not expressing her usual character. As she has been forced to act in a particular way, we are unable to draw an inference to a flawed character. This approach does have certain attractions; not least it accords with our tendency to regard as significant the fact that someone acts “out of character” and may be more in keeping with the function of the criminal law as a form of social control. However, it is this intuitive appeal that reveals a central weakness of this character theory. The infliction of a serious harm could be regarded as non-culpable if the agent acted “out of character”.¹⁶³ But how would we know if any action were uncharacteristic of the agent? This theory is unlikely to replace the capacity conception of responsibility because it looks too much like punishing people for what they are rather than for what they do. Such a person:

“remains a moral cripple, a flawed person in his own eyes, a person who understands that he committed a crime because of ‘the kind of person he is’ ... [This amounts to an] enormous and sadistic cruelty.”¹⁶⁴

B. BLAME AND MENS REA

2–129

The fact that one is a responsible agent does not necessarily mean that criminal liability is justifiable when a harm is caused or a wrong committed. Duff puts it that:

“responsibility is a necessary but not a sufficient condition of liability. I am liable to conviction or blame for X only if I am responsible for X; but I can be responsible for X without being thus liable.”¹⁶⁵

The question is thus: in what circumstances should the actions of a responsible actor be held criminal? The answer is: when she is sufficiently blameworthy in causing the harm or committing the wrong. The mechanisms for establishing this appropriate degree of blame are the subject of the ensuing sections. But it should be emphasised at the outset that the indicators of blame are largely fashioned according to which of the above competing conceptions of responsibility we adopt. For example, if we adopted the “character conception” of responsibility, we might need to evaluate an actor’s motivations because a laudable motive would not reveal a flawed character. The law, however, has been fearful of adopting such a course as it might necessitate exempting from blame those who rob the rich to give to the poor or those who, as in Chandler v DPP,¹⁶⁶ commit offences to express their opposition to nuclear weapons. Accordingly, the law adopts the stance that motive is generally irrelevant to the assessment and has instead preferred the “capacity conception” of responsibility. We blame those who have control over their actions and have chosen to commit a crime. The process of choosing to commit a crime is a mental process involving cognition (knowing or realising that a consequence could occur or that a circumstance could exist). This mental state became known as mens rea. (We shall see, however, that more recently the term mens rea has been expanded to encompass more than pure mental states.)

Some commentators have rejected the need for mens rea before criminal liability is justified and have argued that liability should be based on harm done.

BARONESS WOOTTON, CRIME AND
THE CRIMINAL LAW, 2ND EDN (1981),
PP.43, 46–48:

2–130

“If the law says that certain things are not to be done, it is illogical to confine this prohibition to occasions on which they are done from malice aforethought; for at least the material consequences of an action, and the reasons for prohibiting it, are the same whether it is the result of sinister malicious plotting, of negligence or of sheer accident. A man is equally dead and his relatives equally bereaved whether he was stabbed or run over by a drunken motorist or by an incompetent one; and the inconvenience caused by the loss of your bicycle is unaffected by the question whether or not the youth who removed it had the intention of putting it back, if in fact he had not done so at the time of his arrest. It is true, of course, as Professor Hart has argued, that the material consequences of an action by no means exhaust its effects.

‘If one person hits another, the person struck does not think of the other as just a cause of pain to him. If the blow was light but deliberate, it has a significance for the person struck quite different from an accidental much heavier blow.’

To ignore this difference, he argues, is to outrage ‘distinctions which not only underlie morality but pervade the whole of our social life.’ That these distinctions are widely appreciated and keenly felt no one would deny. Often perhaps they derive their force from a purely punitive or retributive attitude; but alternatively they may be held to be relevant to an assessment of the social damage that results from a criminal act. Just as a heavy blow does more damage than a light one, so also perhaps does a blow which involves psychological injury do more damage than one in which the hurt is purely physical.

The conclusion to which this argument leads is, I think, not that the presence or absence of the guilty mind is unimportant, but that mens rea has, so to speak—and this is the crux of the matter—got into the wrong place. Traditionally, the requirement of the guilty mind is written into the actual definition of a crime. No guilty intention, no crime, is the rule. Obviously this makes sense if the law’s concern is with wickedness: where there is no guilty intention, there can be no wickedness. But it is equally obvious, on the other hand, that an action does not become innocuous merely because whoever performed it meant no harm. If the object of the criminal law is to prevent the occurrence of socially damaging actions, it would be absurd to turn a blind eye to those which were due to carelessness, negligence or even accident. The question of motivation is in the first instance irrelevant.

But only in the first instance. At a later stage, that is to say, after what is now known as a conviction, the presence or absence of guilty intention is all-important for its effect on the appropriate measures to be taken to prevent a recurrence of the forbidden act. The prevention of accidental deaths presents different problems from those involved in the prevention of wilful murders. The result of the actions of the careless, the mistaken, the wicked and the merely unfortunate may be indistinguishable from one another, but each case calls for a different treatment. Tradition, however, is very strong, and the notion that these differences are relevant only after the fact has been established that the accused committed the forbidden act seems still to be deeply abhorrent to the legal mind.”

2–131

Hart has taken issue with these claims by putting forward what has become the classic justification of the doctrine of mens rea.¹⁶⁷ He clearly believed in people’s ability to determine their own actions and rested his defence of mens rea upon that belief. Even if one accepts people as “responsible”, it does not mean that the notion of “wickedness” need automatically be accepted as well, nor that one, therefore, punishes retributively on the basis of it. Instead, as we have seen, the value of punishment rests on the “simple idea that unless a man has the capacity and a fair opportunity or chance to adjust his behaviour to the law its penalties ought not to be applied to him”.¹⁶⁸ By punishing when there is some mental element, one acknowledges a person’s capacity and has given her the chance not to overstep the legal boundaries of action. It gives people the maximum power to determine their own future. The person who has exercised self-restraint and who has made the right choices is not made to suffer for mistakes or accidents.

H. L. A. HART, PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (1968), P.183:

2–132

“If you strike me, the judgment that the blow was deliberate will elicit fear, indignation, anger, resentment: these are not voluntary responses; but the same judgment will enter into deliberations about my future voluntary conduct towards you and will colour all my social relations with you. Shall I be your friend or enemy? Offer soothing words? Or return the blow? All this will be different if the blow is not voluntary. This is how human nature in society actually is and as yet we have no power to alter it. The bearing of this fundamental fact on the law is this. If as our legal moralists maintain it is important for the law to reflect common judgments of morality, it is surely even more important that it should in general reflect in its judgments on human conduct distinctions which not only underlie morality, but pervade the whole of our social life. This it would fail to do if it treated men merely as alterable, predictable, curable or manipulative things.”

These views have been widely accepted by the criminal law. But what does “mens rea” mean?

J. F. STEPHEN, HISTORY OF THE
CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND, VOL.II
(1883), PP.94–95:

2–133

“The maxim, ‘Actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea’, is sometimes said to be the fundamental maxim of the whole criminal law ...

It is frequently though ignorantly supposed to mean that there cannot be such a thing as legal guilt where there is no moral guilt, which is obviously untrue, as there is always a possibility of a conflict between law and morals.

It also suggests the notion that there is some state of mind called a ‘mens rea’, the absence of which, on any particular occasion, deprives what would otherwise be a crime of its criminal character. This also is untrue. There is no one such state of mind, as any one may convince himself by considering the definitions of dissimilar crimes. A pointsman falls asleep, and thereby causes a railway accident and the death of a passenger; he is guilty of manslaughter. He deliberately and by elaborate devices produces the same result: he is guilty of murder. If in each case there is a mens rea, as the maxim seems to imply, mens rea must be a name for two states of mind, not merely differing from but opposed to each other, for what two states of mind can resemble each other less than indolence and an active desire to kill?

The truth is that the maxim about mens rea means no more than that the definition of all or nearly all crimes contains not only an outward and visible element, but a mental element, varying according to the different nature of different crimes. Thus, in reference to murder, the mens rea is any state of mind which comes within the description of malice aforethought. In reference to theft the mens rea is an intention to deprive the owner of his property permanently, ... Hence the only means of arriving at a full comprehension of the expression mens rea is by a detailed examination of the definitions of particular crimes, and therefore the expression itself is unmeaning.”

2-134

Mens rea is the term generally used to indicate the mental element required by the definition of the crime. Older law and statutes used evaluative terms such as “malice aforethought” and “maliciously”. For the past century, and particularly the last half-century, more cognitive terms such as knowledge and belief in relation to circumstances, and intention and recklessness in relation to consequences, have become prevalent. The courts have embraced these new concepts and have reinterpreted the older terms in the light of them. For example, “maliciously” in the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20 has been construed as meaning “recklessly”. Other forms of affective (as opposed to cognitive) mens rea also exist. For example, theft requires “dishonesty”: this is a state of mind relating to the wrongfulness of actions.

However, the term mens rea has also been used to describe other forms of culpability that do not necessarily involve a “state of mind” in its cognitive sense of intending or being subjectively aware that a consequence could occur. For example, in the 1980s the law adopted an “objective” test of recklessness that involved a failure to foresee an obvious risk (an interpretation abandoned in 2003). Also, it has long been established that the mens rea for one species of manslaughter is satisfied by proof of gross negligence. In Misra it was stated that:

“the term ‘mens rea’ is also used to describe the ingredient of fault or culpability before criminal liability for the defendant’s actions may be established ... The requirement for gross negligence provides the necessary element of culpability.”¹⁶⁹

The Sentencing Advisory Panel (now known as the Sentencing Council) stated that there are four levels of culpability: intention, recklessness, knowledge and negligence.¹⁷⁰ Indeed, there is an increasing number of crimes for which only negligence is required. A prime example of this is the crime of rape. It would be churlish to describe rape as a crime not involving mens rea.

One approach to this issue would be to conclude that there are two species of mens rea. First, there is “cognitive mens rea” which involves intention or foresight on the part of the defendant. Secondly, there is “normative mens rea” under which an assessment of culpability involves an evaluation of the defendant’s actions, taking into account all the circumstances including the defendant’s state of mind.¹⁷¹

KUMARALINGHAM AMIRTHALINGAM, “CALDWELL RECKLESSNESS IS DEAD,
LONG LIVE MENS REA’S
FECKLESSNESS” (2004) 67 M.L.R.
491, 492:

2–135

“The doctrine of mens rea itself needs to be restored to its normative roots of attributing blameworthiness ...

Briefly, blameworthiness goes beyond mere conduct responsibility; it is a normative enquiry as to whether the person deserves to be labelled and punished as a criminal. The blameworthiness of an accused is not determined merely by enquiring whether there existed a ‘subjective’ mens rea; it requires an additional crucial step of asking whether the ‘mens was rea’. This inquiry involves an ‘objective’ element and includes inadvertence within mens rea.”¹⁷²

2–136

This approach, which is more consistent with the “character conception” of responsibility, has the advantage that it focuses attention on the central issue whether the defendant is blameworthy.¹⁷³ In many cases, cognitive mens rea is a prime indicator of blameworthiness but an assessment of blame can be based on other non-cognitive factors. For example, a defendant can be blamed for causing a harm when, even though there was no awareness of the possibility of the harm occurring at the time of acting, it was the defendant's own fault for getting herself into a situation or condition (for example, intoxicated) whereby she was deprived of the capacity for awareness. Also, the fact that a defendant has cognitive mens rea does not conclusively establish that she is blameworthy. She might intentionally bring about a prohibited harm but be exempt from blame because of a recognised excuse or justification (for example, duress or self-defence).

Accordingly, it must be borne in mind throughout this book that the term "mens rea" is no more than a tool in the identification of culpability. The construction of the various mens rea terms, such as recklessness, should be governed by the central quest of identifying blameworthiness. For example, in assessing whether "recklessness" should be interpreted as including a failure to consider obvious risks, the central issue is whether such a failure can be regarded as sufficiently culpable to justify the imposition of criminal liability.

C. PROOF OF COGNITIVE MENS REA

2-137

Most of the mens rea concepts mentioned above require proof of a person's state of mind. Did the actual defendant intend the consequence or foresee the risk of it occurring? This is commonly described as being a "subjective" test. Such a subjective test assumes that a person's state of mind is ascertainable. However, is it possible to inquire into a person's mind to ascertain what her intentions were when she committed the crime (maybe many months or even years previously)? As Ackner J said in his summing-up to the jury in Hyam:

"There is no scientific measurement or yardstick for gauging a person's intention. Unfortunately, there is no form of meter which one can fix to an accused person, like an amp meter or something of that kind, in order to ascertain what the intention is, no X-ray machine which will produce a useful picture."¹⁷⁴

Despite the scientific impossibility of ascertaining what a person's state of mind was at the time of the alleged crime, cognitive mens rea requires courts to try to establish these subjective states of mind. How is this done?

Without direct evidence of a person's state of mind, such as a confession (although even this might not be reliable), mens rea has to be established by drawing inferences from facts; the jury must consider all the circumstantial evidence—the conduct of the defendant before, during and after the crime, motive, statements by the defendant, type of weapon used etc—and from that infer what the defendant must have intended. The jury can only perform this task by trying to ascertain what any normal or reasonable person would have intended or foreseen in those circumstances. From this developed the important maxim that a person must be taken to intend the natural and probable consequences of her actions. This maxim, which of course went a long way towards destroying any subjective notion of mens rea, was interpreted rigidly by the House of Lords in the following decision.

DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS
V SMITH [1961] A.C. 290 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-138

The respondent was driving a car in which there was stolen property. He was stopped by a police officer who told him to draw into the near side. The respondent began to do so and the constable walked beside the car. Then the respondent suddenly accelerated down an adjoining road. The constable succeeded in hanging on to the car which pursued an erratic course until he was thrown off in the path of a vehicle which ran over him, killing him.

At his trial for murder, the respondent maintained that he had no intention of killing or causing serious injury to the constable. Donovan J directed the jury:

“if you are satisfied that he must, as a reasonable man, have contemplated that grievous bodily harm was likely to result to that officer and that such harm did happen and the officer died in consequence, then the accused is guilty of capital murder.”

The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The Court of Criminal Appeal quashed his conviction on the ground of misdirection. The Crown appealed to the House of Lords.

VISCOUNT KILMUIR:

“The unlawful and voluntary act must clearly be aimed at someone in order to eliminate cases of negligence or of careless or dangerous driving. Once, however, the jury are satisfied as to that, it matters not what the accused in fact contemplated as the probable result or whether he ever contemplated at all, provided he was in law responsible and accountable for his actions, that is, was a man capable of forming an intent, not insane within the M’Naghten Rules and not suffering from diminished responsibility. On the assumption that he is so accountable for his actions, the sole question is whether the unlawful and voluntary act was of such a kind that grievous bodily harm was the natural and probable result. The only test available for this is what the ordinary responsible man would, in all the circumstances of the case, have contemplated as the natural and probable result. That, indeed, has always been the law ...

Another criticism of the summing-up and one which found favour in the Court of Criminal Appeal concerned the manner in which the trial judge dealt with the presumption that a man intends the natural and probable consequences of his acts. The real question is whether the jury should have been told that it was rebuttable. In truth, however, as I see it, this is merely another way of applying the test of the reasonable man. Provided that the presumption is applied, once the accused’s knowledge of the circumstances and the nature of his acts have been ascertained, the only thing that could rebut the presumption would be proof of incapacity to form an intent, insanity or diminished responsibility. In the present case, therefore, there was no need to explain to the jury that the presumption was rebuttable.”

Appeal allowed

2-139

This decision was greeted with howls of derision by most English commentators.¹⁷⁵ The exact effect of the decision was never settled: did it lay down an irrebuttable evidential presumption that intention was to be ascertained objectively for all crimes? Or did it lay down a new mens rea for murder—a completely objective test where it was only necessary to establish that death or grievous bodily harm was objectively foreseeable? Either way, its effect was profound. Murder (and possibly all crimes) had been transformed into a crime of negligence: if the reasonable man would have foreseen the harm, the defendant was liable.

Intense criticism of this decision¹⁷⁶ led to the passing of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 s.8:

“A court or jury, in determining whether a person has committed an offence—

- (a) shall not be bound in law to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of these actions; but
- (b) shall decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances.”

The legislature has thus clearly endorsed the idea that intention is to be subjectively ascertained—as must foresight.¹⁷⁷ Of course, one way to establish a person’s state of mind is by obtaining a confession. There is evidence that historically this led to the police exerting more pressure to get confessions from defendants to strengthen the case for the prosecution.¹⁷⁸ The results were seen in a number of successful appeals against convictions.

Section 8 does not actually solve the practical problem of proving mens rea at all; it merely states what ought to be done in theory. It is true that if there is clear evidence that the defendant did not intend a result, the jury can so find. But in what circumstances would a jury conclude that while a reasonable man would have foreseen a result, the defendant did not? Surely this would generally only occur where there was clear evidence that the defendant's state of mind was in some material way different from that of the reasonable man—say, because she was a schizophrenic. But Viscount Kilmuir in DPP v Smith was careful to exclude those persons not capable of conforming to the standards of the reasonable man.

2-140

In other cases, however, it is doubtful if juries can do otherwise than draw inferences from conduct and apply their own standards, the standards of ordinary people: “If I had been in that situation, what would I have foreseen?” Perhaps this is what was meant by the startling extract from a training manual for magistrates which stated:

“It is sometimes said on the defendant's behalf that he did not intend to inflict the particular injury which the victim suffered. This is always a weak point because any sane person who commits an act of violence must expect injury to result. The fact that it happens to be greater than anticipated provides no excuse whatsoever.”¹⁷⁹

The Court of Appeal can sometimes pay lip-service to s.8 and quash convictions because the jury was not clearly directed that the test of intention is subjective.¹⁸⁰ Nevertheless, in reality, it seems likely that in many (if not most) cases s.8 is impracticable and juries in fact have to apply objective tests. As we shall see, this is one of the reasons why subjectivism has come under attack and there have been increasing calls for a more objectivist approach towards the ascertainment of mens rea—particularly recklessness.

We are now in a position to examine some of the core mens rea concepts, in particular, intention, recklessness and negligence. Other mens rea concepts, such as dishonesty and knowledge, are discussed later in the book in relation to the offences to which they apply. Which of these mens rea concepts is applicable depends on the definition of the offence on question. For some offences, this is specified by statute. For example, the Theft Act 1968 s.1 defines theft as requiring proof of dishonesty. For other offences, case law has established the type of mens rea required. For example, for an assault proof of recklessness suffices.¹⁸¹

D. INTENTION

1. Introduction

2-141

For many crimes it is unnecessary to distinguish intention from recklessness because proof of either will suffice. For example, the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1) provides that it is an offence to destroy or damage any property belonging to another “intending to destroy or damage any such property or being reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged”. However, there are some crimes that can only be committed intentionally: for example, the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.18 makes it an offence to wound or cause grievous bodily harm “with intent to cause grievous bodily harm”. For these crimes, it is essential to define intention with some precision in order to distinguish it from recklessness.

2. The law

2-142

As seen above, the Criminal Justice Act 1967 s.8 lays down an evidential rule as to how intention is to be proved and makes it clear that intention is a subjective state of mind. What matters is whether the defendant intended the result, not whether the reasonable man would have intended it. In trying to ascertain what the defendant did intend, the court or jury must draw inferences from all the relevant evidence.

However, while this is clear as to the process for ascertaining intention, there is no statutory definition of intention in English law. Indeed, over the past few decades there has been much controversy over the actual meaning of the concept “intention”. Two views have dominated this debate:

- (1) A consequence is intended when it is the aim or the objective of the actor. This is called “direct” intention.
- (2) A consequence is intended when it is the aim or objective of the actor, or is foreseen as a virtual, practical or moral certainty. If this second state of mind is classed as intention, it is usually called “oblique” intention.

The courts used to adopt an even broader view in holding that a consequence was intended when it was foreseen as a probable or likely result of the defendant’s actions.¹⁸² In Hyam,¹⁸³ for instance, Mrs Hyam poured petrol through the letterbox of the house of her lover’s new mistress and then ignited it knowing people were asleep in the house. She claimed that she had not meant to kill but had foreseen death or grievous bodily harm as a highly probable result of her actions. Her conviction for murder was upheld with the House of Lords arguably ruling that her state of mind amounted to an intention to kill or cause grievous bodily harm.

However, since then there has been a retreat from this position and it is now clear that foresight of a consequence as probable, likely or even highly probable does not amount to intention. However, the precise status and meaning of oblique intention has greatly troubled the courts.

R. V MOLONEY [1985] A.C. 905 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–143

The appellant and his stepfather, both of whom had been drinking heavily, engaged in a contest to ascertain who was quicker on the draw with a shotgun. The appellant shot and killed his stepfather but claimed he had not realised the gun was pointing at him. He was convicted of murder and his appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal. He appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH:

“[L]ooking on their facts at the decided cases where a crime of specific intent was under consideration, they suggest to me that the probability of the consequence taken to have been foreseen must be little short of overwhelming before it will suffice to establish the necessary intent. The golden rule should be that, when directing a jury on the mental element necessary in a crime of specific intent, the judge should avoid any elaboration or paraphrase of what is meant by intent, and leave it to the jury's good sense to decide whether the accused acted with the necessary intent, unless the judge is convinced that, on the facts and having regard to the way the case has been presented to the jury in evidence and argument, some further explanation or elaboration is strictly necessary to avoid misunderstanding. In trials for murder or wounding with intent, I find it very difficult to visualise a case where any such explanation or elaboration could be required, if the offence consisted of a direct attack on the victim with a weapon ... Even where the death results indirectly from the act of the accused, I believe the cases that will call for a direction by reference to foresight of consequences will be of extremely rare occurrence ...

I do not, of course, by what I have said in the foregoing paragraph, mean to question the necessity, which frequently arises, to explain to a jury that intention is something quite distinct from motive or desire. But this can normally be quite simply explained by reference to the case before the court or, if necessary, by some homely example. A man who, at London Airport, boards a plane which he knows to be bound for Manchester, clearly intends to travel to Manchester, even though Manchester is the last place he wants to be and his motive for boarding the plane is simply to escape pursuit. The possibility that the plane may have engine trouble and be diverted to Luton does not affect the matter. By boarding the Manchester plane, the man conclusively demonstrates his intention to go there, because it is a moral certainty that that is where he will arrive ...

Starting from the proposition ... that the mental element in murder requires proof of an intention to kill or cause really serious injury, the first fundamental question to be answered is whether there is any rule of substantive law that foresight by the accused of one of those eventualities as a probable consequence of his voluntary act, where the probability can be defined as exceeding a certain degree, is equivalent or alternative to the necessary intention. I would answer this question in the negative ...

The irrationality of any such rule of substantive law stems from the fact that it is impossible to define degrees of probability, in any of the infinite variety of situations arising in human affairs, in precise or scientific terms ...

I am firmly of opinion that foresight of consequences, as an element bearing on the issue of intention in murder, or indeed any other crime of specific intent, belongs, not to the substantive law, but to the law of evidence ...

In the rare cases in which it is necessary to direct a jury by reference to foresight of consequences, I do not believe it is necessary for the judge to do more than invite the jury to consider two questions. First, was death or really serious injury in a murder case (or whatever relevant consequence must be proved to have been intended in any other case) a natural consequence of the defendant's voluntary act? Secondly, did the defendant foresee that consequence as being a natural consequence of his act? The jury should then be told that if they answer yes to both questions it is a proper inference for them to draw that he intended that consequence."

Appeal allowed

R. V HANCOCK AND SHANKLAND
[1986] A.C. 455 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-144

The defendants, two striking miners, pushed a large lump of concrete from a bridge on to a convoy of cars below carrying a miner to work. The concrete struck a taxi's windscreen and killed the driver. The defendants claimed they had not meant to kill or cause serious injury. Their plan was to drop the concrete in the middle lane of the carriageway while the convoy was in the nearside lane. Their aim was to frighten the miner or block the road in order to prevent him from getting to work. The defendants were convicted of murder. The Court of Appeal allowed their appeals and substituted verdicts of manslaughter. The Crown appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD SCARMAN:

"[T]he cases to which the guidance was expressly limited by the House in Moloney, i.e. the 'rare cases' in which it is necessary to direct a jury by reference to foresight of consequences, are unlikely to be so rare or so exceptional as the House believed. As the House then recognised, the guidelines as formulated are applicable to cases of any crime of specific intent, and not merely murder. But further and disturbingly crimes of violence where the purpose is by open violence to protest, demonstrate, obstruct, or frighten are on the increase. Violence is used by some as a means of public communication. Inevitably there will be casualties: and inevitably death will on occasions result. If death results, is the perpetrator of the violent act guilty of murder? It will depend on his intent ...

The question for the House is, therefore, whether the Moloney guidelines are sound ...

[Lord Bridge of Harwich in Moloney] omitted any reference in his guidelines to probability. I agree with the Court of Appeal that the probability of a consequence is a factor of sufficient importance to be drawn specifically to the attention of the jury and to be explained. In a murder case where it is necessary to direct a jury on the issue of intent by reference to foresight of consequences the probability of death or serious injury resulting from the act done may be critically important. Its importance will depend on the degree of probability: if the likelihood that death or serious injury will result is high, the probability of that result may be seen as overwhelming evidence of the existence of the intent to kill or injure. Failure to explain the relevance of probability may, therefore, mislead a jury into thinking that it is of little or no importance ... In my judgment, therefore, the Moloney guidelines as they stand are unsafe and misleading. They require a reference to probability. They also require an explanation that the greater the probability of a consequence the more likely it is that the consequence was foreseen and that if that consequence was foreseen the greater the probability is that that consequence was also intended. But juries also require to be reminded that the decision is theirs to be reached upon a consideration of all the evidence ...

In a case where foresight of a consequence is part of the evidence supporting a prosecution submission that the accused intended the consequence, the judge, if he thinks some general observations would help the jury, could well, having in mind section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, emphasise that the probability, however high, of a consequence is only a factor, though it may in some cases be a very significant factor, to be considered with all the other evidence in determining whether the accused intended to bring it about. The distinction between the offence and the evidence relied on to prove it is vital ...

For these reasons I would hold that the Moloney guidelines are defective and should not be used as they stand without further explanation.”

Appeal dismissed

R. v NEDRICK [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1025
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-145

The appellant poured paraffin through the letterbox of a house and set light to it. The house caught fire and a child died. The appellant claimed that he did not want anyone to die. He was convicted of murder and appealed.

LORD LANE CJ:

“What then does a jury have to decide so far as the mental element in murder is concerned? It simply has to decide whether the defendant intended to kill or do serious bodily harm. In order to reach that decision the jury must pay regard to all the relevant circumstances, including what the defendant himself said and did.

In the great majority of cases a direction to that effect will be enough, particularly where the defendant’s actions amounted to a direct attack upon his victim, because in such cases the evidence relating to the defendant’s desire or motive will be clear and his intent will have been the same as his desire or motive. But in some cases, of which this is one, the defendant does an act which is manifestly dangerous and as a result someone dies. The primary desire or motive of the defendant may not have been to harm that person, or indeed anyone. In that situation what further directions should a jury be given as to the mental state which they must find to exist in the defendant if murder is to be proved?

We have endeavoured to crystallise the effect of their Lordships’ speeches in R. v Moloney and R. v Hancock in a way which we hope may be helpful to judges who have to handle this type of case.

It may be advisable first of all to explain to the jury that a man may intend to achieve a certain result whilst at the same time not desiring it to come about ...

When determining whether the defendant had the necessary intent, it may therefore be helpful for a jury to ask themselves two questions. (1) How probable was the consequence which resulted from the defendant's voluntary act? (2) Did he foresee that consequence?

If he did not appreciate that death or serious harm was likely to result from his act, he cannot have intended to bring it about. If he did, but thought that the risk to which he was exposing the person killed was only slight, then it may be easy for the jury to conclude that he did not intend to bring about that result. On the other hand, if the jury are satisfied that at the material time the defendant recognised that death or serious harm would be virtually certain (barring some unforeseen intervention) to result from his voluntary act, then that is a fact from which they may find it easy to infer that he intended to kill or do serious bodily harm, even though he may not have had any desire to achieve that result.

...

*Where the charge is murder and in the rare cases where the simple direction is not enough, the jury should be directed that they are not entitled to infer the necessary intention, unless they feel sure that death or serious bodily harm was a virtual certainty (barring some unforeseen intervention) as a result of the defendant's actions and that the defendant appreciated that such was the case.*¹⁸⁴

Where a man realises that it is for all practical purposes inevitable that his actions will result in death or serious harm, the inference may be irresistible that he intended that result, however little he may have desired or wished it to happen. The decision is one for the jury to be reached upon a consideration of all the evidence."

*Appeal allowed
Conviction of manslaughter substituted*

R. v WOOLLIN [1999] 1 A.C. 82
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

The appellant lost his temper with his three-month-old son and threw him with great force causing the child to hit his head on something hard and die. In an interview, the appellant admitted that he had realised there was a risk of serious injury. The trial judge directed the jury that they might infer intention if they were satisfied that the appellant appreciated that there was a substantial risk that he would cause serious harm. The appellant was convicted of murder and appealed on the ground that the judge should not have used the phrase “substantial risk”, which is a test of recklessness, but should have used the phrase “virtual certainty”.

LORD STEYN:

“The Crown did not contend that the appellant desired to kill his son or to cause him serious injury. The issue was whether the appellant nevertheless had the intention to cause serious harm ...

I approach the issues arising on this appeal on the basis that it does not follow that ‘intent’ necessarily has precisely the same meaning in every context in the criminal law. The focus of the present appeal is the crime of murder.

Lord Bridge observed in Moloney [that] ...

‘But looking on their facts at the decided cases where a crime of specific intent was under consideration, including Reg v Hyam itself, they suggest to me that the probability of the consequence taken to have been foreseen must be little short of overwhelming before it will suffice to establish the necessary intent.’ (Emphasis added)

Lord Bridge paraphrased this idea in terms of ‘moral certainty.’ In the result the House adopted a narrower test of what may constitute intention which is similar to the ‘virtual certainty’ test in Nedrick ...

In Hancock, Lord Scarman did not express disagreement with the test of foresight of a probability which is ‘little short of overwhelming’ as enunciated in Moloney ... Moreover, Lord Scarman thought that where explanation is required the jury should be directed as to the relevance of probability without expressly stating the matter in terms of any particular level of probability. The manner in which trial judges were to direct juries was left unclear ...

His Lordship then cited from Nedrick, including the italicised passage in [para.2-145 fn.184]

While I have thought it right to give the full text of Lord Lane's observations, it is obvious that the italicised passage contains the critical direction. The effect of the critical direction is that a result foreseen as virtually certain is an intended result.

It is now possible to consider the Crown's direct challenge to the correctness of Nedrick. First, the Crown argued that Nedrick prevents the jury from considering all the evidence in the case relevant to intention. The argument is that this is contrary to the provisions of section 8 of the Act of 1967 ... [s.8] is no more than a legislative instruction that in considering their findings on intention or foresight the jury must take into account all relevant evidence: Nedrick is undoubtedly concerned with the mental element which is sufficient for murder ... But, as Lord Lane CJ emphasised in the last sentence of Nedrick: 'The decision is one for the jury to be reached upon a consideration of all the evidence.' Nedrick does not prevent a jury from considering all the evidence: it merely stated what state of mind (in the absence of a purpose to kill or to cause serious harm) is sufficient for murder. I would therefore reject the Crown's first argument.

In the second place the Crown submitted that Nedrick is in conflict with the decision of the House in Hancock. Counsel argued that in order to bring some coherence to the process of determining intention Lord Lane CJ specified a minimum level of foresight, namely virtual certainty. But that is not in conflict with the decision in Hancock which, apart from disapproving Lord Bridge's 'natural consequence' model direction, approved Moloney in all other respects. And in Moloney Lord Bridge said, that if a person foresees the probability of a consequence as little short of overwhelming, this 'will suffice to establish the necessary intent' (my emphasis) ...

The Crown did not argue that as a matter of policy foresight of a virtual certainty is too narrow a test in murder ... Moreover, over a period of 12 years since Nedrick the test of foresight of virtual certainty has apparently caused no practical difficulties. It is simple and clear. It is true that it may exclude a conviction of murder in the often cited terrorist example where a member of the bomb disposal team is killed. In such a case it may realistically be said that the terrorist did not foresee the killing of a member of the bomb disposal team as a virtual certainty. That may be a consequence of not framing the principle in terms of risk-taking. Such cases ought to cause no substantial difficulty since immediately below murder there is available a verdict of manslaughter which may attract in the discretion of the court a life sentence ... I am satisfied that the Nedrick test, which was squarely based on the decision of the House in Moloney, is pitched at the right level of foresight ...

It may be appropriate to give a direction in accordance with Nedrick in any case in which the defendant may not have desired the result of his act. But I accept the trial judge is best placed to decide what direction is required by the circumstances of the case ...

It follows that the judge should not have departed from the Nedrick direction. By using the phrase 'substantial risk' the judge blurred the line between intention and recklessness, and hence between murder and manslaughter. The misdirection enlarged the scope of the mental element required for murder. It was a material misdirection ... The conviction of murder must be quashed.

The status of Nedrick

In my view Lord Lane CJ's judgment in Nedrick provided valuable assistance to trial judges ... [His Lordship then repeated part of Lord Lane's judgment]:

'... (B) Where the charge is murder and in the rare cases where the simple direction is not enough, the jury should be directed that they are not entitled to infer the necessary intention, unless they feel sure that death or serious bodily harm was a virtual certainty (barring some unforeseen intervention) as a result of the defendant's actions and that the defendant appreciated that such was the case. (C) Where a man realises that it is for all practical purposes inevitable that his actions will result in death or serious harm, the inference may be irresistible that he intended that result, however little he may have desired or wished it to happen. The decision is one for the jury to be reached upon a consideration of all the evidence.' (Lettering added)

... [It has been observed] that the use of the words 'to infer' in (B) may detract from the clarity of the model direction. I agree. I would substitute the words 'to find'. Thirdly, the first sentence of (C) does not form part of the model direction. But it would always be right for the judge to say, as Lord Lane CJ put it, that the decision is for the jury upon a consideration of all the evidence in the case.”

Appeal allowed

The following conclusions can be drawn from these cases.

(i) Wanting result

2–147

A defendant who wants a result to happen or is prepared to do acts to achieve a consequence even if not (emotionally) desired¹⁸⁵—when it is the aim or objective (direct intention)—clearly intends that result.

R. A. DUFF, INTENTION, AGENCY AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY: PHILOSOPHY
OF ACTION AND THE CRIMINAL LAW
(1990), PP.47–48:

2–148

“To say that she intended to bring about a particular result is to say that that result formed at least part of her reason for acting as she did ... What Mrs Hyam did fitted both the description ‘setting fire to the house’ and the description ‘making work for the fire brigade’: what makes the former description, but not the latter, appropriate as a description of her intended action is its relation to her reasons for action.”

2–149

Duff goes on to suggest that direct intention can be measured by employing a “test of failure”: would the defendant count her actions as a failure if the result did not ensue?¹⁸⁶ Employing this test, Mrs Hyam did not directly intend to kill or cause injury because she would not have regarded her actions as a failure had no one been killed or injured.

Such wanted results are intended even if the chances of the result occurring are slim: if the defendant shoots at her victim half a mile away knowing that she could easily miss, she still intends to kill because that is what she is trying to do. Lord Reid has expressed this point in terms of a golfing analogy:

“If I say I intend to reach the green, people will believe me although we all know that the odds are ten to one against my succeeding.”¹⁸⁷

However, no matter how much one may want to achieve a result, one can only be said to intend it if one recognises that there is a chance of achieving it. If one does not believe that the consequence is a possible result of one’s actions one can hardly be said to be trying to achieve it.¹⁸⁸

(ii) Question of fact for jury

2–150

In the normal case the term “intention” should not be given a legal definition. Judges should refrain from giving juries guidance as to what it means. This is particularly true in common cases where there has been a direct attack upon the victim.¹⁸⁹ Whether a defendant intended a result is a question of fact which only the jury, applying their common sense to an ordinary English word, can answer. It is thus impossible to define intention or to know precisely what it means. It could well mean different things to different juries. Presumably, although one is only guessing, most juries will opt for the ordinary, common-sense meaning, namely, “as ‘a decision to bring about a certain consequence’ or as the aim”.¹⁹⁰

(iii) “Exceptional” cases: oblique intention

2–151

However, there may be other cases where a defendant has a purpose other than causing the prohibited harm—but where that result is an inevitable or likely consequence. For example, the defendant’s main aim in Nedrick was to burn down the house in order to frighten its occupant but, in so doing, causing death was a likely result. In Woollin, it was again emphasised that a direction was only necessary in cases where the defendant does not desire the consequence that has occurred. In Moloney, Lord Bridge thought such guidance would only be necessary in “rare” and “exceptional” cases.¹⁹¹ However, Lord Scarman in Hancock stated that such cases would not be at all rare or exceptional—and, accordingly, guidance to the jury will be necessary in most cases where the defendant has a primary aim in acting other than causing the prohibited harm.¹⁹² Despite this, more recent cases have stressed that a Woollin direction will only be required in “rare circumstances”.¹⁹³ Further, giving a Woollin direction when it is not appropriate can amount to a misdirection providing grounds for quashing a conviction because it can lead to the trial judge analysing the evidence differently from how it should be analysed in the normal cases of direct intention.¹⁹⁴

So, in rare cases it is permissible to give juries some guidance. However, it is far from clear precisely what intention does mean in such cases. The central problem is that there are two possible interpretations of Woollin:

- (i) Definitional interpretation: a new extended definition of intention has been laid down. If a consequence is foreseen as virtually certain the jury may be told that this amounts to intention. This view is supported by two passages in Woollin. First, Lord Steyn cited with approval from Moloney that “if a person foresees the probability of a consequence as little short of overwhelming, this will suffice to establish the necessary intent” (Lord Steyn’s emphasis). Secondly, after citing the italicised passage from Nedrick (p.152), Lord Steyn added: “The effect of the critical direction is that a result foreseen as virtually certain is an intended result” (our emphasis). This interpretation is strengthened by the fact that in Woollin the Crown did not contend that the appellant desired to kill or seriously injure his son. The case proceeded on the basis that there could be another species of intention apart from direct intention.
- (ii) Evidential interpretation: there is still no definition of intention. Where a consequence is foreseen as virtually certain this is evidence entitling a court or jury to find intention. Lord Steyn emphasised his approval of the critical direction in Nedrick (the italicised passage on p.217). While he substituted “find” in place of “infer”,¹⁹⁵ he endorsed the Nedrick view that the jury was “not entitled to [find] the necessary intention unless they feel sure that death or serious bodily harm was a virtual certainty ... and the defendant appreciated that such was the case”. While endorsing the virtual certainty test as evidence from which the jury is entitled to find intention, Lord Steyn immediately went on to rule that the Nedrick proposition (first sentence of (C) cited in Woollin) that the inference may be irresistible, does not form part of the model direction. This seems to confirm that there is no test of intention. While foresight of a virtual certainty is a prerequisite to a finding of intention, the jury may (is “entitled to”) find intention in such cases, but equally they may not. This evidential interpretation was adopted in the following case.

R. V MATTHEWS AND ALLEYNE [2003]
2 CR. APP. R. 30 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2–152

The defendants deliberately threw a non-swimmer into a deep, wide river where he drowned. They were convicted of murder and appealed on the ground that the trial judge had misdirected the jury that if they were satisfied the defendants foresaw death as virtually certain they had to convict (i.e. that the trial judge adopted the definitional interpretation).

RIX LJ:

“Mr Coker for the Crown on this appeal submits that in Woollin the House of Lords has finally moved away from a rule of evidence to a rule of substantive law. In this connection he drew attention to a sentence in Lord Steyn’s speech where he says ... that—

‘The effect of the critical direction is that a result foreseen as virtually certain is an intended result.’ ...

In our judgment, however, the law has not yet reached a definition of intent in murder in terms of appreciation of a virtual certainty ... [W]e do not regard Woollin as yet reaching or laying down a substantive rule of law. On the contrary, it is clear from the discussion in Woollin as a whole that Nedrick was derived from the existing law, at that time ending in Moloney and Hancock, and that the critical direction in Nedrick was approved, subject to the change of one word.

In these circumstances we think that the judge did go further than the law as it stands at present permitted him to go ...

Having said that, however, we think that, once what is required is an appreciation of virtual certainty of death, and not some lesser foresight of merely probable consequences, there is very little to choose between a rule of evidence and one of substantive law. It is probably this thought that led Lord Steyn to say that a result foreseen as virtually certain is an intended result ...

We also think that on the particular facts of this case, reflected in the judge's directions, the question of the appellants' intentions to save Jonathan from drowning highlight the irresistible nature of the inference or finding of intent to kill, once the jury were sure both that the defendants appreciated the virtual certainty of death '(barring some attempt to save him)' and that at the time of throwing Jonathan from the bridge they then 'had no intentions of saving him'. If the jury were sure that the appellants appreciated the virtual certainty of Jonathan's death when they threw him from the bridge and also that they then had no intention of saving him from such death, it is impossible to see how the jury could not have found that the appellants intended Jonathan to die."

Appeal dismissed

2-153

In an ambiguous judgment in Stringer,¹⁹⁶ Toulson LJ seemed to accept that if a consequence was foreseen as virtually certain, a finding of intention "was bound to follow". Despite this, the evidential interpretation endorsed in Matthews and Alleyne appears to represent the current law. Nevertheless, the question still remains: which of these interpretations is preferable? The definitional interpretation has the advantage of being simpler and more workable. There are two separate species of intent: direct intent (aim/purpose) and oblique intent (foresight of virtual certainty). Each is clearly defined and proof of either will suffice (for murder, at any rate: see below). It avoids the absurdity of having to infer one state of mind (intention) from another state of mind (foresight of virtual certainty).

WILLIAM WILSON, “DOCTRINAL RATIONALITY AFTER WOOLLIN”
(1999) 62 MODERN L. REV. 448, 451–
452:

2–154

“What a person foresees is not necessarily even probative of what he means to achieve. Direct intention and foresight are different states of mind, in the same way that love is different from acquisitiveness. Proving that a person foresees a consequence as probable/highly probable is no more conclusive of an intention to produce that consequence than counting an art dealer’s acquisitions can establish his love of art.”

2–155

The problem with the evidential interpretation is that if one is inferring (or finding) intention from foresight of a virtual certainty, one must know what intention means. If intention (A) may be found from foresight of a virtual certainty (B), (A) and (B) must logically mean different things. But what does intention (A) mean? It is not foresight of a virtual certainty (B) because that is merely an evidential pre-condition.¹⁹⁷ It should not mean direct intention¹⁹⁸ because juries should only be given a Nedrick/Woollin direction in cases where the defendant does not aim to achieve the consequence. It is a logical nonsense to tell the jury that because the defendant does not want the result they are going to be given the special direction but that if they are satisfied that the defendant foresaw the consequence as a virtual certainty, they may conclude that he did want it after all.

The result is that intention can only mean something mysterious:

“some ineffable, indefinable notion of intent, locked in the breasts of the jurors”.¹⁹⁹ Where there is such a “logical gap”²⁰⁰ between foresight of a virtual certainty and this mysterious, undefined concept of intention, it becomes difficult to predict when and in what circumstances the finding of intent will or will not be made. Such an approach allows the jury maximum flexibility to make moral assessments of the defendant’s actions and to do justice as they perceive it.²⁰¹

On the other hand, the definitional interpretation places the jury in a moral straight-jacket. If the defendant foresees a consequence as virtually certain the jury is bound (in theory) to conclude that the test of oblique intention is satisfied.

ALAN NORRIE, “AFTER WOOLLIN” [1999] CRIMINAL L. REV. 532, 538:

2–156

“[There] are cases where there is a ‘moral threshold’ such that even though the accused could foresee a result as virtually certain, it is so at odds with his moral conception of what he was doing that it could not be conceived as a result that he intended ... [T]here is a good argument for saying that a person does not intend indirectly those results which may be foreseen as virtually certain where they are at serious moral odds with what he intended to do ... [Judges] and juries would be ‘entitled’ to find, in terms of principle and without strain, that the moral threshold between what the accused intended and what she foresaw as virtually certain was sufficiently large to avoid attribution of fault.”

2–157

In most cases (certainly murder cases) what the defendant foresees is not going to be “at serious moral odds with what he intended to do”. Such defendants are usually engaged in reprehensible conduct such as that in Matthews and Alleyne where it was stated that on the facts the inference was “irresistible” and that if the defendants appreciated the virtual certainty of death, it would be “impossible” for the jury not to find the requisite intention to kill.

However, as argued by Norrie, the advantage of the evidential interpretation is that in other cases where their sympathy is aroused the jury is given a “get out clause”²⁰² in that while they are entitled to find intention, equally they are entitled not to find intention. This approach gives juries “moral elbow-room”²⁰³ to acquit in such cases without having to resort to perverse verdicts. As Wilson puts it: by not having a strict definition of intention the judge or jury have a “flexible friend, which, in appropriate circumstances can allow good intentions to take doctrinal precedence over knowledge”.²⁰⁴

R. v STEANE [1947] K.B. 997 (COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL):

2–158

The appellant, a British film actor, was resident and working in Germany before World War II. When war broke out he was arrested. As a result of threats to place his wife and children in a concentration camp and physical threats to himself, the appellant reluctantly agreed to broadcast on the radio for the Germans. For four months he read the news three times a day. After the war he was convicted of doing acts likely to assist the enemy, with intent to assist the enemy, contrary to of the Defence (General) Regulations 1939 reg.2A and was sentenced to three years’ imprisonment. He appealed against the conviction.

GODDARD LCJ:

“The appellant also asserted ... that he never had the slightest idea or intention of assisting the enemy and what he did was done to save his wife and children ...

The ... difficult question that arises, however, is in connection with the direction to the jury with regard to whether these acts were done with the intention of assisting the enemy ... While no doubt the motive of a man’s act and his intention of doing the act are in law different things, it is nonetheless true that in many offences a specific intention is a necessary ingredient, and the jury have to be satisfied that a particular act was done with that specific intent ...

An illustration ... would be if a person deliberately took down his blackout curtains or shutters with the result that light appeared on the outside of his house, perhaps during an air raid; it might well be that no evidence or explanation were given and if all that was proved was that during that raid the prisoner exposed lights by a deliberate act, a jury could infer that he intended to signal or assist the enemy. But if the evidence in the case showed, for instance, that he or someone was overcome by heat and that he tore down the blackout to ventilate the room, the jury would certainly have to consider whether his act was done with the intent to assist the enemy or with some other intent, so that while he would be guilty of an offence against the Blackout Regulations, he would not be guilty of the offence of attempting to assist the enemy ...

British soldiers who were set to work on the Burma Road, or if invasion had unhappily taken place, British subjects who might have been set to work by the enemy digging trenches would undoubtedly be doing acts likely to assist the enemy. It would be unnecessary surely in their cases to consider any of the niceties of the law relating to duress because no jury would find that merely doing this work they were intending to assist the enemy ... The proper direction to the jury in this case would have been that it was for the prosecution to prove the criminal intent, and that while the jury would be entitled to presume that intent if they thought that the act was done as the result of the free uncontrolled action of the accused, they would not be entitled to presume it if the circumstances showed that the act was done in subjection to the power of the enemy or was as equally consistent with an innocent intent as with a criminal intent, for example, a desire to save his wife and children from a concentration camp. They should only convict if satisfied by the evidence that the act complained of was in fact done to assist the enemy and if there was doubt about the matter the prisoner was entitled to be acquitted.”

Conviction quashed

2-159

If this case were decided today under the definitional interpretation of Woollin, the jury would be forced (short of a perverse verdict) to conclude that Steane intended to assist the enemy: he would certainly have foreseen that consequence as a virtual certainty. However, under the evidential interpretation the jury would have the moral elbow-room to conclude that, despite such foresight, the result was not intended.

This approach also provides flexibility in medical cases where doctors administer drugs or other treatment with lawful motives (for example, to relieve pain) but knowing the treatment will kill the patient.

RE A (CONJOINED TWINS: SURGICAL SEPARATION) [2000] 4 ALL E.R. 961 (COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION):

2-160

The issue in this case was whether a declaration should be made that it would be lawful for doctors to separate conjoined twins even though such a procedure would certainly result in the death of the weaker twin. One of the matters canvassed was whether the doctors would have the mens rea of murder, namely, an intention to kill or cause grievous bodily harm.

WARD LJ:

“I have to ask myself whether I am satisfied that the doctors recognise that death or serious harm will be virtually certain (barring some unforeseen intervention) to result from carrying out this operation. If so, the doctors intend to kill or do that serious harm even though they may not have any desire to achieve that result. It is common ground that they appreciate that death to Mary would result from the severance of the common aorta. Unpalatable though it may be ... to stigmatise the doctors with ‘murderous intent’, that is what in law they will have if they perform the operation and Mary dies as a result.

The doctrine of double effect ... teaches that an act which produces a bad effect is nevertheless morally permissible if the action is good in itself, the intention is solely to produce the good effect, the good effect is not produced through the bad effect and there is sufficient reason to permit the bad effect. It may be difficult to reconcile with R. v Woollin ... I can readily see how the doctrine works when doctors are treating one patient administering pain-killing drugs for the sole good purpose of relieving pain, yet appreciating the bad side-effect that it will hasten the patient’s death. I simply fail to see how it can apply here where the side-effect to the good cure for Jodie is another patient's, Mary's, death, and when the treatment cannot have been undertaken to effect any benefit for Mary."

BROOKE LJ:

"[A]n English court would inevitably find that the surgeons intended to kill Mary, however little they desired that end, because her death would be the virtual certain consequence of their acts, and they would realize that for all practical purposes her death would inevitably follow ..."

ROBERT WALKER LJ:

"However the stark facts of R. v Woollin and the speeches in the House of Lords in that case say nothing at all about the situation in which an individual acts for a good purpose which cannot be achieved without also having bad consequences (which may be merely possible, or very probable, or virtually certain). This is the doctrine (or dilemma) of double effect. In one class of case the good purpose and the foreseen but undesired consequence (what Bentham called 'oblique intention') are both directed at the same individual. This can be illustrated by a doctor's duty to his patient ... [H]e may in order to palliate severe pain, administer large doses of analgesics even though he knows that the likely consequence will be to shorten the patient's life ... In these cases the doctrine of double effect prevents the doctor's foresight of accelerated death from counting as a guilty intention. This type of double effect cannot be relevant to conduct directed towards Mary ...

There is another class of case in which a person may be faced with the dilemma of whether to save himself or others at the cost of harm or even death to a third person. The dilemma generally arises as the result of an emergency ... [such as] disasters at sea. If a person, faced with such a dilemma, acts with the intention of saving his own life (or the lives of others) it may be said that that leaves no room for a guilty intention to harm or even kill the third person. Equally, it may be said that although he must (on R. v Woollin principles) be taken to have intended the death which he foresaw as virtually certain, he has a defence of necessity. That is the way the submission was put by Miss Davies ...

In Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority [1986]

1 A.C. 112 at 190, Lord Scarman ... said ...:

‘The bona fide exercise by a doctor of his clinical judgment must be a complete negation of the guilty mind which is an essential ingredient of the criminal offence ...’

Here the court is concerned with the possibility of the commission of a much more serious criminal offence, that is murder. But in the wholly exceptional case of these conjoined twins I consider that the same principles apply ... Mary’s death would be foreseen as an inevitable consequence of an operation which is intended, and is necessary, to save Jodie’s life. But Mary’s death would not be the purpose or intention of the surgery.”

2-161

This case is significant in two respects. First, it demonstrates the difference between the two interpretations of intention. Ward LJ and Brooke LJ, in effect, followed the definitional interpretation. The doctors would foresee death as a virtual certainty and therefore they would intend death.²⁰⁵ However, Robert Walker LJ (implicitly) allowed himself moral elbow-room in holding that the doctors would not intend to kill the weaker twin because that was not “the purpose or intention of the surgery”.

Secondly, this divergence of approach brings to the fore a central dilemma here. Is intention a psychological state of mind or a moral conclusion?²⁰⁶ While Robert Walker LJ clearly adopted the latter view that there was no intention because the doctors would not be morally responsible for the death, the other two members of the Court of Appeal proceeded on the basis that intention is a psychological state. The issue was quite simply whether the doctors would, as a matter of fact, foresee death as a virtual certainty.

A conclusion that a defendant is criminally liable must, of course, involve a judgment of moral responsibility but the issue is ascertaining where such moral assessments should be located: ought they to be part of the question whether the defendant intended a result or should they affect the issue of whether a defence is available? For example, Ward LJ and Brooke LJ were clear that the doctors would not be guilty of murder but they achieved this result by holding that, while they would intend death, they would be afforded a defence of medical necessity. Similarly, Steane could have been decided on the basis that he did intend to assist the enemy but had a defence of duress because he was forced to broadcast.

The argument in favour of the view that intention should be a moral conclusion is that actions must pass a “threshold of responsibility” before there can be intention. For example, the teacher who gives a student a (deserved) bad mark knowing it will upset the pupil does not intend such upset because of a moral assessment that the teacher is only performing her duty to grade properly.²⁰⁷ On this basis Norrie argues that:

“there is a moral objection in common sense to saying [that Steane obliquely intended to assist the enemy], which stems from the duress under which Steane operated. The threats to his family represented the basis of a moral excuse for saying that he did not possess the oblique intention to assist the enemy, but only intended to save his family.”²⁰⁸

Another way of making such moral assessments is to examine the defendant’s attitudes towards the risks she is creating.

ANTJE PEDAIN, “INTENTION AND THE TERRORIST EXAMPLE” [2003] CRIM.
L.R. 579, 589, 586, 587:

2–162

“If intending something means to endorse it as the consequence of one’s voluntary actions, then the issue is not about whether you endorse it as the certain, the likely or the unlikely consequence of your behaviour. It is about endorsement as such. The point is about whether you give that consequence your blessing ...

[The author applies this ‘endorsement test’ to the facts of Woollin] The reason why we allow Woollin to distance himself from the foreseeable consequences of his actions is that he did not endorse injury or death even as a possibility ... [and to the facts of Hyam] [T]he sense of ‘not wanting something to happen’ is the sense of not caring about an outcome, of having no interest in it or being indifferent to its occurrence. This is the sense in which Hyam did ‘not want’ Mrs Booth’s daughters to die in the fire. That in itself is insufficient for her to disassociate herself from this consequence of her intentional conduct.”

2–163

Under the evidential interpretation such an approach would be helpful to a jury in deciding whether to draw the inference of intention or not.²⁰⁹

These approaches are, however, highly problematic in less straightforward cases particularly where the defendant’s actions do not unambiguously reveal her attitude or where there is uncertainty as to whether the defendant does have a moral excuse or not.

CHANDLER V DPP [1964] A.C. 763 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–164

The appellants were deeply opposed to nuclear weapons. In order to demonstrate their opposition, they planned non-violent action to immobilise an aircraft at an RAF station for a period of six hours. They were convicted of conspiracy to commit a breach of the Official Secrets Act 1911 s.1, namely entering a prohibited place for “a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state”. The trial judge ruled that they were not entitled to call evidence to show that it would be for the benefit of the country to give up nuclear armaments. He directed the jury to convict if they were satisfied that the immediate purpose of the appellants was the obstruction of an aircraft. Their appeal was dismissed by the Court of Criminal Appeals. They appealed to the House of Lords.

RADCLIFFE LJ:

“The trial judge ... directed the jury that they should not be influenced by what, he said, was the undisputed fact that the views as to the wrongness and, indeed, unwisdom of nuclear weapons held by the appellants were deeply and passionately held and that they were honest and sincere views. In effect he put it to the jury that they should look on the appellants as having made their entry for two separate purposes, an immediate purpose of obstructing the airfield, and a further or long-term purpose of inducing or compelling the Government to abandon nuclear weapons in the true interests of the state. His ruling was that, if they found the immediate purpose proved, that of obstruction, they ought to find the appellants guilty of offences under section 1 of the Act, regardless of whether they might think the long-term purpose in itself beneficial or, at any rate, non-prejudicial to the interests and safety of the state. In my opinion there was nothing defective in law in this ruling.”

Appeal dismissed

2–165

Following the definitional interpretation of Woollin the defendants in Chandler would clearly be liable—a view consistent with the notion that intention is a psychological state of mind. The moral judgment as to liability would be left to the determination of whether they should be afforded a defence—which they would not.²¹⁰ On the other hand, under the evidential interpretation of Woollin, the jury would be able to evaluate the motives of the defendants in deciding whether to find intention or not. There are, however, problems with this latter approach. First, whether intention would be “found” or not in a case such as Chandler would depend largely on the “political” persuasions of the jury, thus generating uncertainty and inconsistency. Secondly, it results in a blurring of the distinction between the elements of an offence and exculpatory defences.²¹¹ Would it mean that Steane could have done anything (for example, blow up an aeroplane killing hundreds of people) to save his family?²¹²

Such an important question as whether duress should be a defence to murder should not be left to the vagaries of a jury decision. It raises fundamental moral questions, which should be determined as a matter of law within the parameters of the defence of duress.

(iv) A variable meaning?

2–166

In Moloney and Hancock it was stressed that the court was not only dealing with murder, but with all crimes of “intention”. In short, according to these cases intention bears the same meaning throughout the criminal law.

However, Lord Steyn in Woollin was careful to limit the scope of his judgment:

“I approach the issues arising on this appeal on the basis that it does not follow that ‘intent’ necessarily has the same meaning in every context in the criminal law.”

The impact of this limitation is, of course, dependent on which of the two interpretations of Woollin, discussed above, is adopted. If, as generally accepted, Woollin is interpreted as not defining intention, but simply confirming Nedrick that the jury is “entitled to find” intention where there is foresight of a virtual certainty, then this limitation is unimportant as the Nedrick test was broadly accepted as applying to all crimes that required intention.²¹³ However, if Woollin is interpreted as laying down a definition of intention, this would mean that there is a definition of intention for the crime of murder, but for all other crimes resort would still have to be had to Nedrick.

It is, of course, possible to argue that the concept “intention” should have a chameleon-like character and change its meaning according to its context. For example, Glanville Williams has argued that “intent” should generally include foresight of a virtual certainty, but that there are three exceptions where it should bear its narrowest, purposive meaning of “direct” intent: namely, offences of causing mental stress or annoyance; certain instances of complicity; and treason.²¹⁴ Duff, on the other hand, also argues for a concept of “oblique” intention but with three different exceptions where only “direct” intention should suffice. His exceptions are attempted crimes, other “with intent” crimes where there has to be an intention to cause a result not specified in the actus reus of the crime and, finally, the doctrine of implied malice.²¹⁵

Such an approach is unacceptable. As can be seen from the divergent views of the above writers, agreement as to which crimes should require which type of intention would be impossible to secure and would only increase the uncertainty in this area of law. Further, it is difficult to see that there is any justifiable legal policy underpinning a variable meaning for “intention”. Also, such an approach would simply lead to complication and complexity. If the Woollin limitation were accepted it would mean that intention to cause grievous bodily harm for murder would be governed by Woollin but for the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.18 it would be governed by Nedrick.

Both in terms of principle and pragmatism, the concept “intention” should bear the same meaning throughout the criminal law. If it were felt that for certain crimes this fixed meaning was inappropriate, then an additional or alternative species of mens rea should be stipulated—without the concept of “intention” having to shrink or expand to meet the exigencies of all situations.

3. Evaluation

2–167

From the above discussion, it should be clear that in the wake of Woollin foresight of a virtual certainty is an alternative species of intention or, at least, an evidential precondition to a finding of intention. The implications of these two interpretations have been assessed. However, a final question remains. Should foresight of a virtual certainty suffice for intention? Is such an approach too narrow in that intention should perhaps be found to exist in a wider range of cases such as where a consequence is foreseen as probable or likely? Or, is the foresight of a virtual certainty approach too broad in that intention should be restricted to its core meaning of direct intention (aim/purpose)? It is suggested that an appropriate meaning can only be ascribed to “intention” after the following four matters have been considered.

(a) Semantic precision

2–168

There ought to be some semantic precision about the law’s use of the word “intention” so that it correlates with the layman’s perceptions of the word. Intention is an ordinary word in everyday usage. The criminal law ought to reflect the values of society and, thus, if the word “intention” is to have any useful function, it ought to bear this ordinary meaning. As Duff states:

“[T]he ‘appeal to ordinary language’ should not be despised: not just because it may cause confusion if the law uses terms whose legal and extra-legal meanings differ radically; but because the term’s ordinary usage reflects our moral understanding of its relevance to ascriptions of responsibility, and of those distinctions which we regard as morally significant. Thus if it is any part of the law’s purpose to assign legal liability in accordance with moral responsibility, there must be a presumption in favour of preserving the ordinary meanings of the concepts through which responsibility is assigned.”²¹⁶

Further, the task of the jury is made easier when legal terms are given their ordinary meanings. It was this desire to avoid confusing juries that led the Court of Appeal in the earlier case of Belfon to reject broader interpretations of intention:

“There has never been any need to explain what ‘intent’ means ... Juries do not seem to have experienced any difficulty in understanding the word ‘intent’ without further explanation.”²¹⁷

It was this reasoning that led Lord Bridge in Moloney to his view that generally juries needed no guidance as to the meaning of “intention”. It was a matter of fact to be decided by them according to the ordinary usage of the word.

On the other hand, as Lacey has suggested:

“if ordinary usage is as consistent and reliable as [the House of Lords] presumably think it is given the importance they accord to it, guidelines would be irrelevant.”²¹⁸

In short, it is not always easy to ascertain the “ordinary, everyday” meaning of words. This difficulty in assigning an “ordinary” meaning to intention is illustrated by the fact that while most commentators agree with the Oxford English Dictionary definition of “intend” as aim or design, Lord Cross in the now discredited House of Lords’ decision of Hyam considered that the “ordinary man” would equate foresight of injury with intentionally causing injury. It may well be that Lord Cross was falling into the common trap of confusing the issue of how ordinary people would describe the concept of intention with the issue of whom ordinary people would want to hold responsible for their actions. However, despite this potential problem, it seems tolerably clear that to most people the term “intend” means “aiming at” or “meaning to achieve”. The consequence must be one’s purpose, objective or goal. Even the Law Commission in an earlier draft Bill accepts that it is attributing an artificial meaning to the word intention when it defined its “standard test of intention” as being “either [to] intend or have no substantial doubt”²¹⁹ that a result will occur. Having no substantial doubt is clearly accepted as being something different from intention. As has been stated:

“Oblique intention is not really any kind of intention at all. It is a label for a different sort of mental state altogether, namely foresight or, in Model Penal Code terminology, knowledge. Calling it a species of intention is pure obfuscation.”²²⁰

Should intention be defined or simply left to the jury? It is becoming increasingly common in criminal law to leave crucial issues such as this to the jury. For instance, one of the critical concepts in theft, “dishonesty”, is largely left to jury determination. However, a concept such as “dishonesty” involves the application of standards; ethical stances have to be taken. In short, a judgment has to be made as to the morality of the defendant’s actions. The jury, as the mouthpiece of community values, is probably the most appropriate body to express such judgments. It has been argued that this is no less true of the concept “intention” and that judicial reliance on “the haven of ‘ordinary language’”²²¹ allows judges to let in through the back door ethical questions concerning the appropriateness of criminal liability “under the guise of supplementing conceptual analysis in a value-neutral way”.²²² As already seen, however, many commentators argue that the meaning to be attributed to “intention” should involve moral judgments but these are less various, and perhaps more capable of reduction to a single formula, than the never-ending range of factors affecting ethical judgments as to the meaning of a concept such as dishonesty.²²³ Accordingly, it would be preferable for “intention” to be given a legal definition, and that definition should largely reflect the ordinary meaning of the word.

(b) Capable of proof

2–170

Proponents of both the definitional and the evidential interpretation of intention often assume that foresight is easier to prove than a person’s purposes in acting (direct intention).

M. CATHLEEN KAVENY, “INFERRING INTENTION FROM FORESIGHT” [2004]
120 L.Q.R. 81, 87, 83, 82, 89, 91, 93:

2–171

“Both [approaches to intention] assume that a defendant’s foresight is simpler and easier to discern than his intent. Both assert a reliable relationship of evidential inference between foresight and intent. Finally, both maintain that the best way to pin down a defendant’s intention is to move through foresight ... [T]here is a conceptual distinction between intention and all degrees of foresight ... no degree of foresight can, by itself, be the basis of a reliable inference of intention ... An agent may foresee a given result of his action as virtually certain, but nonetheless not intend it (e.g. a chemotherapy patient with respect to hair loss); on the other hand, he may intend to achieve a result he predicts is highly unlikely to come about (e.g. a diplomat with respect to a peace treaty) ...

[W]e are concerned not with probability in the abstract, but rather with the assessment of probability by human beings ... Unfortunately, there appears to be no uniformity in the way people assess probability or even in the way they use terms pertaining to probability ...

Additional complications and possibilities for error arise because the jury’s evaluation of the defendant’s assessment of probability is both retrospective and second-hand. To what degree is their judgment about his foresight of bad consequences likely to be affected by their belief that the defendant was a bad person doing a bad thing? ... Foresight, unlike intention (which bridges the thinking, acting agent and the world), is a purely mental state. In itself, it leaves no immediate traces in the world, and is propelled by no momentum. Short of eliciting a true confession, how do we determine another person's foresight of the consequences of his action?"

(c) Distinction from recklessness

2-172

One of the main problems with the old Hyam formulation that foresight of a probable or highly probable consequence amounted to intention was that no principle could be discerned to establish the cut-off point between recklessness and intention. Foreseeing a consequence as probable or likely was intention but foreseeing it as less than probable was recklessness. Such a test involved having to define "probable" and "likely".²²⁴ While these problems are perhaps reduced after Woollin, they have not been eradicated. The boundary between intention and recklessness has simply shifted. If a consequence is foreseen as extremely likely this will presumably still amount to recklessness whereas if it is foreseen as virtually certain it can count as intention (or intention can be found). No principled basis for distinguishing between these two states of mind exists because, in both situations, the consequence is not the objective of the action. In both, it is simply a by-product of the actor's actions that is foreseen as having varying chances of occurring. The only clear basis for drawing the distinction would be to limit intention to direct intention.

(d) Moral content

2-173

The final factor to be taken into account in ascribing a meaning to the concept of intention is the most important, but also the most elusive. Is there a moral difference between foreseeing a consequence as likely, foreseeing it as virtually certain and aiming at it? If so, where should this “moral line” be drawn?

First, should intention be given a broad meaning so as to include foresight of a consequence as merely probable or likely? If there is no significant moral difference between the person who aims to achieve a consequence and the person who merely foresees that a consequence is probable, then one might be justified in describing both as intention; but if there is a moral distinction between the two, this distinction should be reflected by the law in order that different levels of liability and punishment can be imposed.

H. L. A. HART, “INTENTION AND PUNISHMENT” IN PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (1968), PP.119–122:

2–174

“[Hart cites the case of R. v Desmond, Barrett (The Times 28 April 1868) where the defendant, Barrett, dynamited a prison wall in order to effect the escape of two Irish Fenians imprisoned therein. Though the plot failed, the explosion killed some persons living nearby].

[F]or the law, a foreseen outcome is enough, even if it was unwanted by the agent, even if he thought of it as an undesirable by-product of his activities, and in Desmond’s case this is what the death of those killed by the explosion was. It was no part of Barrett’s purpose or aim to kill or injure anyone; the victims’ deaths were not a means to his end; to bring them about was not his reason or part of his reason for igniting the fuse, but he was convicted on the ground that he foresaw their death or serious injury ...

The reason [that the law should neglect the difference between direct intention and foreseeing the consequence] is, I suggest, that both the case of direct intention and that of oblique intention share one feature which any system of assigning responsibility for conduct must always regard as of crucial importance. This can be seen if we compare the actual facts of the Desmond case with a case of direct intention. Suppose Barrett shot the prison guard in order to obtain from them the keys to release the prisoners. Both in the actual Desmond case and in this imaginary variant, so far as Barrett had control over the alternative between the victims' dying or living, his choice tipped the balance; in both these cases he had control over and may be considered to have chosen the outcome, since he consciously opted for the course leading to the victims' deaths. Whether he sought to achieve this as an end or a means to his end, or merely foresaw it as an unwelcome consequence of his intervention, is irrelevant at the stage of conviction where the question of control is crucial. However, when it comes to the question of sentence and the determination of the severity of punishment it may be (though I am not at all sure that this is in fact the case) that on both a retributive and a utilitarian theory of punishment the distinction between direct and oblique intention is relevant."

2-175

This "control" test of intention is similar to the views of Lord Diplock in Hyam when he equated desiring a consequence with foreseeing that consequence as likely because "what is common to both these states of mind is willingness to produce the particular evil consequence".

Even if one accepts Hart's premise that the actor has "control" in both situations, does this necessarily mean that both states of mind must be defined as "intention", and that both deserve the same level of criminal liability? The actor who acts recklessly in merely foreseeing a remote possibility of a consequence occurring, is also "in control", but if one were to designate such actions as being intentional, one would have eliminated much of the concept of recklessness.

This view that intention should include foresight of probable consequences has been firmly rejected by English law (in Moloney and Hancock) and no longer commands serious support from commentators.

The prevailing view, both judicial and extra-judicial, is that intention should extend beyond its core meaning to include foresight of a consequence as a virtual, practical or moral certainty ("oblique intent").

GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, TEXTBOOK
OF CRIMINAL LAW, 2ND EDN (1983),

“Clearly, a person can be taken to intend a consequence that follows under his nose from what he continues to do, and the law should be the same where he is aware that a consequence in the future is the certain or practically certain result of what he does. As Lord Hailsham said in Hyam, ‘intention’ includes ‘the means as well as the end and the inseparable consequences of the end as well as the means.’ (What he evidently meant was the consequences known to the defendant to be inseparable.) ...

To take a hypothetical case: suppose that a villain of the deepest dye sends an insured parcel on an aircraft, and includes in it a time-bomb by which he intends to bring down the plane and consequently to destroy the parcel. His immediate intention is merely to collect on the insurance. He does not care whether the people on board live or die, but he knows that success in his scheme will inevitably involve their deaths as a sideeffect. On the theoretical point, common sense suggests that the notion of intention should be extended to this situation; it should not merely be regarded as a case of recklessness. A consequence should normally be taken as intended although it was not desired, if it was foreseen by the actor as the virtually certain accompaniment of what he intended. This is not the same as saying that any consequence foreseen as probable is intended ...

Clearly, one cannot confine the notion of foresight of certainty to certainty in the most absolute sense. It is a question of human certainty, or virtual certainty, or practical certainty. This is still not the same as speaking in terms of probability.”

THE LAW COMMISSION (LAW COM.
NO.177), A CRIMINAL CODE FOR
ENGLAND AND WALES,
COMMENTARY ON DRAFT CRIMINAL
CODE BILL (1989), PARAS 8.14–8.16:

“Acting in order to bring about a result is, as it were, the standard case of ‘intending’ to cause a result. But we are satisfied that a definition of ‘intention’ for criminal law purposes must refer, as Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC expressed it in Hyam to ‘the means as well as the end and the inseparable consequences of the end as well as the means.’ Where a person acts in order to achieve a particular purpose, knowing that this cannot be done without causing another result, he must be held to intend to cause that other result. The other result may be a precondition—as where D, in order to injure P, throws a brick through the window behind which he knows P to be standing; or it may be a necessary concomitant of the first result—as (to use a much quoted example) where D blows up an aeroplane in flight in order to recover on the insurance covering its cargo, knowing that the crew will inevitably be killed. D intends to break the window and he intends to kill the crew. But there is no absolute certainty in human affairs. P might fling up the window while the brick is in flight. The crew might make a miraculous escape by parachute. D’s purpose might be achieved without causing the second result—but these are only remote possibilities and D, if he contemplates them at all (which may be unlikely), must know that they are only remote possibilities. The result will occur, and D knows that it will occur, ‘in the ordinary course of events ... unless something supervenes to prevent it.’ It is, and he knows it is, ‘a virtual certainty.’ ...

A person’s awareness of any degree of probability (short of virtual certainty) that a particular result will follow from his acts ought not, we believe, to be classed as an ‘intention’ to cause that result for criminal law purposes.”

2–178

The view that foresight of a virtual certainty amounts to intention has long been embraced by law reform bodies.²²⁵

In 2005, the Law Commission published a Consultation Paper on homicide seeking views as to whether the law should adopt a definition of intention as a matter of law (the definitional approach) or whether it should set preconditions which must be satisfied before the jury may find that a person acted intentionally (the evidential approach).²²⁶ After consultation, the Law Commission concluded that the latter approach should be adopted.

LAW COMMISSION, NO.304, MURDER, MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE
(2006), PARA.3.27:

2-179

“We recommend that the existing law governing the meaning of intention is codified as follows:

- (1) A person should be taken to intend a result if he or she acts in order to bring it about.
- (2) In cases where the judge believes that justice may not be done unless an expanded understanding of intention is given, the jury should be directed as follows: an intention to bring about a result may be found if it is shown that the defendant thought that the result was a virtually certain consequence of his or her action.”

2-180

There are, however, contrary views that intention should not be expanded so as to include oblique intention. The argument here is that there are strong moral justifications for distinguishing between an actor who foresees a result as virtually certain and one who tries to achieve that result. A person’s objectives or aims influence our perceptions of her character as a moral agent. Actions become more reprehensible if they are deliberate and purposeful. A boy, throwing a ball dangerously near a window and realising that it is virtually certain that in the course of his game he could break the window, will instinctively cry out: “I didn’t mean to break it”, when the window is duly shattered. Our characterisation of the boy as a moral agent would be different if he had deliberately taken aim and thrown the ball, trying to break the window. As Duff says:

“To do what I believe will help the enemy, or cause injury, may be counted criminal even when I do it for reasons which have nothing to do with helping the enemy or causing injury: but to act with the intention of helping the enemy, or causing injury, gives a quite different moral character to the action, which we may wish to mark by making only that an offence, or by making it a more serious offence.”²²⁷

JOHN FINNIS, “INTENTION AND SIDE-EFFECTS” IN R. G. FREY AND CHRISTOPHER W. MORRIS, LIABILITY AND RESPONSIBILITY (1991), P.46:

2–181

“[I]t is well to recall how foreign to the commonsense concept of intention is the academics’ notion that what is foreseen as certain is intended.

One who hangs curtains knowing that the sunlight will make them fade does not thereby intend that they shall fade. Those who wear shoes don’t intend them to wear out. Those who fly the Atlantic foreseeing certain jetlag don’t do so with the intention to get jetlag; those who drink too heavily rarely intend the hangover they know is certain ... Indeed, we might call the academics’ extended notion of intent the Pseudo-Masochist Theory of Intention—for it holds that those who foresee that their actions will have painful effects upon themselves intend those effects.”

R. A. DUFF, INTENTION, AGENCY AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY: PHILOSOPHY OF ACTION AND THE CRIMINAL LAW (1990), PP.111–113:

2–182

“[A] non-consequentialist view ... finds an intrinsic moral difference in intended action; a significance which depends not on its expected consequences, but on the intentions which structure it ... One who tries to kill me ... attacks my life and my most basic rights; and the harm which I suffer in being murdered (or in being the victim of an attempted murder) essentially involves this wrongful attack on me. The point is not that a murder victim suffers the same (consequential) harm of death as a victim of natural causes, and also suffers the separate harm of being attacked: it is that she suffers the distinctive harm of being killed by one who attacks her life. The ‘harm’ at which the law of murder is aimed is thus not just the consequential harm of death, but the harm which is intrinsic to an attack on another’s life ... [A]n attack is an action which is intended to do harm ... It is through the intentions with which I act that I engage in the world as an agent, and relate myself most closely to the actual and potential effects of my actions; and the central or fundamental kind of wrong-doing is to direct my actions towards evil—to intend and to try to do what is evil.”²²⁸

2–183

This is the approach recommended in the US by the American Law Institute’s Model Penal Code and which has been widely adopted in state code revisions throughout the US. The Code does not adopt the view of intention favoured by the Law Commission and leading commentators in England. It adopts the narrower view that a person acts intentionally “when it is his conscious object to engage in conduct of that nature or to cause such a result”.²²⁹ What of foresight of a virtual certainty? The Model Penal Code does not assimilate this with intention, nor does it relegate it to the realms of recklessness. Instead, it has created a special category of mens rea between intention and recklessness, namely, knowledge. Section 202(2)(b) defines “knowingly” in the following terms:

“A person acts knowingly with respect to a material element of an offense when: ... (ii) if the element involves a result of his conduct, he is aware that it is practically certain that his conduct will cause such a result.”

The commentary to this sub-section recognises that the distinction drawn is a narrow one and is “no doubt inconsequential for most purposes of liability”. But apart from being conceptually necessary and helping to promote clarity of definition, the distinction does have some practical utility as:

“there are areas where the discrimination is required ... This is true in treason, for example, in so far as a purpose to aid the enemy is an ingredient of the offense ... and in attempts and conspiracy, where a true purpose to effect the criminal result is requisite for liability ... The distinction also has utility in differentiating among grades of an offense for purposes of sentence, e.g. in the case of homicide.”²³⁰

Thus, according to this view, there is a moral, as well as a linguistic, justification for drawing this fine distinction. Indeed, there are some states in the US that have employed this Model Penal Code terminology and have felt the distinction to be sufficiently material to warrant using it as the basis for a grading of homicide offences. Alaska provides that it is murder in the first degree to kill “with intent to cause the death of another person”, but only murder in the second degree to kill “knowing that the conduct is substantially certain to cause death”.²³¹ New Hampshire provides that it is first degree murder to kill “purposely” and second degree murder to kill “knowingly”.²³²

2-184

One final question remains. How should one classify cases where a consequence is foreseen as certain, as opposed to virtually certain? In these situations, the consequence is foreseen as something that must happen; it is a condition precedent to the occurrence of the actor’s primary aim.²³³ To take the classic example where I intend to shoot you; you are standing behind a glass window that cannot open. Do I intend to break the window? In this case, I foresee it as certain that I will break the glass; I cannot shoot you without doing so. This means that breaking the glass is my aim or objective, albeit only a secondary aim or objective to my main one of killing you. It is a necessary and “wanted” means to my end. I intend to break the window. Lord Hailsham in Hyam endorsed this when he spoke of:

“intention, which embraces, in addition to the end, all the necessary consequences of an action including the means to the end and any consequences intended along with the end.”²³⁴

However, where an undesired consequence is only foreseen as “virtually certain” or “morally certain” it ceases to be an inescapable consequence or a necessary means to an end. It thus ceases to be a secondary aim and should no longer be described as intention. In the celebrated example where I blow up an aircraft in flight in order to obtain the insurance money and the passengers are killed, I would foresee the death of these passengers as virtually certain. But, if it is not my object to kill them, the fact that there is a chance (albeit one in a million) that they could parachute to safety, means that their death is not a necessary means to an end and cannot be described as intention. Using Duff’s “test of failure”,²³⁵ blowing up the aeroplane without killing the occupants would not mark the failure of the enterprise, but would represent the ultimate in success. Similarly, flying across the Atlantic and not suffering jetlag would be a cause for celebration. On the other hand, failing to break the window represents a failure of the agent’s action because this necessarily involves not killing the person behind it. The line of demarcation is a thin one and would only apply in the most exceptional cases.²³⁶ Nevertheless, it is a conceptually clear distinction and provides a principled basis for distinguishing intention from recklessness. There is no intention to kill the passengers on the aeroplane, but there is an intention to break the glass.

If there are indeed linguistic, practical and moral justifications for distinguishing between intention (including the condition precedent cases) and foresight of the virtually certain, English law would surely not be justified in following the Law Commission’s proposal (whether finally accepted as a definition of intention or as an evidential proposition from which intention can be inferred) to treat both as “intention”.

E. RECKLESSNESS

1. Background

Some crimes, such as attempted offences, can only be committed intentionally and so it is crucial to be able to distinguish intention from recklessness. This line of demarcation depends, as we have just seen, on how broadly one chooses to define “intention”. Any degree of foresight less than that specified in the definition of intention will constitute recklessness. But a large number of crimes can be committed “intentionally or recklessly”. Indeed, the Draft Criminal Code 1989 proposes that recklessness should be the basic fault element for all offences (unless otherwise stated).²³⁷ For all these crimes the distinction between intention and recklessness is unimportant; what matters, instead, is the distinction between recklessness and negligence or other forms of conduct not regarded as equally blameworthy. This demarcation is vital as it has been the general policy of English law to punish reckless wrongdoing, but, with notable exceptions, to exempt negligent wrongdoing from criminal liability.

2. Law prior to G: two species of recklessness

2–186

The concept of “recklessness” has had a chequered and uncertain history with judges vacillating as to whether it meant “gross negligence”²³⁸ (an objective major deviation from the standards of the reasonable person) or whether it meant simply failing to foresee an obvious risk or whether it should be limited to cases where the defendant subjectively realised that there was a possibility of the consequence occurring (or the circumstance existing) but carried on regardless. By the beginning of the present century and until the landmark decision of G,²³⁹ however, it had become established that there were two distinct species of recklessness.

(i) Cunningham recklessness

2–187

By the late 1970s, following the leading decision of Cunningham,²⁴⁰ a subjective meaning of recklessness had been approved. Recklessness entailed the conscious running of an unjustifiable risk. The following case illustrates this approach.

R. V STEPHENSON [1979] Q.B. 695
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-188

The appellant, who had crept into a hollow in the side of a large straw stack to sleep, felt cold and lit a fire of twigs and straw inside the hollow. The stack caught fire and was damaged. He was charged with arson contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1). Evidence on his behalf was given by a consultant psychiatrist that the appellant suffered from schizophrenia that could have the effect of depriving him of the ability of a normal person to foresee or appreciate the risk of damage from the act of lighting the fire. The judge directed the jury that a person was “reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged”, within s.1(1) of the 1971 Act, if he closed his mind to the obvious fact of risk from his act, and that schizophrenia might be a reason which made a person close his mind to the obvious fact of risk. The jury returned a verdict of guilty and the appellant was convicted. He appealed against the conviction on the ground, inter alia, of a misdirection by the judge on what constituted recklessness.

GEOFFREY LANE LJ:

“Does the word ‘reckless’ require that the defendant must be proved actually to have foreseen the risk of some damage resulting from his actions and nevertheless to have run the risk (the subjective test), or is it sufficient to prove that the risk of damage resulting would have been obvious to any reasonable person in the defendant’s position (the objective test)? In our view it is the subjective test which is correct.

... A man is reckless when he carries out the deliberate act appreciating that there is a risk that damage to property may result from his act. It is however not the taking of every risk which could properly be classed as reckless. The risk must be one which it is in all the circumstances unreasonable for him to take.

Proof of the requisite knowledge in the mind of the defendant will in most cases present little difficulty. The fact that the risk of some damage would have been obvious to anyone in his right mind in the position of the defendant is not conclusive proof of the defendant's knowledge, but it may well be and in many cases doubtless will be a matter which will drive the jury to the conclusion that the defendant himself must have appreciated the risk. The fact that he may have been in a temper at the time would not normally deprive him of knowledge or foresight of the risk. If he had the necessary knowledge or foresight and his bad temper merely caused him to disregard it or put it to the back of his mind not caring whether the risk materialised, or if it merely deprived him of the self-control necessary to prevent him from taking the risk of which he was aware, then his bad temper will not avail him. This was the concept which the court in R. v Parker (Daryl) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 600 at 604 was trying to express when it used the words 'or closing his mind to the obvious fact that there is some risk of damage resulting from that act.' ... We wish to make it clear that the test remains subjective, that the knowledge or appreciation of risk of some damage must have entered the defendant's mind even though he may have suppressed it or driven it out ...

How do these pronouncements affect the present appeal? The appellant, through no fault of his own, was in a mental condition which might have prevented him from appreciating the risk which would have been obvious to any normal person. When the judge said to the jury 'there may be ... all kinds of reasons which make a man close his mind to the obvious fact—among them may be schizophrenia'—we think he was guilty of a misapprehension, albeit possibly an understandable misapprehension. The schizophrenia was on the evidence something which might have prevented the idea of danger entering the appellant's mind at all. If that was the truth of the matter, then the appellant was entitled to be acquitted. That was something which was never left clearly to the jury to decide."

Appeal allowed

2-189

Under this "subjective" approach, the definition of recklessness, both as to consequences and circumstances,²⁴¹ imposes a double test:

- (1) whether the defendant foresaw the possibility of the consequence occurring; and

(2) whether it was unjustifiable or unreasonable to take the risk.

Whether a risk is justifiable or not depends on the social importance of the acts and on the chances of the forbidden consequence occurring. As the Law Commission has stated:

“The operation of public transport, for example, is inevitably accompanied by risks of accident beyond the control of the operator, yet it is socially necessary that these risks be taken. Dangerous surgical operations must be carried out in the interests of the life and health of the patient, yet the taking of these risks is socially justifiable.”²⁴²

Thus if there is perceived to be a one in a thousand chance of high-speed trains being involved in an accident, the social value of high-speed public transport is such as to render the taking of such a remote risk justifiable, but if it is realised that there is a one in 20 chance of these trains being involved in an accident, then the chances of an accident occurring outweighs the social importance of the activity and it becomes unjustifiable to take such a risk. On the other hand, if there is the same (subjectively perceived) one in a thousand chance of killing a friend while playing Russian roulette, the complete absence of any social value attached to the activity renders the taking of the risk unjustifiable. Thus, the test involves a subtle balancing operation between the following questions: how socially useful is the activity? What are the perceived chances of the harm occurring? How serious is the harm that could occur? For example, in *Vehicle Inspectorate v Nuttall*²⁴³ it was stated that if one was dealing with conduct that could imperil the safety of the public, foresight of the slightest possibility (of a breach of contraventions) would suffice.

Whether a risk is justifiable or unreasonable is an objective issue and does not depend on the defendant's view of the matter. For example, in *Dodman*²⁴⁴ it was stated that it was irrelevant that the defendant did not know his conduct was wrongful. Of course, the question whether there is any social utility in an activity is a highly evaluative one which has led some writers to argue that the concept of recklessness is an inherently political one.²⁴⁵ This is true inasmuch as a value judgment is involved, a point that can always be made when employing a value-ridden concept such as “reasonableness”.²⁴⁶ The advantage, however, of employing such a concept and leaving it to members of the jury is that they can reflect the ever-shifting notions of social utility.

The Law Commission in the Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993²⁴⁷ has endorsed this “subjective” approach, as has the Draft Offences Against the Person Bill 1998 cl.14(2) of which provides:

“A person acts recklessly with respect to a result if he is aware of a risk that it will occur and it is unreasonable to take that risk having regard to the circumstances as he knows or believes them to be.”

(ii) Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness

2–190

In 1981, there was a radical change of direction when the House of Lords handed down two judgments on the same day, both concerned with the meaning of recklessness. It should be stressed that this change only affected the first limb of the test cited above, namely, whether the defendant must foresee the possibility of harm occurring. It did not affect the second requirement that it must be unjustifiable to take the risk.

R. V CALDWELL [1982] A.C. 341 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–191

The respondent had done some work for the owner of a hotel as the result of which he had a quarrel with the owner, got drunk and set fire to the hotel in revenge. The fire was discovered and put out before any serious damage was caused and none of the ten guests in the hotel at the time was injured. The respondent was indicted on two counts of arson under the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1) and (2). At his trial, he pleaded not guilty to the more serious charge under s.1(2) of damaging property with intent to endanger life or being reckless whether life would be endangered. He claimed that he was so drunk at the time that he thought that he might be endangering the lives of the people in the hotel had never crossed his mind. The trial judge directed the jury that drunkenness was not a defence to a charge under s.1(2) and he was convicted.

The Court of Appeal allowed his appeal. The Crown appealed to the House of Lords, where in order to decide whether drunkenness was a defence to a charge under s.1(2), the House ruled that it was necessary to decide upon the precise meaning of the term recklessness as employed in s.1(2).

LORD DIPLOCK (with whom Lord Keith and Lord Roskill concurred):

“[T]he popular or dictionary meaning is careless, regardless, or heedless, of the possible harmful consequences of one’s acts. It presupposes that if thought were given to the matter by the doer before the act was done, it would have been apparent to him that there was a real risk of its having the relevant harmful consequences; but, granted this, recklessness covers a whole range of states of mind from failing to give any thought at all to whether or not there is any risk of those harmful consequences, to recognising the existence of the risk and nevertheless deciding to ignore it ...

My Lords, the restricted meaning [adopted by] the Court of Appeal in R. v Cunningham ... called for a meticulous analysis by the jury of the thoughts that passed through the mind of the accused at or before the time he did the act that caused the damage, in order to see on which side of a narrow dividing line they fell. If it had crossed his mind that there was a risk that someone’s property might be damaged but, because his mind was affected by rage or excitement or confused by drink, he did not appreciate the seriousness of the risk or trusted that good luck would prevent its happening, this state of mind would amount to malice [a term used in the Malicious Damage Act 1861] in the restricted meaning placed upon that term by the Court of Appeal; whereas if, for any of these reasons, he did not even trouble to give his mind to the question whether there was any risk of damaging the property, this state of mind would not suffice to make him guilty of an offence under the Malicious Damage Act 1861.

Neither state of mind seems to me to be less blameworthy than the other; but if the difference between the two constituted the distinction between what does and what does not in legal theory amount to a guilty state of mind for the purposes of a statutory offence of damage to property, it would not be a practicable distinction for use in a trial by jury. The only person who knows what the accused's mental processes were, is the accused himself—and probably not even he can recall them accurately when the rage or excitement under which he acted has passed, or he has sobered up if he were under the influence of drink at the relevant time. If the accused gives evidence that because of his rage, excitement or drunkenness the risk of particular harmful consequences of his acts simply did not occur to him, a jury would find it hard to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that his true mental process was not that, but was the slightly different mental process required if one applies the restricted meaning of 'being reckless as to whether' something would happen, adopted by the Court of Appeal in R. v Cunningham.

My Lords, I can see no reason why Parliament when it decided to revise the law as to offences of damage to property should go out of its way to perpetuate fine and impracticable distinctions such as these, between one mental state and another. One would think that the sooner they were got rid of, the better ...

'Reckless' as used in the new statutory definition of the mens rea of these offences is an ordinary English word. It had not by 1971 become a term of legal art with some more limited esoteric meaning than that which it bore in ordinary speech—a meaning which surely includes not only deciding to ignore a risk of harmful consequences resulting from one's acts that one has recognised as existing, but also failing to give any thought to whether or not there is any such risk in circumstances where, if any thought were given to the matter it would be obvious that there was.

If one is attaching labels, the latter state of mind is neither more nor less 'subjective' than the first. But the label solves nothing. It is a statement of the obvious; mens rea is by definition, a state of mind of the accused himself at the time he did the physical act that constitutes the actus reus of the offence; it cannot be the mental state of some non-existent, hypothetical person.

Nevertheless, to decide whether someone has been 'reckless' as to whether harmful consequences of a particular kind will result from his act, as distinguished from his actually intending such harmful consequences to follow, does call for some consideration of how the mind of the ordinary prudent individual would have reacted to a similar situation. If there were nothing in the circumstances that ought to have drawn the attention of an ordinary prudent individual to the possibility of that kind of harmful consequence, the accused would not be described as 'reckless' in the natural meaning of that word for failing to address his mind to the possibility; nor, if the risk of the harmful consequences was so slight that the ordinary prudent individual upon due consideration of the risk would not be deterred from treating it as negligible, could the accused be described as 'reckless' in its ordinary sense if, having considered the risk, he decided to ignore it. (In this connection the gravity of the possible harmful consequences would be an important factor. To endanger life must be one of the most grave.) So to this extent, even if one ascribes to 'reckless' only the restricted meaning, adopted by the Court of Appeal in R. v Stephenson of foreseeing that a particular kind of harm might happen and yet going on to take the risk of it, it involves a test that would be described in part as 'objective' in current legal jargon. Questions of criminal liability are seldom solved by simply asking whether the test is subjective or objective.

In my opinion, a person charged with an offence under section 1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 is 'reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged' if (1) he does an act which in fact creates an obvious risk that property will be destroyed or damaged and (2) when he does the act he either has not given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or has recognised that there was some risk involved and has nonetheless gone on to do it. That would be a proper direction to the jury; cases in the Court of Appeal which held otherwise should be regarded as overruled. [His Lordship then went on to consider the defence of drunkenness.]”

2-192

LORD EDMUND-DAVIES (with whom Lord Wilberforce concurred) dissenting:

“[I]t is well known that the Criminal Damage Act 1971 was in the main the work of the Law Commission, who, in their Working Paper No.31, Codification of the Criminal Law, General Principles, The Mental Element in Crime (issued in June, 1970) defined recklessness by saying, at p.52:

‘A person is reckless if, (a) knowing that there is a risk that an event may result from his conduct or that a circumstance may exist, he takes that risk, and (b) it is unreasonable for him to take it, having regard to the degree and nature of the risk which he knows to be present.’

It was surely with this contemporaneous definition and the much respected decision of R. v Cunningham in mind that the draftsman proceeded to his task of drafting the Criminal Damage Act 1971.

It has therefore to be said that, unlike negligence, which has to be judged objectively, recklessness involves foresight of consequences, combined with an objective judgment of the reasonableness of the risk taken. And recklessness in vacuo is an incomprehensible notion. It must relate to foresight of risk of the particular kind relevant to the charge preferred, which, for the purpose of section 1(2), is the risk of endangering life and nothing other than that.

So if a defendant says of a particular risk, ‘it never crossed my mind,’ a jury could not on those words alone properly convict him of recklessness simply because they considered that the risk ought to have crossed his mind, though his words might well lead to a finding of negligence. But a defendant’s admission that he ‘closed his mind’ to a particular risk could prove fatal, for:

‘A person cannot, in any intelligible meaning of the words, close his mind to a risk unless he first realises that there is a risk; and if he realises that there is a risk, that is the end of the matter.’ See Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law (1978), p.79.

In the absence of exculpatory factors, the defendant’s state of mind is therefore all-important where recklessness is an element in the offence charged and section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 has laid down that:

‘A court or jury, in determining whether a person has committed an offence—(a) shall not be bound by law to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of those actions; but (b) shall decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances.’

My Lords, it is unnecessary to examine at length the proposition that ascertainment of the state of mind known as ‘recklessness’ is a subjective exercise ... [His Lordship then went on to consider the defence of drunkenness].”

Appeal dismissed

R. V LAWRENCE [1982] A.C. 510 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–193

The appellant was riding his motorcycle at an excessive speed along an urban road and ran into and killed a pedestrian who was crossing the road. The appellant was convicted of causing death by reckless driving, contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1972 s.1 and appealed against his conviction.

Lord Diplock (with whom Lord Fraser, Lord Roskill and Lord Bridge agreed):

“[His Lordship cited sections 1 and 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as amended by section 50(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977:

- ‘1. A person who causes the death of another person by driving a motor vehicle on a road recklessly shall be guilty of an offence.
2. A person who drives a motor vehicle on a road recklessly shall be guilty of an offence.’²⁴⁸

He then contrasted these with the ‘lesser offence’ of section 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1972:

‘If a person drives a motor vehicle on a road without due care and attention, or without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road, he shall be guilty of an offence.’]

So section 3 takes care of the kind of inattention or misjudgment to which the ordinarily careful motorist is occasionally subject without its necessarily involving any moral turpitude, although it causes inconvenience and annoyance to other users of the road ...

The context in which the word 'reckless' appears in section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 differs in two respects from the context in which the word 'recklessly' appears in sections 1 and 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as now amended. In the Criminal Damage Act 1971 the actus reus, the physical act of destroying or damaging property belonging to another, is in itself a tort. It is not something that one does regularly as part of the ordinary routine of daily life, such as driving a car or a motor cycle. So there is something out of the ordinary to call the doer's attention to what he is doing and its possible consequences, which is absent in road traffic offences. The other difference in context is that in section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 the mens rea of the offences is defined as being reckless as to whether particular harmful consequences would occur, whereas in sections 1 and 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as now amended, the possible harmful consequences of which the driver must be shown to have been heedless are left to be implied from the use of the word 'recklessly' itself. In ordinary usage 'recklessly' as descriptive of a physical act such as driving a motor vehicle which can be performed in a variety of different ways, some of them entailing danger and some of them not, refers not only to the state of mind of the doer of the act when he decides to do it but also qualifies the manner in which the act itself is performed. One does not speak of a person acting 'recklessly,' even though he has given no thought at all to the consequences of his act, unless the act is one that presents a real risk of harmful consequences which anyone acting with reasonable prudence would recognise and give heed to. So the actus reus of the offence under sections 1 and 2 is not simply driving a motor vehicle on a road, but driving it in a manner which in fact creates a real risk of harmful consequences resulting from it. Since driving in such a manner as to do no worse than create a risk of causing inconvenience or annoyance to other road users constitutes the lesser offence under section 3, the manner of driving that constitutes the actus reus of an offence under sections 1 and 2 must be worse than that; it must be such as to create a real risk of causing physical injury to someone else who happens to be using the road or damage to property more substantial than the kind of minor damage that may be caused by an error of judgment in the course of parking one's car.

I turn now to the mens rea ... Recklessness on the part of the doer of an act does presuppose that there is something in the circumstances that would have drawn the attention of an ordinary prudent individual to the possibility that his act was capable of causing the kind of serious harmful consequences that the section which creates the offence was intended to prevent, and that the risk of those harmful consequences occurring was not so slight that an ordinary prudent individual would feel justified in treating them as negligible. It is only when this is so that the doer of the act is acting 'recklessly' if before doing the act, he either fails to give any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or, having recognised that there was such risk, he nevertheless goes on to do it.

In my view, an appropriate instruction to the jury on what is meant by driving recklessly would be that they must be satisfied of two things:

First, that the defendant was in fact driving the vehicle in such a manner as to create an obvious and serious risk of causing physical injury to some other person who might happen to be using the road or of doing substantial damage to property; and

Second, that in driving in that manner the defendant did so without having given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or, having recognised that there was some risk involved, had nonetheless gone on to take it ...

If satisfied that an obvious and serious risk was created by the manner of the defendant's driving, the jury are entitled to infer that he was in one or other of the states of mind required to constitute the offence and will probably do so; but regard must be given to any explanation he gives as to his state of mind which may displace the inference."

Appeal dismissed

R. v REID (1992) 95 CR. APP. R. 391 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-194

LORD KEITH OF KINKEL:

"The precise state of mind of a person who drives in the manner indicated must in the vast majority of cases be quite incapable of ascertainment. Absence of something from a person's mind is as much part of his state of mind as its presence. Inadvertence to risk is no less a subjective state of mind than is disregard of a recognised risk."

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY:

"I think it is wise to bear in mind the possibility that words such as reckless or recklessly, which can be used in a number of different contexts, may not necessarily be expected to bear the same meaning in all statutory provisions in which they are found ... Indeed, it can be argued with force that, in many cases of failing to think, the degree of blameworthiness to be attached to the driver can be greater than that to be attached in some cases to the driver who recognised the risk and decided to disregard it. This is because the unspoken premise which seems to me to underlie Lord Diplock's statement of the law in Lawrence (and perhaps also in Caldwell) is that the defendant is engaged in an activity which he knows to be potentially dangerous."

(a) Implications of Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness

2-195

These decisions had a profound effect on English criminal law. What was the precise meaning of recklessness under this test?

1. Ruling out the risk

2-196

This Caldwell/Lawrence test of recklessness excludes from its ambit the defendant who stops to think whether there is a risk, concludes there is no risk and consequently acts. Such a person does not come within the test which requires that the actor must have either "not given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk" (because thought has been given to such a possibility) or must have "recognised that there was some risk involved" (because the possibility of there being a risk has been dismissed). Accordingly, there can be no recklessness. This has been described as a "lacuna" (a gap) in the law of recklessness.²⁴⁹ Thus if Stephenson could have established that he had contemplated the possibility of the straw stack catching fire but had dismissed the possibility (say, because of his schizophrenia) then he could not be held reckless under Lord Diplock's test. Such an actor would of course be negligent. The existence of the lacuna, as supported in the case of Shimmen,²⁵⁰ is an important feature distinguishing negligence from Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness. The defendant in that case was showing off his martial-arts skills to some friends. He aimed a kick at a plate-glass window contending that he believed he had the necessary muscular control and skill to avoid breaking the window. He did however break it and was charged with criminal damage contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1). Taylor J interpreted the defendant's state of mind as being that he was aware of the risk and took precautions which he intended to eliminate the risk, but which were plainly inadequate for this purpose. As such, the defendant's state of mind did not fall into the so-called lacuna, since he had not completely ruled out the risk. However, in deciding this, Taylor J was acknowledging that such a lacuna might exist in a case where the defendant considers the possibility of a result occurring and then comes to the conclusion that there is no risk.

The whole approach towards a lacuna is highly questionable. In Shimmen, the court was drawing an impossibly fine distinction. A defendant who rules out a risk by mistakenly concluding that there is no risk is not reckless. On the other hand, the defendant who thinks there is no risk because she is taking all steps to eliminate the risk, is reckless. Such hair-splitting distinctions, apart from lacking any solid moral foundation, can only give rise to numerous interpretive problems.

2. Creating an obvious risk

2-197

Lord Diplock stated that recklessness involved the doing of an act "which in fact creates an obvious risk" of the relevant harm occurring. What was meant by the phrase "creates an obvious risk"? Obvious to whom? To the reasonable person? Or, to the defendant? There was a strong argument that the risk must have been obvious to the defendant himself had he bothered to think about the matter.²⁵¹ Indeed, there are dicta in Caldwell that recklessness “presupposes that, if thought were given to the matter by the doer before the act was done, it would have been apparent to him”²⁵² that there were risks involved. However, there are numerous other passages in both Caldwell and Lawrence, fortified by the model direction in Caldwell, that the risk must have been obvious to the “ordinary prudent individual”. This was the view endorsed by later decisions.

ELLIOTT V C (A MINOR) (1983) 77
CR. APP. R. 103 (QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

2–198

The defendant was a 14-year-old schoolgirl, with learning difficulties. After staying out all night without sleep she poured white spirit on the carpet of a garden shed and then threw two lighted matches on the spirit. The shed was destroyed by fire. She was charged with criminal damage contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1), it being alleged that she had been reckless as to whether the shed be destroyed. The justices concluded that because of her age, lack of understanding, lack of experience and exhaustion, the risk of destroying the shed would not have been obvious to her if she had given any thought to the matter. Accordingly, they found she was not reckless and dismissed the information. The prosecutor appealed by way of case stated.

GLIDEWELL J:

“Mr Moses [counsel for the prosecution] submits that the phrase ‘creates an obvious risk’ means that the risk is one which must have been obvious to a reasonably prudent man, not necessarily to the particular defendant if he or she had given thought to it. It follows, says Mr Moses, that if the risk is one which would have been obvious to a reasonably prudent person, once it has also been proved that the particular defendant gave no thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, it is not a defence that because of limited intelligence or exhaustion she would not have appreciated the risk even if she had thought about it ...

In the light of [the authorities, viz. Caldwell, Lawrence and Miller], we are in my judgment bound to hold that the word ‘reckless’ in section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 has the meaning ascribed to it by Mr Moses.”

Appeal allowed

2–199

This approach was followed in R. (Stephen Malcolm),²⁵³ where it was held that the risk had to be obvious to an ordinary prudent person and it was not appropriate to endow such an ordinary prudent person with the characteristics of the defendant—say, age and sex.²⁵⁴ In Bell,²⁵⁵ the defendant, who had a history of mental illness, suffered a schizophrenic attack and feeling he was being driven on by an outside force which he thought was God, used his car as a “weapon to attack various targets which he regarded as evil”, namely, a Butlins holiday camp. He was held to be acting recklessly in that he had failed to foresee obvious risks. The fact that he might have been unable to foresee those risks was irrelevant; they were obvious to ordinary prudent people. Under this purely objective test the schizophrenic Stephenson would clearly have been regarded as having acted recklessly.

Such an approach was unfortunate. It is only possible to defend the Caldwell/Lawrence test of recklessness if one is dealing with an actor who is capable of improving her behaviour. We have seen that the notion of responsibility, upon which the doctrine of mens rea is premised, is based on choice. We can blame a defendant for making the wrong choice. How can we realistically blame the schizophrenics in Stephenson or Bell or the young girl in Elliott v C? They were not able to assume the responsibility we expect most people to shoulder. They “chose” to act as they did only in the most meaningless sense of the word “choice”. And, crucially, their actions did not demonstrate lack of concern; they were simply the inevitable product of their inadequacy. No civilised society should blame people for inadequacies or immaturity over which they have no control (as opposed to self-induced inadequacies such as the drunkenness in Caldwell).

3. Distinguishing Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness

Negligence is a failure to exercise such care, skill or foresight as a reasonable person would exercise in the circumstances. The test is a purely objective one. The conduct of the defendant is measured against that of an ordinary, reasonably careful person.

The Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness test was widely regarded as laying down an objective standard in that the defendant need not subjectively realise that there are risks involved. Following Elliott v C, it was only necessary that those risks be obvious to the ordinary prudent individual. This looks at first glance like a definition of negligence. However, closer inspection reveals that there was still a distinction between such recklessness and negligence for the following reasons.

First, it was tolerably clear that a defendant who considered a risk, but ruled it out, was not acting recklessly. Such a defendant may, however, be acting negligently if the reasonable person in that situation would not have so dismissed the risk.

Secondly, Lord Diplock's judgment in Lawrence indicates that something more than negligence simpliciter is required for a finding of recklessness. He insisted that an "obvious and serious risk" be established. "Serious" risk here seems to refer to the degree of likelihood of the risk materialising.²⁵⁶ There is a distinction between a risk being merely "obvious" (negligence) and being "obvious and serious" (recklessness).

Lord Diplock encapsulated this distinction in Lawrence by indicating that there must be "moral turpitude" for a finding of recklessness, while no such "moral turpitude" was necessary for the "lesser offence" of careless driving which is a crime of negligence.²⁵⁷ Crimes of recklessness are "worse" than crimes of negligence. In the former, the defendant, by failing to consider the consequences of actions (or considering them and acting regardless), manifests an attitude of indifference which is culpable. A negligent actor simply makes an "error of judgment". This distinction is intolerably difficult to draw.

4. A variable meaning

The concept of recklessness is employed in both statutory and common law offences. During the period that the law employed two tests of recklessness, a critical issue was whether recklessness bore its Cunningham or its Caldwell/Lawrence meaning.

In Seymour,²⁵⁸ the House of Lords indicated that recklessness should bear its Caldwell/Lawrence meaning throughout the criminal law, whether the offence was a statutory or a common law one. However, in Reid it was made clear that recklessness could be interpreted differently for different offences. Lord Goff said of recklessness that “as used in our law, it has more than one meaning”. Lord Browne-Wilkinson said that he did “not accept that the constituent elements of recklessness must be the same in all statutes. In particular [various] factors may lead to the word being given different meanings in different statutes”.²⁵⁹

The unfortunate result was that for some offences recklessness bore its Caldwell/Lawrence meaning but for other offences it bore its Cunningham meaning. For example, the Caldwell/Lawrence test of recklessness applied to criminal damage and was held to be applicable to several lesser-known offences.²⁶⁰ On the other hand, it had become established that the subjective Cunningham test applies to aiding and abetting offences,²⁶¹ to conspiracy to damage property being reckless as to whether life is endangered²⁶² and to false imprisonment.²⁶³ It had also become widely accepted as being applicable to the central offences against the person such as common assault and assault occasioning actual bodily harm,²⁶⁴ and as being applicable to other lesser-known offences.²⁶⁵

The result was confusion and unpredictability. The stage was thus set for the courts and/or Parliament to make a choice between the two tests.

3. Present law

As will be seen later, both tests had supporters but one thing was agreed upon: with the exception of some of the (now repealed) driving offences requiring recklessness, the two tests of recklessness should not be allowed to co-exist. The matter was brought to a head and largely resolved by the following leading House of Lords' decision. While the ratio of this decision is limited to criminal damage, it has been interpreted, as we shall see, as applying to other offences as well, resulting in the effective demise of Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness.

R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-203

Two boys, aged 11 and 12 respectively, set fire to newspapers and threw them under a wheelie-bin. The bin was set alight and adjoining buildings caught fire causing some £1 million damage. They claimed they thought the lit newspapers would burn themselves out on the concrete floor and that it never crossed their minds that there was a risk of the fire spreading. They were convicted of arson with the trial judge ruling that whether there was an obvious risk of the property being damaged was to be assessed by reference to the reasonable man and not a person endowed with the characteristics of the defendants: "the ordinary reasonable bystander is an adult". The defendants were convicted. Their appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed and they appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL:

"The task confronting the House in this appeal is, first of all, one of statutory construction: what did Parliament mean when it used the word 'reckless' in section 1(1) and (2) of the 1971 Act? In so expressing the question I mean to make it as plain as I can that I am not addressing the meaning of 'reckless' in any other statutory or common law context. In particular, but perhaps needlessly since 'recklessly' has now been banished from the lexicon of driving offences, I would wish to throw no doubt on the decisions of the House in R v Lawrence and R. v Reid ...

[Lord Bingham, along with the other two Law Lords extracted below, engaged in a detailed historical analysis and concluded that Parliament, in enacting the Criminal Damage Act 1971, intended to give effect to the Law Commission's proposals that 'reckless' bear its subjective Cunningham meaning. Caldwell was based on a 'misinterpretation' of that Act. Additionally, he put forward three other reasons to justify departing from Caldwell.]

First, it is a salutary principle that conviction of serious crime should depend on proof not simply that the defendant caused (by act or omission) an injurious result to another but that his state of mind when so acting was culpable ... The most obviously culpable state of mind is no doubt an intention to cause the injurious result, but knowing disregard of an appreciated and unacceptable risk of causing an injurious result or a deliberate closing of the mind to such risk would be readily accepted as culpable also. It is clearly blameworthy to take an obvious and significant risk of causing injury to another. But it is not clearly blameworthy to do something involving a risk of injury to another if (for reasons other than self-induced intoxication: R. v Majewski [1977] AC 443) one genuinely does not perceive the risk. Such a person may fairly be accused of stupidity or lack of imagination, but neither of those failings should expose him to conviction of serious crime or the risk of punishment.

Secondly, the present case shows, more clearly than any other reported case since R. v Caldwell, that the model direction formulated by Lord Diplock is capable of leading to obvious unfairness ... [T]he trial judge regretted the direction he (quite rightly) felt compelled to give, and it is evident that this direction offended the jury's sense of fairness. The sense of fairness of 12 representative citizens sitting as a jury (or of a smaller group of lay justices sitting as a bench of magistrates) is the bedrock on which the administration of criminal justice in this country is built. A law which runs counter to that sense must cause concern ... It is neither moral nor just to convict a defendant (least of all a child) on the strength of what someone else would have apprehended if the defendant himself had no such apprehension ...

Thirdly, I do not think the criticism of R. v Caldwell expressed by academics, judges and practitioners should be ignored ...

It is perhaps unfortunate that the question at issue in [Caldwell] fell to be answered in a case of self-induced intoxication. For one instinctively recoils from the notion that a defendant can escape the criminal consequences of his injurious conduct by drinking himself into a state where he is blind to the risk he is causing to others. In R.

v Caldwell it seems to have been assumed that the risk would have been obvious to the defendant had he been sober. Further, the context did not require the House to give close consideration to the liability of those (such as the very young and the mentally handicapped) who were not normal reasonable adults. The overruling by the majority of R. v Stephenson does however make it questionable whether such consideration would have led to a different result.

In the course of argument before the House it was suggested that the rule in R. v Caldwell might be modified, in cases involving children, by requiring comparison not with normal reasonable adults but with normal reasonable children of the same age. This is a suggestion with some attractions but it is open to four compelling objections. First, even this modification would offend the principle that conviction should depend on proving the state of mind of the individual defendant to be culpable. Second, if the rule were modified in relation to children on grounds of their immaturity it would be anomalous if it were not also modified in relation to the mentally handicapped on grounds of their limited understanding. Third, any modification along these lines would open the door to difficult and contentious argument concerning the qualities and characteristics to be taken into account for purposes of the comparison. Fourth, to adopt this modification would be to substitute one misinterpretation of section 1 for another. There is no warrant in the Act or in the travaux préparatoires which preceded it for such an interpretation.

A further refinement, advanced by Professor Glanville Williams in his article 'Recklessness Redefined' [1981] CLJ 252, 270–271 ... is that a defendant should only be regarded as having acted recklessly by virtue of his failure to give any thought to an obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged, where such risk would have been obvious to him if he had given any thought to the matter. This refinement also has attractions, although it does not meet the objection of principle and does not represent a correct interpretation of the section. It is, in my opinion, open to the further objection of over-complicating the task of the jury (or bench of justices). It is one thing to decide whether a defendant can be believed when he says that the thought of a given risk never crossed his mind. It is another, and much more speculative, task to decide whether the risk would have been obvious to him if the thought had crossed his mind. The simpler the jury's task, the more likely is its verdict to be reliable."

2-204

LORD STEYN:

"The accepted meaning of recklessness [before Caldwell] involved foresight of consequences. This subjective state of mind is to be inferred 'by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances' [citing Criminal Justice Act 1967 s.8] ... That is what Parliament intended by implementing the Law Commission proposals.

This interpretation of section 1 of the 1971 Act would fit in with the general tendency in modern times of our criminal law. The shift is towards adopting a subjective approach. It is generally necessary to look at the matter in the light of how it would have appeared to the defendant ... I regard section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, as of central importance.

[His Lordship then cited the leading decisions on mistake which have mostly adopted a subjective approach: see pp.210-214.]

That brings me to the question whether the subjective interpretation of recklessness might allow wrongdoers who ought to be convicted of serious crime to escape conviction. Experience before R. v Caldwell did not warrant such a conclusion. In any event, as Lord Edmund-Davies explained, if a defendant closes his mind to a risk he must realise that there is a risk and, on the evidence, that will usually be decisive ...

In my view the case for departing from R v Caldwell has been shown to be irresistible ... I agree with the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I have nothing to add to his observations on self-induced intoxication."

LORD ROGER OF EARLSFERRY:

"Cases of self-induced intoxication are an exception to the general rule. In our judgment the decision of the House of Lords in R. v Majewski makes it clear that they are such an exception ...

It does not follow, however, that Lord Diplock's broader concept of recklessness was undesirable in terms of legal policy. On the contrary, there is much to be said for the view that, if the law is to operate with the concept of recklessness, then it may properly treat as reckless the man who acts without even troubling to give his mind to a risk that would have been obvious to him if he had thought about it. This approach may be better suited to some offences than to others. For example, in the context of reckless driving ...

[However] I have come to share your Lordships' view that we should indeed overrule R. v Caldwell and set the law back on the track that Parliament originally intended it to follow. If Parliament now thinks it preferable for the 1971 Act to cover culpably inadvertent as well as advertent wrongdoers, it can so enact."

Appeal allowed

2-205

This unanimous decision by the House of Lords adopts the Cunningham view that recklessness involves foresight of the possibility of an unjustified risk.

Three further points emerge from the judgments. First, Lord Steyn, added that "if a defendant closes his mind to a risk he must realise that there is a risk" and so will be reckless. In Booth v CPS,²⁶⁶ the defendant ran across a road without checking whether it was safe to cross; he collided with a car, denting it. It was held that:

"aware of those risks (risk of collision and damage to property), he then deliberately put them out of his mind ... The magistrates have found that the appellant was aware of the risk and closed his mind to it ... [Accordingly], they had applied the correct test [of recklessness as laid down in G]."

Secondly, the law on self-induced intoxication (which was the context in which Caldwell was decided) is unaffected. Lord Bingham exempted self-induced intoxication stating that "one instinctively recoils from the notion that a defendant can escape the criminal consequences of his injurious conduct by drinking himself into a state where he is blind to the risk he is causing to others". The law on self-induced intoxication is discussed in Ch.4.

Thirdly, and very importantly, Lord Bingham (with whom all their Lordships agreed) restricted his judgment to the meaning of recklessness in the Criminal Damage Act 1971:

“I mean to make it as plain as I can that I am not addressing the meaning of ‘recklessness’ in any other statute or common law context.”

2–206

In particular, he approved the Lawrence meaning of recklessness adopted for offences involving reckless driving. Lord Rodger also stated that that Caldwell “may be better suited to some offences than to others. For example, in the context of reckless driving”.

However, all offences involving reckless driving have been abolished and replaced by offences requiring dangerous driving. Prior to G, Caldwell had become largely restricted to the offence of criminal damage and, as regards that offence at least, it has been overruled. However, as seen earlier, there were a few other offences, apart from criminal damage, that had employed the Caldwell test of recklessness. Technically, these decisions have not been overruled by G and Caldwell recklessness is still applicable to them. However, these are mostly obscure, little-used offences and it can be confidently predicted that for them and other such offences that fall for consideration, the new test laid down so firmly in G will be applicable. As was stated in Brady,²⁶⁷ “many of their Lordships observations [in G] have much wider application” and apply to crimes other than criminal damage. In Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 2003) the Court of Appeal stated that in G “general principles were laid down”.²⁶⁸

4. Evaluation

2–207

English law has progressed to the point where there is, for almost all offences, now only one test of recklessness. Cunningham recklessness has prevailed over Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness. However, while certainty and simplicity in this area of the law is to be welcomed, it is less clear that the House of Lords in G did in fact adopt the better test in terms of policy and principle. Most of the decision is devoted to a technical, historical examination as to the meaning intended by Parliament when it enacted the Criminal Damage Act 1971 and to judicial decisions relating to the interpretation of that Act. The only discussion of matters of policy and principle are extracted above. It is to these issues that we now turn.

The argument over the merits or otherwise of Caldwell/Lawrence is a dispute as to whether blameworthiness is dependent on cognition. Are we justified in blaming only those who realise that their actions could cause the prohibited harm? This was described earlier as “cognitive mens rea”. Or, should the law adopt what was earlier described as “normative mens rea” under which an assessment of culpability involves an evaluation of the defendant’s actions, taking into account all the circumstances including, but not limited to, the defendant’s state of mind?

Many of the arguments over which of these two approaches should be adopted have focused on whether negligence is an appropriate basis for the imposition of criminal liability and reference should be made to the next section where this issue is addressed. However, as discussed earlier, Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness was not synonymous with pure negligence. In particular, as the House of Lords in Reid emphasised, Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness still involved looking at the defendant’s attitude, motive, emotional state and capacities.²⁶⁹ Not all cases of inadvertence are regarded as involving blameworthiness. Where the inadvertence arose from drink, rage, an attitude of indifference or wilful blindness the defendant could be adjudged blameworthy and therefore reckless. But where the lack of foresight arose from some other factor over which the defendant had no control such as “some condition not involving fault on his part” (Lord Keith in Reid) there is no blame and no recklessness. Accordingly, the remainder of this section focuses on whether the House of Lords in G was right to jettison the Caldwell/Lawrence test of recklessness.

Lord Diplock’s reasoning in Caldwell and Lawrence has been described as “pathetically inadequate”,²⁷⁰ “slap-happy”, and “profoundly regrettable”.²⁷¹ The case for cognitive mens rea is that recklessness is a species of mens rea and mens rea should be based on the notion of responsibility which involves ideas of choice. The defendant has chosen to act in a certain way and that choice only becomes blameworthy if there was knowledge that the actions could cause the prohibited harm. For example, in the infamous case of *Lamb*²⁷² the defendant pointed a revolver at his best friend in jest and pulled the trigger. His friend was similarly treating the incident as a joke. The revolver had a five-chambered cylinder which, unknown to the defendant, rotated clockwise each time the trigger was pulled. There were two bullets in the chambers but, before firing, neither was in the chamber opposite the barrel. The pulling of the trigger caused the cylinder to rotate, placing a bullet opposite the barrel so that it was struck by the striking pin. The bullet was discharged killing his friend. Lamb’s defence was that he was unaware that the pulling of the trigger would bring one bullet into the firing position opposite the barrel and thus the killing was an accident. Lamb was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to three years’ imprisonment. On appeal, this conviction was quashed because of a misdirection on the law of manslaughter. However, the Court of Appeal stated that with a proper direction, Lamb would have been convicted and no criticism was made of the sentence originally imposed. Glanville Williams has written of this:

“I do not hesitate to say that I regard the sentence as outrageous, a wholly mistaken exercise of judicial discretion. Lamb was a fool, but there is no need to punish fools to that degree. There is no need to punish Lamb at all. He had killed his friend, and that was punishment enough.”²⁷³

According to this view, because there was no advertence to the possibility of the consequence occurring, blame becomes inappropriate.

However, there are opposing views supporting a broader normative approach to mens rea under which the decisions in Caldwell/Lawrence could be supported. There are two central arguments here. The first relates to the immense difficulty in proving a person's state of mind. As seen earlier, in most cases where there is no confession, juries, in drawing inferences from conduct, can do little other than apply their own standards as being the standards of ordinary people. If, in the circumstances, they think they would have foreseen a result, then, unless there is an explanation that the defendant is in some way materially different from them, for example suffering from a mental illness, they will conclude that the defendant did foresee the result.

R. A. DUFF, INTENTION, AGENCY AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY (1990), PP.120– 121:

2–209

“Our inferences from another's behaviour to his mental states cannot be based on correlations which we have observed between the behaviour of others and their mental states: for we can never directly observe the mental states of others. The only case in which we can observe correlations between external behaviour and inner mental states is our own. I am directly aware of my own mental states, and can observe correlations between them and my external behaviour and situation; these observed correlations must provide the basis of my inferences from the behaviour of others to their mental states.

This is the Argument from Analogy. I see bodies around me, which resemble mine and behave in ways similar to mine. I know that my body is connected to a mind. So I infer, by analogy with my own case, that these other bodies are also connected to minds [and have similar responses to mine to stimuli].”

2–210

The difficulties in proving a person's state of mind were an important reason behind Lord Diplock's conclusion in Caldwell that recklessness should be given a more objective meaning. He described the distinction between consciously running a risk and failing to appreciate a risk as “not being a practicable distinction for use in a trial by jury”. He stated that:

“[t]he only person who knows what the accused’s mental processes were, is the accused himself, and probably not even he can recall them accurately when the rage or excitement under which he acted has passed.”

He was not prepared to perpetuate such “fine and impracticable distinctions”.

This, taken to its logical conclusion, is the argument that, because it is unrealistic to believe that one can reliably determine the state of a person’s mind, the criminal law should not attempt to make criminal liability turn on states of mind.

The second strand to the arguments supporting the objectively-based test in Caldwell/Lawrence relates to the central question of how culpability should be established.

R. A. DUFF, “RECKLESSNESS” [1980]
CRIM.L.R.282, 289–292:

2–211

“[There is a] view that inadvertence, however negligent, cannot constitute mens rea since we cannot blame a man for what he does not know. That view has been convincingly demolished: whether I notice some aspect of my action or its context may depend on the attention I pay to what I am doing, and be thus within my control; failures of attention may be as ‘voluntary’ and culpable as other omissions ...

Some failures of attention or realisation may manifest, not mere stupidity or ‘thoughtlessness,’ but the same indifference or disregard which characterises the conscious risk-taker as reckless. If I intend to injure someone seriously, I may not realise that this might kill them: not because I am mistaken about the likely effect of my assault, but because it ‘just doesn’t occur to me’—I am blind to that aspect of my action. But such blindness to such an essential and integral aspect of a serious assault, though possible, itself manifests a ‘reckless disregard’ for my victim’s life no different from that of an assailant who knows he is endangering life ...

[M]y failure to realise this aspect of my action expresses a certain attitude to it. I do not realise it because I regard it as unimportant; my failure expresses my complete lack of concern about it. In general, the extent to which I notice or realise the various aspects of my action, its context, and its results, is a function as much of my attitudes and values as of my powers of observation and attention: to say that I forgot or did not realise something is to admit that I thought it unimportant, and thus to convict myself of a serious lack of concern for it (which is why a bridegroom would hardly mitigate his offence of missing his wedding by the plea that he forgot it). If, as I have suggested, an agent is reckless to the extent that his actions manifest a serious kind of ‘practical indifference,’ a ‘willingness’ to bring about some harm, then such recklessness, indifference, and willingness can be exhibited as much in his failure to notice obvious and important aspects of his action as in his conscious risk-taking. A man may be reckless even though, and even partly because, he does not realise the risk which is in fact an essential and significant aspect of his action.”

R. A. DUFF, INTENTION, AGENCY AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY: PHILOSOPHY
OF ACTION AND THE CRIMINAL LAW
(1990), P.172:

2-212

“[A]n appropriate general test of recklessness would be—did the agent’s conduct (including any conscious risk-taking, any failure to notice an obvious risk created by her action, and any unreasonable belief on which she acted) display a seriously culpable practical indifference to the interests which her action in fact threatened?”

2-213

Duff stresses that this is still a subjective test. What matters is the defendant’s “practical indifference”; it is subjective to her. Recklessness is not just failing to conform to an objective standard:

“for what matters is not just that, but why, the agent fails to notice an obvious risk; she is reckless only if she fails to notice it because she does not care about it.”²⁷⁴

On this basis, he rejects the conclusion in Caldwell: it cannot be established that because Caldwell failed to notice the risk to life from his actions that he was displaying reckless indifference thereto. On the other hand, the defendant in Lawrence was driving recklessly: no-one could drive in the manner in which he did unless he was utterly indifferent to the safety of others.

This approach, endorsed to some extent in Reid, presents an immediate problem. On what basis are we to decide that Lawrence displayed this practical indifference but that Caldwell did not?

ALAN NORRIE, “SUBJECTIVISM, OBJECTIVISM AND THE LIMITS OF CRIMINAL RECKLESSNESS” (1992) 12
O.J.L.S. 45, 50–52:

2–214

“This then raises the broader question of how one could tell the callous from the stupid, the negligent or the thoughtless. Is it not likely that one person’s callousness will be another person’s stupidity, negligence or thoughtlessness? [What matters] on Duff’s analysis is the attitude of the interpretive audience to the conduct on display. It is the inference which ‘we,’ the observers of the events, or the jury, draw from the facts of the case which is relevant ... [Norrie then gives the rape example of a man who makes an unreasonable mistake as to the woman’s consent to sexual intercourse. While Duff would describe this as utter practical indifference to the woman’s interests and therefore recklessness, there might be others in our ‘society characterised by male chauvinism’ who might have different views ‘about how willing women are to be forcibly seduced.’]

This is not a matter of social consensus in a sexist society. The world ought to be as Duff wants it to be but it is not. So the ‘we’ who judge callous indifference to consent to be unreasonable cannot claim that our judgment is apolitical because universal. And the attribution of responsibility on the basis of a conception of practical indifference therefore relies here upon an interpretation of behaviour and attitude that may have nothing to do with the way in which the defendant himself would explain them. It requires the reading onto, the imposition of an interpretation of, an attitude on behaviour from 'outside.' It is practical indifference as interpreted objectively by an audience, and having no necessary subjective link with the accused. The accused does not necessarily share Duff's worldview, and hence interpretation of attitudes, yet may be adjudged subjectively guilty on Duff's account. It may be right to argue politically that the law ought to promote Duff's enlightened values through the requirement of a particular moral attitude, but it should not be presented as a form of subjectivism."

2-215

There is much to be said for Norrie's criticisms. Why is Duff so confident that Lawrence did not care about the risks of his driving? Presumably, driving as he did posed severe risks to his own life and safety as well. Was he indifferent to that as well? Lord Diplock in Lawrence was clearly imposing (his own) objective standard:

"to ensure that young tearaways and others who drive cars or motor cycles disgracefully will not get off of a charge of reckless driving by saying that they were perfectly convinced that their manner of driving presented no danger, because they were so clever that they could always avoid a mishap. The object of the offence of reckless driving is to catch the driver who flagrantly disregards rules of prudence, whatever he may think about the safety of his behaviour."²⁷⁵

Nevertheless, Duff's test of "practical indifference" does offer the distinct advantage that it enables one to escape from some of the rigours of the more formally objective test as laid down in Caldwell and then subsequently applied in Elliott v C (a Minor) without having to return to a full-blooded test based on cognition. Indeed, one might not really ascertain what the defendant's true attitude was, but equally under the cognitive tests one never really establishes what the defendant foresaw. One simply draws inferences from facts and then tries to deduce what that state of mind must have been. The Caldwell/Lawrence test of recklessness (assuming the dicta in Reid, qualifying it, had been built upon) is at least asking the right questions: who can we adjudge to be reckless in the sense that they are blameworthy and deserving of punishment? Those who advert to the risks involved in their actions might²⁷⁶ well be blameworthy but there is no reason why the inquiry should stop there.

The case being made here is that the Caldwell/Lawrence concept of recklessness was right to have freed itself from the shackles of cognition and that provided that the dicta in Reid (which are not dissimilar to the ideas of Duff) had been accepted, this recklessness test should not have been abandoned by the House of Lords in G. Whether we might ever want to distinguish advertence from inadvertence in assessing appropriate levels of criminal liability or punishment is a matter to which we shall return shortly.

F. NEGLIGENCE

1. Introduction

2–216

When people cause harm accidentally, in circumstances where they are acting impeccably, they will not be blamed; indeed, they will probably get our sympathy. However, the “accident” may have been one which, with some simple care and precautions, could have been avoided. In this latter situation our tendency is now to blame the actor: “You should have been more careful”. The question is whether this moral blame should be translated into criminal liability.

The legal concept of negligence has developed to reflect this responsibility that is attributed in everyday life. The following is a classic definition of negligence:

“A person is negligent if he fails to exercise such care, skill or foresight as a reasonable man in his situation would exercise.”²⁷⁷

2. Negligence as a basis of liability

2–217

For much of the last century the law was strongly committed to subjectivism in the form of cognitive mens rea. Negligence was regarded as imposing an objective test which could not be accommodated within such an approach and, accordingly, particularly at common law, negligence was not widely utilised in the criminal law.

There were, however, notable exceptions at common law. First, there has long been a crime of careless driving (now driving without due care and attention or without reasonable consideration for other persons contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.3). Secondly, in extreme cases where death results, the law has been prepared to depart from its traditional insistence on advertence and allow liability for negligence, provided the defendant had shown such lack of care that the conduct could be regarded as extremely negligent. The law thus developed the idea that there can be degrees of negligence and that a person can be liable for manslaughter if there is gross negligence. Thirdly, for much of the last century there was a trend that mistakes in relation to certain defences had to be reasonable. For example, if a person claimed that she was acting in self-defence but in reality she was mistaken in her belief that she was under attack, the defence would only be available if the mistake were reasonable. As we shall see shortly, the courts over the past 25 years have largely abandoned this approach to mistaken beliefs in defences.

However, over the past few decades the law has tended to expand these exceptions and has started to adopt a normative theory of mens rea under which the defendant's actions in the circumstances are subjected to a broader moral assessment. From this perspective, it is legitimate to regard negligence as a species of mens rea. As seen earlier, the Sentencing Advisory Panel regards negligence as one means (along with intention, recklessness and knowledge) of establishing culpability.²⁷⁸ With the proliferation of statutory offences regulating commercial and other aspects of daily life these views have been gaining ground and have led to the creation of many new offences based on negligence: for example, insider dealing,²⁷⁹—harassment²⁸⁰ and selling firearms or ammunition to “another person whom he knows or has reasonable cause for believing to be drunk or of unsound mind”.²⁸¹ Further, as we shall see, many prima facie strict liability offences allow “due diligence” defences. If the defendant can establish that she was not negligent she will escape liability. For example, the Food Safety Act 1990 s.21 provides a defence to any person who “took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of the offence”.

2–218

Additionally, negligence as to an aspect of the actus reus has been employed for some serious criminal offences. Prior to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, rape and other sexual offences required subjective mens rea. For example, if a man honestly believed the other was consenting to intercourse he would not be guilty of rape, no matter how unreasonable that belief.²⁸² The Sexual Offences Act 2003 abandoned this subjectivist stance and substituted negligence as a new basis of liability; under the Act the defendant is liable unless he reasonably believed that the other was consenting. The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.5 introduced the new crime of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult. This offence can be committed negligently, the test being whether the defendant was, or ought to have been, aware of a significant risk of serious physical harm being caused to the deceased. The Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 s.20, has created an offence of ill-treatment or wilful neglect applicable to care-workers punishable by a maximum of five years’ imprisonment when tried at the Crown Court. No definition of “ill-treatment or wilful neglect” is provided, although presumably no further mens rea is required beyond an objective test of negligence. It is perhaps strange that the statutory provision should provide a definition of most of the terms in the offence (e.g. care worker; health care), without defining the wrongdoing that it seeks to punish.

3. Negligence and capacity

2–219

Negligence was earlier defined as failing to exercise such care, skill or foresight as a reasonable person in that situation would exercise. Rape requires that the defendant have no reasonable belief in the other's consent and the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.1(2) provides that "whether a belief is reasonable is to be determined having regard to all the circumstances". What is meant by "in that situation" and "having regard to all the circumstances"? Does this mean that the defendant's characteristics or capacities must be taken into account?²⁸³

In the following classic exposition of negligence, Hart suggested that the characteristics and capacities of the defendant should be taken into account.

H. L. A. HART, "NEGLIGENCE, MENS REA AND THE ELIMINATION OF RESPONSIBILITY" IN PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (ESSAYS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW) (1968), PP.152–157:

2–220

"What is crucial is that those whom we punish should have had, when they acted, the normal capacities, physical and mental, for doing what the law requires and abstaining from what it forbids, and a fair opportunity to exercise these capacities. Where these capacities and opportunities are absent, as they are in different ways in the varied cases of accident, mistake, paralysis, reflex action, coercion, insanity, etc., the moral protest is that it is morally wrong to punish because 'he could not have helped it' or 'he could not have done otherwise' or 'he had no real choice'. But ... there is no reason (unless we are to reject the whole business of responsibility and punishment) always to make this protest when someone who 'just didn't think' is punished for carelessness. For in some cases at least we may say 'he could have thought about what he was doing' with just as much rational confidence as one can say of any intentional wrong-doing 'he could have done otherwise'.

Of course, the law compromises with competing values over this matter of the subjective element in responsibility ...

The most important compromise which legal systems make over the subjective element consists in its adoption of what has been unhappily termed the 'objective standard'. This may lead to an individual being treated for the purposes of conviction and punishment as if he possessed capacities for control of his conduct which he did not possess, but which an ordinary or reasonable man possesses and would have exercised. The expression 'objective' and its partner 'subjective' are unhappy because, as far as negligence is concerned, they obscure the real issue. We may be tempted to say with Dr Turner that just because the negligent man does not have 'the thought of harm in his mind,' to hold him responsible for negligence is necessarily to adopt an objective standard and to abandon the 'subjective' element in responsibility. It then becomes vital to distinguish this (mistaken) thesis from the position brought about by the use of objective standards in the application of laws which make negligence criminally punishable. For, when negligence is made criminally punishable, this itself leaves open the question: whether, before we punish, both or only the first of the following two questions must be answered affirmatively.

(i) Did the accused fail to take those precautions which any reasonable man with normal capacities would in the circumstances have taken?

(ii) Could the accused, given his mental and physical capacities, have taken those precautions? ... If our conditions of liability are invariant and not flexible, i.e. if they are not adjusted to the capacities of the accused, then some individuals will be held liable for negligence though they could not have helped their failure to comply with the standard. In such cases, indeed, criminal responsibility will be made independent of any 'subjective element', since the accused could not have conformed to the required standard. But this result is nothing to do with negligence being taken as a basis for criminal liability; precisely the same result will be reached if, in considering whether a person acted intentionally, we were to attribute to him foresight of consequences which a reasonable man would have foreseen but which he did not. 'Absolute liability' results, not from the admission of the principle that one who has been grossly negligent is criminally responsible for the consequent harm even if 'he had no idea in his mind of harm to anyone,' but from the refusal in the application of this principle to consider the capacities of an individual who has fallen below the standard of care.

It is of course quite arguable that no legal system could afford to individualise the conditions of liability so far as to discover and excuse all those who could not attain the average or reasonable man's standard. It may, in practice, be impossible to do more than excuse those who suffer from gross forms of incapacity, viz. infants, or the insane, or those afflicted with recognisably inadequate powers of control over their movements, or who are clearly unable to detect, or extricate themselves, from situations in which their disability may work harm. Some confusion is, however, engendered by certain inappropriate ways of describing these excusable cases, which we are tempted to use in a system which, like our own, defines negligence in terms of what the reasonable man would do. We may find ourselves asking whether the infant, the insane, or those suffering from paralysis did all that a reasonable man would in the circumstances do, taking 'circumstances' (most queerly) to include personal qualities like being an infant, insane or paralysed. This paradoxical approach leads to many difficulties. To avoid them we need to hold apart the primary question (1) What would the reasonable man with ordinary capacities have done in these circumstances? from the second question (2), Could the accused with his capacities have done that? Reference to such factors as lunacy or disease should be made in answering only the second of these questions. This simple, and surely realistic, approach avoids difficulties which the notion of individualising the standard of care has presented for certain writers; for these difficulties are usually created by the mistaken assumption that the only way of allowing for individual incapacities is to treat them as part of the 'circumstances' in which the reasonable man is supposed to be acting. Thus Dr Glanville Williams said that if 'regard must be had to the make-up and circumstances of the particular offender, one would seem on a determinist view of conduct to be pushed to the conclusion that there is no standard of conduct at all. For if every characteristic of the individual is taken into account, including his heredity the conclusion is that he could not help doing as he did.' (The General Part (1st ed.) p.82.)

But 'determinism' presents no special difficulty here. The question is whether that individual had the capacity (inherited or not) to act otherwise than he did, and 'determinism' has no relevance to the case of one who is accused of negligence which it does not have to one accused of intentionally killing."

Judicial support for this approach can be found in the case of RSPA v C.²⁸⁴ A 15-year-old girl was charged with causing unnecessary suffering to a domestic cat contrary to the Protection of Animals Act 1911 s.1(a). In determining whether she was negligent the issue was whether her age and position in the household (her father had decided that the cat should not receive veterinary care) should be taken into account. It was held that the fact the defendant was a youth and part of her father's household was relevant in determining whether her actions were reasonable.²⁸⁵

This approach is to be welcomed. If such an approach had been adopted in the recklessness case of Elliott v C, it could well have lessened the criticism levelled at the Caldwell/Lawrence test. The Law Commission has similarly endorsed this approach in relation to gross negligence for the purposes of manslaughter stressing that it is important that:

“the grossness of negligence be made relative to someone's individual capacity to appreciate the nature and degree of risks, which may be affected by youth or disability.”²⁸⁶

However, the degree to which individual characteristics or qualities should be taken into account is brought into question in relation to regulatory offences, where an individual is expected to live up to a particular standard of care as a condition of engaging in a particular, risky activity. The obvious example of offences of negligence forming part of a regulatory regime is that of driving offences such as careless and dangerous driving. Both are offences of negligence, but of different degrees: careless driving requires that the defendant drove below the standard of driving expected of a competent and careful driver²⁸⁷; dangerous driving that the defendant's driving fell far below that standard and that it would have been obvious to a competent and careful driver that such driving was dangerous.²⁸⁸ All those who take control of a potentially lethal weapon such as a car are expected to live up to the standard of a competent and careful driver, whether she is on her first driving lesson or has 30 years of experience of driving. That this is an entirely objective test was in question following the case of Milton, in which a police officer, trained to drive at an advanced standard, argued that whilst it might be dangerous for other drivers to drive at speeds of up to twice the permitted speed limit, the fact that he was particularly skilled was a characteristic which meant that it was not dangerous for him to do so. This argument was upheld on appeal to the Divisional Court and the officer's conviction quashed, with Smith LJ arguing that to allow such circumstances to be taken into account "does not offend against the requirement that the test for dangerous driving is objective. It simply refines the objective test by reference to existing circumstances".²⁸⁹ The Court of Appeal, however, did not agree, later overruling Milton in the case of Bannister.²⁹⁰ That case had very similar facts to Milton: a police advanced driver drove at speeds of up to 113mph on a motorway in the dark and wet, and spun out of control and crashed. The defendant argued that, on the basis of Milton, he was not guilty of dangerous driving as it was relevant that he had completed an advanced training course which had enabled him to drive safely at high speed in the conditions concerned, even if it would not be safe for the ordinary competent and careful driver. The Court of Appeal overruled Milton, and held that taking into account the driving skills of a particular driver was inconsistent with the objective test set out in the Road Traffic Act. The special skill, or lack of skill, of a driver was an irrelevant circumstance when considering whether the driving was dangerous. This decision is to be welcomed; to continue with the position in Milton would allow arguments to be made by a defendant that although her driving did not meet the standard of a competent and careful driver, she should not be assessed according to that standard because of a lack of skill or experience in driving and she could not be expected to do more than her incompetent best. That would undermine the regulatory regime of driving offences put in place for the safety of all road users.

4. Should negligence be a basis for the attribution of criminal responsibility?

ROBERT P. FINE AND GARY M.

COHEN, “IS CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE A DEFENSIBLE BASIS FOR PENAL LIABILITY” (1967) 16 BUFFALO L. REV. 749, 750–752:

2–222

“[T]he question is raised as to the advisability of punishing negligent conduct with criminal sanctions. Professor Edwin Keedy responded to this question as follows:

‘If the defendant, being mistaken as to the material facts, is to be punished because his mistake is one an average man would not make, punishment will sometimes be inflicted when the criminal mind does not exist. Such a result is contrary to fundamental principles, and is plainly unjust, for a man should not be held criminal because of lack of intelligence.’ (Keedy, “Ignorance and Mistake in the Criminal Law” 22 Harv. L. Rev. 75, 84 (1908) (Emphasis added)).

This argument is persuasive, especially when considered in conjunction with the traditional concepts and goals of criminal punishment.

The concept of criminal punishment is based on one, or a combination, of four theories: deterrence, retribution, rehabilitation and incapacitation.

The deterrence theory of criminal law is based on the hypothesis that the prospective offender knows that he will be punished for any criminal activity, and, therefore, will adjust his behaviour to avoid committing a criminal act. This theory rests on the idea of ‘rational utility,’ i.e. prospective offenders will weigh the evil of the sanction against the gain of the contemplated crime. However, punishment of a negligent offender in no way implements this theory, since the negligent harm-doer is, by definition, unaware of the risk he imposes on society. It is questionable whether holding an individual criminally liable for acts the risks of which he has failed to perceive will deter him from failing to perceive in the future.

The often-criticised retributive theory of criminal law presupposes a ‘moral guilt,’ which justifies society in seeking its revenge against the offender. This 'moral guilt' is ascribed to those forms of conduct which society deems threatening to its very existence, such as murder and larceny. However, the negligent harm-doer has not actually committed this type of morally reprehensible act, but has merely made an error in judgment. This type of error is an everyday occurrence, although it may deviate from a normal standard of care. Nevertheless, such conduct does not approach the moral turpitude against which the criminal law should seek revenge. It is difficult to comprehend how retribution requires such mistakes to be criminally punished.

It is also doubtful whether the negligent offender can be rehabilitated in any way by criminal punishment. Rehabilitation presupposes a 'warped sense of values' which can be corrected. Since inadvertence, and not a deficient sense of values, has caused the 'crime', there appears to be nothing to rehabilitate.

The underlying goal of the incapacitation theory is to protect society by isolating an individual so as to prevent him from perpetrating a similar crime in the future. However, this approach is only justifiable if less stringent methods will not further the same goal of protecting society. For example, an insane individual would not be criminally incarcerated, if the less stringent means of medical treatment would afford the same societal protection. Likewise, with a criminally negligent individual, the appropriate remedy is not incarceration, but 'to exclude him from the activity in which he is a danger'.

The conclusion drawn from this analysis is that there appears to be no reasonable justification for punishing negligence as a criminal act under any of these four theories. It does not further the purposes of deterrence, retribution, rehabilitation or incapacitation; hence, there is no rational basis for the imposition of criminal liability on negligent conduct ...

In addition, Hall ("Negligent Behaviour Should be Excluded from Penal Liability" 36 Colum.L.Rev. (1963)), suggests scientific arguments for the exclusion of negligence from penal liability. One contention is that the incorporation of negligence into the penal law imposes an impossible function on judges, namely, to determine whether a person, about whom very little is known, had the competence and sensitivity to appreciate certain dangers in a particular situation when the facts plainly indicate that he did not exhibit that competence."

The opposing view is that “punishment supplies men with an additional motive to take care before acting, to use their faculties and to draw upon their experience”.²⁹¹ As Brett puts it:

“It is common knowledge that as soon as traffic police appear on the roads drivers begin to pay greater attention to what they are doing, and the standard of driving rises sharply.”²⁹²

Further, perhaps those who fail to consider the obvious consequences of their actions reveal their dangerousness and need incapacitation (say, having their driving licence removed) and rehabilitation.

However, many of the arguments in favour of negligence as a basis for the imposition of criminal liability have not concentrated on such utilitarian considerations, but have stressed that judgments of blameworthiness should not be limited to cases where the defendant realises that harm could occur. Even accepting the premise of responsibility involving the notion of choice, we can blame those who make choices of which we disapprove. We can blame Lamb²⁹³ for acting as he did in total disregard of an obvious and serious risk. In the context of recklessness, Lord Diplock in Caldwell regarded non-advertence as no less blameworthy than advertence. Lord Goff in Reid went further and said that:

“it can be argued with force that, in many cases of failing to think, the degree of blameworthiness to be attached to the driver can be greater than that to be attached in some cases to the driver who recognized the risk and decided to disregard it.”²⁹⁴

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, “THE THEORY OF CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE:
A COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS” (1971)
119 U. PA. L. REV. 401, 415–418:

“At first blush it seems odd that anyone would argue that negligence is not an appropriate ground for censuring the conduct of another ... In daily conduct, we all confidently blame others who fail to advert to significant risks. If we confront a motorist driving without his lights on and thereby endangering the lives of many others, we would hardly condition our condemnation of his conduct on whether he knew his lights were off. His failure to find out whether his lights were on or off would itself be a basis for condemning him.²⁹⁵ Yet theorists have repeatedly argued that this judicial practice is primitive and that, as a matter of principle, an actor must choose to do harm in order to be culpable and fairly subject to penal sanctions. Jerome Hall has vigorously advanced this view ... [T]he proponents of punishing negligence have relied upon the same reply: the culpability of negligence is not the culpability of choice, but rather of failing to bring to bear one’s faculties to perceive the risks that one is taking ... The battleground of one segment of the literature is the role of culpability in justifying criminal sanctions. Jerome Hall argues, for example, that ‘in the long history of ethics voluntary harm-doing is the essence of (culpability).’ From this premise he reasons that negligence is involuntary, and that therefore it is unjust to punish negligent risk-taking. The question Hall raises is the right one. We do wish to know whether it is just to punish the negligent actor. It is not enough to show that punishing negligence has a deterrent impact on other potential risk-creators, for the goal of deterrence, however sound, does not speak to the fairness of forcing the specific defendant to be the object of exemplary sanctioning. Yet the issue of fairness to the defendant is not resolved by positing that negligence is not voluntary and therefore not culpable. Surely, the negligent actor, like the intentional actor, has the capacity of doing otherwise; he could have brought to bear his faculties to perceive and to avoid the risk he created. That is all we typically require to label conduct as voluntary ...

With the idea of forfeiture in the foreground, culpability functions as the touchstone of the question whether by virtue of his illegal conduct, the violator has lost his moral standing to complain of being subjected to sanctions. If his illegal conduct is unexcused, if he had a fair chance of avoiding the violation and did not, we are inclined to regard the state’s imposing a sanction as justified. The defendant’s failure to exercise a responsibility shared by all, be it a responsibility to avoid intentional violations or to avoid creating substantial and unjustified risks, provides a warrant for the state’s intrusion upon his autonomy as an individual. From the viewpoint of culpability as a standard of moral forfeiture, it seems fair and consistent to regard negligence as culpable and to subject the negligent offender to criminal sanctions.”

5. Conclusion

2-225

There are deep tensions within English criminal law. On the one hand, much of the judiciary is deeply committed to subjectivism. For them, mens rea means cognitive mens rea. These views were strongly expressed in G and in a series of House of Lords’ decisions dealing with mistake.²⁹⁶ The Law Commission has also traditionally adopted this subjectivist stance. The Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989, for example, makes no mention of negligence, stating that recklessness should be the core fault element for every offence unless specifically otherwise provided.²⁹⁷

On the other hand, there is no denying that, at least for statutory offences, there is growing reliance on the concept of negligence. With the notable exception of gross negligence manslaughter, much of this increase has related to lesser offences. However, with rape and the other sexual offences and the offence of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult now added to the list of crimes that can be committed negligently, the door to further utilisation of the concept has been thrown open.

G. LEVELS OF CULPABILITY

2-226

An important final point needs consideration. Assuming defendants who act with non-advertent recklessness (the now overruled Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness) or negligence are to be blamed and punished for the harms they cause, are they as blameworthy as those who might have caused the same harms intentionally or with subjective foresight of the risks they were running? If not, should the law reflect the differences in culpability by imposing different levels of liability and/or punishment? Should the law reflect the view that:

“to break your Ming china, deliberately or intentionally, is worse than to knock it over while waltzing wildly round the room and not thinking of what might get knocked over?”²⁹⁸

Further, is it worse to break your Ming china while waltzing round the room realising that you might knock it over than when you have no such realisation?

A. KENNY, FREEWILL AND RESPONSIBILITY (1978), PP.85–92:

2–227

“In the same way as the justification of the general requirement of mens rea flows from the nature of punishment and the nature of practical reasoning, so the justification of distinguishing between different degrees of mens rea arises from the different degrees of proximity to the actuality or possibility of practical reasoning in particular criminal behaviour. The same act, when performed negligently, may be punished less severely than when performed knowingly, and the same act when performed recklessly may be punished less severely than when performed intentionally. We must ask why this is so, and whether it should be so ...

No doubt almost everyone would regard a reckless killer as more wicked than an inadvertent killer; but the law’s principal concern is the prevention of harm, and the harm done by either killer is identical. Should not the penalty too be identical? No: for the point at which the threat of punishment is intended to be brought to bear upon practical reasoning is different in the two cases. The threat of punishment for negligence is meant to enforce at all times a standard of care to ensure that one’s actions do not endanger life: the threat of punishment for recklessness is meant to operate at the specific points at which one is contemplating a course of action known to be life-endangering. The actions, therefore, on which the threat of punishment for negligence is brought to bear are less dangerous than those on which the threat of punishment for recklessness is brought to bear: for in general actions which, for all one knows, may be dangerous are less dangerous than actions which one positively knows to be a risk to life. Hence the more severe threat of punishment is held out to the citizen contemplating the more dangerous action.

“Just as actions known to be likely to cause death are in general more dangerous than those not known to be so likely, so actions done with the intention of causing death are in general more dangerous than those merely foreseen as likely to cause death. (The latter, for instance, unlike the former, are compatible with the taking of precautions against the causing of death.) This perhaps offers a reason for punishing intentional homicide more severely than reckless homicide, just as reckless homicide is punished more severely than negligent homicide ...

Thus we have seen the rationale, on the deterrent theory of punishment, for the discriminations made in law between the different forms of mens rea from negligence, recklessness and basic intent up to specific intent. It may well be thought that the theory behind such discriminations presupposes a coolness in calculation and a competence in the theory of games which it is unrealistic to impute to the average citizen tempted to commit a crime. On the other hand, it is surely not a mere accident that the gradations of severity in punishment which a comparatively recondite application of the theory of deterrence suggests should correspond in such large measure with the intuitions of moral common sense about the comparative wickedness of frames of mind.

In practice, of course, the deterrent effect of the law operates unevenly and erratically. The elaborate efforts of lawyers and academics to sort offences into precise categories and to fit crimes to punishment on impeccable theoretical grounds may well strike a layman as resembling an attempt to make a town clock accurate to a millisecond in a community most of whom are too short-sighted to see the clock-face, too deaf to hear the hours ring, and many of whom set no great store on punctuality in any case.”

2-228

Do such utilitarian arguments adequately explain why we distinguish between different levels of culpability and reflect this by different punishments for each?

JAMES B. BRADY, “RECKLESSNESS, NEGLIGENCE, INDIFFERENCE AND AWARENESS” (1980) 43 M.L.R. 381,

What is the justification for the decreasing culpability attaching to intentional, reckless and negligent conduct? ... First of all, I do not believe that an utilitarian rationale concerning the purpose of punishment will suffice. For example, it has been argued that the culpability distinction between intentional action and recklessness may be justified since there is a greater likelihood that an intentional action will result in harm. If the purpose of punishment is the prevention of harm, the argument goes, the degree of seriousness of the offence should be proportionate to the degree of dangerousness. On this theory we punish the intentional offender more because (a) a more severe penalty may be necessary to deter a person from accomplishing a result that is his aim or purpose than to deter one who acts knowing that there is a risk but whose purpose is not to bring about that result, and (b) the intentional offender may require a longer sentence, for purpose of reform or special deterrence, than the reckless or negligent offender ... [T]hese arguments from an utilitarian rationale are not persuasive in general. For example, considering the class of negligent or reckless offenders as contrasted with the class of intentional offenders there seems to be no reason to believe that the former pose less of a continuing threat of harm than the latter. If the degree of seriousness of the offence were only dictated by utilitarian reasons, negligence might well be viewed as more serious, in light of the greater number of negligent harms in comparison to intentional harms, and might in special cases require more punishment for purposes of general or special deterrence than intentional offences require.

These distinctions between different modes are to be viewed as distinctions of culpability in the strict sense. If they are justified at all, they are justified because they mark moral distinctions. The strongest argument is that unless the law is to treat morally disparate cases alike the law should reflect these distinctions ...

There does not seem to be any single criterion which fully captures our intuitions concerning degrees of culpability. One might argue, for example, that the distinctions could be maintained on the basis of the degree of voluntariness of the action. The reason that negligence, where the agent is unaware of the risk, is less blameworthy than recklessness is that negligent conduct is less voluntary than reckless conduct. But this will not explain the distinction between intentional and reckless conduct. Since in reckless conduct the agent is aware of the risk, it would seem that in both reckless and intentional action the agent has the choice of forbearing from his action. From a consideration of control of conduct, therefore, reckless conduct seems to be as voluntary as intentional conduct.

Suppose that we consider another theory, that it is the factor of likelihood to cause harm which is the criterion of blame. This is a different theory than the one discussed earlier which attempts to explain these distinctions on utilitarian grounds relating to a greater degree of likelihood of harm. The argument here is that the greater likelihood of harm marks a moral distinction and that one who engages in conduct which is more likely to cause harm is more culpable than one who engages in conduct with a lesser chance of harm. Under this theory the reason that intentional conduct is more culpable than recklessness causing the same harm is that harm is judged more likely to occur if that is the purpose of one's action than if it is the merely foreseen consequence of one's action.

To a certain extent this factor might explain some of the distinctions in culpability. It seems to be part of the reason, for example, for one who hopes that the harm will not occur, is more blameworthy than one who 'doesn't care one way or the other' in regard to a less likely risk. In this case 'hoping not' is not a mitigating factor because of the greater likelihood of the harm occurring.

But while the likelihood of harm is an important factor, it cannot explain other distinctions. For example, a person who causes harm with the desire of bringing about that harm is thought more culpable, even where the chance of his succeeding was slight, than a person who causes harm by recklessly taking a substantial risk. This cannot, of course, be explained on the grounds of likelihood of harm since the likelihood where the person intentionally takes a 'long shot' is less than where the person acts recklessly in regard to a likely risk. And in cases regarding the same risk, the person's hopes that the harm will not occur does reduce culpability in comparison with one who does not care at all. Again, the difference in degree cannot be explained on the basis of greater likelihood of harm since the risk is the same. Similarly, this theory evidently cannot explain the distinctions between negligent and reckless conduct involving the same risk of harm since, of course, the likelihood of harm is the same. Why then do we blame the reckless agent more? Here the answer seems to be that recklessness manifests a trait of the person that is not present to the same degree in negligence. The person who realises the risk would not have acted unless he was indifferent, in the broad sense, to the interests of others. We properly blame him more, since he is more indifferent. And the person who hopes that harm will not occur is less indifferent, in regard to the same risk, than one who does not care at all. Though again in some cases involving different degrees of risk ‘hoping not’ does not show a lesser degree of indifference.”

2–230

Alternatively, there might be a different way of assessing whether an objective or subjective test of blameworthiness is appropriate, depending on the context in which the offence is committed.

SALLY CUNNINGHAM, “RECKLESSNESS: BEING RECKLESS AND ACTING RECKLESSLY” (2010) 21
KINGS LAW JOURNAL 445, 457–460:

2–231

“The key to the mistakes made by the courts is that they tried to find a definition of recklessness to apply to both conduct crimes and result crimes. Reckless driving is a conduct crime. It does not require any concrete harm to have been caused by the blameworthy conduct of the offender, since it exists to punish those who take risks and to regulate the dangerous activity of driving. Non-aggravated criminal damage [under s.1(1) Criminal Damage Act 1971] and offences against the person such as assault are result crimes which require a specific harm to have been caused as part of the actus reus of the offence. These two different types of crimes should have been dealt with in entirely different ways by the courts, given their different natures.

This distinction was recognised by some of ... the [relevant] cases ... In Murphy [1980] Q.B. 434 the distinction was made between ‘reckless’ as an adjective describing an attitude towards certain possible consequences (result crime), and ‘recklessly’ as an adverb governing the accused’s conduct (conduct crime). In each case the word ‘reckless’ or ‘recklessly’ is doing a different job, and so it makes sense that it should carry a different meaning. In one, ‘recklessness’ is describing a state of mind, whilst in the other it relates to the quality of D’s act.

A similar argument was made in Lawrence. Counsel for the Crown contended that there are three basic categories of recklessness:

- (a) Recklessness as to circumstance (‘conduct crimes’)
- (b) Recklessness as to consequences (‘result crimes’) and
- (c) Recklessness as defined by statute in relation to a particular situation. (at p.514)

Reckless driving falls within the first category (a), whilst non-aggravated criminal damage is an example of the second category (b). It would therefore be consistent to have two different tests such as those given in Murphy and Stephenson for different offences. In giving his judgment in Lawrence Lord Diplock did admit that there was a difference between the context in which the word ‘reckless’ was used in relation to driving and in relation to criminal damage as the Crown had suggested, ...

2-232

The distinction between the adjective ‘reckless’ and the adverb ‘recklessly’ can be seen in the drafting of relevant legislation. Section 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, prior to amendment by the Road Traffic Act 1991, stated that: ‘a person who drives a motor vehicle on a road recklessly is guilty of an offence.’ This uses recklessly as an adverb in describing how a particular type of conduct which is normally lawful, can be proscribed if a person goes about the activity in a particular way. Section 1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 requires that D destroy or damage property belonging to another intending to do so or ‘being reckless’ as to doing so. ‘Reckless’ describes D’s state of mind when causing a proscribed harm, as an alternative to the state of mind of intention.

...

Examples of conduct crimes (reckless driving, child neglect, rape, aggravated criminal damage) all involve the creation of risks. But all of these activities are in themselves hazardous occupations if not carried out with care. The underlying risk is always present, in that: driving is inherently dangerous; caring for a child can easily end in tragedy if sufficient attention is not paid to the child's needs; there is the possibility of interfering with another individual's autonomy; damage to property can easily create danger of at least injury to others. Psychologists suggest that there is a fundamental distinction between 'risk and hazard'.

“Risk” (in any sense) is a measure of a subjective process. “Hazard” is a measure of what actually happens independently of any subjective considerations. Strictly speaking, no individual is in a position to compare, in advance of any enterprise, the risk he is taking with the hazard the undertaking involves. The individual can only compare his risk (i.e. his expected success or failure) with his impression or guess of the hazard, or with past hazards.’ (Cohen and Christensen, Information and Choice, (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd), 1970), p.101.)

If someone is engaging in hazardous conduct where the potential for risk exists, the question of whether she has foreseen that a risk might materialise is not relevant. The salient point is that she must take care in engaging in the activity to try to minimise the possibility of the potential risk occurring. If she fails to take sufficient care, creating a risk from a hazardous situation, she becomes blameworthy, whether or not she adverts to the risk. She has carried out the hazardous activity in a reckless manner if she fails to take care, thereby creating a risk which should have been avoided.

An objective test of mens rea is appropriate in relation to conduct crimes, because D is partaking in a dangerous activity and so should pay attention to the risks and is blameworthy if she does not. D ought to make her knowledge of a risk ‘explicit’, to use another term employed by Duff, by making herself alert to the potential risks involved in the activity and calling her latent knowledge to mind. If she fails to do so she is blameworthy and should attract criminal condemnation. On the other hand, in relation to result crimes we start from the position that a particular proscribed harm has been caused and need to work our way back from there in order to determine whether D's state of mind is sufficiently blameworthy in relation to that harm in order to attract criminal liability. A different test is appropriate to that employed in relation to conduct crimes.”

Under this analysis, some offence definitions would need redrafting to properly reflect the species of mens rea required, and to perhaps use terms such as “negligently” rather than “recklessly” where an objective test is appropriate. Indeed, it may be that we should start to use a more varied selection of mens rea terms, rather than trying to stretch the traditional terms to fit what is needed.

FINDLAY STARK, “IT’S ONLY WORDS: ON MEANING AND MENS REA” (2013)
72(1) C.L.J. 155, 170–172:

“It has been argued that, if the criminal law is to live up to its communicative ideal, citizens must be able to understand (normatively and semantically) and use the language of wrongdoing and liability adopted by the courts and the legislature in planning their conduct. Similarly, if the discretion accorded to criminal justice actors is to be controlled adequately, the criminal law’s mens rea terms should be defined clearly and consistently.

But what are the courts and the legislature to do if they accept the argument from communication made here, yet want to ensure that the law can react appropriately to the competing principles and policies which affect different areas of the criminal law? ... Tadros suggests that the courts may, in interpreting terms such as intention, be conservative and not seek to make generalisations which might damage some parts of the law. This approach results, however, in the courts using a small number of mens rea terms in different ways and leads to the potential confusion pointed to above. A better solution, it is submitted, would be to expand the range of mens rea terms presently utilised in the criminal law, and ensure that, when they were used, these words are defined consistently across offences ...

Consider again the definition of intention. Sometimes there does not seem to be a significant moral difference between meaning to bring about a certain result (for instance, death) and failing to be motivated sufficiently by the realisation that it is virtually certain that, if the defendant proceeds with his plan, that result will be brought about. It might be argued that the law would be missing something morally significant if it defined murder as only desired and purposeful killings. Therefore, foresight of a virtual certainty might be treated, for the law of murder, as being sufficient mens rea to secure culpability. This is the position at present in English law (with the added complication that nobody is sure if foresight of a virtual certainty is intention, or just something morally equivalent to it).

Rather than doing what the English courts have up until now done, however, and simply expanding the concept of intention in this area to include foresight of a virtual certainty, it would be more conducive to clarity if the mens rea of murder were expressed in terms of an intention to kill (or cause grievous bodily harm) or foresight of virtual certainty that death (or grievous bodily harm) would result from the defendant's action. 'Foresight of virtual certainty' could be conceived of as a separate category of mens rea from intention ... It is unacceptable, because it makes inaccessible the message (and undermines the communicative enterprise) of the criminal law, to be conservative in the way that the English courts have been and, as a result, use the same words in different ways in different contexts. The courts should thus refuse to do so, and should define mens rea terms in a uniform fashion wherever they are encountered.

The benefit of using different terms, rather than different definitions, is obvious. It would avoid the need for the courts to decide when intention ought to include foresight and when it ought not to. This decision would be left to Parliament in drafting an offence ... Intention would mean, if foresight of virtual certainty were separated from it, meaning to bring about a certain result—a definition that coheres sufficiently with the 'everyday' understanding of that term that it could be utilised effectively by citizens in planning or arguing about their conduct. It would also be clear to citizens what 'foresight of virtual certainty' means, and it would not be difficult to explain to them that, where foresight of virtual certainty is viewed as being sufficiently culpable to constitute mens rea then the definition of the crime is satisfied. Plans could be made fairly, on this basis, to avoid liability."

the courts in interpreting recklessness, and that they have put forward different interpretations of the word in order to “do justice” in a particular case. However, he submits that it would have been preferable for the courts to stick to a uniform definition of mens rea terms and require Parliamentary intervention to ameliorate the position. This is eventually what occurred in relation to the mens rea of rape, with the Sexual Offences Act 2003 being passed to ensure that an appropriately objective test is used in relation to belief in consent. Beyond rape, however, that leaves the legislature with a huge amount of work to do in redrafting offences to ensure that appropriate mens rea terms are used, a process which Stark recognises is extremely unlikely to happen. Despite this practical hurdle, the argument that the courts should make the difficulties faced by using current mens rea terms a more immediate problem for Parliament by refusing to stretch them to fit the requirements of a case “so that a more sensible debate over criminal fault can commence” has much to merit it.

IV. Relationship of Mens Rea to Actus Reus

A. INTRODUCTION

2–236

A general rule of the criminal law is that mens rea must exist in relation to the actus reus. Bearing in mind that an actus reus can consist of:

- (1) an act;
- (2) committed in certain specified circumstances; and
- (3) leading to the prohibited consequence.

Mens rea should exist in relation to each of these separate elements. However, it does not necessarily follow that the same degree of mens rea is required in relation to each. Thus, the crime of attempt, for example, could require (1) an intentional act; (2) recklessness as to surrounding circumstances; and (3) an intention to bring about the forbidden consequences. But whatever the level of mens rea, it must exist “in relation to” the actus reus, or, to put it another way, the actus reus must be attributable to the mens rea. In order to understand this rule it is necessary to investigate two “principles” that are well established in criminal law, and to consider the problem of mistake.

B. COINCIDENCE OF ACTUS REUS AND MENS REA

2–237

In the Rhodesian case of *Shorty*²⁹⁹ the defendant violently assaulted the deceased with intent to kill him. The defendant, genuinely believing the victim to be dead, attempted to dispose of the “body” by putting it down a sewer. The deceased was in fact still alive at the time but died of drowning in the sewer. The court ruled that these actions must be divided into:

- (1) the assault which did not cause death—this was accompanied by an intent to kill; and
- (2) the actus reus of murder (placing the “body” in a sewer with resultant drowning)—but this was not accompanied by mens rea at this stage.

Because the actus reus of murder did not coincide with the mens rea thereof, the defendant could not be convicted of murder. He was convicted only of attempted murder (stage 1), the actus reus of which did coincide with the requisite mens rea.

Is such a result realistic? The defendant intended to kill his victim; he did kill him. Should his mistake as to the method and time of death affect his liability?

THABO MELI V R. [1954] 1 ALL E.R. 373 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

2–238

The appellants, in accordance with a pre-arranged plan, took a man to a hut, gave him beer so that he was partially intoxicated and then struck him over the head. Believing him to be dead, they took his body and rolled it over a low cliff, making the scene look like an accident. In fact, the man was not dead, but died of exposure when unconscious at the foot of the cliff.

LORD REID:

“The point of law which was raised in this case can be simply stated. It is said that two acts were done:—first, the attack in the hut; and, secondly, the placing of the body outside afterwards—and that they were separate acts. It is said that, while the first act was accompanied by mens rea, it was not the cause of death; but that the second act, while it was the cause of death, was not accompanied by mens rea; and on that ground, it is said that the accused are not guilty of murder, though they may have been guilty of culpable homicide. It is said that the mens rea necessary to establish murder is an intention to kill, and that there could be no intention to kill when the accused thought that the man was already dead, so their original intention to kill had ceased before they did the act which caused the man’s death. It appears to their Lordships impossible to divide up what was really one series of acts in this way. There is no doubt that the accused set out to do all these acts in order to achieve their plan, and as parts of their plan; and it is much too refined a ground of judgment to say that, because they were under a misapprehension at one stage and thought that their guilty purpose had been achieved before, in fact, it was achieved, therefore they are to escape the penalties of the law ... Their crime is not reduced from murder to a lesser crime merely because the accused were under some misapprehension for a time during the completion of their criminal plot.”

Appeal dismissed

2-239

Dealing with a similar situation (except there was no preconceived plan) in Church,³⁰⁰ it was stated that the jury should have been told they could convict of murder “if they regarded the appellant’s behaviour from the moment he first struck her to the moment when he threw her into the river as a series of acts designed to cause death or grievous bodily harm”.³⁰¹

R. V LE BRUN (1992) 94 CR. APP. R.

101 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2-240

The defendant hit his wife on the chin knocking her unconscious. While trying to drag her body away (probably to avoid detection) he dropped her causing her to fracture her skull and die. He was convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

LORD LANE CJ:

“[After citing Church with approval his Lordship continued]

It seems to us that where the unlawful application of force and the eventual act causing death are parts of the same sequence of events, the same transaction, the fact that there is an appreciable interval of time between the two does not serve to exonerate the defendant from liability. That is certainly so where the appellant’s subsequent actions which caused death, after the initial unlawful blow, are designed to conceal his commission of the original unlawful assault.

It would be possible to express the problem as one of causation. The original unlawful blow to the chin was a causa sine qua of the later actus reus. It was the opening event in a series which was to culminate in death: the first link in the chain of causation, to use another metaphor. It cannot be said that the actions of the appellant in dragging the victim away with the intention of evading liability broke the chain which linked the initial blow with the death.

In short, in circumstances such as the present ... the act which causes death and the necessary mental state to constitute manslaughter need not coincide in point of time ...

[The trial judge had drawn a correct distinction] between actions by the appellant which were designed to help his wife and actions which were not so designed: on the one hand that would be a way in which the prosecution could establish the connection if he was not trying to assist his wife; on the other hand if he was trying to assist his wife, the chain of causation would have been broken and the nexus between the two halves of the prosecution case would not exist.”

Ashworth argues that these decisions “take a rather elastic view of the contemporaneity principle, and seem to be motivated by considerations akin to constructive liability”.³⁰² However, in all the above cases the so-called problem of a “coincidence of actus reus and mens rea” is illusory. In each case, the defendant’s actions caused the ultimate death (that is, the chain of causation was not broken); the defendant was held liable for either murder or manslaughter³⁰³ depending on the mens rea present at the time of the original assault.

This approach was confirmed by the House of Lords in Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 1994) where Lord Mustill stated:

“The existence of an interval of time between the doing of an act by the defendant with the necessary wrongful intent and its impact on the victim in a manner which leads to death does not in itself prevent the intent, the act and the death from together amounting to murder, so long as there is an unbroken causal connection between the act and the death.”³⁰⁴

Lord Hope added that:

“the act which caused the death and the mental state which is needed to constitute manslaughter need not coincide in point of time ... [as long as] the original unlawful and dangerous act, to which the required mental state is related, and the eventual death of the victim are both part of the same sequence of events.”³⁰⁵

It has been suggested that this causation analysis will not apply and that the “continuing actus reus” doctrine will still be necessary in cases where the second event is the overwhelming cause of death and breaks the chain of causation³⁰⁶—for example, if the wife in Le Brun had been dropped by a Good Samaritan trying to take her to hospital.³⁰⁷ The short answer to this is that if the second event is so overwhelming as to break the causal chain, it would not be regarded as part of the same “series of acts” (Church) or “same sequence of events” (Le Brun). The continuing actus reus principle would not apply.

2-242

In such cases where there are two separate incidents which cannot be conflated into a continuous act or the “same sequence of events”, the jury must be unanimous as to which of the acts forms the basis of the defendant’s liability.³⁰⁸ In Boreman,³⁰⁹ the defendant seriously assaulted the victim (with the mens rea of murder) and later (perhaps accidentally) started a fire at the victim’s flat. The victim died but the medical evidence was divided as to the cause of death. It was held that:

“where the two possible means by which the killing is effected comprise completely different acts, happening at different times, it can properly be said that the jury ought to be unanimous on which act leads them to the decision to convict.”

However, the appeal was dismissed on the ground that the jury must have been satisfied that the injuries were an operating cause of death.

There are other “coincidence cases” where the initial act is not accompanied by mens rea but the defendant forms mens rea at a later stage in the sequence of events.

FAGAN V METROPOLITAN POLICE COMMISSIONER [1969] 1 Q.B. 439
(QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

2-243

The appellant was told by a police officer to park his car in an exact position against the kerb. He drove the vehicle forward and stopped with its front off-side wheel on the constable’s left foot. When told to reverse off, the appellant replied, “Fuck you, you can wait”, and turned off the ignition. After several further requests, the appellant reversed the vehicle off the constable’s foot. He was convicted of assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty. On appeal, he claimed that the initial driving on to the foot was unintentional and therefore not an assault, and that his refusal to drive off was not an “act” capable of amounting to an assault.

JAMES J:

“We think that the crucial question is whether, in this case, the act of the appellant can be said to be complete and spent at the moment of time when the car wheel came to rest on the foot, or whether his act is to be regarded as a continuing act operating until the wheel was removed. In our judgment, a distinction is to be drawn between acts which are complete—though results may continue to flow—and those acts which are continuing ... For an assault to be committed, both the elements of actus reus and mens rea must be present at the same time ... It is not necessary that mens rea should be present at the inception of the actus reus, it can be superimposed on an existing act. On the other hand, the subsequent inception of mens rea cannot convert an act which has been completed without mens rea into an assault ...

There was an act constituting a battery which at its inception was not criminal because there was no element of intention, but which became criminal from the moment the intention was formed to produce the apprehension which was flowing from the continuing act. The fallacy of the appellant’s argument is that it seeks to equate the facts of this case with such a case as where a motorist has accidentally run over a person and, that action having been completed, fails to assist the victim with the intent that the victim should suffer.”

Appeal dismissed

2–244

In Miller,³¹⁰ the defendant fell asleep holding a lit cigarette which started a fire. When he awoke, he failed to do anything about the fire but simply moved to another room. The House of Lords adopted the “duty theory” that by creating the dangerous situation (starting the fire) the defendant became under a duty to act and so could be held responsible for the omission to act. Lord Diplock, however, conceded that the “continuous act” theory would provide an alternative route to liability.

R. V MILLER [1983] A.C. 161 (HOUSE

LORD DIPLOCK:

“[T]he conduct of the accused, throughout the period from immediately before the moment of ignition to the completion of the damage to the property by the fire, is relevant; so is his state of mind throughout that period ...

[The ratio decidendi of the Court of Appeal] treats the whole course of conduct of the accused, from the moment at which he fell asleep and dropped the cigarette on to the mattress until the time the damage to the house by fire was complete, as a continuous act of the accused, and holds that it is sufficient to constitute the statutory offence of arson if at any stage in that course of conduct the state of mind of the accused, when he fails to try to prevent or minimise the damage which will result from his initial act, although it lies within his power to do so, is that of being reckless as to whether property belonging to another would be damaged.”

In 1998, the Government published a Consultation Document containing a Draft Bill which would deal with the problem in Miller in the following manner.

HOME OFFICE, VIOLENCE: REFORMING THE OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON ACT 1861, DRAFT
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON
BILL 1998 CL.16:

“(1) Where it is an offence under this Act to be at fault in causing a result by an act and a person lacks the fault required when he does an act that may cause or does cause the result, he nevertheless commits the offence if—

- (a) being aware that he has done the act and that the result may occur or (as the case may be) has occurred and may continue, and
- (b) with the fault required, he fails to take reasonable steps to prevent the result occurring or continuing and it does occur or continue.”

2–248

This is, as indicated in Miller, a better way of resolving the problem. Rather than resorting to fictions concerning a “continuing actus reus”, the defendant is effectively treated as having created a dangerous situation. This generates a duty to take reasonable steps to prevent harm resulting from that danger.

C. TRANSFERRED MALICE

2–249

There are two well-established and accepted rules of criminal law:

- (a) If a defendant causes the actus reus by a different method than she intended she is nevertheless liable. Thus, if the defendant intended to kill her victim by stabbing him but after the first stab the victim fell and struck his head on a kerb, the blow killing him, the defendant is clearly guilty of murder and cannot claim that the death is accidental. She intended to kill her victim; by her actions she has killed the victim; she has mens rea in relation to the actus reus; she is liable.
- (b) If the defendant is mistaken as to the identity of her victim, she is nevertheless liable. Thus if the defendant shoots at a victim thinking he is Smith but in fact he is Jones and Jones dies, the defendant is clearly guilty of murder. Again, she is committed the actus reus of murder; she had the requisite mens rea; she is liable.

However, what of the following scenarios?

- (a) What if the defendant fires her gun at Smith, but misses and hits a passing stranger, Jones, and kills him? If the defendant was unaware of the existence of Jones, can she nevertheless be liable for murder?

- (b) What if the defendant throws a brick at Smith, but misses and breaks a window near Smith? If the defendant was unaware of the existence of the window, can she be liable for criminal damage?

2-250

The response of English law to these two situations is clear:

- (a) The defendant will be liable for murder. She intended to cause the actus reus of murder; she did cause the actus reus of murder. Her malice against Smith is transferred to Jones. The actus reus of murder is killing a human being. This she has done, intentionally; the identity of the victim is irrelevant. The leading illustration of this principle is *Latimer*³¹¹ where the defendant swung his belt at a man with whom he was quarrelling but the belt hit the face of a woman to whom he was talking. Lord Coleridge CJ held: “if a person has a malicious intent towards one person, and in carrying into effect that malicious intent he injures another man, he is guilty of what the law considers malice against the person so injured.”
- (b) The defendant will not be liable for criminal damage because the doctrine of transferred malice does not apply where the actus reus (criminal damage) is different from the mens rea (of an offence against the person). Only if the actus reus intended and the actus reus caused are the same can the malice be transferred from the one to the other. In Pemblition,³¹² where the facts were similar to the hypothetical example, the defendant was acquitted (on appeal) of malicious damage to a window.

The rationale of, and limits to, the doctrine of transferred malice were explored in the following case. In order to understand the decision, it is necessary to appreciate two rules to be explored in Ch.8. First, a foetus cannot be the victim of a crime of violence. If the foetus dies in utero, it cannot be murder or manslaughter.

If, however, the child is born alive but later dies from violence aimed at it while in utero, the assailant may be liable for manslaughter. Secondly, the mens rea of murder is satisfied by either an intention to kill or an intention to cause grievous bodily harm.

“ATTORNEY-GENERAL’S REFERENCE
(NO. 3 OF 1994) [1998] A.C. 245
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–251

The appellant stabbed a pregnant woman intending to cause her grievous bodily harm. As a result, her child was born prematurely and 121 days later died because of the prematurity of the birth. The trial judge directed the jury to acquit the appellant of both murder and manslaughter because the foetus, at the time of the attack, was not a live person. The doctrine of transferred malice was not applicable because “the intent to stab the mother (a live person) could not be transferred to the foetus (not a live person)”. On a reference by the Attorney-General, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on the ground that the foetus is part of the mother so that an intention to cause grievous bodily harm to the mother is equivalent to the same intent directed towards the foetus. The appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD MUSTILL:

“[His Lordship rejected the Court of Appeal’s views on the ground that] the mother and the foetus were two distinct organisms living symbiotically, not a single organism with two aspects. The mother’s leg was part of the mother; the foetus was not ...

I turn to ... ‘transferred malice’ ... One explanation [of this rule is that it is] founded on the notion of risk. The person who committed a crime took the chance that the outcome would be worse than he expected ... but as a foundation of a modern doctrine of transferred malice broad enough to encompass the present case it seems to me quite unsupportable ...

[T]here was [also] the idea of ‘general malice’, of an evil disposition existing in the general and manifesting itself in the particular, uniting the aim of the offender and the result which his deeds actually produced. According to this theory, there was no need to 'transfer' the wrongful intent from the intended to the actual victim; for since the offender was ... 'an enemy to all mankind in general', the actual victim was the direct object of the offender's enmity. Plainly, this will no longer do, for the last vestiges of the idea disappeared with the abolition of the murder/felony doctrine.

What explanation is left: for explanation there must be, since the 'transferred malice' concept is agreed on both sides to be sound law today? ... [His Lordship then discussed Pembliton and Latimer.] I find it hard to base a modern law of murder on these two cases ... [although the answers they gave] would be the same today. But the harking back to a concept of general malice, which amounts to no more than this, that a wrongful act displays a malevolence which can be attached to any adverse consequence, has long been out of date. And to speak of a particular malice which is 'transferred' simply disguises the problem by idiomatic language. The defendant's malice is directed at one objective, and when after the event the court treats it as directed at another object it is not recognising a 'transfer' but creating a new malice which never existed before. As Dr Glanville Williams pointed out ... the doctrine is 'rather an arbitrary exception to general principles'. Like many of its kind this is useful enough to yield rough justice ...

My Lords, the purpose of this enquiry has been to see whether the existing rules are based on principles sound enough to justify their extension to a case where the defendant acts without an intent to injure either the foetus or the child which it will become. In my opinion they are not. To give an affirmative answer requires a double 'transfer' of intent: first from the mother to the foetus and then from the foetus to the child as yet unborn ... For me, this is too much ... I am willing to follow old laws until they are overturned, but not to make a new law on a basis for which there is no principle.

Moreover, even on a narrower approach the argument breaks down. The effect of transferred malice, as I understand it, is that the intended victim and the actual victim are treated as if they were one, so that what was intended to happen to the first person (but did not happen) is added to what actually did happen to the second person (but was not intended to happen), with the result that what was intended and what happened are married to make a notionally intended and actually consummated crime. The cases are treated as if the actual victim had been the intended victim from the start. To make any sense of this process there must, as it seems to me, be some compatibility between the original intention and the actual occurrence, and this is, indeed, what one finds in the cases. There is no such compatibility here. The defendant intended to commit and did commit an immediate crime of violence to the mother. He committed no relevant violence to the foetus, which was not a person, either at the time or in the future, and intended no harm to the foetus or to the human person which it would become ... I would not overstrain the idea of transferred malice by trying to make it fit the present case.

Accordingly, ... the judge was right to direct an acquittal on the count of murder.

[His Lordship then went on to hold that the appellant could have been guilty of manslaughter for which recourse to transferred malice was not necessary.]”

Appeal allowed

2-252

This decision can be supported because what was intended (grievous bodily harm to the mother) was qualitatively different to what occurred (death of the child who, at the time of the attack, was not legally a person). As Lord Mustill put it: for the doctrine of transferred malice to apply, there must be “some compatibility between the original intention and the actual occurrence”.

JEREMY HORDER, TRANSFERRED MALICE AND THE REMOTENESS OF UNEXPECTED OUTCOMES FROM INTENTIONS” [2006] CRIM. L.R. 383, 388, 385, 386, 388-389:

2-253

“In my terms, ‘compatibility’ can be maintained by asking the jury to consider whether the way in which the death of an unanticipated victim resulted was too remote from the death that the defendant intended or anticipated, for a conviction for murder ... to constitute a representative label ...

Example 1: D fires a gun at V1 intending to kill V1. D misses, but the noise of the gun being fired startles a bystander, V2, who consequently dies of a heart attack.

... What should matter in these examples is not only that the actual victims were unintended victims, but also that they died in an unanticipated way. This double element of deviation from D's plan is what, in principle, may make the deaths too 'remote' from what D intended for murder to be a representative label ...

[T]he remoteness principle comes into play only when (a) the victim was not the intended victim; and (b) the victim was not killed in the way intended. These two conditions were met in Attorney-General's Reference (No.3 of 1994). Although they are necessary conditions, they should not, however, be treated as sufficient conditions for the purposes of the remoteness principle. Crucial in this regard is the evidence that B deliberately stabbed M in the abdomen, knowing that she was pregnant. If D is aware that something might go awry, and a fortiori of how it may go awry, when they try to put their intention into effect, that awareness is highly relevant to the question of how far, morally speaking, D can distance himself from the unintended outcome. Morally speaking, it makes the outcome less 'remote' from what B intended, and more compatible with it."

2-254

Horder's suggested approach is somewhat impractical. It involves leaving too much to the jury who have to decide whether the death is too remote from what was intended or anticipated for murder to constitute a representative label. This is effectively telling the jury that "if it looks like murder, if it feels like murder, then it is murder".

Real life has provided a complex scenario in which to consider the boundaries of the doctrine of transferred malice, albeit not quite as complex as Horder's fictional one. In the case of Gnango,³¹³ two gunmen were engaged in a shoot-out in a car-park when a passer-by got caught in the crossfire and was killed.

The gunman who fired the fatal shot was, for unknown reasons, not prosecuted, and the question for the court was whether the doctrine of transferred malice could be used, in conjunction with the doctrine of joint enterprise liability,³¹⁴ to convict the second gunman of the murder of the passer-by. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was indeed guilty of murder on the basis that he had aided and abetted the other gunman in the attempted murder of himself, and his malice towards himself could therefore be transferred to the passer-by. This is surely stretching the doctrine too far.³¹⁵

Is the doctrine of transferred malice justifiable? Lord Mustill's clear dislike of the doctrine of transferred malice in Attorney-General's Reference (No.3 of 1994) echoes the earlier views of Ashworth.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, “TRANSFERRED MALICE AND PUNISHMENT FOR UNFORESEEN CONSEQUENCES” IN P. R.
GLAZEBROOK (ED), RESHAPING THE CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.77, 84–89:

2–255

“The principle that a person should not be convicted of an offence unless he brought about the proscribed harm either intentionally or recklessly is frequently urged ... The doctrine known as transferred malice seems to stand out as an exception to this principle, for it results in criminal liability for consequences which would in ordinary language be described as accidental. The doctrine applies ‘when an injury intended for one falls on another by accident.’ ...

But if the indictment charges D with wounding P with intent to do grievous bodily harm to P, contrary to section 18 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, is it not an affront to common sense to convict him in the knowledge that his intent was to harm O and not P?³¹⁶ ... The apparent illogicality can of course be ignored in the belief that transferred malice represents a higher principle of criminal liability which must be applied even where the particular words of a statute do not sit happily with it ...

What, if anything, would be lost if the doctrine were abolished here? Does our criminal law offer any acceptable alternative methods of dealing with these cases? There are two obvious possibilities—liability for the crime attempted (thus ignoring the accidental result), and liability for the actual result based on recklessness—and these will be examined in turn ...

A conviction for attempt is possible in virtually all cases which fall within the doctrine of transferred liability ... In Latimer, for example, D could quite simply have been convicted of the attempted unlawful wounding of O; and likewise in Pembliton there were strong grounds for convicting D of attempted unlawful wounding of persons in the crowd ...

In many of the cases to which transferred malice applies, the harm to P was quite unforeseen. But in some of them D could be held liable for harm to P without invoking transferred malice—on the basis that, in attempting to harm O, he was reckless as to harming P ... It is often said that in Pembliton the jury should have found D reckless as to damaging the window, and that this would have spared counsel and the courts much fruitless argument ...

The doctrine could, then, be abolished without material loss to criminal justice; and it is desirable that it should be. For, quite apart from any problems over the consistency of the doctrine with general principles of criminal liability, it attributes significance to matters of chance and results in a mischaracterisation of D's criminality which could simply and effectively be avoided by charging an attempt. What, then, are the objections to using the law of attempts?

The first is that it would be wrong for a person who intended to cause harm of a certain kind and did cause such a harm to escape with a lighter sentence merely because he was charged with an attempt ...

A second objection ... is that even if the punishment were the same, it is more appropriate to convict of the completed crime in the 'transferred malice' situation. Where D set out to cause harm of a certain kind and did cause harm of that kind, it seems empty and insufficient to convict him of a mere attempt. He has actually caused a loss to the community of the kind he intended to cause, and that fact should be recorded. Once again, however, this reasoning leans too heavily on results which may be entirely a matter of chance. In a system based on subjective liability, the legal label attached to D's offence should generally reflect his intentional act and not the chance result."

2-256

This hostility to the doctrine of transferred malice seems misplaced. Where the defendant intends to kill another human being and does kill another human being, albeit a different one from the one intended, is it fair to describe that result as a "matter of chance", exempting the defendant from liability for murder? Is this mistake as to the identity of the victim relevant in any material way?³¹⁷ Murder involves the intentional killing of a human being. If the defendant tries to kill Smith and instead kills Jones, the difference in result can hardly be sufficient to avoid the conclusion that the defendant intentionally killed a human being and deserves the label "murderer". Further, if the defendant detonates a bomb in a crowded pub, intentionally killing 20 strangers, he will be liable for their murder; the fact that their identity is unknown to him is irrelevant. Similarly, if he burns down a house intending to kill V1 but, unknown to him, V2 is also in the house and dies, he will be liable for the murder of both provided the indictment is drafted in a suitable manner. Where it is not only a different victim, but that victim is killed in a different way (as in the example given by Horder), the only relevant moral issue is whether the defendant can still be held to have caused death. The Law Commission and the Draft Offences Against the Person Bill 1998 accepted the doctrine of transferred malice in its present form and proposed a statutory provision to that effect.³¹⁸

D. MISTAKE

2-257

A defendant may make many different types of mistake. Sometimes she will think she is committing no crime at all. At other times, she will think that she is committing a different crime from the one that transpires. What is the law's response to such pleas?

In order for a mistake to be considered as a possible exculpatory factor, it must relate in a relevant way to the elements of the crime. If a driver makes a mistake and puts a foot on the accelerator thinking that he is putting it on the brake and so kills a pedestrian, this is not a relevant mistake as to an element of the crime of causing death by dangerous driving.³¹⁹ Indeed, instead of being an exculpatory factor, such a mistake is important evidence in establishing the critical element required for the crime, namely that the driving was “dangerous”.

A mistake might have relevance to an exemption from liability in the following three situations:

- (1) mistake as to one of the elements of the actus reus;
- (2) mistake as to a defence element; or
- (3) mistake as to law.

As we shall see, it is difficult to distinguish rigidly between these three, but such a classification is useful for purposes of exposition.

1. Mistake as to element of actus reus

2–258

For most crimes, the defendant must have mens rea in relation to the actus reus. This means that she must have mens rea in relation to every element of the actus reus—often referred to as the “definitional elements”. However, the mistake must not simply be one as to some quality of the definitional element. It must be as to the existence of the definitional element. For example, the actus reus of criminal damage is destroying or damaging any property belonging to another.³²⁰ If the defendant thinks the property belongs to Smith when in fact it belongs to Jones, her mistake is irrelevant because she knows that the property belongs to another. On the other hand, if the defendant thinks the property belongs to herself this mistake now negates her mens rea. She does not have mens rea in relation to a definitional element and would thus escape liability.³²¹

The Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 s.170(2) makes it an offence to be knowingly concerned in the fraudulent evasion of the prohibition on the importation of prohibited goods. In Ellis,³²² the defendants believed they were importing prohibited pornographic goods but in fact it was prohibited drugs. Their convictions were upheld. They had mens rea in relation to the definitional element “prohibited goods”. The precise nature and quality of such prohibited goods was of no more relevance than whether the property belonged to Smith or Jones in the earlier example.³²³ In Taaffe,³²⁴ the defendant was charged with this offence when he imported cannabis resin into the country. He believed the substance was currency and that doing this was illegal, which it was not. The House of Lords held that there would be no liability in these circumstances. His mistake of fact meant he believed he was importing goods which were not prohibited.³²⁵

Where the mistake is as to the existence of a definitional element, the position used to be that the defendant would only escape liability if the mistake was a reasonable one. In Tolson,³²⁶ the defendant’s husband deserted her and sailed for the US. Inquiries revealed that the ship had been sunk and so, believing herself to be a widow, five years later she went through a marriage ceremony with another man. Later that year her husband returned from the US and the defendant was charged with bigamy. Her conviction was quashed, on the basis that she had believed “in good faith and on reasonable grounds” that her husband was dead.

However, the House of Lords in the following case effected a radical change of direction by holding that in certain circumstances an honest mistake would exempt a defendant from criminal liability. It was no longer necessary that the mistake be reasonable.

DPP V MORGAN [1976] A.C. 182 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2–259

A husband invited a number of companions to have sexual intercourse with his wife, apparently in order to be avenged for her real or imagined infidelity. He suggested that she might put up a struggle but that they were not to take it seriously; it was her way of increasing her sexual satisfaction. The men, so urged, had intercourse in turn without her consent. They were tried and convicted of rape; the husband was convicted of aiding and abetting rape. The judge directed the jury that the men were guilty of rape even if they in fact believed that Mrs Morgan consented if such belief was not based on reasonable grounds.

The question certified to the House of Lords was whether the defendants' belief in her consent had to be based on reasonable grounds.

LORD CROSS:

“In fact, however, I can see no objection to the inclusion of the element of reasonableness in what I may call a ‘Tolson’ case. If the words defining an offence provide either expressly or impliedly that a man is not to be guilty of it if he believes something to be true, then he cannot be found guilty if the jury think that he may have believed it to be true, however inadequate were his reasons for doing so. But, if the definition of the offence is on the face of it ‘absolute’ and the defendant is seeking to escape his prima facie liability by a defence of mistaken belief, I can see no hardship to him in requiring the mistake—if it is to afford him a defence—to be based on reasonable grounds. As Lord Diplock said in Sweet v Parsley [1970] A.C. 132, there is nothing unreasonable in the law requiring a citizen to take reasonable care to ascertain the facts relevant to his avoiding doing a prohibited act. To have intercourse with a woman who is not your wife is, even today, not generally considered to be a course of conduct which the law ought positively to encourage and it can be argued with force that it is only fair to the woman and not in the least unfair to the man that he should be under a duty to take reasonable care to ascertain that she is consenting to the intercourse and be at the risk of prosecution if he fails to take such care. So if the Sexual Offences Act 1956 had made it an offence to have intercourse with a woman who was not consenting to it, so that the defendant could only escape liability by the application of the ‘Tolson’ principle, I would not have thought the law unjust.

But, as I have said, section 1 of the Act of 1956, does not say that a man who has sexual intercourse with a woman who does not consent to it commits an offence; it says that a man who rapes a woman commits an offence. Rape is not a word in the use of which lawyers have a monopoly and the question to be answered in this case, as I see it, is whether according to the ordinary use of the English language a man can be said to have committed rape if he believed that the woman was consenting to the intercourse and would not have attempted to have it but for his belief, whatever his grounds for so believing. I do not think that he can. Rape, to my mind imports at least indifference as to the woman's consent. I think, moreover, that in this connection the ordinary man would distinguish between rape and bigamy. To the question whether a man who goes through a ceremony of marriage with a woman believing his wife to be dead, though she is not, commits bigamy, I think that he would reply 'Yes, —but I suppose that the law contains an escape clause for bigamists who are not really to blame.' On the other hand, to the question whether a man, who has intercourse with a woman believing on inadequate grounds that she is consenting to it, though she is not, commits rape, I think that he would reply 'No. If he was grossly careless then he may deserve to be punished but not for rape.' That being my view as to the meaning of the word 'rape' in ordinary parlance, I next ask myself whether the law gives it a different meaning. There is very little English authority on the point but what there is ... accords with what I take to be the proper meaning of the word ... For these reasons, I think that the summing up contained a misdirection.

The question which then arises as to the application of the proviso [to section 2(1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968] is far easier of solution ... The jury obviously considered that the appellant's evidence as to the part played by Mrs Morgan was a pack of lies and one must assume that any other jury would take the same view as to the relative culpability of the parties ... So I would apply the proviso and dismiss the appeal."

2-260

LORD HAILSHAM:

"No doubt it would be possible, by statute, to devise a law by which intercourse, voluntarily entered into, was an absolute offence subject to a 'defence' of belief whether honest or honest and reasonable, of which the 'evidential' burden is primarily on the defence and the 'probative' burden on the prosecution. But in my opinion such is not the crime of rape as it has hitherto been understood. The prohibited act in rape is to have intercourse without the victim's consent. The minimum mens rea or guilty mind in most common law offences, including rape, is the intention to do the prohibited act ...

The only qualification I would make ... is the refinement ... that if the intention of the accused is to have intercourse nolens volens, that is recklessly and not caring whether the victim be a consenting party or not, that is equivalent on ordinary principles to an intent to do the prohibited act without the consent of the victim ... Once one has accepted, what seems to me abundantly clear, that the prohibited act in rape is non-consensual sexual intercourse, and that the guilty state of mind is an intention to commit it, it seems to me to follow as a matter of inexorable logic that there is no room either for a 'defence' of honest belief or mistake, or of a defence of honest and reasonable belief or mistake. Either the prosecution proves that the accused had the requisite intent, or it does not. In the former case it succeeds, and in the latter it fails. Since honest belief clearly negatives intent, the reasonableness or otherwise of that belief can only be evidence for or against the view that the belief and therefore the intent was actually held ... Any other view, as for insertion of the word 'reasonable' can only have the effect of saying that a man intends something which he does not ...

I am content to rest my view of the instant case on the crime of rape by saying that it is my opinion that the prohibited act is and always has been intercourse without consent of the victim and the mental element is and always has been the intention to commit that act, or the equivalent intention of having intercourse willy-nilly not caring whether the victim consents or no [sic]. A failure to prove this involves an acquittal because the intent, an essential ingredient, is lacking. It matters not why it is lacking if only it is not there, and in particular it matters not that the intention is lacking only because of a belief not based on reasonable grounds ...

For the above reasons I would answer the question certified in the negative, but would apply the proviso to the Criminal Appeal Act on the ground that no miscarriage of justice has or conceivably could have occurred."

LORD SIMON:

"It remains to consider why the law requires, in such circumstances, that the belief in a state of affairs whereby the actus would not be reus must be held on reasonable grounds ...

... The policy of the law in this regard could well derive from its concern to hold a fair balance between victim and accused. It would hardly seem just to fob off a victim of a savage assault with such comfort as he could derive from knowing that his injury was caused by a belief, however absurd, that he was about to attack the accused. A respectable woman who has been ravished would hardly feel that she was vindicated by being told that her assailant must go unpunished because he believed, quite unreasonably, that she was consenting to sexual intercourse with him ...

I would therefore answer the question certified for your Lordships' consideration, Yes. But, even did I consider that it should be answered No, I would, for the reasons given by my noble and learned friends, think this a suitable case to apply the proviso."

[Lord Fraser held that the defendant's belief in the woman's consent did not have to be based on reasonable grounds; Lord Edmund-Davies, however, felt that only the legislature could effect such a reform in the law.]

Appeal dismissed

B (A MINOR) v DPP [2000] A.C. 428 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

2-261

The defendant, a 15-year-old boy, invited a 13-year-old girl to perform oral sex with him on a bus. He was charged with the offence of inciting a girl under the age of 14 to commit an act of gross indecency, contrary to the Indecency with Children Act 1960 s.1(1) (an offence now repealed by the Sexual Offences Act 2003). He honestly believed that she was over 14 years of age.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD:

"The 'reasonable belief' school of thought held unchallenged sway for many years. But over the last quarter of a century there have been several important cases where a defence of honest but mistaken belief was raised. In deciding these cases the courts have placed new, or renewed, emphasis on the subjective nature of the mental element in criminal offences. The courts have rejected the reasonable belief approach and preferred the honest belief approach. When mens rea is ousted by a mistaken belief, it is as well ousted by an unreasonable belief as by a reasonable belief ... [I]t is the defendant's belief, not the grounds on which it is based, which goes to negative the intent ...

Considered as a matter of principle, the honest belief approach must be preferable. By definition the mental element in a crime is concerned with a subjective state of mind, such as intent or belief. To the extent that an overriding objective limit ('on reasonable grounds') is introduced, the subjective element is displaced. To that extent a person who lacks the necessary intent or belief may nevertheless commit the offence. When that occurs the defendant's 'fault' lies exclusively in falling short of an objective standard. His crime lies in his negligence. A statute may so provide expressly or by necessary implication. But this can have no place in a common law principle, of general application, which is concerned with the need for a mental element as an essential ingredient of a criminal offence ...

There has been a general shift from objectivism to subjectivism in this branch of the law. It is now settled as a matter of general principle that mistake, whether reasonable or not, is a defence where it prevents the defendant from having the mens rea which the law requires for the crime with which he is charged. It would be in disharmony with this development now to rule that in respect of a defence under subsection 1(1) of the Act of 1960 the belief must be based on reasonable grounds."

Appeal allowed

2-262

One year later the House of Lords reaffirmed this approach in R. v K,³²⁷ an appeal involving indecent assault on a girl under the age of 16 contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 1956 s.14(1). A 26-year-old man committed sexual acts with a consenting 14-year-old girl believing she was aged 16 or over. Under s.14(2), a girl under the age of 16 could not give valid consent for the purposes of this offence. It was held that the actus reus of this offence involved “an indecent act done ... with or without the consent of the other person being a person under the age of 16 years” and that, as regards mens rea, the prosecution “must be prepared to prove that the defendant did not have an honest belief that the other person was in fact consenting and not under 16 years of age”. Lord Bingham did, however, stress that while the defendant’s belief need only be honest and genuine and need not be reasonable, “the more unreasonable the belief, the less likely it is to be accepted as genuine”.

These decisions on mistake in relation to rape and the other sexual offences have now been overruled by the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Section 1(1) provides that the mens rea of rape is satisfied if the defendant does not reasonably believe that the other is consenting. Sections 9 to 12 of this Act create various “child sex offences”. For those offences where the age of 16 is the material age there is provision that the belief that the child is 16 or over must be reasonable.

However, in relation to other offences where statute does not specifically insist on mistakes being reasonable in order to exculpate defendants, the principle established by Morgan and its progeny continues to apply. The appropriateness of this approach is considered later in this section but, for now, two points need to be noted.

First, it is incorrect to talk of a “defence of mistake”. It is not a defence: the defendant does not have to prove anything. The prosecution has to prove mens rea. If there is a mistake as to an actus reus element, the prosecution will have failed to prove its case. The principle is clear. A mistake as to a definitional element can negate mens rea; it is irrelevant whether the mistake is reasonable or not; reasonableness is only relevant as a matter of evidence in determining whether a belief was in fact honestly held.

Secondly, given this clear principle, what is the status today of Tolson which required a mistake, for the crime of bigamy, to be reasonable? This case was approved in Morgan with Lord Cross stating that Tolson was dealing with a prima facie strict liability offence and in such cases, any “defence of mistaken belief” needed to be reasonable. One view is that the Tolson principle still operates for bigamy because bigamy is a crime of negligence.³²⁸ If the defendant makes an unreasonable mistake, she is negligent. However, Tolson was disapproved in B (A Minor) v DPP. Lord Nicholls, in addition to the passages extracted above, cited Sweet v Parsley on this point and concluded that this view was “out of step with this recent line of authority” and that the dicta from those cases “must in future be read as though the reference to reasonable grounds were omitted”. It thus appears that Tolson is no longer good authority, or, at least, is limited to the offence of bigamy.

2. Mistake as to a defence element

2–263

There is another type of mistake a defendant can make. He might have made a mistake in thinking he was entitled to a defence. For example, a defendant might admit that he intentionally killed another but claim that he thought that he was being attacked and was therefore defending himself, when, in reality, he had made a mistake and was not under attack.³²⁹

Originally, and even for a few years after Morgan, the courts insisted that only reasonable mistakes as to defence elements would suffice to exempt a person from liability.³³⁰ However, in relation to mistakes affecting self-defence the courts soon abandoned the requirement that the mistake be reasonable.

R. V WILLIAMS (GLADSTONE) (1984) 78 CR. APP. R. 276 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

2–264

The appellant saw a man, Mason, dragging a youth along a street and striking him; the youth was calling for help. Mason claimed he was a police officer and was arresting the youth for mugging a lady. When he was unable to produce a warrant card, a struggle ensued during which the appellant punched Mason, who sustained injuries to his face. The appellant, who was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm, claimed that he honestly believed Mason was unlawfully assaulting the youth and that he was trying to rescue the youth. (One is entitled to use reasonable force to prevent an unlawful assault on another.) However, the appellant had made a mistake. While Mason was not a police officer, he had nevertheless seen the youth seize the woman's handbag and was acting lawfully in restraining the youth with a view to taking him to a police station. At his trial, the jury were directed that the appellant's mistake would only be relevant if it were a reasonable one. He was convicted and appealed on the ground of a misdirection.

LANE LCJ:

“‘Assault’ ... is an act by which the defendant, intentionally or recklessly, applies unlawful force to the complainant. There are circumstances in which force may be applied to another lawfully. Taking a few examples: first, where the victim consents, as in lawful sports, the application of force to another will, generally speaking, not be unlawful. Secondly, where the defendant is acting in self-defence: the exercise of any necessary and reasonable force to protect himself from unlawful violence is not unlawful. Thirdly, by virtue of section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967, a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime or in effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of an offender or suspected offender or persons unlawfully at large. In each of those cases the defendant will be guilty if the jury are sure that first of all he applied force to the person of another, and secondly that he had the necessary mental element to constitute guilt.

The mental element necessary to constitute guilt is the intent to apply unlawful force to the victim. We do not believe that the mental element can be substantiated by simply showing an intent to apply force and no more.

What then is the situation if the defendant is labouring under a mistake of fact as to the circumstances? What if he believes, but believes mistakenly, that the victim is consenting, or that it is necessary to defend himself, or that a crime is being committed which he intends to prevent? He must then be judged against the mistaken facts as he believes them to be. If judged against those facts or circumstances the prosecution fail to establish his guilt, then he is entitled to be acquitted.

The next question is, does it make any difference if the mistake of the defendant was one which, viewed objectively by a reasonable onlooker, was an unreasonable mistake? ... The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the defendant's belief is material to the question of whether the belief was held by the defendant at all. If the belief was in fact held, its unreasonableness, so far as guilt or innocence is concerned, is neither here nor there. It is irrelevant. Were it otherwise, the defendant would be convicted because he was negligent in failing to recognise that the victim was not consenting or that a crime was not being committed and so on. In other words the jury should be directed first of all that the prosecution have the burden or duty of proving the unlawfulness of the defendant's actions; secondly, if the defendant may have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he must be judged according to his mistaken views of the facts; thirdly, that is so whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not ...

We have read the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee, Part IX, paragraph 72(a), in which the following passage appears:

'The common law defence of self-defence should be replaced by a statutory defence providing that a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he believes them to be in the defence of himself or any other person.'

In the view of this Court that represents the law as expressed in Morgan."

Appeal allowed

BECKFORD V R. [1988] A.C. 130 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

2-265

The appellant was a police officer who was a member of an armed posse which chased, shot and killed a fleeing man. The appellant claimed he had killed in self-defence. The trial judge directed the jury that the belief that life was in danger had to be a reasonable belief. The Court of Appeal of Jamaica confirmed this. The appellant appealed to the Privy Council.

LORD GRIFFITHS:

“There can be no doubt that prior to the decision of the House of Lords in R. v Morgan the whole weight of authority supported the view that it was an essential element of self-defence not only that the accused believed that he was being attacked or in imminent danger of being attacked but also that such belief was based on reasonable grounds ...

The question then is whether the present Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lane, in R. v Williams (Gladstone), was right to depart from the law as declared by his predecessors in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in R. v Morgan ...

It is because it is an essential element of all crimes of violence that the violence or the threat of violence should be unlawful that self-defence, if raised as an issue in a criminal trial, must be disproved by the prosecution. If the prosecution fail to do so the accused is entitled to be acquitted because the prosecution will have failed to prove an essential element of the crime namely that the violence used by the accused was unlawful.

If then a genuine belief, albeit without reasonable grounds, is a defence to rape because it negatives the necessary intention, so also must a genuine belief in facts which if true would justify self-defence be a defence to a crime of personal violence because the belief negatives the intent to act unlawfully ...

There may be a fear that the abandonment of the objective standard demanded by the existence of reasonable grounds for belief will result in the success of too many spurious claims of self-defence. The English experience has not shown this to be the case. The Judicial Studies Board with the approval of the Lord Chief Justice has produced a model direction on self-defence which is now widely used by judges when summing up to juries. The direction contains the following guidance:

‘Whether the plea is self-defence or defence of another, if the defendant may have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he must be judged according to his mistaken belief of the facts: that is so whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not.’”

Appeal allowed

In Faraj,³³¹ the defendant restrained a victim mistakenly thinking he was a burglar. On a charge of false imprisonment, it was held that he was entitled to a defence of defence of property if he honestly believed the victim was a burglar, irrespective of the reasonableness of this belief.

These cases clearly establish that, in order to afford a defence, a mistake in relation to the need to resort to self-defence (or defence of property) need only be honest; it need not be a reasonable mistake. This has now been confirmed by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(3) which provides that whether force can be used is to be decided “by reference to the circumstances as D believed them to be”.

This subjective approach, however, has not been adopted with other defences. In Graham,³³² it was held that the defence of duress would only be available to one who reasonably believed that he was being subjected to the requisite threats for a defence of duress. This approach was approved by the House of Lords in *Howe*³³³ and Hasan.³³⁴ The same test was applied in *Martin*³³⁵ to “duress of circumstances”.³³⁶ In O’Grady,³³⁷ it was held that a person who made a drunken mistake in thinking he was being attacked was not entitled to a defence. In Fotheringham,³³⁸ the defendant made a drunken mistake when having non-consensual intercourse with his 14-year-old babysitter: he thought it was his wife. It was held that such a drunken mistake was no defence. While it was held in both these cases that drunken mistakes were no defence, if, in fact, despite the defendant’s drunkenness, the mistake made was a perfectly reasonable mistake that an ordinary sober person would have made, it should be a defence. The Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(5) now provides that a defendant pleading self-defence cannot rely on “any mistaken belief attributable to intoxication”. If the mistake was a reasonable one, it would presumably not be attributable to the intoxication; the intoxication would be coincidental; the same mistake would probably have been made if he had been sober. The Law Commission endorses this approach: where the defendant is voluntarily intoxicated, “D’s actual belief is to be taken into account only if D would have held the same belief if not intoxicated”³³⁹.

How can this divergence of approach, between mistakes as to consent and self-defence on the one hand, and duress, duress of circumstances and drunkenness on the other hand, be explained?

In Williams (Gladstone) and Beckford, the court drew a distinction between mistakes which affect definitional elements (where the mistake need only be genuine) and mistakes as to a defence element (where the mistake must be reasonable). According to these cases it is part of the definitional elements that the defendant be acting “unlawfully”; self-defensive action renders conduct lawful and so if a defendant has made a mistake as to the need for self-defensive action, there is no mens rea in relation to that definitional element of “unlawfulness”.

GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, TEXTBOOK
OF CRIMINAL LAW, 2ND EDN (1983),
P.138:

2-267

“No other rule of the substantive criminal law distinguishes between the definitional and defence elements of a crime, and it is a distinction that is impossible to draw satisfactorily. (Our notion of what issue is a ‘defence,’ in so far as we have any clear notion, seems to depend largely on whether we think that the defendant should be required to take the initiative in introducing it, i.e. on whether he should bear an evidential burden in respect of it. But there is no reason why the distribution of evidential burdens should affect the rules of liability.) A rule creating a defence merely supplies additional details of the scope of the offence. To regard the offence as subsisting independently of its limitations and qualifications is unrealistic. The defence is a negative condition of the offence, and is therefore an integral part of it. What we regard as part of the offence and what as part of a defence depends only on traditional habits of thought or accidents of legal drafting; it should have no bearing on the important question of criminal liability. For example, it is purely a matter of convenient drafting whether a statute says, on the one hand, that damaging the property of another without his consent is a crime, or, on the other hand, that damaging the property of another is a crime but that his consent is a defence. In fact we regard the non-consent of the owner as a definitional element, but there is no particular reason why this should be so, and the question of guilt or innocence should not depend on it.”

2–268

It is difficult to determine on what basis an offence or a defence requirement should be classified as either a definitional or a defence element.³⁴⁰ For example, if a defendant honestly believes that he is being subjected to duress, could one not say that he lacks mens rea in relation to the definitional element of “unlawfulness”? If so, why did Graham and Martin insist that such mistakes be reasonable?

Another possible explanation is that mistakes as to justificatory defences need only be honest but that mistakes as to excusatory defences must be reasonable. Consent and self-defence are both justificatory defences. Justificatory conduct is in effect “approved of”—or, at least, tolerated as acceptable conduct. Thus, a person acting in self-defence is effectively doing “right”; she is doing what we expect her to do; she is restricting unprovoked aggression; in effect, she is acting lawfully. A person who honestly thinks that she is acting in a justified and thus lawful manner is not blameworthy and there is no point punishing her. Accordingly, an honest mistaken belief will suffice to exempt from criminal liability.

On the other hand, duress and intoxication raise excusatory defences. When conduct is excused, it remains wrong and unacceptable (i.e. unlawful) but because the defendant has an excuse, we punish her less or not at all. If, thinking she is being subjected to duress a defendant robs a bank, this is “wrong and disapproved of” conduct—but we might wish to exempt the defendant from liability if she had been subjected to terrible threats. But because the conduct remains wrong we will only excuse those who have a plausible excuse—and a plausible excuse is a reasonable one. The same analysis is true of drunken mistakes. The defendant has acted unlawfully and will only be afforded an excuse if the mistake was one that a sober, reasonable person would have made.

This approach presupposes that there is a water-tight distinction between justification and excuse. As will be seen in Ch.4, where these defences are explored more fully, this is not always the case.³⁴¹ For example, it is uncertain how “duress of circumstances” should be classified. The approach in *Martin*³⁴² suggests it is an excuse while in *Martin (DP)*³⁴³ it was held that the defence was analogous to self-defence, which is a justificatory defence.

Nevertheless, to summarise, the position at the moment would seem to be that with regard to mistakes as to definitional elements (which include mistakes as to justificatory defences) an honest mistake will exempt a defendant from criminal liability. However, with regard to mistakes as to excusatory defences, only a reasonable mistake will entitle a defendant to such exemption.

This whole approach had been condemned by the Law Commission who in the Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 proposed that “a person who acts in the belief that a circumstance exists has any defence that he would have if the circumstance existed”.³⁴⁴

3. Evaluation of the law

2–269

How are we to evaluate the law’s response to the problem of mistake? Are we to approve of Morgan and its progeny? Are the present distinctions drawn by the law based upon sound policy considerations or should we adopt the Law Commission’s proposal of allowing an honest mistake to exculpate in all cases?

D. COWLEY, “THE RETREAT FROM MORGAN” [1982] CRIM. L.R. 198, 206–208:

2–270

“One theory suggests that whether the objective test of mistake applies depends upon where in respect of the relevant issue the evidential burden lies, and that where an evidential burden lies on the accused to show that he believed in facts inconsistent with the offence,

‘a bald assertion of belief for which the accused can indicate no reasonable ground is evidence of insufficient substance to raise any issue requiring the jury’s consideration’ (per Lord Simon in Morgan).

It is respectfully submitted that this theory is unsound and that there is no connection between the incidence of the evidential burden and the question whether the mistake must be reasonable, the main reason being that an evidential burden on the defendant merely requires him to give some reasonable evidence of belief as opposed to evidence of reasonable belief. It may well be the case that his assertion of belief is not ‘bald’ but is fully corroborated by independent evidence leading the jury to accept that the unreasonable belief was in fact held and, in such circumstances, the defendant will have discharged the burden cast upon him.

An alternative reason for requiring the belief to be reasonable put forward by Lord Simon is the fact that the victim must be ‘vindicated’ by punishing e.g. an assailant who has made an unreasonable mistake: ‘the policy of the law in this regard could well derive from its concern to hold a fair balance between the victim and the accused. It would hardly seem just to fob off a victim of a savage assault with such comfort as he could derive from knowing that his inquiry was caused by a belief, however absurd, that he was about to attack the accused. One cannot but agree with Professor Williams’ opinion ((1975) New L.J. p.968) that this is not only a somewhat old-fashioned view of the criminal law but also fails to explain who is vindicated when a bigamist is punished. The lawful spouse, in particular, may not care a jot about the bigamy.

Perhaps ... [an] insistence on there being reasonable grounds for mistaken belief can, rather, be put down to a simple lack of confidence in the jury as the final arbiter of fact. If so, such judicial mistrust is very reminiscent of the somewhat misconceived and blinkered popular reaction to the decision in Morgan. What was apparently overlooked by those whose passions were aroused by Morgan’s effect on the law of rape, and those whose railing against the case implied a serious lack of faith in the tribunal of fact in criminal cases, was not only the total lack of gullibility of that particular jury who decided that the defendants’ tale as to Mrs Morgan’s consent to their intercourse with her was a ‘pack of lies’, but also the ultimate result of the case—the dismissal of the defendants’ appeals against conviction. There is little evidence there to support the often heard claim that a requirement of mere honest belief facilitates bogus defences, and before seeking to impose any kind of restriction upon the freedom of the jury to determine issues of fact the judiciary might reflect upon the oft-quoted words of Dixon J. that a ‘lack of confidence in the ability of a tribunal correctly to estimate evidence of states of mind and the like can never be sufficient ground for excluding from inquiry the most fundamental element in a rational and humane criminal code’ Thomas v R. (1937) 59 C.L.R. 278 at 309.”

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.696–697, 707, 709–710:

2–271

“[W]e would be naive to think we had a definitive, unassailable solution to the enduring problem of determining when mistakes must be reasonable in order to have an exculpatory effect. The thesis is tentative, and to aid those who might wish to carry the effort further, we should restate the critical premises for recognising that some mistakes have a categorical exculpatory effect.

1. The definition of an offence is the violation of a prohibitory norm.
2. The prohibitory norm identifies the minimal set of objective circumstances necessary, in the given cultural context, to state a coherent moral or social imperative.
3. There is no violation of a prohibitory norm unless the actor acts intentionally or knowingly with respect to the elements of the definition (the prohibitory norm) ...

A mistake as to one of these elements ... has the same effect in barring liability for an intentional offence as the absence of one of the objective elements ... Of course, if the offense is one that can be committed negligently, then the mistake only bars conviction for the intentional offence. The premises supporting the alternative track requiring mistakes to be reasonable are the following:

4. Relevant mistakes about elements extrinsic to the definition are excuses.

5. Elements of justification are extrinsic to the definition.
6. Excuses are not valid unless they negate the actor's culpability.
7. A mistake does not negate culpability unless the making of the mistake was blameless ...

[Fletcher admits that this distinction is as yet fragile. For example, he finds the issue of consent in Morgan to be justificatory, rather than definitional.] ... [I]n the field of putative self-defense and other imagined circumstances of justified conduct, it is generally assumed that the mistake must be reasonable. We could interpret this requirement as a concern about whether the actor's mistake is free from fault. But the doctrine could also be read as a theory about the justifying effect of appearances. If the circumstances warrant a reasonable belief, the actor is entitled to rely upon appearances, whatever the facts may actually be ... [C]ommon-law courts are reluctant to reveal to the jury the extent to which a conviction rests on a moral assessment of the actor's wrongful conduct ... As a step toward overcoming these inhibitions about moral discourse, we should try to state precisely how individuals can be fairly blamed for making mistakes or for remaining inadvertent to the risks implicit in their conduct. The inquiry encompasses not only mistakes in the narrow sense, but the culpability of inadvertent negligence.”

ANDREW ASHWORTH AND JEREMY HORDER, PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LAW, 7TH EDN (2013), P. 217:

2-272

“[T]he law should adopt [a] more context-sensitive approach, taking some account of the circumstances of the act, of D's responsibilities, and of what may reasonably be expected in such situations. The consequence may be not to require knowledge of a certain circumstance in the definition of the offence, but to require reasonable grounds for a belief. In rape cases these considerations militate in favour of a requirement of reasonable grounds for any mistake, as the Sexual Offences Act 2003 now provides; reasonable grounds should also be required in respect of age requirements for consensual sexual conduct ... In principle, it is also right to require reasonable grounds before allowing the acquittal of a police officer with firearms training, as in Beckford v R. Of course, any such infusion of objective principles must recognize the exigencies of the moment, and must not expect more of D than society ought to expect in that particular situation. That is a necessary safeguard of individual autonomy. The general point, however, is that there may be good reasons for society to require a certain standard of conduct if the conditions were not such as to preclude it, particularly where the potential harm involved is serious.”

2-273

This “context-sensitive” approach can be welcomed. Owing to their training we can legitimately expect a higher standard of responsibility from police officers or members of the armed forces who inflict force on others believing they are acting in self-defence: we can insist that their mistakes be reasonable if they are to escape liability. So too with rape: because of the necessary proximity between the parties and thus the ease of ascertaining whether there is consent, only reasonable mistakes should exculpate. Similarly, the basis of the decision in R. v K is flawed. The effect of this case is that a middle-aged paedophile could (under the law prior to the Sexual Offences Act 2003) escape liability for an indecent assault on a girl under the age of 16 on the basis that he genuinely believed, albeit unreasonably, that she was 16. Surely, if older men want to have sex with “children” they should be under a duty to ensure that the person is at least 16 and ought only to be able to “rely on appearances” (Fletcher) if other reasonable people would also have thought the girl was over 16.

This context-sensitive approach has been accepted for rape and other sexual offences in the Sexual Offences Act 2003. However, this view was rejected by the self-defence provisions in the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 where no distinction is drawn between the mistaken beliefs of the police or military personnel and similar mistakes of ordinary people.³⁴⁵

However, as these examples show, looking at the problem another way, the question becomes: in what contexts will a mere honest, but unreasonable, mistake serve to exculpate? Given the sorts of interests the criminal law seeks to protect (bodily integrity, property rights etc), can we not demand of all defendants that only reasonable mistakes will suffice for exemption of liability? Most people would accept that Williams (Gladstone) be allowed to “rely on appearances”—but, again, this means only relying on reasonable mistakes. Ashworth argues that we should not expect more of a defendant “than society ought to expect in that particular situation”. Following the above argument, we ought always to expect ordinary persons to avoid making unreasonable mistakes. However, we can have no such expectations when dealing with defendants whose mental capacities are such that they are unable to achieve this standard, for example, mentally vulnerable defendants with severe learning difficulties. This argument then reduces itself to a proposition similar to that encountered earlier when we examined Hart’s favoured test of negligence: we are entitled to blame persons for their unreasonable conduct (and unreasonable mistakes) provided they had the capacity to act according to that standard.

4. Mistake as to law

2–274

Traditionally, mistakes of law have been regarded as generally irrelevant. Citizens are presumed to know the law of the land—their ignorance or mistake cannot avail them. The reason often given is that the law sets an objective standard; citizens should not be able to make it subjective by their mistaken view of it,³⁴⁶ or that it might encourage ignorance.³⁴⁷

However, this proposition that mistakes of law are irrelevant is somewhat misleading. Some mistakes of law can be highly relevant. In this context, it is necessary to distinguish between:

- (i) mistake as to civil law; and
- (ii) mistake as to criminal law.

(i) Mistake as to civil law

2–275

Some mistakes of civil law may negate the mens rea required for a crime. In Smith (David),³⁴⁸ the defendant damaged property wrongly believing it was his own property. He was not liable. He had made a mistake of the civil law. As a result of this mistake he lacked the intention to damage property belonging to another.³⁴⁹

In essence, a mistake of civil law is (or results in) a mistake of fact, e.g. thinking one is damaging property belonging to oneself. Accordingly, such mistakes will be governed by the principles—discussed above. So, where a defendant mistakenly believes that her first marriage has been dissolved by a foreign divorce entitled to recognition in England, she will, following the demise of Tolson, escape liability if her mistake as to the civil law on recognition of foreign divorces was honest and genuine.

(ii) Mistake as to criminal law

2–276

Here the maxim “ignorance of the law is no excuse” comes into operation. A mistake as to whether one’s actions are criminal will generally be irrelevant. So, if a defendant thinks it is legal to have more than one wife, the actus reus and mens rea of the crime of bigamy are present; he is merely alleging that he did not know bigamy was a crime and such a mistaken belief is irrelevant.³⁵⁰

This same principle extends to persons who know that a particular activity is criminal but mistakenly think they have not committed the crime. In Lee,³⁵¹ the defendant honestly believed he had not failed a roadside breathalyser test and so, believing his arrest to be unlawful, punched the police officers. It was held that his belief in his innocence did not negate his liability for the offence of assault with intent to resist lawful arrest contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.38. This decision is uncontroversial. Any other solution would have given carte blanche to all arrested persons to resist that arrest on the ground that they believed they were innocent and so the arrest was unlawful.³⁵²

In many cases, however, there are problems in distinguishing between mistakes of civil law and criminal law, and much turns on the wording of particular statutory provisions. Three cases demonstrate this. In Grant v Borg,³⁵³ the offence charged was under the Immigration Act 1971 s.24(1)(b)(i), which makes it an offence if a non-partial “having only limited leave to ... remain ... knowingly ... remains beyond the time limited by the leave”.

The House of Lords held that a mistake as to whether “leave” had expired was a mistake of law and thus irrelevant. Lord Bridge went so far as to state that:

“The principle that ignorance of the law is no defence in crime is so fundamental that to construe the word ‘knowingly’ in a criminal statute as requiring not merely knowledge of the facts material to the offender’s guilt, but also knowledge of the relevant law, would be revolutionary and, to my mind, wholly unacceptable.”³⁵⁴

But in this case, there was no dispute that the defendant knew it was a crime to overstay his leave. The question was whether he might have been mistaken as to when his leave had expired—surely a question of civil law.

2–277

In Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Hart,³⁵⁵ a somewhat different approach was adopted. In this case, the defendant acted as the auditor of two companies while being disqualified from so acting because he was a director of the companies. He was charged with an offence under the Companies Act 1976 s.13(5) which prohibited a person acting as auditor of a company “at a time when he knows that he is disqualified for appointment to that office”. The defendant admitted he knew all the facts or circumstances disqualifying him, but did not know that he was disqualified in law—in other words, he was unaware of the disqualification and its criminal sanctions—surely a mistake as to whether he had committed a crime which, in principle, is not dissimilar to the mistake made in Lee. Yet the Divisional Court held the defendant must know he was disqualified; an awareness of the statutory restrictions was a prerequisite of liability. As Ormrod LJ said:

“If that means that he is entitled to rely on ignorance of the law as a defence, in contrast to the usual rule, the answer is that the section gives him that right.”³⁵⁶

In *Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1995)*³⁵⁷ the defendant was charged with an offence, contrary to the Banking Act 1987 s.3(1), of accepting deposits in the course of acting as a deposit-taking business without being authorised to do so by the Bank of England. The defendants knew they were accepting deposits but had “no idea” they needed to be licensed by the Bank of England. It was held that as long as the defendants knew the facts which constituted the offence (which they did), they would be liable. The fact that they did not know it was an offence to act as they did without a licence was mere ignorance of the law and no defence. This decision seems correct. If they had mistakenly believed they had acquired a licence, this would be a mistake of fact or civil law (depending on the circumstances). Not knowing it was a crime to fail to acquire a licence was a mistake of criminal law.

A limited exception to the rule that ignorance of the law is no excuse is provided by the Statutory Instruments Act 1946 s.3(2): it is a defence to a crime created by a Statutory Instrument if the instrument has not been published and reasonable steps have not been taken to bring its contents to the notice of the public or the defendant. Further, in Rimmington,³⁵⁸ Lord Bingham stated that under the ECHR art.7 “the law must be adequately accessible—and an individual must have an indication of the legal rules applicable in a given case”. In Christian,³⁵⁹ Lord Woolf, in the Privy Council, stated that it was a “requirement of the rule of law” that persons must “be given actual or at least constructive notice of what the law requires”. He added, however, that “the onus is firmly on a person ... to take the action that is open to him to find out what are the provisions of that law”.

A final question remains for consideration. Is it right that mistake or ignorance of the law should generally have no bearing on the imposition of criminal liability?

PAUL ROBINSON, CRIMINAL LAW

“Austin argues that to permit mistakes as to criminality as an excuse for criminal conduct would be to present insoluble problems of proof (Austin on Jurisprudence: 13th edn 1920). Everyone could claim such ignorance and it could be disproved only with considerable difficulty.

An examination of the structure of a general mistake excuse gives this concern considerable support. It is the one excuse that has no disability, no observance and verifiable abnormality, to lend support to the actor’s claim of an excusing condition. The mistaken actor, except for his mistake, is indistinguishable from all other ‘normal’ persons. Evidence of the defendant’s excusing condition, of his ignorance of criminality, must come solely from circumstantial evidence of his state of mind.

The absence of a distinguishing abnormality not only makes it difficult to distinguish the defendant and to establish his excusing condition, but also makes it more difficult to maintain the integrity of the prohibition violated while excusing the actor for his violation. ‘[O]nce the conduct has been so defined [as criminal], one cannot usurp the lawmaking function by pleading that his ignorance must mean that the conduct is not criminal as to him.’ (Packer, “The Model Penal Code and Beyond” 63 Colum. L. Rev. 594, 596–97, 1963). In light of the heightened need for clear proof and the simultaneous increased difficulty in reliably determining mistake of law claims, one may reasonably concur with Holmes that ‘to admit [such an] excuse at all would be to encourage ignorance where the lawmaker has determined to make men know and obey ...’ (Holmes, The Common Law 48, 1881). It is on the basis of these arguments that ‘ignorance of the law is no excuse’ is a maxim of long standing.”

A. T. H. SMITH, “ERROR AND MISTAKE OF LAW IN ANGLO-AMERICAN CRIMINAL LAW” (1985)
14 ANGLO-AM. L.R. 3, 16–18:

“1. Problems of proof.

... [I]t may be argued that mistakes of fact and law and mistakes of law are not essentially different in kind, and since the inquiry is manifestly not impossible in the case of the former, it is equally not impossible in the latter. This response does not directly confront the brutal utilitarianism that lies behind the objection; it is not so much that proof is impossible but that the pursuit of absolute justice must be curtailed by considerations of social utility and the distribution of resources ...

2. To admit the defence would be to encourage ignorance ...

Even the utilitarian should allow that where a particular individual can show that he has taken all the steps that he conceivably can to conform his conduct to what he reasonably believes to be the dictates of the law, he has done all that can be asked of him.

3. The argument from legality. According to Jerome Hall, ((1976) 24 Am. Jo. Comp. Law 680) if the law were to assess a defendant's culpability on the footing of the law as he believed it to be, then for those purposes the law would be thus and so. This could undercut the rule of law, which relies on an objective law impartially administered by officials who declare what the law is. But this, as has been most persuasively argued, is to fail to distinguish between wrong-doing and attribution, justification and excuse. The mere fact that an individual is not held to be legally accountable for a wrong act does not mean that the act is not condemned; it means only that the actor is not to be blamed for what he did.”

The present approach of English law is perhaps justifiable in relation to the major offences where there is a close correlation between law and morality, for instance, crimes of murder and rape and so on. In Christian,³⁶⁰ the defendants, from Pitcairn Island, argued that they did not know that the English law of rape and sexual abuse applied on their island. This argument was rejected on the ground that rape and sexual abuse are such obvious moral wrongs that they must have known that their conduct was criminal—even if they were unaware of the specific provisions of the law.

Similarly, the present law can be defended in relation to specialist activities in which the actor may be engaged.³⁶¹ However, when turning to the plethora of legislation surrounding modern life, one is forced to question whether this approach is either just or efficacious.

Ashworth³⁶² has argued that (at least) in cases where the defendant has relied upon incorrect official assurances there should be a defence of mistake of law or any prosecution should be stayed as an abuse of the process of court. He cites two cases. In the first, Cambridgeshire and Isle of Ely CC v Rust,³⁶³ the defendant, having made enquiries of local and national authorities, set up a stall beside a highway. After operating and paying rates on the stall for three years, the defendant was prosecuted and convicted of an offence of pitching a stall on a highway with the Divisional Court holding that his mistake of law was irrelevant. However, in Postermobile v Brent LBC,³⁶⁴ a prosecution was stayed for abuse of process in a case where the defendant had been told by officials from the Brent planning department that it would be lawful to erect advertising hoardings. It was held that persons should be able to rely on the statements of public officials: “it was not as though they had requested planning advice from one of the council’s gardeners”. More recently, though, Ashworth has argued in favour of a broader defence of ignorance of the criminal law in limited circumstances.³⁶⁵ He notes that this step has been taken in South Africa, where in *S v De Blom*³⁶⁶ it was held that the defendant’s ignorance of the law prohibiting her from taking jewellery out of the country negated the mens rea required for that offence.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, “IGNORANCE OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, AND DUTIES TO AVOID IT” (2011) 74 M.L.R. 1, 24– 26

2–281

“The aim of this article is to offer a critique of the common law doctrine on ignorance of the criminal law, with a view to moving discussions away from narrow (and unpersuasive) consequentialist arguments and opening up some wider issues of justice and political obligation. Three points have particular significance.

First, the common law doctrine that ignorance of the criminal law is no excuse has been shown to have insecure foundations. To exclude any defence based on ignorance of the criminal law is manifestly unfair, given the diverse, often technical, and changing content of the criminal law. To require actual knowledge of particular conduct's criminality would be to go too far in the other direction, since it is right to expect citizens to make reasonable efforts to find out the criminal law (so long as the State recognises its obligations too). It was argued that a defence of excusable or reasonable ignorance of the law would achieve the best alignment with fairness, bearing in mind the censure inherent in criminal conviction

Secondly, the State's duty of security requires not just the creation of laws to protect us from significant wrongs and harms, but also recognition of the State's obligations in relation to the accessibility of the criminal law and communication of its ambit to adults and to children. If the State takes proper steps to inform its citizens about the criminal law, the incidence of ignorance of the criminal law should decline, there would be fewer unfair convictions, and there might possibly be fewer crimes. The State's primary interest should be in ensuring maximum law-abidance without having to bring prosecutions, and this is in the interests of potential victims too. This obligation also flows from the State's duty of justice, respecting the right of individuals not to be convicted of offences of which it was not reasonable to expect them to have knowledge.

Thirdly, the State's duties of security and justice are particularly engaged in relation to omissions. Offences of omission are unusual in English criminal law, and are known to be so, and therefore the State must make a particular effort to draw any such offence to people's attention ...

These three points should lead the government, the Law Commission and the judiciary to re-appraise their approaches. The common law ignorance-of-law doctrine is theoretically and practically unsustainable. The criminal law, and particularly new crimes and extensions to existing crimes, must be properly communicated to the public. So much for the critical dimension of this article. Much more problematic is the task of devising a fair and workable response to excusable ignorance of the criminal law. Three particular difficulties may be mentioned in conclusion.

First, a defence of reasonable ignorance of the criminal law can only operate if there is a serviceable distinction between ignorance and mistakes of fact and ignorance and mistakes of law ...

Secondly, there are still people who find a nagging attraction in the malum in se concept. The argument above was that there are very few mala in se, because in a culturally diverse country there is a range of different views about right and wrong. That argument is strong in relation to sexual offences, where the boundaries may change in a generation or from one country to another nearby, but it may be much weaker for possession of some types of firearm. Moreover, when members of a household (indeed, a family) stand by and fail to intervene as another family member repeatedly beats his wife, are we not all drawn to the argument that they must have known that it was wrong not to intervene? The answer offered here is that there is a significant distinction between knowing something is wrong and knowing that it is a (serious) criminal offence; and that this distinction is supported by English law's general and known reluctance to recognise positive duties to intervene. Our sympathies may sometimes point in a different direction, but the malum in se argument is too uncertain and too unruly to be relied upon in circumstances where there is excusable or reasonable ignorance of the criminal law. More difficult to accommodate is the probability that many defendants may either suspect that their conduct is close to the borderline of crime or have a kind of partial ignorance, in the sense that they know there are prohibitions on firearms but do not know or are mistaken as to the details. Those cases have been treated here as falling within the ambit of reasonable ignorance, but some would prefer a narrower defence that does not extend to those who suspect that their conduct may be unlawful.

Thirdly, at two crucial stages—in developing the argument for a defence of reasonable or excusable ignorance of the criminal law, and in discussing the State's duty of justice—particular emphasis has been laid on the values of the rule of law and the principle of legality. The criminal law must be certain, prospective and accessible in order to guide people's behaviour. Yet liberal criminal lawyers must note the tension that this creates ... The compromises are evident in the arguments ... in favour of an individual's duty to take reasonable steps to discover the law; in favour of legal specification of duty-situations ...; in favour of the State's duty to make the criminal law reasonably accessible, and to take reasonable steps to communicate it to adults and children, and so forth.”

2–282

Ashworth points to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 as an example of a new piece of legislation that introduced a whole raft of offences, the details of which received little publicity. His argument that citizens should be able to expect to use the criminal law in order to guide their conduct, and that the state therefore has a duty to make the law certain and sufficiently publicised, is a forceful one. With the vast array of regulatory offences, with constantly changing and varying standards of permissible conduct, for example, in relation to obscenity, with the law often being unclear and uncertain even to lawyers, do we necessarily blame all defendants who have made mistakes as to the criminal law? The paradigmatic blameworthy defendant is one who has culpably brought about the prohibited result or state of affairs and has acted in open defiance of the law. With mistake of law there is no such flouting of the rules. Bearing in mind that one is not justifying the wrong done, but merely excusing the actor—and, therefore, an excuse should only be available if the mistake was a reasonable one—there must surely be a strong case for exempting such an actor from criminal liability.

1 Whether an objective failure to conform to a set standard of behaviour (negligence) is accurately described as a species of mens rea is a controversial matter. See paras 2-143–2-146 where a distinction is drawn between cognitive mens rea (involving a subjective mental element) and normative mens rea (involving an assessment of culpability taking account of all the circumstances including a failure to conform to set standards).

2 D. Lanham, “Larsonneur Revisited” [1976] Crim. L.R. 276.

3 Criminal Law: The General Part (1961), p.20; G. Williams, “Statutory Exceptions to Liability and the Burden of Proof” (1976) 126 New L.J. 1032, 1034; see also Williams (Gladstone) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 276.

4 S. H. Kadish, “The Decline of Innocence” (1968) 26 C.L.J. 273, 273–275.

5 This claim is only plausible with regard to justificatory defences. The distinction between justificatory and excusatory defences is discussed at paras 4-001–4-043.

6 See, however, para.2-270 where judicial decisions have lost sight of this simple point and made criminal liability dependent upon a particular mode of analysing the constituent elements of a crime.

- 7 A. T. H. Smith, "On Actus reus and Mens rea" in P. R. Glazebrook (ed), Reshaping the Criminal Law: Essays in Honour of Glanville Williams (London: Stevens, 1978), pp.95, 96, 102.
- 8 R. v Miller (James) [1983] 2 A.C. 161 at 175. See also P. H. Robinson, "Should the Criminal Law Abandon the Actus Reus and Mens Rea Distinction?" in S. Shute, J. Gardner and J. Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1993) who argues that these phrases are misleading and obscure understanding.
- 9 For a view that it could be justifiable to punish evil intentions alone, see D. Husak, "Does Criminal Liability Require an Act?" in A. Duff (ed), Philosophy and the Criminal Law (Cambridge: CUP, 1998). See, generally, R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime (Oxford: Hart, 2007), pp.102–105.
- 10 Duff, Answering for Crime (2007), pp.95–101
- 11 G. Williams, Criminal Law: The General Part (1961), p.2.
- 12 P. H. Robinson, "Should the Criminal Law Abandon the Actus Reus and Mens Rea Distinction?" in S. Shute, J. Gardner and J. Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1993), 191.
- 13 Theft Act 1968 s.1.
- 14 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.1(1).
- 15 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.2.
- 16 Beyond the creation of a danger of injury to others or serious damage to property: the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.2A(3).
- 17 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.1.
- 18 Theft Act 1968 s.2(1)(a).
- 19 R. v White (John) [1910] 2 K.B. 124; See also Re Hensler (1870) 11 Cox C.C. 570.
- 20 R. v Deller (Charles Avon) (1952) 36 Cr. App. R. 184. This case is commonly discussed in relation to The Queen v George Dadson (1850) 2 Den. 35.
- 21 H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 1968), p.100: "It is surely absurd even to attempt to fit omissions into such a picture of voluntary or involuntary conduct ... [because] in the case of omissions no muscular movement or contraction need occur ... [Such a theory] would have very unwelcome consequences for legal responsibility: for the only omissions which would then be culpable would be deliberate omissions. We could then only punish those who failed to stop at traffic lights if they deliberately shot the lights."
- 22 For a discussion of Welzel's view, see G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little Brown, 1978), pp.434–439.
- 23 G. Williams, The Mental Element in Crime (Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1965), p.18.
- 24 This is not, as Packer says, to "be read as plunging into the deep waters of free will vs determinism ... The law is not affirming that some conduct is the product of the free exercise of conscious volition; it is excluding, in a crude kind of way, conduct that in any view is not" (The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (California: Stanford University Press, 1969), p.76).
- 25 K. J. M. Smith and W. Wilson, "Impaired Voluntariness and Criminal Responsibility: Reworking Hart's Theory of Excuses—The English Judicial Response" (1993) 13 O.J.L.S. 69, 74.

- 26 A. Ashworth and J. Horder, Principles of Criminal Law, 7th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2013), p.86.
- 27 J. Gardner, “The Gist of Excuses” [1998] 1 Buff. Crim. L.R. 575.
- 28 For a discussion of the importance of the distinction between exemptions and excuses, see C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), pp.81–82 where it is suggested that it might be helpful to regard the former as “status excuses” and the latter as “non-status excuses”.
- 29 D. Husak, Philosophy of Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1987), p.102. Similarly, while it would be contrary to principle to make it an offence to be HIV positive, it could be permissible to make it an offence to have sexual intercourse while HIV positive.
- 30 See also O’Sullivan v Fisher [1954] S.A.S.R. 33 (S. Aust.); Achterdam (1911) E.D.L. 336 (SA).
- 31 G. R. Sullivan, “Strict Liability for Criminal Offences in England and Wales Following Incorporation into English Law of the European Convention on Human Rights” in A. P. Simester (ed), Appraising Strict Liability (New York: OUP, 2005), p.208.
- 32 Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.1(2)(a).
- 33 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.6(4).
- 34 R. v Miller (James) [1983] 2 A.C. 161 at 175.
- 35 The first draft of the Criminal Code Bill specified the circumstances in which one would be under a duty to act (cl.20(2)). These detailed proposals were dropped from the revised Draft Criminal Code; they were regarded as matters that should remain for the development of the common law (Law Com.No.77 Vol.2 para.7.12). The Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993 cl.19, follows this latter approach (Law Com.No.218, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences against the Person and General Principles Cmnd.2370 (1993)).
- 36 R. v Smith [1979] Crim. L.R. 251; R. v Hood (Kenneth) [2004] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 73.
- 37 Downes (1875) 13 Cox C.C. 111.
- 38 In this case and in Shepherd (1862) 9 Cox C.C. 123, it was indicated that the duty was imposed by statute (Poor Law Amendment Act 1868 s.37). In Downes (1875) 13 Cox C.C. 111, Coleridge CJ deliberately left open the question of whether there would be a duty to act in the absence of such a statutory duty. While many of the earlier cases were decided on this basis, it is now generally accepted that there is a common law duty to act in such cases but there is little express authority on this point.
- 39 R. v Evans (Gemma) [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 at [20].
- 40 Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 at [20], [34].
- 41 People v Beardsley 150 Mich. 206; 113 N.W. 1128; 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1020; 121 Am. St. Rep. 617; 13 Ann. Cas. 39 (1907). This case was cited with approval in England in Sinclair [1998] EWCA Crim 2590.
- 42 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little Brown, 1978), p.613.
- 43 Shepherd (1862) 9 Cox C.C. 123.
- 44 R. v Stone (John Edward) [1977] Q.B. 354. Ashworth describes Lord Lane’s judgment as “notoriously unsatisfactory”, given that it is uncertain whether all three of the duty-supporting reasons he lists (blood relative; assumption of duty by allowing V to stay; assumption of duty by making efforts to wash and feed V) were

- essential: A. Ashworth, “Manslaughter by omission and the rule of law” [2015] Crim. L.R. 563–577, 566.
- 45 R. v Stone (John Edward) [1977] Q.B. 354. An extract from this case can be found at para.2-062.
- 46 R. v Ruffell (Stephen David) [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 53.
- 47 Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 at [34], [35].
- 48 Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 at [36].
- 49 US v Knowles 26 Fed. Cas. 800 (N.D. Cal. 1864).
- 50 W. R. LaFave and A. W. Scott, Criminal Law, 2nd edn (Eagan: West Group, 1986), p.204.
- 51 R. v Pittwood (Philip) (1902) 19 T.L.R. 37.
- 52 Lowe [1973] 1 Q.B. 702. An extract from this case can be found at para.8-050.
- 53 The species of gross negligence manslaughter might be the more appropriate charge in such cases, however.
- 54 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.122, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences against the Person and General Principles (1992), para.6.19.
- 55 See paras 2-059–2-061.
- 56 G. Meade, “Contracting into Crime: A Theory of Criminal Omissions” (1991) 11 O.J.L.S. 147, 171.
- 57 Fagan v MPC [1969] 1 Q.B. 439. The actual reasoning adopted in this case was somewhat different to the proposal here: see para.2-243.
- 58 DPP v Santa-Bermudez [2004] Crim. L.R. 471.
- 59 A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2016), p.79.
- 60 R. v Kennedy (Simon) [2008] 1 A.C. 269; G. Williams, “Gross Negligence Manslaughter and Duty of Care in ‘Drugs’ Cases: R. v Evans” [2009] Crim. L.R. 631, 638.
- 61 Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 at [20].
- 62 “Death, Drugs and Duties” [2009] Archbold News 6, 6–9.
- 63 Hood [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 73.
- 64 L. Katz, Bad Acts and Guilty Minds: Conundrums of the Criminal Law (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), p.143. For further discussion of the distinction between acts and omissions, see A. P. Simester, “Why Omissions are Special” (1995) 1 Legal Theory 311.
- 65 Environmental Agency v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 22.
- 66 B. Hogan, “Omissions and the Duty Myth” in P. Smith (ed), Criminal Law: Essays in Honour of J. C. Smith (London: Butterworths, 1986), pp.85–86.
- 67 H. L. A. Hart and T. Honoré, Causation in the Law, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 1985), p.37.
- 68 J. Feinberg, Harm to Others (New York: OUP, 1984), p.133.
- 69 A. P. Simester, “Why Omissions are Special” (1995) 1 Legal Theory 311.
- 70 A. Ashworth, “The Scope of Criminal Liability for Omissions” (1989) 105 L.Q.R. 424, 425–426.

- 71 J. Murphy, “Blackmail: A Preliminary Inquiry” The Monist 63 No.2 (1980) fn.6; L. K. Stell, “Dueling and the Right to Life” (1979) 90 Ethics 7, 12 cites John Stuart Mill’s distinction between perfect and imperfect obligations: “Duties of perfect obligation are those duties in virtue of which a correlative right resides in some person or persons; duties of imperfect obligation are those moral obligations which do not give birth to any right” (Utilitarianism (1957), p.61).
- 72 Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), p.601.
- 73 M. Moore, Act and Crime: The Philosophy of Action and Its Implications for Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1993), p.59.
- 74 Husak, Philosophy of Criminal Law (1987), p.100. Husak advocates replacing the actus reus requirement in criminal law generally with a “control principle”.
- 75 Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] A.C. 789 at 865.
- 76 See para.2-052.
- 77 G. Hughes, “Criminal Omissions” (1958) 67 Yale L.J. 590, 627; J. Hall, General Principles of Criminal Law (Indianapolis: The Bobs-Merrill Co, 1947), pp.256–266.
- 78 A. Leavens, “A Causation Approach to Criminal Omissions” (1988) 76 Cal. L. Rev. 547, see para.2-052.
- 79 This point was recognised in Miller [1983] 2 A.C. 161, when Lord Diplock indicated that a “passive bystander” could not be said to have caused a fire, or presumably any injuries sustained in the fire.
- 80 Many continental Criminal Codes contain similar and even broader provisions. See A. Ashworth and E. Steiner, “Criminal Omissions and Public Duties: The French Experience” (1990) 10 L.S. 153; Hughes, (1958) 67 Yale L.J. 590, 627, 631–634.
- 81 See, e.g. A. Ashworth, “Manslaughter by omission and the rule of law” [2015] Crim. L.R. 563–577, 576.
- 82 A. Ashworth, “The Boundaries of Criminal Law: Offences of Failure to Report” [2014] Crim. L.R. 1.
- 83 Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.5.
- 84 A. Ashworth, “Ignorance of the Criminal Law, and Duties to Avoid it” (2011) 74(1) M.L.R. 1, 18.
- 85 Ashworth, “Ignorance of the Criminal Law, and Duties to Avoid it” (2011) 74(1) M.L.R. 1, 13.
- 86 Hood [2004] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 73.
- 87 See para.5-059 where this point and the case in which it arose (Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 1992) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 383) are discussed.
- 88 The ensuing discussion of Welansky is drawn from the report of the case itself, from H. R. Veltford and G. E. Lee, “The Cocoanut Grove Fire: A Study in Scapegoating” (No.2 clinical supp.; 1943) Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology XXXVIII 138, 141–154, and from J. Goldstein, A. M. Dershowitz and R. D. Schwartz, Criminal Law: Theory and Process (Macmillan, 1974), pp.833–837.
- 89 The Boston Globe 28 December 1970, p.10 col.3. See Goldstein, Dershowitz and Schwartz, Criminal Law: Theory and Process (1974), p.836.
- 90 Welansky 55 N.E. 2d 902 at 905.
- 91 Letter by F. Lichtenstein, cited in See Goldstein, Dershowitz and Schwartz, Criminal Law: Theory and Process (1974), p.835.

- 92 Letter by K. Denehy, cited in See Goldstein, Dershowitz and Schwartz, Criminal Law: Theory and Process (1974), pp.835–836.
- 93 M. Moore, “The Metaphysics of Causal Intervention” (2000) 88 Cal. L.R. 827.
- 94 S. J. Morse, “The Moral Metaphysics of Causation and Results” (2000) 88 Cal. L.R. 879.
- 95 A. Norrie, “A Critique of Criminal Causation” (1991) 54 M.L.R. 685, 701.
- 96 C. S. Kenny and J. W. C. Turner, Kenny’s Outlines of Criminal Law, 19th edn (Cambridge, CUP, 1966), pp.20–21. See Royall v The Queen (1991) 65 A.L.J.R. 451 per McHugh J, discussed in S. Shute, “Causation: Foreseeability v Natural Consequences” (1992) 55 M.L.R. 584.
- 97 G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (London: Stevens, 1983), p.381.
- 98 National Rivers Authority v Yorkshire Water Services Ltd [1994] 4 All E.R. 274; Alphacell v Woodward [1972] A.C. 824.
- 99 N. Padfield, “Clean Water and Muddy Causation: Is Causation a Question of Law or Fact, or Just a Way of Allocating Blame?” [1995] Crim. L.R. 683, 692–693.
- 100 Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 22. See also Southern Water Authority v Pegrum and Pegrum [1989] Crim. L.R. 442.
- 101 Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 22 at 33.
- 102 Alphacell v Woodward [1972] A.C. 854.
- 103 Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 at [29].
- 104 V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.175–181.
- 105 Norrie, “A Critique of Criminal Causation” (1991) 54 M.L.R. 685, 692.
- 106 White [1910] 2 K.B. 124.
- 107 R. v Malcherek (Richard Tadeusz) (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 173.
- 108 R. v Smith (Thomas Joseph) [1959] 2 Q.B. 35; R. v Mitchell (Ronald James) [1983] 2 W.L.R. 938.
- 109 R. v Cato (Ronald Philip) [1976] 1 W.L.R. 110; R. v Notman [1994] Crim. L.R. 518.
- 110 Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 2nd edn (1985), p.4.
- 111 R. v Pagett (David Keith) (1983) 75 Cr. App. R. 279.
- 112 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.3ZB, inserted by the Road Safety Act 2006. In 2015, the version of the offence based on disqualified driving was replaced by s.29 of the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, which inserted s.3ZC into the 1988 Act.
- 113 Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 at [17].
- 114 R. v Williams (Jason John) [2010] EWCA Crim 2552.
- 115 G. R. Sullivan and A. P. Simester, “Causation Without Limits: Causing Death While Driving Without a Licence, While Disqualified or Without Insurance” [2012] Crim. L.R. 753–766.
- 116 R. v McKechnie (Roy Maurer) (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 51.
- 117 R. v Watson (Clarence Archibald) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 684. See also Towers (1874) 12 Cox C.C. 530 and Hayward (1908) 21 Cox C.C. 692. For a medical explanation of how one can frighten someone to death, see A. Busuttil and A. McCall Smith, “Fright, Stress and Homicide” (1990) 54 Jo.C.L. 257.
- 118 Hayward (1908) 21 Cox C.C. 692.

- 119 Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 at [22].
- 120 R. v Cheshire (David William) (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 251.
- 121 Hart [1986] NZLR 48, cited by A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan's Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart 2016), p.95.
- 122 Environment Agency v Brook Plc The Times 26 March 1998.
- 123 Express Ltd (t/a Express Dairies Distribution) v Environment Agency [2003] 2 All E.R. 778.
- 124 Hoffmann, "Causation" (2005) 30 L.Q.R. 121.
- 125 Ormerod, Commentary to Kennedy (No.2) [2008] Crim. L.R. 224.
- 126 Some 10 years later the deceased girl's mother was awarded damages against the police for their negligent handling of the siege (The Guardian 4 and 5 December 1990).
- 127 R. v Gnango (Armel) [2011] UKSC 59 at [131]–[132].
- 128 See para.2-254 below and Ch.6 paras 6-068-6-069 where this case is extracted.
- 129 Malcherek (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 173.
- 130 Ashworth and Horder, Principles of Criminal Law, 7th edn (2013), p.111.
- 131 R. v Corbett (Christopher) [1996] Crim. L.R. 594.
- 132 R. v M (Richard) (A Juvenile) [2000] Crim. L.R. 372.
- 133 R. v Tarasov (Valodia) (2016) LTL 23/11/2016.
- 134 Kennedy (No.1) [1999] Crim. L.R. 65.
- 135 Dias [2001] 2 Cr. App. R. 96.
- 136 R. v Finlay (Paul Anthony) [2003] EWCA Crim 3868.
- 137 The approach adopted in R. v Kennedy (No.2) [2008] 1 A.C. 269 has since been rejected in Scotland: MacAngus and Kane v HM Advocate [2009] H.C.J.A.C. 8.
- 138 T. H. Jones, "Causation, Homicide and the Supply of Drugs" (2006) 26 L.S. 139, 149.
- 139 L. Cherkassky, "Kennedy and Unlawful Act Manslaughter: An Unorthodox Application of the Doctrine of Causation" (2008) 72 Jo.C.L. 387.
- 140 R. Heaton, "Principals? No Principles" [2004] Crim. L.R. 463, 464.
- 141 R. v Khan (Rungzabe) [1998] Crim. L.R. 830.
- 142 MacAngus and Kane v HM Advocate [2009] H.C.J.A.C. 8, citing T. H. Jones, "Causation, Homicide and the Supply of Drugs" (2006) 26 L.S. 139.
- 143 Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 at [22].
- 144 Simester and Sullivan explain this apparent anomaly on the basis that "[t]he difference lies in a peculiarity of constitutive manslaughter: V's taking of the drug was freely chosen in Kennedy, and it was not caused by Kennedy's unlawful act of supplying the heroin": A. P. Simester and G. R. Sullivan, "Causation as Fault" (2014) 73(1) C.L.J. 14–17, 16.
- 145 Hayward (1908) 21 Cox C.C. 692.
- 146 R. v McKechnie (Roy Maurer) (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 51.
- 147 See also Holland (1841) 2 Mood. & R. 351 where a victim, who could have recovered, ignored medical advice and died 2 weeks later; the original assailant was held to have caused the death.

- 148 Lewis 124 Cal. 551; 57 Pac. 470 (1889).
- 149 R. v Dear [1996] Crim. L.R. 596.
- 150 R. v Dhaliwal [2006] EWCA Crim 1139.
- 151 The defendant was convicted of murder in R. v Dear [1996] Crim. L.R. 596. In R. v Blaue (1975) 61 Cr. App. R. 271, the conviction was for manslaughter by diminished responsibility.
- 152 The approach in R. v Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 was affirmed by the Supreme Court in another case of constructive liability involving road death. In Taylor [2016] UKSC 5 the certified question to be addressed was whether the offence of aggravated vehicle taking under the Theft Act 1968 s.12A is committed when, following the basic offence (of taking a vehicle without the owner's consent) and before recovery of the vehicle, the defendant drove the vehicle, and without fault in the manner of his driving the vehicle was involved in an accident which caused injury [or death] to a person. The Supreme Court answered the question in the negative, taking the same approach as in Hughes and requiring that some fault in D's driving must be found before he can be said to have caused V's death.
- 153 B. Williams, "Moral Responsibility and Political Freedom" [1997] C.L.J. 96.
- 154 R. A. Duff and A. von Hirsch, "Responsibility, Retribution and the 'Voluntary': A Response to Williams" [1997] C.L.J. 103, 109.
- 155 F. G. Jacobs, Criminal Responsibility (London: Orion Publishing Group, 1971), p.13.
- 156 Duff and von Hirsch "Responsibility, Retribution and the 'Voluntary': A Response to Williams" [1997] C.L.J. 103, 109.
- 157 Duff and von Hirsch "Responsibility, Retribution and the 'Voluntary': A Response to Williams" [1997] C.L.J. 103, 104.
- 158 See generally, N. Lacey, State Punishment: Political Principles and Community Values (London: Routledge, 1988), pp.62–68; J. Horder, "Criminal Culpability: The Possibility of a General Theory" (1993) 12 Law and Philosophy 193; N. Lacey, "In Search of the Responsible Subject: History, Philosophy and Social Sciences in Criminal Law Theory" (2001) 64 M.L.R. 350. V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), Ch.2.
- 159 Arenella would insist that an actor also be capable of some form of moral evaluation and be able to incorporate these moral beliefs and values into practical judgments about how to act. ("Convicting the Morally Blameless: Reassessing the Relationship between Legal and Moral Accountability" (1992) 39 U.C.L.A. Law Rev. 1511.) This approach is not accepted by present English law.
- 160 Because of the danger of repetition of harm in such circumstances, it might be necessary to retain control over the defendant.
- 161 A. Norrie, "The Limits of Justice: Finding Fault in the Criminal Law" (1996) 59 M.L.R. 540, 552.
- 162 N. Lacey, State Punishment: Political Principles and Community Values (London: Routledge, 1988), p.66.
- 163 M. S. Moore, "Choice, Character and Excuse" (1990) 7 Social Philosophy and Policy 29; J. Horder, "Criminal Culpability: The Possibility of a General Theory" (1993) Law and Philosophy 193, 207.
- 164 J. R. Lindgren, "Criminal Responsibility Reconsidered" (1987) 6 Law and

- Philosophy* 89, 94. This criticism of the character theory is rejected by V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.49–51.
- 165 R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart, 2007), p.20.
- 166 Chandler [1964] A.C. 763.
- 167 H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 1968), Ch.3.
- 168 Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 1968), p.181.
- 169 R. v Misra (Amit) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21 at 57.
- 170 Overarching Principles: Seriousness (2004), p.4.
- 171 C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), pp.19–20, 56.
- 172 Amirthalingam suggests that mens rea could be construed as follows: the “mens” should refer to the state of mind of the defendant and the “rea” should involve a normative evaluation of that mental state in all the circumstances. The better view is that this evaluation should include—but not be limited to—the defendant’s mental state.
- 173 This approach was rejected in R. v Kingston (Barry) [1995] 2 A.C. 355.
- 174 No.6530 C.72, Warwick Crown Court; tried 22–24 November 1972.
- 175 Fletcher regards the reaction to this case as “even more unfortunate” than the decision itself in that English judges and commentators have “gone to the opposite extreme” in eschewing “any reliance on the projected behaviour of a reasonable person” (Rethinking Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1978), p.704).
- 176 e.g. Law Commission, Imputed Criminal Intent (Director of Public Prosecutions v Smith), 1965.
- 177 See also Frankland (Graham Ralph) v The Queen [1987] A.C. 576 where the Privy Council reiterated the point that the test is a subjective one.
- 178 A. Sanders, “Some Dangers of Policy Oriented Research—The Case of Prosecutions” in I. Dennis (ed), Criminal Law and Justice (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1987), p.208.
- 179 R. Bartle, Crime and the New Magistrate (London: B. Rose, 1985), quoted from D. Nelken, “Criminal Law and Criminal Justice” in I. Dennis (ed), Criminal Law and Justice (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1987), p.149.
- 180 R. v Ingram [1975] Crim. L.R. 457.
- 181 R. v Venna (Henson George) [1976] Q.B. 421.
- 182 This was the view (obiter) of the House of Lords in R. v Lemon (Denis) [1979] A.C. 617, and was arguably the view adopted in Hyam v DPP [1975] A.C. 55. The alternative interpretation of Hyam is that the House of Lords was there defining “malice aforethought”, the mens rea of murder—and not defining “intention”. See generally, J. Buzzard, “Intent” [1978] Crim. L.R. 5 and J. C. Smith, “‘Intent’: A Reply” [1978] Crim. L.R. 14.
- 183 Hyam [1975] A.C. 55.
- 184 This section was italicised by Lord Steyn in Woollin when he cited this passage with approval.
- 185 In R. v Hales (Ricky) [2005] EWCA Crim 1118 it was held that it was enough that the defendant was “prepared to kill” in order to escape police custody (at [28]).

- 186 R. A. Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability: Philosophy of Action and the Criminal Law (London: Blackwell, 1990), p.61. See also R. A. Duff, “Intention, Mens Rea and the Law Commission Report” [1980] Crim. L.R. 147, 150–151.
- 187 Gollins v Gollins [1964] A.C. 644 at 664.
- 188 R. A. Duff, “The Obscure Intentions of the House of Lords” [1986] Crim. L.R. 771, 779; R. A. Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability: Philosophy of Action and the Criminal Law (London: Blackwell, 1990), p.58.
- 189 Gregory and Mott [1995] Crim. L.R. 507; R. v Fallon [1994] Crim. L.R. 519.
- 190 Mohan [1976] 1 Q.B. 1.
- 191 See also Gilmour [2000] Cr. App. R. 407.
- 192 In R. v Walker (John Charles) (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 226, it was held that a mere request from a jury for a further direction did not make the case a rare and exceptional one requiring a direction on foresight.
- 193 R. v MD [2004] EWCA Crim 1391 at [29]. See also R. v Allen (Tony John) [2005] EWCA Crim 1344 at [63] and Hales [2005] EWCA Crim 1118 at [27].
- 194 MD [2004] EWCA Crim 1391 at [36].
- 195 Some commentators have suggested that the substitution of “find” for “infer” “seems a clear indication that the connection between virtual certainty and intention is not merely evidential” (A. Simester, “Murder, Mens Rea and the House of Lords-Again” (1999) 115 L.Q.R. 17). However, the jury is only entitled to find intention suggesting that this is still an evidential proposition.
- 196 R. v Stringer (Matthew) [2008] EWCA Crim 1222.
- 197 W. Wilson, “Doctrinal Rationality after Woollin” (1999) 62 M.L.R. 448, 155.
- 198 Norrie has argued that one can only infer intention from foresight where intention connotes direct intention plus foresight of a moral certainty (oblique intention) because one cannot infer a mental state (A) from the facts (b) where A and b are qualitatively different (A. Norrie, “Oblique Intention and Legal Politics” [1989] Crim. L.R. 793, 803). However, as Duff has effectively responded: “intention is inferable from foresight only if they are distinct”; if they are the same thing, no further inference is needed (“The Politics of Intention: A Response to Norrie” [1990] Crim. L.R. 637, 639).
- 199 J. Smith “Commentary to Woollin” [1998] Crim. L.R. 891.
- 200 Duff, “The Obscure Intentions of the House of Lords” [1986] Crim. L.R. 771.
- 201 This approach is criticised in C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), p.213. Norrie says it “permits the law to have its principled cake of subjectivism, and to eat it” (“Oblique Intention and Legal Politics” [1989] Crim. L.R. 793, 806).
- 202 W. Wilson, “Doctrinal Rationality after Woollin” (1999) 62 M.L.R. 448, 456.
- 203 J. Horder, “Intention in the Criminal Law—A Rejoinder” (1995) 58 M.L.R. 678, 687.
- 204 “Murder and the Structure of Homicide” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law (Oxford: OUP, 2000), p.48.
- 205 A similar approach was approved (obiter) in Burke v GMC [2005] EWCA Civ 1003.
- 206 A. P. Simester and S. Shute, Letter to the Editor [2000] Crim. L.R. 204.
- 207 R. A. Duff, “Intention, Mens Rea and the Law Commission Report” [1980] Crim. L.R. 147 at 152–154.

- 208 Norrie, “Oblique Intention and Legal Politics” [1989] Crim. L.R. 793 at 797.
- 209 Assuming the consequence was foreseen as virtually certain. Note that Pedain’s argument is that this should not be a prerequisite: all that she requires is an intention to expose someone to a risk coupled with endorsement of the possible consequences. Such an approach would significantly broaden the current English concept of intention.
- 210 See paras 4-200–4-204.
- 211 W. Wilson, “A Plea for Rationality in the Law of Murder” (1990) 10 L.S. 307, 310.
- 212 Duff, “The Politics of Intention: A Response to Norrie” [1990] Crim. L.R. 637, 638.
- 213 This view was adopted in R. v Purcell (Frank) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 45; R. v AMK (Property Management) [1985] Crim. L.R. 600; Bryson [1985] Crim. L.R. 669; R. v Burke (Alisdair David) [1988] Crim. L.R. 839.
- 214 Glanville Williams, “Oblique Intention” [1987] C.L.J. 417, 435–437.
- 215 Duff, “Intention, Mens Rea and the Law Commission Report” [1980] Crim. L.R. 147; R. A. Duff, “Intentions Legal and Philosophical” (1989) 9 O.J.L.S. 76. A similar argument for a variable meaning has been put forward by Buzzard J (“Intent” [1978] Crim. L.R. 5).
- 216 Duff, “Intention, Mens Rea and the Law Commission Report” [1980] Crim. L.R. 147, 148.
- 217 R. v Belfon (Horace Adrian) (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 59 at 60.
- 218 N. Lacey, “A Clear Concept of Intention: Elusive or Illusory?” (1993) M.L.R. 621, 634.
- 219 Law Commission Paper No.89, Report on the Mental Element of Crime (1978), p.56.
- 220 C. Finkelstein, “No Harm No Foul? Objectivism and the Law of Attempts” (1999) 18 Law and Philosophy 69, 75.
- 221 Lacey, “A Clear Concept of Intention: Elusive or Illusory?” (1993) M.L.R. 621, 633. Lacey has argued that the appeal to “ordinary usage” implies that the criminal law “operates on the basis of widely shared meanings and widely endorsed judgments. It hence suppresses the idea that criminal law is hierarchical, an exercise of power, based on meanings which are imposed” (p.636).
- 222 Horder, “Intention in the Criminal Law—a Rejoinder” (1995) 58 M.L.R. 678, 679, summarising Lacey’s views.
- 223 C. M. V. Clarkson and H. M. Keating, “Codification: Offences against the Person under the Draft Criminal Code” (1986) 50 J. Crim. L. 405, 410.
- 224 For a discussion of these issues, see the 4th edn of this book at p.147.
- 225 Criminal Law Revision Committee (14th Report, Offences against the Person, Cmnd.7844 (1980) para.10; Law Commission, Draft Criminal Code (1989); Law Commission, Draft Criminal Law Bill (1993). These proposals did not use the terminology of “virtual certainty” but rather “knows that it would occur in the ordinary course of events if he were to succeed in his purpose of causing some other result”. This approach also represents the common law position in the US where Burger CJ in United States v United States Gypsum (438 U.S. 422) held that a person intended a result “when he knows that the result is practically certain to follow from his conduct, whatever his desire may be as to that result”. The Canadian Law Reform Commission produced an even stricter definition that the defendant must act “in order to effect: (a) that consequence; or (b) another consequence which he knows involves that consequence” (Report 31, Recodifying Criminal Law (1987); see J. C.

- Smith, “A Note on ‘Intention’” [1990] Crim. L.R. 85).
- 226 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), paras 4.3, 4.4.
- 227 Duff, “Intention, Mens Rea and The Law Commission Report” [1980] Crim. L.R. 147, 159.
- 228 Duff does, however, argue that such direct intention should only be required in exceptional cases (see para.2-166 above).
- 229 American Law Institute, Model Penal Code s.2.02(2)(a) prefers the term “purposely”. However, most code revisions have used this same definition for the term “intention”.
- 230 American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Tent. Draft No.4 (1955) art.2 pp.124, 125.
- 231 Alaska Stat. tit. 11 ss.11.41.100, 110.
- 232 N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. ss.630: 1-a, b.
- 233 This need not be scientific certainty, but the consequence must be inseparable in terms of the agent’s conception of the world as he understands it (A. P. Simester, “Moral Certainty and the Boundaries of Intention” (1996) 16 O.J.L.S. 445, 459).
- 234 Hyam [1975] A.C. 55 at 73.
- 235 See para.2-149.
- 236 Norrie, above, fn.198 denies the possibility of drawing such a distinction on the basis that virtual certainty “denote[s] the only kind of certainty that it is ever possible to have in any practical intervention in the natural or social world”. This ignores the fact that one is dealing with a subjective concept. It is the defendant’s aims and foresight that matter. To most defendants firing at the person standing behind the window, it is only possible to shoot the victim by breaking the glass. The fact that it might actually be possible to achieve the result without breaking the window (an earthquake might break the glass at the critical moment) does not alter the fact that the defendant is trying to break the window.
- 237 Law Commission Paper No.177 (1989) cl.20(1).
- 238 Andrews v DPP [1937] A.C. 576.
- 239 R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034.
- 240 R. v Cunningham (Roy) [1957] 2 Q.B. 396. See also R. v Briggs (Basil Ian) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 605; R. v Parker (Daryl Clive) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 600; Law Commission Paper No.89, Report on the Mental Element in Crime, 1978, paras 20–21.
- 241 For the sake of simplicity, the remainder of this section will refer only to consequences, but this should be taken to include circumstances.
- 242 Law Commission Paper No.31, Working Paper on the Mental Element in Crime, p.53.
- 243 Vehicle Inspectorate v Nuttall [1999] 1 W.L.R. 629.
- 244 R. v Dodman (Darryl Philip) [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 338.
- 245 A. Norrie, “Subjectivism, Objectivism and the Limits of Criminal Recklessness” (1992) 12 O.J.L.S. 45.
- 246 J. A. G. Griffiths, The Politics of the Judiciary, 4th edn (London: Fontana Press, 1991).
- 247 Law Commission Paper No.218, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences against the Person and General Principles (1993).

- 248 The Road Traffic Act 1988, as amended by the Road Traffic Act 1991, has replaced these offences with those of causing death by dangerous driving (s.1) and dangerous driving (s.2).
- 249 G. Williams, “Recklessness Redefined” [1981] C.L.J. 252, 278–281; G. Williams, “Divergent Interpretations of Recklessness” (1982) 132 N.L.J. 289, 313, 336 at 313–314, 336; J. Smith [1981] Crim. L.R. 393, 394.
- 250 Chief Constable of Avon v Shimmen (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 7.
- 251 Williams, “Recklessness Redefined” [1981] C.L.J. 252; Williams, “Divergent Interpretations of Recklessness” (1982) 132 N.L.J. 289, 313, 336 at 289–290; G. Syrota, “A Radical Change in the Law of Recklessness” [1982] Crim. L.R. 97, 252 Above, para.2-191 (emphasis added).
- 253 R. v R (Stephen Malcolm) (1984) 79 Cr. App. R. 334.
- 254 This approach of endowing the reasonable person with such characteristics was employed in the former partial defence of provocation (and in its replacement, loss of control) and in the defence of duress.
- 255 R. v Bell (David) [1984] 3 All E.R. 842.
- 256 Williams, “Recklessness Redefined” [1981] C.L.J. 252, 276. In Lamb [1990] Crim. L.R. 522 it was held that juries must be directed that the risk must be serious in reckless driving cases.
- 257 Simpson v Peat [1952] 2 Q.B. 24. See also: Taylor [2016] UKSC 5.
- 258 R. v Seymour (Edward John) [1983] 2 A.C. 493.
- 259 R. v Seymour (Edward John) [1983] 2 A.C. 493 at 412. Lord Ackner endorsed this view (at 402).
- 260 Air Navigation Order 1980 art.45, made under the Civil Aviation Act 1982 ss.60 and 61 prohibiting reckless acts likely to endanger aircraft or persons therein (Warburton-Pitt (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 135); The Data Protection Act 1984 s.5 (subsequently repealed by the Data Protection Act 1998) (Data Protection Registrar v Amnesty International [1995] Crim. L.R. 633). For further examples, see D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.137.
- 261 Blakely v DPP [1991] Crim. L.R. 763.
- 262 Mir, The Independent 23 May 1994.
- 263 James, The Times 2 October 1997.
- 264 This point was, however, not beyond doubt: see the 5th edn of this book, pp.164–165.
- 265 e.g. the Sea Fishing (Enforcement of Community Control Measures) Regulations 1985 reg.3(2) (Large v Mainprize [1990] 1 All E.R. 331).
- 266 Booth v CPS [2006] EWHC 192 (Admin).
- 267 Brady [2006] EWCA Crim 2413.
- 268 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 2003) [2004] Cr. App. R. 367 at 371. See also R. v C [2007] EWCA Crim 1068. It is, of course, possible for Parliament expressly to provide an objective definition of recklessness in a specific statute: see, e.g. Uranium Enrichment Technology (Prohibition of Disclosure) Regulations 2004 (SI 2004/1818) (made under the Anti-terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 s.80(7)) reg.2(2) of which defines recklessness as including being “indifferent” as to whether a risk is created and “fail[ing] to give any thought to the possibility” of creating a risk.

- 269 J. Stannard, "Subjectivism, Objectivism, and the Draft Criminal Code" (1985) 101 L.Q.R. 540, 543.
- 270 J. Smith [1981] Crim. L.R. 393, 394.
- 271 Williams, "Recklessness Redefined" [1981] C.L.J. 252.
- 272 Lamb [1967] 2 Q.B. 981.
- 273 Above, fn.271 at pp.281–282.
- 274 R. A. Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability (London: Blackwell, 1990), pp.165–166. Similarly, Horder argues that rather than basing culpability on cognition, we should adopt "a moral theory whose focus is the evaluation of actions stemming from the desires associated with emotions". ("Cognition, Emotion, and Criminal Culpability" (1990) 106 L.Q.R. 469, 476.)
- 275 Williams, "Recklessness Redefined" [1981] C.L.J. 252, 272.
- 276 It is interesting that Duff concludes that advertent risk-taking necessarily exhibits practical indifference whereas inadvertent risk-taking has to pass the "lack of concern" test thereby demonstrating indifference. This is criticised by Gardner and Jung: J. Gardner and H. Jung, "Making Sense of Mens Rea: Anthony Duff's Account" (1991) 11 O.J.L.S. 559.
- 277 Law Commission, Working Paper No.31, p.57.
- 278 Overarching Principles: Seriousness (2004), p.4. See above, fn.X.
- 279 Criminal Justice Act 1993 s.52.
- 280 Protection from Harassment Act 1997 ss.1(1), 2(1).
- 281 Firearms Act 1968 s.25.
- 282 DPP v Morgan [1976] A.C. 182.
- 283 This question will be addressed in more detail below in Ch.7. The Court of Appeal has considered the question of whether account can or cannot be taken of the defendant's mental condition in deciding whether he held a reasonable belief in consent. It was held that a defendant's delusional belief in consent owing to his schizophrenia cannot in law render reasonable a belief that his partner was consenting when she was not. Beliefs in consent arising from conditions such as delusional psychotic illness or personality disorders must be judged by objective standards of reasonableness and not by taking into account a mental disorder which induced a belief which could not reasonably arise without it: R. v B [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 36.
- 284 RSPA v C [2006] EWHC 1069 (Admin).
- 285 It should be noted that the offence under the Protection of Animals Act 1911 has now been replaced by the Animal Welfare Act 2006 s.4. It has been held in relation to that offence, that the requirement that the defendant "knew, or ought reasonably to have known, that the act, or failure to act" would cause an animal to suffer was an entirely objective test of negligence: R. (Gray) v Aylesbury Crown Court [2013] EWHC Admin 500.
- 286 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), para.3.185.
- 287 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.3ZA.
- 288 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.2A.
- 289 Milton v DPP [2007] R.T.R. 43 at [27].

- 290 R. v Bannister (Craig) [2010] R.T.R. 4.
- 291 Model Penal Code, Tentative Draft No.4 pp.126–127.
- 292 P. Brett, An Inquiry into Criminal Guilt (Sydney: Law Book Company of Australasia, 1963), p.98.
- 293 Above, para.2-208.
- 294 Reid (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 393 at 406.
- 295 Compare Williams, “Recklessness Redefined” [1981] C.L.J. 252, 261: “can it possibly be said, with justice, that a driver who opens his door being momentarily forgetful of risk is ‘no less blameworthy’ than the driver who realises the possibility of causing injury to a cyclist whom he sees approaching but flings open his door regardless?”.
- 296 See paras 2-258–2-262.
- 297 Law Commission Paper No.177 cl.20(1).
- 298 Hart, above, para.2-220 at p.136.
- 299 Shorty (1950) S.R. 280.
- 300 R. v Church (Cyril David) (1965) 49 Cr. App. R. 206.
- 301 See also R. v Moore and Dorn [1975] Crim. L.R. 229. In Att-Gen’s Reference (No.4 of 1980) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 705 the Court of Appeal left open the question whether this “series of acts” test was a correct extension of the Thabo Meli principle.
- 302 Ashworth and Horder, Principles of Criminal Law, 7th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2013), p.159.
- 303 This solution was not adopted in Shorty (1950) S.R. 280. It is submitted that under English causation principles, Shorty would be regarded as wrong.
- 304 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 1994) [1997] 3 All E.R. 936 at 942.
- 305 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 1994) [1997] 3 All E.R. 936 at 956–957.
- 306 A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2016), p.179.
- 307 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.155.
- 308 Brown (1983) 79 Cr. App. R. 115.
- 309 R. v Boreman (Victor) [2000] 1 All E.R. 307.
- 310 Miller [1983] A.C. 161. A fuller extract from this case is provided at para.2-042.
- 311 Latimer (1886) 17 Q.B.D. 369. For a more recent illustration of transferred malice (and where the doctrine was expressly approved), see Mitchell (1983) 75 Cr. App. R. 293. In Jones (Peter) [1987] Crim. L.R. 701 the doctrine was applied in a provocation case.
- 312 Pembliton (1874) 12 Cox 607.
- 313 Gnango [2011] UKSC 59.
- 314 See Ch.6 below.
- 315 See R. Buxton, “Being an accessory to one’s own murder” [2012] Crim. L.R. 275–281.
- 316 This point was accepted in Slimmings [1999] Crim. L.R. 69. The indictment would need to specify that D caused grievous bodily harm to P with intent to cause grievous bodily harm to O.

- 317 D. Stroud, Mens Rea (1914), p.184; G. Williams, “Convictions and Fair Labelling” [1983] C.L.J. 85, 86–88.
- 318 Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993 cl.32 (Law Com. No.218, 1993); Draft Offences against the Person Bill 1998 cl.17.
- 319 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.4 of 2000) [2001] Crim. L.R. 578.
- 320 Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(1).
- 321 Smith (David) [1974] Q.B. 354.
- 322 R. v Ellis (Ian) [1987] Crim. L.R. 44.
- 323 J. Smith has pointed out that this decision might have been unexceptional when the importation of prohibited drugs and pornographic material were both punishable with 2 years’ imprisonment—but it becomes questionable now that the penalties in relation to drugs have been increased ([1987] Crim. L.R. 46). In Leeson [2001] 1 Cr. App. R. 233 the defendant was in possession of cocaine (a Class A drug) but believed it was an amphetamine (a Class B drug). The court concluded that the relevance of the different classes of drugs related only to sentencing.
- 324 R. v Taaffe (Paul Desmond) [1984] A.C. 539.
- 325 See R. v Forbes (Giles) [2002] 2 A.C. 512 where the “Taaffe defence” was approved—but on the facts the jury had rejected the defence.
- 326 Tolson (1889) 23 Q.B. 168.
- 327 R. v K [2002] 1 A.C. 462.
- 328 Ormerod, Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law, 13th edn (2011), p.332.
- 329 There is a further type of mistake that a defendant can make with regard to self-defence. He might mistakenly believe that it is necessary to use more force than is actually necessary. See paras 4-097–4-110.
- 330 Albert v Lavin [1982] A.C. 546.
- 331 R. v Faraj (Shwan) [2007] EWCA Crim 1033.
- 332 Graham [1982] 1 W.L.R. 294.
- 333 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] A.C. 417.
- 334 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467.
- 335 R. v Martin (Colin) [1989] 1 All E.R. 652.
- 336 However, in R. v Martin (David Paul) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 42 it was held that the Williams (Gladstone) principle did apply to duress. However, this approach was rejected by the House of Lords in Hasan [2005] 2 A.C. 467. See below, para.4-170. 337 O’Grady [1987] Q.B. 995. See also Hatton [2006] Crim. L.R. 353.
- 338 R. v Fotheringham (William Bruce) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 206 at 416.
- 339 Law Commission Paper No.314, Intoxication and Criminal Liability (2009), Draft Criminal Law (Intoxication) Bill 2009 cl.5(3)(b).
- 340 See R. H. S. Tur, “Subjectivism and Objectivism: Towards Synthesis” in S. Shute, J. Gardner and J. Horder, Action and Value in Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1993), p.213, pp.217–222 for a view that this process of reclassifying defence elements as definitional elements has been largely a matter of “dry legal technique” flowing from a commitment to subjectivism with the consequence that pressing moral and public concerns have been overlooked.

- 341 For a criticism of our suggested approach, see Simester, Simester and Sullivan's Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart 2016), p.699.
- 342 Above, fn.335.
- 343 Martin [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 42.
- 344 Law Commission Paper No.177 cl.41(1).
- 345 A. Ashworth and J. Horder, Principles of Criminal Law, 7th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2013), p.218.
- 346 J. Hall, General Principles of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (Clark: The Lawbook Exchange Ltd, 1960).
- 347 O. W. Holmes, The Common Law (Mineola: Dover Publications, 1881), p.45.
- 348 Smith (David) [1974] Q.B. 354.
- 349 Both the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.2(5)(2)(a) and the Theft Act 1968 s.2(1) provide that defendants are not liable if they believe they have a legal right to damage or appropriate the property of another.
- 350 The Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 (Law Com.No.177, 1989) endorses this approach: "Ignorance or mistake as to a matter of law does not affect liability to conviction of an offence except—(a) where it is so provided; or (b) where it negatives a fault element of the offence" (cl.21).
- 351 Lee [2001] 1 Cr. App. R. 293.
- 352 See also Doring [2002] Crim. L.R. 817 where a defendant claimed she did not believe what she was doing amounted to "management" of companies for the purpose of bankruptcy offences. This belief was dismissed as irrelevant. 353 Grant v Borg [1982] 1 W.L.R. 638.
- 354 Grant v Borg [1982] 1 W.L.R. 638 at 646. See to similar effect, R. v Millward (Neil Frederick) [1985] Q.B. 519.
- 355 Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Hart [1982] 1 W.L.R. 481.
- 356 Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Hart [1982] 1 W.L.R. 481 at 487.
- 357 Att-Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1995) [1996] 4 All E.R. 21.
- 358 R. v Rimmington (Anthony) [2005] UKHL 63.
- 359 Christian [2006] 2 A.C. 400.
- 360 Christian [2006] 2 A.C. 400.
- 361 Some countries provide a defence of mistake of law but exclude it in such situations, e.g. Norway (Penal Code of 1902–57, added 1939). See also A. L. I. Model Penal Code, Proposed Official Draft 1962 s.2.04(3). See G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (London: Little, Brown, 1978), pp.713–736.
- 362 Andrew Ashworth, "Testing Fidelity to Legal Values: Official Involvement and Criminal Justice" (2000) 63 M.L.R. 633.
- 363 Cambridgeshire and Isle of Ely CC v Rust [1972] 1 Q.B. 426.
- 364 Postermobile v Brent LBC The Times 8 December 1997.
- 365 For a more in-depth argument in favour of exculpation for those ignorant of the law, see D. Husak, Ignorance of the Law: A Philosophical Inquiry (OUP 2016).
- 366 S v De Blom 1977 (3) S.A. 513.

Chapter 3

Strict Liability and Corporate Culpability

I. Strict Liability

A. INTRODUCTION

3-001

Under the general principles considered in Ch.2, a finding of culpability or blameworthiness is necessary for the imposition of criminal liability. While this proposition is true for most serious criminal offences, there are nevertheless many offences for which no culpability need be established.¹ These are called crimes of strict liability. Liability is “strict” because the prosecution is relieved of the necessity of proving mens rea in relation to one or more of the elements of the actus reus.² In the first “modern” case of strict liability,³ for example, the defendant was accused of selling adulterated milk. It was sufficient to prove that the milk was adulterated and that he was selling it; his mistake that he had thought the milk was pure was irrelevant. Similarly, in the much later case of *Alphacell v Woodward*⁴ liability was established under the Rivers (Prevention of Pollution) Act 1951 s.2(1)(a) by the defendants causing polluted water to enter a river. The fact that they had not known that the pollution was taking place and that they had mistakenly thought that their filtering system was operating efficiently did not exonerate them. A majority of strict liability crimes exist within schemes of regulation where the main emphasis is on the maintenance of standards such as safety. Regulatory schemes making extensive use of strict liability cover areas such as food, consumer protection, the environment, agriculture, the countryside, construction and fire. In these areas, the main concern is to ensure compliance with the law and administrative remedies such as improvement notices are extensively used. However, as a last resort, a criminal prosecution can be brought. These offences are known as “regulatory offences”. While much of the literature and debate in this area has revolved around these regulatory offences, it must be emphasised that there are countless other strict liability offences that do not exist within regulatory schemes.

B. THE LAW

3–002

How are the courts to determine whether an offence is one of strict liability? At first sight, the issue resolves itself into a problem of statutory interpretation. When the legislature has done its job efficiently, there is no difficulty. It may indicate, by the inclusion of terms such as “knowingly” or “recklessly” that the offence being created is one requiring mens rea. It may, alternatively, make it clear that an offence of strict liability is being created.⁵

All too often, however, legislation is enacted with no indication as to whether the offence is one requiring proof of mens rea. In such cases, it is for the courts to determine whether the offence is one of strict liability. The mere absence of mens rea terms is by no means indicative that no culpability is required. On the contrary, there is an “established common law presumption that a mental element, traditionally labelled mens rea, is an essential ingredient unless Parliament has indicated a contrary intention either expressly or by necessary implication”.⁶

1. The presumption of mens rea

SWEET V PARSLEY [1970] A.C. 132
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

3–003

The defendant, a teacher, let rooms to students in a farmhouse in which she did not reside although she occasionally stayed overnight in the one room retained for her use. She exercised no control over the students beyond collecting rent from them and occasionally shouting at them to be quiet if on her visits there was excessive noise late at night.

She was convicted of being concerned in the management of premises which were used for the purpose of smoking cannabis contrary to the Dangerous Drugs Act 1965 s.5(b), when such substances were found during a police search. The Divisional Court upheld her conviction on the basis that she was not only in a position of being able to choose her tenants but could have made it a term of the letting that the smoking of cannabis was prohibited.⁷ She appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD REID:

“How has it come about that the Divisional Court has felt bound to reach such an obviously unjust result? It has in effect held that it was carrying out the will of Parliament because Parliament has chosen to make this an absolute offence. And, of course, if Parliament has so chosen the courts must carry out its will, and they cannot be blamed for any unjust consequences. But has Parliament so chosen? Our first duty is to consider the words of the Act: if they show a clear intention to create an absolute offence that is an end of the matter. But such cases are very rare. Sometimes the words of the section which creates a particular offence make it clear that mens rea is required in one form or another. Such cases are quite frequent. But in a very large number of cases there is no clear indication either way. In such cases there has for centuries been a presumption that Parliament did not intend to make criminals of persons who were in no way blameworthy in what they did. That means that whenever a section is silent as to mens rea there is a presumption that, in order to give effect to the will of Parliament, we must read in words appropriate to require mens rea.

In the absence of a clear indication in the Act that an offence is intended to be an absolute offence, it is necessary to go outside the Act and examine all relevant circumstances in order to establish that this must have been the intention of Parliament. I say ‘must have been’ because it is a universal principle that if a penal provision is reasonably capable of two interpretations, that interpretation which is most favourable to the accused must be adopted.”

LORD PEARCE:

“My Lords, the prosecution contend that any person who is concerned in the management of premises where cannabis is in fact smoked even once, is liable, though he had no knowledge and no guilty mind. This is, they argue, a practical act intended to prevent a practical evil. Only by convicting some innocents along with the guilty can sufficient pressure be put upon those who make their living by being concerned in the management of premises. Only thus can they be made alert to prevent cannabis being smoked there. And if the prosecution have to prove knowledge or mens rea, many prosecutions will fail and many of the guilty will escape. I find that argument wholly unacceptable.

The notion that some guilty mind is a constituent part of crime and punishment goes back far beyond our common law. And at common law mens rea is a necessary element in a crime. Since the Industrial Revolution the increasing complexity of life called into being new duties and crimes which took no account of intent. Those who undertake various industrial and other activities, especially where these affect the life and health of the citizen, may find themselves liable to statutory punishment regardless of knowledge or intent, both in respect of their own acts or neglect and those of their servants. But one must remember that normally mens rea is still an ingredient of any offence. Before the court will dispense with the necessity for mens rea it has to be satisfied that Parliament so intended. The mere absence of the word ‘knowingly’ is not enough. But the nature of the crime, the punishment, the absence of social obloquy, the particular mischief and the field of activity in which it occurs, and the wording of the particular section and its context, may show that Parliament intended that the act should be prevented by punishment regardless of intent or knowledge.”

Appeal allowed

The strength of this presumption of mens rea has more recently been strongly affirmed.

B (A MINOR) v DPP [2000] 2 A.C. 428
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

3-004

The defendant, a 15-year-old boy, invited a 13-year-old girl to perform oral sex on him on a bus. He was charged with the offence of inciting a girl under the age of 14 to commit an act of gross indecency, contrary to the Indecency with Children Act 1960 s.1(1). He honestly believed she was over 14 years of age.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD:

“The starting point for a court is the established common law presumption that a mental element, traditionally labelled mens rea, is an essential ingredient unless Parliament has indicated a contrary intention either expressly or by necessary implication ...

In section 1(1) of the Indecency with Children Act 1960 Parliament has not expressly negated the need for a mental element in respect of the age element of the offence. The question, therefore, is whether, although not expressly negated, the need for a mental element is negated by necessary implication. ‘Necessary implication’ connotes an implication which is compellingly clear. Such an implication may be found in the language used, the nature of the offence, the mischief sought to be prevented and any other circumstances which may assist in determining what intention is properly to be attributed to Parliament when creating the offence.

I venture to think that, leaving aside the statutory context of section 1, there is no great difficulty in this case. The section created an entirely new criminal offence, in simple unadorned language. The offence so created is a serious offence. The more serious the offence, the greater is the weight to be attached to the presumption, because the more severe is the punishment and the graver the stigma which accompany a conviction. Under section 1 conviction originally attracted a punishment of up to two years’ imprisonment. This has since been increased to a maximum of ten years’ imprisonment. The notification requirements under Part I of the Sex Offenders Act 1997 now apply, no matter what the age of the offender: see Schedule 1, paragraph 1(1) (b). Further, in addition to being a serious offence, the offence is drawn broadly (‘an act of gross indecency’). It can embrace conduct ranging from predatory approaches by a much older paedophile to consensual sexual experimentation between precocious teenagers of whom the offender may be the younger of the two. The conduct may be depraved by any acceptable standard, or it may be relatively innocuous behaviour in private between two young people. These factors reinforce, rather than negative, the application of the presumption in this case.

Similarly, it is far from clear that strict liability regarding the age ingredient of the offence would further the purpose of section 1 more effectively than would be the case if a mental element were read into this ingredient. There is no general agreement that strict liability is necessary to the enforcement of the law protecting children in sexual matters.”

LORD HUTTON:

“It would be reasonable to infer that it was the intention of Parliament that liability under section 1(1) of the Act of 1960 should be strict so that an honest belief as to the age of the child would not be a defence. But the test is not whether it is a reasonable implication that the statute rules out mens rea as a constituent part of the crime—the test is whether it is a necessary implication. Applying this test, I am of the opinion that there are considerations which point to the conclusion that it is not a necessary implication.”

Appeal allowed

3-005

This approach was reaffirmed by the House of Lords in *R. v K*⁸ where it was held that the offence of indecent assault on a girl under the age of 16, contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 1956 s.14(1) was an offence requiring mens rea and so the defendant, believing the girl to be aged 16 or over, could not be liable. Lord Steyn emphasised the point made by Lord Nicholls in B (A Minor) v DPP that the presumption of mens rea can only be displaced by “necessary implication which is compellingly clear”.

In these cases where the presumption is applied, it is necessary for the courts to specify the precise form of mens rea that is being implied. This is generally taken to mean intention or subjective recklessness or knowledge or belief.⁹ Negligence has not traditionally been regarded as sufficiently blameworthy for this purpose. Perhaps, despite the strength of the presumption emphasised in the above cases, it is this “all or nothing” approach (full subjective mens rea or strict liability) that has resulted in the presumption being displaced so often. If the courts had been prepared to utilise negligence as an appropriate fault requirement here, the presumption might have been applied in a wider range of situations. The recent case of *Taylor*¹⁰ does, however, hint at a potential shift in approach. In relation to the offence of aggravated vehicle taking under the Theft Act 1968 s.12A, which had previously, in the case of Marsh,¹¹ been interpreted as requiring no fault element, the Supreme Court followed the approach it had taken in *Hughes*¹² in requiring that some fault in D's driving must be found before D could be punished for the fatal outcome of such driving. Despite showing that the Supreme Court is in fact prepared to utilise some degree of negligence as an appropriate fault element instead of displacing the presumption in favour of mens rea, this does not necessarily indicate a general change in approach. It is more likely to have been prompted by the particular constructive offence under examination. Indeed, the court appears to have conflated two separate issues here: whether D had caused V's death and whether the offence was one of strict liability or not.

2. Displacing the presumption

GAMMON LTD V ATTORNEY- GENERAL OF HONG KONG [1985] 1 A.C. 1 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

3-006

LORD SCARMAN:

In their Lordships' opinion, the law may be stated in the following propositions: (1) there is a presumption of law that mens rea is required before a person can be held guilty of a criminal offence; (2) the presumption is particularly strong where the offence is 'truly criminal' in character; (3) the presumption applies to statutory offences, and can be displaced only if this is clearly or by necessary implication the effect of the statute; (4) the only situation in which the presumption can be displaced is where the statute is concerned with an issue of social concern, and public safety is such an issue; (5) even where a statute is concerned with such an issue, the presumption of mens rea stands unless it can also be shown that the creation of strict liability will be effective to promote the objects of the statute by encouraging greater vigilance to prevent the commission of the prohibited act.”

3-007

The presumption in favour of mens rea can be overridden. Guiding criteria have gradually emerged as to when this is appropriate. These criteria, encapsulated in the “Gammon principles” above are now regularly applied as the appropriate test to determine whether an offence is one of strict liability.¹³

(i) Type of offence

3-008

Strict liability is more likely to be imposed in relation to offences that:

- pertain to matters of social regulation and public welfare such as health and safety or road traffic;
- are regarded generally as only “quasi-criminal”: that is, there is little or no stigma attached to their violation; and
- carry a light punishment, typically a fine.

STAPLES V UNITED STATES 511 US 600 (1994) (SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES):

3-009

STEVENS J:

“‘Public welfare’ offenses share certain characteristics: (1) they regulate ‘dangerous or deleterious devices or products or obnoxious waste materials’; (2) they ‘heighten the duties of those in control of particular industries, trades, properties or activities that affect public health, safety or welfare’; public welfare statutes render criminal ‘a type of conduct that a reasonable person should know is subject to stringent public regulation and may seriously threaten the community’s health or safety. The purposes of this legislation thus touch phases of the lives and health of people which, in the circumstances of modern industrialism, are largely beyond self-protection'. [A]n overriding public interest in health or safety may outweigh that risk [of injustice] when a person is dealing with products that are sufficiently dangerous or deleterious to make it reasonable to presume that he either knows, or should know, whether those products conform to special regulatory requirements¹⁴ [citations omitted]”.

LIM CHIN AIK V THE QUEEN [1963] A.C. 160 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

3-010

(For facts see below, para.3-019)

LORD EVERSHERD:

“Where the subject matter of the statute is the regulation for the public welfare of a particular activity—statutes regulating the sale of food and drink are to be found among the earliest examples—it can be and frequently has been inferred that the legislature intended that such activities should be carried out under conditions of strict liability. The presumption is that the statute or statutory instrument can be effectively enforced only if those in charge of the relevant activities are made responsible for seeing that they are complied with. When such a presumption is to be inferred, it displaces the ordinary presumption of mens rea. Thus sellers of meat may be made responsible for seeing that meat is fit for human consumption and it is no answer for them to say that they were not aware that it was polluted. If that were a satisfactory answer, then the distribution of bad meat (and its far-reaching consequences) would not be effectively prevented.”

3-011

It is, however, not always clear what a “public welfare” offence is. “The connection between ‘public welfare’/‘quasi’ crime and strict liability is self-fulfilling at both a legislative and an interpretive level.”¹⁵ An offence can be held to be one of strict liability because it is only “quasi-criminal” and then because it is an offence of strict liability it can be labelled a “public welfare offence”.

MUHAMAD V R. [2003] 2 W.L.R. 1050
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

3-012

The appellant was convicted of materially contributing to the extent of his insolvency by gambling contrary to the Insolvency Act 1986 s.362(1)(a) and appealed.

DYSON LJ:

“It is not clear to us whether an offence under section 362(1) (a) would have been classified by Lord Reid as ‘quasi-criminal’, or ‘truly criminal’. A maximum penalty of two years’ imprisonment is by no means insignificant, although it is towards the lower end of the scale of maximum custodial sentences. On the other hand, it is open to doubt whether, at any rate in 2002, such an offence would be regarded as ‘truly criminal’ ...

The question whether the presumption of law that mens rea is required applies, and, if so, whether it has been displaced can be approached in two ways. One approach is to ask whether the act is truly criminal, on the basis that, if it is not, then the presumption does not apply at all. The other approach is to recognise that any offence in respect of which a person may be punished in a criminal court is, prima facie, sufficiently ‘criminal’ for the presumption to apply. But the more serious the offence, the greater the weight to be attached to the presumption, and conversely, the less serious the offence, the less weight to be attached. It is now clear that it is this latter approach which, according to our domestic law, must be applied.

The starting point, therefore, is to determine how serious an offence is created by section 362(1) (a), and accordingly how much weight, if any, should be attached to the presumption. Some weight must undoubtedly be given to the presumption, but in our judgment it can be readily displaced. As we have said, the maximum sentence indicates that Parliament considered this to be an offence of some significance, but not one of the utmost seriousness. This is not surprising. We do not believe that great stigma attaches to a conviction of this offence. In our view, this is not, and never has been, a particularly serious offence ...

First, the 1986 Act created a clear and coherent regime. The majority of the offences include an express requirement of a mental element. This is achieved either in the section which creates the offence (for example, section 356(2)); or by reference to section 352 (which contains a reverse onus of proof provision). Only a few, of which section 362(1) (a) is one, do not specify a mental element. In our judgment, this is a clear pointer to Parliament's intention in relation to section 362(1) (a) ...

Further support for the displacement of the presumption in relation to section 362(1) (a) emerges when a comparison is made of the maximum sentences provided for by the various offences created in Chapter VI of the 1986 Act. The offences where no mental element is specified, for the most part, attract considerably lower maximum sentences than those where a mental element is specified ...

The next point relied on by [the prosecution] is the fact that gambling which harms a gambler's creditors is a matter of social concern. That is obviously right. It follows that this is a case where the fourth and fifth of Lord Scarman's propositions [in Gammon] are engaged. So too they were in Harrow LBC v Shah [1999] 2 Cr.App.R. 457. In that case, the Divisional Court had to decide whether the offence of selling National Lottery tickets to a person under the age of 16 was an offence of strict liability. The court decided that it was. In giving the leading judgment, Mitchell J said that the legislator dealt with an issue of social concern, and that it was an excellent example of the sort of legislation contemplated by Lord Scarman's fifth proposition. He said: 'That strict liability attaches to this offence will unquestionably encourage greater vigilance in preventing the commission of the prohibited act' ...

It is self-evident that section 362(1) (a) is aimed at an issue of social concern. [A]n offence of strict liability may have a more chilling effect on gambling that may materially contribute to insolvency than an offence which requires a mental element. We are satisfied that strict liability will encourage greater vigilance to prevent gambling which will or may materially contribute to insolvency ...

We conclude, therefore, that the offence created by section 362(1) (a) of the 1986 Act is one of strict liability."

Appeal dismissed

The approach towards offence seriousness expressed in the above cases is by no means universally applied. There are glaring examples of cases where strict liability has been imposed where the crime has the stamp of traditional criminality. For example, in *Warner*¹⁶ it was held that the serious crime of possession of dangerous drugs contrary to the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964 s.1 involved strict liability. Similarly, in Land,¹⁷ it was held that the offence of possessing an indecent photograph of a child contrary to the Protection of Children Act 1978 s.1(1)(c) was one of strict liability. In Barnfather it was held that the strict liability offence committed by a parent whose child failed regularly to attend at school involved:

“a real stigma (being) attached ... It suggests either an indifference to one’s children, or incompetence at parenting, which in the case of the blameless parent will be unwarranted.”¹⁸

As seen in Muhamad, it is often stated that the level of punishment attached to a crime is important in assessing whether the offence is one of strict liability. In the US, the Model Penal Code proposes that the possibility of imprisonment should conclusively indicate that the offence is not one of strict liability.¹⁹

However, this is again only a guiding principle. In Jackson,²⁰ it was held that strict liability was not precluded merely because the offence imposed the sanction of imprisonment. In many cases, offences carrying reasonably severe penalties have been held to be crimes of strict liability. In Hussain,²¹ the defendant was convicted of unlawful possession of a firearm contrary to the Firearms Act 1968 s.1 even though he believed it was a toy used by his son. Despite the fact that this offence carried a maximum penalty of three years’ imprisonment, it was held to be one of strict liability.

GAMMON LTD V ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF HONG KONG [1985] 1
A.C. 1 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

The appellants were charged under Hong Kong Building Ordinances with deviating in a material way from work shown on an approved plan. It had to be determined whether they had to know that their deviation was material or whether liability was strict in relation to that element of the offence, the maximum penalty for which was a fine of $250,000 and imprisonment for three years.

LORD SCARMAN:

“The severity of the penalties is a more formidable point. But it has to be considered in the light of the Ordinance read as a whole ... [T]here is nothing inconsistent with the purpose of the Ordinance in imposing severe penalties for offences of strict liability. The legislature could reasonably have intended severity to be a significant deterrent, bearing in mind the risks to public safety arising from some contraventions of the Ordinance ... It must be crucially important that those who participate in or bear responsibility for the carrying out of works in a manner which complies with the requirements of the Ordinance should know that severe penalties await them in the event of any contravention or non-compliance with the Ordinance.”

Appeal dismissed

One of the most serious offences created by the Sexual Offences Act 2003 is that of the crime of rape of a child under 13 (which carries a maximum penalty of life imprisonment). Yet this is an offence of strict liability: it is irrelevant that the defendant believes the child is over 13.²² Whether strict liability for an offence as serious as this can be justified is a matter to which we shall return.

(ii) Statutory context

It has been repeatedly stated by the House of Lords that the presumption of mens rea can only be displaced if this is clearly or by necessary implication the effect of the statute. As the wording of the statute usually leaves the matter open, what is important is the statutory context of the provision in question.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN V STORKWAIN LTD (1986) 83 CR. APP. R. 359 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

3-017

The appellants, retail chemists, supplied prescription-only drugs in accordance with a forged prescription. They were charged with an offence contrary to the Medicines Act 1968 s.58(2)(a) which provides that:

“no person shall sell by retail, or supply in circumstances corresponding to retail sale, a medical product of a description, or falling within a class, specified in an order under this section except in accordance with a prescription by an appropriate practitioner.”

It had to be determined whether this was an offence of strict liability.

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY:

“It is, in my opinion, clear from the Act of 1968 that Parliament must have intended that the presumption of mens rea should be inapplicable to s.58(2) (a). First of all, it appears from the Act of 1968 that, where Parliament wished to recognize that mens rea should be an ingredient of an offence created by the Act, it has expressly so provided. Thus, taking first of all offences created under provisions of Part II of the Act of 1968, express requirements of mens rea are to be found in both s.45(2) and in s.46(1), (2) and (3) of the Act. More particularly, in relation to offences created in Part III and Parts V and VI of the Act of 1968, section 121 makes detailed provision for a requirement of mens rea in respect of certain specified sections of the Act, including ss.63 to 65 (which are contained in Part III), but significantly not s.58 ... It is very difficult to avoid the conclusion that, by omitting s.58 from those sections to which s.121 is expressly made applicable, Parliament intended that there should be no implication of a requirement of mens rea in s.58(2) (a).”²³

3-018

If several sections of a statute allow due diligence defences (see below) but the provision under consideration omits such a defence, it will be easier to infer strict liability.²⁴

(iii) Effectiveness in promoting the objectives of the statute

LIM CHIN AIK V THE QUEEN [1963] A.C. 160 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

3-019

The defendant was convicted of contravening an immigration ordinance by remaining in Singapore after he had been declared a prohibited immigrant. There was no evidence that the prohibition order had been brought to his attention or that any effort had been made to do so. He appealed.

LORD EVERSHERD:

“But it is not enough in their Lordships’ opinion merely to label the statute as one dealing with a grave social evil and from that to infer that strict liability was intended. It is pertinent also to inquire whether putting the defendant under strict liability will assist in the enforcement of the regulations. That means there must be something he can do, directly or indirectly, by supervision or inspection, by improvement of his business methods or by exhorting those whom he may be expected to influence or control, which will promote the observance of the regulations. Unless this is so, there is no reason in penalising him, and it cannot be inferred that the legislature imposed strict liability merely in order to find a luckless victim. Their Lordships prefer [this] to the alternative view that strict liability follows simply from the nature of the subject matter and that persons whose conduct is beyond any sort of criticism can be dealt with by the imposition of a nominal penalty.²⁵

Where it can be shown that the imposition of strict liability would result in the prosecution and conviction of a class of persons whose conduct could not in any way affect the observance of the law, their Lordships consider that, even where the statute is dealing with a grave social evil, strict liability is not likely to be intended. The subjectmatter, the control of immigration, is not one in which the presumption of strict liability has generally been made. Nevertheless, if the courts of Singapore were of the view that unrestricted immigration is a social evil which it is the object of the Ordinance to control most rigorously, their Lordships would hesitate to disagree. That is a matter peculiarly within the cognisance of the local courts. But [counsel for the respondent] was unable to point to anything that the appellant could possibly have done so as to ensure that he complied with the regulations. It was not, for example, suggested that it would be practicable for him to make continuous inquiry to see whether an order had been made against him. Clearly one of the objects of the Ordinance is the expulsion of prohibited persons from Singapore, but there is nothing that a man can do about it if, before the commission of the offence, there is no practical or sensible way in which he can ascertain whether he is a prohibited person or not.”

Appeal allowed

MATUDI V THE CROWN [2003] EWCA
CRIM 697 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

3-020

The defendant was convicted of importing animal products (meat from Africa) contrary to of the Products of Animal Origin (Import and Export) Regulations 1996 regs 21 and 37.²⁶ The defendant received a consignment which he believed contained leaves and herbs; he had no idea that it contained any meat. He appealed on the ground that the offence ought to require mens rea.

SCOTT BAKER LJ:

“[Counsel for the defendant] argued that if Regulation 21 is interpreted as an absolute offence the importer is in an impossible position; he cannot control what the consignor puts into the consignment ... In our judgment an importer will emphasise to his supplier that the contents of the consignment must correspond with the information on the accompanying documents. Also, it is up to importers to ensure that their consignments come from a reliable source. In our view it is too simplistic for the appellant to say there is nothing he could have done about it. Strict liability imposes a clear black and white obligation on importers. It is up to them to ensure that they contract with consignors that they can trust who do not take risks on lax procedures ...

[The issue] is whether strict liability will be effective to promote the objects of the legislation. There will obviously be a temptation with some importers to by-pass the notice provisions and thus save the delay and expense involved in the consignment being diverted to a border inspection post. It seems to us that strict liability is inevitably going to make the regulation more effective ...

[T]he mischief sought to be prevented ... is likely to be better achieved if the offence is one of strict liability.”

Appeal dismissed

3. Defences to strict liability

(i) General defences

3–021

A crime of strict liability is one where mens rea is not required in relation to one or more elements of the actus reus. Liability is thus strict and not absolute, although courts often misleadingly use this latter term. The importance of this point is only fully realised when one comes to consider what, if any, defences are available to a defendant charged with a strict liability offence. If the offence were “absolute” then no defences would save the defendant from the consequences of his actions. But, given that this is not the case, one has to consider whether the defendant may plead, for example, duress or self-defence or even automatism in answer to a charge. What would be the position if a dangerous dog was properly secured inside premises but let loose by a burglar? Prima facie the owner of the dog would be liable under the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 s.3(1) as this is a strict liability offence. However, in Robinson-Pierre it was held that the owner’s conviction could not be upheld where the dog was released by a deliberate act of a third party (in this case police officers deliberately entering the property in execution of a search warrant) and the jury had not been given the opportunity to consider whether the owner had contributed to the events by his voluntary act or omission.²⁷

One approach would be to make the availability of a defence depend upon the nature of the defence being raised. As we shall see, it is possible to distinguish between defences that are justificatory in nature (resulting in a determination that there was no wrongful act at all) and those that are excusatory (relieving the defendant from blame whilst acknowledging the wrongfulness of the conduct). In relation to strict liability offences, it would be logical to allow the defendant to plead defences that are justifications for conduct (such as self-defence) but to deny defences that are excuses (because the defendant is really claiming absence of blame, which is not in any event required). If this argument were adopted, the excusatory defences of insanity, infancy, intoxication, duress and automatism would be denied to the defendant. An approach consistent with this view was adopted in *DPP v Harper*²⁸ where it was held that insanity could only be a defence to crimes requiring mens rea and, accordingly, was not a defence to the strict liability offence of driving with excess alcohol.

The above argument, however, presupposes that the distinction between justificatory and excusatory defences is clear which, as will be seen, is not always the case. Further, if the underlying rationale of strict liability is the promotion of higher standards of care, this seems unlikely to be served by the punishment of, say, infants, the insane or others whose actions were involuntary. In Hill v Baxter,²⁹ automatism was successfully pleaded to a charge of dangerous driving. If non-insane automatism can be a defence here, so too should insane automatism. After all, the essence of an automatism defence is a denial of the “voluntary act” requirement, which is an essential element of the actus reus, and not merely a denial of mens rea. Going even further, in *Martin*³⁰ it was held that duress of circumstances (classically regarded as an excuse) was a defence to the strict liability offence of driving while disqualified.³¹ As we shall see, whether strict liability offences are ever justifiable is a controversial matter. Recognising that all established defences are available to such offences would go a long way towards “sweetening the bitter pill” of their (perhaps necessary) existence.

(ii) Due diligence defences

In addition to any general defences that may be available, there is the growing possibility that the offence may contain within it a specific defence. This will be based upon showing an absence of fault; these are often called “due diligence” defences. An example of such a defence is to be found in the Food Safety Act 1990. This Act creates a number of offences relating to the preparation and sale of food such as rendering food injurious to health and not complying with food safety requirements and selling food which is not of the nature or substance or quality demanded. Section 21(1) creates a due diligence defence:

“[I]t shall be a defence for the person charged to prove that he took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of the offence by himself or by a person under his control.”

A research study into 41 Statutory Instruments concerning food found that 34 of them included due diligence defences.³² This same research revealed extensive use of due diligence defences in the other main areas of regulatory crime: environmental health, trading and consumer laws and construction.

DEBORAH L. PARRY, “JUDICIAL APPROACHES TO DUE DILIGENCE”
[1995] CRIM. L.R. 695, 701–702:

“[The author examined a series of cases dealing with the due diligence defence provided by section 39 of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 and concluded that while a flexible attitude was apparent in pricing cases, a very demanding standard was required for safety-related offences.]

[W]hilst at the trial a due diligence defence may succeed in a safety-related matter, in none of the appeal cases has it been established ... [This causes] concern as strict liability offences may be appearing more like absolute offences ...

If ... it is felt by businesses that no one can ever 'win', there is a risk of the offences being viewed as unavoidable and of removing any stigma from convictions if it is known that even 'careful' defendants are convicted. It could certainly encourage many to opt for a plea of guilty plus mitigation, rather than expend time and money on establishing a defence."

Placing the burden on the defendant to establish due diligence does, however, present problems. In Woolmington v DPP,³³ the House of Lords declared that it was for the prosecution to establish the guilt of the defendant. It was not the responsibility of the defendant to establish their innocence. The European Convention on Human Rights art.6(2) provides that "everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law". This raises the issue of whether due diligence defences are compatible with art.6(2).

Broadly speaking, the courts have tackled this issue in the following manner. If a provision imposes a legal burden of proof on a defendant (where they are required to prove on a balance of probabilities that, in this context, they have exercised due diligence or reasonable care), it will be incompatible with the presumption of innocence unless the provision is serving a legitimate aim and is a proportionate and justifiable response. For example, in *Matthews*³⁴ the defendant was charged with possession of a knife contrary to the Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.139 and claimed a due diligence defence under s.139(4) that he had good reason for having the article with him in a public place, namely, that it was to cut lino. It was held that this reverse burden of legal proof was not incompatible with art.6(2) because it was a justifiable and proportionate response: the reason for having a knife in a public place was something peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused; the reverse onus provision struck a fair balance between the interests of the community and the individual and went:

"no further than is necessary to accomplish Parliament's objective in protecting the public from the menace posed by persons having bladed articles in public places without good reason."³⁵

However, if a reverse burden of proof is not regarded as a reasonable and proportionate response, the court can “read down” the provision as only placing an evidential burden on the defence. An evidential burden merely requires the defendant to raise sufficient evidence to show that the defence could apply but the burden remains on the prosecution to establish beyond reasonable doubt that the defence does not apply. For example, in *Lambert*³⁶ the defendant was charged with possession of a controlled drug with intent to supply, contrary to the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 s.5(3) but raised the due diligence defence available in s.28(2) and (3) that he did not know or suspect that he was possessing controlled drugs. The House of Lords declared, obiter, that placing a legal burden on the defendant would be incompatible with art.6(2) as being a disproportionate measure for such a serious offence. However, the majority stated that s.28(2) and (3) should be “read down” so that only an evidential burden was placed on the defendant and this would not be incompatible with the presumption of innocence established in art.6(2).³⁷ Such a “reading down” will almost always be possible³⁸ but, if the provision cannot be “read down”, then as a last resort under the Human Rights Act 1998 s.4 the court should declare the reverse burden incompatible with art.6(2).

The result of this approach is inevitable uncertainty. It is difficult to see why “a strong public interest in bladed articles not being carried in public” makes a due diligence defence a proportionate response while a similar defence to possession of drugs is a disproportionate response. We shall see in the next section that since the coming into force of the Human Rights Act 1998 the English courts have considered the status of some strict liability offences and have held that they are not, per se, incompatible with the European Convention. If such (admittedly lesser) offences without due diligence defences represent a proportionate response to a problem, it would be odd to hold that affording a due diligence defence with a reverse burden of legal proof (admittedly for more serious offences) could be incompatible with the ECHR. We shall shortly examine the many objections to offences of strict liability. As a response to these problems, courts in some Commonwealth countries, such as Canada, have declared that all strict liability offences should presumptively be construed as incorporating due diligence defences³⁹ and the Law Commission of England and Wales has also consulted on whether courts should be given a power to apply a due diligence defence to any statutory offence not requiring fault.⁴⁰ It would be a sad irony if human rights concerns, as expressed in Lambert, were to lead to a foreclosure of this option.

4. Strict liability and the European Convention on Human Rights

3-025

As seen above, in certain circumstances strict liability offences with reverse burdens of proof could be incompatible with art.6(2) of the European Convention. There is, however, a further argument that some strict liability offences could, in dispensing with any fault element, contravene other articles of the Convention. This approach has not been adopted by the English courts.⁴¹

MUHAMAD V R. [2003] 2 W.L.R. 1050 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

3-026

The appellant was convicted of materially contributing to the extent of his insolvency by gambling, contrary to the Insolvency Act 1986 s.362(1)(a).

DYSON LJ:

“[It is argued that art.7] requires the criminal law to be sufficiently accessible and precise to enable an individual to know in advance whether his conduct is criminal. No gambler can necessarily know, when he places his bet, whether he runs a real risk of prosecution if he loses. The only way to avoid running this risk is not to gamble at all, or to gamble for low stakes. Without mens rea the offence is objectionably uncertain. Furthermore, a construction of strict liability is neither necessary in a democratic society, nor proportional to any legitimate aim ...

[T]he narrow question that arises is whether the fact that the offence is one of strict liability is disproportionate so as to render it in breach of Article 7. We accept that a strict liability offence is easier to prove than one requiring a mental element, and that, if section 362(1)(a) is interpreted as creating an offence of strict liability, it may deter persons from gambling who, if the offence required a mental element, might not be so deterred. We do not consider that either of these consequences indicates that it is disproportionate to hold that the section creates an offence of strict liability. [I]f strict liability does have a chilling effect on gambling, we are not convinced that the imposition of strict liability is a disproportionate response to the need, in the public interest, to deter persons from gambling in such a way as to cause loss to their creditors.

We should add that, so far as concerns the ECHR, there is nothing objectionable in principle with strict liability offences. In Salabiaku v France 13 E.H.R.R. 379 at [27] the ECtHR said:

'27. As the Government and the Commission have pointed out, in principle the Contracting States remain free to apply the criminal law to an act where it is not carried out in the normal exercise of one of the rights protected under the Convention and, accordingly, to define the constituent elements of the resulting offence. In particular, and again in principle, the Contracting States may, under certain conditions, penalise a simple or objective fact as such, irrespective of whether it results from criminal intent or from negligence. Examples of such offences may be found in the laws of the Contracting States.'

In our judgment, therefore, there is nothing in the ECHR and in particular in Article 7 which requires us to reach a different conclusion from that which we expressed earlier on the basis of an application of domestic law principles. Upon its true construction, section 362(1)(a) creates an offence of strict liability." (Emphasis added)

3-027

In Barnfather, it was held that these "certain conditions" (emphasised in above extract) related to procedural matters (such as reverse burdens of proof) and did not apply to the substantive elements of an offence. It was held that art.6(2) (presumption of innocence) does not impose any restrictions on the right of Parliament to create strict liability offences.⁴² Lord Hope in R. v G stated that these “certain conditions” were simply referring to the fact that a strict liability offence could be incompatible with other articles of the Convention.⁴³ The ironic result (conceded in Barnfather) is that:

“a state’s laws are subject to fuller review when they include a defence which places a burden on the defence than they are when no defence at all is conferred.”⁴⁴

In R. v G it was held that the strict liability offence of rape of a child under 13 contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.5 was not incompatible with art.6.2 (presumption of innocence) or with art.8 (right to respect for privacy and family life) of the ECHR.

R. v G. [2009] 1 A.C. 92 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

3-028

The defendant, aged 15, had consensual sexual intercourse with a 12-year-old girl. He believed she was 15. He was convicted of rape of a child under 13 contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.5 and appealed.

LORD HOFFMANN:

“[3] ... [T]he offence is one of strict liability and it is no defence that the accused believed the other person to be 13 or over.

[4] Article 6(1) guarantees fair procedure but not that either the civil or criminal law will have any particular substantive content ... Likewise, article 6(2) requires him to be presumed innocent of the offence but does not say anything about what the mental or other elements of the offence should be. In R v G [2003] 1 Cr App R 343, para 33 Dyson LJ said:

‘The position is quite clear. So far as article 6 is concerned, the fairness of the provisions of the substantive law of the contracting states is not a matter for investigation. The content and interpretation of domestic substantive law is not engaged by article 6.’

[7] The other ground of appeal is that the conviction violated the defendant’s right of privacy under article 8 ...

[10] Prosecutorial policy and sentencing do not fall under article 8. If the offence in question is a justifiable interference with private life, that is an end of the matter. If the prosecution has been unduly heavy handed, that may be unfair and unjust, but not an infringement of human rights.”

BARONESS HALE:

“[54] In effect, therefore, the real complaint is that the defendant has been convicted of an offence bearing the label ‘rape’. Parliament has very recently decided that this is the correct label to apply to this activity. In my view this does not engage the article 8 rights of the defendant at all, but if it does, it is entirely justified. The concept of private life ‘covers the physical and moral integrity of the person, including his or her sexual life’: X and Y v The Netherlands 8 EHRR 235, para 22. This does not mean that every sexual relationship, however brief or unsymmetrical, is worthy of respect, nor is every sexual act which a person wishes to perform. It does mean that the physical and moral integrity of the complainant, vulnerable by reason of her age if nothing else, was worthy of respect.”

LORD MANCE:

“[70] In the final analysis, the core of the defendant’s objection to what occurred lies in the stigma which he maintains he will sustain as a result of the heading attached to section 5. If he had any complaint on this score, it has to be, as I see it, on the basis that the use of the word ‘rape’ in that heading involves an unjustified stigma which will affect his ‘right to establish and to develop relationships with other human beings, especially in the emotional field for the development and fulfilment of one’s own personality’. However, the concept of ‘statutory rape’ has long been familiar as a description of the previous strict liability offence of unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl existing under section 5 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. The actual ingredients of the offence are defined by the actual wording of the section. The ingredients are strict, but their strictness reflects the protective purpose of the section and the unreality or unreasonableness of speaking of any properly informed consent in relation to sexual intercourse with someone aged 12 or under ...

[71] The criticism made is that the offence under section 5 should have been framed so as to contain an exception for a belief (at least if reasonably held) on the part of the defendant that the complainant was 13 or over, and/or possibly also for circumstances where the defendant was himself under a certain age. But the offence under section 5 is deliberately strict in its protective intention, and leaves such matters to be taken account of in sentencing.”

*Appeal dismissed*⁴⁵

3–030

The one area where the ECHR can have an impact is in relation to sentencing for strict liability offences. In *International Transport Roth GmbH*⁴⁶ it was stated that to be compatible with art.6(1) there needed to be an investigation into the culpability of defendants at the sentencing stage to ensure that a punitive response is proportionate to the offending. In R. v G, the defendant had been sentenced to a 12-month detention and training order. The Court of Appeal reduced this to a conditional discharge for 12 months. (He had already spent five months in custody.) Baroness Hale and Lord Mance stated that this final sentence was rational and proportional, impliedly suggesting that the original sentence imposed might have been incompatible with the Convention.

5. Are strict liability offences justifiable?

3–031

The Law Commission has stated:

“The criminal law should only be employed to deal with wrongdoers who deserve the stigma associated with criminal conviction because they have engaged in seriously reprehensible conduct. It should not be used as the primary means of promoting regulatory objectives.”⁴⁷

In the light of this strong statement of principle, possible justifications for the imposition of strict liability require close scrutiny, starting with the general purposes of punishment.

HERBERT L. PACKER, “MENS REA AND THE SUPREME COURT” (1962)
SUP. CT. REV. 107, 109:

3-032

“To punish conduct without reference to the actor’s state of mind is both inefficacious and unjust. It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy.”

From this, two major questions emerge:

- (i) Can strict liability be justified on utilitarian or instrumental grounds?
- (ii) Is strict liability a morally justifiable doctrine?

(i) The utilitarian and instrumental arguments

3-033

In favour of strict liability, it is claimed that the interests of the public require that the highest possible standards of care be exercised by people engaged in certain forms of conduct and that “strict liability can reduce the risks of harm to private and public interests”.⁴⁸ Expressed in utilitarian terms, the greater good to be achieved by occasionally convicting someone who may have taken all reasonable care to abide by the law could not be achieved to the same extent, if, for example, the defence of reasonable mistake were available.

R. MACRORY, REGULATORY JUSTICE:
SANCTIONING IN A POST-HAMPTON
WORLD (2006), PARAS D4–D8:

3–034

“D4 A core argument in favour of the use of strict liability offences is that it improves deterrence ... This is likely to be especially important where the non-compliance involves technical and managerial complexities of which only the regulated body, rather than the regulator, has full knowledge.

D5 Prosecution of legitimate businesses should generally be a matter of last resort after other sanctioning tools have failed or where the offence is serious enough to warrant a prosecution in the first instance. However, without the existence of criminal offences which are reasonably easy to prove, the regulator’s power to advise and warn regulated business would be seriously jeopardised: ‘Routine enforcement is conducted against a background of the criminal law and the implied threat of invocation ...’

D6 Strict liability offences are also an important tool in securing convictions of corporate entities ...

D7 Strict liability for regulatory offences can also be justified on the grounds that business operating in regulatory areas can be said to implicitly accept the risk of criminal liability even where no intention or recklessness is involved ... Strict liability encourages companies not just to do what they can reasonably be capable of, but to do everything possible to comply. Further, it may be consistent with a public view that regulatory breaches causing serious damage (such as a major pollution incident, or death or serious injury in the workplace or elsewhere) are truly criminal in their own right, whatever the state of mind of the perpetrator.

D8 Finally, in practice, any perceived injustices from strict criminal liability is tempered by the fact that ‘fault creeps back in during the various stages of the enforcement process’. Prosecution bodies have discretion whether or not to prosecute in a particular case, and are more likely to prosecute where in their view there is some element of fault. Courts have discretion in the sentence they impose, and lack of intention or recklessness can be presented by the offender in mitigation.”

UNITED STATES V DOTTERWEICH, 320 US (1943) 277 AT 284–285 (SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES):

3–035

FRANKFURTER J:

“The Food and Drugs Act of 1906 was an exertion by Congress of its power to keep impure and adulterated food and drugs out of the channels of commerce ... The purposes of this legislation thus touch phases of the lives and health of people which, in the circumstances of modern industrialism, are largely beyond self-protection ... In the interest of the larger good it puts the burden of acting at hazard upon a person otherwise innocent but standing in responsible relation to a public danger ...

Hardship there doubtless may be under a statute which thus penalizes the transaction though consciousness of wrongdoing be totally wanting. Balancing relative hardships, Congress has preferred to place it upon those who have at least the opportunity of informing themselves of the existence of conditions imposed for the protection of consumers before sharing in illicit commerce, rather than to throw the hazard on the innocent public who are wholly helpless.”

A. KENNY, FREEWILL AND RESPONSIBILITY (1978), P.93:

3–036

“The application of strict liability can be justified in special cases: particularly with regard to the conduct of a business. In such a case, even a strict liability statute makes an appeal to the practical reasoning of the citizens: in this case, when the decision is taken whether to enter the business the strictness of the liability is a cost to be weighed. Strict liability is most in place when it is brought to bear on corporations. In such cases there may not be, in advance, any individual on whom an obligation of care rests which would ground a charge of negligence for the causing of the harm which the statute wishes to prevent: the effect of the legislation may be to lead corporations to take the decision to appoint a person with the task of finding out how to prevent the harm in question.”

3-037

Opponents of strict liability have argued that there is no evidence that a higher standard of care results from the imposition of strict liability. Those engaged in activities will only do what is reasonable to prevent harm. Indeed, some have argued that strict liability may operate as a disincentive to do even this. If operators know that prosecution could flow whatever precautions they take, they may be tempted to take none whatsoever. In other words, the defendant may as well be “hanged for a sheep as for a lamb”.⁴⁹ Such an attitude scarcely increases respect for the law. There may be further harmful effects: the innocent may be made to feel insecure not only in general psychological terms but to the extent that they may be deterred from entering into socially beneficial enterprises governed by strict liability.⁵⁰

JAMES B. BRADY, “STRICT LIABILITY OFFENCES: A JUSTIFICATION” (1972)
8 CRIM. L. BULLETIN 217, 224:

3-038

“There are two replies to this argument. First, there is little evidence to show that the effect of strict liability offences has been to make these socially beneficial enterprises less attractive. The second, and more important point is that a person who does not have the capacity to run (for example) a dairy in such a manner as to prevent the adulteration of milk is not to be protected on the sole ground that he is engaged in a ‘socially beneficial’ enterprise. An incompetent carrying on an enterprise in which there is the danger of widespread harm actually is not engaged in a ‘socially beneficial’ enterprise. There can be no objection, therefore, to his choosing not to enter the business.”

In addition to the arguments above, a further instrumental argument may be adduced. Because of the sheer volume of criminal offences, particularly those of a regulatory nature, it is argued that it would be too time-consuming to require the prosecution to prove a mental element.

A. P. SIMESTER, “IS STRICT LIABILITY ALWAYS WRONG?” IN A. P. SIMESTER (ED), APPRAISING STRICT LIABILITY (2005), P.26:

“From an administrative perspective, the costs involved before and during trial are likely to be considerably decreased if [the activity] is made a criminal offence, since the number of elements required to be proved at trial, and the number of potential issues, is reduced. This consideration matters because criminal justice is very expensive. It is plausible that, if every one of a nation’s offences required proof of mens rea with respect to all elements of the actus reus, administration of the criminal law would not be merely cumbersome but unaffordable ... If it is impossible fully to protect victims from harm while maintaining a Rolls-Royce system of criminal justice, the conflicting interests of defendants and victims may be mediated, in part, by simplifying the mens rea elements of certain offences ... The state should consider which offences to ‘skimp’ on. If the choice is either cutting corners or abandoning the prohibition altogether, a pared-down regulation (say, with reduced sanctions attached) may well be preferable.”

NORVAL MORRIS AND COLIN HOWARD, STUDIES IN CRIMINAL LAW (1964), P.199:

“[It is often alleged that there is] an administrative problem.

Prosecutions are numerous: if P were required to prove a wrongful intention, in itself impossible in most regulatory offence cases, the speed at which these charges can at present be dealt with would be much diminished and overwhelming arrears of work would accumulate ... There is no evidence of an administrative problem. Proof of absence of fault is admissible in mitigation of punishment. If such proof is admissible for one purpose, no loss of time is involved in admitting it for another. Prosecutions for regulatory offences may be numerous but so are prosecutions for many other offences, particularly the various forms of larceny. No one suggests that the pressure of work should be relieved by removing the requirement of mens rea from larceny. Indeed, it is arguable that, far from saving time, strict liability often wastes time by necessitating legal argument as to whether it applies to the case in hand.”

3-042

Supporters of the expediency argument sometimes temper their support by claiming that prosecutorial discretion will prevent the obviously blameless being charged. There are, however, great difficulties with this approach. Prosecutorial discretion is notoriously unreliable; there is no guidance as to how extreme the case must be to justify a prosecution. Most importantly, it amounts to a negation of strict liability. To some extent at least, liability is being made to depend upon fault. We shall return to this point later.

(ii) Is strict liability morally justifiable?

3-043

It has already been noted that the concept of mens rea is deeply embedded in the development of the criminal law. For many commentators, its importance is so great that it cannot be trumped by utilitarian considerations. According to this view, the criminal law should only be invoked when the defendant has done something deserving of blame. Somebody who has taken all reasonable precautions is not blameworthy and does not deserve to be punished. Labelling a blameless person, a criminal “amounts to systematic moral defamation by the state”.⁵¹

The classic response to this argument is that while these views might be true of stigmatic crimes, most offences of strict liability are not “real” crimes, but, at most, are “quasi-criminal” offences.⁵² Simester has argued that sometimes “strict liability may be legitimate in non-stigmatic offences”.⁵³ In Wings Ltd v Ellis, Lord Scarman referred to the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, which creates consumer protection offences, as being “not a truly criminal statute. Its purpose is not the enforcement of the criminal law but the maintenance of trading standards”.⁵⁴

PETER BRETT, AN INQUIRY INTO CRIMINAL GUILT (1963), PP.114–116:

3–044

“Let us now consider what ought to be the future of the doctrine of strict liability. There are those who believe that there is no great objection to it, and even that it serves a useful and proper social purpose. Sayre’s general conclusion (‘Public Welfare Offences’, 33 Col. L. Rev. 55 (1933)) was that the doctrine was applicable only to the minor public welfare offences, despite his recognition of its applicability in some other fields, which he attempted to distinguish on special grounds. In his view there is no objection to applying strict liability so long as only a light penalty is involved; but it ought not to be applied to ‘true crimes’. This seems rather like saying that it is all right to be unjust so long as you are not too unjust. My own position is that any doctrine which permits the infliction of punishment on a morally innocent man is reprehensible.

If my view is accepted, we are then faced with the question whether it can be implemented without imperilling the social fabric. There seems to be a strong belief that it cannot. The argument is that the regulation of public welfare has been successfully accomplished under a regime of strict liability, and that it is thus proved that ‘strict liability regulation works’. This is doubtless true, but it does not take us one step further to the proposition that effective public welfare regulation will not work without strict liability. That proposition must for most countries remain empirically unverified, for the simple reason that it has never been tried out in practice.

A school of thought has sprung up in recent years which attempts to resolve the question by attaching new labels to strict liability offences. Thus it has been argued that the strict liability offences should be termed ‘civil offences’, and that to such offences mistake of fact should not be a defence. They would be punishable only by a fine, and not by any form of imprisonment.⁵⁵ The Model Penal Code appears to accept this basic position save that it proposes to treat the strict liability offences as still being criminal in nature, but classes them as violations: as such the punishment which may be imposed when they are committed without fault is strictly limited, and the determination whether to class an offence as a violation is left to the legislature.

The difficulty which I have with proposals of this kind is that their proponents seem to regard the injustice of punishing innocent conduct as a matter which may be disregarded if it takes place under a different label. My own view is that the injustice remains unaffected despite the semantic change. A fine continues to be a punishment whether it is labelled civil or criminal. I do not deny that the change of label may accomplish a removal of part, if not the whole, of the stigma which results from the mere fact of conviction for a crime; nor would I wish to diminish the importance of such a step. But when this step has been taken, there still remains the brute fact that a man is being punished for innocent behaviour. I cannot reconcile this with any theory of justice with which I am acquainted.”

3-045

The distinction drawn between “real” and “quasi-criminal” crimes or between stigmatic and non-stigmatic crimes (sometimes known as crimes mala in se and mala prohibita), is problematic. How is one to determine whether a crime is a stigmatic one or not? Is it based on whether the convicted person feels stigmatised (psychological stigma) or on whether such a person ought to feel stigmatised (normative stigma)?⁵⁶ Referring to the offence under the Insolvency Act 1986 in Muhamad, extracted above, Stanton-Ife asks:

“How is it that stigma gets attached to criminal convictions on his Lordship’s view? Does he mean the population at large or the business community or some other group does not believe this behaviour to be stigmatic or that it is not deserving of stigma, whatever any group of people may think about the matter?” (Emphasis in original)⁵⁷

Baroness Wootton argued that the distinction being drawn between crimes mala in se and mala prohibita does not rest on any inherent characteristics of the former category other than the antiquity of such crimes.⁵⁸ Particularly once one steps beyond offences that are part of a regulatory scheme, it becomes far from obvious that a clear line can be drawn between truly criminal and quasi-criminal offences. Even with regulatory offences there are problems with making them offences of strict liability because this “marginalises” such offences; nobody, least of all the perpetrator, has to take them seriously because, after all, they are not really criminal.

6. Enforcement

3-046

One of the classic arguments against strict liability is that it results in the prosecution and conviction of people who were not at fault and who might even have done everything they possibly could to avoid bringing about the harm. However, empirical studies of the enforcement of many strict liability offences do not always support this conclusion.

The case of *Storkwain*⁵⁹ provides an interesting case study. In this case, the defendants were found guilty of the strict liability offence of supplying prescription-only drugs without a valid prescription; it had been forged. At first sight it seems that the defendants could not be blamed for what had happened. How, in a busy chemist, could checks be made as to the validity of every prescription? Yet closer examination of the case reveals that the Pharmaceutical Society (the regulatory body) which wanted to confirm the principle of strict liability, actually believed the pharmacist’s conduct fell short of normal good practice. The prescription was a blatant forgery. Moreover, because the prescription was for controlled drugs it was expected that the pharmacist would telephone for confirmation. He did so, but, rather than checking in the directory, rang the number given on the prescription. Not surprisingly, the forgery was confirmed by an accomplice at the end of the phone. In conclusion then, the pharmacist was prosecuted because he was at fault; even a due diligence defence, had one existed, would not have saved him.⁶⁰

Empirical studies of many strict liability offences also point to highly selective enforcement practices amongst different enforcement agencies.⁶¹ Fault appears to play an important role in the decision to prosecute (although the magnitude of the harm is also significant). However, compliance is more normally secured by means of co-operation rather than coercion and the self-image of the inspectors is that of educators and advisers rather than as police. Advice, repeat visits, warnings, improvement notices and the like are all much more likely to be used to secure compliance. For example, in 2005 the Health and Safety Executive commenced 712 prosecutions yet, in contrast, issued 8,445 enforcement notices (improvement notices, immediate prohibition notices and deferred prohibition notices).⁶² The emphasis is on administrative procedures with the criminal law being a remedy of last resort.⁶³

7. Sentencing

3-047

Sentences for strict liability offences (particularly white collar crimes) are generally light. This may be because a defendant is regarded as less blameworthy than for “real” crimes or may even be seen as blameless.

R. V JACKSON [2007] CR. APP. R. 28 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

3-048

HOOPER LJ:

“At the sentencing stage it is important for the court to determine the level of culpability to the criminal standard of proof. A pilot who knowingly or recklessly flies his plane at less than 100 ft may expect a higher sentence than one who flies lower than that height negligently (as did the appellant). Likewise if there is no knowledge or recklessness or negligence then it may well be that the appropriate penalty is one of an absolute discharge.”

On the other hand, there may be a number of other factors having little to do with blame or the amount of harm caused that influence such sentencing practices. The fact that the defendant has lost her job or business may be seen as punishment enough. The level of fine may be affected by the sentencer's perception of the defendant's ability to pay.⁶⁴ The defendant's previous good character may be persuasive but likely to figure is, once again, the judgment that such offences are not really criminal. The result is that the fines imposed may be no more than "pin-pricks" to an organisation which may be able to write them off as a minor business expense.⁶⁵

3-049

Recently the Sentencing Council has sought to enhance uniformity in sentencing and, as with other offences, has taken a methodical approach in determining sentence ranges dependent on a combination of culpability and harm. In relation to environmental offences, for example, culpability is measured in four bands: deliberate, reckless, negligent and no or low culpability. "Deliberate", however, does not include only deliberate pollution, but also, in the case of organisations, deliberate failure "to put into place and to enforce such systems as could reasonably be expected in all the circumstances to avoid commission of the offence".⁶⁶

8. Civil sanctions

3-050

Instead of employing strict criminal liability (or criminal punishments), more use could be made of civil/administrative law to ensure compliance with the law.

In 2009, Baroness Scotland, the Attorney-General, was "fined" (according to the press) £5,000 by the UK Border Agency for employing an illegal worker. Baroness Scotland is reported as saying:

"It's a civil penalty just as if you drive into the city and don't pay a congestion charge. It's not a criminal offence. I made an administrative technical error."⁶⁷

It is notoriously difficult to define a crime.⁶⁸ Perhaps the most widely-accepted definition is that of Glanville Williams that a crime is:

“an act that is capable of being followed by criminal proceedings, having one of the types of outcome (punishment, etc.) known to follow these proceedings.”⁶⁹

Applying this test to the Baroness Scotland case, this was indeed a civil penalty (and not a fine) that was imposed under the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Act 2006 s.15. Section 15 refers to a “penalty” and uses the civil language that “it is contrary to this section to employ”. This can be contrasted with s.21 of the same Act which states that “a person commits an offence if he employs another knowing that the employee is subject to immigration control”. Of course, the nomenclature chosen by Parliament is not determinative but what is important, in distinguishing this from a crime, is that this civil penalty “may be recovered by the Secretary of State as debt due to him”.⁷⁰

This does suggest a possible way forward. Instead of employing strict liability criminal offences, the civil law and civil sanctions could be utilised. If decriminalisation of existing strict liability offences were contemplated, there would need to be some assurance that the loss of procedural safeguards thereby occasioned would not be likely to lead to administrative malpractice and, of course, it would not satisfy critics such as Brett, who believe that relabeling offences using the language of civil law is mere semantics.⁷¹

An alternative approach is to retain (or create) strict liability offences as criminal offences but to utilise civil sanctions instead of traditional criminal punishments. In 2006, the Government commissioned the Macrory Report to examine regulatory sanctions.⁷² This Report proposed that much regulatory non-compliance should be dealt with by administrative remedies outside the criminal justice system. These recommendations have been given effect to by the Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 which allows Ministers to introduce statutory instruments providing civil sanctions to a wide range of strict liability offences contained in a long list of statutes: for example, the Control of Pollution Act 1974, the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991, the Fireworks Act 2003, the Food Safety Act 1990 and the Medicines Act 1968. In all, 135 statutes are listed.⁷³ These civil sanctions can also be applied to a further 44 statutes under which Ministers have power by statutory instrument to create criminal offences.⁷⁴

3-051

In these cases, where a Regulator (for example, the Environment Agency, the Food Standards Agency, the Health and Safety Executive, the Financial Conduct Authority⁷⁵) is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that a person has committed one of the specified offences, instead of a criminal prosecution, the Regulator may impose one of the following civil sanctions:

- (1) Fixed Monetary Penalty⁷⁶: usually capped at £5,000.⁷⁷
- (2) Discretionary requirements.⁷⁸ The Regulator may impose one or more of the following:
 - a Variable Monetary Penalty,
 - a compliance notice, and
 - a restoration notice.
- (3) Stop notices⁷⁹ (preventing a person from carrying on an activity until specified steps have been taken).
- (4) Enforcement undertakings⁸⁰ (an undertaking to take specified corrective action).

In all of these cases there is a right of appeal to a tribunal, but not to a court of law.⁸¹ Provision may be made for the Regulator to recover monetary penalties either as a civil debt or, on the order of a court, as if payable under a court order.⁸²

Under these provisions the criminal process and the criminal courts will be bypassed although a breach of any of the orders could ultimately result in judicial sanctions. These provisions do not involve any decriminalisation of existing offences. A criminal prosecution remains an option. As we have seen, those enforcement agencies already involved in such procedures rely upon the stick of the criminal sanction as their last resort.

9. Conclusion

3-052

Despite the weight of the arguments against strict liability offences, it would be naïve to imagine that they can all be transformed into offences requiring full mens rea or that they could all be decriminalised. It seems clear that there is a cogent argument in favour of strict liability for the most minor of offences. However, for the rest a number of possibilities exist.

First, it is open to the courts to extend the presumption in favour of mens rea.⁸³ One important enhancement, copied from Canada, would be to state that if the penalty for the offence involves imprisonment, then strict liability is precluded.⁸⁴

Secondly, again following the lead set elsewhere,⁸⁵ and as recommended in the Law Commission's consultation paper,⁸⁶ existing offences of strict liability could be converted into what would amount to offences of negligence by the general, rather than selective, use of due diligence defences. This would not have the effect of making the prosecutor's task too difficult because the onus would be on the defendant to show that he was not negligent. However, as seen, it is possible that such a general shifting of the burden of proof could be incompatible with the ECHR.

3-053

Thirdly, increased use of administrative procedures and civil sanctions (as under the Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008) could be made to secure compliance. This can have twin benefits. It can close the "compliance gap, where some regulators lack the appropriate enforcement tools to address regulatory non-compliance".⁸⁷ Also, through by-passing the criminal process, the civil sanctions will not carry the same stigma as a criminal conviction. This might lessen the objections to such strict liability offences. However, some caution is necessary here as this by-passing of the criminal process could result in a loss of the protection offered by the criminal justice system, for example, in relation to the burden of proof.

Many of the provisions in the Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 are aimed at corporate non-compliance with regulatory laws (but are not limited to such cases). Perhaps this differentiation between individual and corporate responsibility should be extended. Many, if not most, strict liability offences govern the operations not of individuals but of businesses. Those who object to strict liability when applied to individuals might be prepared to support its use for corporations, especially if a wider range of sentencing options were introduced. It is to this, and related, matters that we now turn.

II. Corporate Criminal Liability

A. INTRODUCTION

3-054

The criminal law has developed as a mechanism for responding to individual wrongdoing. Individuals are regarded as autonomous. They are free to control their actions, to think and make decisions, including the choice to do wrong. Accordingly, such persons can be held responsible for those choices and can be praised or blamed and punished for them. This individualistic notion of responsibility does not naturally encompass artificial organisations such as companies.

Much of our lives today is affected by companies and other organisations: we work for them (in conditions that might be dangerous); we purchase their products (that might explode or poison us); we travel in their ferries and trains (that might be unsafe); we drink the water they provide (which might be unclean); and we breathe the air (into which they might have emitted their fumes). In short, companies can destroy our environment or kill or injure us but can they be held criminally responsible?

A company is a legal entity. It has a legal personality. It can sue and be sued in its own name and, as seen in the previous section on strict liability where many of the defendants were companies, it can be held criminally liable.⁸⁸ In principle, there is no reason why a company should not be capable of committing any criminal offence, subject to two exceptions. First, it is unlikely that a company could commit crimes that necessarily involve human action such as sexual offences and bigamy.⁸⁹ Secondly, as the only criminal penalty that can be imposed on a company in English law is a fine (apart from remedial orders and publicity orders), a company cannot be convicted of murder as this carries a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment.

While companies have long been held liable for a wide array of offences, such as pollution offences and offences involving financial irregularities, the whole issue of corporate criminal liability has become extremely high-profile and controversial in cases where the activities of companies have led to the death or injury of workers or members of the public. The interest in this subject was heightened by two sets of developments. First, there were a series of highly publicised “disasters” in which large numbers of persons were killed. In 1988, there was the Piper Alpha oil rig explosion in which 167 people were killed. The inquiry which followed identified “unsafe practices”, “grave shortcomings” and “significant flaws” in the management’s approach to safety as causes of the explosion and subsequent deaths.⁹⁰ In 1987, there was the King’s Cross fire in which 31 people died and 60 people were injured, the cause being the failure of the various groups and individuals within the overall corporate structure to identify their respective areas of responsibility.⁹¹ And, most infamously, in 1987, there was the Zeebrugge “disaster” in which the ferry, Herald of Free Enterprise, capsized killing 192 people. The official inquiry found that:

“from top to bottom the body corporate was infected with the disease of sloppiness ... The failure on the part of the shore management to give proper and clear directions was a contributory cause of the disaster.”⁹²

3-055

Further, there have been a series of high-profile train crashes (Southall: seven killed and 151 injured; Paddington: 31 killed and over 400 injured; Hatfield: four killed and 102 injured) accompanied by mounting accusations of incompetence and complacency and poor safety management by the rail companies concerned.⁹³ More recently, there has been strong condemnation of deaths caused in hospitals. In 2006, it was revealed that 33 people had died from C Difficile bacterium over the previous two years at Stoke Mandeville Hospital. Over the same period this bacterium directly caused the deaths of 90 people and contributed to the deaths of a further 345 people at two Kent hospitals. In both cases a Healthcare Commission Report revealed “serious failings” by senior managers.⁹⁴

Secondly, there has been an increased awareness of the numbers of persons annually being killed and seriously injured in their places of work. In 2015/16, 144 people were killed at work. Over the same year, 621,000 workers self-reported as having sustained injuries, whilst employers reported 72,702 injuries causing absences from work of at least seven days.⁹⁵

Many of these incidents will have been the result of corporate fault. The HSE itself has publicly stated in the past that 90 per cent of deaths could have been prevented and that “in 70 per cent of cases positive action by management could have saved lives”.⁹⁶

FRANK PEARCE AND STEVE TOMBS, TOXIC CAPITALISM: CORPORATE CRIME AND THE CHEMICAL INDUSTRY (1998), PP.153–154:

3–056

“In report after report, the HSE and its Inspectorates have stated that managements bear primary responsibility for these ‘accidents’. For example, ... the HSE has stated that in 75 per cent of maintenance accidents in the chemical industry, site management were found to be ‘wholly or partly responsible for failing to take all reasonably practicable precautions to prevent an accident’; similarly, managements have been cited as responsible for approximately two out of three deaths in general manufacturing, three out of five farm deaths. 78 per cent of fatal maintenance accidents in manufacturing, 70 per cent of deaths in the construction industry, and so on ... It seems clear that the predominance of the label ‘accident’ to such systematic failings ... owes more to legal, social, political and economic modes of thought and balances of power—to a dominant ideological hegemony—than to any inherent features of the events themselves ...

It is clear that for many instances of employee death, injury or ill-health arising out of work, the use of the term ‘accident’ is often inappropriate ... [A] significant number of these incidents are the consequence of criminal acts of commission or omissions.”

3–057

Increased publicity of these “disasters” and other work-related fatality cases has had a profound effect on “transmitting messages about risk to the wider population”.⁹⁷ The result of these two developments has been mounting pressure for the introduction of laws making it easier to hold corporations accountable in such cases. This pressure led to the enactment of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 for cases where people have been killed through corporate gross negligence. This statute will be considered towards the end of this section but, first, more general issues concerning corporate criminal liability, and its application to other offences, must be considered.

B. CORPORATE OR PERSONAL CRIMINAL LIABILITY

3–058

A central question is whether the criminal law should hold corporations accountable or whether it should rather seek to punish the culpable individuals within the company. The argument in favour of only prosecuting individuals is that it is they who are blameworthy and deserve punishment. In some cases, an individual manager in order to secure promotion, for example, might implement a policy with short-term rewards but contrary to the long-term interests of the company. In such cases the company does not deserve blame and punishment. Further, it is argued that individuals within a company are the ones most amenable to deterrence. In order to deter the company itself fines would need to be huge. A company is only likely to be deterred if its expected costs exceed its expected gains. If a company anticipates making £10 million from a criminal act and the risk of apprehension is 20%, it has been argued that the fine would need to be at least £50 million to have any hope of being an effective deterrent.⁹⁸ There is a further problem here with the “deterrence trap”: this is where the risk of apprehension is so low that no penalty will operate as a deterrent.⁹⁹ In terms of incapacitation and rehabilitation, it could be said that it is the particular individuals who should be removed from office, disciplined or made to improve their work practices.

Finally, it is argued that punishment of a company by way of a fine amounts to punishment of innocent shareholders, creditors, employees who might be made redundant, or the public who will ultimately have to bear the burden of the fine. In short, the ones who will really suffer will be those whom the law is aiming to protect.

On the other hand, the case in favour of corporate criminal liability is formidable.

BRENT FISSE AND JOHN
BRAITHWAITE, “THE ALLOCATION OF
RESPONSIBILITY FOR CORPORATE
CRIME: INDIVIDUALISM,
COLLECTIVISM AND
ACCOUNTABILITY” (1988) 11 SYDNEY
L. REV. 468, 479–508:

3–059

“In the case of organisations, individuals may be the most important parts, but there are other parts, as is evident from factories with manifest routines which operate to some extent independently of the biological agents who flick the switches. Organisations are systems ... not just aggregations of individuals ... Indeed, the entire personnel of an organisation may change without reshaping the corporate culture; this may be so even if the new incumbents have personalities quite different from those of the old ... The fact is that organisations are blamed in their capacity as organisations for causing harm or taking risks in circumstances where they could have acted otherwise. We often react to corporate offenders not merely as impersonal harm-producing forces but as responsible, blameworthy entities. When people blame corporations they ... [are not] pointing the finger at individuals behind the corporate mantle. They are condemning the fact that the organisation either implemented a policy of non-compliance or failed to exercise its collective capacity to avoid the offence for which blame attaches ... We routinely hold organisations responsible for a decision when and because that decision instantiates an organisational policy and instantiates an organisational decision-making process which the organisation has chosen for itself ...

Punishment directed at a corporate entity typically seeks to deter a wide range of individual associates from engaging in conduct directly or indirectly connected with the commission of an offence. Individual persons who are directly implicated in offences may be difficult or impossible to prosecute successfully, and those who influence the commission of offences indirectly may fall outside the scope of liability for complicity or other ancillary heads of criminal liability ... Companies value a good reputation for its own sake, just as do universities, sporting clubs and government agencies. Individuals who take on positions of power within such organisations, even if they as individuals do not personally feel any deterrent effects of shaming directed at their organisation, may find that they confront role expectations to protect and enhance the repute of the organisation ... Another factor which tends to limit the deterrent efficacy of individual criminal liability for corporate crime is the expendability of individuals within organizations ... [T]he corporation 'marches on its elephantine way almost indifferent to its succession of riders.' The risk thus arises of rogue corporations exploiting their capacity to toss off a succession of individual riders and, if necessary, to indemnify them in some way ... Consider also the extreme tactic adopted by some companies of setting up internal lines of accountability so as to have a 'vice-president responsible for going to jail.' By offering an attractive sacrifice the hope is that prosecutors will feel sufficiently satisfied with their efforts to refrain from pressing charges against the corporation or members of its managerial elite ...

[I]n some respects corporations may be better endowed than individuals to be the subject of responsibility. Corporations, it may be argued, have a number of advantages when it comes to rational decision-making, including access to a pool of intelligence and the resources to acquire a superior knowledge of legal and other obligations. The conclusion is thus invited that although corporations do not have a 'soul to be damned' they can deserve to be blamed ...

[With regard to the argument that punishing companies amounts to punishment of innocent shareholders etc] [f]irst, cost-bearing associates are not themselves subject to the stigma of conviction and criminal punishment—they are not convicts but corporate distributees. Secondly, employees and stockholders accede to a distributional scheme in which profits and losses from corporate activities are distributed on the basis of position in the company or type of investment rather than degree of deserved praise or blame ... Thirdly, and above all, not to punish an enterprise at fault would be to allow corporations to accumulate and distribute to associates a pool of resources which does not reflect the social cost of production. Justice as fairness requires, as a minimum, that the cost of corporate offences be internalised by the enterprise.”

3-060

Many large corporations have complex structures which make it difficult for outsiders to ascertain who is responsible for a particular decision. Punishing the company can trigger the most appropriate institutional response in that the company is in the best position to identify and discipline its employees. In many cases, prosecution of individuals might be inappropriate as it ignores the corporate pressures that might have been placed upon them by the corporate structure; these pressures will often remain even after the individual has been sacrificed. It is only by punishment of the company itself that one can hope for a corporate response to the wrongdoing by the implementation of the appropriate safety procedures.

Modern companies now often promote themselves as distinct identifiable entities. Such advertising:

“designed to ‘humanise’ the company in the interests of image-building, has reinforced the anthropomorphic perception of the company in the public mind, which in turn has led to a public demand to apportion blame and to criminalise and punish companies for serious transgressions.”¹⁰⁰

The concept of fair-labelling applies not just to offences themselves, but to whom we choose to blame for the offences committed. After the capsizing of the Herald of Free Enterprise a manslaughter prosecution was brought against the company involved (P&O) and seven employees of the company. For reasons to be explored shortly, the judge directed acquittals against P&O and the five most senior employees. It is a telling fact that the relatives of the victims who died on the Herald of Free Enterprise were primarily interested in a prosecution of P&O and not of the individuals. Even the prosecution seemed of similar mind when it dropped the charges against the two most immediate “causers” of the sinking as soon as the judge had directed acquittals against P&O and its senior executives. Perhaps there was a realisation that junior employees should never have been left in a position where the entire safety of the ferry and its passengers depended on them without any adequate system of checks or controls. The true fault lay with the company.

3-061

However, a final and critical point must be stressed here. The above argument is that companies should be capable of being held criminally liable. This does not mean that individuals within the company should be exempt from liability. In appropriate cases, where an individual has committed the actus reus with the mens rea of the offence, she should also be liable. Indeed, in the case of small companies, particularly “one-person-companies”, imposing criminal liability on the company, in addition to the individual, is somewhat pointless. Even in relation to larger companies, individual criminal liability should be imposed (in addition to corporate criminal liability). The central case for this is based on deterrence. People are more amenable to deterrence than corporations. The evidence suggests that employer groups are most vocal in their opposition to new laws when there is a risk that under those laws company directors or senior managers might go to prison.¹⁰¹

Indeed, for many statutory offences, there is specific provision for holding individuals liable when an offence is committed by a company. A standard form employed in many statutes, such as the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 s.37(1), is as follows:

“Where an offence under any of the relevant statutory provisions committed by a body corporate is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of, or to have been attributable to any neglect on the part of, any director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate or a person who was purporting to act in any such capacity, he as well as the body corporate shall be guilty of that offence and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.”

Liability under such a provision is broader and easier to establish than liability under the complex common law rules on accessory liability. The extent to which this provision is utilised in the controversial cases of death at work is considered later in this section.

C. THE LAW

3-062

There are two ways in which a company can be criminally liable.

1. Vicarious liability

3-063

With many offences of strict liability and negligence a company can be vicariously liable for the acts of its employees in the course of their duties.

NATIONAL RIVERS AUTHORITY V ALFRED MCALPINE HOMES EAST LTD [1994] 4 ALL E.R. 286 (QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

3-064

The defendant company was charged with causing pollution, namely, wet cement, to enter controlled waters contrary to the Water Resources Act 1991 s.85(1). Two employees of the company, the site agent and the site manager, accepted responsibility for the pollution. At their trial in the magistrates' court the company was acquitted on the ground that a company can only be criminally liable if the criminal acts are committed by senior persons within the company. The prosecution appealed by way of case stated.

SIMON BROWN LJ:

“I for my part see Alphacell as an illustration of vicarious liability ... [A]n employer is liable for pollution resulting from its own operations carried out under its essential control, save only where some third party acts in such a way as to interrupt the chain of causation ... It is sufficient that those immediately responsible on site (those who in the event acknowledged what had occurred) were employees of the company and acting apparently within the course and scope of that employment.”

MORLAND LJ:

“The object of the relevant words of s.85(1) and the crime created thereby is the keeping of streams free from pollution for the benefit of mankind generally and the world’s flora and fauna. Most significantly deleterious acts of pollution will arise out of industrial, agricultural or commercial activities ... In almost all cases the act or omission will be that of a person such as a workman, fitter or plant operative in a fairly low position in the hierarchy of the industrial, agricultural or commercial concern.

In my judgment, to make the offence an effective weapon in the defence of environmental protection, a company must by necessary implication be criminally liable for the acts or omissions of its servants or agents during activities being done for the company.”

Appeal allowed Case remitted for rehearing

3-065

The doctrine of vicarious liability is well established in English law in relation to strict liability offences dealing with matters such as pollution, food and drugs and trading standards.¹⁰² It has also been applied to hybrid offences which are prima facie strict liability offences but allow a due diligence defence.¹⁰³ However, it is clear that vicarious liability will not necessarily apply to all offences of strict liability. In Seaboard Offshore Ltd,¹⁰⁴ the House of Lords held that the doctrine of vicarious liability did not apply to the offence before it¹⁰⁵ irrespective of whether the offence was one of strict liability or not. Whether vicarious liability applies or not is a matter of statutory interpretation, taking into account the policy of the law and whether vicarious liability will assist enforcement.¹⁰⁶ For example, in McAlpine, the law could only be made effective by holding the company vicariously liable. In Seaboard, it was concluded that the statute was aimed at the safety policies of the company itself rather than the actions of menial employees. The result is that at present it is rather difficult to predict whether an offence will be held to be one to which the doctrine of vicarious liability will be applicable.

Is the doctrine of vicarious liability justifiable? The doctrine can be defended on pragmatic grounds. It is easy to apply. As long as someone (anyone) acting in the course of their employment has committed a crime the company can be held liable. It prevents companies shielding themselves from criminal liability by delegating potentially illegal operations to employees. Companies delegate powers to act, in their respective spheres, to all their employees and accordingly should be held responsible for their criminal acts. It is also argued that optimum deterrence is achieved through the imposition of vicarious liability in that companies will “know where they stand”.¹⁰⁷ These arguments are, of course, particularly powerful when applied to strict liability offences. If no fault is required on the part of the individual committing the crime, there seems little point in requiring fault on the part of the company to be established. There are, however, strong arguments against the doctrine.

ERIC COLVIN, “CORPORATE PERSONALITY AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY” (1995) 6 CRIMINAL LAW
FORUM 1, 8:

3-066

“Vicarious corporate liability has been criticized for being both underinclusive and overinclusive. It is underinclusive because it is activated only through the criminal liability of some individual. Where offenses require some form of fault, that fault must be present at the individual level. If it is not present at this level, there is no corporate liability regardless of the measure of corporate fault. Yet vicarious liability is also overinclusive because, if there is individual liability, corporate liability follows even in the absence of corporate fault. The general objection to vicarious liability in criminal law—that it divorces the determination of liability from an inquiry into culpability—applies to corporations as it does to other defendants. The special characteristics of corporations do not insulate them from the stigmatizing and penal consequences of a criminal conviction.”

3-067

An example of the over-inclusiveness of the doctrine is that a company could be liable for an offence despite having adopted clear policies and having issued express instructions to avert the wrongdoing. It hardly seems justifiable to hold a company liable for the actions of a lowly employee who decides to breach company rules and commit a crime.

A possible compromise would be to make companies prima facie vicariously liable for all offences committed by employees in the course of their employment (whether a particular individual could be identified or not), but to afford a due diligence defence.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE, LIABILITY OF ENTERPRISES FOR OFFENCES,
RECOMMENDATION NO. R (88) 18
(1990), 6-7:

3-068

“1(2) The enterprise should be [criminally] liable, whether a natural person who committed the acts or omissions constituting the offence can be identified or not.

(4) The enterprise should be exonerated from liability where its management is not implicated in the offence and has taken all the necessary steps to prevent its commission.”

3-069

A similar proposal would allow vicarious liability to apply to all offences, but only afford a due diligence defence to “non-regulatory offences that carry a stigma”.¹⁰⁸

2. Direct liability: the identification doctrine

3-070

When it comes to crimes involving blameworthiness the commitment to individualistic notions of responsibility meant that English criminal law was reluctant to hold companies criminally liable. However, as company law developed the fiction of corporate personality—the idea that a company was a legal “person” that could sue and be sued in its own name—the criminal law did not take long to lift this fiction and superimpose it on its individualist conception of criminal liability. The courts started “lifting the veil” of companies to see if there was an individual who had committed the actus reus of a crime with the appropriate mens rea. This individual had to be sufficiently important in the corporate structure for their acts to be identified with the company itself; in such circumstances the company could be criminally liable (as well as the individual). This is known as the identification doctrine.

TESCO SUPERMARKETS LTD V NATTRASS [1972] A.C. 153 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

3-071

Tesco were prosecuted under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 s.11(2) for advertising outside their shop that they were selling goods for less than they were being offered for sale inside the shop. The fault for the incorrect advertisement lay with the local manager whose system of daily checks had broken down. Tesco claimed a defence under s.24 of the same Act that the “failure was due to the default of another person”. The question then arose as to whether the local manager was “another person” or whether he was to be identified with the company.

LORD REID:

“I must start by considering the nature of the personality which by a fiction the law attributes to a corporation. A living person has a mind which can have knowledge or intention or be negligent and he has hands to carry out his intentions. A corporation has none of these: it must act through living persons, though not always one or the same person. Then the person who acts is not speaking or acting for the company. He is acting as the company and his mind which directs his acts is the mind of the company. There is no question of the company being vicariously liable. He is not acting as a servant, representative, agent or delegate. He is an embodiment of the company or, one could say, he hears and speaks through the persona of the company, within his appropriate sphere, and his mind is the mind of the company. If it is a guilty mind then that guilt is the guilt of the company. It must be a question of law whether ... a person ... is to be regarded as the company or merely as the company’s servant or agent ...

Reference is frequently made to the judgment of Denning LJ in HL Bolton (Engineering) Co Ltd v TJ Graham & Sons Ltd [1957] 1 Q.B. 159. He said, at p.172:

‘A company may in many ways be likened to a human body. It has a brain and nerve centre which controls what it does. It also has hands which hold the tools and act in accordance with directions from the centre. Some of the people in the company are mere servants and agents who are nothing more than hands to do the work and cannot be said to represent the mind or will. Others are directors and managers who represent the directing mind and will of the company, and control what it does. The state of mind of these managers is the state of mind of the company and is treated by the law as such.’

In that case the directors of the company only met once a year: they left the management of the business to others, and it was the intention of those managers which was imputed to the company. I think that was right. There have been attempts to apply Lord Denning’s words to all servants of a company whose work is brain work, or who exercise some managerial discretion under the direction of superior officers of the company. I do not think that Lord Denning intended to refer to them. He only referred to those who ‘represent the directing mind and will of the company, and control what it does.’

[The local manager was not to be identified with the company. He was, therefore, ‘another person’.]”

There were significant objections to this strict interpretation of the identification doctrine particularly with larger companies where it is most unlikely that a senior manager will actually commit the actus reus of an offence with the accompanying mens rea. It is arguable that a more flexible approach was adopted by the Privy Council in the following case.

MERIDIAN GLOBAL FUNDS MANAGEMENT ASIA LTD V
SECURITIES COMMISSION [1995] 2
A.C. 500 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

The chief investment officer and senior portfolio manager of Meridian, unknown to the board of directors and managing director, invested in another company without making disclosures to the stock exchange as required by the New Zealand Securities Amendment Act 1988 s.20(3). The company was convicted of failing to comply with s.20. The New Zealand Court of Appeal upheld the conviction on the basis that the investment manager was the directing mind and will of the company and so his knowledge was attributable to the company. The company appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

LORD HOFFMANN:

“Any proposition about a company necessarily involves a reference to a set of rules. A company exists because there is a rule (usually in a statute) which says that a persona ficta shall be deemed to exist and to have certain of the powers, rights and duties of a natural person ... It is ... a necessary part of corporate personality that there should be rules by which acts are attributed to the company. These may be called ‘the rules of attribution’ ...

Judges sometimes say that a company ‘as such’ cannot do anything; it must act by servants or agents ... [A] reference to a company ‘as such’ might suggest that there is something out there called the company of which one can meaningfully say that it can or cannot do something. There is in fact no such thing as the company as such, no ding an sich, only the applicable rules. To say that a company cannot do something means only that there is no one whose doing of that act would, under the applicable rules of attribution, count as the act of the company.

... [T]he criminal law ... ordinarily impose[s] liability only for the actus reus and mens rea of the defendant himself. How is such a rule to be applied to a company?

... In such a case, the court must fashion a special rule of attribution for the particular substantive rule. This is always a matter of interpretation: given that it was intended to apply to a company, how was it intended to apply? Whose act (or knowledge, or state of mind) was for this purpose intended to count as the act etc. of the company? One finds the answer to this question by applying the usual canons of interpretation, taking into account the language of the rule (if it is a statute) and its content and policy.

... The policy of section 20 of the Securities Amendment Act 1988 is to compel, in fastmoving markets, the immediate disclosure of the identity of persons who become substantial security holders in public issuers. Notice must be given as soon as that person knows that he has become a substantial security holder. In the case of a corporate security holder, what rule should be implied as to the person whose knowledge for this purpose is to count as the knowledge of the company? Surely the person who, with the authority of the company, acquired the relevant interest. Otherwise the policy of the Act would be defeated. Companies would be able to allow employees to acquire interests on their behalf which made them substantial security holders but would not have to report them until the board or someone else in senior management got to know about it. This would put a premium on the board paying as little attention as possible to what its investment managers were doing. Their Lordships would therefore hold that upon the true construction of section 20(4) (e), the company knows that it has become a substantial security holder when that is known to the person who had authority to do the deal ...

It was therefore not necessary in this case to inquire whether [the investment officer] could have been described in some more general sense as the 'directing mind and will' of the company. But their Lordships would wish to guard themselves against being understood to mean that whenever a servant of a company has authority to do an act on its behalf, knowledge of that act will for all purposes be attributed to the company. It is a question of construction in each case as to whether the particular rule requires that the knowledge that an act has been done, or the state of mind with which it was done, should be attributed to the company ... [T]he fact that a company's employee is authorised to drive a lorry does not in itself lead to the conclusion that if he kills someone by reckless driving, the company will be guilty of manslaughter. There is no inconsistency. Each is an example of an attribution rule for a particular purpose, tailored as it always must be to the terms and policies of the substantive rule."

Appeal dismissed

3-074

This decision is unfortunately ambiguous and could lead to uncertainty. Lord Hoffmann states that "the court must fashion a special rule of attribution for the particular substantive rule". On the facts of Meridian this was easy. The issue was whether the company knew it had invested in another company without making the required disclosures. The person who had "authority to do the deal" was the investment manager; his knowledge was attributed to the company. But what was the "special rule of attribution" that enabled this sensible result to be achieved? Is Lord Hoffmann saying that, depending on the statute, one has a choice between utilising the identification doctrine or imposing vicarious liability—and that the company here was vicariously liable for the acts of its investment manager? Or does it mean that, again depending on the statute, one can broaden the identification doctrine so that a company can be directly liable for the acts of someone not traditionally associated with the "controlling mind" of the company, which in this case was the investment manager? Perhaps the answer to these questions is not important. After all, the identification doctrine can be viewed as a very narrow form of vicarious liability¹⁰⁹: companies can only be held "vicariously" liable for the acts of persons representing the controlling mind of the company. Whichever route is adopted, the effect of Meridian is the same. Companies can be liable for mens rea offences on the basis of acts by persons not traditionally regarded as senior enough under the Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass formulation of the identification doctrine.

How is this approach to be applied to statutes dealing with non-regulatory areas and creating stigmatic offences, such as the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 or to cases where there is no statute to be construed? If the acts and knowledge of an investment manager can be attributed to a company for investment offences, logic would dictate that the acts and knowledge of a health and safety manager should be attributed to a company for all health and safety purposes which would include cases where a worker sustained serious injuries. In Odyssey v OIC Run-Off Ltd,¹¹⁰ it was stated that the Meridian principle was of general application and could be applied to “a substantive rule of judge made law” (whether the finality of a judgment could be displaced by the perjury of a party). In this case, a company was identified through the acts of a former director because at the trial where the perjury took place, he was “part of a team which was helping to row [the company] to victory”. However, Brooke LJ was careful to emphasise that this was a civil case where the approach to corporate liability was “fundamentally different”. In a strong dissent, Buxton LJ stated that the same rules of attribution should be applied in both criminal and civil cases. His view was that Meridian is “at best an imperfect guide to the correct approach to the rule for attribution of a crime” and that he was “bound by Tesco v Natrass to apply the ‘directing mind and will’ formulation, or something very near to it”.¹¹¹

Indeed, the following criminal decision confirmed that any flexibility introduced by Meridian in relation to statutory offences had no application to the common law offence of manslaughter.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL’S REFERENCE
(NO.2 OF 1999) [2000] 2 CR. APP. R.
207 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION):

Following a train collision at Southall, seven passengers died and 151 were injured. Great Western Trains was prosecuted for manslaughter but was acquitted, as there was no human being with whom the company could be identified. On reference by the Attorney General:

ROSE LJ:

“There is, as it seems to us, no sound basis for suggesting that, by their recent decisions, the courts have started a process of moving from identification to personal liability as a basis for corporate liability for manslaughter ... [T]he identification principle is in our judgment just as relevant to the actus reus as to mens rea ...

In our judgment, unless an identified individual’s conduct, characterisable as gross criminal negligence, can be attributed to the company the company is not, in the present state of the common law, liable for manslaughter. Civil negligence rules ... are not apt to confer criminal liability on a company.

None of the authorities relied on by [counsel] as pointing to personal liability for manslaughter by a company supports that contention. In each, the decision was dependent on the purposive construction that the particular statute imposed ... In each case there was an identified employee whose conduct was held to be that of the company. In each case it was held that the concept of directing mind and will had no application when construing the statute. But it was not suggested or implied that the concept of identification is dead or moribund in relation to common law offences ... Indeed, Lord Hoffmann’s speech in the Meridian case, in fashioning an additional special rule of attribution geared to the purpose of the statute, proceeded on the basis that the primary ‘directing mind and will’ rule still applies although it is not determinative in all cases. In other words, he was not departing from the identification theory but reaffirming its existence ...

[T]he identification principle remains the only basis in common law for corporate liability for gross negligence manslaughter.”

Opinion accordingly

3-076

The ratio of this decision only extends to the common law offence of corporate manslaughter (which, as we shall see, has now been abolished) and would probably apply to other common law offences. While the point has not been settled, it seems likely that it would also apply to statutes creating stigmatic offences, such as the Offences Against the Person Act 1861. So if a prosecution had been brought under the 1861 Act in relation to the 151 people seriously injured (probably under s.20), it would seem that the company would only have been liable if a person representing the controlling mind of the company had actually committed the offence. This is intolerably narrow. Managing Directors do not drive trains and it would be extraordinarily difficult, if not impossible, to establish that their gross negligence in the boardroom caused the death of workers or members of the public.

The extent of Meridian has even been brought into question in relation to regulatory offences. In St Regis Paper Co Ltd,¹¹² the trial judge relied on Lord Hoffmann's observations to conclude that the company defendant could be identified as having committed an offence of intentionally making a false entry in a record required to be kept under the condition of a permit (Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations 2000¹¹³ reg.32) through the acts and state of mind of the technical manager of the smallest of five paper mills owned by the company. The offence involved the manager making a false entry about the amount of solids the company was discharging into a river. The Court of Appeal quashed the conviction, holding that to attribute an employee's act to the company the individual must be seen as the directing mind and will of the company, and such persons would normally be on the board of directors, a managing director or some other superior officer of the company who carried out the functions of management and spoke and acted as the company. That was the case even though the offence fell within a regulatory regime, since if parliament had intended vicarious liability to be possible it would not have drafted the offence to require mens rea. The lesson to be learned from Meridian, noted Moses LJ, is the importance of construing the statute which creates the statutory offence in order to determine the rules of attribution applicable to the statutory offence in question.¹¹⁴

That the question revolves around statutory interpretation in relation to offences specifically designed as part of a regulatory regime may not be particularly enlightening in determining the rules of attribution in relation to a statutory offence, such as one under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, which was not drafted with the liability of corporations in mind. However, even if the more flexible Meridian approach were adopted, there would still be immense problems with the identification doctrine. It still requires an individual to be identified within the company whose acts and knowledge can be attributed to the company. In many cases the wrong might have occurred for the very reason that there was no person within the company responsible for, say, health and safety. Alternatively, the company's structures may be so complex and impenetrable, with decision-making buried at many different departmental levels, that it becomes impossible to pin-point any individual with responsibility for a particular area of activity. It is for these, and other, reasons, explored below, that there has been a call for the complete abandonment of the identification doctrine in English law.

D. RESTRUCTURING CORPORATE CRIMINAL LIABILITY

3-077

The identification doctrine is inadequate to deal with the reality of decision-making in many modern companies. Accordingly, several alternative methods for the establishment of corporate culpability have been suggested.

1. Aggregation doctrine

3-078

In HM Coroner for East Kent Ex p. Spooner,¹¹⁵ the aggregation doctrine was considered and rejected.¹¹⁶ Under this doctrine, one aggregates all the acts and mental elements of the various relevant persons within the company to ascertain whether, aggregated together, they would amount to a crime if they had all been committed by one person. This doctrine has the advantage of recognising that in many cases it is not possible to isolate a single individual who has committed the crime with mens rea. This doctrine can deter companies from burying responsibility deep within the corporate structure.

However, this doctrine simply perpetuates the personification of companies myth. Instead of finding one person with whom the company can be identified (as required by the identification doctrine), one finds several people. The doctrine ignores the reality that the real essence of the wrongdoing might not be what each individual did but the fact that the company had no organisational structure or policy to prevent each individual doing what she did in a way that cumulatively amounts to a crime. Indeed, in the *Herald of Free Enterprise*¹¹⁷ case, it is doubtful whether the aggregation of the acts and omissions of the various personnel would have amounted to a corporate crime. The real fault in that case lay with the lack of policy and responsibility for safety within the company.

2. Reactive corporate fault

3-079

A somewhat different approach to corporate criminal liability has been proposed by Fisse and Braithwaite. As many company structures are impenetrable to outsiders they propose that companies “activate and monitor [their own] private justice systems of corporate defendants”.

BRENT FISSE AND JOHN BRAITHWAITE, “THE ALLOCATION OF
RESPONSIBILITY FOR CORPORATE
CRIME: INDIVIDUALISM,
COLLECTIVISM AND
ACCOUNTABILITY” (1988) 11 SYDNEY
L. REV. 468, 511–512:

3-080

“One possible approach would be to restructure the imposition of corporate liability so as to enforce internal accountability. Where the actus reus of an offence is proven to have been committed by or on behalf of a corporation, the court, if equipped with a suitable statutory injunctive power, could require the company (a) to conduct its own enquiry as to who was responsible within the organisation, (b) to take internal disciplinary measures against those responsible, and (c) to return a report detailing the action taken. If the corporate defendant returned a report demonstrating that due steps had been taken to discipline those responsible then corporate criminal liability would not be imposed. If the reaction of the company was inexcusably deficient then both the company and its top managers would be criminally liable for their failure to comply with the order of the court. The range of punishments for corporate defendants would include court-ordered adverse publicity, community service, and punitive injunctive sentences ...

Where it can be proven that harm proscribed by the actus reus of an offence has been caused by conduct performed on behalf of a corporation, it is not unreasonable that the cost of investigating internal responsibility for that harm causing be borne by the corporate defendant rather than by taxpayers in general ... Even though sanctions available to private justice systems—fines, dismissals, demotions, shame—may be less potent than some of those available in the public arena, it seems better to have weaker sanctions hitting the right targets than stronger weapons pounding the wrong targets.”¹¹⁸

3-081

There are, however, many problems with this reactive fault doctrine. What corrective measures and disciplinary actions will suffice to avoid liability? Would a formal reprimand of an employee coupled with the circulation of an internal memorandum advising staff that certain actions need to be taken in future suffice?¹¹⁹ If a company fails to take sufficient steps, what offence would be committed? If the company were to be liable for established offences such as theft or fraud, there would be a severe danger of “false labelling”¹²⁰ in that the established prerequisites of the crime, in terms of actus reus and mens rea, would not be made out. On the other hand, if new special offences relating to reactive fault were to be created, there is the danger that the crimes committed by such companies will continue to be perceived as “poor cousins” to the “real criminal offences”. Convicting companies of a failure to comply with a court order conveys the same message as a conviction under the Health and Safety legislation. What is needed is a more direct public shaming of the company itself for the actual harm that the company’s culpable acts have caused.

Nevertheless, such proposals could be useful for lesser regulatory offences and an approach along these lines is already adopted by English law to a certain extent. In these situations, Statutory Notices can be imposed requiring a company to do or refrain from certain behaviour with failure to comply being a specific criminal offence. For example, it is common in environmental and health and safety law for such an approach to be adopted.¹²¹ The Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008, discussed earlier,¹²² enables Regulators to serve Stop Notices on corporations prohibiting them from carrying on specified activities until certain steps have been taken.¹²³ Further, Regulators can accept Enforcement Undertakings from corporations that they will take specified action to secure that the offence does not continue or recur.¹²⁴ As will be seen at the end of this chapter, something similar has been introduced in relation to corporate liability for economic crime, in the form of Deferred Prosecution Agreements.

3. Corporate culture doctrine

3–082

What is needed is a recognition that corporate policies and behaviour often depend on the organisational structure and lines of authority within the corporation with responsibility for standard procedures, such as those relating to safety, being spread throughout the company. Corporate acts and policies are not simply an aggregation of individual choices but are often the acts and policies of the company itself. A company might have “no soul to be damned, and no body to be kicked”,¹²⁵ but it can be likened to “an intelligent machine”.¹²⁶ Much of the modern literature on corporate culpability has rejected the individualistic conceptions underlying the identification doctrine and favours an organisational model in which companies are seen as more than the sum of their total numbers: “they are discrete and unique moral entities which can be criminally culpable in their own right”.¹²⁷ The focus should be on corporate structures and systems and on practices and policies and whether the corporation has allowed a “corporate culture” to develop which facilitated the commission of the crime. From such a corporate culture of non-compliance with the law, it becomes possible to infer corporate mens rea by the corporation itself.

BRENT FISSE, “RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN CORPORATE CRIMINAL LAW AND CORPORATE LIABILITY TO MONETARY PENALTIES” (1990) 13 UNSWLJ 1, 15–16:

3–083

“Corporate policy is the corporate equivalent of intention, and a company that conducts itself with an express or implied policy of non-compliance with a criminal prohibition exhibits corporate criminal intentionality ... The concept of negligently failing to comply with the law is also applicable to a corporation as a collectivity. Corporations perform corporate roles in society and have collective capacities. Accordingly, they are subject to distinctly corporate standards of care.

Although it is possible to define corporate fault in terms of corporate policy and corporate negligence, the worry is that corporations will develop compliance systems that look immaculate on paper but which are not meant to be taken seriously by their personnel. One solution is to recognise that a corporation may have an implied policy of non-compliance ... There would be merit in a rule that a company is deemed to have a policy of non-compliance where the company has failed to have in place a system whereby employees could report suspected or anticipated episodes of non-compliance directly to top management.”

C. M. V. CLARKSON, “CORPORATE CULPABILITY” [1998] 2 WEB

“While it is perhaps easy to grasp the notion of a company being grossly negligent in that no subjective mental element is required, it is important to stress that both recklessness or intention can also be found in a company’s policies, operational procedures and lack of precautions. If the corporate culture permitted or encouraged the wrongdoing, it may be easy to infer that the corporate body itself must have foreseen the possibility of the harm occurring (Cunningham recklessness) ... or that the consequence was virtually certain to occur from which intention may be inferred (Moloney/Hancock intention). The important point about this approach is that it is not whether any individual within the company would have realised or foreseen the harm occurring but whether in a properly structured and organised careful company the risks would have been obvious ... Possibly the only avenue of escape would be for a company to assert that while the risks looked objectively obvious, they had special expertise enabling them to rule out the risk (which would negate both ... recklessness and intention). In the unlikely event of this claim being believed (bearing in mind that the risk clearly did materialise), the company would (rightly) escape liability.

The major objection to the corporate mens rea doctrine is the difficulty of determining whether the policies and practices of a company are sufficiently defective to be adjudged blameworthy to the requisite degree. In Herald of Free Enterprise this could easily have been done. The company had no proper safety procedures, no director responsible for safety and had received and ignored prior warnings of open-door sailings. In other cases, however, particularly where there is no pattern of wrongdoing, it could be more difficult to identify the policies and practices as amounting to mens rea. One method of addressing this problem in the United States would be to inquire whether a company had a Corporate Compliance Programme (a formal system or programme designed to ensure that all employees know the relevant laws affecting the company’s operations and seeking to ensure corporate compliance with the law) which has been enforced in good faith.”

In 2001, Australia enacted the Criminal Code Pt 2.5,¹²⁸ allowing for corporations that do not have a culture of compliance to be held liable for any offence with a fault element.¹²⁹ In addition to this, in 2004, the Australian Capital Territory (ACT) introduced a new criminal offence (Industrial Manslaughter)¹³⁰ expressly endorsing this approach whereby mens rea can be inferred from a corporate culture. Recklessness is needed for the offence and is attributed to the company itself if it “expressly, tacitly or impliedly authorised or permitted the commission of the offence”. Such authorisation or permission may be established by:

“proving that a corporate culture existed within the corporation that directed, encouraged, tolerated or led to non-compliance with the contravened law; or proving that the corporation failed to create and maintain a corporate culture requiring compliance with the contravened law.”¹³¹

Corporate culture is defined to mean:

“an attitude, policy, rule, course of conduct or practice existing within the corporation generally or in that part of the corporation where the relevant conduct happens.”¹³²

In assessing whether a relevant corporate culture exists it is relevant to consider whether the employee etc. who committed the offence reasonably believed that senior managers of the corporation would have authorised or permitted the commission of the offence. (This would capture situations where, although corporate policy ostensibly prohibits conduct, it is in fact encouraged by management.)

Academic commentators¹³³ have suggested that the following factors could be relevant in establishing a corporate culture:

- Hierarchy of corporation: does the Board make efforts to comply with the law? Is the management structure organised in such a way as to encourage non-compliance (e.g. insulating certain officers from responsibility)?

- Corporate goals: are these realistic or so unrealistic as to encourage unlawful behaviour?
- Monitoring compliance: monitoring systems/internal audits/channels of communication for employees to report concerns.
- Circumstances of offence.
- Reactions to past violations.
- Incentives and indemnification.

We shall see later in this section that English law has endorsed a version of this approach in establishing liability for the new offence of corporate manslaughter.

4. Specific corporate offences

3–087

The discussion of the above approaches to establishing corporate criminal liability relates to mechanisms for holding corporations liable for established criminal offences that can be committed by individuals. These offences were all shaped around individualistic conceptions of liability making it difficult to fashion rules for corporate liability. Accordingly, an alternative approach could be the creation of special offences that can only be committed by corporations. These offences can then be specially designed to accommodate the reality of corporate decision-making. As we shall see, this has been done with the creation of a special offence of corporate manslaughter. The other major statute to deal with criminal liability is the Bribery Act 2010, which created a special offence of failure of commercial organisations to prevent bribery.¹³⁴

The Law Commission has conducted a general review of organisational liability. One of its proposals was that new legislation should include specific provisions in criminal offences to indicate the basis on which companies may be found liable.¹³⁵ However, such proposals were put on hold and a full scale project on corporate liability remains on the Commission's list of future programmes of reform.

E. DEATH AND INJURY AT WORK: A CASE STUDY IN CORPORATE CRIMINAL LIABILITY

3–088

The issues discussed above apply to all criminal offences that can be committed by corporations. However, it was the application of these rules in cases where workers or others had been killed or injured at work or through other corporate operations (such as transport) that proved most controversial. The result was a sustained and vigorous campaign for reform of the law which culminated in the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007. Before the provisions of this Act are examined, we need to explore why this area of the law has proved so controversial. This involves examining both how the law in this field has operated in practice and the particular shortcomings of the identification doctrine in such cases.

1. The law in action

3–089

Where someone has been killed or injured as a result of corporate activities, it is possible to have recourse to the main homicide and non-fatal offences against the person. However, the reality is that there were only ever seven convictions of corporations for common law manslaughter in England and Wales¹³⁶ and prosecutions for other serious offences against the person are virtually unknown. Why is this?

An important explanation relates to enforcement procedures and public attitudes moulded by the media, the state and companies themselves. When persons are killed or seriously injured at work (even when they are members of the public) the typical response has in the past been to describe this as an “accident”—which in turn structures the official response.¹³⁷ While there is evidence that work-related fatalities are now regarded as very serious crimes,¹³⁸ crime in the streets is still generally regarded as worse than crime in the suites. In an attempt to increase safety at work and prevent such “accidents” the Health and Safety at Work etc.

Act 1974 makes it an offence for an employer to breach a duty “to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, the health, safety and welfare at work of all his employees”.¹³⁹ This and other similar offences under the Act are drafted without any reference to whether a worker is killed or injured or not. The crime is simply an endangerment offence involving the failure to maintain proper safety standards. This stands in strong contrast to the offences available when persons are killed or injured outside their workplaces which are structured in terms of the seriousness of the harm caused. This is true not only in cases of personal violence but also under the Road Traffic Act 1988. The different structure of the health and safety offences contributes to the overall sense that death and injury at work is not “real crime”. The main body set up to enforce this legislation is the HSE which has the power to notify companies that certain safety matters require attention, to issue improvement or prohibition notices or to bring a criminal prosecution. It is only since 1998, as a result of a protocol agreed between the HSE, the CPS and the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO), that the police now attend the scene of every sudden workplace death.¹⁴⁰ When someone is seriously injured at work it is extremely rare for the police to conduct an investigation into the incident¹⁴¹ and only about 10% of non-fatal serious injuries are investigated by the HSE.¹⁴²

3-090

Further, in those cases where an investigation is undertaken, the HSE does not regard its primary function as being one of initiating prosecutions, but rather as one of advising companies and of determining good practice.¹⁴³ The HSE’s regulatory practice is underpinned by three concepts: self-regulation, co-operation and compliance seeking.¹⁴⁴ The HSE, under-manned and under-resourced,¹⁴⁵ with its policy of advising rather than prosecuting companies, will only press charges in cases that they believe represent a flagrant breach of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. In cases where serious injuries have been sustained a prosecution (under the Health and Safety legislation) is only brought in 11% of cases that were investigated (i.e. only in about 1% of the total number of cases where a serious injury was sustained).¹⁴⁶ A majority of these prosecutions are brought in the magistrates' court (60%¹⁴⁷) as this is quicker and cheaper for the HSE.¹⁴⁸ Penalties there have traditionally been low.¹⁴⁹ This displacement of police powers by the primarily regulatory HSE simply marginalises corporate crime and contributes, even in those cases where there is a prosecution, to the general feeling that such deaths and injuries are not really “crime” or the products of corporate violence.

However, deaths in the work place began to be taken more seriously.

PAUL ALMOND, CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND REGULATORY REFORM, (2013), P.XIII:

3-091

“I was ... undertaking fieldwork for my study of health and safety inspectors' attitudes in relation to work-related fatality cases, and I was speaking with a very experienced inspector about his 30-year career and the changes he had witnessed during that time. He identified what he saw as a paradox underpinning this area of regulation:

‘When I joined HSE 27 years ago it wasn't a very important job to be honest, but it just seems to have grown and grown in importance ... I remember investigating fatalities when nobody was interested in what was going on, it was just one of those things, people go to work and get killed, but it's a big event now. I wonder why, when actually we're safer, the importance of the subject seems to keep rising? In the time I've been an inspector, employee fatalities have fallen from about six or seven hundred a year down to about two hundred a year. You'd expect people to have said “right, we can pack in now”, but they don't, the importance keeps growing. It's a conundrum.’”

2. Failings of the identification doctrine

3-092

One reason for the lack of criminalisation in cases when people were killed as a result of corporate activities was that the identification doctrine made a conviction for homicide extremely difficult. This problem still persists when people are injured.

R. v HM CORONER FOR EAST KENT,
EX P. SPOONER (1989) 88 CR. APP. R.
10 (QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT)

3-093

The applicants sought judicial review of the coroner's decision that a company could not be indicted for manslaughter and that the acts or omissions of the company personnel could not be aggregated so as to render the company liable.

BINGHAM LJ:

"The inquest arises from the capsizing of the vehicle ferry 'Herald of Free Enterprise' off Zeebrugge on March 6, 1987 and the huge loss of life, both of passengers and crew, to which that tragic disaster gave rise. Nearly 200 lives were lost, causing widespread grief, and the facts of the disaster are etched not only on the recollections of all who were involved, directly or indirectly, but on the consciousness of the nation as a whole.

Very shortly after the Secretary of State for Trade ordered a formal investigation under section 55 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1970, Sheen J. sitting with Assessors, was appointed to conduct it ...

The investigation found that the immediate cause of the vessel's loss was that she sailed with her bow doors opened trimmed by the head, i.e. with her nose down. The manoeuvre in which she engaged led to the entry of water into the vehicle deck, the heavy listing of the vessel and her speedy capsizing.

Sheen J criticised a number of individuals who had failed to perform their duty, in particular those responsible for failing to close the bow doors, failing to see that the doors were closed and sailing without knowing that the doors were closed. He expressed his criticisms in strong terms. The vessel was owned and operated by Townsend Car Ferries Ltd, and that company also was the subject of severe criticism.

It is right that I should refer to the terms in which Sheen J expressed those criticisms. In paragraph 14.1 of his report he said this:

‘At first sight the faults which led to this disaster were the aforesaid errors of omission on the part of the Master, the Chief Officer and the assistant bosun, and also the failure by Captain Kirby to issue and enforce clear orders. But a full investigation into the circumstances of the disaster leads inexorably to the conclusion that the underlying or cardinal faults lay higher up in the Company. The Board of Directors did not appreciate their responsibility for the safe management of their ships. They did not apply their minds to the question: What orders should be given for the safety of our ships? The Directors did not have any proper comprehension of what their duties were. There appears to have been a lack of thought about the way in which the HERALD ought to have been organised for the Dover/Zeebrugge run. All concerned in management, from the members of the Board of Directors down to the junior superintendents, were guilty of fault in that all must be regarded as sharing responsibility for the failure of management. From top to bottom the body corporate was infected with the disease of sloppiness ... The failure on the part of the shore management to give proper and clear directions was a contributory cause of the disaster. This is a serious finding which must be explained in some detail.’

The report then goes into very considerable detail and in the course of the present hearing three points are relied on as being particularly relevant. First, it is pointed out that the company and its representatives failed to give serious consideration to a proposal that lights should be fitted on the bridge of the vessel which would inform the Master whether the bow doors and, for that matter, the stern doors were closed or not. Such a warning system, if duly heeded by the Master, would have prevented this disaster. This was a suggestion which was made but seems unhappily to have been the subject of facetious comment.

Secondly, attention is drawn to the failure of the company and its representatives to report and collate information relating to previous incidents when vessels had sailed with their doors open. It appears that there were five or six such incidents between October 1983 and February 1987. Had knowledge of these repeated incidents been appreciated it should have alerted the officers of the company to the risk of disaster, but it appears that there was no person within the company who ever knew of all the incidents.

Thirdly, attention is drawn to the lack of any proper system within the company to ensure that the vessels were operated in accordance with the highest standards of safety. It is rightly urged upon us that where the result of an unsafe system is liable to be so grave, the onus on a company to ensure safe operation is correspondingly high.

At the very end of his report, Sheen J answered the questions posed for the investigation by the Secretary of State. Question 3 was in these terms: ‘Was the capsizing of the “Herald of Free Enterprise” caused or contributed to by the fault of any person or persons and, if so, whom and in what respect?’ The answer given to that question was: ‘Yes, by the faults of the following,’ and three individuals are listed. Then: ‘4. Townsend Car Ferries Limited at all levels from the Board of Directors through the managers of the Marine Department down to the Junior Superintendents ...’

[The coroner] said this ...

‘although it is possible for several persons to be guilty individually of manslaughter, it is not permissible to aggregate several acts of neglect by different persons, so as to have gross negligence by a process of aggregation. That is a very important point of law ...’

No criticism is I think made of what the coroner said about manslaughter as against a personal defendant, but criticism has been made before us as to what he said about aggregation. The point has been made that a company can be guilty of manslaughter as well as an individual ... I am, however, tentatively of opinion that on appropriate facts the mens rea required for manslaughter can be established against a corporation. I see no reason in principle why such a charge should not be established ... [F]or a company to be criminally liable for manslaughter—on the assumption I am making that such a crime exists—it is required that the mens rea and the actus reus of manslaughter should be established not against those who acted for or in the name of the company but against those who were to be identified as the embodiment of the company itself. The coroner formed the view that there was no such case fit to be left to the jury against this company. I see no reason to disagree. I would add that I see no sustainable case in manslaughter against the directors who are named either.

I do not think the aggregation argument assists the applicants. Whether the defendant is a corporation or a personal defendant, the ingredients of manslaughter must be established by proving the necessary mens rea and actus reus of manslaughter against it or him by evidence properly to be relied on against it or him. A case against a personal defendant cannot be fortified by evidence against another defendant. The case against a corporation can only be made by evidence properly addressed to showing guilt on the part of the corporation as such. On the main substance of his ruling I am not persuaded that the coroner erred.”

Applications refused

3-095

At the inquest, the jury ignored the coroner’s instruction that there were no grounds for a verdict of corporate manslaughter and returned verdicts of unlawful death. Eventually, almost three years after the Zeebrugge deaths and after threats of a private prosecution, prosecutions for manslaughter were instituted against P&O (who had taken over Townsend) and seven employees of the company. At a preliminary hearing it was finally established that a company can be liable for manslaughter¹⁵⁰ but at the end of the prosecution case the trial judge, Turner J, directed acquittals against P&O and the five most senior employees.¹⁵¹ This indicates that there was a case to be answered by the two most junior employees, Stanley, the assistantbosun who had not closed the bow doors, and Sable, the loading officer/officer of the watch whose responsibility it was to check that the bow doors were closed. The prosecution immediately dropped all charges against these two on the ground that it was not in the public interest to proceed against them alone. The reason for directing an acquittal against P&O and the senior managers was that it could not be proved that the risks of open-door sailing were obvious to any of them.

The collapse of this prosecution is not surprising. There was no one individual, sufficiently high in the hierarchy of P&O, who could be said to have committed the actus reus and mens rea of manslaughter. For similar reasons, the failure to secure a manslaughter conviction in the Great Western Trains case, discussed above,¹⁵² was predictable. In short, this whole approach of “humanising” companies will generally only be appropriate for small ownermanaged companies where it will not be too difficult to pinpoint a senior individual with whom the company can be identified. For example, a corporate manslaughter conviction was obtained in *Kite*¹⁵³ where four teenagers had been drowned during a canoeing trip in Lyme

Bay, because the company, OLL Ltd, was effectively a one-person company and as the trial judge put it: “Mr Kite and the company OLL, of which he is managing director, stand or fall together. One for all and all for one”.¹⁵⁴ However, with larger companies, such as P&O, it will not be easy to find a corporate officer who committed an offence that can be attributed to the company. The identification doctrine ignores the reality of modern corporate decision-making which is often the product of corporate policies and procedures rather than individual decisions.

3. Corporate manslaughter

3–096

The inadequacy of the law, particularly in relation to securing a manslaughter conviction against larger companies, led to a sustained campaign for reform of the law.

In 1996, the Law Commission responded to these calls for reform of the law and proposed the introduction of a new offence of “corporate killing”.¹⁵⁵ It proposed abandonment of the identification doctrine and its replacement by a test of “management failure”. When the Labour Government came to power in 1997, one of its pledges was to introduce an offence along these lines and in due course the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 (CMCH Act) was enacted and came into force in 2008.¹⁵⁶

This Act abolishes the “common law of manslaughter by gross negligence” in its application to corporations and other organisations. A new offence, corporate manslaughter,¹⁵⁷ is created. Individuals cannot be liable for aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the new offence but can still be liable for the common law offence of manslaughter.

The offence of corporate manslaughter is defined as follows:

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 s.1:

“The offence

- (1) An organisation to which this section applies is guilty of an offence if the way in which its activities are managed or organised—
- (a) causes a person’s death, and
 - (b) amounts to a gross breach of a relevant duty of care owed by the organisation to the deceased ...
- (3) An organisation is guilty of an offence under this section only if the way in which its activities are managed or organised by its senior management is a substantial element in the breach referred to in subsection (1).”

From this somewhat cumbersome offence definition, it can be seen that the following core ingredients need to be established:

- Organisation.
- Relevant duty of care.
- Senior management failure.
- Gross breach of duty.
- Causing death.

Each of these ingredients will be examined in turn.

(i) Organisation

Despite the nomenclature of “corporate” manslaughter, the offence can be committed by any of the following specified “organisations”.

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007

s.1(2):

“The organisations to which this section applies are—

- (a) a corporation;
- (b) a department or other body listed in Schedule 1;
- (c) a police force;
- (d) a partnership, or a trade union or employers’ association, that is an employer.”

Schedule 1 lists various government departments and other public bodies such as the Department of Transport, the Department of Health and Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs. This list may be amended by statutory instrument.¹⁵⁸ Crown immunity for all such bodies is removed by s.11. While this extension of the law to these other bodies is significant, we shall see in the next section that ss.3–7 provide that public authorities do not owe a relevant duty of care in a wide range of circumstances meaning that the lifting of crown immunity is largely a matter of “symbolism”.¹⁵⁹

(ii) Relevant duty of care

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 S.2:

“Meaning of ‘relevant duty of care’

(1) A ‘relevant duty of care’, in relation to an organisation, means any of the following duties owed by it under the law of negligence—

- (a) a duty owed to its employees or to other persons working for the organisation or performing services for it;
- (b) a duty owed as occupier of premises;
- (c) a duty owed in connection with—

- (i) the supply by the organisation of goods or services (whether for consideration or not),
- (ii) the carrying on by the organisation of any construction or maintenance operations,
- (iii) the carrying on by the organisation of any other activity on a commercial basis, or
- (iv) the use or keeping by the organisation of any plant, vehicle or other thing;
- (d) a duty owed to [a person held in custody] ...
- (5) For the purposes of this Act, whether a particular organisation owes a duty of care to a particular individual is a question of law.
The judge must make any findings of fact necessary to decide that question.
- (6) For the purposes of this Act there is to be disregarded—
 - (a) any rule of the common law that has the effect of preventing a duty of care from being owed by one person to another by reason of the fact that they are jointly engaged in unlawful conduct;
 - (b) any such rule that has the effect of preventing a duty of care from being owed to a person by reason of his acceptance of a risk of harm.”

3–103

As with the current law of manslaughter by gross negligence, the organisation must owe a relevant duty of care to the deceased. This is a duty owed under the civil law of negligence; whether a duty of care is owed is a question of law.

This requirement is drawn from the *Adomako*¹⁶⁰ test for gross negligence manslaughter under which the defendant must owe a duty of care to the deceased. However, under this common law test the civil law concept of duty of care has not been fully employed by the criminal law. In Wacker,¹⁶¹ it was stated that the law of tort and criminal law have different objectives and so concepts such as duty of care need to be adapted to the different areas of law in which they are being applied.¹⁶² Accordingly, in this case it was held that the tortious doctrine of ex turpi causa non oritur actio did not apply in a case where a lorry driver smuggled 58 illegal immigrants (who died) into the country. To preserve the effect of this decision and also to ensure that the civil law rules on volenti non fit injuria do not apply, s.2(6) specifically provides that neither doctrine applies for the purposes of corporate manslaughter. Thus, a corporate defendant in a Wacker-type case will be regarded as being under a duty of care. Similarly, the fact that a worker has accepted a risk of harm will not prevent the employer company being under a duty of care.

The extent to which a duty of care is owed by public authorities, the military, police and law enforcement agencies, emergency services, child-protection and probation agencies are severely limited by ss.3–7 which provide various exemptions from liability. Some of these exemptions are “comprehensive”.¹⁶³ Public authorities do not owe a relevant duty of care “in respect of a decision as to matters of public policy (including in particular the allocation of public resources or the weighing of competing public interests)”.¹⁶⁴ Thus if the Department of Health makes a decision not to allocate public resources to, for example, the purchase of certain drugs, there will be no duty of care owed to any patients who might die because of the unavailability of the drug. The other comprehensive exemptions relate to military combat operations¹⁶⁵ and police operations dealing with terrorism and violent disorder.¹⁶⁶ Other exemptions are “partial”. For example, with regard to other policing and law enforcement activities and the emergency response of fire authorities and other emergency response organisations, there is, in essence,¹⁶⁷ no duty of care in relation to their operational activities; there is only a duty of care where the death relates to the organisation’s responsibility as employer or as occupier of premises.¹⁶⁸ So, for example, if a fire authority acts negligently while rescuing people from a fire, there will be no liability. However, if the fire authority negligently fails to maintain its fleet of fire engines with the result that a death is caused, the fire authority can be liable for the new offence. The exemption which applies in relation to military operations is broadly accepted, but the exemption of a duty of care owed by the military in respect of training of a hazardous nature or carried out in a hazardous way has recently come under attack. The House of Commons Select Committee recommended that the CMCH Act ought to be amended to allow for appropriate prosecutions in relation to deaths arising from training exercises.¹⁶⁹

3–104

It is to be hoped that the courts will not get bogged down with legal intricacies relating to whether a duty of care exists under the civil law or whether the case comes within the exclusions in ss.3–7. Indeed, it may be questioned whether it is appropriate to employ the civil law concept of duty of care here at all. The duty of care concept has been developed and refined in the totally different context of claims for compensation. It is also a complex legal concept that is still evolving through judicial decisions. Given the special context of the new offence, it might have been better not to follow the contours of the law of gross negligence manslaughter and instead to have recognised that the focus of the new offence should be on breaches of health and safety that cause death. As shall be seen, such breaches form a critical component in the assessment of whether an organisation is liable. Such offences are specifically designed for regulating corporate conduct and are clear and well-established. The Law Commission’s original proposal with no such requirement of a duty of care was superior.¹⁷⁰ However, the CMCH Act rejects this view.

(iii) Senior management failure

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 s.1:

3–105

“(3) An organisation is guilty of an offence under this section only if the way in which its activities are managed or organised by its senior management is a substantial element in the breach referred to in subsection (1) ...

(4)(c) ‘senior management’, in relation to an organisation, means the persons who play significant roles in—

- (i) the making of decisions about how the whole or a substantial part of its activities are to be managed or organised, or
- (ii) the actual managing or organising of the whole or a substantial part of those activities.”

MINISTRY OF JUSTICE, UNDERSTANDING THE CORPORATE
MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE
HOMICIDE ACT 2007 (2007), PP.12–14:

3–106

“The offence is concerned with the way in which activities were managed or organised. This represents a new approach to establishing corporate liability for manslaughter ... and does not require the prosecution to establish failure on the part of particular individuals or managers. It is instead concerned with how an activity was being managed and the adequacy of those arrangements.

- This approach is not confined to a particular level of management within an organisation: the test considers how an activity was managed within the organisation as a whole. However, it will not be possible to convict an organisation unless a substantial part of the organisation’s failure lay at a senior management level ...
- Exactly who is a member of an organisation’s senior management will depend on the nature and scale of an organisation’s activities. Apart from directors and similar senior management positions, roles likely to be under consideration include regional managers in national organisations and the managers of different operational divisions ...

Can the offence be avoided by senior management delegating responsibility for health and safety?

- No. The Act is concerned with the way an activity was being managed or organised and will consider how responsibility was being discharged at different levels of the organisation. Failures by senior managers to manage health and safety adequately, including through inappropriate delegation of health and safety matters, will therefore leave organisations vulnerable to corporate manslaughter ... charges.”

3–107

The above provisions focus on the way in which the organisation’s activities are managed and organised by the senior management. This is to ensure “that the new offence is targeted at failings in the strategic management of an organisation’s activities, rather than failings at relatively junior levels”.¹⁷¹ The insistence in the Act on fault by senior management is a response to critics of earlier proposals who argued that because companies are purely creatures of law, crimes can only be committed by people and not companies and so the real issue is one of determining when the acts of these people should be attributed to a company.¹⁷²

DAVID ORMEROD AND RICHARD TAYLOR, “THE CORPORATE
MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE
HOMICIDE ACT 2007” [2008] CRIM.
L.R. 589, 593–594:

3–108

“This test returns the focus, at least to some extent, to the evaluation of the relative contribution of groups of individuals. It can thus be described as implementing a ‘qualified aggregation principle’ in two respects: (1) because it adds together the failings of a number of individuals or groups of individuals, not in creating an artificial level of fault of an appropriate degree than can be anthropomorphically attributed to the company but rather, in characterising the company’s management failure as the aggregate of those (groups of) individuals’ failures; and (2) because whilst the failures might be found in and aggregated from a variety of places within the company, there is a proviso or qualification that failures must include to an appropriate (substantial) extent, failure or failures by ‘senior management’.”

3–109

Once the decision had been made to abandon the identification doctrine (and not to adopt the aggregation doctrine)¹⁷³ and instead to focus “responsibility on the working practices of the organisation”,¹⁷⁴ this insistence on identifying the “senior management” seems unduly restrictive and threatens to open the door to endless argument in court as to whether certain persons do or do not qualify as part of the “senior management”. A further obvious problem with this approach is that it replicates one of the main problems with the previous law in that it could apply inequitably to small and large organisations. It will clearly be easier to identify senior management failings in small companies.¹⁷⁵ In essence, this senior management test is little more than a broadening of the identification doctrine. In effect, as suggested by Ormerod and Taylor, it is an endorsement of a version of the aggregation doctrine where, instead of identifying one senior directing mind, one aggregates the actions and culpability of several senior persons. It is unfortunate that the Law Commission approach was not adopted whereby the definition of a management failure removed the need to identify persons representing the senior management and placed the emphasis on the activities of the company: “the way in which its activities are managed or organised”.¹⁷⁶ This placed the focus where it should be: on the activities and organisational practices of the company.

Price is optimistic that the provisions of the CMCH Act can in fact be interpreted in a way which would focus on the organisational practices of the company.

LUKE PRICE, “FINDING FAULT IN ORGANISATIONS —RECONCEPTUALISING THE ROLE OF SENIOR MANAGERS IN CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER” (2015) 35 (3) LEGAL

“The senior management requirement functions without regard to the presence or absence of misconduct by senior managers themselves. The 2007 Act requires the management and organisation of corporate activities by senior management to be a substantial element of the offence, but does not specify the necessary manner of this involvement. There is no requirement within the act for the individuals who make up senior management to contribute to any criminal act, so long as senior management remains a substantial element of the corporate crime. There is no requirement that senior managers are at fault, or that corporate liability derives from the aggregated culpability of individuals.

Senior managers themselves need not be substantially involved in events giving rise to corporate manslaughter liability, which ceases to be [a] matter of aggregating the misconduct of senior management members. It is not the members of senior management themselves that matter, nor any fault on their part but, rather, their characteristic involvement as architects and surveyors that facilitate development of corporate structure. Through occupying these roles, members of senior management have a significant and substantial role in corporate crime.

With this interpretation of the senior management requirement, the Corporate Manslaughter Act becomes a model of corporate culpability. The liability of an organisation is indicated by the involvement of individuals who play a particular role, and have particular significance, within that organisation. When corporate structure, marked by the involvement of senior management, causes death, the organisation is liable. When corporate structure alters the decisions of individual employees, it becomes capable of causing them to act in a way that causes death. Corporate manslaughter liability arises when the way in which the organisation is managed or organised causes death. Corporations are liable due to the effect of the system of work on individual action, with no further causal link required. There is no need to enquire into the fault of individuals, whether senior manager or otherwise.”

It may be that, interpreted in this way, the senior management failure requirement could throw off the shackles of the identification doctrine. There is little evidence, however, that it is likely that the courts will find favour with such an approach. If this had been Parliament's intention in drafting the provision, it could have made it much clearer.

(iv) Gross breach of duty

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 S.1(4)(B):

3-112

“[A] breach of a duty of care by an organisation is a ‘gross’ breach if the conduct alleged to amount to a breach of that duty falls far below what can reasonably be expected of the organisation in the circumstances.”

3-113

This is following the contours of gross negligence manslaughter as laid down in Adomako.¹⁷⁷ There must be a gross breach of the relevant duty of care in the way the senior managers manage or organise the organisation's activities.

It is for the jury to determine whether a breach of duty is a “gross breach”. One of the main criticisms of the Adomako test is that it is too vague. The jury has to assess, in an unstructured manner, the broad, open issue of whether the conduct was “so bad” that it deserves to be labelled manslaughter. In response to this, and to similar criticisms that the Law Commission's proposals were also too vague in this respect, the Act provides a range of statutory criteria for the jury in deciding whether there was a gross breach of duty.

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 S.8:

3-114

“Gross breach

Factors for jury

- (1) This section applies where—
 - (a) it is established that an organisation owed a relevant duty of care to a person, and
 - (b) it falls to the jury to decide whether there was a gross breach of that duty.
- (2) The jury must consider whether the evidence shows that the organisation failed to comply with any health and safety legislation that relates to the alleged breach, and if so—
 - (a) how serious that failure was;
 - (b) how much of a risk of death it posed.
- (3) The jury may also—
 - (a) consider the extent to which the evidence shows that there were attitudes, policies, systems or accepted practices within the organisation that were likely to have encouraged any such failure as is mentioned in subsection (2), or to have produced tolerance of it;
 - (b) have regard to any health and safety guidance that relates to the alleged breach.
- (4) This section does not prevent the jury from having regard to any other matters they consider relevant.”

(a) Failure to comply with health and safety legislation

3–115

In deciding whether there has been a gross breach of duty, the jury must consider whether the organisation failed to comply with any health and safety legislation that relates to the alleged breach, and if so, (a) how serious that failure was; and (b) how much of a risk of death it posed.

Four points should be made with regard to this provision. First, the jury must consider the issues specified in s.8(2). This is to be welcomed. Companies are expected to comply with the health and safety legislation. Their failure to do so raises at least a prima facie case of a gross breach. Secondly, it is only compliance with health and safety legislation that must be considered. Whether there has been compliance with health and safety guidance is a matter to which the jury may have regard.¹⁷⁸ Thirdly, the jury must consider whether the organisation (as a whole) failed to comply with the health and safety legislation. While it has been stated that this “further supports the argument that the activities of non-senior managers are relevant in determining whether there has been a management failure”,¹⁷⁹ the fact remains that the failure to comply with the health and safety legislation by the organisation must be substantially attributable to the way in which the organisation’s activities are managed or organised by its senior management. Fourthly, it is right that not every (perhaps trivial) breach of health and safety laws should give rise to liability for the new offence. The jury must go on to assess how serious the failure was and how much of a risk of death it posed.

3–116

Of course, there is an inevitable circularity in asking whether conduct falls far below a standard and then measuring this by “how serious” is the failure to comply with the law. However, making these decisions in relation to something tangible (the breach of health and safety laws) is a helpful step compared to the position under Adomako where no guidance at all for the jury is specified. The approach is not without practical problems, though. As highlighted by Dobson,¹⁸⁰ proving breaches of health and safety legislation involves a reverse burden of proof, allowing a company to escape liability if it is able to show that it did what was practicable.¹⁸¹ It is unclear whether such a reverse burden would apply when the jury is to assess whether a breach of health and safety legislation has occurred for the purposes of s.8.¹⁸² Given that a company may well be facing charges of breach of health and safety legislation alongside a corporate manslaughter charge (see below), such procedural issues could become confusing for the jury.

(b) Corporate culture

As a result of the Parliamentary Subcommittees' Report on the 2005 Bill,¹⁸³ the Act has introduced a new, additional, test for the jury in determining whether the conduct "falls far below what can reasonably be expected of the organisation in the circumstances". The jury may also "consider the extent to which the evidence shows that there were attitudes, policies, systems or accepted practices within the organisation that were likely to have encouraged" the failure to comply with health and safety laws or to have produced tolerance of such a failure.

This is drawing upon the corporate culture test applied in the Australian Capital Territory (discussed earlier¹⁸⁴). This approach has tried to escape from the notion that corporate acts must be linked to individual human beings' choices and acts. It has adopted an organisational model with the focus being on corporate structures and systems and on practices and policies and whether the corporation has allowed a "corporate culture" to develop which facilitated the commission of the crime. It should be noted that the Subcommittees' Report proposed this corporate culture test as a substitute for the senior management test. The Act has, however, utilised the corporate culture test as an additional mechanism to determine whether there has been the required senior management failure. While the Australian test has been criticised as too vague,¹⁸⁵ the provision in s.8(3) is less amenable to attack because it is an additional test to the breach of health and safety laws test. It is only when there has been a breach of health and safety laws that the jury may go on to consider the corporate culture within the corporation; the provision specifically relates to how the corporate culture encouraged the failure to comply with the health and safety laws. This is a far more focused issue than the rather unstructured and broad test from Australia.

(c) Any other relevant matters

Neither of the above two provisions prevent the jury from having regard to "any other matters they consider relevant". It is difficult to see that this provision will be much utilised. It is unthinkable that a jury could conclude that there had been no breach of health and safety laws yet because of “other matters” there was a gross breach of duty. So, the relevance of this provision must relate to the issue of “how serious” was the failure to comply with the health and safety laws. Such issues would normally fall to be determined by the corporate culture test.

(v) Causing death

3–119

In many cases when a death occurs at work, the most immediate cause of the death will be the act of a particular individual. To prevent arguments that this could constitute a free, deliberate and informed act breaking the chain of causation, the Law Commission Report recommended that liability could not be avoided on the ground that the most immediate cause of death was the act or omission of “an individual”.¹⁸⁶ The Government rejected this approach.

HOME OFFICE, CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER: THE GOVERNMENT’S DRAFT BILL FOR REFORM, CMND.6497 (2005), PARA.51:

3–120

“The case law in this area has, however, developed since the Law Commission reported and we are satisfied that no separate provision is now needed. An intervening act will only break the chain of causation if it is extraordinary—and we do not consider that corporate liability should arise where an individual has intervened in the chain of events in an extraordinary fashion causing death, or the death was otherwise immediately caused by an extraordinary and unforeseeable event.”

3–121

Accordingly, s.1(1)(a) simply specifies that the way in which the organisation managed or organised its activities must “cause a person's death". The normal rules on causation apply. This Home Office view was based on the then leading decision in Empress Cars.¹⁸⁷ However, since then the House of Lords has reaffirmed the supremacy of the rule that a chain of causation will be broken by the free, voluntary and informed action of a third party.¹⁸⁸ This has opened the door to arguments that the action of an individual employee, who is the most immediate cause of the death, will be regarded as voluntary and informed and will break the chain of causation. It is unfortunate that the Law Commission's proposal was not carried into the legislation.

Having outlined the main ingredients of the new offence, the following matters deserve consideration.

(vi) Relationship to health and safety legislation

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 S.19:

3-122

- “(1) Where in the same proceedings there is—
- (a) a charge of corporate manslaughter ... arising out of a particular set of circumstances, and
 - (b) a charge against the same defendant of a health and safety offence arising out of some or all of those circumstances, the jury may, if the interests of justice so require, be invited to return a verdict on each charge.
- (2) An organisation that has been convicted of corporate manslaughter ... arising out of a particular set of circumstances may, if the interests of justice so require, be charged with a health and safety offence arising out of some or all of those circumstances.”

3-123

An organisation may be charged with both corporate manslaughter and a health and safety offence and the jury may return a verdict on only the lesser charge. Under s.17, the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions is required for a corporate manslaughter prosecution. The Act makes no change to the position that the CPS (and not the HSE) has responsibility for prosecuting the offence.¹⁸⁹

SENTENCING GUIDELINES COUNCIL,
CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND HEALTH AND SAFETY OFFENCES CAUSING DEATH: DEFINITIVE
GUIDELINE (2010), PARA.4:

3–124

“There are considerable differences between these two offences:

- (a) because corporate manslaughter involves both a gross breach of duty of care and senior management failings as a substantial element in that breach, those cases will generally involve systemic failures; by contrast the HSWA offences are committed whenever the defendant cannot show that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid a risk of injury or lack of safety; that may mean that the failing is at an operational rather than systemic level and can mean in some cases that there has been only a very limited falling below the standard of reasonable practicability;
- (b) in corporate manslaughter the burden of proof remains on the prosecution throughout; in particular this will ordinarily involve the prosecution identifying the acts or omissions which it relies upon as constituting the breach, and then proving them; by contrast, in a HSWA prosecution the prosecutor need only prove that there has been a failure to ensure safety or absence of risk, which it may often be able to do simply by pointing to the injury; once it has done so the burden of proof shifts to the defendant; the prosecution need not identify the precautions which it says ought to have been taken, nor need it prove how the accident happened (R. v Chargot [2008] UKHL 73, Electric Gate Services Ltd [2009] EWCA Crim 1942); usually however it will do so.

(c) in corporate manslaughter the prosecution must prove that the breach was a (but not necessarily the only) substantial cause of death; by contrast the HSWA offences can be proved without demonstrating that any injury was caused by the failure to ensure safety ...”¹⁹⁰

(vii) Abolition of liability or organisations for manslaughter at common law

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 S.20:

3–125

“The common law offence of manslaughter by gross negligence is abolished in its application to corporations, and in any application it has to other organisations to which section 1 applies.”

3–126

While the common law offence of manslaughter by gross negligence is abolished in relation to organisations, it is not abolished, as shall be seen in the next section, in relation to individuals.

(viii) No individual liability

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007 S.18:

3–127

“(1) An individual cannot be guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence of corporate manslaughter.”

3–128

One of the most controversial aspects of the new law is the exemption from liability for individuals, such as directors or managers. Section 18 provides that no individual can be liable for aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring an offence of corporate manslaughter committed by an organisation. Such persons can still be liable to prosecution under the Health and Safety legislation (Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 s.37) or for the common law offence of gross negligence manslaughter. However, the reality is that few company directors (mostly of small companies) are personally convicted under Health and Safety legislation and even fewer have been convicted of manslaughter.¹⁹¹ With the introduction of the new corporate manslaughter offence, it was feared that even fewer prosecutions would be brought against individuals as prosecutors could view companies as easier targets.¹⁹²

However, what appears to be emerging is a tendency to use prosecutions of both companies and their individual directors to open the door to plea bargains. In Lion Steel, for example, a guilty plea to corporate manslaughter was offered and accepted once the charges against the individual directors were dropped.¹⁹³ Woodley worries that this is cause for concern:

“Will plea bargains be offered as a matter of course in the hope that directors facing individual prosecution will instruct their company’s solicitors to plead guilty? Or will the initiative come from those same directors to offer a corporate guilty plea in the hope or knowledge that any individual liability will be dropped with the added ‘bonus’ of a reduction in any subsequent fine on the company?”¹⁹⁴

3–129

Antrobus concludes that in cases combining gross negligence manslaughter charges against individual directors and a corporate manslaughter charge against their company, where the prosecution seek to persuade the jury that the:

“corporate entity is little more than the vehicle of those directors, then the risk is run that the company’s liability will stand or fall with the liability of those individuals. It is therefore tempting to conclude that in many respects the liability of corporations and their directors is little different from the situation prior to the CMCHA 2007 coming into force.”¹⁹⁵

(ix) Need for a special offence

3–130

The inadequacies of the old law were exposed earlier in this section. Reform of the law was essential. However, was it necessary to introduce a completely new offence? There are two views that can be adopted here.

The first view is that there was no need for the introduction of a new special offence. All unlawful killings should be prosecuted under the general law of homicide (in these situations, manslaughter). Whether someone is killed by an attack, by a car, by a negligent doctor or as a result of corporate activities should make no difference. As long as the identification doctrine were abolished or reformed, “corporate killings” could have been dealt with in the same way as other unlawful killings. Separate treatment through the introduction of a new offence could lead to a marginalisation of the seriousness of such killings. The offence will not be regarded as serious as “real” manslaughter and much of the law’s censuring and symbolic role would be defeated. Further, while the introduction of this new offence could greatly facilitate prosecutions in cases where death has been caused, the identification doctrine still continues to apply to all other cases, in particular, those where serious injury has been caused and with the high-profile problem of corporate killings being catered for, pressure for reform of the identification doctrine has been significantly reduced.

The alternative view is that the new offence can be supported.

C. M. V. CLARKSON, “CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER: NEED FOR A NEW

OFFENCE?” IN C. M. V. CLARKSON AND S. R. CUNNINGHAM (EDS), CRIMINAL LIABILITY FOR NON-AGGRESSIVE DEATHS (2008), PP.84– 86:

3–131

“Special homicide offences are perhaps needed when there is something distinctive about the context in which the killing occurred that justifies labelling the offence as something different from manslaughter...

Where a death has been caused in the context of corporate activities, the killing is far removed from the paradigmatic manslaughter. Duff (‘Criminalising Endangerment’ in R. A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes (2005)) distinguishes attacks from endangerments and argues that there is a significant moral difference between them. Attacks manifest ‘practical hostility’ towards people and their interests. An attack involves being guided by the wrong reasons: I attack you because I want to harm you; this is not a reason by which I should be guided. Endangerment involves not being guided by the right reasons.

Corporate activities do not involve attacks on the interests of others. Harming people is not the object of corporate enterprises. Such activities are widely regarded as acceptable and beneficial ... But if a company allows dangerous machinery or operations it is not being guided by all the reasons against allowing danger at work. These different actions reveal different wrongs (compared to attacks) and show the company’s character in different lights ... [D]eath is still the product of a lack of health and safety measures. It is very far-removed from manslaughter and so should be marked by the existence of a special offence. To underwrite this difference, it can be strongly argued that the label ‘corporate killing’ would have been more appropriate than ‘corporate manslaughter’.”

3–132

Further, this fear that such a new, separate offence could lead to its marginalisation could be misplaced. Having separate vehicular homicide offences has not resulted in trivialisation of their seriousness as can be seen by the sentences imposed in such cases.¹⁹⁶

4. Corporate liability for non-fatal injuries

3–133

Early in the process that led to the CMCH Act it was suggested that the Act should be extended to cover cases where serious injuries had been caused by corporate gross negligence. As was seen earlier, the number of people seriously injured at work grossly exceeds the number killed (144 people killed; 72,702 injured in 2015/16). It was argued that it was illogical that a company could be liable for the death of a worker but not for the serious injury to another worker when both might have been involved in the same incident and the second worker's life might only have been saved by the quick actions of the emergency services or by sheer luck.¹⁹⁷

However, such a proposal was not pursued. The view that prevailed was that while it was acceptable to criminalise corporate manslaughter on the basis of gross negligence as such culpability has always sufficed for manslaughter, it would be anomalous and a major extension of the law to criminalise serious injury caused negligently as subjective mens rea has traditionally been required for non-fatal offences against the person. It was also felt that it could “lead to dilution of the corporate killing offence and could potentially over-stretch investigation and enforcement resources”.¹⁹⁸ However, the most important reason for the limitation of the new offence to killings was because of political expedience:

“it might lose its current clear focus on manslaughter, and the ensuing controversy and drafting difficulties might further delay the introduction of the actual Bill.”¹⁹⁹

3–134

Accordingly, for serious, stigmatic offences—such as non-fatal offences against the person (where vicarious liability cannot be applied)—the common law, with its notorious identification doctrine, continues to apply and will continue to hamper the prosecution of companies in cases where serious injury is caused at work. The most realistic charge will be for inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to s.20 of this Act. However, for such a charge to succeed it will be necessary to prove that the senior person representing the directing mind and will of the company inflicted the grievous bodily harm and did so foreseeing the risk of some harm.²⁰⁰ It will only be in the most extraordinary circumstances that this could be proved—which is why there have been no reported convictions to date for such a corporate offence. Such cases will continue to be prosecuted under the Health and Safety legislation. However, it can be anticipated that there will be calls for legislative intervention to extend the law to non-fatal offences. At the time the Act was passed, the Government was urged to consider the possibility of using the Corporate Manslaughter Act as a template for introducing further criminal offences, such as an offence of corporate grievous bodily harm, in due course.²⁰¹ This suggestion can be further bolstered by the fact that such an offence would no longer be an anomaly, thanks to the introduction of a new offence of causing serious injury by dangerous driving in 2012.²⁰²

Although no general offence of corporate grievous bodily harm has yet been created, the Corporate Manslaughter Act has been used as a template for creating an additional specific offence resulting in corporate liability.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND COURTS ACT 2015 s.21:

3–135

“Ill-treatment or wilful neglect: care provider offence

(1) A care provider commits an offence if—

- (a) an individual who has the care of another individual by virtue of being part of the care provider’s arrangements ill-treats or wilfully neglects that individual,

- (b) the care provider’s activities are managed or organised in a way which amounts to a gross breach of a relevant duty of care owed by the care provider to the individual who is ill-treated or neglected, and
 - (c) in the absence of the breach, the ill-treatment or wilful neglect would not have occurred or would have been less likely to occur.
- (2) ‘Care provider’ means—
- (a) a body corporate or unincorporated association which provides or arranges for the provision of—
 - (i) health care for an adult or child, other than excluded health care, or
 - (ii) social care for an adult, or
 - (b) an individual who provides such care and employs, or has otherwise made arrangements with, other persons to assist him or her in providing such care.”

3–136

It can be seen that this offence uses the same concept of a breach of a relevant duty of care, and can apply to both corporations and individuals. The penalties, under s.23 of the Act, include a fine, a remedial order and a publicity order. It appears that, unlike corporate manslaughter, this is not a result crime, but a conduct crime, in that s.21 does not require any particular harm to have been caused as a result of the ill-treatment or wilful neglect. It will undoubtedly be for the courts to decide how this provision is to be interpreted.

F. PUNISHMENT OF CORPORATIONS²⁰³

3–137

It is useful to consider first sentencing in cases of corporate manslaughter and health and safety offences causing death and then to consider sentencing of other offences committed by organisations and other sentencing options.

1. Corporate manslaughter/health and safety offences causing death

(i) Fines

3–138

Traditionally, the main penalty imposed on corporations for these offences has been a fine. This continues to be the main penalty under the CMCH Act. As seen earlier, fines imposed on companies under the Health and Safety legislation have traditionally been low and could be described as little more than a “public morality tax”.²⁰⁴ This is one of the reasons contributing to the marginalisation of such offences. However, the last 20 years has seen a change of attitude. In *F Howe & Sons (Engineers) Ltd*²⁰⁵ it was stated that:

“Generally where death is the consequence of a criminal act it is regarded as an aggravating feature of the offence. The penalty should reflect public disquiet at the unnecessary loss of life ... The objective of prosecutions for health and safety offences in the work place is to achieve a safe environment for those who work there and for other members of the public who may be affected. A fine needs to be large enough to bring that message home where the defendant is a company not only to those who manage it but also to its shareholders. [It was argued] that the fine should not be so large as to imperil the earnings of employees or create a risk of bankruptcy. Whilst in general we accept that submission ... there may be cases where the offences are so serious that the defendant ought not to be in business.”

3–139

The average fine following a death at work increased steadily between the 20th and 21st centuries, and in a few high-profile cases the fines have been significant. In the Great Western Trains case, a fine of £1.5 million was imposed following the Southall train crash. In 2005, the two biggest fines ever for breach of health and safety laws were imposed on Balfour Beatty (£10 million) and Network Rail (£3.5 million) following the Hatfield derailment where four people were killed and 70 injured.²⁰⁶ However, while this new attitude to the level of fines is to be welcomed, it should be pointed out that the fine in the Great Western Trains case represented only 5.6% of the company's profit for the preceding year.²⁰⁷ Under the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.164(3), the court must inquire into the financial circumstances of the offender before fixing the amount of a fine. Equality in sentencing means equality of impact. If large corporations with vast profits were to be fined according to their means (say a percentage thereof) a new attitude to corporate violence and other crime might start emerging.

Since the CMCH Act, sentencing guidelines have been issued for both corporate manslaughter and for breaches of health and safety legislation causing death. These have been recently revised, with clearer guidance on the level of fine to be imposed, applying the now standard sentencing approach of using harm and culpability to assess offence seriousness, whilst also taking account of the size of the company (large, medium, small or micro-organisation).²⁰⁸

Previously, the sentencing guidelines had suggested that the appropriate fine for corporate manslaughter would "seldom be less than £500,000".²⁰⁹ Despite this, none of the first five successful prosecutions for corporate manslaughter exceeded that amount. The largest company to be convicted, Lion Steel, was fined just shy of this supposed minimum at £480,000, the judge explaining this on the basis that a fine at the recommended level would "have a serious effect on the ability of the company to pay its way and sustain its business".²¹⁰ This is not to suggest, however, that judges will always balk at the idea of effectively applying the death penalty to companies. The first company convicted of corporate manslaughter, Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings, was fined £385,000, upheld on appeal, despite the fact that the company would probably have to go into liquidation to pay the fine.²¹¹ Under the 2010 guidelines, the largest fine imposed was £700,000, against Baldwins Crane Hire.²¹² Under the 2016 guidelines, however, more detail is given on the precise starting points and sentencing ranges for different sizes of company. It is now the case that a 'medium' sized company such as Baldwins Crane Hire²¹³ could expect to be fined a far higher sum of money.

SENTENCING COUNCIL, HEALTH AND SAFETY OFFENCES, CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND FOOD SAFETY AND HYGIENE OFFENCES, DEFINITIVE GUIDELINE (2015), PP.22–24:

3–140

STEP ONE: Determining the Seriousness of the Offence

“By definition, the harm and culpability involved in corporate manslaughter will be very serious. Every case will involve death and corporate fault at a high level. The court should assess factors affecting the seriousness of the offence within this context by asking:

(a) How foreseeable was serious injury?

Usually, the more foreseeable a serious injury was, the graver the offence. Failure to heed warnings or advice from the authorities, employees or others or to respond appropriately to ‘near misses’ arising in similar circumstances may be factors indicating greater foreseeability of serious injury.

(b) How far short of the appropriate standard did the offender fall?

Where an offender falls far short of the appropriate standard, the level of culpability is likely to be high. Lack of adherence to recognised standards in the industry or the inadequacy of training, supervision and reporting arrangements may be relevant factors to consider.

(c) How common is this kind of breach in this organisation?

How widespread was the non-compliance? Was it isolated in extent or, for example, indicative of a systematic departure from good practice across the offender’s operations or representative of systemic failings? Widespread non-compliance is likely to indicate a more serious offence.

(d) Was there more than one death, or a high risk of further deaths, or serious personal injury in addition to death?

The greater the number of deaths, very serious personal injuries or people put at high risk of death, the more serious the offence.

Offence Category A: Where answers to questions (a)–(d) indicate a high level of harm or culpability within the context of offence.

Offence Category B: Where answers to questions (a)–(d) indicate a lower level of culpability.

STEP TWO: Starting point and category range

Having determined the offence category, the court should identify the relevant table for the offender on the following pages. There are tables for different sized organisations.

At step two, the court is required to focus on the organisation’s annual turnover or equivalent to reach a starting point for a fine. The court should then consider further adjustment within the category range for aggravating and mitigating features.

At step three, the court may be required to refer to other financial factors listed below to ensure that the proposed fine is proportionate.

Obtaining financial information

The offender is expected to provide comprehensive accounts for the last three years, to enable the court to make an accurate assessment of its financial status. In the absence of such disclosure, or where the court is not satisfied that it has been given sufficient reliable information, the court will be entitled to draw reasonable inferences as to the offender’s means from evidence it has heard and from all the circumstances of the case, which may include the inference that the offender can pay any fine.

...

Very large organisation

Where an offending organisation’s turnover or equivalent very greatly exceeds the threshold for large organisations, it may be necessary to move outside the suggested range to achieve a proportionate sentence.

Large organisation
-------------------------------	--	--

Turnover more than £50 million
Offence category	Starting point	Category range
A	£7,500,000	£4,800,000–£20,000,000
B	£5,000,000	£3,000,000–£12,500,000
Medium organisation Turnover £10 million to £50 million
Offence category	Starting point	Category range
A	£3,000,000	£1,800,000–£7,500,000
B	£2,000,000	£1,200,000–£5,000,000
Small organisation Turnover £2 million to £10 million
Offence category	Starting point	Category range
A	£800,000	£540,000–£2,800,000
B	£540,000	£350,000–£2,000,000

Micro organisation
Turnover up to £2 million
Offence category	Starting point	Category range
A	£450,000	£270,000–£800,000
B	£300,000	£180,000–£540,000”

Having established a starting point, the sentence must take into account a list of aggravating and mitigating circumstances to result in an upward or downward movement from the starting point. Steps three and four of the sentencing process then involve the court taking a “step back”, to review and, if necessary, adjust the initial fine based on turnover to ensure that it fulfils the objectives of sentencing for these offences. The main objective is emphasised as being that: “the fine must be sufficiently substantial to have a real economic impact which will bring home to management and shareholders the need to achieve a safe environment for workers and members of the public affected by their activities”.²¹⁴

This more punitive stance is to be welcomed. It demonstrates that the courts should be taking death caused by corporations seriously, and it is encouraging to see the objective being expressed as one which addresses safety culture rather than solely providing retribution for the bereaved. It appears that this change in the guidelines is translating into sentencing practice, with the first case to be sentenced for corporate manslaughter under the new guidelines resulting in the joint third highest penalty of the 19 fines to have been imposed by the time the micro-company was sentenced.²¹⁵ This was followed by the 20th company convicted for the offence being fined £600,000 despite again being small, and also in liquidation.²¹⁶ This case was reported to be an “indication that the guideline will result in more severe and proportionate penalties”.²¹⁷ The guidelines on health and safety offences are even more complex, given that they must cater for a full range of harms, including risks that materialised in some kind of injury falling short of death, as well as those that did not give rise to any physical harm. As a result, the starting point for a medium sized company ranges from £3,000 to £1,600,000.²¹⁸ The recent case of *R. v Merlin Attractions Operations*²¹⁹ represents how the change in the guidelines may signal a change in approach to sentencing, representing as it does the highest fine imposed under the new guidelines. The company that runs Alton Towers theme park was fined £5 million for failures that resulted in a collision of two trains on a rollercoaster at the park. Sixteen people were injured in the incident, several seriously. Merlin Attractions pleaded guilty to a breach of the Health and Safety at Work Act s.3(1) in that on or before 2 June 2015 the conduct of its undertaking had exposed persons other than its employees at its theme park (i.e. visitors) to risks to their safety. In sentencing, Judge Chambers emphasised that the “offence is concerned primarily with punishing the criminality for the exposure to a material risk; the fact that actual injuries were in fact caused is simply a manifestation of that risk and an aggravating feature”.²²⁰

(ii) Penalties other than fines

3–142

The CMCH Act permits other penalties to be imposed.

CORPORATE MANSLAUGHTER AND CORPORATE HOMICIDE ACT 2007:

3–143

“Remedial orders and publicity orders

9 Power to order breach etc to be remedied

(1) A court before which an organisation is convicted of corporate manslaughter or corporate homicide may make an order (a ‘remedial order’) requiring the organisation to take specified steps to remedy—

(a) the breach mentioned in section 1(1) (‘the relevant breach’);

- (b) any matter that appears to the court to have resulted from the relevant breach and to have been a cause of the death;
- (c) any deficiency, as regards health and safety matters, in the organisation’s policies, systems or practices of which the relevant breach appears to the court to be an indication ...
- (5) An organisation that fails to comply with a remedial order is guilty of an offence, and liable on conviction on indictment to a fine.

10 Power to order conviction etc to be publicised

(1) A court before which an organisation is convicted of corporate manslaughter or corporate homicide may make an order (a ‘publicity order’) requiring the organisation to publicise in a specified manner—

- (a) the fact that it has been convicted of the offence;
- (b) specified particulars of the offence;
- (c) the amount of any fine imposed;
- (d) the terms of any remedial order made.”

3–144

These provisions are to be welcomed although it must be recognised that there is a risk that with the sanction for failing to comply with the order being a monetary penalty, a corporation could deliberately refuse to comply with the order, thus converting the remedial order into a fine.²²¹

Remedial orders are also available for HSWA offences.²²² Such orders are rarely imposed as, by the time an organisation is sentenced for an offence, the offender should have remedied any specific failings involved in the offence and if it has not, will be deprived of significant mitigation.²²³ Indeed, in Lion Steel the judge chose not to apply a remedial order following a guilty plea to corporate manslaughter on the basis that he was satisfied that the company’s working protocols had been sufficiently improved since the fatality occurred.²²⁴

The Sentencing Council states that publicity orders “should ordinarily be imposed in cases of corporate manslaughter”, the object of it being deterrence and punishment.²²⁵ Again, in Lion Steel the judge failed to make full use of the sentencing options available to him, choosing not to make a publicity order, instead commenting that such an order would “achieve nothing which will not be achieved by the reporting of these sentencing remarks”.²²⁶ As of March 2016, only five of the 18 companies convicted of and fined for corporate manslaughter also had publicity orders imposed on them.²²⁷

2. Other corporate offences; other sentencing options

3–145

With other offences committed by organisations the main penalty has again been a fine. However, increasingly, suggestions have been made that other sentencing options should be made available as there is doubt whether fines alone ensure that companies revise their internal operational procedures to guard against repetition of the offence.²²⁸

Because of these concerns and the fear that the public will ultimately have to bear the cost in terms of price rises, Coffee has advocated the imposition of “equity fines” whereby a company would be forced to issue shares to a public body (say, the Victim Compensation Fund) which would then dispose of them on the market.²²⁹ As the company would have no need to raise immediate cash, there would be no need for consumers to bear the cost of price increases and no threat of redundancies.²³⁰ And, as Coffee says:

“Because the equity fine can vastly exceed the cash fine, the stock market will begin to discount the securities of those companies perceived to be vulnerable to future criminal prosecutions ... [C]orporate managers will have an incentive to institute preventive monitoring controls to forestall this decline.”²³¹

Releasing such shares onto the market would increase the risk of a hostile takeover. As managers gain great psychological rewards in the form of power and prestige (as well as money) from their positions of authority in the corporation, the threat of losing these benefits is regarded by managers as a traumatic experience and they will defend their positions with great zeal.²³²

Other alternatives have been mooted and tried in other jurisdictions. For example, a community service order could be made against the company requiring it to engage in various projects. Thus, a company convicted of a pollution offence could be required to clean up rivers or beaches. In imposing such orders a court could order senior management to be involved in the service:

“Executive wrongdoers should not be able to delegate to employees responsibilities that are rightfully theirs ... any more than a convicted defendant should be allowed to hire a substitute to serve his prison sentence.”²³³

3–146

However, care must be taken here to ensure that the company does not profit, in terms of publicity and reputation, from involvement in such worthwhile projects. For example, in order to prevent this, the CMCH Act permits organisations to be ordered to place adverse publicity advertisements in newspapers.

An alternative sentence is corporate probation whereby companies could be forced to change those policies and procedures that allowed the offence to be committed. Courts could demand an internal restructuring of the company²³⁴ or could appoint trustees or directors to examine the procedures of the company or to investigate who was responsible within the company. These measures, which would have to be financed by the company itself, would ensure that companies “rehabilitated themselves” and adopted whatever measures were necessary to prevent a reoccurrence of the wrongdoing.

In England and Wales, the Macrory Report proposed a range of sanctioning regimes that would not involve a court prosecution. Some of these recommendations have been implemented by the Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 and are discussed in the previous section on strict liability. Where a conviction has been obtained in the criminal courts, the following sanctions were recommended:

MACRORY REPORT, REGULATORY JUSTICE: MAKING SANCTIONS EFFECTIVE (FINAL REPORT, 2006):

3-147

“Profit Orders

4.49 ... [I]t would be preferable if the criminal courts had the power to impose a profits order that is separate from any fine imposed. The Profit Order would be a non-judgmental sanction in that it reflected solely the profits made from non-compliance, while the fine imposed would reflect the court’s assessment of the seriousness with which they regard the breach ... Identifying and removing the financial benefit from a regulatory breach is something I believe would strengthen enforcement and send a clearer signal to industry that it is not acceptable to make financial gain from non-compliance ...

Corporate Rehabilitation Orders

4.53 Corporate Rehabilitation Orders ... contain provisions to enable a court to require a company to undertake specific actions or activities during a specified period ... [with the] aim to rehabilitate the offender by ensuring tangible steps are taken that will address a company’s poor practices and prevent future non-compliance. They involve a period of monitoring of the activities, policies and procedures of a business, with a view to organisational reform ...

Community Projects

4.57 The range of requirements that could form the elements of Corporate Rehabilitation Orders should be flexible ... It could, for example, include a requirement for the business to complete an appropriate community improvement project ... Community projects would enable the business community to take responsibility for its actions within a local community and restore the harm it may have caused to the community or individuals ...

4.58 Examples of community projects include funding and delivering an education campaign in a specific subject or funding and delivering a project in the built environment, such as a park or a garden, or making some donations to the local community of time or resource ...”

While the Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 accepted other recommendations by the Macrory Report,²³⁵ it did not implement these particular proposals. Since then, the Crime and Courts Act 2013 has introduced provisions which may have the same effect as such recommendations, but not as sentences per se. Schedule 17 to the Act introduces Deferred

3–148

Prosecution Agreements (DPA) as an alternative to trial and conviction of companies in relation to certain financial crimes. It should be noted that the wrongdoing this is proposed to tackle is quite different to that under discussion here, which has focused on injuries and fatalities caused by health and safety breaches. Instead, the target is economic crime, in the form of theft, fraud, forgery, bribery,²³⁶ money laundering etc.²³⁷ Essentially, the DPA is a type of conditional caution for companies, which permits the prosecution to achieve the objectives of punishment without the cost of a trial. The prosecution commences proceedings against the company for one of the offences listed, after which such proceedings are automatically suspended once the prosecution and defendant company have negotiated the content of the DPA. So long as the terms of the DPA are met, the company will avoid the prosecution resuming. A DPA may impose the following requirements:

- (a) to pay to the prosecutor a financial penalty;
- (b) to compensate victims of the alleged offence;
- (c) to donate money to a charity or other third party;
- (d) to disgorge any profits made by P from the alleged offence;
- (e) to implement a compliance programme or make changes to an existing compliance programme relating to P’s policies or to the training of P’s employees or both;
- (f) to co-operate in any investigation related to the alleged offence;
- (g) to pay any reasonable costs of the prosecutor in relation to the alleged offence or the DPA.²³⁸

The Ministry of Justice, in proposing the creation of DPAs, suggested that they were designed to overcome particular obstacles to successfully prosecuting a company for economic crime. Such obstacles stem from the law of corporate criminal liability, the increasingly sophisticated criminal behaviour in the area of economic crime, the size of commercial organisations and the difficulties of identifying criminal activity and of prosecution at national level for what can often be wrongdoing across a number of jurisdictions.²³⁹ What is not clear is how DPAs circumvent the need for the Crown Prosecution Service to have collected sufficient evidence against a company for the relevant offences in order to be able to bring charges to begin with, before a DPA can be negotiated. Although the initiative has been imported from the US, it is yet to be seen how they will generally operate in practice in this country. The first case in which a DPA was reached under the Crime and Courts Act 2013 involved an innocent parent company self-reporting suspicions of corporate wrongdoing by a subsidiary company. In granting the application for a DPA, Sir Brian Leveson P in the Crown Court at Southwark identified a core purpose of the creation of DPAs as being to incentivise the exposure and self-reporting of corporate wrongdoing.²⁴⁰

3-149

While DPAs are not relevant to corporate wrongdoing involving corporate violence, the point is that there is a range of sentencing options that could be employed to tackle corporate wrongdoing generally. As already stressed, nothing in this chapter should be taken as suggesting that corporate criminal liability should in all cases replace individual liability. In many cases where an individual has “gone out on a limb” it is that individual who should be prosecuted. In many cases, both the company and individuals should be prosecuted.²⁴¹ Indeed, culpable persons should never be allowed to hide behind the corporate facade. Equally, however, in many cases the real fault will lie with the company and not with any individual. In such cases, there should be a real possibility of a prosecution and conviction with appropriate, meaningful punishment being available to reflect the true guilt of the company.

-
- 1 In 2000, it was estimated that more than half the (then) roughly 8,000 crimes in English law were ones involving strict liability (A. Ashworth, "Is the Criminal Law a Lost Cause?" (2000) 116 L.Q.R. 225).
 - 2 Most of these offences are statutory in origin.
 - 3 Woodrow (1846) 153 E.R. 907 (Exch).
 - 4 Alphacell v Woodward [1972] A.C. 824.
 - 5 See, e.g. the offence of causing the death of another person by driving a vehicle while uninsured (Road Traffic Act s.3ZB). The injustice of making this serious offence one of strict liability has been lessened by the Supreme Court in Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. (above para.2-086).
 - 6 B (A Minor) v DPP [2000] 2 A.C. 428 at 460 per Lord Nicholls.
 - 7 J. C. Smith [1968] Crim. L.R. 328 points out that such a term in the letting agreement would not have absolved the defendant from liability if the crime were one of strict liability.
 - 8 R. v K [2002] 1 A.C. 462.
 - 9 This was the approach adopted in the House of Lords' decisions of B (A Minor) v DPP [2000] 2 A.C. 428, R. v K [2002] 1 A.C. 462 and DPP v Collins [2006] UKHL 40.
 - 10 Taylor [2016] UKSC 5.
 - 11 Marsh [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 67.
 - 12 Hughes [2013] UKSC 56. Extracted above at para.2-086.
 - 13 R. v Bezzina (Anthony) (1994) 99 Cr. App. R. 356; R. v Brockley (Frank) (1994) 99 Cr. App. R. 385; R. v Blake (Albert Philip) [1997] 1 All E.R. 963; R. v Paine (Nicholas) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 36; R. v Ezeemo (Godwin Chukwena) [2012] EWCA Crim 2064.
 - 14 It has been stressed in the US that, even with public welfare offences, mens rea is "generally" required (PostersNThings Ltd v United States 511 U.S. 513 (1994)).
 - 15 C. Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility (1993), p.8.
 - 16 Warner [1969] A.C. 256.
 - 17 R. v Land (Michael) [1998] 1 All E.R. 403. See also R. v Lemon (Denis) [1979] A.C. 617.
 - 18 Barnfather v Islington Education Authority [2003] 1 W.L.R. 2318 at [57]. See J. Horder, "Whose Values Should Determine When Liability is Strict?" in A. P. Simester (ed), Appraising Strict Liability (Oxford: OUP, 2005).
 - 19 US Model Penal Code art.6.02(4).
 - 20 R. v Jackson (Robert Valentine) [2007] 1 Cr. App. R. 28.
 - 21 Hussain (1981) 47 Cr. App. R. 143.
 - 22 R. v G [2009] 1 A.C. 92.
 - 23 See also Sherras v De Rutzen [1895] 1 Q.B. 918; Neville v Mavroghenis [1984] Crim. L.R. 42; and R. v Bradish (Liam Christopher) [1990] Crim. L.R. 723.
 - 24 K. Reid, "Strict Liability: Some Principles for Parliament" (2008) Statute L. Rev. 173 at 174; see also R. v Deyemi (Danny) [2007] EWCA Crim 2060 at [21].
 - 25 As happened in the case of Hussain (1981) 47 Cr. App. R. 143 where the defendant

- was only fined £100.
- 26 Products of Animal Origin (Import and Export) Regulations 1996 (SI 1996/3124).
 - 27 R. v Robinson-Pierre (Symieon) [2013] EWCA Crim 2396, see extract above para.2-027.
 - 28 DPP v Harper [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1406.
 - 29 Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 Q.B. 277.
 - 30 R. v Martin (Colin) [1989] 1 All E.R. 652.
 - 31 However, in Hampshire CC v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin) some doubt was expressed about whether duress of circumstances could be pleaded in relation to the strict liability offence of failing to secure the attendance of a child at school under the Education Act 1996 s.444(1).
 - 32 A. P. Simester and P. Roberts, “Strict Liability in UK Regulation” in Macrory, Regulatory Justice: Sanctioning in a Post-Hampton World (2006), Annex E, E17.
 - 33 Woolmington v DPP [1935] A.C. 462.
 - 34 R. v Matthews (Mark Anthony) [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 19.
 - 35 A similar approach was adopted in R. v Johnstone (Robert Alexander) [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 33.
 - 36 Lambert [2001] 2 Cr. App. R. 511.
 - 37 A similar approach was approved in R. v DPP Ex p. Kebeline [2000] 1 Cr. App. R. 275 and applied in Sheldrake v DPP [2005] 1 A.C. 264.
 - 38 I. Dennis, “Reverse Onuses and the Presumption of Innocence: In Search of Principle” [2005] Crim. L.R. 901.
 - 39 R. v City of Sault Ste Marie (1978) 85 D.L.R. (3d) 161.
 - 40 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010), para.1.68. The paper considers whether the test of due diligence should be less strict than is currently formulated (paras 1.78–1.79).
 - 41 See generally, G. R. Sullivan, “Strict Liability for Criminal Offences in England and Wales Following Incorporation into English Law of the European Convention on Human Rights” in A. P. Simester (ed), Appraising Strict Liability (Oxford: OUP, 2005).
 - 42 Barnfather [2003] 1 W.L.R. 2318.
 - 43 R. v G [2009] 1 A.C. 92 at [28]. Lord Hoffmann recommended that Salabiaku v France should in future be “ignored” (at [6]).
 - 44 Barnfather [2003] 1 W.L.R. 2318 at [45].
 - 45 An application by G to the ECtHR was declared inadmissible on similar reasoning to that of the House of Lords: G v United Kingdom (37334/08) (2011). See A. Ashworth, “Human Rights: Presumption of Innocence, art.6(2)” [2012] Crim L.R. 47. For a recent application of G see R. v Brown (Richard) [2013] UKSC 43.
 - 46 International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] 3 W.L.R. 344.
 - 47 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010), para.1.28.
 - 48 G. Lamond, “What is a Crime?” (2007) 27 O.J.L.S. 609, 630.
 - 49 P. Brett, An Inquiry into Criminal Guilt (Sydney: Law Book Co of Australia, 1963),

p.8.

- 50 R. B. Brandt, Ethical Theory (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1959), p.493.
- 51 A. P. Simester, "Is Strict Liability Always Wrong?" in A. P. Simester (ed), Appraising Strict Liability (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.34.
- 52 For a more nuanced argument that strict liability may be legitimate in the grading of offences, see, K. W. Simons, "Is Strict Liability in the Grading of Offences Consistent With Retributive Desert?" (2012) 32 O.J.L.S. 445.
- 53 Simester, "Is Strict Liability Always Wrong?" in A. P. Simester (ed), Appraising Strict Liability (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.21.
- 54 Wings Ltd v Ellis [1984] 3 All E.R. 577 at 587.
- 55 This view is, of course, relevant also to the deterrent argument. Some commentators have argued (e.g. James B. Brady, "Strict Liability Offences: A Justification" (1972) 8 Crim. L. Bulletin 217 at para.3-038 above) that higher penalties might increase the deterrent effect.
- 56 J. Stanton-Ife, "Strict Liability: Stigma and Regret" (2007) 27 O.J.L.S 151.
- 57 Stanton-Ife, "Strict Liability: Stigma and Regret" (2007) 27 O.J.L.S 151, 158.
- 58 B. Wootton, Crime and the Criminal Law, 2nd edn (London: Stevens and Son, 1981), pp.42–44.
- 59 Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Storkwain Ltd (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 359. See above, para.3-017.
- 60 B. S. Jackson, "Storkwein: A Case Study in Strict Liability and Self-Regulation" [1991] Crim. L.R. 892.
- 61 I. Paulus, The Search for Pure Food: A Sociology of Legislation in Britain (Littleton: Fred B. Rothman & Co, 1974); W. F. Carson, "White-Collar Crime and the Enforcement of Factory Legislation" (1970) 10 Brit. J. Criminol. 383.
- 62 R. Macrory, Regulatory Justice: Sanctioning in a Post-Hampton World (2006), para.4.19.
- 63 See generally, K. Hawkins, Law as Last Resort (New York: OUP, 2002).
- 64 N. Padfield, "Clean Water and Muddy Causation: Is Causation a Question of Law or Fact, or Just a Way of Allocating Blame?" [1995] Crim. L.R. 683, 693.
- 65 H. Croall, White Collar Crime (1992), pp.112–125.
- 66 Sentencing Council, Environmental Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014) p.5, available at https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Final_Environmental_Offences_Definitive_Guideline_web1.pdf [Accessed March 2017].
- 67 J. Beattie, "Baroness Scotland refuses to Resign after £5K Fine for Hiring an Illegal Worker" The Mirror 23 September 2009.
- 68 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's: Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), pp.3–16.
- 69 "The Definition of Crime" (1955) 8 C.L.P. 107, 128. See also Lamond, "What is a Crime?" (2007) 27 O.J.L.S. 609, 630.
- 70 Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Act 2006 s.18.
- 71 Above para.3-044.
- 72 Regulatory Justice: Making Sanctions Effective (Final Report, 2006) (Macrory

- Report). See also, Law Commission Consultation Paper No.195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010), paras 3.21–3.51.
- 73 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 Sch.6.
- 74 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.62, Sch.7.
- 75 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 Sch.5 lists 26 designated regulators.
- 76 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.39.
- 77 Ministry of Justice, Guidance on Creating New Regulatory Penalties and Offences (2009), para.11.
- 78 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.42.
- 79 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.46.
- 80 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.50.
- 81 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.54.
- 82 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.52(2).
- 83 Under the Draft Criminal Code cl.20, there is a presumption in favour of mens rea “unless otherwise provided” (Law Commission Paper No.177, A Criminal Code for England and Wales (1989)).
- 84 See A. Ashworth, “Editorial: Trumping Strict Liability” [1987] Crim. L.R. 721, 721–723.
- 85 e.g. see the American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Tent. Draft No.4, 1985, s.2.05 and comment at p.140.
- 86 Above fn.40.
- 87 Ministry of Justice, Guidance on Creating New Regulatory Penalties and Offences (2009), para.3.
- 88 A partnership can be criminally liable as a separate entity from the partners if there are partnership assets available to meet any penalty imposed: R. v W Stevenson & Sons (A Partnership) [2008] EWCA Crim 273.
- 89 R. v P&O European Ferries (Dover) Ltd (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 72 at 73. In Richmond upon Thames LBC v Pinn & Wheeler Ltd The Times 14 February 1989, it was held that a company could not be convicted of an offence of driving a lorry without a permit. The act of driving was a physical act which could only be performed by a natural person. In R. v Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd [1970] 1 All E.R. 577 a company was convicted of causing death by dangerous driving. This was, however, on the basis that the company had counselled and procured the offence. In Kosar v Bank of Scotland Plc t/a Halifax [2011] EWHC 1050 (Admin), it was held that it would be possible for a corporation to commit the offence of harassment. In a private prosecution, a bank was accused of committing the offence of harassment under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 s.2. The District Judge ordered the case to be dropped, on the basis that the offence could only be committed by a person who is an individual. Section 7(5) of the Act states: “references to a person, in the context of the harassment of a person, are references to a person who is an individual”. The appellant argued this applied only to victims not to perpetrators. The High Court agreed, interpreting Parliament’s intention as being that the body corporate could be a perpetrator but not a victim of this offence.
- 90 Department of Energy, The Public Inquiry into the Piper Alpha Disaster (The Cullen Report) (1990) Cmnd.1310, paras 11.4, 11.14, 14.52.
- 91 Investigation into the Kings Cross Underground Fire (1988) (Fennell Report).

- 92 Department of Transport, The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, MV Herald of Free Enterprise, Report of Court No.8074 (Sheen Report), para.14.1. See further, paras 3-093–3-094.
- 93 e.g. the Cullen Report on the Paddington (Ladbroke Grove) train crash accused Railtrack of complacency and “underlying deficiencies in the management of safety” (Ladbroke Grove Rail Enquiry (Cullen Report), 2001). Other “disasters” that have contributed to the growing clamour for corporate accountability have included the Clapham Junction rail disaster in 1988 where faulty signalling caused the death of 35 people, the Purley train crash in 1989 where 5 people were killed and there were strong claims that British Rail management shortcomings had contributed to the crash.
- 94 Healthcare Commission, Investigation into Outbreaks of Clostridium Difficile at Stoke Mandeville Hospital, Buckinghamshire Hospitals NHS Trust (2006); Healthcare Commission, Investigation into Outbreak of Clostridium Difficile at Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells NHS Trust (2007).
- 95 Health and Safety Executive, Health and Safety at Work: summary statistics for Great Britain 2016/16 at <http://www.hse.gov.uk/statistics/overall/hssh1516.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 96 Health and Safety Executive, Blackspot Construction (1988), p.4. See also, Health and Safety Executive, The Role of Managerial Leadership in Determining Workplace Safety Outcomes (2003).
- 97 P. Almond, “Regulating Crisis: Evaluating the Potential Legitimizing Effects of ‘Corporate Manslaughter’ Cases” (2007) 29 Law and Policy 285, 291–293.
- 98 J. C. Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: An Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 389 drawing on the work of R. A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, 2nd edn (Boston: Little, Brown, 1977), p.167.
- 99 Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: An Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 390.
- 100 L. Dunford and A. Ridley, “No Soul to be Damned, No Body to be Kicked: Responsibility, Blame and Corporate Punishment” (1996) 24 Int. J. Soc. L. 1, 7.
- 101 C. M. V. Clarkson, “Corporate Manslaughter: Need for a Special Offence?” in C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Deaths (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008), p.88.
- 102 R. v British Steel Plc [1995] I.C.R. 586.
- 103 Tesco Supermarkets Plc v Brent LBC [1993] 2 All E.R. 718.
- 104 Seaboard Offshore Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1994] 2 All E.R. 99.
- 105 Merchant Shipping Act 1988 s.31: failing to take reasonable steps to ensure that a vessel is operated in a safe manner.
- 106 See, e.g. R. v Gateway Foodmarkets Ltd [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 40.
- 107 G. R. Sullivan, “The Attribution of Culpability to Limited Companies” [1996] C.L.J. 515, 541.
- 108 Sullivan, “The Attribution of Culpability to Limited Companies” [1996] C.L.J. 515, 544.
- 109 A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 5th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2013), p.282.

- 110 Odyssey v OIC Run-Off Ltd The Times 17 March 2000.
- 111 In the Scottish case of Transco plc v HM Advocate (2004 S.L.T. 41) the English civil case of El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings ([1994] 2 All E.R. 685) was discussed. In this latter case it was held that the directing mind and will of the company need not be the person with general management of the company; the directing mind of a company can be found in different persons for different activities. In Transco, Lord Hamilton described both El Anjou and Meridian as being of “no assistance” in a case dealing with corporate homicide (the Scottish equivalent of corporate manslaughter).
- 112 R. v St Regis Paper Co Ltd [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 14.
- 113 Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations 2000 (SI 2000/1973).
- 114 This is in agreement with the Law Commission, which proposes that in the absence of specific legislative provisions setting out the basis upon which companies are to be found liable, the courts should treat the question of how corporate fault may be established as a matter of statutory interpretation. The Law Commission, however, would “encourage the courts not to presume that the identification doctrine applies when interpreting the scope of criminal offences applicable to companies”: Law Commission Consultation Paper 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010), Proposal 13. Pinto and Evans argue that Moses LJ in St Regis Paper Co misinterpreted the statute, and that the particular provision of reg.32(1), rather than pointing away from liability for the company, invited the opposite conclusion. They suggest that for the purpose of the regulation it is the person who produced the daily environmental reports whose acts should be attributable to the company, and that would have been the technical manager. Despite the court acknowledging that the purpose of the statute was to protect the environment, the effect of the decision, they argue, is that a company can immunise itself against the risk of liability under the regulation by assigning the duty of keeping the record to a sufficiently lowly employee, which will not discourage environmental pollution: A. Pinto QC and M. Evans, Corporate Criminal Liability, 3rd edn, (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2013), pp.60–61.
- 115 R. v HM Coroner for East Kent Ex p. Spooner (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 10.
- 116 This rejection was confirmed in Att-Gen’s Reference (No.2 of 1999) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 207.
- 117 Below paras 3-093–3-094.
- 118 For a statutory model based on this proposal, see B. Fisse, “The Attribution of Criminal Liability to Corporations: A Statutory Model” (1991) 13 Sydney L. Rev. 277.
- 119 C. M. V. Clarkson, “Corporate Culpability” [1998] 2 Web J.C.L.I.
- 120 G. R. Sullivan, “The Attribution of Culpability to Limited Companies” [1996] C.L.J. 515, 526.
- 121 See generally, Macrory Consultation Document, Regulatory Justice: Sanctioning in a post-Hampton World (2006), Annex F.
- 122 At paras 3-050–3-051.
- 123 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.46.
- 124 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 s.50.
- 125 J. C. Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: an Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386.
- 126 M. Dan-Cohen, Rights, Persons, and Organisations: A Legal Theory for

- Bureaucratic Society* (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986), p.49. For an argument that a company can be a culpability-bearing agent, see C. M. V. Clarkson, “Kicking Corporate Bodies and Damning Their Souls” (1996) 59 M.L.R. 557. See also, C. Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2001).
- 127 T. Woolf, “The Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth)—Towards a Realist Vision of Corporate Criminal Liability” (1997) 21 Crim. L.J. 257.
- 128 Criminal Code Act 1995. The Criminal Code applies in the states of the Australian Capital Territory, the Northern Territory, Queensland, Tasmania and Western Australia. See S. Quo, “Corporate Culture and Corporate Criminal Responsibility in Australia” (2016) 37(12) Comp. Law. 389–393.
- 129 To date there have been no prosecutions based on the Criminal Code Pt 2.5. See S. Quo, “Corporate Culture and Corporate Criminal Responsibility in Australia” (2016) 37(12) Comp. Law. 389–393.
- 130 Crimes (Industrial Manslaughter) Amendment Act 2003, amending the Crimes Act 1900 (ACT).
- 131 ACT s.51(2)(c) and (d).
- 132 ACT s.51(6).
- 133 Cited in J. Clough and C. Mulhern, The Prosecution of Companies (Melbourne: OUP, 2002).
- 134 Bribery Act 2010 s.7. See C. Wells, “Bribery: Corporate Liability under the Draft Bill 2009” [2009] Crim. L.R. 479 and C Wells, “Corporate Criminal Liability: A Ten Year Review” [2014] Crim L.R. 849, 862–876.
- 135 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010), Proposal 13.
- 136 For details of these convictions, see C. M. V. Clarkson, “Corporate Manslaughter: Yet More Government Proposals” [2005] Crim. L.R. 677 fn.9.
- 137 C. Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2001), p.11.
- 138 P. Almond, “Public Perceptions of Work-Related Fatality Cases: Reaching the Outer Limits of ‘Popular Punitiveness’?” (2008) Brit. J. Criminol. 448.
- 139 Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 s.2(1).
- 140 Health and Safety Executive, Work-Related Deaths: A Protocol for Liaison (1998).
- 141 D. Bergman, Deaths at Work: Accidents or Corporate Crime (Workers Educational Association, London Hazards Centre, Inquest (London), 1991), p.17.
- 142 S. Tombs and D. Whyte, “A Crisis of Enforcement: The Decriminalization of Death and Injury at Work” (2008) 5 Centre for Crime and Justice Studies 5.
- 143 In 2014/15, 12,430 enforcement notices were issued while only 728 prosecutions were brought by the HSE: Health and Safety Executive, Annual Report and Accounts 2015/16 at <http://www.hse.gov.uk/aboutus/reports/ara-2015-16.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 144 P. Almond, “An Inspector’s Eye View: The Prospective Enforcement of Work-Related Fatality Cases” (2006) 46 Brit. J. Criminol. 893, 896.
- 145 Tombs and Whyte, “A Crisis of Enforcement: The Decriminalization of Death and Injury at Work” (2008) 5 Centre for Crime and Justice Studies 5–6.

- 146 Tombs and Whyte, “A Crisis of Enforcement: The Decriminalization of Death and Injury at Work” (2008) 5 Centre for Crime and Justice Studies 5–6.
- 147 Freedom of Information Request to HSE, 2009. In 2004/05, 80% of prosecutions were brought in the magistrates’ court (Sentencing Advisory Panel, Advice to the Sentencing Guidelines Council: Sentencing for Corporate Manslaughter and Health and Safety Offences Involving Death (2009)).
- 148 B. Hutter and S. Lloyd-Bostock, “The Power of Accidents” (1990) 30 Brit. J. Criminol. 409: “an inspector working on a prosecution or on a public inquiry is not out making visits to other premises” (p.421).
- 149 Until 1992 the maximum fine there was £2,000; this has since been increased to £20,000 for breaches of the general duties in the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 ss.2–6.
- 150 DPP v P&O European Ferries (Dover) Ltd (1991) 93 Cr. App. R. 73.
- 151 Unreported. Transcript: R. v Alcindor 1990 (Central Criminal Court, 19 October 1990). See D. Bergman, “Recklessness in the Boardroom” (1990) 140 N.L.J. 1496.
- 152 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.2 of 1999) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 207.
- 153 Kite, The Independent 9 December 1994.
- 154 Cited in Smith and Smith, “The Company Behind Bars”, Health and Safety at Work, February 1995, p.10.
- 155 Law Commission Paper No.237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996).
- 156 For an excellent, concise summary of the first six years of the corporate manslaughter offence see C. Wells, “Corporate Criminal Liability: a Ten Year Review” [2014] Crim. L.R. 849, 849–862.
- 157 The offence is termed corporate homicide in Scotland.
- 158 Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.22. Amendments have been made several times, in order to reflect restructuring of government departments, the most recent being in November 2016.
- 159 D. Ormerod and R. D. Taylor, “The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007” [2008] Crim. L.R. 589, 597.
- 160 R. v Adomako (John Asare) [1995] 1 A.C. 171.
- 161 R. v Wacker (Perry) [2003] 1 Cr. App. R. 22.
- 162 This point was endorsed in R. v Willoughby (Keith Calverley) [2004] EWCA Crim 3365.
- 163 Ministry of Justice, Understanding the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 (2007), p.9.
- 164 Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.3(1).
- 165 Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.4.
- 166 Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.5(1)(2).
- 167 Detail of these provisions is beyond the scope of this book. See Ormerod and Taylor, “The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007” [2008] Crim. L.R. 589, 605–9.
- 168 e.g. Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.5(3).
- 169 House of Commons Defence Committee, Beyond Endurance? Military exercises and the duty of care, Third Report of Session 2015–16, HC 598, at [150] at <http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201516/cmselect/cmdfence/598/598.pdf> (Accessed March 2017).

- 170 Above, fn.155 at 4.
- 171 Home Office, Corporate Manslaughter: The Government’s Draft Bill for Reform (2005), para.28.
- 172 G. R. Sullivan, “The Attribution of Culpability to Limited Companies” (1996) 55 C.L.J. 515; P. R. Glazebrook, “A Better Way of Convicting Businesses of Avoidable Deaths and Injuries” (2002) 61 L.Q.R. 405.
- 173 A point made explicitly in Home Office, Corporate Manslaughter: The Government’s Draft Bill for Reform (2005), para.27.
- 174 Home Office, Corporate Manslaughter: The Government’s Draft Bill for Reform (2005), para.26.
- 175 Of the first 5 companies to be successfully prosecuted under the Act, the largest is Lion Steel Equipment Ltd which had 142 employees: R. v Lion Steel Equipment Ltd unreported July 2012; see <http://www.judiciary.gov.uk/judgments/r-v-steel-equip-ltd-sentencing-remarks/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 176 Above fn.155.
- 177 R. v Adomako (John Asare) [1995] 1 A.C. 171. See below, paras 8-068–8-070.
- 178 Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.8(3)(b).
- 179 Ormerod and Taylor, “The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007” [2008] Crim. L.R. 589, 603.
- 180 A. Dobson, “Shifting Sands: Multiple Counts in Prosecutions for Corporate Manslaughter” [2012] Crim. L.R. 200.
- 181 Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 s.40.
- 182 Dobson notes that in R. v Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings Ltd [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 26 Field J held that the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 s.40 did not apply when analysing the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.8. Dobson, “Shifting Sands: Multiple Counts in Prosecutions for Corporate Manslaughter” [2012] Crim. L.R. 200, 207.
- 183 House of Commons, Home Affairs and Work and Pensions Committees, Draft Corporate Manslaughter Bill, First Joint Report of Session 2005–06 (2005).
- 184 Above, paras 3-085–3-086.
- 185 J. Clough and C. Mulhern, The Prosecution of Corporations (Melbourne: OUP, 2002), pp.140–147.
- 186 Law Commission Paper No.237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996), para.8.39.
- 187 Environmental Agency v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 22. See para.2-094.
- 188 R. v Kennedy (Simon) [2008] 1 A.C. 269. See para.2-108.
- 189 See generally, P. Almond, “An Inspector’s Eye View: The Prospective Enforcement of Work-Related Fatality Cases” (2006) 46 Brit. J. Criminol. 893, 896.
- 190 The 2010 guidelines have now been superseded by the Health and Safety Offences, Corporate Manslaughter and Food Safety and Hygiene Offences Definitive Guideline (2015), effective from February 2016, which contains less discussion and explication than the 2010 version. There is nothing to suggest that these points apply any less now than they did when the previous guidelines were published and, indeed, the fact that offences under the HSW Act s.33 are endangerment offences penalising the creation of a risk of harm is emphasised on p.5 of the new guidelines.

- 191 For full statistics, see C. M. V. Clarkson, “Corporate Manslaughter: Yet More Government Proposals” [2005] Crim. L.R. 677, 687.
- 192 J. Clough and C. Mulhern, The Prosecution of Companies (2002), p.9.
- 193 R. v Lion Steel Equipment Ltd unreported July 2012; see <http://www.judiciary.gov.uk/judgments/r-v-steel-equip-ltd-sentencing-remarks/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 194 M. Woodley, “Bargaining over Corporate Manslaughter—What Price a Life?” (2013) 77(1) J. of Crim. Law 33–40.
- 195 S. Antrobus, “The Criminal Liability of Directors for Health and Safety Breaches and Manslaughter” [2013] Crim. L.R. 309, 322.
- 196 See Ch.8 below for further discussion.
- 197 House of Commons, Home Affairs and Work and Pensions Committee, Draft Corporate Manslaughter Bill: First Report of Session 2005–06, Vol.I: Report, para.77.
- 198 House of Commons, Home Affairs and Work and Pensions Committee, Draft Corporate Manslaughter Bill: First Report of Session 2005–06, Vol.I: Report, para.80.
- 199 House of Commons, Home Affairs and Work and Pensions Committee, Draft Corporate Manslaughter Bill: First Report of Session 2005–06, Vol.I: Report, para.81.
- 200 See paras 7-044–7-055.
- 201 House of Commons, Home Affairs and Work and Pensions Committees, Draft Corporate Manslaughter Bill: First Report of Session 2005–06, Vol.I: Report, para.81.
- 202 Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 s.143, inserting s.1A into the Road Traffic Act 1988.
- 203 See generally, J. Gobert, “Controlling Corporate Criminality: Penal Sanctions and Beyond” [1998] Web J.C.L.I; M. Jefferson, “Corporate Criminal Liability: The Problem of Sanctions” (2001) 65 J. Crim. L. 235.
- 204 Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: an Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 407.
- 205 R. v F Howe & Son (Engineers) Ltd [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 37.
- 206 The fine on Balfour Beatty was reduced on appeal to £7.5 million (R. v Balfour Beatty Rail Infrastructure Services Ltd [2006] EWCA Crim 1586).
- 207 S. Trotter, “Corporate Manslaughter” (2000) N.L.J. 454.
- 208 Sentencing Council, Health and Safety Offences, Corporate Manslaughter and Food Safety and Hygiene Offences, Definitive Guideline (2015) at <https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/HS-offences-definitive-guideline-FINAL-web.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 209 Sentencing Guidelines Council, Corporate Manslaughter and Health and Safety Offences Causing Death: Definitive Guideline (2010), para.24.

- 210 R. v Lion Steel Equipment Ltd unreported July 2012; see <http://www.judiciary.gov.uk/judgments/r-v-steel-equip-ltd-sentencing-remarks/.pdf> [Accessed March 2017]. The amount of £480,000 did, however, take into account a reduction of 20% due to the guilty plea.
- 211 R. v Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings Ltd [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 26.
- 212 H. Fidderman, “Corporate Manslaughter Update” (2016) 446 H.S.B. 19.
- 213 Baldwins Crane Hire is reported to have had a turnover in excess of £22 million during the year to 31 March 2015: H. Fidderman, “Corporate Manslaughter Update” (2016) 446 H.S.B. 19.
- 214 Sentencing Council, Health and Safety Offences, Corporate Manslaughter and Food Safety and Hygiene Offences, Definitive Guideline (2015), p.25.
- 215 H. Fidderman, “The first application of the new guideline on manslaughter fines” (2016) 451 H.S.B. 5.
- 216 H. Fidderman, “Skip firm feels effect of new manslaughter fines guideline” (2016) 452 H.S.B. 2.
- 217 H. Fidderman, “Skip firm feels effect of new manslaughter fines guideline” (2016) 452 H.S.B. 2.
- 218 Sentencing Council, Health and Safety Offences, Corporate Manslaughter and Food Safety and Hygiene Offences, Definitive Guideline (2015), p.7.
- 219 R. v Merlin Attractions Operations [2012] EWCA Crim 2670; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36. See H. Fidderman “Merlin Failed to Manage Ride’s Human-technology Interface” (2016) 454 H.S.B. 10.
- 220 Fidderman, fn.219 above.
- 221 Gobert, “Controlling Corporate Criminality: Penal Sanctions and Beyond” [1998] Web J.C.L.I.
- 222 Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 s.42.
- 223 Sentencing Council, above fn.208, p.12.
- 224 Above fn.210.
- 225 Above fn.208, p.27.
- 226 R. v Lion Steel Equipment Ltd unreported July 2012 at [48].
- 227 Fidderman, above fn.215.
- 228 Fisse, “The Attribution of Criminal Liability to Corporations: A Statutory Model” (1991) 13 Sydney L. Rev. 277 makes the point that fines are inappropriate in the context of offences committed by quasi-governmental authorities as they would simply result in “some budgetary shuffling with money deducted from one arm of government passing back into general revenue” (p.9).
- 229 Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: an Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 413–424.
- 230 J. Gobert, “Controlling Corporate Criminality: Penal Sanctions and Beyond” [1998] 2 Web J.C.L.I.
- 231 Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: an Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 420.
- 232 Coffee, “‘No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick’: an Unscandalised Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment” (1981) 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 412.

- 233 Gobert, “Controlling Corporate Criminality: Penal Sanctions and Beyond” [1998] 2 Web J.C.L.I.
- 234 B. Fisse, “Reconstructing Corporate Criminal Law: Deterrence, Retribution, Fault and Sanctions” (1983) 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1141, 1222. Probation is clearly more sensible in the context of offences committed by quasi-governmental bodies.
- 235 See paras 3-050–3-051 above.
- 236 For a brief discussion of DPAs in the context of bribery, see Wells, “Corporate Criminal Liability: a Ten Year Review” [2014] Crim. L.R. 849, 874–875.
- 237 Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 Sch.17 Pt 2 sets out the offences to which DPAs can be applied. Some of these offences are also the subject of a sentencing guideline applying to corporate offenders: Sentencing Council, Fraud, bribery and money laundering: corporate offenders: Definitive Guideline (2014) at <http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/publications/item/fraud-bribery-and-money-laundering-offences-definitive-guideline/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 238 Crime and Courts Act 2013 Sch.17 para.5.
- 239 MoJ CP 9/2012 Consultation on a new enforcement tool to deal with economic crime committed by commercial organisations: Deferred Prosecution Agreements (May 2012).
- 240 Serious Fraud Office v XYZ Ltd [2016] Lloyd’s Rep. F.C. 509. See N. Padfield, “Editorial: Deferred Prosecution Agreements” [2016] Crim. L.R. 449–450.
- 241 The most recent sentencing guidelines for health and safety offences provide guidance on sentencing individuals separately to sentencing companies: Sentencing Council: Health and Safety Offences, Corporate Manslaughter and Food Safety and Hygiene Offences, Definitive Guideline (2015).

Chapter 4

General Defences

I. Justification and Excuse

A. INTRODUCTION

4-001

A defendant may commit the actus reus of an offence with the requisite mens rea and yet escape liability because he has a “general defence”.¹ For example, he may have intentionally killed his victim, but have been acting in self-defence because the victim had been trying to kill him. In such a case, assuming the requirements of self-defence are met, he escapes all liability.

It was seen in Ch.2 that there are different ways of analysing criminal liability. It could be, continuing the above example, that the defendant is regarded as having committed the actus reus with an appropriate mens rea but is afforded a defence which is a separate third element. This mode of analysis could be useful in describing the shifting burdens of proof in a criminal trial in those jurisdictions² where it is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the actus reus with appropriate mens rea, but the burden then shifts to the defendant to establish on a balance of probabilities that he has a defence. This “procedural analysis” is employed in England and Wales with the defences of insanity³ and diminished responsibility.⁴ Such an approach is, however, not accurate in describing the burden of proof in other cases in England and Wales where, in relation to common law defences, the burden remains on the prosecution throughout.⁵ Nor is this “procedural analysis” helpful in understanding the true bases of criminal liability: who, why and when persons should be adjudged blameworthy and held criminally responsible for their actions.

Accordingly, a “substantive interpretation” tends to focus on the requirement of blameworthiness. Criminal liability is imposed on a blameworthy actor who causes a prohibited harm or prohibited act or omission. If a defendant has a “general defence” she is not blameworthy and, therefore, deserves to escape criminal liability. Accordingly, as Horder states, the way in which defences are defined and restricted “represents criminal law’s contribution to society’s commitment to the common good of upholding respect for the individual and general interests of persons” just as much as the definition and scope of offences.⁶

The term “general defences” is used to convey that such defences are available to all crimes. There are some defences that are not “general” but specific to particular offences: for example, loss of control (formerly provocation) and diminished responsibility are defences only to murder, reducing liability to manslaughter. Such specific defences are dealt with later in relation to their particular offences. Further, it must be stressed that the title “general defences” is adopted purely for expository convenience. It is patently untrue that all these defences are available to all offences. For example, duress is not available for murder. Another problematic area is the extent to which the “general defences” are available to offences of strict liability.

4-002

These general defences used to be listed as isolated sets of identifiable conditions or circumstances which prevented a defendant being convicted. However, over the last 35–40 years a number of attempts have been made to bring defences within an overall theoretical framework. The chief advantage of this is that it enables more rational analysis of the ways in which the law has developed or been restricted.⁷ Defences have been broadly classified into two groups: those that provide a justification for the defendant’s conduct, and those that excuse her conduct.⁸ However, commentators have reworked the category of excusatory defences and increasingly exclude from it those which amount to denials of responsibility. This latter group may be called exemptions. Most recently, as we will see, Duff has suggested a reworking of defences to introduce a fourth category.⁹

It must be stressed, however, that the classification of defences into groups is not watertight. This is true in a number of respects. First, at least some members of the judiciary appear to have less regard for the classifications than many academic commentators.¹⁰ Secondly, the categories themselves are still being refined. As we shall see, it has become commonplace to distinguish between the categories on the basis that excuses focus upon the actor and justifications upon actions. But it can be argued that in reality the focus has to be upon both actors and actions for both justifications and excuses. Thus, the distinction between the categories is often blurred.¹¹ Finally, it may be difficult to locate a particular defence within just one category:

“In English law this is compounded by the law’s cautious insistence on having a belt as well as braces: in general no excuse is accepted into the criminal law which is not also a partial justification, and no justification is accepted which is not also a partial excuse.”¹²

PAUL ROBINSON, “CRIMINAL LAW DEFENSES: A SYSTEMATIC ANALYSIS” (1982) 82 COL. L. R. 199, 213, 221, 229:

4-003

“[J]ustification defences are not alterations of the statutory definition of the harm sought to be prevented or punished by an offense. The harm caused by the justified behaviour remains a legally recognised harm which is to be avoided whenever possible. Under the special justifying circumstances, however, that harm is outweighed by the need to avoid an even greater harm or to further a great societal interest ...

Excuses admit that the deed may be wrong, but excuse the actor ...

Justifications and excuses may seem similar in that both are general defenses which exculpate an actor because of his blamelessness ... The conceptual distinction remains an important one, however. Justified conduct is correct behaviour which is encouraged or at least tolerated. In determining whether conduct is justified, the focus is on the act, not the actor. An excuse represents a legal conclusion that the conduct is wrong, undesirable, but that criminal liability is inappropriate because some characteristic of the actor vitiates society's desire to punish him. Excuses do not destroy blame ... rather, they shift it from the actor to the excusing condition. The focus in excuses is on the actor. Acts are justified; actors are excused."

4-004

Robinson's analysis has been very influential, but, as we shall see, both his description of justifications and excuses has come under fire. At times, it is far from clear-cut whether a particular defence is justificatory or excusatory in nature.

B. JUSTIFICATIONS

JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING
CRIMINAL LAW (1987), PP.180-183:

4-005

"[V]arious theories of justification are espoused ...

Moral Forfeiture

Some moral interests ... may be forfeited as a result of morally wrong conduct. As a result of a person's improper conduct society may determine unilaterally that it will no longer recognize her interest in her life or property.

The moral-forfeiture doctrine is frequently used to explain why taking human life in self-defence or in preventing the escape of a fleeing felon is justified. Pursuant to this principle, V, an aggressor or a felon, forfeits her legal interest in the protection of her life as a result of her morally wrong conduct ... When D kills V in self-defence or in order to prevent her flight from a felony, no socially recognized harm has occurred. From the perspective of the homicide laws, the taking of V's life is viewed as no different than the killing of a fly or damage to an inanimate object.

The forfeiture principle ... is morally troubling because it involves the non-consensual loss of a valued right. When the principle is applied to the interest in human life it runs counter to the 'good and simple moral principle that human life is sacred'. A theory that treats human life as the equivalent of an inanimate object is troubling to those who believe in the sanctity of human life.

Securing Legal and Moral Rights

... The defendant's conduct is justified when it is determined that she had an affirmative right to protect a socially recognized interest that was threatened by the victim.

For example, when D kills or seriously injures V, a lethal aggressor, her conduct may be justified because she was enforcing a natural right of personal autonomy that V's conduct threatened. As this theory views the situation, D is a citizen protecting her interest against the outlaw, V, who seeks to take away her rights. This principle of justification does not treat V's death as socially irrelevant (as does the forfeiture doctrine); rather, it views D's conduct as affirmatively proper.

This concept is not without its critics ... Once it is determined that V has intruded on a right belonging to D—e.g. the right to personal autonomy or the right to possess personal property—the theory suggests that D may use whatever force is necessary to enforce her rights, no matter how minor the intrusion on them. After all, she is in the right, and V is in the wrong, and Right should never give way to Wrong. In its unadulterated form, therefore, this justification theory may permit a disproportional response to the harm threatened.

Superior Interest

... Conduct may be justified by a straightforward balancing of competing interests. In this view, the victim's interests are not forfeited by her prior conduct nor does the defendant possess an unlimited right to act in enforcement of a particular interest. Pursuant to this principle the interests of D and V—and, more broadly, the interests of society in the values that they seek to enforce—are balanced. In each case there is a superior, or at least a noninferior, interest. As long as such an interest is pursued, it is justified.”

Some commentators have been of the view that “a defence is justificatory whenever it denies the objective wrongness of the act” and that “a justification is a defence, affirming that the act, state of affairs or consequences are on balance, to be socially approved, or are matters about which society is neutral”.¹³

However, other commentators decline to go this far.

JOHN GARDNER, “JUSTIFICATIONS AND REASONS” IN A. P. SIMESTER
AND A. T. H. SMITH (EDS), HARM AND CULPABILITY (1996), PP.107–108:

4–007

“In classifying some action as criminal, the law asserts that there are prima facie reasons against its performance—indeed reasons sufficient to make its performance prima facie wrongful. In providing a justificatory defence the law nevertheless concedes that one may sometimes have sufficient reason to perform the unlawful act, all things considered ...

The reasons against the action, which are the reasons for its criminalisation, may all have been defeated in the final analysis. It may have been alright for the defendant to act against them, all things considered. But it does not mean that they dropped out of the picture. That a reason is defeated does not mean that it is undermined or cancelled. It still continues to exert its rational appeal. It may indeed be a matter of bitter regret or disappointment that, thanks to the reasons which justified one’s action, one nevertheless acted against the prima facie reasons for avoiding that action. It may even be a matter of regret or disappointment to the criminal law. The law certainly need not welcome it. But by granting a defence the law concedes that any regret or disappointment must be tolerated ... By granting a justificatory defence the law concedes that this is true by virtue of the fact that the defendant had, at the time of her prima facie wrongful action, sufficient reason to perform it.”

4–008

According to this view it is not enough that the action may be justified on a utilitarian, balancing of interests, basis (as favoured, for example, by Robinson). It is necessary to explore the reasons the defendant had for acting. In order to have a justificatory defence, the defendant’s (explanatory) reasons for acting must correspond to the (guiding) reasons that exist for such actions.¹⁴ In other words, her actual reasons for acting must be one of the accepted reasons for acting. As Tadros explains: justifications “operate where the defendant has acted for good reason”.¹⁵

Bringing the reasons for acting into the concept of a justification creates a dilemma for theorists. How should we respond to the person who acts for what she believes to be a good reason when in fact that reason does not exist? Duff gives the example of the person who deliberately breaks a window of a house in order to obtain entry so that she can provide assistance to a person she believes (wrongly) to be unconscious (the person in fact being simply asleep). Gardner would, at most, treat this as an excuse, if the mistake had been a reasonable one to make. Tadros would regard this still as a justification.¹⁶ Duff has suggested that this should be described as “warranted” and in so doing proposes a fourth category of defences:

“[By] calling her action warranted we can do justice both to the way in which it unlike straightforwardly ‘justified’ actions (because it is not right) and to the ways in which it is unlike excused actions (because it is warranted).”¹⁷

Whether one confines one’s analysis to a balancing of interests or looks for underlying guiding reasons for permitting action, the following defences can be classified as justificatory in nature.

(i) Self-defence

4–009

Under any of the above theories self-defence provides a justification. The interests of the person attacked are greater than those of the attacker. The aggressor’s culpability in starting the fight tips the scales in favour of the defendant.¹⁸ Further “a rule allowing defensive action tends to inhibit aggression, or at least to restrain its continuance, as a rule forbidding defensive action would tend to promote it”.¹⁹

(ii) Necessity (where the harm threatened is greater than the harm caused)

4-010

Where a lesser evil is committed in order to prevent a greater evil (for example, criminal damage is caused to save the lives of 20 people), the interests of the latter outweigh the interests of the owner of the property. In the US, necessity is widely regarded as a paradigmatic example of justification.²⁰ This defence has only recently been admitted by English law, initially under the nomenclature of “duress of circumstances” and its parameters are as yet uncertain. As will be argued later, it is because of this classification of necessity as a justification that English judges, historically, showed reluctance to admit the defence at all. Perhaps if necessity had been viewed as an excuse only, there might have been a greater willingness to accept the defence into English law as it would have been seen as posing less threat to the established prohibitions of the criminal law. The closely related defence of duress is widely regarded as an excuse and in the leading case of Howe,²¹ the House of Lords seemed to think that the same principles applied to both. The recent “duress of circumstances” cases have a distinct excusatory flavour to them. Perhaps, then, if a fully-blown defence of necessity were to be admitted into English law it would be in an excusatory format. However, where the threatened harm is greater than the harm inflicted, the defence bears all the hallmarks, in principle, of a justification.

(iii) Public authority

4-011

The use of force by the police, for example, in effecting an arrest is justified, the superior interest being the enforcement of the law. The same applies to acts “to prevent or terminate crime” or “to prevent or terminate a breach of the peace”.²²

(iv) Discipline/chastisement

4-012

Parents are, controversially, regarded as justified in using force not amounting to actual bodily harm against their children, the superior interest being to “promote the welfare of the minor” and to prevent or punish misconduct.²³

(v) Consent

4–013

Force against a person who has consented is justified, the superior interest being the value of human autonomy. Individuals are free and responsible agents and respect must be given to their right to consent to the infliction of force against them. However, in certain cases the interests of society prevail over any value attached to human autonomy and thus consent may not be given to certain types of force (mainly serious force such as death or grievous bodily harm, or disapproved-of-force such as sado-masochistic beatings inflicting injury).

C. EXCUSES

4–014

Duff suggests that, “to offer an excuse is to admit that I got it wrong: I acted as I should not have acted”.²⁴ A defence is thus excusatory when a wrongful, unjustified act has been committed but, because of the excusing circumstances, the wrongdoer is not morally to blame for committing that act.

SANFORD H. KADISH, “EXCUSING CRIME” (1987) 75 CAL. L. REV. 257, 264:

4–015

“To blame a person is to express a moral criticism, and if the person’s action does not deserve criticism, blaming him is a kind of falsehood and is, to the extent the person is injured by being blamed, unjust to him. It is this feature of our everyday moral practices that lies behind the law’s excuses. Excuses, then, ... represent no sentimental compromise with the demands of a moral code; they are, on the contrary, of the essence of a moral code.”

According to this view, an excuse destroys blame. However, the theoretical basis upon which this is done is far from agreed:

“Two theories of excuses are currently popular in criminal law theory: the character theory and the capacity theory. In the former, the claim that the defendant makes is ‘although I did it, I wasn’t really myself’. In the latter, the claim is ‘I did it but I couldn’t have done otherwise. I had no real choice.’”²⁵

4-016

While the capacity-based approach, which centred on notions of voluntariness,²⁶ was very influential during the latter part of the 20th century, it has become subject to criticism.²⁷ More recently, debate has been divided as to whether a character-based analysis or a modified capacity-based analysis²⁸ offers the best way of understanding the role excuses play in the criminal law. Gardner, for example, prefers the character theory.

JOHN GARDNER, “THE GIST OF EXCUSES” (1998) 1 BUFFALO
CRIMINAL LAW REVIEW 575, 575– 579:

4-017

“It is often said that the criminal law judges actions, not character. That is true, but misleading. It is true that, barring certain exceptional and troubling examples, crimes are actions ... Nevertheless, the criminality of an action frequently falls to be determined, in part, according to standards of character—according to standards of courage, carefulness, honesty ... Nobody can be a thief in English law, for instance, unless she acts dishonestly. There is, to be sure, a difference between asking whether the accused acted dishonestly, and asking whether she is dishonest. She is dishonest if and only if she tends to act dishonestly. In other words, judging a person dishonest has a diachronic aspect which judging an action dishonest lacks. But apart from this diachronic aspect, the standard by which we judge a person dishonest is exactly the same standard as that by which we judge an action dishonest. It is a standard of character, a standard which bears not only on what is done, but also on the spirit in which and reason for which it is done ...

[S]ometimes, standards of character figure in the criminal law because they are built into the definition of particular criminal offenses ... They also figure separately, however, in many of the criminal law's excusatory doctrines ... On one familiar view, sometimes called the 'Humean' view, we should grant an excuse to somebody in respect of what he did if and only if what he did was no manifestation of his character. This view proceeds from the sound thought that excuses matter because a person's excused actions do not reflect badly on him—do not show him, personally, in a bad light. That being so, the thinking goes, an excuse must be something that blocks the path from an adverse judgment about an action to a correspondingly adverse judgment about the person whose action it is. The action is cowardly, say, but since this person does not otherwise tend towards cowardly actions, she herself is no coward. Her cowardly action is 'out of character'. And that, according to the Humean view, is the gist of excuses. But there is a good deal of confusion in this line of thought. For there is no such thing as a cowardly action which does not show its agent in a cowardly light. It is true that ... one cowardly action does not make a coward. But ... in my cowardly action, by definition, I manifest at least the beginnings of a cowardly tendency ... Cowards are no more and no less than people who tend to perform cowardly actions. Their cowardly actions add up to constitute, not to evidence, their cowardice. Thus even if this cowardly action is my first, and is quite unprecedented, it necessarily counts constitutively and not merely evidentially against me whenever, thereafter, the question arises of whether I am a coward. And that is exactly what it means to say that my cowardly actions show me in a cowardly light. It follows that the Humean view unravels. If my excused actions do not show me in a cowardly light, they cannot, after all, be cowardly actions. That they are excused cannot therefore block the path from the judgment that I did something cowardly to the judgment that I am a coward. The excuse must intervene earlier to forestall the original judgment that this was a cowardly action ...

So the gist of an excuse is not that the action was 'out of character', in the sense of being a departure from what we have come to expect from the person whose action it is. Quite the contrary, in fact. The gist of an excuse ... is precisely that the person with the excuse lived up to our expectations ... [T]he question, for excusatory purposes, is obviously not whether the person claiming the excuse lived up to expectations in the predictive sense of being true to form ... The question is whether that person lived up to expectations in the normative sense. Did she manifest as much resilience, or loyalty, or thoroughness, or presence of mind as a person in her situation should have manifested? In the face of terrible threats, for example, did this person show as much fortitude as someone in his situation could properly be asked to show? ... The character standards which are relevant to these and other excuses are not the standards of our own characters, not even the standards of most people's characters, but rather the standards to which our characters should, minimally, conform."²⁹

4-018

This assessment does not involve making broad or sweeping judgements about the individual's character as a person. Instead, the judgement, based in practice upon reasonableness, involves a specific assessment of whether the reasons upon which the action was taken correspond to the character standards to which we should conform.³⁰ Central to Gardner's argument is the point that those who claim excuses are not denying "responsibility" for their actions. This needs clarification because the word responsibility is ambiguous. Those who plead excusatory defences are obviously hoping to avoid responsibility in the sense of liability. However, they are not denying that they were their actions, for which there is an intelligible, rational explanation.³¹ Indeed, Gardner argues it is part of being a self-respecting person:

"to be able to give an intelligible rational account of herself, to be able to show that her actions were the actions of someone who aspired to live up to the proper standards ... She wants it to be the case that her actions were not truly wrongful, or if they were wrongful, that they were at any rate justified, or if they were not justified, that they were at any rate excused."³²

It has been suggested that Gardner's explanation either leaves the category of excuses extremely limited or indeed that he is mistaken about the gist of excuses.³³ Other defences, such as involuntary intoxication, fall outside this analysis but some commentators have argued that they ought to provide an excuse.³⁴

VICTOR TADROS, “THE CHARACTERS OF EXCUSE” (2001) 21 O.J.L.S. 495, 498:

4–019

“In fact, I would suggest that there is no single gist of excuses. The criminal law is supervised by a multitude of principles. In arguing that one has an excuse, one attempts to show that whilst one’s action was wrongful, the principles of the criminal law would not be served by imposing criminal liability. Excuses, then, mop up where exemptions, offence definitions and justifications would lead to convictions in inappropriate cases ... [It] may be because the defendant underwent a fundamental, and reasonable, shift in character before committing the wrongful act. Or it may be because the defendant only exhibited a vice that is an inappropriate target for criminal liability. Or it may be for some other reason, say because the defendant was, beyond her control, placed in a situation in which she was deprived of a fair opportunity to make her behaviour conform to the criminal law. In my view, that is as much as can be said for the gist of excuses.”

4–020

One further issue arises. Just as we might wish to blame the intentional killer more than the negligent killer, so too we might wish to blame the provoked killer less than the unprovoked killer. In other words, there are degrees of blame that mean that some defences will not necessarily operate in an all or nothing fashion.

MARTIN WASIK, “PARTIAL EXCUSES
IN THE CRIMINAL LAW” (1982) 45
M.L.R. 516, 524–525:

“A more helpful model of the operation of excuses in the criminal law would involve the recognition of a ‘scale of excuse’, running downwards from excusing conditions, through partial excuses to mitigating excuses. Excuses towards the higher end of the scale are those where maximum moral pressure for exculpation outweighs reasons of policy and practicality for not permitting the excuse. Automatism is an example. Those towards the lower end of the scale, while they may be morally significant, are out-weighed by practical and policy considerations. A general excusing condition of good motive is an example. Partial excuses fall into the centre of this range, and exhibit a fine balance between rival considerations. The partial excuse of provocation, for example, has been said to be ‘... an extremely strong exculpatory claim ...’ (Gross, p.158) ... On the other hand this excusatory power should surely be weighed against the law’s requirement of self-control ...

All ‘middle range’ excuses may be regarded as potential partial excuses, but it is clearly not inevitable that they will turn out to be so. At a given stage in the history of criminal law, policy claims against admitting a particular excuse as an excusing condition will be seen as more or less compelling.”³⁵

Despite the continued debate surrounding the underlying rationale of excuses, it is possible to identify those defences which, broadly speaking, can be classified as excuses.

(i) Mistake

We saw in Ch.2 that there is fierce controversy over whether mistake negates a definitional element of the crime (and, therefore, is simply lack of mens rea), or whether it is a defence that previously had to be based on reasonable grounds.³⁶ This problem could easily be solved within the existing framework by asserting that no blame attaches to a person who makes a reasonable mistake (i.e. complete excuse), but that some blame attaches to the person who makes an unreasonable mistake, and he should be liable to that extent (i.e. a partial excuse).

(ii) Duress

4-024

Duress is generally treated as an excuse rather than a justification. Some cases have identified the defence as hinging upon the morally involuntary response of the actor, in other words that the defendant lacked a fair opportunity to conform to the law. It may also be explained by reference to Gardner's gist of excuses. It is not currently open to a defendant charged with murder or attempted murder to plead duress—although there have been proposals to reform the law in this respect.³⁷

(iii) Loss of control (formerly provocation)

4-025

Although provocation may have originated as a justification, its transformation into a partial excuse under the common law became more or less complete. However, the new statutory defence of loss of control has restored an element of justification to the test. One of the attractions of pleading loss of control, as opposed to diminished responsibility, is that it gives self-respecting defendants the opportunity to give an intelligible rational account of their actions rather than denying any responsibility.

(iv) Intoxication

4-026

Whether intoxication should be regarded as a defence at all is a problematic issue that will be considered later. The courts very frequently refer to it in such terms. Where defendants lack mens rea because of voluntary intoxication, they will be acquitted of crimes requiring specific intent but will be convicted of lesser crimes of basic intent. Looked at in this way, intoxication appears to constitute a partial excuse.³⁸

(v) Necessity (where the harm threatened is equal to the harm caused)

4-027

As shall be seen, it is unlikely that English law affords a defence in such situations. Necessity or “duress of circumstances” as it has become known is only available as a defence when the defendant acts “proportionately in order to avoid a threat of death or serious injury”³⁹ and, as “duress of circumstances”, is not a defence to a charge of murder. Accordingly, the only situations where the defence could conceivably be available in English law where the harm threatened is equal to the harm caused would be where a defendant causes serious injury to avoid a threat of serious harm or (perhaps) commits what could be manslaughter to avoid a threat of death. In such cases, the defence cannot be regarded as justificatory as the harm being caused is not less than the harm being threatened, but such a defence might be regarded as an excuse. We can understand the predicament of an actor who claims to have had no real choice. If the defence were to be allowed in the context of homicide, one possibility would be to regard it as only a partial excuse, i.e. reducing murder to manslaughter, which is the approach adopted to loss of control.⁴⁰ However, given that the general principles that govern duress and duress of circumstances are increasingly regarded as “substantially the same”, there have been proposals for a complete defence to be introduced.⁴¹

(vi) Superior orders

4-028

A defence of superior orders does not exist in English law. To the extent that obeying the orders of superiors is a defence in the US, the harm done is justified on the basis that the superior interest protected is military discipline and effectiveness. The superiority of this interest is only overturned when the unlawfulness of the order is obvious. Although, following this reasoning, superior orders could be tentatively classified as a justification, a better view could be that like duress, it constitutes an excuse. Such an approach could make the defence more politically acceptable and lead to its acceptance into English law. Whether this would be desirable is discussed later.

D. EXEMPTIONS

4-029

While the gist of excuses may remain contested, there has been a growing acceptance of the view that excuses are not denials of responsibility. There must be a basic responsibility for one's actions for them to be amenable to excuse. However, there are other situations where the actor bears no basic responsibility for his actions. This occurs where the defendant lacks practical reasoning skills and where the actions are not amenable to intelligible rational explanation. Defences in such situations (previously categorised as excuses) are now increasingly being regarded as exemptions:

“[T]he focus on making sense of people's actions in the light of their reasons rightly brings to the surface the important point that those whose reasoning can't be made sense of in this way, whether because of profound mental illness or infancy or sleepwalking ... are not responsible for their actions and therefore need no excuses for what they do.”⁴²

A number of defences operate as exemptions.

(i) Insanity

4-030

A defendant who, because of a disease of the mind, cannot appreciate the nature and quality of her act, or cannot appreciate that it is wrong, lacks the practical reasoning skills to be found responsible for what she has done. On this basis insanity ought to act as an exemption. However, as we shall see, the wording of the M'Naghten Rules tends to suggest otherwise.⁴³

(ii) Diminished responsibility

4-031

“Diminished responsibility occupies the peculiar position of a ‘partial exemption’—a position which is closely related to the specific context of the mandatory life sentence for murder”.⁴⁴ It is, however, based on the notion that the actions were unreasonable:

“The whole point of the diminished responsibility defence is that it depends on the unreasonableness of the defendant’s reactions, i.e. their unamenability to intelligible rational explanation.”⁴⁵

(iii) Automatism

4-032

There is some dispute as to whether automatism is a defence or whether the need for voluntariness is part of the actus reus requirement.⁴⁶ What is clear is that automatism shares the same rationale as other conditions which give rise to exemption from criminal liability.

(iv) Lack of age

4-033

Very young children are not regarded as sufficiently responsible to engage in practical reasoning and, accordingly, are exempt from criminal liability when they commit a wrong.⁴⁷

E. SIGNIFICANCE OF DISTINCTIONS

4-034

What is the point of the theoretical distinctions discussed above? For Wilson, the varying rationales that have been proffered for different general defences tend to hinder our comprehension of how they should operate in criminal law; thereby inhibiting the delivery of criminal justice.⁴⁸ However, for other commentators, the distinction between justification, excuse and exemption is regarded as the key to defining the parameters of each of the general defences and, in turn, the reach of the criminal law. Tadros has described these distinctions as “central to the moral architecture of the criminal law”.⁴⁹ For example, approaching duress as an excuse, and not as a justification, informs one as to how its rules should be framed. Its importance as a theoretical guide, therefore, cannot be overestimated. However, there is a practical utility as well. The distinction between defences has the following important consequences:

4-035

(a) Whether one is entitled to resist conduct for which the aggressor has a defence, or entitled to assist the aggressor, depends upon whether the aggressor's defence is justificatory or excusatory in nature.⁵⁰

PAUL ROBINSON, "CRIMINAL LAW DEFENSES: A SYSTEMATIC ANALYSIS" (1982) 82 COL. L. R. 199, 274-275:

4-036

"Where an aggressor has a justification defence, the proper rule is clear: justified aggression should never be lawfully subject to resistance or interference. When conduct is deemed justified, it creates, by definition, a net benefit to society. The owner of a field should not be allowed to resist one who would burn it to stop a spreading fire, and others should be encouraged to assist, and not permitted to interfere.

An excused [or exempted] aggressor, on the other hand, should be subject to lawful resistance. That is, the victim of the psychotic attacker should be able lawfully to defend himself and to have others lawfully assist him in such defense. While the aggressor may be ultimately blameless, the conduct is clearly harmful. All required elements of the offense are satisfied and no justification exists."

4-037

Similar principles apply to accessories to crime. Thus, in *Quick and Paddison*⁵¹ the principal offender had a defence of automatism—an "exemption" under the above analysis. Paddison assisted him in his aggression and was held liable as an accessory. Had Quick's defence been justificatory in nature, say, acting reasonably to defend himself, then Paddison would have been entitled to assist him.

4-038

(b) When conduct is justified, some commentators argue that it is in effect “approved” of or, at least tolerated and there is, arguably, no need to try to prevent such conduct re-occurring. Where conduct is merely excused or exempted, however, society might wish to protect itself from repetition of such conduct and might wish to resort to coercive remedies against the defendant despite his acquittal. Thus, a successful defence of insanity can lead to commitment in a secure mental hospital. Lack of age is a defence to a criminal charge, but separate care proceedings may follow under the Children Act 1989. Diminished responsibility exempts the actor from liability for murder, but not for manslaughter, enabling the court to take appropriate steps in relation to the defendant. So, too, intoxication is only an excuse to certain crimes—generally where there is a lesser included offence available to which it is no defence. Automatism, on the other hand, enables a defendant to escape all coercive measures, but, even here, there are suggestions that some new form of special verdict should be returned in such cases enabling a court to exercise some supervision over such a person to prevent recurrence of the involuntary action. The remaining excuses such as duress present little threat of repetition of the conduct and therefore there is no need to resort to coercive measures, but, in general, a finding of an exemption (as opposed to a justification) does alert one to the possibility of considering some form of restriction, whether criminal or civil, over the defendant.

The next two consequences of the distinction are admittedly somewhat speculative.

4-039

(c) Whether a defence is justificatory or excusatory may affect the law’s response to defendants who claim to have made a mistake. Thus, the law’s response at present seems to be that those who make a mistake in relation to a justification, for example, self-defence, need only have made a genuine mistake. On the other hand, those who make a mistake in relation to an excuse, for example, duress, must have made a reasonable mistake to escape liability.⁵²

4-040

(d) It has been suggested that the justification/excuse/exemption distinction provides the key to determining which of the general defences are available to crimes of strict liability. Justificatory defences are, but excusatory defences are not, available in such cases.⁵³ According to this view one could successfully plead self-defence to a strict liability offence, but could not plead intoxication or mistake to such an offence.

There is a certain logic to this view. The effect of an excusatory defence is that it destroys blame: the whole point of strict liability is that it is not concerned with blame. It would, therefore, be contradictory to allow excusatory defences to strict liability offences.⁵⁴ A fortiori, this argument would apply to exemptions. However, it is submitted that this argument is unacceptable. Duress is generally regarded as an excuse. It would surely be absurd to deny the defence of duress when an actor, with a gun pointed at their head, commits a minor traffic offence. Indeed, as seen in Ch.2, duress of circumstances, insanity and automatism have been held to apply to strict liability offences. This matter is discussed more fully in that chapter.⁵⁵

4-041

(e) Where conduct is justified, some commentators suggest that the law, for conduct in those circumstances, is effectively amended.⁵⁶ A precedent is generated that others, in similar circumstances, may act in the same manner. Excuses and exemptions, on the other hand, do not constitute exceptions or modifications to the law. They simply involve an assessment that in the particular circumstances it would be unjust to hold a particular actor accountable for their actions. This distinction, perhaps, needs clearer expression.

PAUL ROBINSON, "CRIMINAL LAW
DEFENSES: A SYSTEMATIC
ANALYSIS" (1982) 82 COL. L. R. 199,

“When conduct is justified there is again nothing to condemn or punish. The defendant’s conduct did not, under the circumstances, violate the prohibition of the law, and indeed may be desired and encouraged. Yet a harm or evil was inflicted, and such conduct should remain generally prohibited and condemned. Arson, for example, remains a crime even though the law may permit the burning of a field if it creates a fire break that saves an entire town, but when an actor is acquitted under a justification defense, the message to the public may be unclear, especially since the verdict of ‘not guilty’ gives no hint that a justification defense is at work. Thus, the condemnation and general deterrence of arson may be undercut. It might be desirable to alter the jury verdict to ‘justified,’ thereby acquitting the actor because his conduct caused no net harm, yet noting the continuing prohibition of arson ...

Excuses have a great potential for undercutting the condemnation and general deterrence of the harmful conduct. Even taking the objective circumstances into account, the conduct in an excuse case does constitute a net harm or evil that is condemned by the criminal law. Society will continue to condemn and seek to deter such conduct even in identical circumstances. It is the actor, not the act, which causes us to excuse. Furthermore, the explanation for acquittal of the offender is much less apparent than in cases of justification. Excuses, for the most part, rely on subjective criteria like mental illness, mistake, or subnormality. Often only a person who is aware of the evidence adduced at trial will understand that acquittal is based upon these special characteristics of the actor, not an approval or tolerance of the act.

The limited value of a simple ‘not guilty’ verdict to convey the proper message accounts for some of the difficulties which have arisen in cases of excuse [such as Dudley and Stephens: see below, p.387] ...

It may be because of this potential for misapprehension that an acquittal based on insanity is reported as a verdict of ‘not guilty by reason of insanity’ ...

The only sound approach is to recognize excuse defenses, but to minimize the danger of misperception of the acquittal by relying upon special verdicts—not guilty by reason of excuse—and assuring that the public understands that special message. Civil commitment and similar procedures outside the criminal justice system are available to further the goals of special deterrence and rehabilitation in the absence of condemnable culpability.”

4-043

It is important to note, of course, that Robinson draws a distinction between excuses and justifications only. What we now call “exemptions” are included within the excusatory classification. However, his central message is the same. The moral message sent by an excuse or an exemption is different from that sent by justifications. This difference may be made clearer by the development of “special” verdicts. The case for this is, obviously, at its strongest in relation to exemptions. If, however, one takes the view that excuses, such as duress, are borderline justifications, the argument for a “special” verdict is very weak. Somebody who, according to Gardner’s analysis, has lived up to the character standards of her role has done all that could reasonably be expected in the circumstances and should be entitled to a full and unqualified acquittal.

We are now in a position to examine the various defences.

II. Consent

A. INTRODUCTION

4-044

Certain crimes are defined in such a manner that they can only be committed without the victim’s consent. Rape, for instance, is penile penetration of the vagina, anus or mouth of a person who does not consent to it.⁵⁷ In such cases a defendant who claims that a person was consenting to penetration is not pleading consent as a defence, but is claiming that one of the definitional elements of the offence is missing—that the actus reus of the crime has not been committed.⁵⁸ A definition that provided that it was rape to engage in these actions (with a special defence to cover those cases where consent was present) would seem wrong:

“The reason is that it reflects a morality that is foreign to us. We simply do not think that there is always a reason against sexual intercourse. We are much happier, therefore, with a definition of rape which includes consent in the definition of the offence rather than allowing it to operate as a separate defence that only comes into play as an after-thought once the initial prohibition has been breached.”⁵⁹

Most crimes are, however, not expressly defined in such a manner, but the consent of the “victim” may exempt the defendant from liability. The issue of whether consent should be regarded as a “defence” was integral to the House of Lords’ decision of Brown.⁶⁰ The majority took the view that consent should be regarded as a defence rather than as a definitional element of the offence. They then went on to conclude that it should not be available to the appellants who had been convicted of assault occasioning actual bodily harm following consensual sado-masochistic encounters. However, Lord Mustill, in the minority, approached the appeal as raising a question about the ambit of the offence rather than one involving a defence.⁶¹

Normally this distinction is of little importance,⁶² but in Brown, where the court was engaged in law-making,⁶³ there can be no doubt that the “defence approach” made the decision of the majority somewhat easier. While one may have doubts about the conclusion they reached, it is submitted that consent should be regarded as a defence. The defendant admits that they have committed the full actus reus of the offence, but claims that the consent of the “victim” justifies the wrong they would otherwise be committing. As we have seen, a justificatory defence can be explained in terms of a superior interest being upheld. In relation to consent, that superior interest is human autonomy. The foundation of the criminal law is the concept of responsibility and here it finds expression in the freedom of people to consent to what would otherwise be a criminal offence. The question is one of ascertaining what limits, if any, there are to this freedom to consent. As we shall see, consent is not a defence to all crimes. Whether it is available as a defence depends on the following matters: whether the court is sure that the recipient⁶⁴ truly consented (including whether the recipient was responsible enough to make such decisions), the nature and degree of harm involved, and the rationale of consent as a defence.

B. THE REALITY OF CONSENT

JOAN MCGREGOR, “WHY WHEN SHE SAYS NO SHE DOESN’T MEAN MAYBE AND SHE DOESN’T MEAN YES: A CRITICAL RECONSTRUCTION OF CONSENT, SEX AND THE LAW” (1996) 2 LEGAL THEORY 175, 192:

4-045

“There are a number of different ways of construing the nature and effect of consent. Consent is always given to the actions and projects of others. One common understanding of consent is that it ‘authorizes’ another to act in an area that is part of one’s domain, e.g. giving power of attorney to another. Another way of thinking about consent is that of giving ‘permission’ to another. Joel Feinberg said, in Harm to Self, ‘Any act that crosses the boundaries of a sovereign person’s zone of autonomy requires that person’s “permission”; otherwise it is wrongful’ [p.177]. Conceiving of consent in either of these ways has normative significance, since it brings into existence new moral and legal relationships ... Consent must, then, be deliberate and voluntary, since its explicit purpose is to change the world by changing the structure of rights and obligations of the parties involved.

Within the sovereign zone of our domain, all others have a duty to refrain from crossing over without our permission. Consent cancels that duty, at least in regard to the specific acts consented to, and for a specified time.”

To act as such a “moral transformative”⁶⁵ consent must be full and free.⁶⁶ Indeed, within the context of sexual offences, consent is expressly defined along these lines: “a person consents if he agrees by choice, and has the freedom and capacity to make that choice”.⁶⁷ Saying that the decision must be voluntary does not mean that every nuance is critical. Thus, the person who submits to intercourse rather than be beaten or killed is not regarded as having given real consent⁶⁸ but the person who has intercourse because a boyfriend has declared undying love, or because she believes that he is rich, cannot later claim that the consent was invalid if it turns out that the boyfriend was lying.⁶⁹ This latter example introduces another dimension: what information is critical to determining whether consent is full (and free)? In the example above, the person might well claim that she would never have agreed to sex had she known that the boyfriend was lying but this will not prevent her consent being regarded as real. However, what if the boyfriend does not disclose that he is HIV positive?

4-046

R. v DICA [2004] Q.B. 1257 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-047

The defendant, who was HIV positive, had unprotected consensual sexual intercourse with two women on a number of occasions in the course of relationships with them. Both women subsequently contracted HIV. The defendant was charged with inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20. The prosecution alleged that he had been reckless as to whether the women might become infected and that they would never have agreed to sexual intercourse had they known of his condition. The defendant was convicted and appealed, inter alia, on the issue of consent which the trial judge had withdrawn from the jury.

JUDGE LJ:

“The present case is concerned with and confined to s.20 offences alone ... The question for decision is whether the victims’ consent to sexual intercourse, which as a result of his alleged concealment was given in ignorance of the facts of the appellant’s condition, necessarily amounted to consent to the risk of being infected by him. If that question must be answered ‘Yes’, the concept of consent in relation to s.20 is devoid of real meaning ...

In our view, on the assumed fact now being considered [that they had not known of his condition], the answer is entirely straightforward. These victims consented to sexual intercourse. Accordingly the appellant is not guilty of rape. Given the long-term nature of the relationships, if the appellant concealed the truth about his condition from them, and therefore kept them in ignorance of it, there was no reason for them to think that they were running any risk of infection, and they were not consenting to it. On this basis, there would be no consent sufficient in law to provide the appellant with a defence to the charge under s.20.”

[The court concluded that the defendant would have had a defence had the women known of his condition and agreed to sexual intercourse because they were still prepared to run the risks involved. Accordingly, the trial judge had been wrong to withdraw the issue of consent from the jury.]

*Appeal allowed. Retrial ordered*⁷⁰

4-048

In the subsequent decision of Konzani,⁷¹ the Court of Appeal stressed the need for informed consent—which would almost invariably have to result from disclosure by the person with HIV.⁷² The argument that by consenting to unprotected sex the person is also impliedly consenting to the risk of infection was rejected.⁷³ Convictions have also been obtained under s.20 where defendants have failed to disclose infection with hepatitis B, and genital herpes, to their sexual partners.⁷⁴

In R. v B,⁷⁵ it was held that the fact that the defendant (who was charged with rape) had failed to disclose his HIV status was not relevant to the issue of consent to the act of sexual intercourse as the act remained consensual. However, it appears that the position is different if the defendant either actively deceives the complainant, or deliberately overrides a condition that the complainant has expressly stated must be complied with before consenting to sexual activity. In Assange v Sweden,⁷⁶ the Administrative Court held that a deception as to the use of a condom, although not one as to the “nature and purpose” of the act for the purposes of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.76, could vitiate the complainant’s freedom and choice to consent. In R.

(on the application of F) v DPP, it was held that, where F had made it clear that the only basis upon which she was prepared to have sex with her husband was if he withdrew and did not ejaculate inside her, her consent was negated when he deliberately ejaculated in her vagina because she was “deprived of choice relating to the crucial feature on which her original consent to sexual intercourse was based”.⁷⁷ Further, in McNally,⁷⁸ a deception as to the gender of the defendant was held to vitiate consent. If an active deception as to the use of a condom can negative freedom and choice to consent, then it is likely that a similar stance would be taken by the courts in relation to a deception as to HIV (or other STD) status. However, it is not clear what deceptions will be held to vitiate consent, since the most guidance that the Court of Appeal was proposed to give on this issue was that “some deceptions (for example, in relation to wealth) will obviously not be sufficient to vitiate consent”,⁷⁹ and that the evidence in relation to choice and freedom to consent should be approached in a “broad common sense way”.⁸⁰ Nor is it clear precisely at what stage non-disclosure becomes an “active deception”.⁸¹

In addition, the person must have sufficient capacity to give consent. Capacity may be lacking because of the individual’s physical or mental condition. As far as medical treatment is concerned, action taken during an emergency to aid the patient may not constitute an assault even if done without consent.⁸² In theory, at least, the question is whether the patient has the capacity to consent.⁸³ If, for example, a pregnant woman who needs an emergency caesarean operation has capacity to consent then her refusal ought to be respected, even if this places her life and that of her unborn child at risk.⁸⁴ In practice, however, the patient may be found to lack capacity and the operation will go ahead.⁸⁵

4–049

As far as adults with severe learning difficulties or mental disabilities are concerned, capacity to consent is a sensitive issue. In Jenkins,⁸⁶ a young woman with a verbal mental age of two or three who did not understand sexual relationships, pregnancy or sexually transmitted diseases became pregnant. DNA tests on the aborted foetus (the decision being taken for her to have an abortion since she was unable to understand what had happened to her, to care for a child or give consent to an abortion) revealed that the father was a member of her residential staff. He was charged with rape but acquitted, the trial judge ruling that she had properly consented, as she simply had to submit to her animal instincts to be deemed to have consented. The Law Commission has expressed the view that, whilst the law should protect the sexual autonomy of the mentally disabled and others, it should also protect the vulnerable. Rightly, it concluded that the law should be so framed that there is no capacity to consent in situations such as Jenkins and recommended that the need to understand the reasonably foreseeable consequences of sexual activity should be fundamental to any capacity to consent to such activity.⁸⁷ A similar autonomy-based approach was adopted by Baroness Hale in R. v C,⁸⁸ when she concluded that, in relation to sexual activity, to have capacity a person must be able to understand the information relevant to make a decision and weigh that information to make a choice. Capacity in this context is both person and situation specific: “One does not consent to sex in general. One consents to this act of sex with this person at this time and in this place”.⁸⁹ The issue of the capacity of the mentally disabled also frequently arises in relation to medical treatment and will be considered further in the context of the decisions of Bland and Re B.⁹⁰

Incapacity may also arise because of the age of the individual. In Howard,⁹¹ for example, the alleged consent of a six-year-old to attempted sexual intercourse with the defendant was deemed invalid. It was judged that she was incapable of giving real consent. Whilst transparently the right decision in that particular case, the principle that there must be informed consent by minors may not always operate so simply. A six-year-old may truthfully be said not to have attained the “age of discretion” but can the same thing be said of 12- and 13-year-olds? The reality is that the “age of discretion” rests not only upon the mental and physical age of the child but also depends on the type of harm to which she has allegedly given her consent.⁹² For example, in Sutton, it was held that boys of 10, 11 and 12 could consent to their naked bodies being touched in order to indicate the pose the photographer wanted.⁹³ However, had the touching been held to be indecent the same consent would have been held to be invalid and the photographer would have been convicted of indecent assault.⁹⁴ In Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA,⁹⁵ the court was concerned with whether contraceptive advice could be given to girls under the age of 16 without parental consent. The House of Lords ruled that parental rights to determine whether or not such a child should have medical treatment end “when the child achieves a sufficient understanding and intelligence to enable him or her to understand fully what is proposed”.⁹⁶ A similar approach was adopted in R. v D in assessing whether a child could consent to what would otherwise be a kidnapping by one parent.⁹⁷ However, recent cases have undermined this “Gillick-competence” test by restricting it to cases of a child giving positive consent:

“[T]he courts have held that they have power, as part of their inherent parental jurisdiction, to override the child’s objections even when he does have sufficient understanding and has reached 16. They will start with a preference for respecting his views, but will not allow him to die, or probably suffer serious harm, through lack of treatment, especially if his illness is distorting his judgment.”⁹⁸

4–050

Thus, in Re W, a 16-year-old child suffering from anorexia nervosa refused medical treatment that would save her life. It was held that the court had the power to override her wishes even though she was “Gillick-competent”.⁹⁹ It is probably also the case that parents can override their child’s refusal of treatment.¹⁰⁰ Such an approach has been criticised on the basis that it is “an unattractive prospect that parents might have power to oblige a capable child to accept forcible treatment against his will and without any of the safeguards attached to legal proceedings”.¹⁰¹

C. THE NATURE AND DEGREE OF HARM

4–051

Harm can be defined as any violation of an interest and, as we have already begun to see, there are violations of some interests to which courts will not allow consent to be given. Whether consent will constitute a defence is ultimately a question of public policy that involves balancing the seriousness of the harm against the social utility or acceptability of the defendant's conduct. The greater the injury inflicted, the more the defendant must have some justification (in terms of social utility). Stephen J in Coney held:

“The principle as to consent seems to me to be this: When one person is indicted for inflicting personal injury upon another, the consent of the person who sustains the injury is no defence to the person who inflicts the injury, if the injury is of such a nature, or is inflicted under such circumstances, that its infliction is injurious to the public as well as to the person injured.”¹⁰²

Thus, if a defendant kills a person at that other's request, it will still be murder¹⁰³; this will be so even though the actions could be described as “mercy-killing” and even though self-murder (suicide) is no longer a crime.¹⁰⁴ The Criminal Law Revision Committee rejected the proposal that such a killing “should be a special offence removed from the law of murder and should carry a reduced sentence, the reason being that such a killing did not present a threat to public security as did murder in general”.¹⁰⁵ More recently, the Law Commission has declined to make any recommendation as to whether there should be an offence or partial defence of “mercy killing” (beyond a reformed partial defence of diminished responsibility) on the basis that the issue needs to be properly addressed by a specific review of this aspect of the law of homicide.¹⁰⁶ However, while active euthanasia and assisting suicide are prohibited in the UK,¹⁰⁷ the existence of the latter offence is increasingly controversial.¹⁰⁸ Moreover, in instances where compassionate assistance is given by relatives to help someone travel to Switzerland (where assisted suicide is lawful), prosecutions are likely to be very rare indeed.¹⁰⁹

4-052

Increasingly, the courts have been called upon to determine the issue of the continuance of medical treatment. In Re B,¹¹⁰ the patient had suffered an illness that left her paralysed from the neck down and requiring the support of a ventilator to breathe. Ms B asked for the ventilator to be switched off and when the hospital refused, sought a declaration from the court that she had the capacity to make such a decision and that the hospital had been acting unlawfully in treating her in defiance of her wishes. She was found to be capable, the declaration was granted, and Ms B was moved to a hospital prepared to carry out her wishes where she died shortly afterwards.¹¹¹ In other situations, relatives or the hospital treating the patient may raise the issue of withdrawing treatment. Many of these cases have concerned babies born with severe disabilities¹¹² but in the following case of Bland, the House of Lords was asked to make a declaration enabling life-sustaining treatment to be withdrawn from a young male patient who had been severely injured at the Hillsborough football ground disaster in 1989. The patient had suffered catastrophic and irreversible damage to the brain, which had left him in a condition known as a persistent vegetative state. Medical opinion was agreed that there was no hope of recovery or improvement.

AIREDALE NHS TRUST V BLAND [1993] A.C. 789 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

LORD GOFF:

“I must however stress, at this point, that the law draws a crucial distinction between cases in which a doctor decides not to provide, or to continue to provide, for his patient treatment or care which could or might prolong his life, and those in which he decides, for example by administering a lethal drug, actively to bring his patient’s life to an end ... the former may be lawful, either because the doctor is giving effect to his patient’s wishes by withholding the treatment or care, or even in certain circumstances in which ... the patient is incapacitated from stating whether or not he gives his consent. But it is not lawful for a doctor to administer a drug to his patient to bring about his death, even though that course is prompted by a humanitarian desire to end his suffering, however great that suffering may be: see R. v Cox

(unreported), September 18, 1992. So to act is to cross the Rubicon which runs between on the one hand the care of his living patient and on the other hand euthanasia ...

At the heart of this distinction lies a theoretical question. Why is it that the doctor who gives his patient a lethal injection which kills him commits an unlawful act and indeed is guilty of murder, whereas a doctor who, by discontinuing life support, allows his patient to die, may not act unlawfully—and will not do so, if he commits no breach of duty to his patient? ...

I agree that the doctor's conduct in discontinuing life support can properly be categorised as an omission ... But in the end the reason for that difference is that, whereas the law considers that discontinuance of life support may be consistent with the doctor's duty to care for his patient, it does not, for reasons of policy, consider that it forms any part of his duty to give his patient a lethal injection to put him out of his agony.”

4-054

The declaration was affirmed by the House of Lords (dismissing the appeal by the Official Solicitor) on the basis that further treatment was futile and that prolonging the patient's life by medical treatment could not be said to be in his best interests. The decision was not simply based on the principle of “substituted judgement” (as it would have been in the US, for example¹¹³). This is an approach which requires the court to ascertain what the patient would have wanted. Instead, in this country the concept of “substituted judgement” may be subsumed into the broader analysis of the best interests of the patient.¹¹⁴ While in the US consent is regarded as critical even in such cases, the courts in this country rejected the idea that, at common law, they had the power to give consent on behalf of an incapable adult, viewing their role as being confined to declaring whether or not treatment, or the withdrawal of treatment, was lawful.¹¹⁵ Decision-making in such cases is now governed by the Mental Capacity Act 2005,¹¹⁶ but the approach of the courts is similar: life-sustaining treatment may be withdrawn if it is no longer in the best interests of the incapacitated person.¹¹⁷ The statutory test for best interests incorporates an important element of substituted judgement: the patient's wishes and feelings must be considered, and from the patient's subjective point of view insofar as that is possible.¹¹⁸ In Re A (children) (conjoined twins),¹¹⁹ the trial judge decided that the separation of the twins would be lawful, following Bland, because it amounted to a withdrawal of treatment. The Court of Appeal rejected this analysis.¹²⁰ While the concerns expressed in Bland itself about the omission/commission distinction were echoed, the Court of Appeal was unanimous in holding that positive acts would have to be performed to save Jodie's life and thus the lawfulness of the operation had to be based on other grounds.¹²¹ The distinction between acts and omissions continues to be of utmost importance in cases such as Bland where the court is effectively giving consent to the withdrawal of treatment.¹²²

Consent to serious injury

4-055

In the absence of any social utility¹²³ it is clear that consent will be no defence to really serious injuries.¹²⁴ In Leach,¹²⁵ for example, the "victim" organised his own crucifixion on Hampstead Heath. The defendants nailed him to a wooden cross, his hands pierced by 6-inch nails. The defendants were liable for unlawful wounding; the consent of the victim was disregarded. With regard to lesser injuries, the following leading decision establishes that one may consent to common assault which involves only minimal or no injury. It was also thought to establish that consent is not a defence where actual bodily harm occurs or where a wound is inflicted¹²⁶ unless it falls within a recognised exception such as sporting injuries.

R. V BROWN (AND OTHER APPEALS) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-056

The appellants belonged to a group of sado-masochistic gay men who over a ten-year period participated in the commission of acts of violence against each other, including genital torture, for the sexual pleasure engendered in the giving and receiving of pain. The partner in each case consented to the acts being committed and sustained no permanent injury. The participants had code words that enabled them to indicate when the pain became excessive. The appellants were charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to s.47, and with unlawful wounding contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20. The appellants changed their pleas to guilty when the trial judge ruled that consent was no defence to such charges and subsequently appealed.

LORD TEMPLEMAN:

“My Lords, the appellants were convicted of assaults occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 ... The incidents which led to each conviction occurred in the course of consensual sado-masochistic encounters. The Court of Appeal upheld the convictions and certified the following point of law of general public importance:

‘Where A wounds or assaults B occasioning him actual bodily harm in the course of a sado-masochistic encounter, does the prosecution have to prove lack of consent on the part of B before they can establish A’s guilt under section 20 or section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861?’

... In the present case each of the appellants intentionally inflicted violence upon another (to whom I refer as ‘the victim’) with the consent of the victim and thereby occasioned actual bodily harm or in some cases wounding or grievous bodily harm. Each appellant was therefore guilty of an offence under section 47 or section 20 of the Act of 1861 unless the consent of the victim was effective to prevent the commission of the offence or effective to constitute a defence to the charge.

In some circumstances violence is not punishable under the criminal law. When no actual bodily harm is caused, the consent of the person affected precludes him from complaining. There can be no conviction for the summary offence of common assault if the victim has consented to the assault. Even when violence is intentionally inflicted and results in actual bodily harm, wounding or serious bodily harm the accused is entitled to be acquitted if the injury was a foreseeable -incident of a lawful activity in which the person injured was participating. Surgery involves intentional violence resulting in actual or sometimes serious bodily harm but surgery is a lawful activity. Other activities carried on with consent by or on behalf of the injured person have been accepted as lawful notwithstanding that they involve actual bodily harm or may cause serious bodily harm. Ritual circumcision, tattooing, ear-piercing and violent sports including boxing are lawful activities ...

My Lords, the authorities dealing with the intentional infliction of bodily harm do not establish that consent is a defence to a charge under the Act of 1861. They establish that the courts have accepted that consent is a defence to the infliction of bodily harm in the course of some lawful activities. The question is whether the defence should be extended to the infliction of bodily harm in the course of sado-masochistic encounters ... [This question] can only be decided by consideration of policy and public interest ... Counsel for some of the appellants argued that the defence of consent should be extended to the offence of occasioning actual bodily harm under section 47 of the Act of 1861 but should not be available to charges of serious wounding and the infliction of serious bodily harm under s.20. I do not consider that this solution is practicable. Sado-masochistic participants have no way of foretelling the degree of bodily harm which will result from their encounters ... Counsel for the appellants argued that consent should provide a defence to charges under both section 20 and section 47 because, it was said, every person has a right to deal with his body as he pleases. I do not consider that this slogan provides a sufficient guide to the policy decision which must now be made. It is an offence for a person to abuse his own body and mind by taking drugs. Although the law is often broken, the criminal law restrains a practice which is regarded as dangerous and injurious to individuals and which if allowed and extended is harmful to society generally. In any event the appellants in this case did not mutilate their own bodies. They inflicted bodily harm on willing victims. Suicide is no longer an offence but a person who assists another to commit suicide is guilty of murder or manslaughter.¹²⁷

The assertion was made on behalf of the appellants that the sexual appetites of sadists and masochists can only be satisfied by the infliction of bodily harm and that the law should not punish the consensual achievement of sexual satisfaction. There was no evidence to support the assertion that sado-masochist activities are essential to the happiness of the appellants or any other participants but the argument would be acceptable if sado-masochism were only concerned with sex, as the appellants contend. In my opinion sado-masochism is not only concerned with sex. Sado-masochism is also concerned with violence. The evidence discloses that the practices of the appellants were unpredictably dangerous and degrading to body and mind and were developed with increasing barbarity and taught to persons whose consents were dubious or worthless ...

In principle there is a difference between violence which is incidental and violence which is inflicted for the indulgence of cruelty. The violence of sado-masochistic encounters involves the indulgence of cruelty by sadists and the degradation of victims ... I am not prepared to invent a defence of consent for sado-masochistic encounters which breed and glorify cruelty and result in offences under sections 47 and 20 of the Act of 1861.”

LORD MUSTILL (DISSENTING):

“Throughout the argument of the appeal I was attracted by an analysis on the following lines. First, one would construct a continuous spectrum of the infliction of bodily harm, with killing at one end and a trifling touch at the other. Next, with the help of reported cases one would identify the point on this spectrum at which consent ordinarily ceases to be an answer to a prosecution for inflicting harm. This could be called ‘the critical level.’ It would soon become plain however that this analysis is too simple and that there are certain types of special situation to which the general rule does not apply. Thus, for example, surgical treatment which requires a degree of bodily invasion well on the upper side of the critical level will nevertheless be legitimate if performed in accordance with good medical practice and the consent of the patient. Conversely, there will be cases in which even a moderate degree of harm cannot be legitimated by consent ...

For all the intellectual neatness of this method I must recognise that it will not do, for it imposes on the reported cases and on the diversities of human life an order which they do not possess. Thus, when one comes to map out the spectrum of ordinary consensual physical harm, to which the special situations form exceptions, it is found that the task is almost impossible, since people do not ordinarily consent to the infliction of harm. In effect, either all or almost all the instances of the consensual infliction of violence are special ...

Furthermore, when one examines the situations which are said to found such a theory it is seen that the idea of consent as the foundation of a defence has in many cases been forced on to the theory, whereas in reality the reason why the perpetrator of the harm is not liable is not because of the recipient's consent, but because the perpetrator has acted in a situation where the consent of the recipient forms one, but only one, of the elements which make the act legitimate ...

I thus see no alternative but to adopt a much narrower and more empirical approach, by looking at the situations in which the recipient consents or is deemed to consent to the infliction of violence upon him, to see whether the decided cases teach us how to react to this new challenge ...

[Lord Mustill concluded that the case law left the way open for the House to determine the issue completely anew.]

As I have ventured to formulate the crucial question, it asks whether there is good reason to impress upon section 47 an interpretation which penalises the relevant level of harm irrespective of consent, i.e., to recognise sado-masochistic activities as falling into a special category of acts, such as duelling and prize-fighting, which 'the law says shall not be done.' This is very important, for if the question were differently stated it might well yield a different answer. In particular, if it were held that as a matter of law all infliction of bodily harm above the level of common assault is incapable of being legitimated by consent, except in special circumstances, then we would have to consider whether the public interest required the recognition of private sexual activities as being in a specially exempt category. This would be an altogether more difficult question and one which ... [should be answered by Parliament] ... I ask myself ... whether the Act of 1861 (a statute which ... was clearly intended to penalise conduct of a quite different nature) should in this new situation be interpreted so as to make it criminal?"

[His Lordship concluded that there were insufficient grounds to do so and allowed the appeals.]

LORD SLYNN (DISSENTING):

“[T]here exist areas where the law disregards the victim's consent even where that consent is freely and fully given. These areas may relate to the person (e.g. a child); they may relate to the place (e.g. in public); they may relate to the nature of the harm done. It is the latter which is in issue in the present case.

I accept that consent cannot be said simply to be a defence to any act which one person does to another. A line has to be drawn as to what can and as to what cannot be the subject of consent ...

[T]o be workable, it cannot be allowed to fluctuate within particular charges and in the interests of legal certainty it has to be accepted that consent can be given to acts which are said to constitute actual bodily harm and wounding. Grievous bodily harm I accept to be different by analogy with and as an extension of the old cases on maiming. Accordingly, I accept that other than for cases of grievous bodily harm or death, consent can be a defence. This in no way means that the acts done are approved of or encouraged.”

Appeal dismissed

4-059

While this decision can only be profoundly regretted as legal moralism prevailing over human autonomy and the right of persons to express their sexuality as they see fit,¹²⁸ it did, in some respects, help to clarify the law. The majority, in their answer to the certified question, decided that consent can be a defence to common assault, but is generally no defence to an assault occasioning actual bodily harm or to an unlawful wounding. There are exceptions to this general rule based on “policy and public interest” which allow persons to consent to the infliction of actual bodily harm, wounding—and even serious bodily harm. These exceptions include activities such as surgery, tattooing, ear-piercing,¹²⁹ rough sport and extends to sexual activity with a known risk of serious sexual disease. However, the decision in Brown and its progeny leave certain questions unanswered.

While the House of Lords endorsed the existence of “well established exceptions”, the parameters of these exceptions are far from clear. This is true, even in the context of sexual encounters.

R. v WILSON [1996] 2 CR. APP. R. 241
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL

The defendant was convicted of assaulting his wife contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.47. He admitted to the police (who had been informed by the wife's doctor) that he had used a hot knife to brand his initials on her buttocks. The judge ruled that he was bound by the decision in Brown. On appeal:

RUSSELL LJ:

"We are abundantly satisfied that there is no factual comparison to be made between the instant case and ... and Brown: Mrs Wilson not only consented to that which the appellant did, she instigated it. There was no aggressive intent on the part of the appellant. On the contrary, far from wishing to cause injury to his wife, the appellant's desire was to assist her in what she regarded as the acquisition of a desirable piece of personal adornment, perhaps in this day and age no less understandable than the piercing of nostrils or even tongues for the purposes of inserting decorative jewellery.

In our judgment Brown is not authority for the proposition that consent is no defence to a charge under section 47 of the 1861 Act, in all circumstances where actual bodily harm is deliberately inflicted. It is to be observed that the question certified for their Lordships in Brown related only to a 'sodomasochistic encounter'. However, their Lordships recognised in the course of their speeches, that it was necessary that there be exceptions to what is no more than a general proposition. The speeches of [several of their Lordships] ... all refer to tattooing as being an activity which, if carried out with the consent of an adult, does not involve an offence under section 47, albeit that actual bodily harm is deliberately inflicted.

For our part, we cannot detect any logical difference between what the appellant did and what he might have done in the way of tattooing. The latter activity apparently requires no state authorisation, and the appellant was as free to engage in it as anyone else.

We do not think that we are entitled to assume that the method adopted by the appellant and his wife was any more dangerous or painful than tattooing ... [W]e are firmly of the opinion that it is not in the public interest that activities such as the appellant's in this appeal should amount to criminal behaviour. Consensual activity between husband and wife, in the privacy of the matrimonial home, is not, in our judgment, a proper matter for criminal investigation, let alone criminal prosecution ... In this field, in our judgment, the law should develop upon a case by case basis rather than upon general propositions to which, in the changing times we live, exceptions may arise from time to time not expressly covered by authority.”

Appeal allowed

R. v EMMETT, CASE No. 9901191 ZR,
THE TIMES 15 OCTOBER 1999
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-061

The defendant and his partner engaged in consensual sexual activity that on one occasion involved partial asphyxiation and on another occasion setting light to lighter fuel on her breast. As a result, she suffered subconjunctival haemorrhages in both eyes, some bruising around her neck and a burn that at first was thought to be so serious as to require a skin graft. The offence came to light because the doctor treating the woman reported it to the police. The defendant was convicted of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The trial judge distinguished Wilson and followed Brown in ruling that consent was no defence where the parties foresaw the risk of injuries. On appeal:

WRIGHT J:

“[W]e have come to the clear conclusion that the evidence in the instant case, in striking contrast to that in Wilson, made it plain that the actual or potential damage to which the appellant’s partner was exposed in this case, plainly went far beyond that which was established by the evidence in Wilson. The lady suffered a serious, and what must have been, an excruciating painful burn ... As to the process of partial asphyxiation ... while it may now be fairly well known that the restriction of oxygen to the brain is capable of heightening sexual sensation, it is also, or should be, equally well-known that such a practice contains within itself a grave danger of brain damage or even death ... The appellant was plainly aware of that danger ... Accordingly, whether the line beyond which consent becomes immaterial is drawn at the point ... at which common assault becomes assault occasioning actual bodily harm, or at some higher level, where the evidence looked at objectively reveals a realistic risk of more than a transient or trivial injury, it is plain, in our judgment, that the activities involved in by this appellant and his partner went well beyond that line ...

[The appellant argues that] the involvement of the processes of the criminal law, in the consensual activities that were carried on in this couple's bedroom, amount to a breach of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights [right to respect for private and family life] ... It seems clear to us that once the conduct of the accused person has gone beyond the permitted limit, however that is defined, in inflicting injury upon or exposing to potential risk his or her partner, in the course of sadomasochistic games whether homo- or heterosexual, so that he or she prima facie at least has committed an offence of a sufficient degree of seriousness, the institution of a criminal investigation and, if appropriate, criminal proceedings cannot amount to a breach of Article 8."

Appeal dismissed

4-062

While this decision can be welcomed, as applying the same test to different types of sexual relationships, the judgment is non-committal about the precise point at which the state may intervene in one's private sexual life. Branding one's wife with a knife is permitted (by analogy with the "exception" of tattooing¹³⁰) but the activities in this case "went well beyond that line". The reliance in Wilson on the fact that the branding had been done as an act of affection rather than aggression is unhelpful. Subsequently, the decisions of Dica and Konzani have attempted to render more coherent the law surrounding consent and sexual activity. In Dica, the court decided that if the women had known of the defendant's condition and continued to engage in sexual activity with him, their consent would have been an answer to a charge of inflicting grievous bodily harm.

R. v DICA [2004] Q.B. 1257 (COURT

JUDGE LJ:

“[Emmett and the case of *Boyea*¹³¹] demonstrate that violent conduct involving the deliberate and intentional infliction of bodily harm is and remains unlawful notwithstanding that its purpose is the sexual gratification of one or both participants. Notwithstanding their sexual overtones, these cases were concerned with violent crime, and the sexual overtones did not alter the fact that both parties were consenting to the deliberate infliction of serious harm or bodily injury on one participant by the other. To date, as a matter of public policy, it has not been thought appropriate for such violent conduct to be excused merely because there is a private consensual sexual element to it. The same public policy reason would prohibit the deliberate spreading of disease, including sexual disease.

In our judgment the impact of the authorities dealing with sexual gratification can too readily be misunderstood. It does not follow from them, and they do not suggest, that consensual acts of sexual intercourse are unlawful merely because there may be a known risk to the health of one or other participant. These participants are not intent on spreading or becoming infected with disease through sexual gratification. They are not indulging in serious violence for the purpose of sexual gratification. They are simply prepared, knowingly, to run the risk—not the certainty—of infection, as well as all the other risks inherent in and possible consequences of sexual intercourse, such as, and despite the most careful precautions, an unintended pregnancy ...

These, and similar risks, have always been taken by adults consenting to sexual intercourse ... Modern society has not thought to criminalise those who have willingly accepted the risks ...

The problems of criminalizing the consensual taking of risks like these include the sheer impracticability of enforcement and the haphazard nature of its impact. The process would undermine the general understanding of the community that sexual relationships are pre-eminently private and essentially personal to the individuals involved in them ...

In our judgment, interference of this kind with personal autonomy, and its level and extent, may only be made by Parliament.”

4-064

While autonomy is upheld here (unlike in Brown) in respect of the choice of individuals to engage in risk-laden sexual activity, the distinction being drawn between violence and sex is no more illuminating or coherent than the distinction in Wilson between affection and aggression.

In 2013, Steven Lock was tried at Ipswich Crown Court for an offence under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.47. Inspired by the bestselling erotic work of fiction, Fifty Shades of Grey,¹³² he had restrained his partner, who had signed a letter stating that she gave him permission to treat her as a slave, and lashed her with a rope, causing 14 centimetre bruises to her buttocks. His defence was that this was a “master and slave” sex game to which the complainant had consented, and that he had not intended to inflict injury. He was acquitted by the jury.¹³³ In Brown, Lord Mustill recognised that societal attitudes and behaviour change over time, and that the line between acceptable and unlawful behaviour might need to be revisited in the future:

“It also seems plain that as the general social appreciation of what is tolerable and of the proper role of the state in regulating the lives of individuals changes with the passage of time, so we shall expect to find that the assumption of the criminal justice system about what types of conduct are properly excluded from its scope, and about what is meant by going ‘too far’ will not remain constant.”¹³⁴

Injuries during sports

4-065

What is the position with regard to other exceptions? Consent is a defence to sports participants who injure one another in the course of their sporting activities. Lawful sports (excluding activities such as prize-fighting) are to be encouraged: they are “manly diversions, they tend to give strength, skill and activity, and may fit people for defence, public as well as personal, in time of need”.¹³⁵ In Billinghamurst, the jury was directed that rugby players consent to such force as can reasonably be expected during the game.¹³⁶ In Barnes, the defendant made, in the words of the prosecution, “a crushing tackle, which was late, unnecessary, reckless and high up the legs” upon a player on the opposing side in an amateur game of football which resulted in serious injuries to the ankle and calf bone of the player.¹³⁷ The defendant was convicted of maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20. At his appeal, Lord Woolf stated that there was now a steady flow of cases coming before them which required them to give guidance. He stressed that prosecutions should be reserved for those situations where the conduct was sufficiently grave to be categorised as criminal. Given that most organised sports had their own disciplinary procedures for enforcing the rules and standards of conduct, it was not only unnecessary but also undesirable that criminal proceedings should generally occur. “If what occurs goes beyond what a player can reasonably be regarded as having accepted by taking part in the sport, this indicates that the conduct will not be covered by the defence” of consent. Noteworthy is that the court held that the threshold for sporting conduct being regarded as criminal will vary depending on all the circumstances, including “[t]he type of the sport, the level at which it is played, the nature of the act, the degree of force used, the extent of the risk of injury, [and] the state of mind of the defendant”. Where there are borderline cases the jury would “need to ask themselves among other questions whether the contact was so obviously late and/or violent that it could not be regarded as an instinctive reaction, error or misjudgment in the heat of the game”.¹³⁸

In those cases where criminal liability does result, the courts will ordinarily respond to such offending by imposing a custodial sentence.¹³⁹ Where does this analysis leave professional boxing:

“For money, not recreation or personal improvement, each boxer tries to hurt the opponent more than he is hurt himself, and aims to end the contest prematurely by inflicting a brain injury serious enough to make the defendant unconscious ... It is in my judgment best to regard this as another special situation which for the time being stands outside the ordinary law of violence because society chooses to tolerate it.”¹⁴⁰

Injuries during the course of employment

4-066

In H v Crown Prosecution Service,¹⁴¹ the Administrative Court refused to hold that a teacher at a school for children with special needs, by accepting employment at that school, had impliedly consented to the use of minor violence against him by his pupils because, in that type of school, pupils would frequently exhibit aggressive and challenging behaviour. An argument that this situation was analogous to the contact sports cases and that, by analogy, such cases should be dealt with by the schools’ internal disciplinary proceedings, rather than by the criminal law, was similarly rejected. The Court was concerned about possibly opening the floodgates to arguments that those dealing with difficult individuals impliedly consented to minor assaults upon them:

“For example, if teachers impliedly consent to common assault, what of other people such as support staff, dinner ladies and other students? Are they to be regarded as having impliedly consented to assaults upon them? One can also conceive of other situations where, if the defendant’s contention is correct, it must logically follow that consent must be deemed to be given, for example by a nurse or doctor on a ward with difficult patients.”¹⁴²

Ritualistic and surgical procedures

4-067

There are a number of other special situations where the deliberate infliction of bodily harm may be legitimated by consent. An example is the ritual circumcision of males.¹⁴³ The cultural acceptance this form of invasive action enjoys is very different to the position of female circumcision. This latter practice is mainly performed on young girls of African origin in order to protect their virginity. “[I]ts purpose lies in the control and oppression of women and the suppression of female sexuality”.¹⁴⁴ Such circumcisions can cause very severe injuries and have been made criminal.¹⁴⁵ People over the age of 16 may give consent to other forms of surgical interference. Whether it is the consent of the patient that renders the actions lawful or whether surgery forms a special category of its own is an issue which has yet to be fully resolved in the courts.¹⁴⁶ We know that at least one surgeon has performed amputation operations on two patients suffering from the rare medical disorder of apotemnophilia which induces in its sufferers the desire to have a (healthy) limb amputated.¹⁴⁷ The legality of this (and its rationale) was not tested by a prosecution but a similar scenario would provide a “limit” case for the courts on the issue of consent to surgery.

Injuries during “horseplay”

4-068

Finally, there is a problem concerning “rough horseplay”. In Jones,¹⁴⁸ it was held that this activity which occurs “in the school playground, in the barrack-room and on the factory floor”¹⁴⁹ was something that persons consent to as long as there is no intention to cause injury. Because of this, a group of schoolboys in Jones who had thrown their victims “some 9 or 10 feet” into the air causing, in one case, a ruptured spleen which necessitated a surgical operation for its removal, had their convictions for causing grievous bodily harm quashed. In Brown, Lord Mustill stated that the criminal law could not concern itself with such activities “provided that they do not go too far”.¹⁵⁰ This public policy approach was adopted in P where it was held that in the context of horseplay consent might be highly material in negating what would otherwise be an unlawful act.¹⁵¹ In this case, two teenage defendants, after a post-exam celebration, threw the victim over a bridge to his death. Their convictions for manslaughter were upheld—not on the basis that consent was irrelevant in such circumstances—but on the basis that no consent had been given and it was abundantly clear that the victim had been actively resisting the defendants.

These cases have the potential to be a bully’s charter.¹⁵² It is far-fetched to suggest that the boys in Jones who were being held by several others to prevent them running away were genuinely consenting to being thrown into the air. To suggest that boys can consent to grievous bodily harm or a risk of death, but that sado-masochists, who are genuinely consenting, cannot consent to actual bodily harm, provides an interesting insight into the way some of our judiciary view the world. Violence in the playground or barrack-room is what is expected and normal in the male world; it is a “manly diversion”. Two men wishing to express their sexuality together and in private are not doing the sort of thing “real men” do. It is an “evil thing” and “uncivilised”¹⁵³ and cannot be the subject of valid consent.

Assaults occasioning actual bodily harm

4-069

An assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to s.47 can be inflicted intentionally or recklessly. Indeed, the defendant need not foresee any bodily harm at all as the mens rea is the same as that of a common assault.¹⁵⁴ It is unclear whether consent can never be a defence to s.47¹⁵⁵ (apart from the recognised exceptions) or whether this is limited to cases where the actual bodily harm is deliberately inflicted.¹⁵⁶ There are dicta supporting this latter view.¹⁵⁷ On the other hand, the majority in Brown all answered the certified question in the negative. This question was framed with reference to “section 20 and section 47”, both of which offences can be committed recklessly. Lord Jauncey was clear that consent could never be a defence to anyone charged with either a s.47 or a s.20 offence (apart from the well-established exceptions). Further, the majority approved of the dictum of Lord Lane in Attorney-General’s Reference (No.6 of 1980) that it was not in the public interest that people should try to or should cause each other bodily harm (for no good reason) and that it was an assault if actual bodily harm was intended and/or caused.¹⁵⁸ Thus, it is possible that if actual bodily harm results, even though it is neither intended nor foreseen, consent would be negated.¹⁵⁹

However, the better view is that whether consent can ever be a defence, in cases where the injury is not intended, depends on the context in which these injuries are inflicted. In Brown the certified question was expressly posed in relation to woundings or actual bodily harm “in the course of a sadomasochistic encounter” and it is arguable that it is only in such cases that consent is never a defence to a s.47 charge. It is only on “public interest” grounds that consent is not a defence here and presumably the “public interest” varies with the type of case involved. For example, we are all deemed to consent to a certain degree of bodily contact in everyday life when on buses, trains and so on. It seems perfectly plausible in such a case to argue that consent can be a defence to a s.47 charge if the actual bodily harm was not deliberately caused. We all consent not only to everyday touching but also to the risk of being pushed and jostled and perhaps injured. We certainly do not consent, however, to persons pushing us over and deliberately causing us actual bodily harm.

Similarly, with sexual activity (not of a sadomasochistic variety) it was held in Dica, as we have seen, that there could be consent to the risk of HIV (which is grievous bodily harm). In Meachen,¹⁶⁰ the defence case was that the complainant had consented, for her gratification, to the defendant inserting his finger into her anus. She suffered serious anal injury. On appeal, the defendant’s conviction for inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to s.20 was quashed. As her injuries had not been intended, her consent could provide a defence.¹⁶¹

The issue of consenting to actual bodily harms also arises in the context of fights between consenting participants. In Attorney-General’s Reference (No.6 of 1980) it was held that one could not consent to injuries sustained in a fight because such fighting (unless properly conducted under the Queensberry Rules) was contrary to the public interest. However, what if the injuries sustained in the fight were not sufficient to amount to actual bodily harm, or if the prosecution chose for other reasons to charge only with common assault? Would consent be a defence to such a charge? In Attorney-General’s Reference (No.6 of 1980) it was held that there could be an assault in such circumstances if actual bodily harm was “intended and/or caused”.¹⁶² If actual bodily harm is intended but not actually caused, the only possible charge is common assault. This issue is not directly addressed in Brown but would appear to be answered by the following, fairly typical statement by Lord Lowry that “everyone agrees that consent remains a complete defence to a charge of common assault”.¹⁶³ Until this point has been resolved prosecutors are likely to avoid charging common assault in any case where consent is involved.

This leaves us with a legal anomaly: consent is a defence to assault but cannot be a defence to actual bodily harm. Yet how can a defendant be guilty of the offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm when there can be no liability for one of the elements of the offence, namely, the assault?¹⁶⁴

D. THE RATIONALE OF CONSENT AS A DEFENCE

4-070

An attempt to understand the basis upon which, and the extent to which, consent currently operates as a defence involves a consideration of liberalism, paternalism and moralism. Those issues were considered in Ch.1 and will not be explored again here. However, two final insights may be presented.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.770-771:

4-071

“The principle that individuals are free and responsible agents informs the analysis of consent ... Once accepted, the value of autonomy does not lend itself to being offset by competing social interests. So far as the rationale of consent is that individuals should be free to waive their rights, this capacity of waiver is not a contingent value, subject to repeated balancing against the opposing array of interests.

There is some evidence that at the fringes, however, the principle of autonomy gives way to competing social values. The prevailing view in Western legal systems is that the individual has the right to take his own life or to torture himself, but he does not have the right to authorise others to do the killing or to perform a sado-masochistic beating. That there is a personal right to suffer in these cases indicates that the rationale for limiting personal autonomy is not a paternalistic governmental posture toward the victim's injuring himself. If the issue were paternalism, the government should employ sanctions as well against suicide and other forms of self-destruction.

A more convincing account of the distinction between self-injury and consenting to injury by others derives from the danger of implicating other persons in dangerous forms of conduct. The individual who kills or mutilates himself might affect the well-being of family and friends, but this result depends upon the actor's relationships with other people. In contrast, the self-destructive individual who induces another person to kill or to mutilate him implicates the latter in the violation of a significant social taboo. The person carrying out the killing or the mutilation crosses the threshold into a realm of conduct that, the second time, might be more easily carried out. And the second time, it might not be particularly significant whether the victim consents or not. Similarly, if someone is encouraged to inflict a sado-masochistic beating on a consenting victim, the experience of inflicting the beating might loosen the actor's inhibitions against sadism in general."

DAVID FELDMAN, CIVIL LIBERTIES AND HUMAN RIGHTS IN ENGLAND
AND WALES, 2ND EDN (2002), PP.715– 716:

4-072

“[T]o imply ... that carefully controlled, planned, and consensual violence as part of a sexual encounter has no redeeming social value, but to accept that boxing or rough and undisciplined play have social value which justifies the infliction of bodily harm, turns reality on its head. The object of respecting consent to the rough and tumble of sport (like consent to medical treatment) is primarily to protect the individual interests of the participants as they perceive them, rather than to advance any public interest. It is a recognition of individual autonomy, the right of individuals of sufficient understanding to make their own decisions about what is good for them. In principle, this should apply equally to people's sexual preferences. Indeed, it is hard to see how the interest (whether public or private) in allowing people to express their sexuality, which forms a fundamental part of people's personality, could be less important than the interest in allowing people to pursue sports. Sport is fun, but sex, for many people, is more than fun: it is a form of selfexpression."

4-073

Even if one concedes that, in certain cases, consent ought not to provide a complete defence, do we blame such defendants as much as those who commit similar harms against their victims who are not consenting? Even if consent does not provide a complete justification, ought it not to provide a partial defence so as to reduce the defendant's level of criminal liability and/or punishment?

E. REFORM PROPOSALS

4-074

The judgments of their Lordships in Brown prompted the Law Commission to examine the law relating to consent. It adopts an essentially pragmatic approach and follows what it perceives to be the prevailing attitude in Parliament to questions of criminalisation,¹⁶⁵ that is, "paternalism softened at the edges when Parliament is confident that there is an effective system of regulatory control".¹⁶⁶

LAW COMMISSION, CONSENT IN THE CRIMINAL LAW (CONSULTATION PAPER NO.139, 1995), PARAS 4.47– 4.51:

4-075

"4.47 We provisionally propose that the intentional causing of seriously disabling injury to another person should continue to be criminal, even if the person injured consents to such injury or to the risk of such injury.

4.48 We provisionally propose that—

(1) the reckless causing of seriously disabling injury should continue to be criminal, even if the injured person consents to such injury or to the risk of such injury; but

- (2) a person causing seriously disabling injury to another person should not be regarded as having caused it recklessly unless—
 - (a) he or she was, at the time of the act or omission causing it, aware of a risk that such injury would result, and
 - (b) it was at that time contrary to the best interests of the other person, having regard to the circumstances known to the person causing the injury (including, if known to him or her, the fact that the other person consented to such injury or to the risk of it), to take that risk.

4.49 We provisionally propose that the intentional [and reckless (4.50)] causing of any injury to another person other than seriously disabling injury ... should not be criminal if, at the time of the act or omission causing the injury, the other person consented to injury of the type caused.

4.51 ... ‘seriously disabling injury’ should be taken to refer to an injury or injuries which

- (1) cause serious distress, and
- (2) involve the loss of a bodily member or organ or permanent bodily injury or permanent functional impairment, or serious or permanent disfigurement, or severe and prolonged pain, or serious impairment of mental health, or prolonged unconsciousness; and in determining whether an effect is permanent, no account should be taken of the fact that it may be remediable by surgery.¹⁶⁷

[The Law Commission then goes on to identify a number of exceptions. Persons may give consent to a higher level of harm for medical treatment and surgery. There are a number of activities (such as tattooing, sport and horseplay) where the level of harm is to stay at that permitted by the present law. Those under the age of 18 would not be able to consent to injuries intentionally caused for sexual, religious or spiritual purposes.]”

If implemented, these proposals would produce a law which would give rather more scope for the defence of consent. The Law Commission acknowledges that there are still difficulties to be resolved¹⁶⁸ but, beyond this, there are underlying assumptions which are not beyond challenge and to which we now turn.

More recently the Law Commission sets out an alternative approach to the question of the extent to which consent should operate as a defence in cases involving minor injuries.¹⁶⁹ Instead of the defence exempting individuals from criminal liability in cases of assault and battery, the Commission argues that non-consent should operate as an ingredient of those offences. Hence, where V provides consent to a threat of violence or actual touching, the act would not, in and of itself, amount to a “wrong” that is deserving of punishment unless a valid exemption applies. The logic underpinning this approach is that consent changes the quality of the act, such that it does not require justification, excuse or exemption. In other words, a minor injury (touching) inflicted with consent would not amount to an offence and therefore does not require a defence. This would resolve some of the theoretical doubt about the role of consent in relation to these more minor offences. The defence of consent would still be applicable to offences which cause injury. This would mean that for assault offences, the relevant factor is consent to the physical act and in more serious injury offences, the relevant factor is consent to the injury. Only in these latter cases should the issue of Brown, vis-à-vis the validity of consent to injury, arise.¹⁷⁰

III. Self-defence

A. INTRODUCTION

4-077

Almost as long as the criminal law has been in existence it has consistently restricted the right of the individual to self-help; it is the function of the law to preserve law and order and protect the weak. There are, however, inevitably occasions when to depend upon the arrival of official help would be to court disaster and it would be extremely unjust if the remedy of self-help were altogether denied. The law recognises this and in certain situations deems the use of force to be lawful. It has been argued that:

“The source of [this] right is a comparison of the competing interests of the aggressor and the defender, as modified by the important fact that the aggressor is the one party responsible for the fight ... As the party morally at fault for threatening the defender’s interests, the aggressor is entitled to lesser consideration in the balancing process.”¹⁷¹

The underlying rationale of defensive force may also be understood in terms of Gardner’s analysis: “By granting a justificatory defence the law concedes that ... the defendant had, at the time of her prima facie wrongful action, sufficient reason to perform it”.¹⁷² While most of the rules here were developed largely to cater for situations where the defendant is acting against an aggressor, Gardner’s analysis provides a more complete explanation that covers cases where self-defensive action is taken against a non-culpable person such as a small child who is inadvertently threatening the defendant’s interests.

Again, as with consent, it is possible to assert that necessary defence is not truly a “defence”. A defendant acting in self-defence is acting lawfully—an element of the actus reus is thus not established.¹⁷³ As we have seen, this method of characterisation has important implications in cases where the defendant has made a mistake, i.e. mistakenly thinking he needs to defend himself or others.¹⁷⁴ But apart from such cases, the parameters of necessary defence are constant—irrespective of whether it is regarded as a defence, or a denial of a definitional element.

4-078

As we shall see in the context of both homicide and non-fatal offences against the person, most reported violent crime is between young males, typically when they are out socialising.¹⁷⁵ Violence may flare up in such situations, which leads one of the parties to use defensive force. The dynamics of the interaction may not, however, be straightforward; the eventual victim may have precipitated the final outcome or the defendant could actually have been the initial aggressor¹⁷⁶; in short, the division of responsibility between the victim and the defendant may be difficult to determine. Thus, the law has developed fairly rigorous conditions before a plea based on the need to defend oneself will be accepted.

It is also true to say that the context within which these rules have been framed has been predominantly that of inter-male violence.¹⁷⁷ What this ignores (and what is still underrepresented by official statistics) is domestic violence. As we will see, the rules in relation to defensive force may make it difficult for the “battered woman” who retaliates to raise a successful plea.¹⁷⁸

In recent years, the law of self-defence has come under intense scrutiny from the popular press, the public and politicians in relation to the force a householder may use in response to intruders.¹⁷⁹ As a consequence, the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76 was enacted in order to “clarify the operation of the existing defences”.¹⁸⁰ The 2008 Act codifies the existing common law defence of self-defence and the statutory defence under the Criminal Law Act 1967 s.3 of acting in prevention of crime. Section 76 does not abolish the common law; nor does it cover all of the issues dealt with by the common law. As such, the section has been criticised as “pointless”¹⁸¹ and for ignoring the fact that the common law “urgently needs to be reformed”.¹⁸² Reform has come more recently, but not in the form envisaged by most legal scholars. In 2013, the Crime and Courts Act 2013 s.43 amended the 2008 Act in relation to so-called “householder cases”. The new provisions, in effect, legitimise the use of disproportionate force in self-defence in home invasion cases.¹⁸³

B. ELEMENTS OF SELF-DEFENCE

4-079

A number of circumstances must exist in order for an actor to be justified in acting in self-defence. These can be summarised as follows:

1. A threat of unjustified harm;
2. A protected interest;
3. An honest belief that defensive action was necessary; and

4. Defensive force that is reasonable in the circumstances?

In determining whether these elements are satisfied two additional questions may also be asked:

5. Was there an opportunity for the defender to retreat?; and

6. How imminent was the threatened attack?

1. Threat of unjustified harm

4-080

In the paradigmatic self-defence scenario an innocent person is attacked by an unjustified aggressor and this triggers the right to self-defensive action. From this, it is clear that self-defence is not a defence against justified action, for example, against a police officer using reasonable force to make a lawful arrest. On the other hand, as seen earlier when the significance of the distinction between justifications, excuses and exemptions was explored, self-defence is permitted against an exempted actor. One is entitled to defend oneself against a small child firing a gun or an insane person wielding an axe. Such a person, while non-culpable, is still threatening unjustified harm.

RE A (CONJOINED TWINS: SURGICAL SEPARATION) [2001] FAM. 147 (COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION):

4-081

“Jodie” and “Mary” were conjoined twins. Leaving them joined would result in the death of both of them within six months. A separation operation would certainly result in the death of Mary who was not capable of separate survival but would give Jodie a good prospect of a normal life. The issue was whether such an operation would be lawful despite the fact that it would result in the death of Mary under circumstances making the surgeons prima facie liable for murder.

WARD LJ:

“The reality here—harsh as it is to state it, and unnatural as it is that it should be happening—is that Mary is killing Jodie. That is the effect of the incontrovertible medical evidence and it is common ground in the case. Mary uses Jodie's heart and lungs to receive and use Jodie's oxygenated blood. This will cause Jodie's heart to fail and cause Jodie's death as surely as a slow drip of poison. How can it be just that Jodie should be required to tolerate that state of affairs? One does not need to label Mary with the American terminology which would paint her to be 'an unjust aggressor', which I feel is wholly inappropriate language for the sad and helpless position in which Mary finds herself. I have no difficulty in agreeing that this unique happening cannot be said to be unlawful. But it does not have to be unlawful. The six-year-old boy indiscriminately shooting all and sundry in the school playground is not acting unlawfully for he is too young for his acts to be so classified. But is he 'innocent' within the moral meaning of that word? ... I am not qualified to answer that moral question ... If I had to hazard a guess, I would venture the tentative view that the child is not morally innocent. What I am, however, competent to say is that in law killing that six-year-old boy in self-defence of others would be fully justified and the killing would not be unlawful. I can see no difference in essence between that resort to legitimate self-defence and the doctors coming to Jodie's defence and removing the threat of fatal harm to her presented by Mary's draining her lifeblood. The availability of such a plea of quasi-self-defence, modified to meet the quite exceptional circumstances nature has inflicted on the twins, makes intervention by the doctors lawful."

4-082

This view, expressed by Ward LJ, raises complex issues that cannot be fully explored here. For example, in self-defence cases, even against exempted actors such as the small child firing a gun, the defender is acting to protect his actual bodily integrity. It has been argued that "this particular norm is inapplicable to the case of bodies that come into existence with a conjoined circulatory system".¹⁸⁴ How does Mary's right to life square with Jodie's "right" to have her killed? On what basis can Mary be said to have "forfeited" her right not to have force used against her?¹⁸⁵ Can it be argued that a "luckless" person like Mary who has become an "unjustified threat" has "opened up a gap" in her rights?¹⁸⁶ How can Mary be brought within the rationale of self-defence that she has “created a situation in which [her] otherwise protected interests are subject to injury because [she] has stepped outside the area where [she] can legitimately expect to remain free from interference”?¹⁸⁷ Probably the only way of resolving these intractable problems is by turning attention away from the person posing the unjust threat and focusing instead on the defender’s normative position and whether he had sufficient reasons for his actions.¹⁸⁸ An alternative, and certainly easier, approach is that these cases of defensive action against a non-culpable actor should be removed from the ambit of self-defence and dealt with as cases of necessity, as a majority of the judges in Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation) actually did.¹⁸⁹

The position appears to be different when the defendant is acting in defence of property. In DPP v Bayer, it was held that the defence is only available against an unlawful or criminal act. In this case, the defendants entered on to private land which was being drilled with genetically modified maize; to prevent the drilling they attached themselves to the tractors being used. On appeal, it was held that the common law “defence of property” was not available to them because the drilling of the seed was not unlawful.¹⁹⁰ While at one level it might be thought appropriate to have a more rigorous requirement in the context of property, it does expose an anomaly: is the law really saying that if one’s house were set on fire by, say, a sleepwalker (who is not, therefore, committing a crime), one could do nothing to defend one’s property? That cannot be the correct answer.

(i) Innocent third parties

4–083

The force used in response to a threat will typically be directed towards the person who is posing the threat; whether innocent or not. Only in exceptional circumstances may a defendant use force against an innocent third party in order to either resist personal violence and/or prevent a crime being committed by another.

R. v HICHENS [2011] 2 CR. APP. R.

The defendant was convicted of assaulting the complainant (his girlfriend) who he had slapped in order to stop her from allowing O (her ex-boyfriend) from entering their apartment; the defendant, with good reason, anticipating violence from O. The trial judge withdrew the common law defence of self-defence and the s. 3 offence of acting in prevention of crime from the jury on the basis that the defences did not extend to situations where force is used against an innocent third party.

GROSS LJ:

“[30] It is next convenient to focus on two separate strands. The first is whether self-defence at common law and the use of force in the prevention of crime under s.3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 are capable of extending to the use of force, against an innocent third party, to prevent a crime being committed by someone else. If and in so far as the judge thought that these defences were not capable of extending to the use of force against an innocent third party, we respectfully disagree, and indeed Mr Wicks did not seek to contend otherwise. Although we suspect that the facts capable realistically of giving rise to such a defence will only rarely be encountered, examples can be adduced and two will suffice:

1. A police constable bundles a passerby out of the way to get at a man he believes about to shoot with a firearm or detonate an explosive device;
2. Y seeks to give Z car keys with Z about to drive X, believing Z to be unfit to drive through drink, knocks the keys out of Y's hands and retains them.

As ever the fact that the defence is capable of being advanced is of course a very different question from whether it would succeed.”

Appeal dismissed

Reluctantly, the court found that the judge was wrong to withdraw the defence of prevention of crime from the jury, however the conviction was nevertheless safe; the court concluding that the remoteness of the threat posed by O meant that no reasonable jury, even if properly directed, would have acquitted the defendant.

Lord Gross provides two examples of circumstances of when proportionate force may be used against an innocent party in either self-defence or acting in prevention of a crime. Section 76 remains silent on this issue and thus it is upon the common law that we must rely when deciphering which situations (involving innocent third parties) will give rise to the availability of these defences. This leaves yet another aspect of the law on self-defence uncertain.

2. Protected interest

4-086

The “protected interests” currently recognised by the common law are protection of self, protection of others, and property.¹⁹¹ Overlapping these interests to a considerable extent is the further protected interest of acting in the prevention of crime.¹⁹²

It seems only just that innocent persons who are attacked ought to be able to defend themselves and should also be able to go to the aid of their immediate family. But what if friends or even strangers are in need of help; should someone be blamed or protected if they choose to step in? Some authorities, including Devlin v Armstrong suggest that there must be “some special nexus or relationship between the person relying on the doctrine to justify what he did in aid of another, and that other”.¹⁹³ However, it is now clear that no such limitation exists and it makes no difference whether one is defending oneself or a complete stranger.¹⁹⁴ This has important implications for pub and street brawls. A fight between two people can soon escalate with persons who join in claiming that they are acting in defence of others. One may also use physical force to protect one’s property.¹⁹⁵ As we shall see, however, one of the real dilemmas here is in defining how much defensive physical force one may use to protect one’s property.

The European Convention on Human Rights and the Permitted Response

4-087

The law recognises the right to protect both personal and proprietary interests.¹⁹⁶ One can use violence to repel an attack.¹⁹⁷ It is clear, however, that there are severe restrictions as to the circumstances in which one is justified in using such force. One does not have carte blanche to defend oneself entirely as one chooses. The law will simply not accept that it is justifiable to kill a human being in order to protect a much-loved pet guinea-pig. In order for conduct to be justified, the defender must only use such force as is necessary to avert the attack.

In many of the leading self-defence cases the aggressor has been killed. The importance that is attached to the sanctity of life (and the corresponding need for any exception to it to be closely circumscribed) is enshrined in the European Convention on Human Rights art.2:

“(1) Everyone’s right to life shall be protected by law. No-one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

(2) Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:

(a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;

(b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained.”¹⁹⁸

There are a number of preliminary points that need to be discussed here. First, the European Convention on Human Rights art.2 refers to the “intentional” taking of life only. It has been argued that this means that the action must be taken with the “purpose” of killing and “that a person acting in order to defend themselves or others is not acting for the purpose of killing”.¹⁹⁹

However, this view was rejected in R. (Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London where it was held that the protection of art.2 is available in respect of unintentional as well as intentional deaths.²⁰⁰

4–088

Secondly, despite art.2 referring to the protection and deprivation of life, it may also apply in cases where the actor intends to deprive life in self-defence but does not actually cause death. In Davis,²⁰¹ where a police officer shot the claimant, seriously (but not fatally) injuring him, the court held that the shooting itself did not amount to a breach of ECHR art.2 because it had been carried out with the honest and reasonable belief that the police officer was about to be shot.²⁰²

Thirdly, it has also been argued that ECHR art.2 will be confined to cases involving agents of the state but Bennett rejects the idea that a different test should be applied in the case of state officials, such as police officers, to that applicable in general to the issue of self-defence.²⁰³ However, Foster and Leigh have noted that “in Collins, the court made it clear that in cases involving private individuals the duty of the state under art.2(1) is more circumscribed and that the framework obligation is limited by the reluctance of the Court to impose impossible burdens on the state”.²⁰⁴

RICHARD BUXTON, THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT AND THE SUBSTANTIVE
CRIMINAL LAW [2000] CRIM. L.R.
331, 337–338:

4–089

“[U]nder Article 2 the subject has a right to have his life protected by the state. That obligation on the state’s part is most clearly broken if ... the killing is by state agents; or possibly where state agents culpably fail to enforce protective measures. But where ... one citizen simply and unpredictably attacks another, the state, the respondent under Article 2, is only engaged if the system created by the state is inadequate to provide the system with protection. [I]t seems almost inconceivable that ... [the European] Court would hold that the English legal system, including the English law of self-defence, does not give adequate protection to Englishmen against the prospect of being killed by other Englishmen; and even more inconceivable that an English tribunal would feel confident enough to say that that would be the opinion of the Strasbourg Court were the issue to be considered by it.”

4-090

However, the system of English law has been found wanting in relation to protecting children against excessive physical punishment²⁰⁵ and one cannot always confidently predict, therefore, that the law of self-defence between citizens will be safe from challenge.²⁰⁶

Finally, the ECHR art.2 only permits a killing to protect oneself or others against “unlawful violence”. This now also extends to “householder cases”. In the recent case of Collins, involving serious injury to a trespasser who was held in a headlock by the homeowner, the High Court was required to determine whether s.76(5A) was compatible with art.2. The court held that the criminal law in householder cases did in fact fulfil the framework obligation under art.2.²⁰⁷

Despite this myriad of issues, it is now clear that a state actor or private individual may use force which is no more than absolutely necessary. In determining whether force is necessary or not a number of issues and questions can arise. It is to these question that we now turn.

3. The necessity for any defensive action

4-091

It is quite clear that the person seeking to rely upon the defence must believe her action to be necessary; if she is, in reality, the aggressor seeking to disguise his status behind a smokescreen of self-defence, the defence will not apply to him.²⁰⁸ However, this does not mean that an initial aggressor is unable to rely on the defence if, during an altercation, the “tables have been turned”.

R. v KEANE [2010] EWCA CRIM 2514
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION):

The appellant was convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20. After a night out in several pubs the defendant was offered a lift home by three others he had met in one of the pubs. While stopping at a petrol station an argument broke out between the defendant and one of the other passengers, during which the defendant pushed the other passenger to the ground outside the car. The driver, having been inside the petrol station during this altercation, then returned to the car. After several words were spoken between him and the defendant, the defendant punched the driver hard in the face causing him to fall to the floor, hitting the back of his head heavily on the ground.

HUGHES LJ:

“[17]... it is certainly true that it is not the law that the fact that a defendant either started the fight or entered it willingly is always and inevitably a bar to self-defence arising. The law is as stated by Lord Hope, then the Lord Justice General, in the Scottish case of Burns 1995 S.L.T. 1090 at 1093H. The Lord Justice General said this:

‘it is now clear that the propositions in Hume and Macdonald that the accused must not have started the trouble, or provoked the quarrel, are stated too broadly. It is not accurate to say that a person who kills someone in a quarrel which he himself started, by provoking it or entering into it willingly, cannot plead self defence if his victim then retaliates. The question whether the plea of self defence is available depends, in a case of that kind, on whether the retaliation is such that the accused is entitled then to defend himself. That depends upon whether the violence offered by the victim was so out of proportion to the accused’s own actings as to give rise to the reasonable apprehension that he was in an immediate danger from which he had no other means of escape, and whether the violence which he then used was no more than was necessary to preserve his own life or protect himself from serious injury.’

[18] As to its practical application, we would commend attention to the recent decision of this court in Harvey [2009] EWCA Crim 469, which judgment we shall append to the present judgment. We venture to suggest that practitioners will gain a good deal of help from Moses LJ’s treatment in Harvey of the proper approach to cases when self-defence arises. In that case the court considered a direction given by the judge inviting the jury to consider whether 'the tables had been turned'. It seems to us that that kind of homely expression, like 'the roles being reversed', can quite well encapsulate the question which may arise if an original aggressor claims the ability to rely on self-defence. We would commend it as suitable for a great many cases, subject only to this reminder. Lord Hope's formulation of the rule makes it clear that it is not enough to bring self-defence into issue that a defendant who started the fight is at some point during the fight for the time being getting the worst of it, merely because the victim is defending himself reasonably. In that event there has been no disproportionate act by the victim of the kind that Lord Hope is contemplating. The victim has not been turned into the aggressor. The tables have not been turned in that particular sense. The roles have not been reversed.

[19] Thirdly, however, in the present case the central proposition advanced on behalf of this defendant contains a fundamental flaw. It may well be true that if D provokes V to hit him, and succeeds so that V gives way to the invitation, V is acting unlawfully when he does so. It does not however follow that D thereby becomes entitled to rely on self-defence. There are many situations where two people are fighting and both are acting unlawfully, by which we mean other than in self-defence. It is true of every voluntary fight, challenge laid down and accepted. It is true of most fights in which one person deliberately incites and the other cheerfully responds with an unlawful use of force. We need to say as clearly as we may that it is not the law that if a defendant sets out to provoke another to punch him and succeeds, the defendant is then entitled to punch the other person. What that would do would be to legalise the common coin of the bully who confronts his victim with taunts which are deliberately designed to provide an excuse to hit him. The reason why it is not the law is that underlying the law of self-defence is the common sense morality that what is not unlawful is force which is reasonably necessary. The force used by the bully in the situation postulated is not reasonably necessary. On the contrary, it has been engineered entirely unreasonably by the defendant. Exactly the same point emerges clearly from Lord Hope's formulation in Burns. In the situation postulated there has been no disproportionate reaction from the victim which removes from the defendant the quality of the aggressor and reverses the roles. Of course it might be different if the defendant set out to provoke a punch and the victim unexpectedly and disproportionately attacked him with a knife. That is not the case that we are considering.”

Appeal dismissed

(i) Honest belief that force is necessary

4-093

What is the position if the response is not in fact necessary, but the defendant genuinely believes it is (because, say, he mistakenly believes he is about to be attacked)? It used to be thought that such a defendant would only escape liability if his mistake was a reasonable one.²⁰⁹ In Williams (Gladstone),²¹⁰ however, it was held by the Court of Appeal that the defendant’s mistake need not be reasonable. Instead, he had to be judged according to his view of the facts.²¹¹ In Oatridge, the Court of Appeal concluded that the defendant, who had been abused by her partner on previous occasions, was entitled to have her mistaken view of the incident, which led to her fatally stabbing him, considered by the jury:

“[T]he possibility of the appellant honestly believing that on this occasion the victim really was going to do what he had previously threatened—even if this was not in fact what he was going to do—was not so fanciful as to require its exclusion.”²¹²

The Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 confirms the common law in this regard.²¹³

As has already been noted, self-defence is regarded as a justificatory defence. This, however, can only be the case where the defendant is actually acting in self-defence. Where he has made a mistake and is, therefore, attacking the interests of an innocent party, his actions cannot be justified as not involving any wrongdoing. But in these cases, the law has decided that such a mistake negates blameworthiness and excuses the defendant from blame.²¹⁴ This whole approach of excusing all honest mistakes, even if unreasonable, is highly questionable. Suppose two police officers see a man in a car. They think he is a dangerous, wanted criminal. They stop the car to arrest the man. Genuinely believing him to be a violent criminal who would shoot them to effect an escape, they beat him nearly to death with their guns. It transpires that the victim is a completely innocent man. According to Williams (Gladstone) and s.76(3), the actions of the police officers must be judged according to their view of the facts. On that basis, assuming their response was not excessive, they will escape all liability.²¹⁵ That is because the officers thought force was necessary. Now, if their mistake was a reasonable one—i.e. if the facts were such that all reasonable police officers would similarly have thought that the man in the car was the wanted criminal and that it was necessary to use force against him—we have sympathy with the police officers' actions and would wish to exempt them from blame and criminal liability (leaving aside, for the moment, the issue of whether their response might have been excessive). However, if their mistake was an unreasonable one—if there were no reasonable grounds for thinking that the man was the wanted criminal or that he would attack them—then, surely, our response is entirely different. We are now appalled at the enormity of their error. We blame the police officers for making such an unreasonable mistake—and blame them to an extent that we feel they should be made criminally accountable for their actions. In other words, the former requirement that the defendant's mistake had to be based on reasonable grounds not only mitigated the practical difficulty of proving whether the defendant actually held the belief or not, but also reflected a more fundamental attitude towards the determination of culpability.

4-094

It is in this context that the European Convention on Human Rights art.2 may come into play. There have been a number of decisions in which the European Court of Human Rights has held that in determining whether the killing was “absolutely necessary” the honest beliefs of the defenders must be based on “good reason”.²¹⁶ In Bubbins v United Kingdom,²¹⁷ it was stated that the defendant must have an “honest belief, for good reason”. However, having said this, the court then devoted much of its judgment to emphasising the actual belief of the police at the time the victim was shot. In Davis,²¹⁸ a police officer believing D had a pistol shot and seriously injured him. The officer had been told (erroneously) that the claimant was carrying a gun and that he had already fired at the police while committing another offence. D sued the Metropolitan Police Service arguing that they had been negligent in shooting him and that they had breached his right to life under art.2. The court held that despite the erroneous information, the officer had honestly and reasonably believed that he was about to be shot, and therefore the shooting did not amount to a breach of the claimant's right to life under art.2. Although negligence on the part of the officer could be relevant to a claim under art.2, the court determined that there had been no material negligence either in the actual shooting or in the planning of the operation.²¹⁹

However, arguing that the approach taken in Williams (Gladstone) is misconceived does not necessarily mean that the old reasonableness test should simply be resurrected. If the assessment of reasonableness is based upon typical male responses to violence, then change is necessary. What is needed is a test that is capable of taking into account the characteristics of the defender, including, for example, prior history. The question ought to be whether it was reasonable for that person to have used such force in that situation. This will be considered further in the context of the next issue. In the meantime, as a result of Williams (Gladstone) as codified, we are unable to distinguish between those who, when every consideration has been taken of the anguish of the situation, are still blameworthy and those whom we would wish to excuse. In other words, as long as the belief that force is needed is an honest one, it matters not that other reasonable people would not have considered force necessary.²²⁰

4. The amount of responsive force must be reasonable in the circumstances

4-095

It has long been accepted that the defender may only use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances. The general rule is that the response must be proportionate to the attack. A person acting to repel an unlawful attack is, at the same time as trying to protect himself or others, usually also acting to prevent a crime. This latter situation was put on a statutory basis by the following provision.

CRIMINAL LAW ACT 1967 s.3

4-096

“3.—(1) A person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime,²²¹ or in effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of offenders or suspected offenders or of persons unlawfully at large.

(2) Subsection (1) above shall replace the rules of the common law on the question when force used for a purpose mentioned in the subsection is justified by that purpose.”

Both s.3 and the common law rules relating to defensive force now have to be read in the light of s.76.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND IMMIGRATION ACT 2008 s.76

4-097

“76 Reasonable force for purposes of self-defence etc.

(1) This section applies where in proceedings for an offence

—

- (a) an issue arises as to whether a person charged with the offence (“D”) is entitled to rely on a defence within subsection (2), and
- (b) the question arises whether the degree of force used by D against a person (“V”) was reasonable in the circumstances.

(2) The defences are—

- (a) the common law defence of self-defence;
- (aa) the common law defence of defence of property; and
- (b) the defences provided by section 3(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 (c. 58) or section 3(1) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 (c. 18 (N.I.)) (use of force in prevention of crime or making arrest).

- (3) The question whether the degree of force used by D was reasonable in the circumstances is to be decided by reference to the circumstances as D believed them to be, and subsections (4) to (8) also apply in connection with deciding that question.
- (4) If D claims to have held a particular belief as regards the existence of any circumstances—
 - (a) the reasonableness or otherwise of that belief is relevant to the question whether D genuinely held it; but
 - (b) if it is determined that D did genuinely hold it, D is entitled to rely on it for the purposes of subsection (3), whether or not—
 - (i) it was mistaken, or
 - (ii) (if it was mistaken) the mistake was a reasonable one to have made.
- (5) But subsection (4)(b) does not enable D to rely on any mistaken belief attributable to intoxication that was voluntarily induced.
- (5A) In a householder case, the degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was grossly disproportionate in those circumstances.
- (6) In a case other than a householder case, the degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was disproportionate in those circumstances.
- (6A) In deciding the question mentioned in subsection (3), a possibility that D could have retreated is to be considered (so far as relevant) as a factor to be taken into account, rather than as giving rise to a duty to retreat.
- (7) In deciding the question mentioned in subsection (3) the following considerations are to be taken into account (so far as relevant in the circumstances of the case)—

(a) that a person acting for a legitimate purpose may not be able to weigh to a nicety the exact measure of any necessary action; and

(b) that evidence of a person's having only done what the person honestly and instinctively thought was necessary for a legitimate purpose constitutes strong evidence that only reasonable action was taken by that person for that purpose.

(8) Subsections (6A) and (7) are not to be read as preventing other matters from being taken into account where they are relevant to deciding the question mentioned in subsection (3).

(8A) For the purposes of this section “a householder case” is a case where—

(a) the defence concerned is the common law defence of self-defence,

(b) the force concerned is force used by D while in or partly in a building, or part of a building, that is a dwelling or is forces accommodation (or is both),

(c) D is not a trespasser at the time the force is used, and

(d) at that time D believed V to be in, or entering, the building or part as a trespasser.

(8B) Where—

(a) a part of a building is a dwelling where D dwells,

(b) another part of the building is a place of work for D or another person who dwells in the first part, and

(c) that other part is internally accessible from the first part, that other part, and any internal means of access between the two parts, are each treated for the purposes of subsection (8A) as a part of a building that is a dwelling.

(8C) Where—

- (a) a part of a building is forces accommodation that is living or sleeping accommodation for D,
- (b) another part of the building is a place of work for D or another person for whom the first part is living or sleeping accommodation, and
- (c) that other part is internally accessible from the first part, that other part, and any internal means of access between the two parts, are each treated for the purposes of subsection (8A) as a part of a building that is forces accommodation.

(8D) Subsections (4) and (5) apply for the purposes of subsection (8A)(d) as they apply for the purposes of subsection (3).

(8E) The fact that a person derives title from a trespasser, or has the permission of a trespasser, does not prevent the person from being a trespasser for the purposes of subsection (8A).

(8F) In subsections (8A) to (8C)—

“building” includes a vehicle or vessel, and

“forces accommodation” means service living accommodation for the purposes of Part 3 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 by virtue of section 96(1)(a) or (b) of that Act.

(9) This section, except so far as making different provision for householder cases, is intended to clarify the operation of the existing defences mentioned in subsection (2).

(10) In this section—

(a) “legitimate purpose” means—

(i) the purpose of self-defence under the common law,

(ia) the purpose of defence of property under the common law, or

(ii) the prevention of crime or effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of persons mentioned in the provisions referred to in subsection (2)(b);

(b) references to self-defence include acting in defence of another person; and

(c) references to the degree of force used are to the type and amount of force used.”²²²

(i) Non-householder cases

4-099

What is meant by the words “reasonable” and “disproportionate” force under s.76? English law used to insist on a fairly rigorous and objective test of reasonableness. Such an approach can be supported when one recalls that necessary defence amounts to a justification:

“[C]haracterizing self-defence as justification ... involves finding that the attacker’s life has become of less value to society than the life of the person attacked. To reach this difficult conclusion, the law must make the self-defence elements strict enough to ensure that the attacker was really the more culpable party and that there was really no reasonable alternative to killing him.”²²³

However, over the past 30 years or so, English cases have increasingly favoured the interests of the defender.

RE ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF NORTHERN IRELAND’S REFERENCE (NO.1 OF 1975) [1977] A.C. 105 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-100

The reference arose from a case in which a soldier had been charged with murder for shooting and killing someone whom he had mistakenly thought to be a member of the IRA.

LORD DIPLOCK:

“What amount of force is ‘reasonable in the circumstances’ for the purpose of preventing crime is, in my view, always a question for the jury in a jury trial, never a ‘point of law’ for the judge ...

The jury would also have to consider how the circumstances in which the accused had to make his decision whether or not to use force and the shortness of the time available to him for reflection, might affect the judgment of a reasonable man ... [The jury] should remind themselves that the postulated balancing of risk against risk, harm against harm, by the reasonable man is not undertaken in the calm analytical atmosphere of the court-room after counsel with the benefit of hindsight have expounded at length the reasons for and against the kind of degree of force that was used by the accused; but in the brief second or two which the accused had to decide whether to shoot or not and under all the stresses to which he was exposed ...

On the facts that are to be assumed for the purposes of the reference the only options open to the accused were either to let the deceased escape or to shoot at him with a service rifle. A reasonable man would know that a bullet from a self-loading rifle if it hit a human being, at any rate at the range at which the accused fired, would be likely to kill him or injure him seriously. So in one scale of the balance the harm to which the deceased would be exposed if the accused aimed to hit him was predictable and grave and the risk of its occurrence high. In the other scale of the balance it would be open to the jury to take the view that it would not be unreasonable to assess the level of harm to be averted by preventing the accused's escape as even graver—the killing or wounding of members of the patrol by terrorists in ambush and the effect of this success by members of the Provisional IRA in encouraging the continuance of the armed insurrection and all the misery and destruction of life and property that terrorist activity in Northern Ireland has entailed. The jury would have to consider too what was the highest degree at which a reasonable man could have assessed the likelihood that such consequences might follow the escape of the deceased if the facts had been as the accused knew or believed them reasonably to be.”

Decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal of Northern Ireland varied

PALMER V THE QUEEN [1971] A.C. 814 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

4-101

The appellant, who carried a gun, went with other men to buy ganja.

During a dispute, they left with the ganja without paying; during the following chase one of the pursuers was shot by the appellant, who was charged and convicted of murder, although he had claimed self-defence.

LORD MORRIS:

“In their Lordships’ view the defence of self-defence is one which can be and will be readily understood by any jury. It is a straightforward conception. It involves no obtuse legal thought ... only common sense is needed for its understanding. It is both good law and good sense that a man who is attacked may defend himself. It is both good law and good sense that he may do, but may only do what is reasonably necessary. But everything will depend upon the particular facts and circumstances. Of these a jury can decide. It may in some cases be only sensible and clearly possible to take some simple avoiding action. Some attacks may be serious and dangerous. Others may not be. If there is some relatively minor attack it would not be common sense to permit some action of retaliation which was wholly out of proportion to the necessities of the situation. If an attack is serious so that it puts someone in immediate peril then immediate defensive action may be necessary ... If the attack is all over and no sort of peril remains then the employment of force may be by way of revenge or punishment or by way of paying off an old score or may be pure aggression. There may no longer be any link with a necessity of defence. Of all these matters the good sense of the jury will be the arbiter ... If there has been an attack so that defence is reasonably necessary, it will be recognised that a person defending himself cannot weigh to a nicety the exact measure of his necessary defensive action. If a jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary that would be most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken. A jury will be told that the defence of self-defence, where the evidence makes the raising possible, will only fail if the prosecution show beyond doubt that what the accused did was not by way of self-defence.”

Appeal dismissed

Shannon,²²⁴ *Whyte*²²⁵ and *Scarlett*²²⁶ appeared increasingly to be abandoning the objective requirement. As long as the defendants thought that they were using an appropriate amount of force, it seemed there could be no conviction. This dramatic change of approach was entirely too crude and could have led to the result that the more habituated the defendant was to violence, the more retaliatory force they were allowed to use. The Court of Appeal finally halted the trend towards a completely subjective test.

R. v OWINO [1996] 2 CR. APP. R. 128
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-103

The defendant was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm upon his wife. He claimed that the injuries had been caused when he had acted defensively to stop her assaulting him. He was convicted and appealed on the ground (inter alia) that the jury had not been properly directed on the issue of self-defence.

COLLINS J:

“The essential elements of self-defence are clear enough. The jury have to decide whether a defendant honestly believed that the circumstances were such as required him to use force to defend himself from an attack or threatened attack. In this respect a defendant must be judged in accordance with his honest belief, even though that belief may have been mistaken. But the jury must then decide whether the force used was reasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be ...

What ... [Beldam LJ in Scarlett] was not saying, in our view (and indeed if he had said it, it would be contrary to authority) was that the belief, however ill-founded, of the defendant that the degree of force he was using was reasonable, will enable him to do what he did ... [I]f that argument was correct, then it would justify, for example, the shooting of someone who was merely threatening to throw a punch, on the basis that the defendant honestly believed, although unreasonably and mistakenly, that it was justifiable for him to use that degree of force. That clearly is not, and cannot be, the law.”

Appeal dismissed

This was an important clarification of the law which quite properly discarded any suggestion of an entirely subjective test.²²⁷ The initial aggressor, in making the attack, is culpable and deserves to forfeit some of his rights but he does not sacrifice every right. Allowing unreasonable retaliatory force to constitute a justification would be, in effect, to endorse it.

The requirement that the degree of force used by the defendant must be proportionate (i.e. reasonable) is an important element of self-defence. It means that English law appears to have done enough to avoid problems with the European Convention on Human Rights art.2. Article 2 states that fatal force may be used only if “absolutely necessary”. In practice, the European Court of Human Rights has looked for a “strictly proportionate” response although there has been a degree of flexibility in interpreting this.²²⁸ In R. (Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London, it was held that the English reasonableness test is compatible with art.2:

“If any police officer reasonably decides that he must use lethal force, it will inevitably be because it is absolutely necessary to do so. To kill when it is not absolutely necessary to do so is surely to act unreasonably.”²²⁹

It was accepted in this case that allowances must be made for the fact that decisions to use defensive force may be made in the heat of the moment under extraordinary pressure. Section 76 provides several times that the defensive force must be “reasonable in the circumstances” (s.76(1)(b), (3), (6)). This is defined in s.76(6) as “not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was disproportionate in those circumstances”. Drawing on the precise wording in Palmer, s.76(7) states that account should be taken of the fact that the defendant may not be able “to weigh to a nicety” the amount of defensive force to use and that “the evidence of a person’s having only done what the person honestly and instinctively thought was necessary for a legitimate purpose constitutes strong evidence²³⁰ that only reasonable action was taken by that person for that purpose”.²³¹ This second formulation is problematic. As Dennis has commented:

“What is the significance of ‘strong evidence’? Does it create some kind of presumption of reasonableness? And suppose the defendant’s action was not instinctive, but a considered response to a situation justifying the use of force, as it might be in some cases of military or police operations—is this no longer a case of being strong evidence of reasonableness?”²³²

Rather than clarifying the operation of the common law, therefore, s.76 creates potential problems. However, one thing seems clear. Despite the insistence in s.76 that the defensive action be “reasonable in the circumstances”, that action need not actually be objectively reasonable. Whether it is “reasonable” will be influenced by the defendant’s perception of the situation. The more one moves away from an objective standard of proportionality, the more self-defence ceases to have features of a justificatory defence and takes on attributes of an excusatory defence.²³³

(ii) Householder cases

4–105

In Martin,²³⁴ the defendant was convicted of murder having shot a teenage burglar who broke into his isolated Norfolk farmhouse. This case attracted considerable publicity, much of it sympathetic to the defendant.²³⁵ The difficulty is that, for many persons, such a degree of force is the only method by which they can protect their property. If they are not permitted to use such force, they are in effect condemned to forfeiting their property and having to rely on subsequent legal remedies for redress—remedies that will often be useless. However, one might consider that the alternative is even worse. Are we to allow persons to go round inflicting death or severe personal injuries on others merely in defence of property? This seems to be the view upheld by the European Convention on Human Rights art.2. Fatal force may be used if “absolutely necessary”, but only in response to “unlawful violence”. In Faraj, it was held that if the defendant believes that the only threat is to his property rather than the person, reasonable force may be used to detain the intruder but no aggressive force is permitted.²³⁶

However, this can no longer be said to be true for householder cases. Changes made to s.76 in 2013 mean that cases involving trespassers in the home should now be treated differently to other cases of self-defence. Section 76(5A) states:

“In a householder case, the degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was grossly disproportionate in those circumstances.”

This is to be contrasted with s.76(6) which states:

“In a case other than a householder case, the degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was disproportionate in those circumstances.”

This now means that there are two separate tests for what is “reasonable” and “proportionate” in cases involving self-defence and defence of property. It is difficult to justify such a stark divergence in approach to these discrete forms of self-defence. As the court noted in Bennett (already outlined above), “[t]o kill when it is not absolutely necessary to do so is surely to act unreasonably”. How then can killing in protection of one’s property, in circumstances when the force used is disproportionate, ever be justified on the basis of reasonableness? During the second reading speech for the Crime and Courts Bill, the Secretary of State for the Home Department explained the reasoning for new provisions:

“The Bill ... delivers on our coalition commitment to ensure that the law is on the side of people who defend themselves when confronted by an intruder in their home. Few situations can be more frightening than when someone’s own home is violated. Faced with that scenario, a person will do what it takes to protect themselves and their loved ones. They cannot be expected dispassionately to weigh up the niceties of whether the level of force they are using is proportionate in the circumstances. If the intruder is injured, perhaps seriously, in such an encounter, the householder should not automatically be treated as the perpetrator where, with hindsight, the force used is considered to have been disproportionate. Clause 30 will ensure that, in such a context, the use of disproportionate force can be regarded as reasonable, while continuing to rule out the use of grossly disproportionate force.”²³⁷

R. (COLLINS) V SECRETARY OF STATE
FOR JUSTICE [2016] Q.B. 862
(DIVISIONAL COURT)

4–106

In Collins, the claimant, a trespasser in a house in the early hours of the morning, was restrained by one of the householders who held him in a headlock. This caused the claimant serious personal injury. Following a police investigation, the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) decided not to prosecute the householder based on a determination made by a specialist prosecutor that the force used must have been grossly disproportionate for it to be considered unreasonable under the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(5A). The claimant sought judicial review by way of a declaration that s.76(5A) was incompatible with the right to life guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms art.2.

SIR BRIAN LEVESON:

“16 I start ... with the true meaning of section 76(5A) of the 2008 Act, as amended. Mr Bowen argues that the provision alters the common law so that, in householder cases, the test of what is unreasonable in the circumstances (as the defendant believed them to be) is whether the degree of force was grossly disproportionate. Thus, a householder who uses disproportionate, but not grossly disproportionate force, can avail himself of the defence or, in the context of the analysis in this case, there will be no reasonable prospect of conviction unless there is material to the appropriate evidential standard upon which the jury can conclude that the force used was grossly disproportionate. In that regard, Mr Bowen submits that the CPS reviewing lawyer was correct to proceed on the premise that the use of disproportionate force would not be unlawful.

17 Ms Clare Montgomery (for the Secretary of State) rejects this analysis of the legislation. She argues that, on its true construction, the effect of section 76(3) (5A) does not preclude a householder being regarded as having acted unreasonably where the degree of force used was disproportionate. In reality, section 76(5A) says nothing about the bearing of the proportionality of the degree of force used by a householder in the circumstances (as he believed them to be) on its reasonableness, except for excluding the possibility of a grossly disproportionate degree of force being reasonable.

18 For my part, I have no doubt that Ms Montgomery is correct. It is clear from the section that section 76(3) adopts and preserves the second limb of self-defence at common law. As it has been for many years, the central question (and the standard) remains whether the degree of force that a defendant used was 'reasonable in the circumstances as the defendant believed them to be'. The standard remains that which is reasonable: the other provisions (and, in particular, section 76(5A)(6) of the 2008 Act) provide the context in which the question of what is reasonable must be approached. The test in the statute is not whether the force used was proportionate, disproportionate or grossly disproportionate.

19 The operation of section 76(5A) automatically excludes a degree of force which is grossly disproportionate from being reasonable in householder cases. If the degree of force was not grossly disproportionate, section 76(5A) does not prevent that degree of force from being considered reasonable within the meaning of the second self-defence limb. On the other hand, it does not direct that any degree of force less than grossly disproportionate is reasonable. Whether it was or was not reasonable will depend on the particular facts and circumstances of the case.

20 Thus, section 76(5A), read together with section 76(3) and the common law on self-defence, requires two separate questions to be put to the jury in a householder case. Presuming that the defendant genuinely believed that it was necessary to use force to defend himself, these are:

- (i) Was the degree of force the defendant used grossly disproportionate in the circumstances as he believed them to be? If the answer is 'yes', he cannot avail himself of self-defence. If 'no', then;
- (ii) Was the degree of force the defendant used nevertheless reasonable in the circumstances he believed them to be?

If it was reasonable, he has a defence. If it was unreasonable, he does not.

22 On the plain words of section 76, a jury should consider these two questions disjunctively. The answer to the first question does not provide the answer to the second question ...

23 The effect, and no doubt purpose, of section 76(5A) is to allow for a discretionary area of judgment in householder cases, with a different emphasis to that which applies in other cases. The obvious example concerns the extent to which it is appropriate to take into account the duty to retreat (which, by section 76(6A) remains a factor to be taken into account). In a householder case, the failure to do so and, thus, the use of force, may be disproportionate but still reasonable although in a non-householder case, that would be unreasonable by virtue of section 76(6) ...

33 To summarise, on a proper construction of section 76(5A), its true meaning and effect is: (i) whether the degree of force used in any case is reasonable is to be considered by reference to the circumstances as the defendant believed them to be (the common law and section 76(3)); (ii) a householder is not regarded as having acted reasonably in the circumstances if the degree of force used was grossly disproportionate (section 76(5A)); (iii) a degree of force that went completely over the top prima facie would be grossly disproportionate; (iv) however, a householder may or may not be regarded as having acted reasonably in the circumstances if the degree of force used was disproportionate.”

Application dismissed

4-107

The decision in Collins is a refinement of the common law of self-defence. What is considered to be “reasonable” depends, not on whether it was proportionate or disproportionate,²³⁸ but instead on the circumstances as they appear to the householder. Consideration is given to the fact that householders may not be able to weigh to a nicety the exact measure of any necessary action, based partly on the fact that there is less opportunity for them to retreat. Hence, what might be considered to be an objectively disproportionate response may still be considered to be reasonable based on relevant contextual factors that are pertinent to invasions of the home. The court was clear in rejecting the CPS' interpretation that s.75(5A) meant that any force less than grossly disproportionate should be considered as reasonable. The court's approach provides for some flexibility in law by ensuring that householders are not held to the same standards as non-householders, while also allowing juries to determine whether a disproportionate response is reasonable or not based on the circumstances and context of any given case. While this more nuanced approach to interpreting reasonable force is preferable to the CPS' original position, it is questionable whether this reflects the original intention of Parliament.²³⁹ Some further judicial or legislative clarification may therefore be required.

(iii) Defendant characteristics and the perception of danger

4-108

Section 76 has nothing specific to say about the degree of force that may be used by a householder or non-householder—nor, as we shall see, about the issues of pre-emptive force nor imminence. Further, it has failed to offer a solution to an issue that has beset the common law: how should the law respond when a defendant's perception of the danger he faces is distorted by a mental characteristic that he possesses? We shall see later that in relation to both the defence of duress and the common law of provocation the law has struggled to find an appropriate response. The following case grappled with the question of which characteristics may be taken into account when assessing the reasonableness of the defendant's response when the plea is one of self-defence.

R. v MARTIN [2002] 2 W.L.R. 1 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-109

The defendant shot and killed a burglar and was convicted of murder.

On appeal, new medical evidence was accepted that he was suffering from a paranoid personality disorder that would have made him perceive a much greater danger to his physical safety than the average person.

LORD WOOLF CJ:

“[It has been accepted in the law of provocation that the jury is] entitled to take into account some characteristic, whether temporary or permanent, which affected the degree of control which society could reasonably expect of a defendant and which it would be unjust not to take into account.

Is the same approach appropriate in the case of self-defence? There are policy reasons for distinguishing provocation from self-defence. Provocation only applies to murder but self-defence applies to all assaults. In addition, provocation does not provide a complete defence; it only reduces the offence from murder to manslaughter. There is also the undoubted fact that self-defence is raised in a great many cases resulting from minor assaults and it would be wholly disproportionate to encourage medical disputes in cases of that sort ... As a matter of principle we would reject the suggestion that the approach of the majority in Smith in relation to provocation should be applied directly to the different issue of self-defence.

We would accept that the jury are entitled to take into account in relation to self-defence the physical characteristics of the defendant. However, we would not agree that it is appropriate, except in exceptional circumstances which would make the evidence especially probative, in deciding whether excessive force has been used to take into account whether the defendant is suffering from some psychiatric condition.”

Verdict of manslaughter by reason of diminished responsibility substituted

4-110

Leaving aside the obvious absurdity of the view that medical evidence would be inappropriate in a “great many cases resulting from minor assaults” (which is tantamount to asserting that injustice is acceptable if the crime is a minor one), this approach can be supported. Unlike duress, for example, which is an excuse, self-defence provides a justification and so there is good reason to insist that the defendant's response be reasonable without account being taken of individual characteristics.

In the case of Oye,²⁴⁰ the defendant had punched police officers believing they were evil spirits rushing him. There was psychiatric evidence before the jury at the Crown Court that the defendant was insane at the applicable time. The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that the judge had failed adequately to address the issue of self-defence based on the fact that an insanely held delusion on the defendant's part that he was being attacked, causing him to respond violently, had entitled him to be acquitted on the basis of reasonable self-defence. The court held that the defendant could not rely on his delusional belief to support a claim that he had used reasonable force in self-defence because "[a]n insane person cannot set the standards of reasonableness as to the degree of force used by reference to his own insanity".²⁴¹ If such a claim was to succeed it would have "most disconcerting" implications as "[i]t could mean that the more insanely deluded a person may be in using violence in purported self-defence the more likely that an entire acquittal may result".²⁴²

5. The duty to retreat

4-111

It should by now be clear that defensive action should only be used if "absolutely necessary" and that any defensive force used to repel an attack must be reasonable. What, though, if the person under an attack has an opportunity to escape by retreating? Should such an opportunity mean that defensive force is unnecessary and in turn unreasonable?

JOSEPH H. BEALE, "RETREAT FROM A MURDEROUS ASSAULT" (1903) 16
HARV.L.REV. 567, 580-582:

4-112

"The conclusion of the courts which deny the duty to retreat is ..."

commonly rested upon two arguments: that no one can be compelled by a wrongdoer to yield his rights, and that no one should be forced by a wrongdoer to the ignominy, dishonor, and disgrace of a cowardly retreat.

As to the argument of right, the ... law does not ordinarily secure the enjoyment of rights; it grants redress for a violation of rights ...

The argument based upon the honor of the assailed is more elusive and more difficult to answer ... The feeling at the bottom of the argument is one beyond all law; it is the feeling which is responsible for the duel, for war, for lynching; the feeling which leads a jury to acquit the slayer of his wife's paramour; the feeling which would compel a true man to kill the ravisher of his daughter. We have outlived dueling, and we deprecate war and lynching; but it is only because the advance of civilization and culture has led us to control our feelings by our will. And yet in all these cases sober reflection would lead us to realize that the remedy is really worse than the disease. So it is in the case of killing to avoid a stain on one's honor. A really honorable man, a man of truly refined and elevated feeling, would perhaps always regret the apparent cowardice of a retreat, but he would regret ten times more, after the excitement of the contest was past, the thought that he had the blood of a fellowbeing on his hands. It is undoubtedly distasteful to retreat; but it is ten times more distasteful to kill."

4-113

English law used to adopt a strict approach that a "retreat to the wall" was required before extreme force could be justified.²⁴³ Since then, however, there has been considerable amelioration of the rule. In Julien, the law was stated thus:

"It is not, as we understand it, the law that a person threatened must take to his heels and run in the dramatic way suggested ... but what is necessary is that he should demonstrate by his actions that he does not want to fight. He must demonstrate that he is prepared to temporise and disengage and perhaps to make some physical withdrawal; and to the extent that that is necessary as a feature of the justification of self-defence, it is true, in our opinion, whether the charge is a homicide charge or something less serious."²⁴⁴

In McInnes,²⁴⁵ this was accepted as an accurate statement of the law but Edmund-Davies LJ added that a failure to retreat is only one of the factors to be taken into account in determining the reasonableness of the defendant's conduct. This approach was confirmed in the case of *Bird*²⁴⁶ and has now been adopted within s.76(6A), which states "[i]n deciding the question mentioned in subsection (3), a possibility that D could have retreated is to be considered (so far as relevant) as a factor to be taken into account, rather than as giving rise to a duty to retreat". This may militate against a woman who fails to leave a repeatedly violent partner being able to plead self-defence.

KATHERINE O'DONOVAN, "DEFENCES FOR BATTERED WOMEN WHO KILL"
(1991) 18 J. LAW AND SOCIETY 219, 222, 235:

4-114

"Despite the abolition of the duty to retreat, retreat might be considered an appropriate response. In the context of killing following prolonged domestic violence the questions look rather different. There may be a history of previous retreat which, as it were, has not worked. How relevant is the previous relationship of those involved, the lack of a safe place to go, the ideology of family privacy, the presence of children? ... leaving without one's children may seem a frightening prospect. But women's own accounts reveal emotionalities to the abuser which increase the difficulty of leaving. If the legal process is to come to terms with this it will have to accept that for many women connection to others is important. In other words, women's ways of looking at relationships will have to be valued equally with those of men.'

6. The imminence of the threatened attack

4-115

In Western films, the two protagonists tend to stand at opposite ends of a dusty street, each with his fingers hovering near his holster ready to draw and fire. In such films (apart from the occasional good one) the “baddie” will draw first; the “goodie” will then follow suit; he will inevitably be the quicker on the draw and the “baddie” will be killed. The film will then end with the “goodie” looking brave and honourable. The “baddie” drew first. The “goodie” was thus fully justified in acting in self-defence.

In such an example the threat is clearly imminent. But what is the case where the time between the threat and defensive action is drawn out? Section 76 is silent on the meaning of “imminence”. In Hichens, Lord Gross simply notes:

“Plainly both the common law and statutory defences have greater scope for operation where it is certain or nearly certain that a crime will be committed immediately if action is not taken. Conversely, the lower the degree of likelihood of a crime being committed and the greater the time between awareness of the risk and the time when the crime might be committed, so the scope for any defence to have any realistic prospect of success will be correspondingly reduced, even recognising, as we of course do, the subjective element in these defences.”²⁴⁷

Furthermore, what if the “goodie” in our example above is the person to draw first in anticipation that violence will ensue? A plea of anticipatory self-defence would be meaningless in a Hollywood Western. By reaching for his gun first he would have become the aggressor. Life, however, is not lived on a Hollywood film-set and the criminal law has to reflect life as it is and mirror everyday values. Restricting rights of self-defence to purely defensive retaliation could effectively condemn some innocent persons to death or other injury. The problem may be particularly acute where a substantial difference in size and strength exists, as may well be the case when a woman is attacked by a man. In certain limited circumstances the law must permit the right to strike first. As Lord Griffiths said in Beckford, “A man about to be attacked does not have to wait for his assailant to strike the first blow or fire the first shot; circumstances may justify a pre-emptive strike”.²⁴⁸

The problem, however, is in defining the parameters of such a right. Allowing too much anticipatory defensive action could become a charter for vigilantism.

DEVLIN V ARMSTRONG [1971] N.I. 13 (COURT OF APPEAL FOR NORTHERN IRELAND)

4-116

The defendant, during a riot in Londonderry, urged others to build barricades and throw petrol bombs at the police. She was convicted of riotous behaviour and incitement to riotous behaviour. She appealed on the basis that she thought her action necessary to prevent people being assaulted and property damaged by the police.

MACDERMOTT LJ:

“The plea of self-defence may afford a defence where the party raising it uses force, not merely to counter an actual attack, but to ward off or prevent an attack which he has honestly and reasonably anticipated. In that case, however, the anticipated attack must be imminent: see R. v Chisam (1963) 47 Cr.App.R.130 ... and the excerpt from Lord Normand’s judgment in Owens v H.M. Advocate (1946) S.C.(J.) 119 which is there quoted and which runs:

‘In our opinion self-defence is made out when it is established to the satisfaction of the jury that the panel believed that he was in imminent danger and that he held that belief on reasonable grounds. Grounds for such belief may exist though they are founded on a genuine mistake of fact’

However reasonable and convinced the appellant’s apprehensions may have been, I find it impossible to hold that the danger she anticipated was sufficiently specific or imminent to justify the actions she took as measures of self-defence.”

Appeal dismissed

4-117

In Georgiades,²⁴⁹ the defendant was charged with possession of a firearm with intent to endanger life contrary to the Firearms

Act 1968 s.16. Police visited his flat. He came on to the balcony with a loaded shotgun and raised it to waist level before being arrested. He believed he was in danger of being attacked and had not realised his visitors were police officers. On appeal, it was held that self-defence should have been put to the jury. Accordingly, his conviction was set aside and a conviction for possessing a shortened firearm without a licence contrary to the Firearms Act 1968 ss.1 and 4 was substituted.²⁵⁰

MALNIK V DPP [1989] CRIM. L.R. 451 (QUEENS BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

4-118

The appellant, acting as an “adviser” to X went to “visit” one J who was thought to have taken two of X’s valuable cars without authority. As J was known to have a tendency to violent and irresponsible behaviour, the appellant (who was accompanied by three others) armed himself with a rice flail (two pieces of wood joined by a chain which the appellant was capable of using in connection with the martial arts). He was arrested approaching J’s house. He was charged with having an offensive weapon in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse contrary to the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 s.1. The appellant argued that he had a reasonable excuse for having the flail with him, namely, that he had reasonable cause to believe that he was in imminent danger of being subjected to a violent attack. The appellant was convicted and appealed.

It was held:

“dismissing the appeal, the magistrate had correctly concluded that as a matter of law the defence of reasonable excuse was not available to the appellant. The case of Evans v Hughes [in which it was held that there could be a defence to a charge of carrying an offensive weapon if there was ‘an imminent particular threat affecting the particular circumstances in which the weapon was carried’ [1972] 3 All E.R. 412] and R. v Field [one cannot drive people off the streets and compel them not to go to places where they might lawfully be because they might be subjected to an attack there—[1972] Crim.L.R.435] were distinguishable. Ordinarily, individuals could not legitimately arm themselves with an offensive weapon in order to repel unlawful violence which such individual had knowingly and deliberately brought about by creating a situation in which violence was liable to be inflicted. It was quite different where those concerned with security and law enforcement were concerned. If private citizens set out on expeditions such as this, armed with offensive weapons, the risk of unlawful violence and serious injury was great, and obvious. The policy of the law must therefore be against such conduct, which conclusion was consistent with the very narrow limits which previous decisions had imposed on the freedom of the citizen to arm himself against attack. It had been rightly concluded that the risk of violence could have been avoided and thus the need to carry weapons, by inviting the appropriate agency to repossess the cars by the usual means.”

Appeal dismissed

4-119

Subsequently, the courts have emphasised how limited the circumstances are in which the defendant will be able to avoid liability for offences such as possessing a firearm with intent to endanger life: the risk of harm must be imminent.²⁵¹ Thus under the common law the part played by the requirement of imminence was pivotal.

Research into battered women who kill reveals that it is this element that causes most difficulty. In Ewing's study of 100 cases of battered women who killed, he found certain features to be common: years of violence, inadequate help from the community and the police, an inability to leave the situation and a killing that anticipated further violence or followed it, but did not fit the requirement of imminence.²⁵² A number of cases have involved women who have waited until their husbands were asleep before killing them.²⁵³ This removed all possibility of pleading self-defence even though it may have seemed the only way out to the defendants. Other cases have concerned women who have gone to the kitchen to fetch a knife with which to respond to the attack.²⁵⁴ Again, this could remove the possibility of pleading self-defence. Until the recent reforms to the partial defence of provocation, it might also have been deemed to be such “cooling down” time as to remove the possibility of this plea. The new partial defence of loss of control (which replaces provocation) does not contain the requirement that the loss of control be “sudden and temporary” and this means that such defendants may be able to plead either loss of control or diminished responsibility.²⁵⁵

It seems that the time-scale within which pre-emptive defensive action might be taken would be stretched when, as in the above cases, no actual violence had been used. But as Glanville Williams has pointed out:

“[T]here is a distinction between the immediacy of the necessity for acting and the immediacy of the threatened violence. The use of force may be immediately necessary to prevent an attack in the future.”²⁵⁶

Moreover, as has been stated before, in determining the necessity for acting at all, one does not have to jettison the requirement of reasonableness (as Williams (Gladstone) has done) in order to do justice to the differing sizes and strengths of attacker and defender.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee recommended the retention of the imminence rule: “it is desirable to make it clear that a man is not allowed to take the law into his own hands by striking before self-defence becomes necessary”.²⁵⁷ This view was reflected in the Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989.²⁵⁸ However, the Law Commission subsequently concluded that the jury would be able to decide whether the use of pre-emptive force was reasonable without any specific reference to a requirement of imminence.²⁵⁹ Accordingly, no reference was made to it in the Draft Bill. This approach had much to commend it because it raises the possibility, at least, of self-defence being available to battered women who kill. However, this cannot lead to the conclusion that the government adopted the Law Commission’s view. All that s.76 does is to codify the common law, which as we have seen, upholds the requirement of imminence.

7. Excessive self-defence

A successful plea of self-defence justifies the defendant’s conduct and he goes free. Accordingly, despite the potential for s.76 to broaden the defence, the courts are likely to continue to regard it as a rigorous test to satisfy. Where defendants who act in self-defence in public use excessive force the defence fails. Other defendants, such as the battered woman in Ahluwalia, who kill their violent partner while he is asleep, being fearful of violence when he awakes and knowing from past experience that their strength is inadequate to match his, will similarly fail to come within the test.²⁶⁰

This leads to the question, should excessive or premature defensive actions outside the home be regarded as completely unjustified? In terms of assessing their moral culpability, such persons are clearly not on a par with those who cold-bloodedly kill or injure others. Their reasons for acting are understandable. It is only the execution of those actions that is unacceptable. In short, there is a strong case for excusing, or at least partially excusing, such actors. Where the injuries inflicted are short of death, the fact that they were acting in self-defence can be taken into account as a mitigating factor in sentencing. But where they kill, the only verdict is murder with a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment.

In an effort to circumvent such injustice, courts have increasingly allowed such persons to avail themselves of the partial defences to murder. For example, battered women who kill are being afforded defences of diminished responsibility and loss of control which result in manslaughter verdicts. Apart from the fact that these defences do not cover all cases, this whole approach misses the point in fair labelling terms. If a person's reasons for acting are self-defensive and he is not acting because of an abnormality of mind or loss of control, what is needed is a defence—or partial defence—that accurately explains why he is not guilty of murder. Such thinking has led to increasing calls for the introduction of a new partial defence to murder termed “excessive self-defence”, which would result in a manslaughter verdict.²⁶¹

Such a defence exists in many other jurisdictions, for example, the Australian courts used to adopt an approach that persons who killed using excessive force were not guilty of murder, but only of manslaughter.²⁶² They were partially excused:

“[T]he moral culpability of a person who kills another in defending himself but who fails in a plea of self-defence only because the force which he believed to be necessary exceeded that which was reasonably necessary falls short of moral culpability ordinarily associated with murder.”²⁶³

This approach recognised excessive self-defence as a partial excuse. However, the Australian courts have since abandoned this “half-way house”²⁶⁴ and the House of Lords has confirmed that such an approach is not part of English law.

R. v CLEGG [1995] 1 A.C. 482 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-122

The defendant, a soldier on duty in Northern Ireland, was on patrol when he shot and killed the driver of a stolen car and his passenger. He was charged with murder of the passenger and attempted murder of the driver. The defendant claimed that he had fired four shots in self-defence. The judge accepted this defence in relation to the first three shots. However, since the fourth shot (which was a significant cause of the passenger’s death) was fired after the car had passed and the soldier was thus in no further danger, the defence was rejected. The defendant was convicted of murder and appealed.

LORD LLOYD OF BERWICK:

“Strictly speaking, the [issue of self-defence] does not arise on the facts of the present case. Since the danger had already passed when Private Clegg fired his fourth shot, there could be no question of self-defence, and therefore no question of excessive force in self-defence. But it is convenient to deal with this issue all the same ... [His Lordship then surveyed the authorities, including Palmer.] In other words, there is no half-way house. There is no rule that a defendant who has used a greater degree of force than was necessary in the circumstances should be found guilty of manslaughter rather than murder ... [S]o far as self-defence is concerned, it is all or nothing. The defence either succeeds or fails. If it succeeds, the defendant is acquitted. If it fails, he is guilty of murder ...

[His Lordship acknowledged the weight to be given to the views of those who argued for reform and concluded] I am not averse to judges developing law, or indeed making new law, when they can see their way clearly, even when questions of social policy are involved ... But in the present case I am in no doubt that your Lordships should abstain from law-making. The reduction of what would otherwise be murder to manslaughter in a particular class of case seems to me essentially a matter for decision by the legislature, and not by this House in its judicial capacity. For the point in issue is, in truth, part of the wider issue whether the mandatory life sentence for murder should still be retained.”

Appeal dismissed

4-123

In the wake of Clegg’s conviction, the Government announced a review of the law relating to the use of lethal force in self-defence.

REPORT OF THE INTERDEPARTMENTAL REVIEW OF
THE LAW ON THE USE OF LETHAL FORCE IN SELF-DEFENCE OR THE PREVENTION OF CRIME (1996),
PARA.83:

4-124

“The availability of [a manslaughter] verdict might assist in a comparatively small number of cases in which, previously, the outcome had proved contentious. It might help the jury or court to meet the demands of justice where a defendant had acted sufficiently culpably to deserve a criminal conviction, yet had lacked the evil motive usually associated with murder. The review was not convinced, however, that providing an additional option of manslaughter would enable the court or jury to achieve a result which would necessarily always be seen to be just. More options required finer distinctions and judgments to be made. With more borders between cases, there could be more cases that were seen to fall unfairly on the wrong side of the borderline, this time between acquittal and conviction for manslaughter, and between conviction for murder and manslaughter.”

4–125

Whether or not these reasons are regarded as convincing, the Government rejected any alteration to the law of murder in this respect. However, the matter was subsequently considered by the Law Commission as part of the review of the law of homicide.

LAW COMMISSION, MURDER,
MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE
(LAW COM NO.304), (2006), PARAS
5.53–5.57:

4–126

“Under the present law, if D’s killing of V is regarded as an overreaction in self-defence, he or she must be convicted of murder unless he or she can succeed in a plea of provocation ... D will ... have to show that the provocation caused him or her to lose self-control at the time of the killing. It is not enough that D was frightened, but still in control of himself or herself.

In some circumstances, cases [such as these] should end in a first degree murder verdict. In our view, however, a rational approach to reaching the right verdict is currently hampered by arbitrariness and unfairness in the way the provocation defence is structured. In particular, D should not be prejudiced because he or she over-reacted in fear or panic ...

Consequently, we are recommending that the provocation defence should be available where D killed in response to a fear of serious violence. D will be allowed to say that the effect of the fear of the threat, or of the fear of the threat coupled with the impact of the gross violence received, was such that, in the circumstances, someone of D’s age and of an ordinary temperament might have reacted in the same or in a similar way ...

This reform would have the additional benefit of giving Ds ... more flexibility in how they choose to run their defence. If they are prepared to accept nothing less than total vindication of what they did, then they can plead nothing other than self-defence. In such a case, the outcome sought is complete acquittal ... If D is not so confident that the jury will find his or her actions to have been fully justified, he or she can plead provocation—in the form of a fear of serious violence—instead of or alongside a plea of self-defence.

Having the latter option reduces the chance that D will be harshly adjudged to have committed first degree murder because the jury finds he or she overreacted. The jury can opt for the middle course: guilty of second degree murder on the grounds of provocation, leaving the judge with discretion over sentence.”²⁶⁵

4-127

This recommendation, whereby using fatal excessive force would have resulted in a conviction for second degree murder by virtue of a reformed defence of provocation, was not adopted in its entirety by the Government. Instead, it has chosen to reform the law of provocation within the existing framework of murder and manslaughter. The Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.54 creates a new partial defence to murder of loss of control. In order to rely upon this defence, the defendant must have killed as a result of having lost control (which had a qualifying trigger) and, a person of the defendant's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of the defendant, might have reacted in a similar way. The relevant qualifying trigger in this context is that the defendant's loss of control was attributable to his fear of serious violence from V against the defendant or another person.²⁶⁶ If pleaded successfully, liability is reduced to manslaughter. While this is to be welcomed in that it allows for a finer assessment of degrees of blame than is possible under current law, it is not applicable to all current instances of excessive self-defence. A defendant who loses self-control and kills due to a fear of serious violence being used against him will be able to rely on the defence; a defendant who, without loss of control, mistakenly uses a disproportionate amount of defensive force will fall outside the provisions. How common this latter occurrence will be under the potentially wider s.76 remains uncertain but the existing guidance from the CPS on when it is appropriate to bring a prosecution may be indicative of how practice is developing. It may not be in the public interest to prosecute, for example, when it is alleged that the degree of force used is excessive “if the degree of force used is not very far beyond the threshold of what is reasonable.” However, when such force “results in death or serious injury, it will be only in very rare circumstances indeed that a prosecution will not be needed in the public interest”.²⁶⁷

At the same time as the controversy surrounding Private Clegg’s conviction, the Government dismissed proposals to abolish the mandatory life sentence for murder.²⁶⁸ It claimed that release provisions were flexible enough to deal adequately with less heinous murders. Indeed, Private Clegg was released after two and a half years’ imprisonment.²⁶⁹ Now, the fact that the offender acted to any extent in self-defence is regarded as a mitigating factor in the sentencing guidelines for the mandatory life sentence under the Criminal Justice Act 2003.²⁷⁰ However, with the new provisions on householder cases potentially leading to complete acquittals for those who use disproportionate (but reasonable) force to protect their homes, the contrast between these outcomes and the mandatory life sentence for those who use excessive force in public arenas will become starker than ever.

IV. Chastisement

4–128

Parents are entitled to take reasonable disciplinary measures against their children, including the use of moderate physical punishment, although this defence of “reasonable chastisement” was never meant to protect parents from criminal prosecution if the force used was excessive.²⁷¹ Deciding what is “moderate” (and lawful) on the one hand and “excessive” (and unlawful) on the other hand has always been problematic. Indeed, the whole issue of the physical punishment of children is deeply controversial especially in the light of the European Convention on Human Rights art.3, which prohibits inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In A v United Kingdom,²⁷² a boy was beaten with a cane by his step-father-to-be. The man was subsequently acquitted of assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.47, having pleaded reasonable chastisement. The boy's case was taken to the European Court of Human Rights where it was held that the UK was in breach of art.3 for failing to protect the child from such treatment.²⁷³

The Government accepted that the ruling required a change in the law to ensure that children would be protected from inhuman or degrading treatment. In 2000, it published a consultation paper in which it proposed to set out the defence of reasonable chastisement on a statutory basis.²⁷⁴ These modest proposals, which would have required courts to have regard to the nature and context of the treatment, its duration, and its physical and mental effects²⁷⁵ were subsequently abandoned.²⁷⁶ However, international and domestic pressure to, at the very least, reform the defence continued.²⁷⁷ In 2004, the defence was abolished by the Children Act 2004 s.58 in those instances when physical punishment results in actual bodily harm to the child. It is retained for "mild" smacks where only transient harm is caused. As we shall see, the distinction between assault occasioning actual bodily harm and common assault is far from clear²⁷⁸ and yet this is now the basis of the distinction between punishment which is unlawful and that which is permitted.

4-129

The Government chose to restrict rather than abolish the defence of reasonable chastisement, believing:

“that it would be quite unacceptable to outlaw physical punishment of a child by a parent. Nor, we believe, would the majority of parents support such a measure. It would be intrusive and incompatible with our aim of helping and encouraging parents in their role.”²⁷⁹

The Government was influenced, in part, by the results of a survey conducted for them in which 88% of respondents believed that it was sometimes necessary to smack a naughty child.²⁸⁰ Whether there remains this level of public support in the UK is questionable. Over the past 15 years the practice of smacking children appears to have decreased significantly. In 1998, 61% of young adults reported that they had been smacked in their childhood. Just over ten years later, this percentage had decreased to 43% in 2009.²⁸¹ Similarly, physical punishment of children that was experienced “on a regular basis” during childhood was reported by 10% of young adults in 1998, but by only 3% in 2009.²⁸² With the decline in physical punishment of children gaining pace, reform of the law may have gained greater public support. A survey conducted on behalf of the NSPCC in 2002 found that 58% of people would support law reform if they were sure that parents would not be prosecuted for trivial smacks.²⁸³ It is likely that 15 years on this support will have increased further. It is argued that an outright ban, combined with an educational campaign and a very light touch in relation to prosecutions would do much more to protect children than the present, far from satisfactory, law. Indeed, in a recent review of the evidence, Heilmann found that “[c]ross-country comparisons showed that declines in the use of physical punishment are accelerated in countries that have prohibited its use, demonstrating the important symbolic value of legislation”.²⁸⁴ Maintaining the current law cannot be based solely on public attitudes towards smacking. We must also question whether the physical punishment of children can be justified in principle. The defence of reasonable chastisement is based, largely, on an archaic attitude that regards children as less entitled to the right to be free from physical violence than adults. Newell contests this proposition stating that:

“[t]here is an injustice and illogicality in suggesting that it is acceptable to hit children, but that it is quite unacceptable to hit others, or for adults to hit anyone else. Hitting people is wrong—and children are people too.”²⁸⁵

The use of violence to “correct” children’s behaviour may also be far less effective than many parents believe. Heilmann’s review of the research highlights that:

”The majority of the reviewed studies concluded that physical punishment is associated with adverse short- and long-term outcomes for children’s health and development, and should never be used. Negative outcomes included increased aggression and anti-social behaviour, mental health and emotional problems, poorer parent-child relationships, decreased moral internalisation, increased risk of perpetrating abuse towards partners and children in adulthood, and risk of escalation into maltreatment and abuse. The evidence of detrimental outcomes was stronger for severe forms of physical punishment.”²⁸⁶

4–130

Many other European countries have acted to ban the physical punishment of children²⁸⁷ and it is to be hoped that the UK can be persuaded to follow suit in the near future.²⁸⁸ The immediate prospects are not good however: the Government honoured a promise made when the legislation was passed to review it in 2007. Despite evidence, for example, that there was confusion as to what the law is among parents and prosecutors and that it has not deterred parents from continuing to use excessive levels of punishment, the government concluded that smacking is becoming less common and that s.58 has improved legal protection for children. It stated that while it did not condone smacking, it would not be outlawed because “unless there are clear reasons to intervene, parents should be free to bring up children as they see fit”.²⁸⁹

In the meantime, all corporal punishment in schools is banned by the Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998 s.131.²⁹⁰ This was confirmed in the decision of R. (on the application of Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education and Employment,²⁹¹ in which it was decided that the power of parents to delegate to teachers the right to administer physical punishment at school had been removed by the legislation. The House of Lords accepted the argument that the practice of corporal punishment of children was a manifestation of the religious beliefs of the applicants (teachers and parents of certain Christian schools) and, therefore, the ban did interfere with their rights under the European Convention on Human Rights art.9, enshrined in the Human Rights Act 1998. However, because the ban on physical punishment was justified by the need to protect the rights and freedoms of children art.9 had not been breached. It is, of course, still lawful for the parents to administer mild physical punishment at home for misbehaviour at school as long as it does not result in actual bodily harm.

V. Duress and Necessity

A. INTRODUCTION

4-131

The defence of duress arises where a defendant is threatened by another with death or serious injury if he does not commit a crime. For example, in Hudson and Taylor,²⁹² two girls gave false evidence in an unlawful wounding case in which they were the principal witnesses. When charged with perjury they claimed they had been threatened that they would be “cut up” unless they committed perjury; they had been so frightened that they had duly told the lies in court. It was held that the defence of duress should have been put to the jury.²⁹³ The source of the threat must be another person. This species of duress is sometimes termed “duress by threats”.

The defence of necessity potentially arises where a defendant claims that she “had” to commit the crime, not because someone was threatening them, but because something (in the shape of surrounding circumstances which may or may not have been caused by a human being) deprived her of any real alternative. In short, she is claiming that she committed a crime to prevent a greater evil. For example, ten people are climbing a ladder to safety from a vessel that is sinking. One of them is so petrified that he “freezes” on the ladder and cannot be persuaded to move. Eventually, he is pushed from the ladder and dies.²⁹⁴ If charged with murder the survivors would claim that their actions were necessary and that it was better for one to die so that nine could live.

4-132

The defence of duress by threats has long been recognised by English law. However, until fairly recently it was commonly thought that the defence of necessity did not exist in English law. For example, in Buckoke v Greater London Council, it was stated (obiter) that the driver of a fire engine was compelled to stop at red traffic lights even though “he sees 200 yards down the road a blazing house with a man at an upstairs window in extreme peril ... [and if he] waits for that time, the man's life will be lost".²⁹⁵

However, since the 1980s, the courts have been actively extending the defence of duress to apply to a broader range of situations where the threat does not necessarily arise from other persons, but where the defendant is faced with a crisis or emergency. This extended defence has been referred to as duress of circumstances. For example, in Martin the defendant drove his son to work (otherwise he would have been late and at risk of losing his job) because he feared his wife would commit suicide if he did not. He was afforded a defence to a charge of driving while disqualified on grounds of "duress of circumstances":

"English law does, in extreme circumstances, recognise a defence of necessity. Most commonly this defence arises as duress, that is pressure upon the accused's will from the wrongful threats or violence of another. Equally, however, it can arise from other objective dangers threatening the accused or others. Arising thus it is conveniently called 'duress of circumstances'."²⁹⁶

R. v SHAYLER [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2206
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-133

LORD WOOLF CJ:

"There is no reason of principle or authority for distinguishing the two forms of duress in relation to the elements of the defence which we have identified ... The decision in Abdul-Hussain provides useful clarification of the earlier three pronged definition of necessity ... It also reflects other decisions which have treated the defence of duress and necessity as being part of the same defence and the extended form of the defence as being nothing more than different labels for essentially the same thing, see e.g. R. v Conway [1988] 3 All E.R. 1025 at 1029 where it was said: 'As the learned editors point out in Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law, 6th edn (1988) p.225, to admit a defence of “duress of circumstances” is a logical consequence of the existence of the defence of duress as that term is ordinarily understood, i.e. “do this or else”. This approach does no more than recognise that duress is an example of necessity. Whether “duress of circumstances” is called “duress” or “necessity” does not matter. What is important is that, whatever it is called, it is subject to the same limitations as the “do this or else” species of duress.”

4-134

It would be tempting, following this, simply to regard duress, duress of circumstances and necessity as three prongs of a single broad defence. However, while such a development might be perceived to be desirable, it would be both misleading and premature to conclude that English law has fully embraced this approach. First, as we shall see, in developing the defence of duress of circumstances the courts have largely, but not universally, accepted that the conditions for its application are the same as for duress by threats. We shall see that the two defences are not completely identical. More significantly, however, the rationale for the application of each defence is still contested. Duress by threats is, classically, seen as an excusatory defence: we understand the plight of the hapless person whose “will is overborne” by terrible threats. Duress of circumstances, however, appears to have a more justificatory flavour. The defendant has committed a crime to prevent something terrible befalling himself or others: he is driven to commit the crime by force of circumstances. Despite the fact that English law has cast this defence in an excusatory mould, duress of circumstances looks more like a synonym for necessity. Indeed, it has been referred to as “necessity by circumstances”.²⁹⁷ Yet, for the courts, the operation of the defence as a justification is reserved for instances of “pure” necessity, such as, life-saving actions by doctors. Defendants pleading that their actions (which involved conspiring to cause criminal damage at an RAF airbase) were necessary to prevent an illegal war in Iraq will be deemed to be pleading excusatory duress of circumstances, if anything, and not justificatory necessity.²⁹⁸ From the discussion at the start of this chapter, it is clear that the concepts of excuse and justification are themselves problematic: this is compounded here by an as yet developing state of the law. It may well be that a unifying rationale will emerge over time that is cut loose from justification or excuse. An alternative basis might be the reasonableness and proportionality of the defendant's actions. "Of course, an assessment whether a response is reasonable and proportionate must incorporate society's moral and political judgements about what sort of emergencies or threats can be averted".²⁹⁹ In the meantime, the approach taken by the Court of Appeal,³⁰⁰ emphasising the context-specific nature of duress by threats, duress of circumstances and necessity, leads one to be cautious about the prospects of the emergence of a single defence.

4-135

This brings us to the second reason for distinguishing the defences. A fully-fledged defence of necessity would be far broader than the present defence of duress of circumstances. As will be discussed later, it would involve a pure balancing of evils (whereas under the present law on duress of circumstances there has to be a threat of death or serious injury) and it would be a defence to all crimes (whereas duress of circumstances at present is not a defence to murder). As we shall see, it would be premature to regard such a broad necessity defence as having been accepted into English law.

The extent to which these are separate defences or are simply different labels for three prongs of a single defence will be explored in the following sections. As the three do not all share the same theoretical underpinnings and as they have developed differently and, to some extent, have different rules governing their applicability, they will be dealt with separately.

One final initial point should be made. In the past claims that actions were done out of necessity or because of duress were frequently made late, once the trial had commenced, and not, say, at the point of arrest. The burden to disprove such a claim beyond reasonable doubt was then placed upon the prosecution, and it was argued that such defence "ambushes" could cause very considerable problems for the Crown: a claim of duress, it is said, is easily made and far from easily refuted.³⁰¹ This was one reason why, after a period of increasing relaxation of the law, the House of Lords made an effort to restrain the continued development of the defence of duress.³⁰² However, for some time now, the defence have been required to disclose the nature of their case well before the trial,³⁰³ and the courts have made it clear on a number of occasions that the days of “trial by ambush” are effectively over.³⁰⁴ It may therefore be argued that this particular reason no longer provides a justification for restricting the defence.

B. DURESS BY THREATS

4–136

As seen, this is the well-established defence that is afforded to persons who are threatened with death or serious injury unless they commit a crime. It is subject to very stringent qualifying conditions.³⁰⁵

1. Rationale of duress by threats as a defence

J. F. STEPHEN, HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND, VOL.2
(1883), PP.107–108:

4–137

“Criminal law is itself a system of compulsion on the widest scale. It is a collection of threats of injury to life, liberty and property if people do commit crimes. Are such threats to be withdrawn as soon as they are encountered by opposing threats? The law says to a man intending to commit murder, if you do it I will hang you. Is the law to withdraw its threat if someone else says, If you do not do it I will shoot you? Surely it is the moment when temptation to crime is strongest that the law should speak most clearly and emphatically to the contrary. It is, of course, a misfortune for a man that he should be placed between two fires, but it would be a much greater misfortune for society at large if criminals could confer impunity upon their agents by threatening them with death or violence if they refused to execute their commands. If impunity could be so secured a wide door would be opened to collusion, and encouragement would be given to associations of malefactors, secret or otherwise. No doubt the moral guilt of a person who commits a crime under compulsion is less than that of a person who commits it freely, but any effect which is thought proper may be given to this circumstance by a proportional mitigation of the offender's punishment. These reasons lead me to think that compulsion by threats ought in no case whatever to be admitted as an excuse for crime, though it may and ought to operate in mitigation of punishment in most though not in all cases."

LAW COMMISSION, REPORT ON
DEFENCES OF GENERAL APPLICATION
(LAW COM. NO.83) (1977), PARA.2.14:

4-138

"Those who favour the conclusion that duress should not afford a defence which absolves criminal liability contend that it can never be justifiable for a person to do wrong, in particular to do serious harm to another merely to avoid some harm to himself; that it is not for the individual to balance the doing of wrong against the avoidance of harm to himself. They argue that duress does not destroy the will or negative intention in the legal sense, but that it merely deflects the will so that intention conflicts with the wish; in short that it provides a motive for the wrongful act and that motive is, on general principle, irrelevant to whether a crime has been committed."

ABBOTT V THE QUEEN [1977] A.C.
755 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

4-139

LORD SALMON:

"It seems incredible to their Lordships that in any civilised society, acts such as the appellant's whatever threats may have been made to him, could be regarded as excusable or within the law. We are not living in a dream world in which the mounting wave of violence and terrorism can be contained by strict logic and intellectual niceties alone. Common sense surely reveals the added dangers to which in this modern world the public would be exposed, if the change in the law proposed on behalf of the appellant were affected. It might well prove to be a character for terrorists, gang leaders and kidnappers ... [If the accused were allowed to go free he would now have] gained some real experience and expertise, he might again be approached by the terrorist who would make the same threats ... [the accused] would then give a repeat performance, killing even more men, women and children. Is there any limit to the number of people you may kill to save your own life and that of your family?"

4-140

Those who oppose a defence of duress generally concede that it is a relevant matter to take into consideration in mitigation of sentence. For all crimes other than murder, courts have wide discretionary powers when sentencing and in extreme cases of duress only a minimal sentence need be imposed.³⁰⁶ In relation to murder, the existence of duress does not figure as one of the bases for mitigating the length of the minimum term to be served.³⁰⁷

Thus the arguments against a general defence of duress fall broadly into two groups:

(i) the law would lose some of its deterrent effect if duress were allowed as a defence; and

(ii) the defendant is morally blameworthy and, accordingly, deserves punishment. Because of the duress her blameworthiness might be less and so she can receive a mitigated sentence—but she is still, to some extent, morally blameworthy.

(i) Deterrence³⁰⁸

4-141

Was Stephen correct in asserting that “it is the moment when temptation to crime is strongest that the law should speak most clearly and emphatically to the contrary”? Are the law’s threats likely to serve any useful purpose to a person placed in such a perilous situation?

IAN DENNIS, “DURESS, MURDER AND CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY” (1980)

96 L.Q.R. 208, 234, 236:

4-142

“The deterrent argument is clear. If we assume that the accused acted as a reasonable man in not resisting the threat, and that both he and the reasonable man would act in the same way again whatever the attitude of the law, then the imposition of punishment cannot act as either an individual or a general deterrent. It will amount only to the useless infliction of a penalty and, on a utilitarian hypothesis, will therefore be unjustifiable ...

[A] man under pressure to kill or be killed may well reason correctly that he does, at least, gain time by ignoring the law’s prohibition; the alternative of heeding the prohibition and resisting the threat simply leads more quickly to unpleasant consequences. Secondly, if duress is to be taken into account anyway when sentence is passed, then the law’s sanction for ignoring its threat is uncertain and may well not be heavy ... An appeal to the deterrent value of the law disallowing duress as a defence is thus an empty gesture; the deterrent is ineffective because it is not immediate and because it is subverted by admitting duress through the back door as evidence in mitigation.”

4-143

On the other hand, “[w]e do not and we cannot know what choices may be different if the actor thinks he has a chance of exculpation on the ground of his peculiar disabilities than if he knows that he does not,”³⁰⁹ and thus:

“[t]here is an argument for saying that we should nourish the hope, however faint, that the threat of punishment may be enough to tip the balance of decision by those who have only doubtfully sufficient fortitude to undergo martyrdom for the sake of a moral principle.”³¹⁰

Further, quite apart from general deterrence, there is the more realistic “educative” species of deterrence that “legal norms and sanctions operate not only at the moment of climactic choice but also in the fashioning of values and of character”.³¹¹ The denial of a defence of duress would strengthen values so that persons in situations of duress would be less likely to submit to the threats.

(ii) Moral blameworthiness

4-144

Is the actor who submits to duress morally blameworthy and responsible for her actions so that she deserves punishment for them?

We saw in Ch.2 that moral responsibility has been traditionally confined to those who choose to break the law and thus choose to become subject to criminal liability.

H. L. A. HART, PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (1968), PP.22-23:

4-145

“The ... view is that of society ... offering individuals including the criminal the protection of the laws on terms which are fair ... because ... each individual is given a fair opportunity to choose between keeping the law required for society’s protection or paying the penalty ...

Criminal punishment ... consists simply in announcing certain standards of behaviour and attaching penalties for deviation, making it less eligible, and then leaving individuals to choose. This is a method of social control which maximises individual freedom within the coercive framework of law in a number of different ways ... First, the individual has an option between obeying or paying ... Secondly, this system not only enables individuals to exercise this choice but increases the power of individuals to identify beforehand periods when the law’s punishments will not interfere with them and to plan their lives accordingly.”

4-146

The question in duress is whether the actor had this “fair opportunity” to choose between conforming to the law or breaking it. Where the circumstances have overwhelmed his capacity for choice, where his freedom of choice is too restricted, we do not account him blameworthy and responsible.

This is what was meant by Lord Widgery CJ in Kray,³¹² when he spoke of the accused being “so terrified that he ceased to be an independent actor” and what he meant in Hudson and Taylor,³¹³ when he required that the defendant’s “will” must have been “overborne”; the threats had to “neutralise the will”. This does not mean that the defendant lacked mens rea.³¹⁴ Hudson and Taylor both told their lies deliberately and intentionally. As was emphasised by Lord Hailsham in the leading case of Howe:

“[An] unacceptable view is that ... duress as a defence affects only the existence or absence of mens rea. The true view is stated by Lord Kilbrandon (of the minority) in Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 ... at 703:

‘the decision of the threatened man whose constancy is overborne so that he yields to the threat, is a calculated decision to do what he knows to be wrong, and is therefore that of a man with, perhaps to some exceptionally limited extent, a “guilty mind”. But he is at the same time a man whose mind is less guilty than is his who acts as he does but under no such constraint.’”³¹⁵

So, the basis of the defence of duress is that the defendant did not have an effective opportunity to make a choice as to whether to commit the crime. Of course, in one sense, the defendant does make a choice, but it is only “Hobson’s choice”. His dilemma is to choose between two “morally unacceptable courses of action”.³¹⁶ As the external pressure is so great, in a moral sense, it “coerces” the actor into committing the crime. Fletcher describes such conduct as “morally involuntary”.³¹⁷ Morally involuntary conduct is not blameworthy; the defendant does not deserve punishment.

R. v RUZIC (2001) S.C.C. 24 (SUPREME COURT OF CANADA):

4-147

LEBEL J:

“Moral involuntariness is also related to the notion that the defence of duress is an excuse ... In using the expression ‘moral involuntariness’, we mean that the accused had no ‘real’ choice but to commit the offence. This recognizes that there was indeed an alternative to breaking the law, although in the case of duress that choice may be even more unpalatable—to be killed or physically harmed ...

Punishing a person whose actions are involuntary in the physical sense is unjust because it conflicts with the assumption in criminal law that individuals are autonomous and freely choosing agents. It is similarly unjust to penalize an individual who acted in a morally involuntary fashion. This is so because his acts cannot realistically be attributed to him, as his will was constrained by some external force ... [T]he accused's agency is not implicated in her doing. In the case of morally involuntary conduct, criminal attribution points not to the accused but to the exigent circumstances facing him, or to the threats of someone else."

4-148

In England, judges have also made repeated reference to the notion of moral involuntariness in the acceptance of duress as a defence³¹⁸—primarily on the ground that it would be unjust or unfair to punish in such circumstances.³¹⁹

DPP v LYNCH [1975] A.C. 653 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-149

LORD MORRIS:

“[I]t is proper that any rational system of law should take fully into account the standards of honest and reasonable men. By those standards it is fair that actions and reactions may be tested. If then someone is really threatened with death or serious injury unless he does what he is told to do is the law to pay no heed to the miserable, agonising plight of such a person? For the law to understand not only how the timid but also the stalwart may in a moment of crisis behave is not to make the law weak but to make it just. In the calm of the court-room measures of fortitude or of heroic behaviour are surely not to be demanded when they could not in moments for decision reasonably have been expected even of the resolute and the well disposed ...

The law must, I think, take a common sense view. If someone is forced at gun-point either to be inactive or to do something positive—must the law not remember that the instinct and perhaps the duty of self-preservation is powerful and natural? I think it must. A man who is attacked is allowed within reason to take necessary steps to defend himself. The law would be censorious and inhumane which did not recognise the appalling plight of a person who perhaps suddenly finds his life in jeopardy unless he submits and obeys.”

4–150

Does recognising “the appalling plight” of the defendant reduce itself to taking motive into account? Norrie points out, “If ‘doing justice’ to a Lynch means taking into account his motives, it is unclear why ‘doing justice’ to everyone else means ignoring theirs”.³²⁰ Motive is generally irrelevant under the criminal law—because the law seeks to set an objective standard of behaviour—yet there can be no doubt that motives other than the threat of death or serious harm may be compelling. Indeed, as we shall see, this was one of the factors involved in the resistance of English law to the defence of necessity. However, as far as duress is concerned it has to be recognised that it is a “concession to human frailty”³²¹ which is available only when the threats are extreme. If one adopts the terminology of excuse/justification it is thus best viewed as the former rather than the latter.³²² The defendant has done wrong; he has violated the interests of an innocent person, but because of his appalling predicament, he is excused from blame.³²³

2. Parameters of the defence

4–151

In what circumstances may a defendant break the law but escape liability because of duress? When will the circumstances be such that we will not account the defendant blameworthy for their actions or as Gross puts it:

“[H]ow shall the line be drawn to separate cases in which the constraint is sufficiently powerful to make blame inappropriate from cases in which constraint is simply a challenge to avoid harm to oneself as best one can while doing no harm to others? A line too far in either direction means injustice, for it is not right to allow with impunity harming that should have been avoided, nor is it right to punish for harm whose avoidance cannot reasonably be expected.”³²⁴

JOHN GARDNER, “THE GIST OF EXCUSES” (1998) 1 BUFFALO CRIMINAL LAW REVIEW 575, 578–579:

4–152

“The gist of an excuse ... is precisely that the person with the excuse lived up to our expectations ... in the normative sense. Did she manifest such resilience, or loyalty, or thoroughness, or presence of mind as a person in her situation should have manifested? In the face of terrible threats, for example, did this person show as much fortitude as someone in his situation could properly be asked to show? ... The character standards which are relevant to these and other excuses are not the standards of our own characters, nor even the standards of most people’s characters, but rather the standards to which our characters should, minimally conform.”

4–153

Essentially, the attribution of blame involves a moral judgment relating, inter alia, to our expectations of how people should act in certain situations. This inevitably involves a comparison between the defendant’s response and how we imagine we, or other “ordinary people”, would respond in that situation. If we perceive that ordinary people would have responded as the defendant did, then we do not blame the defendant for their actions. But if we perceive that ordinary people would have withstood the threats, then we legitimately blame the defendant for a failure to do so.

This test provides us with the key to answering the following questions concerning the parameters of the defence of duress.

(i) Threat of death or serious harm

In making our moral judgment as to whether to blame the defendant, we would surely wish to compare the crime committed with the nature of the threats to which the defendant was exposed. Suppose a defendant had been threatened that his house would be burnt to the ground if he did not steal a tin of beans from the local supermarket. We would not blame a defendant who committed such a crime. Suppose a defendant who had access to the water supply of London was threatened with death or serious bodily harm if she did not place a deadly poison in the water supply. If she poisoned the water and 10,000 people died (as they knew would be the case), we would blame her for her actions because the harm she caused was so much greater than the harm threatened. This “balancing of harms” approach ought not to operate in a rigid mechanistic manner, but it is a useful aid to our moral judgment as to whether to blame the defendant.³²⁵ This is broadly the approach of the Model Penal Code which states that any “use of, or a threat to use, unlawful force against his person³²⁶ or the person of another, which a person of reasonable firmness in his situation would have been unable to resist”³²⁷ will afford a defence of duress. Lord Wilberforce flirted with this notion in Lynch when he said that “[n]obody would dispute that the greater the degree of heinousness of the crime, the greater and less resistible must be the degree of pressure, if pressure is to excuse”.³²⁸ In Howe, Lord Hailsham said he “believe[d] that some degree of proportionality between the threat and the offence must, at least to some extent, be a prerequisite of the defence under the existing law”.³²⁹ English law, however, is committed to the view that only threats of death or serious harm will suffice for a defence of duress.³³⁰ If the threats are less terrible they should be matters of mitigation only.³³¹

What is meant by serious harm here? Must this be serious physical harm or will serious psychological harm suffice? For the purposes of offences against the person, the term “grievous bodily harm” has been interpreted to include serious psychiatric harm.³³² Such an approach was rejected in *Baker and Wilkins*³³³ but *Shayler*³³⁴ seems to support the view that a threat of serious psychological harm can suffice as it is stated that “protection of the physical and mental well-being of a person from serious harm is still being required”. Of course, where the threat is one of serious psychological harm, it will be difficult (but not impossible) to satisfy the test, to be explored shortly, that the threat must be one of imminent harm.³³⁵

4–155

The Court of Appeal has stated that it had no doubt that rape would fall within the ambit of serious injury,³³⁶ while in van Dao, it commented obiter that its provisional view was that it was “strongly disinclined” to allow a threat of false imprisonment (without any additional threat of serious harm) to suffice for a plea of duress on the basis that any widening of the defence would be ill-advised.³³⁷ It is settled law that a threat of damage to property (however valuable) is not sufficient for the defence to apply.³³⁸

The threat must be extraneous to the offender. In Rodger and Rose,³³⁹ it was held that the defence of duress of circumstances was not available to a charge of breaking prison where the defendants claimed that if they had not escaped, they would have committed suicide.³⁴⁰

LAW COMMISSION, WORKING PAPER
NO.55, DEFENCES OF GENERAL
APPLICATION (1974), PARAS 16, 17:

4–156

“16 ... We have considered whether a defence of duress could be framed in terms of the balancing of one harm against another, permitting it to be raised only when the harm to be inflicted upon the defendant is greater than the harm which he is obliged to do. For various reasons, however, we regard this as impracticable. In the first place, if the defence was so framed it would follow that where the defendant, to save his own life, imperilled the lives of more than one other person, the defence would be unavailable ...

Secondly, a test involving the concept of balance of harms cannot, it seems to us, operate satisfactorily where the offences involved are of an entirely different character. There is, for example, no sensible means of weighing a threat of severe injury to the person against an enforced disclosure of information contrary to the Official Secrets Act which might lead to a danger to national security. Our provisional conclusion is, therefore, that in defining the kind of threats which are the subject of duress, it must be borne in mind that the basic justification of the defence is that it is a concession to human infirmity in situations of extreme peril.

17. This conclusion leads us to take the provisional view that duress ought for the future to be available only in cases where the threat is a threat of death or of serious injury.”

4-157

This conclusion was confirmed in the Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993 cl.25(1). The Law Commission’s proposals would restrict the defence to threats of death or life-threatening harm where the offence charged is murder or attempted murder.³⁴¹ As it is largely accepted that it is the task of the criminal law to set objective standards of behaviour, it is hardly surprising that the defence of duress should be so closely circumscribed. It is only when the threats are extreme that the law can allow individual motive to be an excuse. This does, however, lead to anomalies in the law.³⁴² The Criminal Damage Act 1971 states that the fact that the defendant acted in order to protect property belonging to himself or another may be a lawful excuse for damage caused.³⁴³

(ii) Threats indirectly relayed

4-158

It appears that there is no requirement that the threat of death or serious Injury be conveyed directly to the defendant. For example, in *Hudson and Taylor*³⁴⁴ the threat was made to Hudson, who then passed it on to Taylor, yet the Court of Appeal did not regard this as being fatal to the defence. This issue has been considered more recently in the case of Brandford.

R. V BRANDFORD (OLIVIA) [2016]
EWCA CRIM 1794 (COURT OF

The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to supply cocaine and heroin. She claimed that she had been told by Alford, a man with whom she was infatuated or in love with, that he had been told by a drug dealer that he had inherited a debt from a person who had been murdered, and that if he did not sell drugs for him, “it would not be nice for him”. As a result of this, she was fearful that Alford’s life was at risk and agreed to assist him by carrying drugs for him. The trial judge ruled that the defendant was unable to rely on duress based on threats of which she had no first-hand knowledge, and withdrew the defence from the jury. Whilst the Court of Appeal dismissed her appeal against conviction on the basis that the threats lacked immediacy, there was insufficient evidence of compulsion, and that she had voluntarily associated with known criminals,³⁴⁵ they ruled that the judge had erred in ruling that first-hand knowledge of the threats was required.

LORD JUSTICE GROSS:

”[39] ... (ii) It is striking that amongst the limits on duress canvassed in the authorities to which we have referred, the indirect relaying of a threat is nowhere mentioned. For our part, we can envisage a situation where a threat is indeed very real, regardless of the fact that it is indirectly relayed. Take a threat made to a hypothetical D and her family by a messenger from an organised crime group, conveying a threat from a ‘crime boss’ or the equivalent passing on of a threat from an emissary of a terrorist group. In our judgment, the question is not whether the threat was directly or indirectly relayed which is of significance, so much as its immediacy, imminence, the possibility of taking evasive action, the question of whether D reasonably believed the threat, his/her response to that threat and questions as to the response of a sober person of reasonable firmness sharing D’s characteristics. It is very likely that the more directly a threat is conveyed, the more it will be capable of founding a defence of duress: e.g., the telling example of the loaded pistol in the back, given by Lord Simon of Glaisdale in Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 at 687. Conversely, the more indirectly the threat is relayed the more, all other things being equal, a defendant will struggle to satisfy the requirements of the defence, or (put in burden of proof terms) the more readily the prosecution will disprove it. However, the mere fact that the threat was conveyed indirectly does not seem to us to constitute a fatal bar to the defence. All must depend on the circumstances, of which the manner in which the threat is conveyed is but one, however important it may be.

...

(v) It is to be emphasised that in differing with the Judge’s approach in this respect, we are not in any sense widening the scope of duress, something we would be loath to do. Instead, we are proceeding in accordance with authority, focusing on the well-established inquiries as to the reasonableness of belief in the potency, imminence and immediacy of the threat—rather than the precise means by which it was conveyed.”

Appeal dismissed

(iii) Multiple threats

4–160

In Valderrama-Vega,³⁴⁶ the defendant was threatened with the disclosure of his homosexuality, was under financial pressure and received threats of death or serious harm. The first two are incapable of amounting to duress but the court held that the jury was entitled to look at the cumulative effect of all of the threats. It was wrong to direct the jury that the threat of death or serious injury had to be the sole reason for him committing the crime. In Ortiz,³⁴⁷ however, a direction that the threat to life be the sole threat was upheld, although the court also thought the use of the word “solely” should normally not be included. The special feature of Ortiz appears to have been the possibility of the defendant’s actions also being motivated by the large amount of money he was making from dealing in cocaine and on that basis the authority of Valderrama-Vega is to be preferred.³⁴⁸

(iv) Threats to others

APPLICATION (1974), PARA.18:

4-161

“[W]e consider that no limitation should be placed upon the persons against whom the threat may be made. Obviously, a threat of imminent death, for example, to the defendant’s wife or children ought to suffice for the defence³⁴⁹; but it is not, in our view, possible to maintain with confidence that it should not apply also in the case of threats to a friend³⁵⁰ of the defendant nor, indeed, to someone he does not know. No rational dividing line is discernible in this context.”

4-162

“Duress of circumstances” cases have indicated that the threat can be to the defendant or “some other person”,³⁵¹ and the Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993 provides that the threat must be to the defendant “or another”.³⁵²

R. V SHAYLER [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2206 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-163

The defendant, a former member of MI5, was charged with breaching the Official Secrets Act 1989 s.1(1) by disclosing deficiencies in MI5. He claimed that it was necessary to do so because if MI5 continued to operate in this manner it would inevitably create a danger to the public. He was convicted and appealed.

LORD WOOLF CJ:

“It is also necessary to consider in greater detail the nature of the responsibility and the category of persons to whom the defendant must owe the responsibility for the purposes of the defence. Mr Shayler contends that, as a member of the government secret services, he owed a responsibility to the general public at large. His acts were necessary to protect a yet to be identified group from among the public for whose protection MI5 had responsibilities who would inevitably suffer because of MI5’s incompetence ...

So in our judgment the way to reconcile the authorities to which we have referred is to regard the defence as being available when a defendant commits an otherwise criminal act to avoid an imminent peril of danger to life or serious injury to himself or towards somebody for whom he reasonably regards himself as being responsible. That person may not be ascertained and may not be identifiable. However, if it is not possible to name the individuals beforehand, it has at least to be possible to describe the individuals by reference to the action which is threatened would be taken which would make them victims absent avoiding action being taken by the defendant. The defendant has responsibility for them because he is placed in a position where he is required to make a choice whether to take or not to take the action which it is said will avoid them being injured. Thus if the threat is to explode a bomb in a building if the defendant does not accede to what is demanded the defendant owes responsibility to those who would be in the building if the bomb exploded.”

*Appeal dismissed*³⁵³

4-164

As this bomb example demonstrates, most endangered strangers can be brought within the test as being persons for whom the defendant “reasonably regards himself as being responsible”³⁵⁴ provided they can be identified in a general way: for example, persons in a building. On the facts of Shayler itself, it was stated that “if it is possible to identify the members of the public at risk this will only be by hindsight. This creates difficulty over the requirement of responsibility”.

Where the threat is directed against the defendant, her family or others to whom a direct responsibility is owed, one can legitimately describe the defendant’s conduct as being “morally involuntary” and excusable. However, where strangers are involved, it is questionable whether a defendant should be permitted to, say, cause grievous bodily harm to one stranger in order to save another stranger from grievous bodily harm (especially as there must always be a chance, however small, that the threat will not be carried out). This is in effect allowing such defendants to choose between the two strangers. How are they to assess their relative “worth”? Of course, in many cases the harm to be inflicted by the defendant will be much less than that threatened against the stranger and in such situations, it ought certainly to be an excuse that the defendant committed the crime to save the third party from, at least, serious injury.

(v) Stipulated crime

4–165

Duress by threats is a defence where the defendant is threatened with death or serious injury unless he commits a particular, stipulated crime. What is the position if there is no link between the threat and the offence committed? In Cole,³⁵⁵ the defendant robbed two building societies and claimed that he had done so to pay off a debt to moneylenders who had hit him with a baseball bat and had threatened him and his family. The Court of Appeal held that the defence of duress is only available if the threats are directed at the offence committed. In this case, the moneylenders had not stipulated that he commit robbery in order to meet their demands and there was, therefore, an insufficient nexus between the threat and the offence.³⁵⁶

As we shall see, for the defence of “duress of circumstances” there is no requirement that the defendant commit a stipulated crime. For example, in Martin,³⁵⁷ the evil to be averted was his wife committing suicide; the crime committed was driving while disqualified. There was no link between them. There are two views that can be adopted in relation to this. First, while duress and duress of circumstances are largely identical in the conditions for their application, there are differences and this is one of them. Secondly, if they are in reality, two “prongs” of the same defence, simply bearing different labels to describe the different situations involved, it may be argued that Cole should no longer be regarded as good law on this issue. If a person’s will is so overborne by terrible threats that her actions become “morally involuntary”, it hardly seems material that they commit a crime other than the one stipulated.³⁵⁸

(vi) Belief in threat; steadfastness: subjective or objective

4–166

There are two issues here. First, what is the position if the defendant thinks that he has been threatened with death or serious injury but a reasonable person in his situation would not have interpreted the threat thus? Secondly, what is the position if the defendant is terrified by the threats and duly commits a crime, but the reasonable person would have “stood his ground” and not committed the crime? As the following two extracts demonstrate, these two questions are often dealt with jointly. However, as each raises rather different issues they will be dealt with separately after the extracts.

LAW COMMISSION, REPORT ON
DEFENCES OF GENERAL APPLICATION
(LAW COM. NO.83) (1977), PARAS
2.27, 2.28:

4-167

“2.27. The defence of duress is essentially a concession to human weakness in the face of an overwhelming threat of harm by another, and it is therefore right that so far as possible the criteria to be applied should be subjective. It should be sufficient, provided always that there is a threat of harm, that the defendant believes that the threat is of death or serious personal injury and believes that there is no way of avoiding or preventing the threatened harm other than by committing the offence. That a reasonable person would not have so believed may be relevant in testing the defendant’s evidence as to his own belief but it should not of itself disentitle the defendant to the defence.

2.28. It may be said that the whole test as to whether the requirements of duress exist should be subjective, but we feel that this would create too wide a defence. Serious personal injury can cover a wide range of threatened harm, and if the defence is to be available even in respect of the most serious offences, it would be unsatisfactory in the final event to dispense with some objective assessment of whether the defendant could reasonably have been expected to resist the threat ... We think that there should be an objective element in the requirements of the defence so that in the final event it will be for the jury to determine whether the threat was one which the defendant in question could not reasonably have been expected to resist. This will allow the jury to take into account the nature of the offence committed, its relationship to the threats which the defendant believed to exist, the threats themselves and the circumstances in which they were made, and the personal characteristics of the defendant. The last consideration is, we feel, a most important one. Threats directed against a weak, immature or disabled person may well be much more compelling than the same threats directed against a normal healthy person.”

R. V GRAHAM (1982) 74 CR. APP. R.
235 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-168

The appellant, who was gay lived in a flat with his wife and another gay man, K, in a ménage à trois. The appellant was taking drugs for anxiety which made him more susceptible to bullying. K was a violent man and was jealous of the appellant's wife. One night after the appellant and K had been drinking heavily, K put a flex round the wife's neck, pulled it tight and then told the appellant to take hold of the other end of the flex and pull on it. The appellant did so for about a minute as a result of which the wife was killed. The appellant was charged with murder, as was K, who pleaded guilty. The appellant pleaded not guilty and in evidence said that he had complied with K's demand to pull on the flex because of his fear of K. The Crown conceded that it was open to the appellant to raise the defence of duress and did not seek to contend that the defence was not available to a principal to murder. In his directions, the judge posed two questions for the jury: (i) the subjective question of whether the appellant took part in the killing because he feared for his life or personal safety as a result of K's words or conduct; and (ii) if so, the objective question of whether, taking into account all the circumstances, including the appellant's age, sex, sexual propensities and other personal characteristics, and his state of mind and the drink and drugs he had taken, it was reasonable for the appellant, because of fear of K, to take part in killing his wife. The judge further stated that the test of reasonableness in that context was whether, having regard to those circumstances, the appellant's behaviour reflected the degree of self-control and firmness of purpose to be expected from a person in today's society. The appellant was convicted of murder and appealed.

LORD LANE CJ:

“[T]he direction appropriate ... [to the first question] should have been in these words: ‘Was this man at the time of the killing taking part because he held a well-grounded fear of death [or serious physical injury] as a result of the words or conduct on the part of King?’ The bracketed words may be too favourable to the defendant. The point was not argued before us.

... [Counsel for the appellant] contends that no second question arises at all; the test is purely subjective. He argues that if the appellant's will was in fact overborne by threats of the requisite cogency, he is entitled to be acquitted and no question arises as to whether a reasonable man, with or without his characteristics, would have reacted similarly ...

[Counsel for the Crown], on the other hand, submits that such dicta as can be found on the point are in favour of a second test; this time an objective test ...

As a matter of public policy, it seems to us essential to limit the defence of duress by means of an objective criterion formulated in terms of reasonableness. Consistency of approach in defences to criminal liability is obviously desirable. Provocation and duress are analogous. In provocation the words or actions of one person break the self-control of another. In duress the words or actions of one person break the will of another. The law requires a defendant to have the self-control reasonably to be expected to the ordinary citizen in his situation. It should likewise require him to have the steadfastness reasonably to be expected of the ordinary citizen in his situation. So too with self-defence, in which the law permits the use of no more force than is reasonable in the circumstances. And, in general, if a mistake is to excuse what would otherwise be criminal, the mistake must be a reasonable one.

It follows that we accept [counsel for the Crown's] submission that the direction in this case was too favourable to the appellant. The Crown having conceded that the issue of duress was open to the appellant and was raised on the evidence, the correct approach on the facts of this case would have been as follows: (1) Was the defendant, or may he have been, impelled to act as he did because, as a result of what he reasonably believed King had said or done, he had good cause to fear that if he did not so act King would kill him or (if this is to be added) cause him serious physical injury? (2) If so, have the prosecution made the jury sure that a sober person of reasonable firmness, sharing the characteristics of the defendant, would not have responded to whatever he reasonably believed King said or did by taking part in the killing? The fact that a defendant's will to resist has been eroded by the voluntary consumption of drink or drugs or both is not relevant to this test. We doubt whether the Crown were right to concede that the question of duress ever arose on the facts of this case. The words and deeds of King relied on by the defence were far short of those needed to raise a threat of the requisite gravity. However, the Crown having made the concession, the judge was right to pose the second objective question to the jury. His only error lay in putting it too favourably to the appellant."

Appeal dismissed

(a) Belief in threat

4-170

According to Graham, the defendant must reasonably believe that he has been threatened with death or serious injury ("the first question").³⁵⁹ It is interesting that Lord Lane asserts that "consistency of approach in defences to criminal liability is obviously desirable" yet in the self-defence case of Williams (Gladstone),³⁶⁰ he ruled that the defendant had to be judged according to the facts as he believed them to be. Graham has been approved by the House of Lords in *Howe*³⁶¹ and has been followed in a number of subsequent cases.³⁶² Suggestions from the Court of Appeal that an entirely subjective approach should be taken in duress cases³⁶³ have fallen on stony ground: in Hasan, Lord Bingham stated that "there is no warrant for relaxing the requirement that the belief must be reasonable as well as genuine".³⁶⁴

This is the appropriate approach and the one recommended by the Law Commission.³⁶⁵ As argued earlier, while mistakes as to justifications (such as self-defence) need only be honest, mistakes as to excuses (such as duress) should have to be reasonable as well. While this argument could potentially be problematic when applied to duress of circumstances which contains elements of a justificatory nature, the fact remains that the English courts have treated duress of circumstances as being an excuse. If excuses are to exempt defendants from liability, they should be plausible—i.e. reasonable—excuses.³⁶⁶

(b) Steadfastness

4-171

It is clear from Graham (“the second question”) that the defendant must display reasonable steadfastness or bravery. This was also confirmed in Howe. The test is that the threats must be such that a person of reasonable firmness sharing the characteristics of the defendant would have given way to the threats. There have been a number of cases in which the courts have struggled to distinguish relevant characteristics from those which should be ignored.³⁶⁷ In Emery, for example, the Court of Appeal held that medical evidence about “learned or dependent helplessness” was rightly admitted in determining whether the defendant, charged with cruelty to a child, could have withstood threats from the child’s father.³⁶⁸ The following case attempted to synthesise the principles which have emerged.

R. V BOWEN [1996] 2 CR. APP. R. 157
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-172

The defendant was charged with obtaining services by deception. He claimed that he had been forced to do so, having been accosted by two men who threatened him and his family with petrol-bombing if he did not obtain the goods. He was convicted and appealed on the ground that his abnormal suggestibility and vulnerability (low IQ was added at the appeal stage) were relevant characteristics not put to the jury as affecting his ability to withstand the threats.

STUART-SMITH LJ:

“[T]he question remains, what are the relevant characteristics of the accused to which the jury should have regard in considering the second objective test? This question has given rise to considerable difficulty in recent cases. It seems clear that age and sex are, and physical health or disability may be, relevant characteristics. But beyond that it is not altogether easy to determine from the authorities what others may be relevant ...

[His Lordship then surveyed the case law.]

What principles are to be derived from these authorities? We think they are as follows:

- (1) The mere fact that the accused is more pliable, vulnerable, timid or susceptible to threats than a normal person are not characteristics with which it is legitimate to invest the reasonable/ordinary person for the purpose of considering the objective test.
- (2) The defendant may be in a category of persons who the jury may think less able to resist pressure than people not within that category. Obvious examples are age, where a young person may well not be so robust as a mature one³⁶⁹; possibly sex, though many women would doubtless consider they had as much moral courage to resist pressure as men; pregnancy, where there is added fear for the unborn child; serious physical disability, which may inhibit self protection; recognised mental illness or psychiatric condition, such as post traumatic stress disorder leading to learned helplessness.
- (3) Characteristics which may be relevant in considering provocation, because they relate to the nature of the provocation,³⁷⁰ itself will not necessarily be relevant in cases of duress. Thus, homosexuality may be relevant to provocation if the provocative words or conduct are related to this characteristic; it cannot be relevant in duress, since there is no reason to think that homosexuals are less robust in resisting threats of the kind that are relevant in duress cases.
- (4) Characteristics due to self-induced abuse, such as alcohol, drugs or glue-sniffing, cannot be relevant.
- (5) Psychiatric evidence may be admissible to show that the accused is suffering from some mental illness, mental impairment or recognised psychiatric condition provided persons generally suffering from such condition may be more susceptible to pressure and threats and thus to assist the jury in deciding whether a reasonable person suffering from such a condition might have been impelled to act as the defendant did. It is not admissible simply to show that in the doctor's opinion an accused, who is not suffering from such illness or condition, is especially timid, suggestible or vulnerable to pressure and threats. Nor is medical opinion admissible to bolster or support the credibility of the accused.

- (6) Where counsel wishes to submit that the accused has some characteristic which falls within (2) above, this must be made plain to the judge. The question may arise in relation to the admissibility of medical evidence of the nature set out in (5). If so, the judge will have to rule at that stage. There may, however, be no medical evidence, or, as in this case, medical evidence may have been introduced for some other purpose, e.g. to challenge the admissibility or weight of a confession. In such a case counsel must raise the question before speeches in the absence of the jury, so that the judge can rule whether the alleged characteristic is capable of being relevant. If he rules that it is, then he must leave it to the jury.
- (7) In the absence of some direction from the judge as to what characteristics are capable of being regarded as relevant, we think that the direction approved in Graham without more will not be as helpful as it might be, since the jury may be tempted, especially if there is evidence, as there was in this case, relating to suggestibility and vulnerability, to think that these are relevant. In most cases it is probably only the age and sex of the accused that is capable of being relevant. If so, the judge should, as he did in this case, confine the characteristics in question to these.

How are these principles to be applied in this case? [Counsel for the Crown] accepts, rightly in our opinion, that the evidence that the appellant was abnormally suggestible and a vulnerable individual is irrelevant. But she submits that the fact that he had, or may have had, a low IQ of 68 is relevant since it might inhibit his ability to seek the protection of the police. We do not agree. We do not see how low IQ, short of mental impairment or mental defectiveness, can be said to be a characteristic that makes those who have it less courageous and less able to withstand threats and pressure.”

Appeal dismissed

A. BUCHANAN AND G. VIRGO, “DURESS AND MENTAL ABNORMALITY” [1999] CRIM. L.R.
517, 529–530:

4–174

“Diagnosis in psychiatry ... [has moved] to an ‘atheoretical’ approach. Less emphasis is placed on causative factors, pathological changes or abnormalities of process underlying each disorder and more emphasis is placed on symptoms and signs. This change presents two related problems for the law as it relates to duress. The first is that, as a result, psychiatric conditions are now ‘recognised’ according to different criteria than was previously the case and these criteria cannot be relied upon to identify a group of people whose ability to withstand threats is reduced. The second is that if an atheoretical approach is adopted, psychiatric conditions cannot be said to ‘cause’ any aspect of behaviour because they themselves comprise no more or less than various aspects of behaviour.

It follows that the test ... in Bowen ... is unworkable and needs to be reformulated. There are two options ... Second ... [t]he crucial question would then be whether the defendant could reasonably be expected to have resisted the threat given his or her mental condition. It would not matter that the condition could not be described as recognized.”

4–175

In GAC,³⁷¹ it was argued on behalf of the defendant, C, that she had been suffering from “learned helplessness”, a feature of battered woman syndrome (BWS) at the time of her participation in an importation of cocaine, and was acting under duress because, by the time that the offence was committed, she was in such a state of passivity that she would have complied with anything that her co-defendant required her to do. It was also argued that this “learned helplessness” meant that she was unable to identify evasive action and avoid committing the crime. The Court of Appeal considered that “Learned helplessness would be of particular relevance to the defence of duress”,³⁷² recognising that victims of this condition may suffer “traumatic bonding”, which may lead to them remaining with their abuser,³⁷³ and that courts should bear in mind that they may be inconsistent in their complaints of abuse.³⁷⁴ Hallett LJ emphasised that “not every woman who suffers from BWS can claim the defence of duress”,³⁷⁵ suggesting that “an accused would need to be suffering from BWS in a severe form to claim that their will was overborne”,³⁷⁶ to the extent that she had “lost her free will”.³⁷⁷ On the facts, it was concluded that C did not exhibit BWS at the time of the offence, and that the violence perpetrated against her was not of a severity or degree that would afford a defence of duress. However, by focusing on the issue of whether C exhibited “learned helplessness”, the Court of Appeal did not explore fully the questions that the court must answer when considering whether a defendant with this condition may avail themselves of the defence, in particular, whether a reasonable person suffering from learned helplessness might have reacted in the way that this defendant did.³⁷⁸ The Law Commission takes the view that, in so far as duress as a proposed defence to murder and attempted murder is concerned, the jury should be able to take into account all the circumstances of the defendant, including his or her age but not those which bear upon the defendant’s capacity to withstand duress. This is controversial. It would mean that two different tests would exist. Bowen would continue to apply in non-homicide cases, but a more stringent test would be applied in instances where the crime charged was murder or attempted murder. The Law Commission justifies this in two ways. First, given the seriousness of the offence charged, a strict objective test should be maintained to limit the scope of the defence. Secondly, the defence of diminished responsibility is available for those defendants suffering from mental disorder who might be less able to withstand threats.³⁷⁹

However, one must ask whether this steadfastness rule—as under Bowen or as reformulated by the Law Commission for murder and attempted murder—serves any useful purpose? Bearing in mind that duress can only be pleaded if there has been a threat of death or serious injury and that it is not currently a defence to murder, when would it ever be unreasonable to give in to such grave threats?

K. J. M. SMITH, “DURESS AND STEADFASTNESS: IN PURSUIT OF THE UNINTELLIGIBLE” [1999] CRIM. L.R. 363, 370, 375:

4–176

“Is it being maintained that, when faced with a belief in the threat of death or serious harm, the question is, should that defendant have capitulated bearing in mind their personal characteristics? In other words, does the reasonable steadfastness test envisage some defendants of strong emotional or physical disposition who will be denied a defence of duress and who must not choose self-preservation? ... [N]o coherent function can be assigned to the steadfastness requirement ...

[T]he presence of a steadfastness test deflects attention away from legitimate defence conditions relating to the neutralization or avoidance of threats ... [T]he steadfastness requirement cannot coherently relate to anything other than the distinct conditions that defendants take all reasonable opportunities to escape from or neutralize an aggressor’s threat.”

(vii) Imminence of threat

4–177

It is generally stated that the defence of duress is only available if there is a threat of immediate harm. Thus, in Gill,³⁸⁰ the defendant was threatened with personal violence if he did not steal his employer’s lorry. It was held obiter that he probably could not have pleaded duress because there had been a period of time during which he could have raised the alarm and wrecked the whole enterprise. As Lord Morris said in Lynch:

“[The question is whether] a person the subject of duress could reasonably have extricated himself or could have sought protection or had what has been called a ‘safe avenue of escape’.”³⁸¹

This approach can be supported. We would blame someone who had a reasonable opportunity to raise the alarm and wreck the criminal enterprise,³⁸² but we would not blame someone who had no such opportunity. What is the position if the defendant has an opportunity to seek help but fears that police protection will be ineffective?

R. v HUDSON AND TAYLOR [1971] 2
Q.B. 202 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-178

The facts are set out, above, [para.4-131.]

WIDGERY LJ:

“In the present case the threats ... were likely to be no less compelling, because their execution could not be effected in the court room, if they could be carried out in the streets of Salford the same night ...

[Counsel for the Crown] ... submits on grounds of public policy that an accused should not be able to plead duress if he had the opportunity to ask for protection from the police before committing the offence and failed to do so. The argument does not distinguish cases in which the police would be able to provide effective protection, from those when they would not, and it would, in effect, restrict the defence of duress to cases where the person threatened had been kept in custody by the maker of the threats, or where the time interval between the making of the threats and the commission of the offence had made recourse to the police impossible ...

In the opinion of this court it is always open to the Crown to prove that the accused failed to avail himself of some opportunity which was reasonably open to him to render the threat ineffective, and that upon this being established the threat in question can no longer be relied on by the defence. In deciding whether such an opportunity was reasonably open to the accused the jury should have regard to his age and circumstances, and to any risks to him which may be involved in the course of action relied upon.”

LAW COMMISSION, WORKING PAPER
NO.55, DEFENCES OF GENERAL
APPLICATION (1974), PARA.20:

4-179

“We recognise that effective protection may not be continuously available; yet it seems to us that a defendant subject to this kind of threat must always be under a duty at least to seek that protection in order to reduce the possibility of its execution and failure to do so through fear of the consequences ought properly to be a factor in mitigation rather than a complete defence.”³⁸³

4-180

In Hudson and Taylor, the threats could have been reported to the police, but the two young girls, aged 17 and 19, were convinced that the police protection would be ineffective. Are we to blame them for their failure to seek official protection? It would appear that their response was typical of the response of most ordinary girls of that age faced with such a predicament. It would be absurd to assert that the defence of duress would only be available to them if there had been a sniper sitting in court ready to execute his threats immediately. These views were echoed by Lord Griffiths in Howe:

“[I]f duress is introduced as a merciful concession to human frailty it seems hard to deny it to a man who knows full well that any official protection he may seek will not be effective to save him from the threat of death under which he has acted.”³⁸⁴

However, Hudson and Taylor has always caused disquiet among some members of the judiciary and commentators: Glanville Williams, for example, described it as an “indulgent decision”.³⁸⁵

R. v HASAN [2005] 2 A.C. 467 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-181

The facts are set out below, [para.4-186]

LORD BINGHAM:

“27. ... [Hudson] had the unfortunate effect of weakening the requirement that execution of a threat must be reasonably believed to be imminent and immediate if it is to support a plea of duress ... I can understand that the Court of Appeal in R v Hudson had sympathy with the predicament of the young appellants but I cannot, consistently with principle, accept that a witness testifying in the Crown Court of Manchester has no opportunity to avoid complying with a threat incapable of execution then or there ...

28. ... It should ... be made clear to juries that if the retribution threatened against the defendant or his family or a person for whom he reasonably feels responsible is not such as he reasonably expects to follow on almost immediately on his failure to comply with the threat, there may be little if any room for doubt that he could take evasive action, whether by going to the police or in some other way, to avoid committing the offence with which he is charged.”

This more robust stance³⁸⁶ means that the approach taken by the Court of Appeal in *Abdul-Hussain*³⁸⁷ in the context of duress of circumstances does not apply where the plea is one of duress by threats.³⁸⁸ This latter case concerned an appeal by a group of Iraqis who had hijacked a Sudanese aeroplane. Their plea was they would be killed if returned to Iraq. Rose VP held that:

“the execution of the threat need not be immediately in prospect ... [and that] the period of time which elapses between the inception of the peril and the defendant’s act, and between that act and execution of the threat, are relevant but not determinative factors for a judge and jury in deciding whether duress operates ... In our judgment, although the judge was right to look for a close nexus between the threat and the criminal act, he interpreted the law too strictly in seeking a virtually spontaneous reaction.”³⁸⁹

4-182

This difference in approach adopted with regard to duress by threats (Hasan) and duress of circumstances (Abdul-Hussain) to the issue of imminence reinforces the point that these defences are context-sensitive: the more one slides along the continuum from duress to duress of circumstances and through to necessity, the less rigorous this requirement becomes. This is because in cases of duress by threats the rationale for the excuse is that the defendant’s “will has been overborne” whereas at the other extreme (necessity) the defendant is making a more rational choice. It was stressed in Re A (Conjoined Twins),³⁹⁰ a classic case of necessity, that the principle is “one of necessity, not emergency”. In this case, the death of both twins was not an immediate or even imminent prospect; they could both well have lived for many months. However, as their deaths within that period were a certainty, a severance operation that would kill the weaker twin was a necessity.

(viii) Defendants placing themselves in a position where they might be open to threats

4-183

Defendants who join a criminal association (whether terrorist, gangster or otherwise) which could force them to commit crimes can be blamed for their actions. In joining such an organisation, fault can be laid at their door and their subsequent actions described as blameworthy. This is the approach adopted by English law which denies the defence of duress to such persons.

R. v SHARP [1987] 1 Q.B. 853 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-184

The appellant joined a gang of robbers, knowing they used firearms. He participated in a robbery upon a sub-post office but claimed he had been forced to as one of the other robbers had threatened to kill him if he did not carry through the plan. He was convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

LORD LANE CJ:

“No one could question that if a person can avoid the effects of duress by escaping from the threats, without damage to himself, he must do so. In other words if there is a moment at which he is able to escape, so to speak, from the gun being held at his head by Hussey, or the equivalent of Hussey, he must do so. It seems to us to be part of the same argument, or at least to be so close to the same argument as to be practically indistinguishable from it, to say that a man must not voluntarily put himself in a position where he is likely to be subjected to such compulsion ...

[I]n our judgment, where a person has voluntarily, and with knowledge of its nature, joined a criminal organisation or gang which he knew might bring pressure on him to commit an offence and was an active member when he was put under such pressure, he cannot avail himself of the defence of duress.”

Appeal dismissed

R. V BAKER AND WARD [1999] 2 CR.
APP. R. 335 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-185

The defendants were drug dealers. They got into debt with their suppliers who threatened them with violence and instructed them to rob a store. Their defence to a charge of robbery was that they were acting under duress. They were convicted and appealed.

ROCH LJ:

“In some situations, the evidence may be so clear that the judge will be entitled to rule that the defence is not open to the accused, for example, where the accused has joined a terrorist organisation or a gang of armed robbers ...

In another type of case, the accused, although not joining a gang or organisation, may have involved himself in criminal activities which bring him into contact with other criminals in circumstances where the accused knew or was aware that if he defaulted in fulfilling his role or in discharging obligations he assumed in relation to the other criminals he would be subjected to such compulsion. Drug dealing on a scale which is significant could be such a case. The present case was a case in which it was appropriate to leave to the jury the question whether the accused had voluntarily put themselves in a position where they were likely to be subjected to duress. The defence of duress will not be available to an accused in this situation if he is aware that there is a risk of pressure by way of violence or threats of death or violence to him or a member of his immediate family being brought to bear upon him. The purpose of the pressure has to be to coerce the accused into committing a criminal offence of the type for which he is being tried. If the accused had no reason to anticipate such pressure, then they would be entitled to rely upon duress.”

*Appeal allowed*³⁹¹

R. v HASAN [2005] 2 A.C. 467 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4–186

The defendant worked as a driver and minder for a woman who ran an escort agency and was involved in prostitution. The woman’s boyfriend, Sullivan, had a reputation for violence and was involved in drug dealing. The defendant was charged with aggravated burglary and claimed that he had been forced to commit the offence by Sullivan. He was convicted and appealed. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal.

LORD BINGHAM:

“22. For many years it was possible to regard the defence of duress as something of an antiquarian curiosity, with little practical application ... This has changed ... This is borne out by the steady flow of cases reaching the appellate courts over the last 30 years or so ... I must acknowledge that the features of duress ... incline me, where policy choices are to be made, towards tightening rather than relaxing the conditions to be met before duress may be successfully relied upon ...

29. ... The Court of Appeal ruled that [the trial judge had misdirected the jury] ... because the judge had not directed the jury to consider whether the defendant knew that he was likely to be subjected to threats to commit a crime of the type with which he was charged. It is this ruling which gave rise to the certified question on this part of the case, which is:

‘Whether the defence of duress is excluded when as a result of the accused’s voluntary association with others; (i) he foresaw (or possibly should have foreseen) the risk of being subjected to any compulsion by threats of violence, or (ii) only when he foresaw (or should have foreseen) the risk of being subjected to compulsion to commit criminal offences, and if the latter, (iii) only if the offences foreseen (or which should have been foreseen) were of the same type (or possibly of the same type and gravity) as that ultimately committed.’

The Crown contend for answer (i) in its objective form. The defendant commends the third answer, omitting the first parenthesis ...

37. The principal issue ... is whether R v Baker correctly stated the law ... The defendant is seeking to be wholly exonerated from the consequences of a crime deliberately committed. The prosecution must negative his defence of duress, if raised by the evidence, beyond reasonable doubt. The defendant is, ex hypothesi, a person who has voluntarily surrendered his will to the dominion of another. Nothing should turn on foresight of the manner in which, in the event, the dominant party chooses to exploit the defendant’s subservience. There need not be foresight of coercion to commit crimes, although it is not easy to envisage circumstances in which a party might be coerced to act lawfully. In holding that there must be foresight of coercion to commit crimes of the kind with which the defendant is charged, R. v Baker mis-stated the law.

38. There remains the question, which the Court of Appeal left open ... whether the defendant’s foresight must be judged by a subjective or an objective test: i.e. does the defendant lose the benefit of the defence of duress only if he actually foresaw the risk of coercion or does he lose it if he ought reasonably to have foreseen the risk of coercion, whether he actually foresaw the risk or not? I do not think any decided case has addressed this question, and I am conscious that application of an objective reasonableness test to the other ingredients of duress has attracted criticism ... The practical importance of the distinction in this context may not be very great, since if a jury concluded that a person voluntarily associating with known criminals ought reasonably to have foreseen the risk of future coercion they would not, I think, be very likely to accept that he did not in fact do so. But since there is a choice to be made, policy in my view points towards an objective test of what the defendant, placed as he was and knowing what he did, ought reasonably to have foreseen. I am not persuaded otherwise by analogies based on self-defence or provocation ... The policy of the law must be to discourage association with known criminals, and it should be slow to excuse the criminal conduct of those who do so. If a person voluntarily becomes or remains associated with others engaged in criminal activity in a situation where he knows or ought reasonably to know that he may be the subject of compulsion by them or their associates, he cannot rely on the defence of duress to excuse any act which he is thereafter compelled to do by them ...

39. I would answer this certified question by saying that the defence of duress is excluded when as a result of the accused's voluntary association with others engaged in criminal activity he foresaw or ought reasonably to have foreseen the risk of being subjected to any compulsion by threats of violence."

Appeal allowed

4-188

Duress is an excuse and, on principle, there ought to be a plausible—or reasonable—excuse for the actions. The basis of the rule here is that a defendant has no plausible excuse and is blameworthy if he associates with such criminal enterprises or organisations. If the risks of compulsion were obvious, even though he gave no thought to them, the case for denying the defence is compelling.³⁹² However, it is true that Lord Bingham's approach is very robust and goes further than the Court of Appeal in Sharp: all that is required is that there is a foreseeable risk of being subjected to any compulsion by threats of violence.³⁹³ It is not necessary that the defendant foresaw or ought reasonably to have foreseen that he might be the subject of compulsion to commit a particular type of crime or any criminal offence at all.³⁹⁴ It has been argued that this is unacceptably wide and that the defence should only be removed if there are foreseeable threats of serious violence to commit a crime³⁹⁵ but

Hasan is clearly the leading authority.³⁹⁶

(ix) Length of time after threats

4–189

The defendant can only rely upon the defence as long as the threat is operative. In DPP v Davis; DPP v Pittaway,³⁹⁷ both defendants were charged separately with driving with excess alcohol, contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.5(1)(a). Both pleaded duress. However, on appeal by way of case stated, the Divisional Court held (on a number of grounds) that there was no evidence of duress. In particular, the fact that one of the defendants had driven for two miles without any suggestion that he was being pursued and that the other had decided to drive off after a five minute pause in which no threat had materialised meant that duress could not apply.³⁹⁸

(x) Crimes to which duress is a defence

4–190

If the defendant's conduct can be described as being "morally involuntary", and if we are satisfied that we do not blame the defendant for her actions, because ordinary people would have responded in the same way, it follows that she ought to have a defence to any crime. However, English law adopts the view that duress is a defence to all crimes except murder, attempted murder³⁹⁹ and treason.⁴⁰⁰ In Lynch, the House of Lords decided that duress was a defence to an accessory to murder but in Abbott, the Privy Council ruled that it was not a defence to the principal offender (the one who actually does the killing) of murder. In Howe,⁴⁰¹ the House of Lords held that duress was not a defence to murder, irrespective of the degree of participation.

DPP v LYNCH [1975] A.C. 653

(HOUSE OF LORDS):

4–191

The appellant was ordered to drive members of the IRA in Northern Ireland to a place where they intended to kill, and did kill, a policeman.

The appellant claimed that he was convinced that he would be shot if he did not obey. He was convicted of murder, the trial judge holding that the defence of duress was not available to an accessory to murder. The Court of Criminal Appeal in Northern Ireland dismissed his appeal.

LORD MORRIS:

“It may be that the law must deny such a defence to an actual killer, and that the law will not be irrational if it does so.

Though it is not possible for the law always to be worked out on coldly logical lines there may be manifest factual differences and contrasts between the situation of an aider and abettor to a killing and that of the actual killer. Let two situations be supposed. In each let it be supposed that there is a real and effective threat of death. In one a person is required under such duress to drive a car to a place or to carry a gun to a place with knowledge that at such place it is planned that X is to be killed by those who are imposing their will. In the other situation let it be supposed that a person under such duress is told that he himself must there and then kill X. In either situation there is a terrible agonising choice of evils. In the former, to save his life, the person drives the car or carries the gun. He may cling to the hope that perhaps X will not be found at the place or that there will be a change of intention before the purpose is carried out or that in some unforeseen way the dire event of a killing will be averted. The final and fatal moment of decision has not arrived. He saves his own life at a time when the loss of another life is not a certainty. In the second (if indeed it is a situation likely to arise) the person is told that to save his life he himself must personally there and then take an innocent life. It is for him to pull the trigger or otherwise personally to do the act of killing. There, I think, before allowing duress as a defence it may be that the law will have to call a halt. May there still be force in what long ago was said by Hale?

‘Again, if a man be desperately assaulted, and in peril of death, and cannot otherwise escape, unless to satisfy his assailant’s fury he will kill an innocent person then present, the fear and actual force will not acquit him of the crime and punishment of murder, if he commit the fact; for he ought rather to die himself, than kill an innocent.’

(Hale’s Pleas of the Crown, Vol.1 p.51.)” Appeal allowed: new trial ordered

ABBOTT V THE QUEEN [1977] A.C.
755 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

4-192

The appellant was ordered to kill a girl. He claimed he was afraid that if he did not obey he and his mother would be killed. He dug a hole for the body and held the girl while she was stabbed by another man. She was left dying in the hole while the appellant and others filled in the hole. Both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago held that duress was not available as a defence.

LORD SALMON (delivering the majority judgment of their lordships):

“Counsel for the appellant has argued that the law now presupposes a degree of heroism of which the ordinary man is incapable and which therefore should not be expected of him and that modern conditions and concepts of humanity have rendered obsolete the rule that the actual killer cannot rely on duress as a defence. Their Lordships do not agree. In the trials of those responsible for wartime atrocities such as mass killings of men, women or children, inhuman experiments on human beings, often resulting in death, and like crimes, it was invariably argued for the defence that these atrocities should be excused on the ground that they resulted from superior orders and duress: if the accused had refused to do these dreadful things, they would have been shot and therefore they should be acquitted and allowed to go free. This argument has always been universally rejected. Their Lordships would be sorry indeed to see it accepted by the common law of England.”

LORD WILBERFORCE AND LORD EDMUND-DAVIES dissenting:

“If the Crown is right, there is no let-out for any principal in the first degree, even if the duress be so dreadful as would be likely to wreck the morale of most men of reasonable courage, and even were the duress directed not against the person threatened but against other innocent people (in the present case, the appellant’s mother) so that considerations of mere self-preservation are not operative. That is indeed ‘a blueprint for heroism’: S. v Goliath, 1972 (3) S.A. 1 ...

The question that immediately arises is whether any acceptable distinction can invariably be drawn between a principal in the first degree to murder and one in the second degree, with the result that the latter may in certain circumstances be absolved by his plea of duress, while the former may never even advance such a plea.

The simple fact is that no acceptable basis of distinction has even now been advanced ...

Lynch having been decided as it was, the most striking feature of the present appeal is the lack of any indication, in the judgment of the majority, why a flat declaration that in no circumstances whatsoever may the actual killer be absolved by a plea of duress makes for sounder law and better ethics. In truth, the contrary is the case. For example ... no one can doubt that our law would today allow duress to be pleaded in answer to a charge, under section 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861, of wounding with intent. Yet, here again, should the victim die after the conclusion of the first trial, the accused when faced with a murder charge would be bereft of any such defence. It is not the mere lack of logic that troubles one. It is when one stops to consider why duress is ever permitted as a defence even to charges of great gravity that the lack of any moral reason justifying its automatic exclusion in such cases as the present becomes so baffling—and so important ...

To hold that a principal in the first degree in murder is never in any circumstances to be entitled to plead duress, whereas a principal in the second degree may, is to import the possibility of grave injustice into the common law.”

Appeal dismissed

R. v HOWE [1987] 1 A.C. 417 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-194

Two appellants, Howe and Bannister, participated with others in torturing, kicking, punching and sexually abusing a man. The man was then strangled to death by one of the others. These events were repeated on a second occasion but this time it was Howe and Bannister who themselves killed the victim by strangling him with a shoelace.

The appellants claimed that they had acted under duress at the orders of and through fear of one Murray. At their trial the judge, following Lynch and Abbott, directed the jury that duress could be a defence to the first killing where the appellants were only accessories, but not to the second killing where the appellants were the principal offenders. The Court of Appeal held this was correct. The appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD HAILSHAM LC:

“In general, I must say that I do not at all accept in relation to the defence of murder it is either good morals, good policy or good law to suggest, as did the majority in Lynch and the minority in Abbott that the ordinary man of reasonable fortitude is not to be supposed to be capable of heroism if he is asked to take an innocent life rather than sacrifice his own. Doubtless in actual practice many will succumb to temptation, as they did in Dudley and Stephens. But many will not, and I do not believe that as a ‘concession to human frailty’ the former should be exempt from liability to criminal sanctions if they do. I have known in my own lifetime of too many acts of heroism by ordinary human beings of no more than ordinary fortitude to regard a law as either ‘just or humane’ which withdraws the protection of the criminal law from the innocent victim and casts the cloak of its protection upon the coward and the poltroon in the name of a ‘concession to human frailty’.

I must not, however, underestimate the force of the arguments on the other side ...

A long line of cases ... establish duress as an available defence in a wide range of crimes, some at least, like wounding with intent to commit grievous bodily harm, carrying the heaviest penalties commensurate with their gravity. To cap this, it is pointed out that at least in theory, a defendant accused of this crime under section 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861, but acquitted on the grounds of duress, will still be liable to a charge of murder if the victim dies ... I am not, perhaps, persuaded of this last point as much as I should. It is not simply an anomaly based on the defence of duress. It is a product of the peculiar mens rea allowed on a charge of murder which is not confined to an intent to kill ...

I ... believe that some degree of proportionality between the threat and the offence must, at least to some extent, be a prerequisite of the defence under existing law. Few would resist threats to the life of a loved one if the alternative were driving across the red lights or in excess of 70 mph on the motorway. But ... it would take rather more than the threat of a slap on the wrist or even moderate pain or injury to discharge the evidential burden even in the case of a fairly serious assault. In such a case the 'concession to human frailty' is no more than to say that in such circumstances a reasonable man of average courage is entitled to embrace as a matter of choice the alternative which a reasonable man could regard as the lesser of two evils. Other considerations necessarily arise where the choice is between the threat of death or a fortiori of serious injury and deliberately taking an innocent life. In such a case a reasonable man might reflect that one innocent human life is at least as valuable as his own or that of his loved one. In such case a man cannot claim that he is choosing the lesser of two evils. Instead he is embracing the cognate but morally disreputable principle that the end justifies the means ...

During the course of argument it was suggested that there was available to the House some sort of half-way house between allowing these appeals and dismissing them. The argument ran that we might treat duress in murder as analogous to provocation, or perhaps diminished responsibility, and say that, in indictments for murder, duress might reduce the crime to one of manslaughter. I find myself quite unable to accept this. The cases show that duress, if available and made out, entitles the accused to a clean acquittal, without, it has been said, the 'stigma' of a conviction ... [The suggestion] is also contrary to principle. Unlike the doctrine of provocation, which is based on emotional loss of control, the defence of duress, as I have already shown, is put forward as a 'concession to human frailty' whereby a conscious decision, it may be coolly undertaken, to sacrifice an innocent human life is made as an evil lesser than a wrong which might otherwise be suffered by the accused or his loved ones at the hands of a wrong doer."

LORD GRIFFITHS:

"It is therefore neither rational nor fair to make the defence dependent upon whether the accused is the actual killer or took some other part in the murder ...

I am not troubled by some of the extreme examples cited in favour of allowing the defence to those who are not the killer such as a woman motorist being hijacked and forced to act as getaway driver or a pedestrian being forced to give misleading information to the police to protect robbery and murder in a shop. The short, practical answer is that it is inconceivable that such persons would be prosecuted; they would be called as the principal witnesses for the prosecution.

As I can find no fair and certain basis upon which to differentiate between participants to a murder and as I am firmly convinced that the law should not be extended to the killer, I would depart from the decision of this House in ... Lynch and declare the law to be that duress is not available as a defence to a charge of murder, or to attempted murder. I add attempted murder because it is to be remembered that the prosecution have to prove an even more evil intent to convict of attempted murder than in actual murder.

... This leaves, of course, the anomaly that duress is available for the offence of wounding with intent but not to murder if the victim dies subsequently. But this flows from the special regard that the law has for human life, it may not be logical but it is real and has to be accepted.

[Lords Bridge, Brandon and Mackay agreed that duress should never be a defence to murder irrespective of the defendant's degree of participation. In addition to the above concerns over the special value accorded human life and the difficulty in drawing moral and legal distinctions between perpetrators and accomplices, the House felt there were three further reasons justifying their approach:

- (1) if duress were to be made a defence to the perpetrator of murder, that should be done by Parliament, not the courts; the Law Commission (Law Com. No. 83) recommended ten years previously that duress should be a defence to the principal offender of murder; Parliament's failure to enact this recommendation is an indication that they have rejected the proposal.
- (2) The defence of duress is imprecisely defined and extending it to murder would cause too much uncertainty;
- (3) administrative remedies such as not prosecuting, use of parole and the royal prerogative would ensure that no injustice was perpetrated.]”

Appeals dismissed

R. v GOTTs [1992] 2 A.C. 412 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-196

The defendant, aged 16, seriously injured his mother with a knife. In his defence to a charge of attempted murder he claimed that his father had threatened to shoot him unless he killed his mother. The judge ruled that such evidence was inadmissible since duress was not a defence to such a charge. The defendant pleaded guilty but then appealed.

LORD JAUNCEY:

“It is agreed that there is no English authority which deals directly with the availability of the defence of duress to a charge of attempted murder, but [Counsel for the appellant] ... submitted that this is so because it has long been recognised that the defence of duress is available in respect of all crime except murder and treason ...

My Lords, I share the view of Lord Griffiths [in Howe] that ‘it would have been better had [the development of the defence of duress] not taken place and that duress had been regarded as a factor to be taken into account in mitigation’ ... At the time of the earlier writings on duress as a defence, offences against the person were much more likely to have involved only one or two victims. Weapons and substances capable of inflicting mass injury were not readily available to terrorists and other criminals as they are in the reputedly more civilised times in which we now live. While it is not now possible for this House to restrict the availability of the defence of duress in those cases where it has been recognised to exist, I feel constrained to express the personal view that given the climate of violence and terrorism which ordinary law-abiding citizens now have to face Parliament might do well to consider whether the defence should continue to be available in the case of all very serious crimes ... The reason why duress has for so long been stated not to be available as a defence to a murder charge is that the law regards the sanctity of human life and the protection thereof as of paramount importance. Does that reason apply to attempted murder as well as to murder? As Lord Griffiths pointed out [in Howe] ... an intent to kill must be proved in the case of attempted murder but not necessarily in the case of murder. Is there logic in affording the defence to one who intends to kill but fails and denying it to one who mistakenly kills intending only to injure? ...

It is of course true that withholding the defence in any circumstances will create some anomalies but I would agree with Lord Griffiths ... that nothing should be done to undermine in any way the highest duty of the law to protect the freedom and lives of those who live under it. I can therefore see no justification in logic, morality or law in affording to an attempted murderer the defence which is withheld from a murderer. The intent required of an attempted murderer is more evil than that required of the murderer and the line which divides the two is seldom, if ever, of the deliberate making of the criminal. A man shooting to kill but missing a vital organ by a hair's breadth can justify his action no more than can the man who hits the organ. It is pure chance that the attempted murderer is not a murderer ...

I have no doubt that the Court of Appeal reached the correct decision and that the appeal should be dismissed.”

Appeal dismissed

4-197

The fact that the defendant in Gotts was 16 years old made no difference to the outcome of the trial.⁴⁰² More starkly, in W, the fact that the defendant was 13 years old was irrelevant: the Court of Appeal accepted that there might be grounds for criticising a principle of law that did not afford such a boy any defence but the law was that a 13-year-old boy was responsible for his actions and duress no defence to a charge of murder.⁴⁰³ As Ashworth has commented, the “decision was inevitable, but reflects badly on English criminal law”.⁴⁰⁴

Is duress a defence to conspiracy and encouraging or assisting to murder? Authority on the point is very limited. In the Court of Appeal in Gotts, it was commented that there was “a legitimate distinction to be drawn” between these crimes and attempted murder because they are a “stage further away from the completed offence than is the attempt”⁴⁰⁵ and this was the basis given for allowing duress to be pleaded in the unreported Crown Court decision of Ness.⁴⁰⁶ Thus, while the defence is not available to murder or attempted murder (or treason), it is available to these other serious crimes as well as manslaughter, causing grievous bodily harm with intent contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.18 and arson intending to endanger life or being reckless as to whether life is endangered contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2).⁴⁰⁷ As Lord Lowry stressed in his dissenting speech in Gotts, such anomalies are bound to result unless the defence is extended or denied to all crimes.⁴⁰⁸ The view espoused by Lord Jauncey in Gotts that duress ought to be only a matter of mitigation in sentencing rather than a defence to serious crimes is one that needs to be resisted for the reasons explored at the beginning of this section.

What is disappointing about these decisions is the lack of attention paid to the theoretical basis of the defence. In Gotts, the House concentrated upon whether early writings established duress as a defence to attempted murder and then on its relationship to the crime of murder. At no time did they address fully why duress is a defence.⁴⁰⁹ Prior to Gotts, Howe had already been roundly condemned as requiring unrealistic heroism.⁴¹⁰ Heroism might be a desirable quality but it is unduly harsh to sentence someone to life imprisonment for failing to achieve such heights. The criminal law should rest content if its exhortations induce persons to act reasonably. It seems an odd and an unjust law that can proclaim that the defendant has acted perfectly reasonably but is guilty of murder. And it is simply no answer to assert that injustice will be avoided either by the use of prosecutorial discretion or by more lenient sentencing.⁴¹¹ Further, these platitudes have been heard before in other areas of criminal law—and been blatantly ignored.⁴¹² In an otherwise policy-driven attempt to restrict the defence of duress, Lord Bingham in Hasan acknowledged that the logic of the argument for extending the defence to murder is irresistible.⁴¹³ This call for reform was endorsed by the Law Commission.

LAW COMMISSION, MURDER,
MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE
(LAW COM NO.304), (2006), PARAS

“A full defence to first degree murder

In the CP, we provisionally proposed a different approach in relation to first degree murder [and duress] ... There were two main reasons:

- (1) We thought it important that there should be consistency with the partial defences of provocation and diminished responsibility, both of which we were proposing should reduce first degree murder to second degree murder;
- (2) It would not be right for a person who had intentionally killed to be completely exonerated ...

We now believe that, in this context, we exaggerated the importance of treating duress in a manner that was consistent with the way provocation and diminished responsibility fitted into our proposed structure ...

We also acknowledge that we exaggerated the strength of the case for duress being a partial defence to first degree murder merely because, under our proposals, there would be more categories of murder. We now accept that ... the mere fact that there are more categories of murder does not assist in deciding whether or not as a matter of principle duress should be a full defence to first degree murder ...

The argument that duress should be a full defence to first degree murder has a moral basis. It is that the law should not stigmatise a person who, on the basis of a genuine and reasonably held belief, intentionally killed in fear of death or life-threatening injury in circumstances where a jury is satisfied that an ordinary person of reasonable fortitude might have acted in the same way ...

[W]e believe that there is ... force in the views expressed by consultees who believe that duress should be a complete defence to first degree murder. For example, [one consultee] said that withholding duress as a complete defence implies that the criminal law should support the view that ‘people ought to act in an exceptionally moral and courageous way. They are being punished for giving way to what will often be enormous fear and wholly understandable human frailty.’

We also think it important to bear in mind the stringent qualifying conditions that attach to the defence. In particular, the majority in Hasan were firmly of the view that the defence ought not to be available to D if he or she saw or ought to have foreseen the risk of being subjected to any compulsion by threats of violence. We believe that this will serve to exclude the most unmeritorious cases where the defence should simply not be available. It is true that it will not itself exclude all undeserving cases but we believe that juries should be trusted not to accept the defence in undeserving cases.

Above all, we believe that it is essential to recognize and accord proper weight to the fact that for the defence to succeed, a jury must form a judgement that a reasonable person in D's position might have committed first degree murder. If a jury forms that judgment, we believe that D should be completely exonerated despite having intentionally killed.”

4-199

The Law Commission's proposals in this respect are to be supported: duress should be a defence to all crimes.⁴¹⁴ What the defendant has done remains wrong but we can understand his predicament and excuse him. Given the severe threats, his actions are in effect morally involuntary. Perhaps if the majority in Abbott had realised this they might have produced a different result. Instead they seemed to think they were dealing with a justificatory defence when they spoke of duress bringing the defendant's act “within the law”.⁴¹⁵ Lord Mackay in Howe spoke of a defendant subject to duress having a “right” to commit a crime.⁴¹⁶ This is simply not so. With excusatory defences one has no “right” to commit crimes. One is simply excused from blame: “To acquit him on grounds of duress is merely to sympathise, understand, commiserate with what he did”.⁴¹⁷

C. DURESS OF CIRCUMSTANCES

4-200

As seen earlier, until fairly recently it was clear that no general defence of necessity existed in English law. However, starting in the 1980s, the judiciary has been actively developing this area of law in a way that “can be likened to the overnight growth of a mushroom”.⁴¹⁸ Rather than simply introducing or developing a new full-blown defence of necessity, the courts have chosen to expand the defence of duress by threats to cover what is termed “duress of circumstances”. While often describing the defence as “necessity or duress of circumstances” or even as “duress of necessity”⁴¹⁹ the courts have been careful to ensure that the new defence of “duress of circumstances” has largely followed the contours of the existing defence of duress by threats. By emphasising the similarities between the two defences and, importantly, imposing similar rigorous restraints upon the defence, judges have been able to overcome their reluctance to admit a defence of necessity into English law.

The emergence of this defence occurred “more or less by accident”.⁴²⁰ In Willer,⁴²¹ the defendant was charged with reckless driving when he drove on a pavement to escape from a gang of youths. It was held that regardless of whether necessity had been established or was available, the defence of “duress of circumstances” was applicable.⁴²² “Duress of circumstances” was also considered in the case of Conway, another case of reckless driving.⁴²³ The defendant pleaded that he had to make off in his car when approached by two men (who were in fact police officers) because his passenger was fearful of an attack. In saying that the defence of duress of circumstances should have been put to the jury, the Court of Appeal indicated that it was immaterial whether the defence was called necessity or duress. In Bell,⁴²⁴ the Queen’s Bench Divisional Court referred to the defence that was available to the defendant who had driven with excess alcohol in his blood in order to escape attackers as “duress/necessity”.

R. v MARTIN (1989) 88 CR. APP. R.
343 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4–201

The defendant was charged with driving whilst disqualified under the Road Traffic Act 1972 s.99(b). The facts appear from the judgment.

SIMON BROWN J:

“The circumstances which the appellant desired to advance by way of defence of necessity were essentially these. His wife has suicidal tendencies. On a number of occasions before the day in question she had attempted to take her own life. On the day in question her son, the appellant’s stepson, had overslept. He had done so to the extent that he was bound to be late for work and at risk of losing his job unless, so it was asserted, the appellant drove him to work. The appellant’s wife was distraught. She was shouting, screaming, banging her head against a wall. More particularly, it is said she was threatening suicide unless the appellant drove the boy to work.

The defence had a statement from a doctor which expressed the opinion that ‘in view of her mental condition it is likely that Mrs Martin would have attempted suicide if her husband did not drive her son to work.’

The appellant’s case ... was that he genuinely, and he would suggest reasonably, believed that his wife would carry out that threat unless he did as she demanded. Despite his disqualification he therefore drove the boy. He was in fact apprehended by the police within about a quarter of a mile of the house.

Sceptically though one may regard that defence on the facts ... the sole question before this court is whether those facts, had the jury accepted they were or might be true, amounted in law to a defence ... As it was, such a defence was pre-empted by the ruling. Should it have been?

In our judgment the answer is plainly not. The authorities are now clear. Their effect is perhaps most conveniently to be found in the judgment of this court in R. v Conway. The decision reviews earlier relevant authorities.

The principles may be summarised thus. First, English law does, in extreme circumstances, recognise a defence of necessity. Most commonly this defence arises as duress, that is pressure on the accused’s will from the wrongful threats or violence of another. Equally however it can arise from other objective dangers threatening the accused or others. Arising thus it is conveniently called ‘duress of circumstances’.

Secondly, the defence is available only if, from an objective standpoint, the accused can be said to be acting reasonably and proportionately in order to avoid a threat of death or serious injury.

Thirdly, assuming the defence to be open to the accused on his account of the facts, the issue should be left to the jury, who should be directed to determine these two questions: first, was the accused, or may he have been, impelled to act as he did because as a result of what he reasonably believed to be the situation he had good cause to fear that otherwise death or serious physical injury would result? Second, if so, would a sober person of reasonable firmness, sharing the characteristics of the accused, have responded to that situation by acting as the accused acted? If the answer to both those questions was Yes, then the jury would acquit; the defence of necessity would have been established... We see no material distinction between offences of reckless driving and driving whilst disqualified so far as the application and scope of this defence is concerned. Equally we can see no distinction in principle between various threats of death; it matters not whether the risk of death is by murder or by suicide or indeed by accident. One can illustrate the latter by considering a disqualified driver being driven by his wife, she suffering a heart attack in remote countryside and he needing instantly to get her to hospital.

It follows from this that the judge quite clearly did come to a wrong decision on the question of law, and the appellant should have been permitted to raise this defence for what it was worth before the jury.”

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed

R. v POMMELL [1995] 2 CR. APP. R.
607 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-202

The defendant was found by police at 8am at home in bed with a loaded sub-machine gun. He was charged with possession of a firearm, contrary to the Firearms Act 1968 s.5(1)(a). In his defence, he pleaded that he had taken the gun from someone the night before to prevent that person shooting some people who had killed a friend. He claimed that he had intended to take the gun to the police in the morning. He was convicted, the judge ruling that his failure to go to the police immediately robbed him of the defence of necessity.

KENNEDY LJ:

“There is an obvious attraction in the argument that if A finds B in possession of a gun which he is about to use to commit a crime, and if A is then able to persuade B to hand over the gun so that A may hand it to the police, A should not immediately upon taking possession of the gun become guilty of a criminal offence ...

The strength of the argument that a person ought to be permitted to breach the letter of the criminal law in order to prevent a greater evil befalling himself or others has long been recognised ... but it has, in English law, not given rise to a recognised general defence of necessity, and in relation to the charge of murder, the defence has been specifically held not to exist (see Dudley and Stephens). Even in relation to other offences, there are powerful arguments against recognising the general defence ... [His Lordship then cited the Canadian decision of Perka v R. (1985) 13 D.L.R. 1, where the court thought that a general defence would make the law too subjective, would enable illegal acts to be validated on the basis of expediency and would invite courts to second guess the Legislature.]

However, that does not really deal with the situation where someone commendably infringes a regulation in order to prevent another person from committing what everyone would accept as being a greater evil with a gun. In that situation it cannot be satisfactory to leave it to the prosecuting authority not to prosecute ...

It was, as it seems to us, to meet this difficulty that the limited defence of duress of circumstances has been developed in English law in relation to road traffic offences ... Professor Sir John Smith has written:

‘All the cases so far have concerned road traffic offences but there are no grounds for supposing that the defence is limited to that kind of case. On the contrary, the defence, being closely related to the defence of duress by threats, appears to be general, applying to all crimes except murder, attempted murder and some forms of treason.’
See [1992] Crim. L.R. 176.

We agree ...

That leads us to the conclusion that in the present case the defence was open to the appellant ... That leaves the question as to his continued possession of the gun thereafter ... In our judgment, a person who has taken possession of a gun in circumstances where he has the defence of duress by circumstances must ‘desist from committing the crime as soon as he reasonably can’ (Smith and Hogan, 7th edn p.239) ... However, the situation does not seem to us to have been sufficiently clear cut [to remove the defence] ... in the present case.”

Appeal allowed. Retrial ordered

4–203

This approach has been followed in numerous other decisions⁴²⁵ where it has been emphasised that both species of duress are governed by the same principles, which were canvassed above. Importantly, this means that the defence is not available to murder, attempted murder and certain forms of treason. However, the rather different nature of the defences has involved some inevitable divergence in the application of the two defences. For example, as already seen, for duress by threats there must be a link between the threat and the crime whereas for duress of circumstances there is no such requirement. Further, the courts have taken a more flexible approach to the requirement of imminence with duress of circumstances than that pertaining to duress by threats.

In reality, duress of circumstances covers situations that are termed “necessity” in other jurisdictions. However, necessity is widely regarded as a justificatory defence. On that basis, duress of circumstances could logically be regarded similarly as a justification. However, by building on the blocks of duress by threats, the courts have been able to develop duress of circumstances as an excusatory defence.⁴²⁶ It is recognised that defendants have done wrong but we do not think it appropriate, because of their plight, to blame them. This means that defendants can only be excused if they are able to satisfy stringent requirements: their will must be overborne by threats of death or serious bodily harm.

Such an approach leaves no scope for a claim that actions were justified and that the defendant’s will was not overborne. In Jones (Margaret),⁴²⁷ the defendants argued that their actions in conspiring to cause criminal damage to an air-force base (where preparations were being made for war) were necessary in order to prevent an illegal war.⁴²⁸ Just as in Shayler,⁴²⁹ the court regarded this as, if anything,⁴³⁰ an excusatory plea of duress of circumstances. Yet this does not satisfactorily reflect the reality of the defendants' claim. A further illustration is the case of Quayle in which a number of appeals were heard together.⁴³¹ All involved the possession or supply of cannabis for relief from chronic and acute pain. The Court of Appeal described the defendants' pleas as "necessity by extraneous circumstances" and took the view that, following Hasan, a restrictive approach to the defence was applicable. It was not possible to plead it in circumstances where it would legitimise conduct that was contrary to the clear legislative policy and scheme relating to controlled drugs.⁴³² In dismissing the appeals the Court of Appeal concluded:

"Where there is no imminent or immediate threat or peril, but only a general assertion of an internal motivation to engage in prohibited activities in order to prevent or alleviate pain, it is also difficult to identify any extraneous or objective factors by reference to which a jury could be expected to measure whether the motivation was such as to override the defendant's will or to force him to act as he did. If the response is that the defendant was not forced, but chose to act as he did, then [a continuous and deliberate course of otherwise unlawful self-help is unlikely to give rise to the defence]."⁴³³

4-204

In Quayle, the court rejected the argument that denying a defence in these circumstances amounted to a breach of the European Convention on Human Rights art.8. Similarly, in Altham,⁴³⁴ it was held that the denial of the defence did not breach art.3.

Recognition of the defence of excusatory necessity may, it seems, leave the development of justificatory necessity perpetually in the shadows. In the Draft Criminal Code Bill the Law Commission proposed statutory endorsement of the defence of duress of circumstances.⁴³⁵ Since then, the Law Commission has considered the whole defence of duress as part of its review of the law of homicide. Prefacing its recommendations with the statement that there are two forms of duress: duress by threats and duress of circumstances, the Report acknowledges that the issue of whether duress should be a defence to murder has been discussed primarily in relation to duress by threats.⁴³⁶ However, it takes the view that the general principles that govern duress of circumstances are substantially the same,⁴³⁷ and thus, if the stringent requirements for the defence were met, a defendant would, if the recommendations became law, be able to plead duress of circumstances to a charge of murder.

D. DURESS AND THE MODERN SLAVERY ACT 2015

4–205

The UK is obliged, by International conventions and EU law,⁴³⁸ to provide practical and effective protection of the rights of victims of trafficking. Providing protection in this context includes making provision not to penalise such victims for criminal involvement in unlawful activity that they have been compelled to commit.⁴³⁹ Whilst the Crown Prosecution Service had developed guidance to give effect to these international obligations when decisions were being made as to whether or not to prosecute the victims of trafficking,⁴⁴⁰ the Government felt that the additional protection of a statutory defence was required,⁴⁴¹ and this was enacted in the Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45.

MODERN SLAVERY ACT 2015 s.45:

4–206

- ”(1) A person is not guilty of an offence if—
- (a) the person is aged 18 or over when the person does the act which constitutes the offence,
 - (b) the person does that act because the person is compelled to do it,
 - (c) the compulsion is attributable to slavery or to relevant exploitation, and
 - (d) a reasonable person in the same situation as the person and having the person’s relevant characteristics would have no realistic alternative to doing that act.

(2) A person may be compelled to do something by another person or by the person's circumstances.

(3) Compulsion is attributable to slavery or to relevant exploitation only if—

(a) it is, or is part of, conduct which constitutes an offence under section 1 or conduct which constitutes relevant exploitation, or

(b) it is a direct consequence of a person being, or having been, a victim of slavery or a victim of relevant exploitation.

(4) A person is not guilty of an offence if—

(a) the person is under the age of 18 when the person does the act which constitutes the offence,

(b) the person does that act as a direct consequence of the person being, or having been, a victim of slavery or a victim of relevant exploitation, and

(c) a reasonable person in the same situation as the person and having the person's relevant characteristics would do that act.

(5) For the purposes of this section— 'relevant characteristics' means age, sex and any physical or mental illness or disability; 'relevant exploitation' is exploitation (within the meaning of section 3) that is attributable to the exploited person being, or having been, a victim of human trafficking.

(6) In this section references to an act include an omission.

(7) Subsections (1) and (4) do not apply to an offence listed in Schedule 4."

4-207

Schedule 4 provides that the s.45 defence does not apply to a large number of offences, including murder, manslaughter, kidnapping and false Imprisonment,⁴⁴² the offences under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 ss.18 and 20,⁴⁴³ criminal damage and arson,⁴⁴⁴ robbery, burglary and aggravated burglary,⁴⁴⁵ and most of the sexual offences under the Sexual Offences Act 2003.⁴⁴⁶ These offences were deemed to be too serious to be excused by the defence.⁴⁴⁷ Laird has suggested that the list of offences excluded by Sch.4 appears to be “somewhat arbitrary”, and that so many offences are included that “it has the potential to undermine the effectiveness of the defence. A great many victims ... will only have the common law defence of duress to fall back upon”.⁴⁴⁸

Section 45 creates two defences, one which applies to adults,⁴⁴⁹ and one applicable to those under 18 years of age.⁴⁵⁰

1. The adult defence

4–208

The elements of the adult defence are as follows:

- (i) D Is 18 or over when the act constituting the offence Is committed;
- (ii) D does the act because they are compelled to do It;
- (iii) the compulsion Is attributable to slavery or relevant exploitation, and
- (iv) a reasonable person in the same situation as D and having D’s relevant characteristics would have no realistic alternative to doing that act.

Although compulsion Is an essential feature of both this defence and the common law defence of duress, the defences differ in that the statutory defence does not require that the compulsion be made apparent via threats of death or serious bodily harm. Although ‘compulsion’ is unfortunately not defined In the Act, it appears that it Is intended to be interpreted in a broad fashion, and that specific evidence of threats or force is not required.⁴⁵¹ The compulsion may emanate from a person or persons, or from the defendant’s circumstances.⁴⁵² However, the compulsion must be “attributable to slavery or relevant exploitation”. Section 45(3) provides that compulsion is attributable to slavery or to relevant exploitation only if: (a) it is, or is part of, conduct which amounts to an offence under the Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.1 (slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour), or conduct which constitutes relevant exploitation,⁴⁵³ and (b) it is a direct consequence of D being, or having been, a victim of slavery or a victim of relevant exploitation. This raises questions as to the extent to which a causal link between the compulsion and the offence committed is required: the use of the phrase “direct consequences” suggests that causation is required, although it may be argued that s.45(3)(a) suggests that “something less than but for causation will suffice”.⁴⁵⁴ It is a pity that Parliament has left this issue to be clarified by the courts.

2. The under 18’s defence

4–209

The elements of the defence in relation to children are as follows:

- (i) D Is under 18 at the time of committing the act which constitutes the offence;
- (ii) D does that act as a direct consequence of being, or having been, a victim of slavery or relevant exploitation, and
- (iii) A reasonable person in the same situation as D and having D’s relevant characteristics would do that act.

Compulsion is not required if the defendant Is under 18 at the time that the offence is committed.

3. The level of fortitude required

4–210

In common with the defence of duress, s.45 adopts an objective test in relation to the level of fortitude required. However, as Laird has indicated, applying an entirely objective test to victims of slavery or exploitation is inherently problematic:

”Requiring victims of slavery and trafficking to show the same level of fortitude as ‘normal people’ is deeply problematic, given the nature of their circumstances ...

The reasonable person is to be placed in the same situation as the defendant. Presumably this envisages the ‘reasonable victim of slavery or relevant exploitation'. This, however, demonstrates the problem with invoking the reasonable person test in these circumstances. Either this makes the enquiry essentially subjective, which surely cannot have been intended ... or it requires a victim of slavery or relevant exploitation to be evaluated against a standard they could not possibly have been expected to achieve. Additionally, having never been victims of slavery, this might be a difficult test for the jury to apply."⁴⁵⁵

The definition of "relevant characteristics" in s.45(5) is the same as the characteristics which were held in Bowen to be relevant to duress,⁴⁵⁶ meaning that the problems arising in relation to the relevance of characteristics to the common law defence have been imported into this section.

4. Expanding duress to accommodate victims of slavery and trafficking

4-211

In VSJ, it was argued by Anti-Slavery International, who intervened in the appeal, that the court should expand the common law defence of duress in relation to the victims of trafficking, so that it complied with the UK's international law obligations, by putting those who were unable to rely on the s.45 defence because it was not in force at the time that their offence was committed,⁴⁵⁷ in the same position as those who could rely on s.45.⁴⁵⁸ The Court of Appeal, agreeing with the view expressed in R. v van Doo,⁴⁵⁹ that the defence of duress should not be expanded in cases involving credible victims of trafficking, firmly rejected this submission:

"The present law of duress is clear. Its scope and limits are set out in cases of the highest authority. Parliament has considered the position. It enacted s.45 without providing for retrospective provision. In the circumstances it would require instances of clear injustice to justify a court amending the law of duress as applicable to victims of trafficking who were not able to take advantage of the 2015 Act. We have seen no evidence of such instances ... We see no reason to develop the law of duress in the way suggested."⁴⁶⁰

E. NECESSITY

4–212

The defence of necessity is well-established in other jurisdictions and applies to situations where a defendant chooses to commit a crime in order to avert a greater evil. For example, in the Missouri decision of State v Green,⁴⁶¹ the defendant committed the crime of escaping from prison in order to avoid being raped.

1. Distinction between necessity and duress of circumstances

4–213

All the cases on duress of circumstances, considered above, concern situations of necessity and we have seen that many recent cases use the terms “duress of circumstances” and “necessity” interchangeably as simply being “different labels for essentially the same thing”.⁴⁶²

There are, however, important differences between the two defences. Necessity is widely regarded in other jurisdictions as a justificatory defence whereas, as seen, the defence of duress of circumstances has been viewed as an excuse by English law. This difference in theoretical approach has important consequences for the rules that govern the developing defences,⁴⁶³ although it has to be accepted that the courts are not always clear or consistent in their application of these rules.⁴⁶⁴

First, duress of circumstances is a defence only when there has been a threat of death or serious injury. With an excusatory defence, the essence of which involves the defendant’s will being overborne and the actions being morally involuntary, one can perhaps understand the view that this will only be so if the threat is truly awesome as in the case of a threat of death or serious injury. With a justificatory defence, however, the emphasis is on the actor making a choice between two evils and pursuing the lesser of them. So, with necessity the threat need not be of death or serious injury. The essence of the defence is that it involves a balancing of evils. The threat can take any form but the crime committed by the defendant must involve a lesser evil.

Secondly, with duress of circumstances the threat must be “imminent” in the sense of being operative on the mind of the defendant and overbearing his or her will. With necessity, the principle is one of “necessity, not emergency”.⁴⁶⁵ A rational choice is made to avert a greater evil that will necessarily occur even if it would be some time before it occurs.

Thirdly, the cases on duress of circumstances have allowed certain aspects of the vulnerability of the defendant to be taken into account; the test is whether the reasonable person, sharing the same characteristics as the defendant, would have given in to the threats. This is an appropriate test for determining whether a person should be excused because his will was overborne. With necessity, the focus is on the balancing of evils and not on the particular defendant’s condition. There should be no scope for making allowance for the defendant’s condition or vulnerability.

Finally, duress of circumstances is not a defence to murder, attempted murder or certain forms of treason. With necessity, the focus is on the balancing of evils and judging the choices of the defendant. In principle, necessity ought to be a defence when the defendant kills one person in order to save the lives of more than one person.

2. The traditional approach of English law

4–214

Until the development of duress of circumstances in the 1980s, it was commonly thought that a defence of necessity did not exist in English law.⁴⁶⁶ In *O’Toole*⁴⁶⁷ and Wood v Richards,⁴⁶⁸ an ambulance driver and a police officer, respectively, were involved in car accidents while rushing to answer emergency calls. Both were convicted of road traffic offences, necessity being no defence.⁴⁶⁹ In Kitson,⁴⁷⁰ a passenger woke up drunk in a car to find it running downhill; he steered the car on to a grass verge to avoid a possible accident; he was convicted of driving while under the influence of drink; the defence of necessity was not even raised. And in Southwark LBC v Williams where defendants in dire need of housing accommodation entered empty houses owned by the local authority, it was held that the defence of necessity did not apply. Lord Denning MR stated:

“If homelessness were once admitted as a defence to trespass, no one’s house could be safe. Necessity would open a door which no man could shut. It would not only be those in extreme need who would enter. There would be others who would imagine that they were in need, or would invent a need, so as to gain entry.”⁴⁷¹ and Edmund Davis LJ held:

“[T]he law regards with the deepest suspicion any remedies of self-help, and permits those remedies to be resorted to only in very special circumstances. The reason for such circumspection is clear—necessity can very easily become simply a mask for anarchy.”⁴⁷²

4–215

However, later in the same case Edmund-Davis LJ stated:

“[I]t appears that all the cases where a plea of necessity has succeeded are cases which deal with an urgent situation of imminent peril; for example, the forcible feeding of an obdurate suffragette ... or performing an abortion to avert a grave threat to the life, or ... health of a pregnant young girl who had been ravished in circumstances of great brutality.”⁴⁷³

This apparent recognition of the defence of necessity in extreme cases demonstrates that there has never been a blanket condemnation of it in all guises and in all situations. The following two situations require separate consideration.

(i) Medical treatment

4–216

Edmund-Davies LJ spoke of the forced feeding of suffragettes and emergency abortions being defended on the basis of necessity. More recently, one interpretation of the case of *Gillick*⁴⁷⁴ is that it involved a “hidden” defence of necessity. The doctor who prescribes contraceptive advice or treatment to a girl under the age of 16 does not commit the offence of aiding and abetting underage sexual intercourse if he does so (inter alia) in the belief that unless she receives it her physical or mental health would be likely to suffer.⁴⁷⁵

In F v West Berkshire HA,⁴⁷⁶ it was held that doctors were justified in carrying out a sterilisation operation upon a woman who was incapable of giving informed consent because of her mental handicap. Lord Goff's argument was based upon necessity; there was a grave risk of her becoming pregnant if she was not sterilised and it was agreed that such a condition would have a very disturbing impact upon her.⁴⁷⁷

What is significant about this development is that necessity is not used to excuse wrongful conduct but to justify conduct as the right thing to do. "[T]here is no question of the defence depending on the actor's resistance being overcome".⁴⁷⁸ An example given by Lord Goff during his speech makes this clear: "a man who seizes another and forcibly drags him from the path of an oncoming vehicle, thereby saving him from injury or even death, commits no wrong".⁴⁷⁹

The Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993 recognises this underdeveloped justificatory defence in cl.36(2) by explicitly retaining "any distinct defence of necessity" at the same time as it codified duress by threats and duress of circumstances.⁴⁸⁰

(ii) Statutory defences that are in substance necessity

4-217

Some statutes expressly provide defences that are in substance defences of necessity. For example, fire-engines, police and ambulances are exempted from observing the speed limit in certain circumstances,⁴⁸¹ and in specified circumstances they may treat a red traffic light as a warning to give way.⁴⁸² In such cases it is not possible to plead a general defence of necessity. The only possible defence is under the regulation itself.⁴⁸³ Another important statutory example is that in order to protect property that is in immediate need of protection, it is permissible to destroy the property of another person.⁴⁸⁴ This provision is meant, of course, to provide a defence to, say, a fireman who breaks down a door in order to rescue the occupants of a burning building. Remarkably, however, in 2008 a jury acquitted six climate change protesters charged with criminal damage to a coal fired power station, having heard defence arguments that the damage caused was lawfully excused by the need to prevent the even greater damage caused by climate change.⁴⁸⁵

Further, many statutes contain phrases such as “unlawful”, “without lawful excuse” or “without reasonable excuse”, which may be construed to cover situations in which a defence of necessity might be appropriate: for example, the old Forgery Act 1913 ss.8–10 prohibited the possession of forged bank notes “without lawful authority or excuse”.⁴⁸⁶ In Wuyts,⁴⁸⁷ it was held that if the defendant’s sole purpose in retaining possession of the notes was to hand them to the police, it would have been a “lawful excuse”.⁴⁸⁸

(iii) Necessity in relation to homicide

4–218

One of the greatest handicaps to the development of a general defence of necessity has been that the issue has usually arisen in homicide cases where “there is always a corpse, casting a shadow across the proceedings”.⁴⁸⁹

R. V DUDLEY AND STEPHENS (1884) 14 Q.B.D. 273 (QUEENS BENCH DIVISION):

4–219

The two defendants, with a third man and a 17-year-old boy, were cast away on the high seas in an open boat, 1,600 miles from land. They drifted in the boat for 20 days. When they had been eight days without food and six days without water, and fearing they would all die soon without some sustenance, the defendants killed the boy, who was likely to die first. The men ate his flesh and drank his blood for four days. They were then rescued by a passing vessel and were subsequently charged with murder. The jury found the facts of the case in a special verdict and the case was referred to the Queen's Bench Division for its decision.

LORD COLERIDGE CJ:

“[T]he prisoners put to death a weak and unoffending boy upon the chance of preserving their own lives by feeding upon his flesh and blood after he was killed, and with a certainty of depriving him of any possible chance of survival. The verdict finds in terms that: ‘if the men had not fed upon the body of the boy, they would probably have not survived ...’ and that ‘the boy, being in a much weaker condition, was likely to have died before them’. They might possibly have been picked up next day by a passing ship; they might not have been picked up at all; in either case it is obvious that the killing of the boy would have been an unnecessary and profitless act. It is found by the verdict that the boy was incapable of resistance, and, in fact, made none ...

[I]t is admitted that the deliberate killing of this unoffending and unresisting boy was clearly murder, unless the killing can be justified by some well-recognised excuse admitted by the law. It is further admitted that there was in this case no such excuse, unless the killing was justified by what has been called ‘necessity.’ But the temptation to the act which existed here was not what the law has ever called necessity. Nor is this to be regretted. Though law and morality are not the same, and though many things may be immoral which are not necessarily illegal, yet the absolute divorce of law from morality would be of fatal consequence, and such divorce would follow if the temptation to murder in this case were to be held by law an absolute defence of it. It is not so. To preserve one's life is generally speaking, a duty, but it may be the plainest and the highest duty to sacrifice it. War is full of instances in which it is a man's duty not to live, but to die ...

It is not needful to point out the awful danger of admitting the principle which has been contended for. Who is to be the judge of this sort of necessity? By what measure is the comparative value of lives to be measured? Is it to be strength, or intellect, or what? It is plain that the principle leaves to him who is to profit by it to determine the necessity which will justify him in deliberately taking another's life to save his own. In this case the weakest, the youngest, the most unresisting was chosen. Was it more necessary to kill him than one of the grown men? The answer be, No ...

It must not be supposed that, in refusing to admit temptation to be an excuse for crime, it is forgotten how terrible the temptation was; how awful the suffering; how hard in such trials to keep the judgment straight and the conduct pure. We are often compelled to set up standards we cannot reach ourselves, and to lay down rules which we could not ourselves satisfy. But a man has no right to declare temptation to be an excuse, though he might himself have yielded to it, nor allow compassion for the criminal to change or weaken in any manner the legal definition of the crime. It is therefore our duty to declare that the prisoners' act in this case was wilful murder."

Judgment for the Crown. Sentence of death, later commuted to six months' imprisonment

B. N. CARDOZO, "LAW AND LITERATURE" FROM SELECTED WRITINGS (1947), P.390:

4-220

"Where two or more are overtaken by a common disaster, there is no right on the part of one to save the lives of some by the killing of another. There is no rule of human jettison. Men there will often be who, when told that their going will be the salvation of the remnant, will choose the nobler part and make the plunge into the waters. In that supreme moment the darkness for them will be illuminated by the thought that those behind will ride to safety. If none of such mould are found aboard the boat, or too few to save the others, the human freight must be left to meet the chances of the waters. Who shall choose in such an hour between the victims and the saved? Who shall know when masts and sails of rescue may emerge out of the fog?"

UNITED STATES V HOLMES 26 FED. CAS. 360 (1842) (CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT, PENNSYLVANIA):

The defendant along with eight other seamen and 32 passengers were in an overcrowded lifeboat. Fearing that the boat would sink he threw 16 passengers overboard. The crew were directed “‘not to part man and wife, and not to throw over any women.’ There was no other principle of selection.” The next morning the survivors in the boat were all rescued.

BALDWIN CJ (directing jury):

“[M]an, in taking away the life of a fellow being, assumes an awful responsibility to God, and to society; and that the administrators of public justice do themselves assume that responsibility if, when called on to pass judicially upon the act, they yield to the indulgence of misapplied humanity. It is one thing to give a favourable interpretation to evidence in order to mitigate an offence. It is a different thing, when we are asked, not to extenuate, but to justify, the act ... [T]he case does not become ‘a case of necessity’, unless all ordinary means of self-preservation have been exhausted. The peril must be instant, overwhelming, leaving no alternative but to lose our own life, or to take the life of another person ...

[He then held that the seamen should have been sacrificed first as they were not in an equal position with the passengers as ‘the sailor is bound ... to undergo whatever hazard is necessary to preserve the boat and the passengers’. As between equals the decision as to who should be sacrificed should be made by drawing lots.]

When the solution has been made by lots, the victim yields of course to his fate, or, if he resists, force may be employed to coerce submission. Whether or not ‘a case of necessity’ has arisen, or whether the law under which death has been inflicted have been so exercised as to hold the executioner harmless, cannot depend on his own opinion; for no man may pass upon his own conduct when it concerns the rights and especially, when it affects the lives, of others ... [H]omicide is sometimes justifiable; and the law defines the occasions in which it is so. The transaction must, therefore, be justified to the law ...

[The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant who had already been confined in jail for several months was sentenced to six months’ imprisonment with hard labour and fined $20. The penalty was subsequently remitted.]”

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, MODEL
PENAL CODE, TENT. DRAFT NO.8

(1958), COMMENTS TO ART.3, PP.8–9:

4-221

“It would be particularly unfortunate to exclude homicidal conduct from the scope of the defense ... For recognising that the sanctity of life has a supreme place in the hierarchy of values, it is nonetheless true that conduct which results in taking life may promote the very value sought to be protected by the law of homicide. Suppose, for example, that the actor has made a breach in a dike, knowing that this will inundate a farm, but taking the only course available to save a whole town. If he is charged with homicide of the inhabitants of the farm house, he can rightly point out that the object of the law of homicide is to save life, and that by his conduct he has effected a net saving of innocent lives. The life of every individual must be assumed in such a case to be of equal value and the numerical preponderance in the lives saved compared to those sacrificed surely establishes an ethical and legal justification for the act. So too a mountaineer, roped to a companion who has fallen over a precipice who holds on as long as possible but eventually cuts the rope, must certainly be granted the defense that he accelerated one death slightly but avoided the only alternative, the certain death of both.

... [T]he evil sought to be avoided [must] be a greater evil than that sought to be protected by the law defining the offense. For the result is that the defense would not be available to a defendant who killed A to save B, in circumstances where had he done nothing B would have been killed and A saved, assuming, of course, that there was not ... aggression on either's part ... Nor would the defense be available to one who acted to save himself at the expense of another, as by seizing a raft when men are shipwrecked ... In all ordinary circumstances lives in being must be assumed, as we have said, to be of equal value, equally deserving the protection of the law.”

Dudley and Stephens has, subsequently, received judicial confirmation.

R. v HOWE [1987] 1 A.C. 417 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

For facts see [para.4-194]

LORD HAILSHAM LC:

“[I]f we were to allow this appeal [against a conviction for murder on the basis of duress], we should, I think, also have to say that Dudley and Stephens was bad law. There is, of course, an obvious distinction between duress and necessity as potential defences; duress arises from the wrongful threats of violence of another human being and necessity arises from any other objective dangers threatening the accused. This, however, is in my view a distinction without a relevant difference, since on this view duress is only that species of the genus of necessity which is caused by wrongful threats. I cannot see that there is any way in which a person of ordinary fortitude can be excused from the one type of pressure on his will rather than the other.”

Lord Hailsham’s view is that because the defences of duress and necessity are so similar, neither is available to the person who kills. This could be regarded as implicit acknowledgment of the existence of a defence of necessity to crimes other than murder, attempted murder and certain forms of treason. Perhaps it was dicta such as these that permitted the rapid development of the defence of duress of circumstances.

All the above extracts rightly treat necessity as a justificatory defence. In Dudley and Stephens, Lord Coleridge expressed the view that a defence of necessity would alter “the legal definition of the crime” which would only be the case if it acted as justificatory defence. This approach raises the intractable problem discussed in Dudley and Stephens and in Holmes of having to decide whose lives should be sacrificed. Perhaps the law might have developed in a different direction if the defendants in Dudley and Stephens had been viewed as pleading an excuse. It was not a case of the lives of the three men being superior to that of the cabin-boy. However, given that their lives were of equal value, due consideration should have been given to the awfulness of the situation they were in. The fact that their sentences were so rapidly commuted gives further strength to this argument. Indeed, it has been said that the pardon had been arranged well in advance of the sentences being passed.⁴⁹⁰

The shadow of Dudley and Stephens has long hung over English law. In 1974, the Law Commission proposed that a general defence of necessity be introduced into English law.⁴⁹¹ However, three years later it rejected the idea, going so far as to say that if a defence of necessity already existed at common law, it should be abolished. It felt that allowing such a defence to a charge of murder could effectively legalise euthanasia in England. For “human rights” reasons it would not be prepared to see necessity covering a situation where “an immediate blood transfusion must be made in order to save an injured person: the only one who has the same blood type as the injured refuses to give blood. Can he be overpowered and the blood taken from him?”⁴⁹² Instead, the Draft Criminal Code Bill 1993 proposed a statutory formulation of duress of circumstances, cast as an excuse, but applying to all offences.

3. Emergence of a new defence?

4-224

By the turn of the century, English law thus appeared fairly settled. Whatever the nomenclature, necessity had been let in the back door under the guise of duress of circumstances and was viewed as an excuse with the implications discussed earlier, including the fact that it was not a defence to murder, attempted murder and certain forms of treason. This tranquillity was shattered by the following decision.

RE A (CONJOINED TWINS: SURGICAL SEPARATION) [2001] FAM.147 (COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION):

4-225

“Jodie” and “Mary” were conjoined twins. Leaving them joined would result in the death of both of them within six months. A separation operation would certainly result in the death of Mary who was not capable of separate survival but would give Jodie a good prospect of a normal life. The parents objected to the operation and an application was made to the High Court and then to the Court of Appeal for a declaration, inter alia, that the operation would be lawful despite the fact that it would result in the death of Mary under circumstances making the surgeons prima facie liable for murder.

WARD LJ:

“The first important feature is that the doctors cannot be denied a right of choice if they are under a duty to choose. They are under a duty to Mary not to operate because it will kill Mary, but they are under a duty to Jodie to operate because not to do so will kill her ... What then is the position where there is a conflict of duty? ... Wilson J ... in Perka v The Queen (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 1, 36 [stated]:

‘the ethical considerations of the “charitable and the good” must be kept analytically distinct from duties imposed by law. Accordingly, where necessity is invoked as a justification for violation of the law, the justification must, in my view, be restricted to situations where the accused’s act constitutes the discharge of a duty recognised by law. The justification is not, however, established simply by showing a conflict of legal duties. The rule of proportionality is central to the evaluation of a justification premised on two conflicting duties since the defence rests on the rightfulness of the accused’s choice of one over the other.’

So far I agree ... In [these] circumstances it seems to me that the law must allow an escape through choosing the lesser of the two evils. The law cannot say, ‘Heads I win, tails you lose.’ Faced as they are with an apparently irreconcilable conflict, the doctors should be in no different position from that in which the court itself was placed in the performance of its duty to give paramount consideration to the welfare of each child. The doctors must be given the same freedom of choice as the court has given itself and the doctors must make that choice along the same lines as the court has done, giving the sanctity of life principle its place in the balancing exercise that has to be undertaken. The respect the law must have for the right to life of each must go in the scales and weigh equally but other factors have to go in the scales as well. For the same reasons that led to my concluding that consent should be given to operate, so the conclusion has to be that the carrying out of the operation will be justified as the lesser evil and no unlawful act would be committed.”

BROOKE LJ:

“I have described how in modern times Parliament has sometimes provided ‘necessity’ defences in statutes and how the courts in developing the defence of duress of circumstances have sometimes equated it with the defence of necessity. They do not, however, cover exactly the same ground. In cases of pure necessity the actor’s mind is not irresistibly overborne by external pressures. The claim is that his or her conduct was not harmful because on a choice of two evils the choice of avoiding the greater harm was justified ...

I have considered very carefully the policy reasons for the decision in R. v Dudley and Stephens supported as it was by the House of Lords in R. v Howe. These are, in short, that there were two insuperable objections to the proposition that necessity might be available as a defence for the Mignonette sailors. The first objection was evident in the court’s questions: who is to be the judge of this sort of necessity? By what measure is the comparative value of lives to be measured? The second objection was that to permit such a defence would mark an absolute divorce of law from morality. In my judgment, neither of these objections are dispositive of the present case. Mary is, sadly, self-designated for a very early death. Nobody can extend her life beyond a very short span ... [With regard to the second objection] all that a court can say is that it is not at all obvious that this is the sort of clear-cut case, marking an absolute divorce from law and morality, which was of such concern to Lord Coleridge CJ and his fellow judges.

There are sound reasons for holding that the existence of an emergency in the normal sense of the word is not an essential prerequisite for the application of the doctrine of necessity. The principle is one of necessity, not emergency ...

If a sacrificial separation operation on conjoined twins were to be permitted in circumstances like these, there need be no room for the concern felt by Sir James Stephen that people would be too ready to avail themselves of exceptions to the law which they might suppose to apply to their cases, at the risk of other people’s lives. Such an operation is, and is always likely to be, an exceptionally rare event ...

According to Sir James Stephen there are three necessary requirements for the application of the doctrine of necessity: (i) the act is needed to avoid inevitable and irreparable evil; (ii) no more should be done than is reasonably necessary for the purpose to be achieved; (iii) the evil inflicted must not be disproportionate to the evil avoided. Given that the principles of modern family law point irresistibly to the conclusion that the interests of Jodie must be preferred to the conflicting interests of Mary, I consider that all three of these requirements are satisfied in this case.”

ROBERT WALKER LJ:

“Duress of circumstances can therefore be seen as a third or residual category of necessity, along with self-defence and duress by threats. I do not think it matters whether these defences are regarded as justifications or excuses. Whatever label is used, the moral merits of the defence will vary with the circumstances ...

In the absence of parliamentary intervention the law as to the defence of necessity is going to have to develop on a case by case basis ... I would extend it, if it needs to be extended, to cover this case. It is a case of doctors owing conflicting legal, and not merely social or moral, duties. It is a case where the test of proportionality is met, since it is a matter of life and death, and on the evidence Mary is bound to die soon in any event. It is not a case of evaluating the relative worth of two human lives, but of undertaking surgery without which neither life will have the bodily integrity, or wholeness, which is its due. It should not be regarded as a further step down a slippery slope because the case of conjoined twins presents an unique problem.”

4-228

The full implications of this decision are still unfolding. A narrower interpretation is that this is an extension of the “medical necessity” principle discussed above. Ward LJ limited his judgment to cases where there was a conflict between a doctor’s duties. A doctor is under a legal duty to do what is best for a patient. Here there were conflicting duties owed to the twins and, in exercising their duty, the doctors had to make a choice of the lesser of two evils. Although this narrower interpretation involves a significant extension of the law in that it allows doctors to kill their patients in these tightly-defined circumstances it does provide one of the many reasons why arguments in the courts that doctors should be able to plead necessity to a charge of assisting suicide (or even euthanasia) have been unsuccessful: in Re A, the conflict was resolved in favour of taking action to preserve at least one life. As Stark comments, this is what makes Re A distinguishable from cases such as Nicklinson, where the applicant sought to argue that it would not be unlawful for a doctor, to assist the termination of his life, on the basis that the defence of necessity would be available to such a person.⁴⁹³ In the words of the Court of Appeal in Nicklinson:

“[T]here is a world of difference between taking a life to save a life and taking a life because the deceased wishes it to end ... [Re A] is too slender a thread on which to hang such a far-reaching development of the common law.”⁴⁹⁴

A bolder interpretation of Re A is one which has the potential to lead to the development of a true defence of necessity, cut free from its theoretical links to duress. Many of the examples of necessity Brooke LJ cites and discusses extend beyond medical necessity and suggest a wider role for the defence.

IAN DENNIS, “ON NECESSITY AS A DEFENCE TO CRIME: POSSIBILITIES, PROBLEMS AND THE LIMITS OF JUSTIFICATION AND EXCUSE” (2009)
CRIM LAW AND PHILOS 29, 44–45:

4–229

“It would seem, although this is not completely clear, that he [Brooke LJ] regarded this form of necessity defence as an act-utilitarian principle. It is not a statement of the classic ‘lesser evils’ form of necessity because it allows for harm to be done equal to that which is threatened, as long as the harm done is not disproportionate ...

However, there are problems with an unqualified act-utilitarian principle. One of them is the potential devaluing of personal autonomy.

Suppose P, a hospital patient, urgently needs a blood transfusion to survive, but she has a very rare blood group. As it happens, Q, the patient in the next bed, has the same rare blood group, but refuses to make a donation of blood even though she could do so without risk to herself. May, D, the doctor treating P, take the blood from Q without her consent? The blood is needed to avoid ‘inevitable and irreparable evil’, and the physical harm done in the form of assault on Q to obtain the blood is not disproportionate to the harm threatened of P’s death. Is the assault on Q ‘no more than reasonably necessary to achieve the purpose of preventing P’s death?’ Everything then turns on the one word ‘reasonably’. A test of reasonableness is a flexible standard that inevitably requires an accommodation of competing values. But in states that subscribe to liberal democratic values personal autonomy is not something that can be traded against other values. Persons have rights to be treated as ends in themselves and not as means to the achievement of other social goals. Accordingly, if Q chose to assert her autonomy by refusing her consent to give blood that would normally be the end of the matter, but the principle adopted by Brooke LJ, applied without qualification, would leave the matter in doubt.”

4-230

Brooke LJ, when dealing with necessity as a defence to murder, was careful to limit his judgment to the killing of those already “designated for death”. This means that a defendant cannot choose (by whatever criterion) to throw four people off a boat to their death in order to save ten others: those four people have not been designated for death. Similarly, on the facts of Dudley and Stephens there would still not be a defence of necessity. While the cabin-boy was the weakest and most likely to die first, they could all have been rescued. He was not designated for death.

However, that still leaves situations, as the example from Dennis illustrates, where a defence of necessity could be pleaded to avoid “an inevitable and irreparable evil”. Brooke LJ’s interpretation could allow necessity as a defence to murder. For example, if after a car crash a driver and passenger were seriously injured but it was clear that the driver was dying with no prospect of recovery but the passenger’s life could be saved, it could be open to paramedics or other emergency services personnel to kill the driver in cutting them loose if that was the only means by which they could get to the passenger in time to save his or her life. Professor Sir John Smith used an even more telling example:

“Following the destruction of the World Trade Centre in New York by hijacked aircraft it now appears to be recognised that it would be lawful to shoot down the plane, killing all the innocent passengers and crew if this were the only way to prevent a much greater impending disaster ... Even if duress cannot be a defence to murder,⁴⁹⁵ it seems quite clear that necessity can.”⁴⁹⁶

What has yet to be determined is how far this will extend.

VI. Superior Orders

4-231

We have seen that the defence of duress can be rationalised on the basis that the defendant lacked effective and real choice in committing the crime; they were forced by someone else to do something that they were loath to do. In the same way, a subordinate may assert that they were forced by duty and loyalty to a superior to obey an order which lead them into conflict with the criminal law. Following this analogy it would seem that superior orders should constitute an excuse. The inferior has done wrong but is excused from blame. It is, however, clear that there is no such defence as superior orders in English law. Lord Salmon in the duress case of *Abbott*⁴⁹⁷ said that the idea of such a defence “has always been universally rejected” and Lord Hailsham took a similar position in Howe.⁴⁹⁸ In Chiu-Cheung,⁴⁹⁹ it was held that a person, who acted as an undercover agent to break a drug ring in Hong Kong, could be guilty of conspiring to traffic in dangerous drugs. The Privy Council confirmed that there was no general defence of superior orders as “neither the police, nor customs, nor any other members of the executive”⁵⁰⁰ had any power to alter the terms of the Hong Kong Ordinance that made the export of heroin unlawful even though the court acknowledged that what the defendant had done was courageous and from the best of motives. In Clegg, the House of Lords held that the soldier would not be entitled to be acquitted by virtue of superior orders as “no such general defence [is] known to English law”.⁵⁰¹ While such an approach might be uncontroversial in civil situations, the matter is not free from dispute in relation to military situations where it may be argued that the claims of duty, especially in war-time, are so strong as to warrant some kind of defence of superior orders.

MCCALL V MCDOWELL, 1 ABB 212
FED CAS. NO.8673 (1867) (CIRCUIT COURT OF CALIFORNIA):

4-232

DEATY J:

“I cannot but think that the law should excuse the military subordinate when acting in obedience to the orders of his commander. Otherwise he is placed in the dangerous dilemma of being liable in damages to a third party⁵⁰² for obedience of an order or to the loss of his commission and disgrace for disobedience thereto⁵⁰³ ... The first duty of a soldier is obedience, and without this there can be neither discipline nor efficiency in an army. If every subordinate officer and soldier were at liberty to question the legality of the orders of the commander ... the camp would be turned into a debating school, where the precious moment for action would be wasted in wordy conflicts between the advocates of conflicting opinions.”

4-233

There have been numerous cases⁵⁰⁴ in the US which have attempted to recognise the “practical dilemma”⁵⁰⁵ of the soldier by striking a balance between total immunity and total liability.

UNITED STATES V CALLEY 22
U.S.M.C.A. 534 (1973) (US COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS)

4-234

Lieutenant Calley was a platoon leader engaged in sweeping out the enemy in part of Vietnam. He was charged with the premeditated murder of 22 infants, children, women and old men. His defence was that he was acting under the direct orders of his commanding officer; he had been told that under no circumstances were they to leave Vietnamese alive as they passed through the villages. He was to “waste them”.

QUINN J:

”[There is] ample evidence from which to find that Lieutenant Calley directed and personally participated in the intentional killing of men, women and children who were unarmed and in the custody of soldiers ... [T]he uncontradicted evidence is that ... they were offering no resistance. In his testimony, Calley admitted he was aware of the requirement that prisoners be treated with respect ... he knew that the normal practice was to interrogate villagers, release those who could satisfactorily account for themselves and evacuate the suspect among them for further examination ...

We turn to the contention that the [trial] judge erred in his submission of the defense of superior orders to the court [by framing the instructions thus]: ‘[I]f you find that Lieutenant Calley received an order directing him to kill unresisting Vietnamese within his control ... that order (as a matter of law) would be an illegal order. A determination that an order is illegal does not, of itself, assign criminal responsibility to the person following the order for acts done in compliance with it ... [such] acts of a subordinate ... are excused and impose no criminal liability upon him unless the superior’s order is one which a man of ordinary sense and understanding would, under the circumstances, know to be unlawful, or if the order in question is actually known to the accused to be unlawful.’ ...

[Defence counsel urged that this was too high a standard for soldiers who may not be persons of ordinary sense and understanding; they argued for a lower test of ‘commonest understanding’] ... [W]hether Lieutenant Calley was the most ignorant person in the United States Army in Vietnam or the most intelligent, he must be presumed to know that he could not kill the people involved here ... [the order was] so palpably illegal that whatever conceptual difference there may be between a person of ‘commonest understanding’ and a person of ‘common understanding,’ that difference could not have had any impact on a court.”

This test of “palpable illegality” has been followed elsewhere. In the South African case of Banda, it was held that the defence was not available where the orders were “manifestly and palpably illegal and that a reasonable man in the circumstances of the soldier would know them to be”.⁵⁰⁷ This is also the test adopted by some international criminal law instruments. For example, the Rome Statute art.33(1)(c) establishing the International Criminal Court provides that a defence of superior orders can never be available to orders that are “manifestly unlawful”.⁵⁰⁸

The English approach of denying the existence of a defence of superior orders has been condemned as inappropriate and unrealistic.

IAN D. BROWNLIE, “SUPERIOR ORDERS—TIME FOR A NEW REALISM?” [1989] CRIM. L.R. 396, 411:

“It is inappropriate because the harm it is aimed at remedying, namely the abuse of executive fiat, is being perpetrated, if at all, by the superiors at various levels who have committed him to that situation. It is unrealistic because it requires the individual soldier to be able to make decisions on legal niceties in situations where sometimes his or her military competence and perhaps even instinct for physical survival will compel instant obedience. The strict ‘no-defence’ position is predicated upon assumptions about constitutional law and the possible consequences of allowing such a defence which cannot be demonstrated in practice ... On the contrary, therefore, it is submitted that courts should be allowed to decide the bona fides of such a defence on the basis that military orders which are not manifestly illegal may give rise to a mistake of law . [which should be relevant]. It is in this way that the interests of justice both for the individual soldier and for the wider civil society in which, increasingly, the soldier is becoming involved, will best be served.”

4-237

The problem with this analysis is that mistakes of law do not give rise to a defence in English law. Of course, the other general defence could be available to policemen or soldiers following orders. For example, a policeman could be ordered to shoot a suspected terrorist wrongly believed to be about to detonate a bomb. Such a policeman could claim putative self-defence if they satisfied the requirements for this defence (honest belief in the necessity to shoot to save the lives of others).⁵⁰⁹

Given judicial pronouncements against superior orders (and both duress and duress of circumstances as defences to murder) it seems most unlikely that any change will take place. Moreover, there must remain grave doubts as to the wisdom of introducing a defence that would allow soldiers to kill innocent persons deliberately and claim that their actions were excused.

VII. Involuntary Conduct

A. INTRODUCTION

4-238

The need for voluntary conduct, and some of the philosophical problems associated with the meaning of terms such as “voluntary” and “involuntary”, were discussed in Ch.2. A claim of involuntariness is a “denial of authorship”⁵¹⁰ and “it is only where defendants are agents and not mere causers of harm that they are to be regarded as responsible for causing that harm”.⁵¹¹ The object of this section is to examine the implications and consequences of a finding that conduct is involuntary. It is worth noting at the outset that the relationship between automatism, insanity and the law relating to defendants who commit offences whilst intoxicated is complex and that this area of law is currently under review by the Law Commission.⁵¹²

If conduct is involuntary there is no actus reus (and certainly no mens rea). This indicates that the defendant should be exempted completely from criminal liability. For example, in the Australian case of Cogden,⁵¹³ a woman, in a somnambulistic state, dreaming that her daughter was being attacked by ghosts, spiders and North Korean soldiers, axed her to death. She was acquitted on the ground that her actions were not voluntary. Because a finding of involuntariness can potentially lead to a complete acquittal (with the danger that the conduct could be repeated), English courts have approached the problem of involuntariness with great circumspection and have adopted a restrictive approach as to when there should be a complete exemption from liability. This caution has manifested itself in three ways.

1. Narrow definition of involuntariness

4-239

The criminal law has adopted a narrow interpretation of “involuntary conduct”. Not only is this because of the possibility of a complete acquittal, but also because of the difficulty of distinguishing a genuine claim from a fraudulent one. In Bratty v Attorney-General for Northern Ireland,⁵¹⁴ it was acknowledged that pleading a blackout is one of the first refuges of a guilty conscience and is a popular excuse.⁵¹⁵ Accordingly, the law has tended to take the view that there is a continuum of involuntariness ranging from complete absence of consciousness, through persons acting in a confused or semi-conscious manner, to those who actually know what they are doing but claim that their actions were morally involuntary because their will was overborne and they were forced to act as they did. The courts, in determining where to draw the line on this continuum, have been strongly influenced by the context, nature and dangerousness of the behaviour. In cases where the defendant is engaged in a particularly dangerous activity, such as driving a car, the law has adopted a strict stance that only a complete absence of consciousness will exempt from liability. In Broome v Perkins,⁵¹⁶ the defendant, when charged with driving without due care and attention, claimed to be in a hypoglycaemic condition. He was acquitted at first instance on the basis that his conduct was involuntary. However, an appeal by case stated resulted in a direction to the magistrates to convict. It was held that his actions were only automatic at intervals; at times “the respondent’s mind must have been controlling his limbs (from the evidence) and thus he was driving”.

J. C. SMITH, COMMENTARY TO BROOME V PERKINS [1987] CRIM.
L.R. 272:

4-240

“The defendant was held not to be in a state of automatism throughout his journey because, from time to time, he apparently exercised conscious control over his car veering away from other vehicles so as to avoid a collision, braking violently when approaching the back of another vehicle and so on. This is a very harsh decision, resulting in the conviction of a person who appears to have suffered a misfortune, not to have been at fault in any real sense and to have behaved most responsibly by going to the police and saying that he believed he must have been involved in a road accident.”

4-241

Despite this view, the same approach was adopted in Attorney-General’s Reference (No.2 of 1992) where it was held that conduct was only involuntary if there was a total loss of voluntary control. In this case, the defendant, a lorry driver, crashed into a broken-down vehicle parked on the hard shoulder of a motorway and killed two people. Experts described the defendant’s condition as “driving without awareness”.⁵¹⁷ Whilst not asleep, “the driver’s capacity to avoid a collision ceased to exist because of repetitive stimuli experienced on straight flat featureless motorways could induce a trance-like state”. However, the expert acknowledged that this amounted to reduced or imperfect awareness and, accordingly, the Court of Appeal ruled that this could not amount to involuntary conduct.

This very robust approach, requiring that there be a complete loss of voluntary control, was confirmed recently in Coley in which Hughes LJ stated that:

“The essence of ... [the defence] is that the movements or actions of the defendant at the material time were wholly involuntary. The better expression is complete destruction of voluntary control.”⁵¹⁸

As Coley concerned a defendant charged with attempted murder, the Law Commission is right to conclude that “the overwhelming weight of authority supports” the view that the requirement of total loss of control is not restricted to widely practiced dangerous activities, such as driving, only.⁵¹⁹

2. Preceding fault

4-242

The rationale for requiring voluntary conduct is that there can be no authorship or responsibility for involuntary conduct and, accordingly, blame is inappropriate. It is not a person’s fault if she is attacked and, in a state of concussion, causes harm to another. Punishment is not deserved and no deterrent goals can be achieved by holding such a person criminally liable. In some situations, however, it might be the defendant’s own fault that the state of involuntariness was brought about. In such cases, the courts, conscious of the fact that the defendant is not only blameworthy in precipitating the involuntariness but could do it again, have been careful to ensure that criminal liability is not evaded.

In Quick and Paddison, the defendant, a diabetic, was charged with an assault that occurred during a hypoglycaemic episode. This arose from eating too little and drinking too much alcohol after having taken insulin. It led to an aggressive outburst and an impairment of consciousness. Lawton LJ stated that:

“a self-induced incapacity will not excuse ... nor will one which could have been reasonably foreseen as a result of either doing, or omitting to do something, as, for example, taking alcohol against medical advice after using certain prescribed drugs, or failing to have regular meals while taking insulin.”⁵²⁰

So, while “accidental” hypoglycaemia could have secured an acquittal, Quick’s abuse of his body meant that he could be blamed for the ensuing hypoglycaemic episode. Although the conviction was actually reversed on appeal (on the basis that the issue of involuntariness should have been left to the jury), it was made clear that self-induced involuntariness will not provide a defence to crimes of basic intent.⁵²¹

4-243

What, however, is meant by “preceding fault” in this context? Must the defendant know that his conduct will cause the involuntary conduct or is it sufficient that the reasonable person would know this? In Quick and Paddison, the question was whether the incapacity could reasonably have been foreseen. In Bailey,⁵²² the defendant was a diabetic who had not taken sufficient food after a dose of insulin to combat its effects. It was held (somewhat controversially) that it was not common knowledge amongst diabetics that such failure could lead to aggressive, dangerous or unpredictable behaviour. Accordingly, it could not be inferred that the defendant knew of the risks and he should not be penalised for his lack of knowledge.⁵²³ One way of reconciling these cases would be to restrict the operation of the rule in Quick and Paddison to cases involving alcohol and drugs because it is so widely known that intoxicants can have such an effect⁵²⁴ and, because of the statistical correlation between intoxication and crime, policy demands that no relief from criminal liability be afforded to intoxicated persons. Such an approach is arguably supported by Hardie,⁵²⁵ where it was held that a defendant who took Valium could escape liability for subsequent involuntary conduct because it was not known to the defendant, nor generally known, that Valium could cause unpredictability and aggressiveness. The essence of the Quick and Paddison principle is that one can legitimately blame persons who, through their own fault, cause their own involuntary conduct. When such fault is established, the requirement of voluntariness is dispensed with—largely because that requirement is only there to protect the faultless.⁵²⁶ The question of whether one can only blame those who knew of the risks they were running or whether blame is appropriate because the risks were obvious and they ought to have appreciated them raises broadly the same issues as were canvassed in relation to the concepts of recklessness and negligence in Ch.2.

It is important that there be precision in locating the act alleged to be involuntary. The rule that preceding fault negates automatism could be employed in driving cases where the driver falls asleep or suffers some form of attack that could have been predicted.⁵²⁷ However, where the driver has previously had similar attacks, the act of driving can in itself amount to dangerous driving. In Marison,⁵²⁸ the defendant suffered a hypoglycaemic episode while driving; he lost control of the car and caused the death of another driver.⁵²⁹ It was held that even though the defendant had become an automaton at the moment of the accident, this was not a case of automatism. Being aware that he might have a hypoglycaemic attack while driving meant that the driver was “in a dangerously defective state due to diabetes”. The offence of dangerous driving had already been committed before the attack occurred.

3. Cause of involuntariness

4-244

Bearing in mind the central point that a finding of involuntariness can lead to a complete acquittal, the courts have been anxious to investigate the cause of the involuntary conduct. If the cause of the involuntary conduct is something internal to the defendant—a disease of the mind—then clearly there is the potential danger that the involuntary conduct could be repeated. Society could need protection from such persons. Accordingly, where the defendant is suffering from a disease of the mind the involuntary conduct is described as insane automatism. Such an insane defendant, while escaping formal criminal liability, nevertheless receives a special verdict of “not guilty by reason of insanity” whereupon the courts have power to restrain the person. On the other hand, if the cause of the involuntary conduct is something external to the defendant—such as a blow on the head—there is little chance of repetition; the defendant is not dangerous. Such cases are described as non-insane automatism—or simply automatism—and the defendant is afforded a complete acquittal. Given this critical distinction between insanity and automatism, one way in which the courts can reduce the number of defendants escaping all liability is to expand the category of insanity thereby reducing the scope of the defence of automatism. Reclassifying the sleep-walking Mrs Cogden, for example, as suffering from an internal rather than an external condition would have a profound impact upon her treatment by the law.

The distinction between insanity and automatism is thus one of fundamental importance and each will be considered in turn.

B. INSANITY

1. Introduction

4-245

The defence of insanity brings into sharp focus many of the issues discussed in previous chapters and has been the source of much debate.⁵³⁰ Requiring a jury to decide whether a person accused of a crime is to be punished as criminal or “treated” as insane forces two major questions to the surface. The first addresses itself to the premise upon which the sane individual is punished. We have seen in Ch.2 that inherent in the criminal justice system is a view of people as responsible agents. Individuals possess freedom of will and can choose one course of action rather than another. If they step outside the limits of legal action we are, therefore, justified in imposing blame and punishment. By the same argument, we cannot blame people who do not have this ability to choose or control their actions.⁵³¹ The insanity defence thus seeks to distinguish the responsible from those lacking responsibility. The difficulty lies in determining where the line between sanity and responsibility on the one hand, and insanity and irresponsibility on the other hand, is to be drawn. It has been increasingly argued that absolute states of sanity and insanity rarely (if ever) exist; instead there are shades of sanity. This attitude towards sanity and responsibility has expressed itself in a number of forms. For some commentators, it has necessitated a more rigorous approach to the search for the crucial dividing line. For them the question of ascertaining who is responsible has been made more important, not less. The same doubt has, however, led others to demand that the insanity defence (or the concept of responsibility itself) be abolished. As we shall see, however, where the insanity defence has been abolished or amended, as in some of the states in the US, it has often been in response to criticisms other than those concerning the principle of responsibility.

Secondly, how are the traditional objectives of punishment, which largely assume responsibility, affected when it comes to the punishment of the insane?

A. S. GOLDSTEIN, THE INSANITY DEFENSE (1967), PP.11–15:

4–246

“At the present time, the objectives of the criminal law are ordinarily said to be retribution, deterrence and rehabilitation ... The retributive function building on the widely held feeling that the criminal owes the community a measure of suffering comparable to that which he has inflicted ... channelled the anger of victims (and of their friends) lest they ... [sought] revenge. But to do so, it was necessary to make a criminal conviction sufficiently consequential to satisfy those who were inclined to feel retributive ... A corollary of this, however, was the feeling that so serious a sanction ought not to be imposed in situations in which the initial impulse to anger was likely to give way, even among victims, to feelings of compassion. These were situations in which the offender seemed so obviously different from most men that he could not be blamed for what he had done. Even under a retributive theory, therefore, an insanity defense was needed to trace in outline those who could not be regarded as blameworthy ...

Under the deterrent theory ... the primary function of criminal law is to move men to conform to social norms, particularly those which cannot be left entirely to informal processes of social control or to those of the civil law. This is accomplished by announcing in a criminal code what conduct is prohibited and how much of a sanction of imprisonment or fine will be visited upon those who ignore the prohibition. Such a system can be effective only with men who can understand the signals directed at them by the code, who can respond to the warnings, and who feel the significance of the sanctions imposed upon violators ... If a man cannot make the calculations or muster the feelings demanded of him by the theory, he is classed as insane. He lacks the requisite degree of intelligence, reasoning power and foresight of consequence. If he were held criminally responsible he would be made to suffer harsh sanctions without serving the purpose of individual deterrence.

It would still be possible, however, to conceive that such a man might serve the ends of general deterrence ... [but] the examples are likely to deter only if the person who is not involved in the criminal process regards the lessons as applicable to him. He is likely to do so only if he identifies with the offender and with the offending situation. This feat of identification is difficult enough to achieve under ordinary circumstances ... it is probably hopeless if the deterrent example is so different from most men that the crime can be attributed to the difference ...

The third view of the insanity defense ... tends to view deviant behaviour as psychological maladjustment, the product of forces beyond the individual's control; he is less to be blamed than to be helped to restore the balance between him and his background or his environment. The tacit assumption is that a paternal state can put him right by psychotherapy or by judicious social planning, if only the 'helping' professions are provided with the resources to do the job ... This 'mental health' image has unquestionably captured the imagination of the reformers and has been propagated almost as a faith ...

Because it is widely assumed that 'blame' plays a critical role in maintaining individual responsibility and social order, the insanity defense continues to be regarded as exceptional. It becomes the occasional device through which an offender is found to be inappropriate for the social purposes served by the criminal law. He is too much unlike the man in the street to permit his example to be useful for the purposes of deterrence. He is too far removed from normality to make us angry with him. But because he is sick rather than evil, society is cast as specially responsible for him and obligated to make him better."

A final preliminary point needs to be considered. Is the insanity defence really a "defence" at all? The issue of insanity is invariably included in discussions of defences to crime, yet this classification is not without its difficulties. To assert that a defendant has a defence to crime has connotations that may or may not prove to be applicable to the case of insanity. Three matters, in particular, require consideration.

- (a) Is insanity regarded as a general exempting condition or as a specific excuse to a particular wrongful act? According to the analysis of defences at the start of this chapter, insanity should be perceived as akin to the general defence of infancy and act as an exemption. As the Law Commission has stated,⁵³² the defendant lacks capacity/ responsibility for his “wrongful” actions—and thus requires no excuse. This incapacity may well be demonstrated in many ways other than the particular act. However, this analogy does not sit well with the current wording of the legal test for insanity. As we shall see, the M’Naghten Rules link the mental condition of the accused causally to the prohibited act. In other words, it appears to focus upon attribution-responsibility. Our inclusion of insanity as an exemption, therefore, is, in part, based upon the way it ought to operate and serves to highlight in advance one of the many flaws of the current test.⁵³³
- (b) Is insanity a true defence or does it negate a definitional element? Support for the view that it performs this latter function comes from the argument that prior to the statutory creation of the special verdict, a finding of insanity would lead to a complete acquittal at common law.⁵³⁴ Indeed, it has been argued further that this would still be true today of defendants pleading insanity in the magistrates’ courts.⁵³⁵ However, it may be that conclusions about whether insanity negates mens rea are best drawn once the M’Naghten Rules have been explored.
- (c) In view of the consequences of a finding of insanity, can it really be said that it is a “defence”? The result of a successful plea of insanity is the special verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity.⁵³⁶ As Goldstein has stated:

“In virtually every state a successful insanity defense does not bring freedom with it. Instead it has become the occasion for either mandatory commitment to a mental hospital or for an exercise of discretion by the court regarding the advisability of such commitment.”⁵³⁷

4–248

In this country, as a result of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 (as amended by the Domestic Violence, Crimes and Victims Act 2004), we have moved from the first position Goldstein describes to the second. It can be argued, therefore, that the “defence” is merely a way of substituting one method of state control for another. The state may not hold the defendant responsible for her actions but still retains the right to dispose of her as it thinks fit.

2. The law

(i) Fitness to plead

4–249

There is little point in going through the ritual of a criminal trial if the defendant is unable to comprehend what is happening.

R.A. DUFF, TRIALS AND PUNISHMENTS (1986), PP.27, 263–264:

4–250

“[W]hat is crucial here (apart from considerations of past deserts or of future consequences) is the offender’s capacity to understand and respond to her imprisonment as a punishment: if she is now so disordered that she lacks this capacity she is not fit to be punished, whether or not she committed an offence which merited punishment, and whether or not imprisonment would be the most efficient way of protecting others against her. For punishment aims and must aim, if it is to be properly justified, to address the offender as a rational and responsible agent: if she cannot understand what is being done to her, or why it is being done, or how it is related as a punishment to her past offence, her punishment becomes a travesty ...

This means that an offender who is fit to be punished ... must be capable not only of grasping the fact that what is being done to her is done because she has broken the law, but also of grasping and responding to its moral meaning and purpose as a punishment. She must have the capacity and the potential for the kind of penitential redemption which punishment aims to induce: which means she must already have some concern which punishment may reawaken and strengthen, for the values which she has flouted, or at least that she has some moral concerns which would enable her to come, through her punishment, to understand and care for the values which the law embodies.”⁵³⁸

4-251

Accordingly, before there can be a trial, a defendant must be found “fit to plead”.⁵³⁹ The earliest criteria employed by the courts to determine this were that the defendant had to be able to understand the charge, challenge jurors, and follow evidence.⁵⁴⁰ These criteria were developed in relation to defendants who were deaf and dumb rather than defendants who were mentally ill and thus the test concentrated upon ability to communicate and intelligence (because at the time deaf mutes were widely regarded as suffering from mental disabilities):

“Because the focus was on mental deficiency ... delusions, disorders of mood and other features common to mental illness which were clearly relevant to the notion of unfitness to plead ... had no role in the concept ... regardless of how they might impinge on a defendant’s chances of having a fair trial.”⁵⁴¹

4-252

Subsequently, the requirement that the defendant be able to instruct counsel was added.⁵⁴² What is significant about this development was that it arose from a case dealing with a mentally ill defendant and emphasis was not placed upon ability to communicate or intelligence but upon the capacity of the defendant properly to instruct counsel. Since then, however, this distinction has been lost and for more than 150 years the test has concentrated upon cognitive ability. In M, the judge broke the issues down thus: the defendant has to be capable of: (i) understanding the charges they face; (ii) deciding whether to plead guilty; (iii) challenging jurors; (iv) instructing solicitors and counsel; (v) following the proceedings; and (vi) giving evidence.⁵⁴³ It is clear that defendants may be found fit to plead and yet have substantial learning difficulties. In SC v United Kingdom,⁵⁴⁴ the defendant was an 11-year-old boy with an intellectual ability of between a six-to eight-year-old child. He did not appear to grasp the role of the jury nor to understand the fact that he risked a custodial sentence if found guilty. Yet the medical expert who examined the boy concluded that he was, on balance, fit to plead. The boy was found guilty and in due course complained to the European Court of Human Rights that, because of his age and low intellectual ability, he was unable to participate effectively at his trial, contrary to art.6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The European Court concluded by a majority that art.6 had been violated and explained:

“The court accepts the government’s argument that art 6(1) does not require that a child on trial for a criminal offence should understand or be capable of understanding every point or evidential detail. Given the sophistication of modern legal systems, many adults of normal intelligence are unable to comprehend all the intricacies and exchanges which take place in the courtroom ... However, ‘effective participation’ in this context presupposes that the accused has a broad understanding of the nature of the trial process and of what is at stake for him or her, including the significance of any penalty which may be imposed. It means that he or she, if necessary with the assistance of, for example, an interpreter, lawyer, social worker or friend, should be able to understand the general thrust of what is said in court. The defendant should be able to follow what is said by the prosecution witnesses and, if represented, to explain to his own lawyers his version of events, point out any statements with which he disagrees and make them aware of any facts which should be put forward in his defence.”⁵⁴⁵

4–253

While this decision applies to child defendants only, there is a compelling argument that it should apply whether the defendant is a child or an adult. The point is not that defendants should conduct their defence wisely or well—simply that “effective participation” under the European Convention on Human Rights art.6 should lead to a higher threshold of competency than the current test of fitness.⁵⁴⁶ In the light of long-standing concerns over whether the test is finding fit those who should not be tried, the Law Commission has commenced a review of the law. In 2010, it -provisionally recommended a test, based upon the Mental Capacity Act 2005, of “decision-making capacity” which would replace the Pritchard formula as re-stated in M.⁵⁴⁷ However, given the responses to the consultation it embarked upon a further period of discussion, including whether reform should supplement the current cognitive test with a decisional competence limb, as advocated by Mackay,⁵⁴⁸ rather than jettisoning it completely. The Law Commission’s final report, including a draft Criminal Procedure (Lack of Capacity) Bill, was published in 2016, and recommended that there should be a new statutory test for fitness to plead, which should be “reformulated to prioritise effective participation”,⁵⁴⁹ and “explicitly incorporate decision-making capacity”.⁵⁵⁰ This proposed test is set out in cl.3 of the Law Commission’s draft bill.⁵⁵¹

LAW COMMISSION, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (MENTAL CAPACITY) BILL (2016):

4–254

Clause 3 Capacity to participate effectively in a trial

- (1) This section has effect for the purposes of section 1.
- (2) A defendant is to be regarded as lacking the capacity to participate effectively in a trial if the defendant’s relevant abilities are not, taken together, sufficient to enable the defendant to participate effectively in the proceedings on the offence or offences charged.
- (3) In determining that question, the court must take into account the assistance available to the defendant as regards the proceedings.
- (4) The following are relevant abilities—

- (a) an ability to understand the nature of the charge;
 - (b) an ability to understand the evidence adduced as evidence of the commission of the offence;
 - (c) an ability to understand the trial process and the consequences of being convicted;
 - (d) an ability to give instructions to a legal representative;
 - (e) an ability to make a decision about whether to plead guilty or not guilty;
 - (f) an ability to make a decision about whether to give evidence;
 - (g) an ability to make other decisions that might need to be made by the defendant in connection with the trial;
 - (h) an ability to follow the proceedings in court on the offence;
 - (i) an ability to give evidence;
 - (j) any other ability that appears to the court to be relevant in the particular case.
- (5) For the purposes of subsection (4)(e) to (g), an ability to make a decision is to be regarded as consisting of—
- (a) an ability to understand information relevant to the decision,
 - (b) an ability to retain that information,
 - (c) an ability to use and to weigh the information when making the decision, and
 - (d) an ability to communicate the decision.

The test in relation to “ability to make a decision” mirrors the test in relation to inability to make a decision in civil matters, provided in the Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.3(1). The Law Commission also recommended the introduction of a separate statutory test for capacity to plead guilty, set out in cl.6 of the draft bill, upon the basis that allowing a defendant to plead guilty where he has capacity to do so “would enhance the autonomy of vulnerable defendants and would increase the courts' capacity to protect the public whilst contributing to public confidence in the criminal justice process".⁵⁵²

LAW COMMISSION, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (MENTAL CAPACITY)
BILL (2016):

4-256

6 Capacity to plead guilty

- (2) A defendant is to be regarded as having the capacity to plead guilty, or to change a plea to a plea of guilty, if the defendant's relevant abilities are, taken together, sufficient to enable the defendant to participate effectively in—
- (a) the hearing in which the defendant pleads guilty or changes a plea (as the case may be), and
 - (b) any subsequent proceedings on the offence or offences in question.
- (3) In determining that question, the court must take into account the assistance available to the defendant as regards the proceedings.
- (4) The following are relevant abilities—
- (a) an ability to understand the nature of the charge;
 - (b) an ability to understand the evidence adduced as evidence of the commission of the offence;
 - (c) an ability to understand what it means to plead guilty and the consequences of a plea of guilty;
 - (d) an ability to give instructions to a legal representative;
 - (e) an ability to make a decision about whether to plead guilty or not guilty or to change a plea (as the case may be);
 - (f) an ability to make other decisions that might need to be made by the defendant in connection with the plea of guilty;

- (g) an ability to follow the proceedings in court on the offence;
 - (h) any other ability that appears to the court to be relevant in the particular case.
- (5) For the purposes of subsection (4)(e) and (f), an ability to make a decision is to be regarded as consisting of—
- (a) an ability to understand information relevant to the decision,
 - (b) an ability to retain that information,
 - (c) an ability to use and to weigh the information when making the decision, and
 - (d) an ability to communicate the decision.

4-257

The adoption of a separate test in relation to capacity to plead guilty, and the more context specific approach adopted in the draft bill has been seen as a positive development,⁵⁵³ and such an approach was approved by the Court of Appeal in *Marcantonio*⁵⁵⁴:

“... the current test does not distinguish between capacity to participate effectively in a trial and capacity to plead guilty. It seems to us that a strong case could be made out for a test that draws such a distinction. There will be cases in which the defendant would be unable to follow proceedings at trial or to give evidence but would not lack the decisional capacity necessary for entering a plea of guilty. We would question the desirability of denying such a defendant the option of pleading guilty.”

The proposal to replace the Pritchard test with a test of effective participation has also been welcomed, with Loughnan suggesting that it:

“...strikes a good balance between, on the one hand, setting an appropriate standard for a finding of unfitness (neither too high nor too low), and, on the other hand, permitting sufficient flexibility in that standard such that It Is tailored to the particular proceedings a defendant faces.”⁵⁵⁵

Some important reforms have already taken place. The Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 as amended by the Domestic Violence, Crimes and Victims Act 2004, substantially altered the consequences of a finding of unfitness or “disability”. Where the judge⁵⁵⁶ finds that the defendant is under a disability the jury are empanelled to decide whether the defendant has done the act or omission charged. If they conclude that the defendant has not done so the jury “shall return a verdict of acquittal as if on the count in question the trial had proceeded to a conclusion”.⁵⁵⁷ The defendant goes free.

4-258

The alternative is for the jury to find that the defendant is under a disability but did the act or omission charged.⁵⁵⁸ In Antoine, the House of Lords ruled that this requires a finding that the actus reus is established only.⁵⁵⁹ It overruled the previous decision of Egan, in which the Court of Appeal had held that the mens rea of the offence need also be established.⁵⁶⁰ While the interpretation favoured by the House of Lords accords with that of Parliament in debates during the passage of the 1991 Act, the level of protection for unfit defendants has been reduced.⁵⁶¹ Judges have also found it difficult sometimes to identify which elements of an offence constitute the actus reus for these purposes, since there is no “bright line” between actus reus and mens rea elements and the actus reus of an offence may involve mental elements.⁵⁶² In R. v B, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial judge had been wrong not to instruct the jury to consider whether the defendant’s observation of two boys had been “for the purpose of sexual gratification” when considering whether the defendant had done the “injurious act” of the offence of voyeurism under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.67.⁵⁶³ In Kail,⁵⁶⁴ the Court of Appeal ruled that reasonable belief in the consent of a complainant to sexual touching was “clearly” a matter of mens rea and did not require a finding in the context of s.4A. However, the general rule that only the actus reus need be proved is subject to qualification. Where, for example, the unfit person participated in the offence as a secondary party rather than as the principal, it will be necessary to refer to the basis of secondary liability. Thus, the jury will have to be satisfied that the unfit person participated with knowledge of the activities of the principal offender and surrounding circumstances before he or she can be held to have “done the act or omission charged”.⁵⁶⁵ The Law Commission has concluded that this division of external and fault elements is problematic, and that “to deprive a defendant who lacks capacity of equal opportunity for acquittal is objectionable”,⁵⁶⁶ and has recommended that the prosecution be required to prove all of the elements charged against a defendant found to lack capacity. They have also recommended that this procedure be extended to magistrates’ courts,⁵⁶⁷ and that the Crown Court should have power, where it is in the interests of justice to do so, to disapply the alternative finding procedure where it has been found that a defendant lacks capacity to participate effectively in his trial.⁵⁶⁸

Where the jury comes to the conclusion that the person did the act or omission the judge may make a hospital order (with or without a restriction order), a supervision order or an order for absolute discharge.⁵⁶⁹

4–259

Research has shown that the judges have responded positively to this increased flexibility and there is also evidence that, after years of decline, the use of the plea has increased since the implementation of the 1991 Act.⁵⁷⁰ At the same time as its use has been increasing, however, the 1991 Act has been subject to a fundamental challenge. In H,⁵⁷¹ it was argued that the procedure to establish whether the person has done the act or omission is to all intents and purposes a procedure to determine a criminal charge and thus ought to attract the protection provided in the European Convention on Human Rights art.6 (the right to a fair trial) of the European Convention on Human Rights. This protection was absent because the defendant, being unfit to plead, could not give instructions and participate fully in his defence. The House of Lords rejected this claim, holding that the procedure lacked the essential features of the criminal process and that it would be highly anomalous if a procedure introduced to protect those unable to defend themselves at trial was to be found incompatible with the Convention.⁵⁷² In spite of this, it is clear that the current law and procedure in relation to fitness to plead are far from satisfactory. The Law Commission's proposals and draft bill, emphasise the need to allow a defendant to participate effectively in his trial where possible, by taking steps to facilitate a defendant to understand proceedings and engage fully with their defence,⁵⁷³ as well as seeking to balance the needs of vulnerable defendants and social protection where a defendant lacks capacity to participate in the trial process.⁵⁷⁴

(ii) Insanity as a “defence”

4-260

In many of the most extreme cases the defendant will not be found fit to stand trial. Accordingly, the insanity defence is usually reserved for problematic and borderline cases.

Before examining the test for insanity, it should be noted that, exceptionally, the burden of proof rests with defendants to show on a balance of probabilities that they were insane at the time of the act⁵⁷⁵ and that it is for the judge to determine whether a defence raised by defendants is, in fact, one of insanity. The question of reverse burden of proof has become deeply problematic with the implementation of the European Convention on Human Rights. The issue is whether placing the burden of proof upon the defendant contravenes the presumption of innocence protected by the European Convention on Human Rights art.6(2). While the point has yet to be tested in relation to insanity, an indication of the way in which courts might approach this issue in relation to the defence of insanity is provided by the cases of *Foye*⁵⁷⁶ and Wilcocks,⁵⁷⁷ in which the Court of Appeal decided that placing the onus upon the defence to establish the defence of diminished responsibility did not contravene art.6(2).

(a) The M’Naghten Rules

M’NAGHTEN’S CASE (1843) 10 C. &
F. 200, 8 ENG. REP. 718:

4-261

The defendant was indicted for the murder of Edward Drummond, Secretary to the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Peel. The defence introduced evidence of the defendant's insanity, particularly his obsession with certain morbid delusions. The presiding judge, Lord Tindal CJ, directed the jury in the following terms: "The question to be asked is whether ... the prisoner had or had not the use of his understanding, so as to know that he was doing a wrong and wicked act." The jury returned a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. The furore occasioned by the verdict led to the whole issue of insanity being debated in the House of Lords. As a result, five questions were put to the judges of the day; the answers to questions two and three form the basis of the "M'Naghten Rules" by which lack of criminal responsibility is tested.

LORD TINDAL CJ:

"Your lordships are pleased to inquire of us, secondly, 'What are the proper questions to be submitted to the jury, where a person alleged to be afflicted with insane delusion respecting one or more particular subjects or persons, is charged with the commission of a crime (murder, for example), and insanity is set up as a defence?' And, thirdly, 'In what terms ought the question to be left to the jury as to the prisoner's state of mind at the time when the act was committed?' And as these two questions appear to us to be more conveniently answered together, we have to submit our opinion to be, that the jurors ought to be told in all cases that every man is to be presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong. The mode of putting the latter part of the question to the jury on these occasions has generally been, whether the accused at the time of doing the act knew the difference between right and wrong: which mode, though rarely, if ever, leading to any mistake with the jury, is not, as we conceive, so accurate when put generally and in the abstract, as when put with reference to the party's knowledge of right and wrong in respect to the very act with which he is charged. If the question were to be put as to the knowledge of the accused solely and exclusively with reference to the law of the land, it might tend to confound the jury, by inducing them to believe that an actual knowledge of the law of the land was essential in order to lead to a conviction; whereas the law is administered upon the principle that everyone must be taken conclusively to know it, without proof that he does know it. If the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if the act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable; and the usual course therefore has been to leave the question to the jury, whether the party accused had a sufficient degree of reason to know that he was doing an act that was wrong: and this course we think is correct, accompanied with such observations and explanations as the circumstances of each particular case may require.” (emphasis added)

4-262

Although the essence of the M’Naghten Rules may be simply stated—it asks whether the defendant knew what they were doing at the time the crime was committed—certain of the phrases used in the formulation of the rules have been subject to much judicial (and academic) interpretation.

One can envisage the M’Naghten Rules as a series of hurdles over which the defendant must jump in order to be excused liability.

(i) Disease of the mind

4-263

The defendant must, first, be suffering from a “disease of the mind”. This phrase:

“initially seems to have attracted no judicial scrutiny ... However, the development of the automatism defence changed this. For suddenly the courts were confronted by the fact that a successful defence based on ‘unconscious involuntary action’ could result in an unqualified acquittal. For obvious social defence reasons this fact began to worry the courts and in order to restrict the availability of such acquittals the judiciary began to develop a complex body of law built upon the phrase ‘disease of the mind’.”⁵⁷⁸

The case of *Kemp*⁵⁷⁹ (where the defendant suffered from arteriosclerosis which induced a state of unconsciousness during which he attacked his wife with a hammer) makes it clear that the condition of the brain is irrelevant. The test is not necessarily whether there is some damage to that physical entity (although the mental disease may have a physical origin) but, more widely, whether the mental faculties of reason, understanding and memory are impaired or absent. This approach has been affirmed by the House of Lords.

R. V SULLIVAN [1984] A.C. 156 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-264

The defendant was charged with inflicting grievous bodily harm, contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20, after he had attacked Payne, his friend, during the postictal stage of an epileptic seizure. The trial judge ruled that this amounted to insanity rather than automatism; consequently, the defendant changed his plea to guilty to the lesser offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. He then appealed against conviction on the basis that he should have been allowed to raise the issue of automatism.⁵⁸⁰

LORD DIPLOCK:

“The M’Naghten Rules have been used as a comprehensive definition for this purpose by the courts for the last 140 years. Most importantly, they were so used by this House in Bratty v Attorney-General for Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386. That case was in some respects the converse of the instant case. Bratty was charged with murdering a girl by strangulation. He claimed to have been unconscious of what he was doing at the time he strangled the girl and he sought to run as alternative defences non-insane automatism and insanity. The only evidential foundation that he laid for either of these pleas was medical evidence that he might have been suffering from psychomotor epilepsy which, if he were, would account for his having been unconscious of what he was doing. No other pathological explanation of his actions having been carried out in a state of automatism was supported by evidence. The trial judge first put the defence of insanity to the jury. The jury rejected it; they declined to bring in the special verdict.

Thereupon, the judge refused to put to the jury the alternative defence of automatism. His refusal was upheld by the Court of Criminal Appeal of Northern Ireland and subsequently by this House.

The question before this House was whether, the jury having rejected the plea of insanity, there was any evidence on non-insane automatism fit to be left to the jury. The ratio decidendi of its dismissal of the appeal was that the jury having negatived the explanation that Bratty might have been acting unconsciously in the course of an attack of psychomotor epilepsy, there was no evidential foundation for the suggestion that he was acting unconsciously from any other cause.

In the instant case, as in Bratty, the only evidential foundation that was laid for any finding by the jury that Mr Sullivan was acting unconsciously and involuntarily when he was kicking Mr Payne, was that when he did so he was in the postictal stage of a seizure of psychomotor epilepsy. The evidential foundation in the case of Bratty, that he was suffering from psychomotor epilepsy at the time he did the act with which he was charged, was very weak and was rejected by the jury; the evidence in Mr Sullivan's case, that he was so suffering when he was kicking Mr Payne, was very strong and would almost inevitably be accepted by a properly directed jury. It would be the duty of the judge to direct the jury that if they did accept that evidence the law required them to bring in a special verdict and none other. The governing statutory provision is to be found in section 2 of the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883. This says 'the jury shall return a special verdict ...'

My Lords, I can deal briefly with the various grounds on which it has been submitted that the instant case can be distinguished from what constituted the ratio decidendi in Bratty v Attorney-General for Northern Ireland, and that it falls outside the ambit of the M'Naghten Rules.

First, it is submitted the medical evidence in the instant case shows that psychomotor epilepsy is not a disease of the mind, whereas in Bratty it was accepted by all the doctors that it was. The only evidential basis for this submission is that Dr Fenwick said that in medical terms to constitute a 'disease of the mind' or 'mental illness,' which he appeared to regard as interchangeable descriptions, a disorder of brain functions (which undoubtedly occurs during a seizure in psychomotor epilepsy) must be prolonged for a period of time usually more than a day; while Dr Taylor would have it that the disorder must continue for a minimum of a month to qualify for the description 'a disease of the mind'.

The nomenclature adopted by the medical profession may change from time to time; Bratty was tried in 1961. But the meaning of the expression 'disease of the mind' as the cause of 'a defect of reason' remains unchanged for the purposes of the application of the M'Naghten Rules. I agree with what was said by Devlin J in R. v Kemp that 'mind' in the M'Naghten Rules is used in the ordinary sense of the mental faculties of reason, memory and understanding. If the effect of a disease is to impair these faculties so severely as to have either of the consequences referred to in the latter part of the rules, it matters not whether the aetiology of the impairment is organic, as in epilepsy, or functional, or whether the impairment itself is permanent or is transient and intermittent, provided that it subsisted at the time of commission of the act. The purpose of the legislation relating to the defence of insanity, ever since its origin in 1800, has been to protect society against recurrence of the dangerous conduct. The duration of a temporary suspension of the mental faculties, of reason, memory and understanding, particularly if, as in Mr Sullivan's case, it is recurrent, cannot on any rational ground be relevant to the application by the courts of the M'Naghten Rules, though it may be relevant to the course adopted by the Secretary of State, to whom the responsibility for how the defendant is to be dealt with passes after the return of the special verdict 'not guilty by reason of insanity.'

To avoid misunderstanding I ought perhaps to add that in expressing my agreement with what was said by Devlin J in Kemp, where the disease that caused the temporary and intermittent impairment of the mental faculties was arteriosclerosis, I do not regard that learned judge as excluding the possibility of non-insane automatism (for which the proper verdict would be a verdict of 'not guilty') in cases where temporary impairment (not being self-induced by consuming drink or drugs) results from some external physical factor such as a blow on the head causing concussion or the administration of an anaesthetic for therapeutic purposes ... The instant case, however, does not in my view afford an appropriate occasion for exploring possible causes of non-insane automatism ...

My Lords, it is natural to feel reluctant to attach the label of insanity to a sufferer from psychomotor epilepsy of the kind to which Mr Sullivan was subject, even though the expression in the context of a special verdict of 'not guilty by reason of insanity' is a technical one which includes a purely temporary and intermittent suspension of the mental faculties of reason, memory and understanding resulting from the occurrence of an epileptic fit. But the label is contained in the current statute, it has appeared in this statute's predecessors ever since 1800. It does not lie within the power of the courts to alter it. Only Parliament can do that. It has done so twice; it could do so once again.

Sympathise though I do with Mr Sullivan, I see no other course open to your Lordships than to dismiss this appeal."

Appeal dismissed

R. v BURGESS [1991] 2 W.L.R. 1206
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-266

The defendant attacked his friend, Miss Curtis, with a bottle and then a video-recorder, finally putting a hand round her throat. The defendant claimed that he was acting unconsciously in that he had been sleepwalking and was thus entitled to be acquitted as a non-insane automaton. The trial judge ruled that the jury had to decide whether the defendant was acting consciously or whether he was not guilty by reason of insanity. The jury returned the latter verdict against which the defendant appealed.

LORD LANE CJ:

"Where the defence of automatism is raised by the defendant, two questions fall to be decided by the judge before the defence can be left to the jury. The first is whether a proper evidential foundation for the defence of automatism has been laid. The second is whether the evidence shows the case to be one of insane automatism, that is to say, a case which falls within the M'Naghten Rules, or one of non-insane automatism ... There can be no doubt but that the appellant on the basis of the jury's verdict, was labouring under ... such a defect of reason as not to know what he was doing when he wounded Miss Curtis. The question is whether that was from ‘disease of the mind’ ...

The appellant plainly suffered from a defect of reason from some sort of failure (for lack of a better term) of the mind causing him to act as he did without conscious motivation. His mind was to some extent controlling his actions which were purposive rather than the result of muscular spasm, but without his being consciously aware of what he was doing. Can it be said that that ‘failure’ was a disease of the mind rather than a defect or failure of the mind not due to disease? That is the distinction, by no means easy to draw, upon which this case depends, as others have depended in the past.

One can perhaps narrow the field of enquiry still further by eliminating what are sometimes called the ‘external factors’ such as concussion caused by a blow on the head. There were no such factors here. Whatever the cause may have been, it was an internal cause.

[His Lordship then cited the case of Sullivan]

What help does one derive from the authorities as to the meaning of ‘disease’ in this context? Lord Denning in Bratty v Attorney-General for Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 236 at 412 said:

... ‘It seems to me that any mental disorder which has manifested itself in violence and is prone to recur is a disease of the mind. At any rate it is the sort of disease for which a person should be detained in hospital rather than be given an unqualified acquittal.’

It seems to us that if there is a danger of recurrence that may be an added reason for categorising the condition as a disease of the mind. On the other hand, the absence of the danger of recurrence is not a reason for saying that it cannot be a disease of the mind. Subject to that possible qualification, we respectfully adopt Lord Denning’s suggested definition.

There have been several occasions when during the course of judgments in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords observations have been made, obiter, about the criminal responsibility of sleep-walkers, where sleep-walking has been used as a self-evident illustration of non-insane automatism. For example in the speech of Lord Denning, from which we have already cited an extract, appears this passage, at 409:

‘No act is punishable if it is done involuntarily: and an involuntary act in this context—some people nowadays prefer to speak of it as “automatism”—means an act which is done by the muscles without any control by the mind, such as a spasm, a reflex action or a convulsion; or an act done by a person who is not conscious of what he is doing, such as an act done whilst suffering from concussion or whilst sleep-walking. The point was well put by Stephen J in 1889:

“Can anyone doubt that a man who, though he might be perfectly sane, committed what would otherwise be a crime in a state of somnambulism, would be entitled to be acquitted? And why is this? Simply because he would not know what he was doing.” ’...

We accept of course that sleep is a normal condition, but the evidence in the instant case indicates that sleep-walking, and particularly violence in sleep, is not normal ... [I]n none of the other cases where sleep walking has been mentioned, so far as we can discover, has the court had the advantage of the sort of expert medical evidence which was available to the judge here.

One turns then to examine the evidence upon which the judge had to base his decision ... Dr d’Orban in examination-in-chief said ... [that]:

‘Burgess’s actions had occurred during the course of a sleep disorder.’

He was asked, ‘Assuming this is a sleep associated automatism, is it an internal or external factor?’ Answer: ‘In this particular case, I think that one would have to see it as an internal factor’.

Then in cross-examination: question: ‘Would you go so far as to say that it was liable to recur?’ Answer: ‘It is possible for it to recur, yes’. Finally, in answer to a question from the judge, namely, ‘Is this a case of automatism associated with a pathological condition or not?’ Answer: ‘I think the answer would have to be yes, because it is an abnormality of the brain function, so it would be regarded as a pathological condition’.

Dr Eames in cross-examination agreed with Dr d’Orban as to the internal rather than the external factor. He accepted that there is a liability to recurrence of sleep-walking. He could not go so far as to say that there is no liability of recurrence of serious violence but he agreed with the other medical witnesses that there is no recorded case of violence of this sort recurring.

It seems to us that on this evidence the judge was right to conclude that this was an abnormality or disorder, albeit transitory, due to an internal factor, whether functional or organic, which had manifested itself in criminality. It was a disorder or abnormality which might recur, though the possibility of it recurring in the form of serious violence was unlikely. Therefore since this was a legal problem to be answered on legal principles, it seems to us that on those principles the answer was as the judge found it to be.”

Appeal dismissed

4-268

These two cases are highly significant. They bear witness to the continued development of the distinction between internal and external causes as a basis for determining whether a particular condition is a “disease of the mind”. It has long been recognised that psychomotor epilepsy is a disease of the mind but dicta, at least, had placed sleepwalking into the category of non-insane automatism. However, the medical evidence relied on in Burgess—that sleepwalking is a “near cousin” of epilepsy—gave the court little choice but to decide that sleepwalking should be perceived as arising from some internal factor. The logic in Burgess in this respect can be supported. Nevertheless, its categorisation of sleepwalking as insane automatism has divided the medico-legal community: not all experts agree that it is caused by an internal factor. In Canada, for example, it is held to be sane automatism: what causes the defendant’s suspension of mental faculties is falling asleep (a perfectly normal occurrence).⁵⁸¹ Moreover, there have been instances in England where defendants have been acquitted of offences on the basis that they were sleepwalking at the time: for example, in Thomas, “a decent man and devoted husband” who strangled his wife during a nightmare in which he believed he was attacking an intruder was acquitted after the prosecution withdrew the case.⁵⁸²

However, the problem with the (increasingly contested) categorisation of sleepwalking is illustrative of a much more fundamental problem. The distinction between internal and external causes is fundamentally flawed. “It makes illogical, hair-splitting distinctions inevitable.”⁵⁸³ We are forced to conclude that epileptics (0.5% of the population) will be regarded as insane if they commit offences during epileptic fits.⁵⁸⁴ The same is true of some diabetics. Diabetics can experience hyperglycaemic episodes (triggered by too much blood sugar and caused by the diabetic condition itself) or hypoglycaemic episodes (too little blood sugar, arising from the combination of diabetes, insulin, food (or lack of it) and possibly alcohol). In Quick and Paddison,⁵⁸⁵ the court distinguished these two conditions holding that a transitory malfunctioning of the mind caused by hypoglycaemia due to external factors (for example, the taking of insulin) is non-insane automatism entitling the defendant to an acquittal.⁵⁸⁶ On the other hand, in Hennessy,⁵⁸⁷ it was held that hyperglycaemia gave rise to insane automatism. In this case, the defendant was charged with taking a conveyance and with driving while disqualified. His defence was that at the relevant time he had failed to take his proper dose of insulin due to stress, anxiety and depression and this caused the ensuing state of hyperglycaemia. The Court of Appeal accepted the Quick and Paddison distinction between hyper- and hypoglycaemia and rejected the defence argument that stress, anxiety and depression were factors that could count as external for the purposes of non-insane automatism. The court added that they constituted a state of mind that was prone to recur and lacked the feature of novelty or accident traditionally associated with non-insane automatism.

The result of these decisions is that we are left with a law under which some diabetics will be able to secure a complete acquittal while others will be regarded as insane. Such a position is absurd. Moreover, the harshness of these categorisations is hardly tempered by telling defendants (and their families), as Lord Diplock does in Sullivan and Lord Lane echoes in Burgess, that the label “insanity” is merely a technical one.

4–269

The key to evaluating these cases depends upon whether the concept “disease of the mind” requires anything more than a finding that the cause is an internal one. In particular, we need to know whether there is any requirement that the internal cause be associated with violence. Lord Denning in Bratty stated that “any mental disorder which has manifested itself in violence and is prone to recur is a disease of the mind”.⁵⁸⁸ This was cited with approval in Sullivan but in Burgess Lord Lane said that “the absence of the danger of recurrence is not a reason for saying that it cannot be a disease of the mind”. It was this that enabled his Lordship to state that the defendant could be said to have a disease of the mind despite the fact that the experts could point to no reported incident of a sleep-walker being repeatedly violent. This modification of Bratty flies in the face of Lord Diplock’s statement in Sullivan that “the purpose of the legislation relating to the defence of insanity, ever since its origin, has been to protect society against dangerous conduct”. However, this social defence argument could not withstand rigorous scrutiny even before Burgess. For example, how can one say that epileptics are more dangerous than diabetics having a hypoglycaemic episode? Can mental disorders that do not manifest themselves in violence, for example, kleptomania, never be diseases of the mind? Nevertheless, despite such weaknesses, the social defence argument did have a valuable limiting function. As a result of Burgess, all that “disease of the mind” seems to mean is any internal factor that has, on one occasion at least, manifested itself in criminality.

This discussion demonstrates that the internal/external factor distinction is unable to bear the weight of distinguishing insanity from non-insane automatism. It highlights the failure of the insanity test (and perhaps, any insanity test) to come to terms with the issue of the responsibility of the individual defendant on the one hand, and the protection of the public (and the defendant himself) against harm on the other. We shall return to this question later, once the remaining elements of the test of insanity, and the proposals for reform thereof, have been considered.

(ii) Defect of reason

4-270

Assuming that the defendant is suffering from a disease of the mind, the next hurdle to be overcome is that this disease of the mind must induce a “defect of reason”. The reasoning ability of the defendant must be affected; it is not enough that he or she simply failed to use powers of reasoning which they had.⁵⁸⁹ This aspect of the insanity test is classically illustrative of one of the basic premises of responsibility in law: guilt cannot be adduced in the absence of the capacity to reason.

(iii) Nature and quality of the act; knowledge of wrong

4-271

Having passed over the initial hurdles, the defendant may be brought within the ambit of the special verdict if either of two further conditions are satisfied. First, the defendant must not know “the nature and quality of his acts”. Kenny provides a vivid example of this: “The madman who cuts a woman’s throat under the idea that he is cutting a loaf of bread”⁵⁹⁰ does not know the nature and quality of his acts. Alternatively, it must be established that the defendant does not know that his actions are “wrong”.⁵⁹¹ The case of *Windle*⁵⁹² decided that this means knowledge that the acts are legally (and not merely morally) wrong. It is often thought that this limb adds very little to the insanity test, yet research has shown that it is this part of the test that is most commonly used to secure a special verdict.⁵⁹³ For example, in one case:

“A 22 year old male attempted to kill his parents because he believed that they were to be tortured and that he must kill them in order that they would die in a humane way. Two psychiatrists stated that while he knew the nature and quality of the act of stabbing his parents, he did not know that what he was doing was wrong ... His mind was plagued with delusional perceptions which confused his rational thinking to the extent that the wrongness of his act would not have been a consideration.”⁵⁹⁴

Research also shows that a broad-brush approach is taken to this requirement. Little effort is made to distinguish between cases where the defendant does not know that her actions are legally wrong and those where there is a lack of knowledge that the actions are morally wrong.⁵⁹⁵ “In so doing, it may be argued that psychiatrists in many respects are adopting a common sense approach and that the courts by accepting this interpretation are, in reality, expanding the scope of the M’Naghten Rules”.⁵⁹⁶ In Johnson,⁵⁹⁷ the Court of Appeal acknowledged that there had been occasions when the courts had been prepared to take a more flexible approach, and agreed that there was a persuasive argument for extending the defence, but reaffirmed the law as stated in Windle.⁵⁹⁸ In concluding, Latham LJ stated:

“This area, however, is a notorious area for debate and quite rightly so. There is room for reconsideration of the rules and, in particular, rules which have their genesis in the early years of the 19th century.”⁵⁹⁹

(iv) Role of medical evidence

4-272

The courts have made it plain from M’Naghten onwards that they regard all these questions as legal ones for their determination. Medical evidence is, in theory, just that—evidence from which decisions can be made. However, there can be little doubt that a large part of the decision-making can rest with the medical expert. Under the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 s.1 no verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity can be returned except on the written or oral evidence of two or more registered medical practitioners (at least one of whom has to be approved under the Mental Health Act 1983 s.12). The reasons advanced for the introduction of this requirement are of interest. In some cases, insanity verdicts had been returned without any medical evidence to support the plea.⁶⁰⁰ Clearly, giving so little weight to the role of experts was unsatisfactory.⁶⁰¹ The position now, however, is that experts are called upon to do too much if the issue is a legal one. Medical experts may not be asked baldly: “Do you think this person is insane?” (The word would be of no medical significance in any event). But they may well be asked: “Do you think this defendant has a disease of the mind?” This intermingling of medical and legal concepts is fraught with danger and the situation is not improved by the decision in Burgess where, despite stating that the issues involved were legal ones, considerable reliance was placed upon the expert’s statement that the defendant’s condition was pathological. Further, not only may medical experts fundamentally disagree amongst themselves about a particular diagnosis but they may, if their sympathies are engaged with their “patient”, distort the evidence to fit the “manifest absurdity of the M’Naghten test”.⁶⁰² One possibility is that it was because neither the judiciary nor the medical experts seemed wholly convinced about their role in the adjudication process that s.1 was passed. It has been argued that it is an “effort to ensure greater congruence between the evidence necessary for a person to be found not guilty by reason of insanity and that necessary for long-term detention under the Mental Health Act 1983 on grounds of mental disorder”.⁶⁰³ If this argument is correct then it would help to rebut a challenge that the M’Naghten Rules contravene the European Convention on Human Rights.⁶⁰⁴ It is by no means clear, however, that s.1 was meant to be anything more than a procedural change and the Draft Criminal Code expressly rejects the assimilation of the two concepts on the basis that the definition of mental disorder under the Mental Health Act 1983 is too wide and was designed for different purposes.⁶⁰⁵

As matters stand, even if medical experts and judges are clear in their own minds about their respective roles, juries appear to have little role to play in most cases. Research has revealed that in 86% of cases there was agreed expert evidence and the jury was simply directed (with both prosecution and defence agreement) to return a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity.⁶⁰⁶

(b) Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991

4–273

Before the 1991 Act, the result of a finding of “not guilty by reason of insanity” was mandatory commitment to such hospital as directed by the Home Secretary (commonly a special hospital such as Broadmoor) without limitation of time. Not unnaturally, defendants faced with this possibility, when their plea had originally been not guilty (because of non-insane automatism), often decided to change their pleas to guilty; indeed, Sullivan did precisely this. Whilst research reveals that defendants did not spend as long in hospital as they feared,⁶⁰⁷ this forced change of plea was clearly unacceptable. Further, given the diversity of cases brought within the concept of “disease of the mind” by the development of the internal/external distinction, there was a pressing need for this to be reflected in the methods of disposal available to the court. It was profoundly unsatisfactory that judges could not make an order that distinguished between the treatment appropriate for an epileptic, a diabetic or a schizophrenic.

The Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 (as amended) enables the court to do this. Until 2004, mandatory commitment followed a finding of insanity in cases of murder. However, in all cases the court may now make a hospital order (with or without restriction order), a supervision order or an order for absolute discharge.⁶⁰⁸

It should be stressed that this section does nothing to alter the M’Naghten Rules themselves.⁶⁰⁹ Indeed, it is possible that by removing mandatory commitment reform may now be less likely than ever, although both the insanity defence and unfitness to plead are currently being considered by the Law Commission as part of its programme of law reform. Despite their limited nature, however, these reforms are welcome and it seems that the judiciary have embraced the new flexibility⁶¹⁰ and that, although still very rare, an increase in the use of the insanity plea has occurred.⁶¹¹

(c) Proposals for reform

4–274

It is possible to support the M’Naghten Rules.

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, MODEL
PENAL CODE TENT. DRAFT. NO.4
(1955), COMMENTS TO S.4.01, PP.156– 157:

4–275

“The traditional M’Naghten rule resolves the problem solely in regard to the capacity of the individual to know what he was doing and to know that it was wrong. Absent these minimal elements of rationality, condemnation and punishment are obviously both unjust and futile. They are unjust because the individual could not, by hypothesis, have employed reason to restrain the act; he did not and he could not know the facts essential to bring reason into play. On the same ground, they are futile. A madman who believes that he is squeezing lemons when he chokes his wife or thinks that homicide is the command of God is plainly beyond reach of the restraining influence of law; he needs restraint but condemnation is entirely meaningless and ineffective. Thus the attacks on the M’Naghten rule as an inept definition of insanity or as an arbitrary definition in terms of special symptoms are entirely misconceived. The rationale of the position is that these are cases in which reason cannot operate and in which it is totally impossible for individuals to be deterred. Moreover, the category defined by the rule is so extreme that to the ordinary man the exculpation of the person it encompasses bespeaks no weakness in the law.”⁶¹²

However, more commonly, the M’Naghten Rules have been subjected to intense criticism.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MENTALLY ABNORMAL OFFENDERS
(BUTLER COMMITTEE) (CMND.6244,
1975), PP.217–219:

4–276

“18.5 Almost throughout their existence the M’Naghten Rules have been criticised, generally as being based on too limited a concept of the nature of mental disorder. The Royal Commission on Capital Punishment in 1953 noted that the interpretation of the rules by the courts had been broadened and stretched to make them fit particular cases, to the point where ‘the gap between the natural meaning of the law and the sense in which it is commonly applied has for so long been so wide, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that an amendment of the law, to bring it into closer conformity with the current practice, is long overdue.’ The Royal Commission pointed out that many offenders who know what they are doing and that it is wrong are nevertheless undoubtedly insane and should not be held responsible for their actions. Another serious difficulty lies in the outmoded language of the rules which gives rise to problems of interpretation. It is unclear, for example, whether the reference to the knowledge of the accused of the nature and quality of his act should be taken to cover the whole mental element in crime or some narrower concept. Similarly the nineteenth century term 'disease of the mind' raises the question whether the rules are intended to cover severe subnormality, neurosis or psychopathy.

18.6 But the main defect of the M'Naghten test is that it was based on the now obsolete belief in the pre-eminent role of reason in controlling social behaviour. It therefore requires evidence of the cognitive capacity, in particular the knowledge and understanding of the defendant at the time of the act or omission charged. Contemporary psychiatry and psychology emphasise that man's social behaviour is determined more by how he has learned to behave than by what he knows or understands. For many years a number of mental disorders differing in their clinical characteristics have been recognised and distinguished from one another. In some disorders the patient's beliefs are so bizarre or his change of mood is so profound and inexplicable, or he is so changed in manner and conduct, that his condition can only be described as alien, or mad. In such cases it is accepted opinion in civilised countries that he should not be held responsible for his actions.

18.7 Strictly interpreted the M'Naghten Rules would provide that mentally disordered defendant with very limited protection. Just as a person must generally be very mad indeed not to know what he is doing (the nature and quality of his act) when he is killing a man or setting fire to a building, so he must be very mad not to know that these acts attract the unfavourable notice of the police (his knowledge of wrong). For example, if a psychotic patient kills a person whom he believes to be putting thoughts into his mind, or kills him and gives as a reason that the victim is spying on him, or simply kills him because he has an overpowering urge to do so, the M'Naghten Rules, strictly interpreted, will not give him a defence if he admits that he knew that he was killing a man and that murder was a crime.

18.8 The M'Naghten Rules are in part linked with the mens rea doctrine, in recognising that evidence of disease of the mind may have the effect of negating a mental element of the crime. The 'knowledge of wrong' test is not an application of the ordinary rules of mens rea, however. 'Wrong' has been held to mean 'legally wrong' and a sane defendant cannot set up a defence of ignorance of the criminal law. Knowledge of the law is hardly an appropriate test on which to base ascription of responsibility to the mentally disordered. It is a very narrow ground of exemption since even persons who are grossly disturbed generally know that murder and arson instances, are crimes. It might seem at first sight more attractive to have regard to the defendant's appreciation of what is morally wrong, but the problems in a test to the mentally disordered would be very great. 'Knowledge of wrong,' as included in M'Naghten, is not therefore a satisfactory test of criminal responsibility."

4-277

In addition to these criticisms, there is a further problem with the M'Naghten Rules. There is still a possibility that they could be found to be incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights art.5. This provision protects the right of individuals to "liberty and security of person" and deprivation of this right has to be "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law". Further, "persons of unsound mind" can only be detained where proper account of objective medical expertise has been taken. This has been interpreted to mean that there must be a strong relationship between legal and medical criteria used to assess those who are insane.⁶¹³ Because of these concerns the forms of disposal following a finding of not guilty by reason of insanity (or a finding of unfitness) were changed, as we have seen, in 2004. However, while in this respect the law is now compatible with art.5, it is not entirely safe from further challenge. Whilst s.1 states that the evidence of two doctors is needed before a finding of not guilty by reason of insanity can be made, the weight to be given to this evidence remains unspecified. Certainly, it is not binding because, as we have seen, the test of insanity is regarded as a legal one. The result may be that M'Naghten contravenes the Convention.⁶¹⁴

Further reform has been proposed. The Butler Committee on Mentally Abnormal Offenders⁶¹⁵ reported in 1975 that major reform was necessary but this Report has been ignored by successive governments. The Law Commission has also recommended reform⁶¹⁶ and is currently re-examining the law. Rightly, given the inter-relationship of automatism and insanity, reform of both is being considered. Responses to the Law Commission's Scoping Paper⁶¹⁷ reveal that while criticisms of the law are regarded as justified, both legal and medical practitioners work around the problems and that reform to the fitness to plead test is more urgent.⁶¹⁸ The Law Commission thus prioritised that work but, nonetheless, regards reform of the law on automatism and insanity as necessary as it is “outmoded, inappropriate and complicated”.⁶¹⁹ Its provisional proposals would constitute a radical change.⁶²⁰ The verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity would be replaced by one of “not criminally responsible by reason of a recognised medical condition”, or RMC (reflecting the view, noted earlier, that the true rationale of the defence is a lack of capacity). The phrase “recognised medical condition” is deliberately wide so as to encompass physical as well as mental conditions.⁶²¹ A number of implications flow from this: for example, the stigmatising label “insanity” would become even more inappropriate than under the existing law and would be jettisoned. The concept would encompass a wide range of conditions, which might now lead to a finding of automatism; thus, the boundary between the two defences would shift. However, in addition to establishing that the defendant was suffering from a recognised medical condition, it would also be necessary to establish that:

“the defendant wholly lacked the capacity

- (i) rationally to form a judgment about the relevant conduct or circumstances;
- (ii) to understand the wrongfulness of what he or she is charged with having done⁶²²; or
- (iii) to control his or her physical acts in relation to the relevant conduct or circumstances.”⁶²³

4-278

There is much to commend in the discussion paper, including the proposal that the defence would apply in the magistrates’ court as well as the Crown Court and that the defendant would bear only an “elevated evidential burden” rather than have to prove the defence, but there are also justifiable concerns about the proposed defences. As Ashworth has commented:

“How often the new defences would be used is unclear, since the RMC defence will require two expert reports and if successful, may lead to a medical disposal. As now, some defendants may prefer to take their chances with ordinary sentencing powers. Both new defences are narrowly drawn, requiring a total lack of capacity or control, and that may ensure that few cases end in a special verdict or an acquittal on grounds of automatism.”⁶²⁴

In contrast to England where, despite the compelling case for reform, proposals have thus far been ignored by government, other countries have already acted. Scotland, for example, reformed its law in 2010⁶²⁵ while the US has witnessed a remarkable series of reforms.⁶²⁶ Initially, based upon the formula of the Model Penal Code,⁶²⁷ the insanity laws were widened to include those who could not control their actions (sometimes referred to as irresistible impulse).⁶²⁸ The inclusion of this volitional limb in the test was never without its critics: some believed that the test was too broad and others argued that it was simply not possible to identify those who could not control their actions. These doubts, particularly as voiced by the anti-crime, pro-victim lobby, were fuelled by the highly controversial acquittal of John Hinckley on the ground of insanity, after he had attempted to murder President Reagan.⁶²⁹ The insanity defence was thought to have been misused with expensive defence lawyers hoodwinking juries into false acquittals. It was also said that dangerous persons were being given early release from psychiatric detention after having been “cured”, only to commit further serious crimes.⁶³⁰

In fact, evidence fails to support either of these criticisms of the operation of the defence.⁶³¹ In reality, just as in this country, the insanity defence in the US is very rarely used and even more rarely successful.⁶³² However, the combination of myth and valid criticism led to rapid and widespread reform. In some states, reform has done nothing more than change the description of the verdict to “not responsible by reason of insanity” on the basis that public reaction to the Hinckley verdict was based upon a misunderstanding.⁶³³ Many states shifted the burden of proof from the prosecution to the defence to prove that the defendant was insane. The fact that in the District of Columbia, unlike in England, the prosecution had to prove that Hinckley was sane was thought to be one of the main reasons he was acquitted.⁶³⁴ Sometimes, in addition to this change, the standard of proof has also been raised.⁶³⁵ Other states have abandoned the “capacity to conform” test in a remarkable return to a modernised version of the M’Naghten Rules.⁶³⁶ Other states have introduced new verdicts of “guilty but mentally ill” as alternatives to the existing verdict.⁶³⁷ However, as we shall see in the next section, four states have rejected the insanity defence altogether.

(d) Should the insanity defence be retained?

4–279

There are critics who would still be profoundly dissatisfied even if reforms of the type indicated above were to take place. It is their belief that the insanity defence ought to be completely abolished. Most, although not all, of these attacks have taken place in the US and the reasoning behind them embraces arguments of principle about the concept of responsibility as well as concerns about mistaken assessments of the danger to which the public are exposed by abuse of the insanity defence.

(1) Procedural criticisms

4–280

There are very real problems of procedure in this area: expert evidence often conflicts, trials may be long, the difficulty of sifting through the evidence to assess accountability is immense, but, as Fletcher points out:

“it is curious to argue from these problems to the conclusion that the defence ought to be abolished. Would anyone wish to abolish the defence of duress because it might be difficult to establish whether the accused was fairly capable of resisting pressure exerted against him?”⁶³⁸

(2) Therapeutic Criticisms

A. W. B. SIMPSON, “THE BUTLER COMMITTEE’S REPORT: THE LEGAL

ASPECTS” (1976) 16 BRIT. J.
CRIMINOL. 175, 176:

4-281

“If one takes the central recommendation of the Butler Committee on the disposal of mentally disordered ‘offenders’—‘the guiding principle in disposal of mentally disordered offenders by the courts is that they should be sent wherever they can best be given the treatment they need: generally treatment by the health services is appropriate’—one cannot but be struck by the incongruity of involving criminal courts in the matter at all. What are red judges doing performing functions which, in the case of measles or mumps, we assign to general practitioners and supporting medical staff? It is as if a doctor, lighting on a case where a patient contracted a chill whilst stealing, took to prescribing aspirins and six months in the local prison.

This fundamental incongruity makes it extremely difficult, and perhaps impossible, to produce a set of recommendations designed to adapt a penal system to a task utterly out of character with the nature of such a system.”

(3) Criminal Law v Mental Health Powers

4-282

Commentators have increasingly voiced doubts about the uneasy mixture of the criminal law and its objectives with the power of courts under mental health legislation to confine dangerous people to hospitals. Some critics of the insanity defence have argued that discussion of mental disorder should be limited to the issue of mens rea. If the mental condition of the defendant negated the mens rea required for the offence, then no further criminal questions could arise—the defendant would be entitled to an acquittal. There would, however, remain the separate issue of civil commitment.

J. GOLDSTEIN AND J. KATZ, “ABOLISH THE ‘INSANITY DEFENSE’—WHY NOT?” (1963) 72

“In our efforts to understand the suggested relationship between ‘insanity’ and ‘mens rea’ there emerges a purpose for the ‘insanity defense’ which, though there to be seen, has remained of extremely low visibility. That purpose seems to be obscured because thinking about such a relationship has generally been blocked by unquestioning and disarming references to our collective conscience and our religious and moral traditions. Assuming the existence of the suggested relationship between ‘insanity’ and ‘mens rea,’ the defence is not to absolve of criminal responsibility ‘sick’ persons who would otherwise be subject to criminal sanction. Rather, its real function is to authorize the state to hold those ‘who must be found not to possess the guilty mind mens rea,’ even though the criminal law demands that no person be held criminally responsible if doubt is cast on any material element of the offense charged ...

What this discussion indicates, then, is that the insanity defense is not designed, as is the defence of self-defense, to define an exception to criminal liability, but rather to define for sanction and exception from among those who would be free of liability. It is as if the insanity defense were prompted by an affirmative answer to the silently posed question: ‘Does mens rea or any essential element of an offense exclude from liability a group of persons whom the community wishes to restrain?’ If the suggested relationship between mens rea and ‘insanity’ means that ‘insanity’ precludes proof beyond doubt of mens rea then the ‘defense’ is designed to authorize the holding of persons who have committed no crime. So conceived, the problem really facing the criminal process has been how to obtain authority to sanction the ‘insane’ who would be excluded from liability by an overall application of the general principles of the criminal law.

Furthermore, even if the relationship between insanity and ‘mens rea’ is rejected, this same purpose re-emerges when we try to understand why the consequence of this defense, unlike other defenses, is restraint, not release.”

CRIMINAL LAW (1982), PP.31–32, 61–
64:

4–284

“It is the overarching theme of this book that injustice and inefficiency invariably flow from any blending of the criminal-law and mental health powers of the state. Each is sufficient unto itself to achieve a just balance between freedom and authority; each has its own interested constituency; when they are mixed together, only the likelihood of injustice is added ...

My belief is that practice and scholarship have been led astray by the following ambivalent and corruptive reaction: though he has done a criminal act, being mentally abnormal he is less guilty in moral terms; St. Peter may indeed hold him morally faultless or at least less blameworthy and so should we; but also he is different from the rest of us, strange and probably more dangerous, and therefore, since he has committed a crime, we had better for his sake and ours separate him from the community or prolong his separation, for his treatment and our protection. We are at the same time more forgiving and more fearful, less punitive and more self-protective; we wish to have it both ways ...

[From this position Morris goes on to attack the notion that we seek to identify the truly responsible by means of an insanity defence]. [The central issue is] the question of fairness, the sense that it is unjust and unfair to stigmatize the mentally ill as criminals and to punish them for their crimes. The criminal law exists to deter and to punish those who would or who would choose to do wrong. If they cannot exercise choice, they cannot be deterred and it is a moral outrage to punish them. The argument sounds powerful but its premise is weak.

Choice is neither present nor absent in the typical case where the insanity defense is currently pleaded; what is at issue is the degree of freedom of choice on a continuum from the hypothetically entirely rational to the hypothetically pathologically determined—in states of consciousness neither polar condition exists.

The moral issue sinks into the sands of reality. Certainly it is true that in a situation of total absence of choice it is outrageous to inflict punishment; but the frequency of such situations to the problems of criminal responsibility becomes an issue of fact in which tradition and clinical knowledge and practice are in conflict ... I think that much of the discussion of the defense of insanity is the discussion of a myth rather than of a reality. It is no minor debating point that in fact we lack a defense of insanity as an operating tool of the criminal law other than in relation to a very few particularly heinous and heavily punished offenses. There is not an operating defense of insanity in relation to burglary or theft, or the broad sweep of index crimes generally; the plea of not guilty on the ground of insanity is rarely to be heard in city courts of first instance which handle the grist of the mill of the criminal law—though a great deal of pathology is to be seen in the parade of accused and convicted persons before these courts. As a practical matter we reserve this defense for a few sensational cases where it may be in the interest of the accused either to escape the possibility of capital punishment (though in cases where serious mental illness is present, the risk of execution is slight) or where the likely punishment is of a sufficient severity to make the indeterminate commitment of the accused a preferable alternative to a criminal conviction. Operationally the defense of insanity is a tribute, it seems to me, to our hypocrisy rather than to our morality.

To be less aggressive about the matter ... the special defense of insanity may properly be indicted as producing a morally unsatisfactory classification on the continuum between guilt and innocence. It applies in practice to only a few mentally ill criminals, thus omitting many others with guilt-reducing relationships between their mental illness and their crimes; it excludes other powerful pressures on human behaviour, thus giving excessive weight to the psychological over the social. It is a false classification in the sense that if a team of the world's most sensitive and trained psychiatrists and moralists were to select from all those found guilty of felonies and those found not guilty by reason of insanity any given number who should not be stigmatized as criminals, very few of those found not guilty by reason of insanity would be selected."

4-285

Morris concludes that the mentally disordered are entitled to be held responsible for their actions, but that their condition may be relevant in sentencing and might result in mitigation on grounds of less moral blameworthiness, or aggravation because of constituting a danger to the public.

(4) Denial of Responsibility:

BARONESS WOOTTON, CRIME AND
THE CRIMINAL LAW, 2ND EDN (1981),
PP.90–91:

4–286

“At a more fundamental level, acceptance of mental disorder as diminishing or eliminating criminal responsibility demands an ability to get inside someone else’s mind so completely as to be certain whether he has acted wilfully or knowingly, and also to experience the strength of the temptations to which he is exposed. This, I submit, is beyond the competence of even the most highly qualified expert. Psychiatrists may uncover factors in patients’ backgrounds (often in terms of childhood experience) by which they profess to ‘explain’ why one individual has an urge to strangle young girls and another to rape elderly women: but these ‘explanations’ are merely predictive of the likelihood of such behaviour occurring ...

I submit, therefore, that the present law, under which offenders must be classified as either mentally disordered or criminally responsible for their actions not only produces anomalies but attempts the impossible ... In the end it would seem that for practical purposes we are brought to the paradoxical conclusion that, if a person’s crimes are by ordinary standards only moderately objectionable, he should be regarded as wicked and liable to appropriate punishment, but if his wickedness goes beyond a certain point (when we cannot comprehend how anyone could commit such a crime) it ceases to be wickedness at all and becomes a medical condition.”

4–287

At least some of Baroness Wootton’s arguments would be supported by those who have secured wide-ranging reform of the insanity laws in the US following the acquittal of John Hinckley.⁶³⁹ Indeed, some states have become so disenchanted with the insanity defence that, rather than amend it, they have completely abolished it.⁶⁴⁰ Where this reform has taken place, the trend has been to restrict the role of insanity to one of determining whether the defendant lacked the necessary mental state for the definition of the crime. If for this reason, the defendant cannot be convicted of an offence, then automatic civil commitment follows.

2-305

The effect of this is, of course, to make mens rea even more important and this aspect of reform of the insanity defence would have found no favour at all with Baroness Wootton. Her view (explored in Ch.2), was that the entire assessment of responsibility was a futile one and that questions relating to the mental state of the defendant ought to be reserved for the postconviction, sentencing stage.

In complete contrast to Baroness Wootton, are the views of Szasz, a psychologist who embraces so whole-heartedly the concept of responsibility that he feels everyone ought to be regarded as sane and accountable for their actions.

T.S. SZASZ, “THE MYTH OF MENTAL ILLNESS” (1960) 15 AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGIST 113, 115–118:

4-288

“[A] currently prevalent claim [is that] ... mental illness is just as ‘real’ and ‘objective’ as bodily illness ... This is a confusing claim since it is never known exactly what is meant by such words as ‘real’ and ‘objective.’ I suspect, however, that what is intended by the proponents of this view is to create the idea in the popular mind that mental illness is some sort of disease entity, like an infection or a malignancy. If this were true, one could catch or get a ‘mental illness,’ one might have or harbour it, one might transmit it to others, and finally one could get rid of it. In my opinion there is not a shred of evidence to support this view. To the contrary, all the evidence is the other way and supports the view that what people now call mental illnesses are for the most part communications expressing unacceptable ideas, often framed, moreover in an unusual idiom . . .

[T]he diversity of human values and the methods by means of which they may be realized is so vast ... that they cannot fail but lead to conflicts in human relations. Indeed, to say that human relations at all levels from mother to child, through husband and wife, to nation and nation—are fraught with stress, strain and disharmony is, once again, making the obvious explicit ... I submit that the idea of mental illness is now being put to work to obscure certain difficulties which at present may be inherent—not that they need be unmodifiable—in the social intercourse of persons. If this is true, the concept functions as a disguise; for instead of calling attention to conflicting human needs, aspirations and values, the notion of mental illness provides an amoral and impersonal ‘thing’ (an illness) as an explanation for problems in living. We may recall in this connection that not so long ago it was devils and witches who were held responsible for men’s problems in social living. The belief in mental illness, as -something other than man’s trouble in getting along with his fellow man, is the proper heir to the belief in demonology and witchcraft. Mental illness exists or is ‘real’ in exactly the same sense in which witches existed or were ‘real’.

... The myth of mental illness encourages us, moreover, to believe in its logical corollary: that social intercourse would be harmonious, satisfying and the secure basis of a good life were it not for the disrupting influences of mental illness. The potentiality for universal human happiness, in this form at least, seems to me but another example of the I-wish-it-were-true type of fantasy. I do believe that human happiness or well-being on a hitherto unimaginably large scale, and not for a select few, is possible. This goal could be achieved, however, only at the cost of many men, and not just a few being willing and able to tackle their personal, social and ethical conflicts. This means having the courage and integrity to forgo waging battles on false fronts, finding solutions for substitute problems—for instance, fighting the battle of stomach acid and chronic fatigue instead of facing up to a marital conflict ...

My argument [is] ... limited to the proposition that mental illness is a myth, whose function it is to disguise and thus render more palatable the bitter pill of moral conflicts in human relations.”

One final insight might be considered.

D. L. ROSENHAN, “ON BEING SANE IN INSANE PLACES” (1973) 179 SCIENCE

“If sanity and insanity exist, how shall we know them?”

The question is neither capricious nor itself insane. However much we may be personally convinced that we can tell the normal from the abnormal, the evidence is simply not compelling. It is commonplace, for example, to read about murder trials wherein eminent psychiatrists for the defense are contradicted by equally eminent psychiatrists for the prosecution on the matter of the defendant’s sanity. More generally, there are a great deal of conflicting data on the reliability, utility and meaning of such terms as ‘sanity,’ ‘insanity,’ ‘mental illness’ and ‘schizophrenia’ ... what is viewed as normal in one culture may be seen as quite aberrant in another. Thus, notions of normality and abnormality may not be quite so accurate as people believe they are ... [this] in no way questions the fact that some behaviours are deviant or odd.

[Rosenhan then goes on to describe the nature of the research he had undertaken; 8 sane people gained secret admission to 12 different hospitals, all complained that they had heard voices, saying in particular, ‘thud,’ ‘hollow and empty.’ In all other respects (save their name and if necessary their profession) the pseudo-patients told the truth about their feelings, their background, and their present lives. The aim of the research was to ascertain whether and how the sane people would be detected. If they were, it would be some support at least for the view that sanity and insanity are distinct enough to be recognised wherever they occur. All the pseudo-patients were admitted to hospital, whereupon they ceased simulatng any symptoms of abnormality but behaved as they ‘normally’ behaved.] Despite their public ‘show’ of sanity, the pseudo-patients were never detected. Admitted, except in one case, with a diagnosis of schizophrenia each was discharged after hospitalisation of between 7 to 52 days, with a diagnosis of schizophrenia ‘in remission.’ The label ‘in remission’ should in no way be dismissed as a mere formality, for at no time during any hospitalisation had any question been raised about any pseudo-patients’ simulaton. Nor are there any indications in hospital records that the pseudo-patients status was suspect. Rather, the evidence was strong that once labelled schizophrenic, the pseudopatient was stuck with that label. If the pseudo-patient was to be discharged, he must naturally be 'in remission'; but he was not sane, nor in the institutions' view, had he ever been sane ...

The facts of the matter are that we have known for a long time that diagnoses are often not useful or reliable, but we have nevertheless continued to use them. We now know that we cannot distinguish insanity from sanity."

4-290

How are we to respond to arguments such as these? Do they constitute a persuasive case for abolition that "trumps" the arguments addressed in the introductory discussion of this defence? Fletcher, for example, remains unconvinced.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), P.846:

4-291

"The criminal law expresses respect for the autonomy of the sane as much as it shows compassion for the insane. The line between the two may shift over time. Our theories of sanity may change. But the line remains. If the criminal law is to be an institution expressing respect as well as compassion, its institutions must be able both to punish the guilty and excuse the weak. These two sentiments depend on each other. Compassion is possible only so far as punishment is the norm. Punishing wrongdoing is possible only so far as we have a concept of accountability for wrongdoing. Respect for autonomy and compassion for the weak are too important to our culture to be easily shaken by the skeptics."

C. AUTOMATISM

1. Introduction

4-292

In the two preceding sections we have seen that non-insane automatism (commonly termed simply "automatism") entitles a defendant to a complete acquittal and that, fearful of allowing too many such acquittals, the law has rigorously circumscribed the parameters of the defence of automatism. This has been achieved, in particular, by insisting that the defendant be blameless in causing the state of automatism and by adopting a broad definition of “disease of the mind” to ensure that in many cases, where there is the slightest risk of repetition of the conduct, the defendant is adjudged insane giving the courts power to make orders in relation to that person.

There have been two main consequences of this restrictive approach. First, the number of situations in which automatism can be successfully pleaded are few and far between. Apart from hypoglycaemia and the (possibly anomalous) decisions involving sleep-walking, already discussed, it would appear that it is only in cases involving isolated incidents of an external cause prompting the involuntary behaviour that the defence will be available. Examples would include physical compulsion (for example, being pushed over so as to injure another) and reflex actions of external origin (for example, reflexive movements while being attacked by a swarm of bees⁶⁴¹). More problematic is involuntary action caused by a blow. Clearly, a physical blow which causes concussion will qualify here. But, in some cases, there might be a less immediate connection between the “blow” and the automatic behaviour. In T,⁶⁴² the defendant, on a charge of robbery and assault causing actual bodily harm, claimed that she had been raped three days previously and that this caused her to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder with the result that she was in a state of psychogenic fugue rendering her actions automatic. At her trial, it was ruled that she was entitled to have this defence put to the jury as one of non-insane automatism.⁶⁴³ It is, however, doubtful whether the law would extend this to purely non-physical psychological “blows” such as receiving a shock or distressing news. In such a situation, it has been held that the ensuing behaviour has its source in the internal psychological or emotional condition of the defendant thus rendering the case one of insanity.⁶⁴⁴ Such distinctions are, however, difficult to sustain. It is unrealistic to conclude that the post-traumatic stress disorder in T was purely the product of the physical impact of the rape; presumably it was the psychological shock thereof that produced this state. Yet given the law’s reluctance to expand the category of automatism, it seems unlikely that the approach adopted in T would be approved if directly tested in the appellate courts.⁶⁴⁵

Another problematic cause of “involuntary” behaviour is hypnotism. There are dicta in *Quick*⁶⁴⁶ to the effect that this could give rise to automatism. On the other hand, it seems unlikely that the courts would go so far as to hold that “brainwashing” can lead to automatic behaviour. Such a holding would be dangerously close to concluding that a person’s unfortunate upbringing should exempt him from criminal liability.

The second consequence of the courts’ restrictive interpretation of automatism and expansive interpretation of insanity has been to force many defendants to plead guilty. The defendants in both Sullivan and Hennessey, discussed earlier, changed their pleas to guilty as soon as it was ruled that their defence was, in reality, one of insanity. These cases were both decided before the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991, at which time all defendants found not guilty by reason of insanity faced mandatory indefinite commitment. The reforms effected in the 1991 Act have produced a slow increase in the use of the plea; thus it would appear that the fear which induced defendants to change their plea is dissipating as the courts show their willingness to use the more flexible powers given to them under the 1991 Act.⁶⁴⁷ Given that mandatory commitment is no longer the only disposal available in murder cases, it may be that, rather than pleading diminished responsibility as defendants have done in the past, a corresponding increase in the plea of automatism has occurred. However, no data is collected which enables this possibility to be confirmed.⁶⁴⁸

4-293

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the present response of the law to the problem of automatism. Along with proposals to modify the insanity defence, reforms have been suggested to the law of non-insane automatism.⁶⁴⁹ As noted in the discussion of insanity, the Law Commission has made provisional recommendations for reform of the law to both insanity and automatism. Automatism would only be a defence, as now, if there was no prior fault,⁶⁵⁰ and:

“if the jury or magistrates find that the accused raises evidence that at the time of the alleged offence he or she wholly lacked the capacity to control his or her conduct and the loss of capacity was not the result of a recognised medical condition ... he or she shall be acquitted unless the prosecution disprove this to the criminal standard.”⁶⁵¹

While this would not lead to a different outcome for an epileptic who commits offences during a seizure (because under the current law the condition is regarded as internally caused and thus raising the plea of insanity) it would do so for a diabetic who, to use an example given by the Law Commission, causes death by dangerous driving during a hypoglycaemic episode where there was no warning of the onset of the episode.⁶⁵² Without prior fault and with a complete absence of control, such a defendant would currently secure an acquittal. Under the proposed reform, the result would be the new special verdict of “not criminally responsible by reason of a recognised medical condition”. While the removal of the hair-splitting internal/external distinction is wholly to be commended, there must be doubt as to whether defendants will wish to risk a special verdict – even one which does not have the negative connotations associated with the label “insanity”.

Finally, we need to examine whether this whole approach is sound. Should automatism provide a complete defence?

The result may be open to doubt at two levels.

2. Psychiatry’s view of the automaton’s true state of mind

R.W. WHITE, THE ABNORMAL PERSONALITY (1948), PP.203–205, 288:

4–294

“A colour-sergeant was carrying a message, riding his motorcycle through a dangerous section of the front. All at once it was several hours later and he was pushing his motorcycle along the streets of a coastal town nearly a hundred miles away. In utter bewilderment he gave himself up to the military police, but he could tell absolutely nothing of his long trip. The amnesia was ultimately broken by the use of hypnosis. The man then remembered that he was thrown down by a shell explosion, that he picked up himself and his machine, that he started straight for the coastal town, that he studied signs and asked for directions in order to reach this destination.

It is clear, in this case, that the amnesia entailed no loss of competence. The patient's actions were purposive, rational, and intelligent. The amnesia rested only on his sense of personal identity. The conflict was between fear, suddenly intensified by his narrow escape and duty to complete the dangerous mission. The forgetting of personal identity made it possible to give way to his impulse toward flight, now irresistible, without exposing himself to the almost equally unbearable anxiety associated with being a coward, failing his mission, and undergoing arrest as a deserter. When he achieved physical safety the two sides of the conflict resumed their normal proportions and his sense of personal identity suddenly returned ...

Hypnotism makes a very strong appeal to a man's delight in the marvellous and his desire for omnipotence. So strong is this appeal that many people would rather not be told that hypnotic phenomena are measurable and that they can be explained by straightforward psychological principles. It is more fun to believe that every vestige of the response to pain can be wiped out, or that suggested blindness produces the equivalent of real blindness, than to regard these as limited, measurable changes in the usual organisation of behaviour. As a result of this secret joy in magic and omnipotence, there has tended to be a large and important constant error in all thinking about the nature of hypnotism. This error is the belief that the hypnotist, rather than the subject produces the phenomena ... We should always bear in mind that the subject is still a person, even though he is participating in an unusual experiment and entering an unusual state. He has not become a fool, and it is he who produces the hypnotic behaviour.

... [There have been] various experimental investigations in which hypnotized persons were given suggestions to perform criminal acts. These experiments laboured under one great disadvantage. As it was not known whether the subjects would carry out the suggestions, the ‘criminal acts’ had to be arranged so that a really dangerous outcome was impossible. Rubber daggers and wooden pistols were used, the subjects being assured that they were real weapons. The outcome of all these earlier experiments can be condensed in a single illustration, amusingly described by Janet:

‘A number of persons of importance, magistrates and professors, had assembled in the main hall of the Salpetriere museum to witness a great seance of criminal suggestions. Witt, the principal subject, thrown into the somnambulist state, had under the influence of suggestion displayed the most saguinary instincts. At a word or sign, she had stabbed, shot and poisoned; the room was littered with corpses. The notables had withdrawn, greatly impressed, leaving only a few students with the subject, who was still in the somnambulist state. The students, having a fancy to bring the seance to a close by a less bloodcurdling experiment, made a very simple suggestion to Witt. They told her that she was now quite alone in the hall. She was to strip and take a bath. Witt, who had murdered all the magistrates without turning a hair was seized with shame at the thought of undressing. Rather than accede to the suggestion, she had a violent fit of hysteria.’ (P. Janet, Psychological Healing (1925), Vol.1 p.184)

This example exposes the fallacy that has ruined so much experimental work with hypnotism: the notion that the subject is a helpless fool who has no idea that he is being deceived. It points unmistakably to the conclusion that hypnotized persons will not carry out suggested acts which are repugnant to them—not when they think the consequences are real.”

4-295

If one accepts the above psychiatric evidence, what should be the law’s response to a defendant who, while under a hypnotic influence, commits a crime? Should such persons have a complete defence as “the dependency and helplessness of the hypnotised subject are too pronounced”,⁶⁵³ and that many persons are saved from being criminals by the force of their inhibitions which hypnotism removes?

3. That even if insanity is not an issue, the public interest may not be served by a complete acquittal

4-296

Even those who would not go so far as to accept the above view of autonomic acts have sometimes expressed concern that certain automatons have been given absolute acquittals.

R. CROSS, “REFLECTIONS ON BRATTY’S CASE” (1962) 78 L.Q.R. 236, 238–239:

4-297

“Although they are still comparatively rare, pleas of non-insane automatism are becoming increasingly frequent, and questions may be legitimately raised concerning the sufficiency of the courts’ powers. Is it right that someone who has been acquitted on the ground of non-insane automatism should inevitably go free? In R. v Charlson (1955) 29 Cr.App.R.37 the accused was acquitted on various charges of causing grievous bodily harm to his son because he acted in a state of automatism which may have been due to a cerebral tumour. It is only natural to feel the deepest sympathy for the accused in such a case, but it is equally natural to question the propriety of an unqualified acquittal. One way of dealing with such problems would be to give the judge powers in all cases of a successful plea of automatism, insane or non-insane, to order the detention of the accused pending a medical inquiry, after which the appropriate order could be made.”

4-298

A similar approach to that advocated by Cross is to be found in the Scottish case of HM Advocate v Fraser.⁶⁵⁴ In this sleepwalking case it was made a condition of discharge that the defendant should not sleep in the same room with anyone else. We have seen that as a result of Sullivan, epileptics, sleepwalkers, those suffering from arteriosclerosis and diabetics during hyperglycaemic episodes, may all now be regarded as insane. It has been argued that this is inappropriate. Although mandatory commitment no longer follows a finding of insanity, there is an undeniable stigma attached to such a finding. The Draft Criminal Code would rename the special verdict. However, it is doubtful whether the proposed term “mental disorder” is neutral enough to have the desired effect.⁶⁵⁵ Two options, therefore, could be considered. One could continue to include some automatons within the “special verdict” but demedicalise the test and label, or one could deal with all automatons outside the special verdict but qualify the acquittal as and when necessary by appropriate orders. Clearly, there would be problems in empowering courts to make appropriate orders in these cases, for example, such orders would probably be incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights art.5.⁶⁵⁶ However, if constructed in such a manner as to ensure compatibility with the Convention, such an approach might well be preferable to including such automatons within the definition of insanity.

VIII. Intoxication

A. BACKGROUND

4-299

A significant proportion of criminal offences are committed by persons who are under the influence of alcohol and/or drugs.

JOHN E. HODGE, “ALCOHOL AND VIOLENCE” IN P. J. TAYLOR (ED), VIOLENCE IN SOCIETY (1993), PP.129–130:

4-300

“Assault

There is clear evidence of a consistent association with alcohol use in cases of assault ... Meyer et al found that approximately two-thirds of perpetrators of police assault had been drinking just prior to the assault, while in a large study in which data on over 10,000 inmates of American prisons were reviewed, just under two-thirds of those convicted of assault were found to have been drinking at the time of the offence.

Homicide

Lindquist found that two-thirds of the offenders and approximately half their victims had been intoxicated at the time of the offence ...

Rape

The use of alcohol by rapists and their victims also seems fairly well established. Shupe found 50 per cent of men arrested for rape had been drinking, and 45 per cent could be described as intoxicated ...

Domestic violence

Pizzey found that alcohol had been involved in about 40 per cent of cases of battered wives and children seeking refuge from domestic violence. Other studies have tended to find rates of alcohol involvement of about 50 per cent.”

Research into crimes of violence in Bristol has confirmed this pattern: “we came to regard cases in which drink was not a factor as rather remarkable.”⁶⁵⁷

The above research is not necessarily claiming that the consumption of alcohol caused the criminal acts, but that there is a strong association between the two. Why is this so?

JOHN E. HODGE, “ALCOHOL AND VIOLENCE” IN P. J. TAYLOR (ED), VIOLENCE IN SOCIETY (1993), PP.132–134:

4–301

“Moral theory

Probably the first was the pre-scientific ‘moral theory’, which held that drinking loosens moral restraints, with the result that individuals who drink lose personal control and, as a result, engaged in immoral behaviours, including violence. While this theory has little scientific validity, it is still popular ... Labelling alcohol as the culprit provides a convenient scapegoat for violent acts.

Disinhibition theory

[B]ehavioural constraints are loosened by the pharmacological action of alcohol, and violence then results. However, the theory appears to imply that aggression is a natural state which is normally held in check ... which can be released by the pharmacological effects of alcohol ... [However], there is little evidence that aggression or violence is a normal human state ... Sobell and Sobell suggested that alcohol may directly act on the inhibitory control of the cerebral cortex over the lower brain centres and thus disinhibit aggressive urges. However, no empirical evidence has been obtained which either supports or refutes this hypothesis.

Stimulation theory

[S]ome ... have suggested that alcohol may directly stimulate aggression in individuals who may in some way be more biologically sensitive to its effects. A particular example of this is the theory of pathological intoxication, which suggests that a small proportion of individuals are particularly prone to become excessively aggressive under the influence of alcohol ...

Other factors which may explain the relationship between alcohol and violence

... The first is the simple physiological effects of alcohol, such as impaired reaction time. It seems unlikely, though, that these effects will lead directly to violence, although it is possible that poor co-ordination may result in a more extreme violent outcome than was perhaps the original intention. Similarly, Parnanen's hypothesis that cognitive impairment may be important in understanding the relationship between alcohol and violence has little supportive evidence ... [There are other] situational and psychological variables ... which help explain the association between alcohol and violence. One of these is the drinking situation itself. In this case, it is fairly clear that situations do influence the association between violence and alcohol. Alcohol use in some situations (for example, at football matches) is more likely to be associated with violence than in others (for example, party going). Cultural factors would also appear to be associated with the levels of violence after drinking ...

One major factor ... is the individual's expectancy of the outcome of drinking. If, as seems likely, there is a generally held belief that violence and alcohol are associated, this is likely to affect both the behaviour of the drinker and the interpretations of his/her behaviour by observers.”

The problem for the criminal law is one of determining what importance should be attached to the intoxication (whether by drink or drugs or both) of defendants who might claim either that they would never have committed the crime but for their drunkenness which loosened their inhibitions, or, alternatively, that they were so drunk that they did not know what they was doing and thus lacked mens rea. An example of the latter claim can be seen from *Lipman*⁶⁵⁸ where the defendant, a drug addict, while on an LSD “trip” had the illusion of descending to the centre of the earth and being attacked by snakes. In his attempt to fight off these reptiles he struck the victim (also a drug addict on an LSD “trip”) two blows on the head causing haemorrhage of the brain and crammed some eight inches of sheet into her mouth causing her to die of asphyxia. He claimed to have had “no knowledge of what he was doing and no intention to harm her”. A similar example can be found in the Scottish case of Brennan v HM Advocate,⁶⁵⁹ where the defendant consumed between 20 and 25 pints of beer, a glass of sherry and a quantity of the drug LSD He then stabbed his father to death with a knife. In both these cases, the defendant claimed that because of drunkenness he was unable to foresee the consequences of his actions and so lacked mens rea.

The law here is faced with a dilemma. On the one hand, strict principle suggests that defendants such as Lipman and Brennan lack mens rea, or perhaps did not even “act” and, accordingly, should escape criminal liability. On the other hand, particularly given the statistics on the close connection between crime and alcohol, the law is concerned with protecting the public (and deterrence) and cannot allow drunken persons to escape criminal liability and punishment. In short, there is a clash between a “strictly logical, subjective approach” and an “absolutist” policy-led approach, “which would focus solely on D’s conduct and its effects, but which would disregard D’s state of mind where affected by voluntary intoxication”.⁶⁶⁰ The law has tried to achieve some sort of compromise between the two approaches:

“Given the unattractiveness of both the strictly logical approach to criminal liability and the absolutist alternative, it should come as no surprise that English law has rejected both these extreme approaches in favour of an intermediate position. To put it another way, English law has adopted the purely logical view for some offences, focusing solely on the definitional requirements of the offence charged, but has employed the absolutist approach in relation to other offences.”⁶⁶¹

B. DRUNKEN INTENT

4-303

As the above cases make clear, the law is not concerned with a defendant who has several (or many) drinks that merely “loosen her up” and remove her inhibitions. If at the time of the crime she knows what she is doing, it is irrelevant that she would not have committed the crime, but for the drinks she has consumed. It was stressed in Sheehan and Moore that “a drunken intent is nevertheless an intent”.⁶⁶²

Equally, the law is not concerned with persons who claim that they would not have committed the crime had they not been intoxicated. The loss of self-control was the defendant’s fault. At the time of the crime she knew what she was doing and so must be held fully responsible.

Accordingly, the only cases in which the criminal law might consider intoxication to be a relevant issue are those where the defendant is so intoxicated as to lack mens rea or to be in a state of automatism. It is not a matter of whether the defendant was capable of forming mens rea. It is a question of whether mens rea was, in fact, formed.⁶⁶³

C. INTOXICATION AS A “DEFENCE”

4-304

Even in cases where the defendant does lack mens rea, the law is unwilling to allow drunken persons to escape criminal liability and draws a distinction between voluntary and involuntary intoxication, the general rule being that drunkenness is only an answer to a charge in the latter situation.

Being voluntarily intoxicated is usually no answer to a criminal charge. However, this rule is subject to a significant exception. Quite how this exception should be classified, however, has always been a matter of difficulty. Judges and texts commonly refer to voluntary intoxication, in these exceptional circumstances, as providing a partial excuse or defence for the defendant. Certainly, in terms of its effect upon the liability of an intoxicated defendant, charged, say, with murder, and eventually convicted of manslaughter, this is how it appears to operate. But as the Law Commission has emphasised, “[t]here is no common law or statutory ‘defence’ of intoxication. That is to say, the simple fact that D was voluntarily intoxicated at the time he or she allegedly committed the offence charged does not provide D with a ‘defence’”.⁶⁶⁴ So how does intoxication have an impact upon a defendant’s liability?

A. P. SIMESTER, “INTOXICATION IS NEVER A DEFENCE” [2009] CRIM. L.R. 3, 4–5:

4–305

“The criminal law does contain an intoxication doctrine, but it is a doctrine of inculcation, not exculpation. Whether the intoxication doctrine is evidential or substantive is uncertain ... Either way, however, it operates for the benefit of the prosecution, not the defence. Wherever the doctrine applies, its function—its sole function—is to treat the defendant as if he acted with mens rea, when in fact, he did not.

The intoxication doctrine is a supplementary device that assists the prosecution to ‘prove’ mens rea where that does not actually exist ...

Suppose ... that D lacked mens rea at the time when he perpetrated the actus reus of the offence charged. Ordinarily, he is then entitled to an acquittal. Yet before we acquit, we need to consider why mens rea was missing. If D lacked mens rea because intoxicated (i.e. where D would have foreseen the risk of perpetrating the actus reus had he been sober), the intoxication doctrine then comes into operation. The doctrine holds that, where D lacks mens rea because intoxicated and certain additional criteria are satisfied, D is to be treated as if he had mens rea.”

4-306

This is a persuasive analysis of the approach taken by the law. In effect, as will be seen, it reverses the standard account and, arguably, intoxication becomes a form of constructive liability.⁶⁶⁵ But before examining this further the concept of voluntary intoxication requires elaboration.

D. MEANING OF VOLUNTARY INTOXICATION

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MENTALLY ABNORMAL OFFENDERS (BUTLER COMMITTEE) (CMND.6244, 1975), PARA.18.56:

4-307

“‘Voluntary intoxication’ would be defined to mean intoxication resulting from the intentional taking of drink or a drug knowing that it is capable in sufficient quantity of having an intoxicating effect; provided that intoxication is not voluntary if it results in part from a fact unknown to the defendant that increases his sensitivity to the drink or drug. The concluding words would provide a defence to a person who suffers from hypoglycaemia, for example, who does not know that in that condition the ingestions of a small amount of alcohol can produce a state of altered consciousness, as well as to a person who has been prescribed a drug on medical grounds without warning of the effect it may produce.”

4-308

The present law does not appear to go quite as far as the above proposal. In Allen,⁶⁶⁶ the defendant claimed that he had not realised that wine he had drunk had a high alcohol content. It was held that, where an accused knows he is drinking alcohol, it is irrelevant whether he knows the precise nature or strength of the alcohol. It was a clear case of voluntary intoxication.

R. V HARDIE (1985) 80 CR. APP. R.
157 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-309

PARKER LJ:

“The problem is whether ... [the taking of] valium ... should properly be regarded as self-induced intoxication ...

There can be no doubt that the same rule applies both to self-intoxication by alcohol and intoxication by hallucinatory drugs, but this is because the effects of both are wellknown and there is therefore an element of recklessness in the self-administration of the drug ...

In the present instance the defence was that the valium was taken for the purpose of calming the nerves only, that it was old stock and that the appellant was told it would do him no harm. There was no evidence that it was known to the appellant or even generally known that the taking of valium in the quantity taken would be liable to render a person aggressive or incapable of appreciating risks to others or have other side effects such that its self-administration would itself have an element of recklessness. It is true that valium is a drug and it is true that it was taken deliberately and not taken on medical prescription, but the drug is, in our view, wholly different in kind from drugs which are liable to cause unpredictability or aggressiveness. It may well be that the taking of a sedative or soporific drug will, in certain circumstances, be no answer, for example in a case of reckless driving, but if the effect of a drug is merely soporific or sedative the taking of it, even in some excessive quantity, cannot in the ordinary way raise a conclusive presumption against the admission of proof of intoxication for the purpose of disproving mens rea in ordinary crimes, such as would be the case with alcoholic intoxication or incapacity or automatism resulting from the self-administration of dangerous drugs.”

Thus, the fact that the court thought that the drug was non-dangerous was highly significant. The Law Commission has long regarded it as unsatisfactory that the courts should have to determine whether or not a drug is dangerous on a case-by-case basis.⁶⁶⁷ Its original approach was to define intoxication and the circumstances in which it would be held to be involuntary.⁶⁶⁸ However, subsequent Government proposals, instead, defined voluntary intoxication and, significantly, inserted a provision that intoxication is presumed to be voluntary.⁶⁶⁹ In its latest proposals, the Law Commission has not adopted this strategy. Its current proposals are that neither “intoxicant” nor “voluntary intoxication” should be defined. Instead, it recommends “that the concept of involuntary intoxication, at or least the most obvious situations which should be regarded as involuntary intoxication, should be expressly set out.”⁶⁷⁰

E. LAW ON VOLUNTARY INTOXICATION

1. Specific and basic intent

We are now in a position to examine further the impact voluntary intoxication has upon a defendant’s liability for offences. In the leading case of Majewski,⁶⁷¹ the House of Lords confirmed a long line of authority⁶⁷² that drunkenness was an answer to charges involving crimes of “specific intent” and not to crimes of “basic intent”.⁶⁷³

This distinction caused little problem at first. A rough list was drawn up by judges: for example, murder and the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.18 were deemed to be crimes of specific intent while manslaughter and the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20 were held to be crimes of basic intent. This distinction was a functional one aimed at achieving a “compromise between the rigors of denying the relevance of intoxication and allowing it to undercut all liability”.⁶⁷⁴ Drunken defendants charged with murder and s.18 could instead be convicted of manslaughter and s.20, respectively.

Intoxication could be seen, in effect, to be acting as a mitigating factor and hence operated in a defence-like way. However, Simester has pointed out that this apparent similarity with partial defences is very limited; indeed, he argues that this thinking needs to be abandoned.

A. P. SIMESTER, “INTOXICATION IS NEVER A DEFENCE” [2009] CRIM. L.R. 3, 13:

4-312

“Unlike partial exculpations, intoxication is a doctrine of (partial) inculcation. Structurally speaking, they work in opposite directions.

True partial defences, such as provocation [now loss of control], operate to excuse a defendant’s deliberate choice to harm the victim. Provocation does not deny that D has the mens rea for murder. Quite the reverse: it explains why he did. It prevents conviction of an offence for which the necessary inculpatory elements are satisfied ... Disregard provocation, and the case is a culpable murder.

For intoxication, by contrast, it is not the drunkenness that is supplying the exception. It is the lack of mens rea. Indeed, strictly speaking exculpation is not required. The core inculpatory element is missing. This is why, in a specific intent offence, intoxication informs no substantive defence known to the criminal law (and why the defendant bears no burden to establish it). The defendant’s submission is like the ‘defence’ of alibi: that the prosecution has not proved the elements, the actus reus and mens rea, of the offence. Of course, courtroom lawyers frequently call such denials a defence, but we should not confuse this usage with the corresponding substantive-law term. The prosecution bears the burden of proving actus reus and mens rea, it has simply failed to do so.

When we come to basic intent offences, on the other hand, now intoxication becomes relevant as a matter of substantive law. The prosecution acquires a supplementary way to establish culpability. It need not, though it may, prove mens rea. Or it may prove that D would have had mens rea but for his voluntary intoxication. Where it succeeds in the latter, this is not to conclude that D somehow had mens rea in fact, but rather that he evinced the level of culpability that the mens rea requirement is designed to track.”

4-313

Whichever view of the operation of intoxication upon liability is taken, and Simester’s view is compelling, the terms “specific” and “basic” intent are crucially important and need to be explained. However, initially they were concepts without substance. They meant nothing. They were like elephants—the courts knew them when they saw them (i.e. they knew when a defendant’s liability could be reduced without escaping all punishment)—but they could not be defined. Difficulties started arising when judges began trying to define these concepts. Attempting to identify a coherent rationale for a practice born out of a compromise between principle and policy considerations was always going to be problematic.

Several views started emerging. For example, Lord Simon in Majewski equated specific intent with “direct” intent (i.e. aim or purpose): “the prosecution must in general prove that the purpose for the commission of the act extends to the intent expressed or implied in the definition of the crime”.⁶⁷⁵ This view, however, never won judicial support and instead the “ulterior intent test” was the first to gain broad acceptance. Under this view, crimes of specific intent are crimes where the mens rea of the offence extends beyond the actus reus, while in crimes of basic intent the mens rea goes no further than extending to the elements of the actus reus itself. An example will illustrate this distinction. Assault is a crime of basic intent: the actus reus is causing apprehension of immediate force; the mens rea is an intention (or recklessness) to cause such apprehension; no mens rea extending beyond the actus reus is required. But assault with intent to resist arrest⁶⁷⁶ is a crime of specific intent: the actus reus is the same as that of common assault, namely, causing apprehension of immediate force; the mens rea is two-fold—there must be the mens rea of the assault and in addition there must be an intent to resist arrest. This additional intention does not relate to anything in the actus reus of the crime; it extends beyond the actus reus; the crime is thus one of specific intent.

However, an alternative view was also expressed in Majewski,⁶⁷⁷ and endorsed in the subsequent House of Lords' decision of Caldwell, namely, the "recklessness test". According to this, drunkenness can only be relevant to crimes that require proof of intention (such as murder and s.18), and is no answer to crimes that can be committed recklessly (such as manslaughter and s.20). In short, a crime of "specific intent" is one that cannot be committed recklessly. It ought to be stressed that while the decision in Caldwell was effectively overruled by the House of Lords in G,⁶⁷⁸ this latter decision was careful not to overrule anything said in Caldwell about self-induced intoxication.

R. V CALDWELL [1982] A.C. 341 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-314

The facts are set out above, [para.2-191]

(Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2):

"A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property, whether belonging to himself or another—(a) intending to destroy or damage any property or being reckless as to whether any property would be destroyed or damaged; and (b) intending by the destruction or damage to endanger the life of another or being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered; shall be guilty of an offence.")

LORD DIPLOCK:

"As respects the charge under section 1(2) the prosecution did not rely upon an actual intent of the respondent to endanger the lives of the residents but relied on his having been reckless whether the lives of any of them would be endangered ... If the only mental state capable of constituting the necessary mens rea for an offence under section 1(2) were that expressed in the words 'intending by the destruction or damage to endanger the life of another', it would have been necessary to consider whether the offence was to be classified as one of 'specific' intent for the purposes of the rule of law which this House affirmed and applied in R. v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443; and this it plainly is. But this is not, in my view, a relevant inquiry where 'being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered' is an alternative mental state that is capable of constituting the necessary mens rea of the offence with which he is charged.

The speech of Lord Elwyn-Jones LC in R. v Majewski ... is authority that self-induced intoxication is no defence to a crime in which recklessness is enough to constitute the necessary mens rea. The charge in Majewski was of assault occasioning actual bodily harm and it was held by the majority of the House, approving R v Venna, that recklessness in the use of force was sufficient to satisfy the mental element in the offence of assault. Reducing oneself by drink or drugs to a condition in which the restraints of reason and conscience are cast off was held to be a reckless course of conduct and an integral part of the crime ... The Lord Chancellor accepted at p. 475 as correctly stating English law the provision in s.2.08(2) of the American Model Penal Code:

'When recklessness establishes an element of the offence, if the actor, due to self-induced intoxication, is unaware of a risk of which he would have been aware had he been sober, such unawareness is immaterial.' ...

My Lords, the Court of Appeal in the instant case regarded the case as turning on whether the offence under section 1(2) was one of 'specific' intent or 'basic' intent ... [T]hey held that the offence under section 1(2) was one of 'specific' intent in contrast to the offence under section 1(1) which was of basic intent. This would be right if the only mens rea capable of constituting the offence were an actual intention to endanger the life of another. For the reasons I have given, however, classification into offences of 'specific' and 'basic' intent is irrelevant where being reckless as to whether a particular harmful consequence will result from one's act is a sufficient alternative mens rea."

4-315

LORD EDMUND-DAVIS (DISSENTING):

"Something more must be said ... having regard to the view expressed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock ... that the speech of Lord Elwyn-Jones LC in R. v Majewski 'is authority that self-induced intoxication is no defence to a crime in which recklessness is enough to constitute the necessary mens rea'. It is a view which, with respect, I do not share. In common with all the noble and learned Lords hearing that appeal, Lord Elwyn-Jones LC adopted the well-established (though not universally favoured) distinction between basic and specific intents. R. v Majewski ... related solely to charges of assault, undoubtedly an offence of basic intent, and the Lord Chancellor made it clear that his observations were confined to offences of that nature ... My respectful view is that Majewski accordingly supplies no support for the proposition that, in relation to crimes of specific intent (such as section 1(2)(b) of the Act of 1971) incapacity to appreciate the degree and nature of the risk created by his action which is attributable to the defendant's self-intoxication is an irrelevance. The Lord Chancellor was dealing simply with crimes of basic intent, and in my judgment it was strictly within that framework that he adopted the view expressed in the American Penal Code ... and recklessness as an element in crimes of specific intent was, I am convinced, never within his contemplation ...

My Lords, it was recently predicted that 'There can hardly be any doubt that all crimes of recklessness except murder will now be held to be crimes of basic intent within Majewski': see Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, p.431 [and] that will surely be the effect of the majority decision in this appeal. That I regret, for the consequence is that, however grave the crime charged, if recklessness can constitute its mens rea the fact that it was committed in drink can afford no defence. It is a very long time since we had so harsh a law in this country."

Appeal dismissed

R. V HEARD [2008] Q.B. 43 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-316

The defendant was charged with sexual assault, contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.3. The defendant, who had been drinking heavily, claimed he could not remember the sexual assault upon a policeman. He was convicted and appealed on the ground that s.3 created an offence of specific intent and that the jury should have been directed to consider whether the drink he had taken meant he did not have an intention to touch as required under s.3.

HUGHES LJ:

“The first thing to say is that it should not be supposed that every offence can be categorised simply as either one of specific intent or basic intent. So to categorise an offence may conceal the truth that different elements of it may require proof of different states of mind ... The current legislative practice of itemising separately different elements of offences created by statute, which is much exhibited in the Sexual Offences Act 2003, may occasionally have the potential to complicate matters for a jury, but it demonstrates the impossibility of fitting an offence into a single pigeon-hole, whether it be labelled ‘basic intent’ or specific intent’.

The offence of sexual assault, with which this case is concerned, is an example ... [I]t is only the touching which must be intentional, whilst the sexual character of the touching is unless equivocal, to be judged objectively, and a belief in consent must be objectively reasonable ...

In the present case, what the appellant did and said at the time ... made it perfectly clear that this was a case of drunken intentional touching. Although the Judge directed the jury that drunkenness was no defence, he also directed the jury that it must be sure that the touching was deliberate. That amounted to a direction that for conviction the appellant’s mind (drunken or otherwise) had to have gone with his physical act of touching ...

[W]e agree that the Judge’s direction that the touching must be deliberate was correct ...

The remaining question is whether the Judge was also correct to direct the jury that drunkenness was not a defence.

We do not agree with [counsel’s] submission for the appellant that the fact that reckless touching will not suffice means that voluntary intoxication can be relied upon as defeating intentional touching. We do not read the cases, including DPP v Majewski, as establishing any such rule ... The Judge was accordingly correct, not only to direct the jury that the touching must be deliberate, but also to direct it that the defence that voluntary drunkenness rendered him unable to form the intent to touch was not open to him ...

[Counsel for the appellant's] proposition that Majewski decides that it is only where recklessness suffices that voluntary intoxication cannot be relied upon derives from a part of the speech by Lord Elwyn-Jones LC in Majewski, and some observations, obiter of Lord Diplock in the subsequent case of Caldwell ...

4-317

There are a number of difficulties about extracting [counsel's] proposition from the [two cases] ...

- (i) Lord Elwyn-Jones was addressing the submission made on behalf of the appellant in Majewski that it was unprincipled or unethical to distinguish between the effect of drink upon the mind in some crimes and its effect upon the mind in others. In rejecting that submission, and upholding the distinction between crimes of basic and specific intent, he was drawing attention to the fact that a man who has got himself into a state of voluntary intoxication is not, by ordinary standards, blameless. Both the Lord Chancellor and others of their Lordships made clear their view that to get oneself into such a state is, viewed broadly, as culpable as in any sober defendant convicted of a crime of basic intent, whether because he has the basic intent or because he is reckless as to the relevant consequence or circumstance. Throughout Majewski it is clear that their Lordships regarded those two latter states of mind as equivalent to one another for these purposes. It therefore does not follow from the references to recklessness that the same rule (that voluntary intoxication cannot be relied upon) does not apply also to basic intent; on the contrary, it seems to us clear that their Lordships were treating the two as the same.
- (ii) The new analysis of recklessness in Caldwell may have led readily to the proposition that voluntary intoxication is broadly equivalent to recklessness, thus defined. But that analysis and definition of recklessness have now been reversed by the House of Lords in R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034. As now understood, recklessness requires actual foresight of the risk.

- (iii) Since the majority in Caldwell held that it was enough for recklessness that the risk was obvious objectively (thus, to the sober man) no question of drink providing a defence could arise; it follows that the explanation of Majewski which was advanced was plainly obiter.
- (iv) Lord Diplock's proposition in Caldwell attracted a vigorous dissent from Lord Edmund-Davies ... [He] dissented not only from the new definition of recklessness, but also from the analysis of Majewski ...
- (v) There were, moreover, many difficulties in the proposition that voluntary intoxication actually supplies the mens rea, whether on the basis of recklessness as re-defined in Caldwell or on the basis of recklessness as now understood; if that were so the drunken man might be guilty simply by becoming drunk and whether or not the risk would be obvious to a sober person, himself or anyone else. That reinforces our opinion that the proposition being advanced was one of broadly equivalent culpability, rather than of drink by itself supplying the mens rea.

It is necessary to go back to Majewski in order to see the basis for the distinction there upheld between crimes of basic and of specific intent. It is to be found most clearly in the speech of Lord Simon ... [and] was that crimes of specific intent are those where the offence requires proof of purpose or consequence, which are not confined to, but amongst which are included, those where the purpose goes beyond the actus reus (sometimes referred to as cases of 'ulterior intent') ...

That explanation of the difference is consistent with the view of Lord Edmund-Davies that an offence contrary to s1(2)(b) Criminal Damage Act is one of specific intent in this sense, even though it involves no more than recklessness as to the endangering of life; the offence requires proof of a state of mind addressing something beyond the prohibited act itself, namely its consequences. We regard this as the best explanation of the sometimes elusive distinction between specific and basic intent in the sense used in Majewski, and it seems to us that this is the distinction which the Judge in the present case was applying when he referred to the concept of a 'bolted-on' intention ...

There is a great deal of policy in the decision whether voluntary intoxication can or cannot be relied upon. [There are] several passages in Majewski where the rule is firmly grounded upon common sense, whether purely logical or not ...

[O]ur view is that the Judge's directions were substantially correct."

Appeal dismissed

4-318

Everything said in this decision about the distinction between specific and basic intent was technically obiter.⁶⁷⁹ It was clear that the defendant had a drunken intent and this has never been a defence. Despite being obiter, the Court of Appeal has, here, disapproved the recklessness test and expressed a strong preference for the "purposive intent" approach and for the ulterior intent test. In doing this, however, the judgment is riddled with ambiguity. It is stated that specific intent includes ulterior intent but is "not confined to" such cases. It is far from clear when an offence, which is not one of ulterior intent, would nevertheless be one of specific intent. There are significant problems with this approach. There is abundant precedent that murder and s.18 are crimes of specific intent yet neither of these is generally⁶⁸⁰ a crime of ulterior intent. Equally, neither of these crimes requires direct, "purposive" intent; oblique intent suffices. It is unfortunate that the simple "recklessness test" has been disapproved by the Court of Appeal (on some rather selective reading of the House of Lords' decisions); the matter cannot be regarded as resolved. It is submitted that the better view is that drunkenness should be an answer to crimes that can only be committed intentionally. This would not necessarily lead to unmeritorious acquittals. In the above case, for example, there was ample evidence of an intention to touch the policeman.

In Heard, it is stated that offences cannot be rigidly categorised as being of specific or basic intent. However, there are clear precedents and judicial pronouncements concerning the specific/basic intent distinction. On the basis of these it would appear that the following are crimes of specific intent:

(i) Murder

4-319

There is no doubt that intoxication leads to an acquittal for the crime of murder; the defendant will instead be found guilty of the lesser included offence of manslaughter.⁶⁸¹ This rule can now be reconciled with the “recklessness test” as since Moloney and Hancock it is clear that murder is a crime of intention; it cannot be committed recklessly. However, this coincidence between principle and policy is little more than chance. For many years preceding Moloney and Hancock, murder was a crime that arguably could be committed recklessly,⁶⁸² yet during this time it was never doubted that murder was nevertheless a crime of specific intent. The policy reasons underlying this were clear. In murder cases, there was always the possibility of a manslaughter conviction operating as a safety-net. Drunken defendants would not escape liability completely so it was “safe” to deem murder to be a crime of specific intent. This had the further advantage that it enabled the judge to avoid the imposition of the mandatory sentence for murder.⁶⁸³ Drunken killers were blameworthy and deserved punishment, but they were, perhaps, not always as blameworthy as deliberate murderers. Conviction for manslaughter allowed the judge flexibility to assess the degree of blameworthiness and punish appropriately.

(ii) Section 18

4–320

The crime of wounding or causing grievous bodily harm with intent to cause grievous bodily harm or with intent to resist apprehension is a crime that cannot be committed recklessly. Drunkenness can lead to the defendant escaping liability for s.18 but the defendant will then be convicted of the lesser basic intent offence of s.20, an offence that can be committed recklessly.⁶⁸⁴ However, there is a problem here. While wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, and wounding or causing grievous bodily harm with intent to resist apprehension, are clearly crimes of ulterior intent, the same cannot be said of causing grievous bodily harm with intent to cause grievous bodily harm. Thus, if ulterior intent were required, drunkenness would be no answer to such a charge. This view, however, is not consistent with the better “recklessness test” and is not supported by authority which suggests that s.18 is always a specific intent offence.⁶⁸⁵

(iii) Theft⁶⁸⁶

4-321

This is a crime of intention; recklessness does not suffice; it is also a crime of ulterior intent.

(iv) Robbery⁶⁸⁷

4-322

Again, recklessness will not suffice here and it is a crime of ulterior intent.

(v) Burglary

4-323

While recklessness as to whether entry to a building as a trespasser will suffice, such entry must be accompanied by an intention (only) to commit a listed offence.⁶⁸⁸ It would thus appear to be a crime of specific intent, passing the “recklessness test”. It is also a crime of ulterior intent.

(vi) Handling stolen goods

4-324

In Durante,⁶⁸⁹ it was accepted that this was an offence of specific intent. This is not an offence of intention at all. The mens rea stipulated by the Theft Act 1968 s.22 is that the defendant must act dishonestly and must know or believe that the goods are stolen. If one adopts the “recklessness” test it is difficult to see why this should be regarded as a crime of specific intent.

(vii) Attempt

4-325

Only intention suffices; further, it is a crime of ulterior intent.⁶⁹⁰

(viii) Assault with intent to resist arrest

4-326

As with burglary, while one of the elements, the assault, may be committed recklessly, there must be a further intention to resist arrest.

It must be emphasised that this list does not purport to be exhaustive.

Most other offences are crimes of basic intent. The most prominent on this list are the following: manslaughter, s.20, s.47 and common assault. Occasionally, a statute specifically provides that intoxication cannot be a defence: the Public Order Act 1986 is an example of this.⁶⁹¹ It is also widely accepted that rape was, under the law prior to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, and continues to be, a crime of basic intent.

R. V FOTHERINGHAM (1989) 88 CR.
APP. R. 206 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

4-327

The appellant and his wife went out for the evening leaving a 14-year-old girl to baby-sit. The wife (probably in the appellant's absence) told the girl to sleep in the matrimonial bed. On returning home, the appellant got into the matrimonial bed and had sexual intercourse with the girl without her consent. The wife appeared and the intercourse ceased. The appellant was charged with rape but claimed that because of drunkenness, he had mistaken the girl for his wife. He admitted that he would not have made this mistake if he had been sober. The judge directed the jury to disregard the appellant's self-induced intoxication in considering whether there were reasonable grounds for his believing that he was having sexual intercourse with a consenting woman, namely, his wife. The appellant was convicted and appealed.

WATKINS LJ:

“The point of law ... [is] whether it is a defence to a charge of rape ... that a defendant, as a result of self-induced intoxication, has an honest but mistaken belief that he was having conjugal relations ...

Counsel had to recognise, as in fact he did, that where the issue in rape is consent, a defendant's self-induced intoxication is not a relevant matter which a jury are entitled to take into account in deciding whether there were reasonable grounds for the defendant's belief that the woman consented—see Woods (1982) 74 Cr.App.R.312. Likewise he had to face the law, which is that 'self-induced intoxication is no defence to a crime in which recklessness is enough to constitute the necessary mens rea'—see ... [Caldwell where Lord Diplock refers to Majewski] where it was held that rape is a crime of basic intent to which self-induced intoxication is no defence ...

[The appellant's argument] clearly runs counter to authority, which is that in rape self-induced intoxication is no defence, whether the issue be intention, consent or, as here, mistake as to the identity of the victim. We do not doubt that the public would be outraged if the law were to be declared to be otherwise.”

Appeal dismissed

4-328

At the time of this decision, rape was a crime that could be committed recklessly in that knowledge or recklessness as to consent would suffice. (Today, the requirement is that the defendant lacks a reasonable belief as to consent.) But in Fotheringham, the mistake was not as to consent but as to whether the defendant was having unlawful sexual intercourse. (As the law then stood, if it had been his wife the sexual intercourse would have been lawful.) However, it was also, and is still, the case that the defendant had to intend to have sexual intercourse.⁶⁹² What was never decided, before the reforms to the law of rape, was whether there had to be an intention to have unlawful sexual intercourse (i.e. knowledge that it was not his wife) or whether recklessness as to the element sufficed. If the former view was correct, the defendant would have lacked mens rea in respect to an element which could not be satisfied by recklessness. On this basis drunkenness should have been relevant. A literal interpretation in Fotheringham, however, means that if any element of a crime can be satisfied by proof of recklessness, the crime is always one of basic intent. Acceptance of this view would necessitate a reassessment of the list of crimes of specific intent presented above. In particular, burglary and assault with intent to resist arrest would all have to be regarded as crimes of basic intent because in each of them one element can be satisfied by proof of recklessness.

The alternative interpretation is that, consistent with the general principle, recklessness as to a surrounding circumstance (in Fotheringham, the “unlawfulness” requirement) suffices and, accordingly, his drunkenness as to this element is irrelevant. Since the abolition of the “marital rape exemption” this particular point is no longer of practical importance but the broader issue still remains. What is the position if a defendant intends to sexually assault a woman in the vaginal area without penetrating her, but, because of his drunkenness, he does penetrate her? Strict principle might suggest that as this element of the crime can only be committed intentionally, drunkenness ought to preclude liability. However, it is almost inconceivable that any court would engage in such an analysis. Policy would almost certainly prevail here and so it can be concluded, especially in the light of Heard above, that, irrespective of the nature of the mistake, rape is always a crime of basic intent.

What is the rationale of this “recklessness test”? In Majewski, Lord Elwyn-Jones LC said:

“If a man of his own volition takes a substance which causes him to cast off the restraints of reason and conscience, no wrong is done to him by holding him answerable criminally for any injury he may do while in that condition. His course of conduct in reducing himself by drugs and drink to that condition in my view supplies the evidence of mens rea, of guilty mind certainly sufficient for crimes of basic intent. It is a reckless course of conduct and recklessness is enough to constitute the necessary mens rea in assault cases ... The drunkenness is itself an intrinsic, an integral part of the crime, the other part being the evidence of the unlawful use of force against the victim. Together they add up to criminal recklessness.”⁶⁹³

4-329

There were two problems with this approach. Suppose a defendant starts drinking at 8pm and by 10pm is no longer aware of his actions. At 11pm he commits the actus reus of the crime. The mens rea of the crime (getting so drunk which is a reckless thing to do) precedes the actus reus. There is no coincidence of actus reus and mens rea, and as Dashwood points out:

“It might be argued that the carry-over of mens rea in the present situation would correspond to that in the famous cases of Thabo-Meli and Church [above, paras 2-238–2-239] where the immediate cause of death was not the attack upon the victim but the measures taken to dispose of what was believed to be a dead body. However, an important distinction is that in these cases the attack and the disposal of the supposed corpse represented successive steps in a single criminal transaction, the later act being consciously linked in the mind of the accused with the earlier act; such an analysis would not apply to the case of misconduct following reckless intoxication.”⁶⁹⁴

The second problem with Lord Elwyn-Jones’ approach is that recklessness does not exist in the abstract. One has to be reckless as to a particular consequence. Thus, under the subjective test of recklessness it should have been necessary to establish that when the defendant was getting drunk (the recklessness) he foresaw the possibility of committing the crime.

It is quite clear that the courts were less concerned with fine arguments such as these than with ensuring that a fair and just solution (in terms of balancing the competing interests of protection of society and the rights of the defendant) was achieved. As Lord Simon said:

“One of the prime purposes of the criminal law, with its penal sanctions, is the protection from certain proscribed conduct of persons who are pursuing their lawful lives. Unprovoked violence has, from time immemorial, been a significant part of such proscribed violence. To accede to the argument on behalf of the appellant would leave the citizen legally unprotected from unprovoked violence where such violence was the consequence of drink or drugs having obliterated the capacity of the perpetrator to know what he was doing or what were its consequences.”⁶⁹⁵

4-330

In Caldwell, Lord Diplock was able to avoid these problems by re-casting recklessness in an objective mould. If the risks would have been obvious to an ordinary person at the time of drinking, then the defendant was reckless as to the particular consequence; it was irrelevant whether the defendant, because of intoxication, foresaw the risk himself.

However, despite the fact that the Caldwell-recklessness test was, in this respect, a more principled approach to the issue of intoxication, it has been jettisoned from English law.⁶⁹⁶ The clash between principle and policy is marked. When subjective mens rea correlates with ordinary people's notions of fault or blameworthiness (say, cases of sober mistakes or accidents) it can be employed. When it does not (as in cases of drunken violence), the concept of subjective mens rea has to be abandoned. The true basis of mens rea is the attribution of blame, which might, or might not, coincide with a defendant's state of mind. Blame is attributed to persons who render themselves insensible through drink or drugs and then commit a crime.⁶⁹⁷ As Lord Russell in Majewski said:

*“Mens rea has many aspects. If asked to define it in such a case as the present I would say that the element of guilt or moral turpitude is supplied by the act of self-intoxication reckless of possible consequences.”*⁶⁹⁸

Such views were endorsed by Lord Simon in Majewski:

*“Mens rea is therefore on ultimate analysis the state of mind stigmatised as wrongful by the criminal law which, when compounded with the relevant prohibited conduct, constitutes a particular offence. There is no juristic reason why mental incapacity brought about by self-induced intoxication, to realise what one is doing or its probable consequences should not be such a state of mind stigmatised as wrongful by the criminal law.”*⁶⁹⁹

4-331

In Heard, the Court of Appeal recognised the fallacy (particularly since G) in the reasoning that getting drunk is a reckless thing to do and that this can constitute the mens rea of an offence. Instead, it suggested that the issue was one of “broadly equivalent culpability” rather than the drink by itself supplying the mens rea. Quite what the culpability relates to was left unclear although an answer has since been supplied by the Law Commission:

“[G]iven the culpability associated with knowingly and voluntarily becoming intoxicated, and the associated increase in the known risk of aggressive behaviour ... the advertent recklessness in voluntarily choosing to become intoxicated, and becoming a greater danger to society, may be equated, morally, with the subjective (advertent) recklessness required for liability.”⁷⁰⁰

This is probably the closest we are likely to get to a satisfactory answer. It lends support to Simester’s analysis of the intoxication doctrine as a form of constructive liability: “becoming voluntarily drunk supplies a gateway to liability, without further mens rea, for basic intent offences”.⁷⁰¹

Despite the long-standing debate over its rationale, the recklessness test received the following endorsement in 1980.

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, 14TH REPORT,
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON
(CMND.7844, 1980), PARAS 267, 270:

4-332

“267(1): ... evidence of voluntary intoxication should be capable of negating the mental element in murder and the intention required for the commission of any other offence; and

(2) in offences in which recklessness constitutes an element of the offence, if the defendant owing to voluntary intoxication had no appreciation of a risk which he would have appreciated had he been sober, such lack of appreciation is immaterial ...

270. The test in (2) above is formulated in such a way as to require the court to take into consideration any particular knowledge or any other personal characteristics of the defendant, as for example backwardness. Thus in a case where a gun is discharged killing or injuring another a jury might consider that many people could have made a mistake about the risk. But if the defendant was familiar with fire-arms the jury may find that he would have appreciated the risk if he had been sober. For similar reasons it would be unjust that a subnormal person should be judged on the same basis as one of average intelligence.”

4–333

Whilst the courts and reform bodies have endeavoured to distinguish specific and basic intent, those applying the law suggest that it has caused little difficulty in practice. The Law Commission has acknowledged the importance of this perspective but has stated that the lack of general agreement on the test “must inevitably lead to uncertainty, wasted court time and the unnecessary incurring of legal costs when a new offence is introduced, since, until the matter is decided by the courts, it will not be possible to ascertain into which category it falls”.⁷⁰² Its latest proposals, to be considered below, are based upon the belief that the distinction between offences of specific and basic intent is “ambiguous, misleading and confusing, and that it should be abandoned.”⁷⁰³

2. A partial “defence”?

4–334

Thus the compromise has developed so that intoxication is an answer to those crimes of intention where there is a lesser included offence for which the defendant can be convicted. As we have seen, one way of looking at this (although not the one argued for so convincingly by Simester) is that intoxication has the practical effect of reducing murder to manslaughter⁷⁰⁴ and of reducing s.18 to s.20. However, despite the obvious importance to the development of the law of the existence of a lesser offence, it is clear that intoxication can sometimes, at least in theory, lead to a complete acquittal under English law. As Lord Russell stated in Majewski:

“[S]pecial intent cases are not restricted to those crimes in which the absence of a special intent leaves available a lesser crime embodying no special intent, but embraces all cases of special intent even though no alternative lesser criminal charge is available.”⁷⁰⁵

The crime of theft is just such a case. Intoxication is an answer to a charge of theft, although there is no lesser included offence of which the defendant can be convicted. This sudden reassertion of principle is somewhat anomalous and, while there are dicta supporting this approach, it is unlikely that the courts actually will take this step and allow a complete defence in such circumstances.⁷⁰⁶

3. Drunken mistake

4-335

In most cases, a drunken defendant will claim that a mistake has been made with the result that mens rea is missing. For example, there will be a claim that there was no intention to kill; the drunken defendant thought he was shooting at a tree stump. Such a plea will be dealt with under the rules canvassed above. There is evidence that drink can cause persons to make mistakes of a somewhat different nature. One effect of alcohol can be to lead the drinker to interpret the words and actions of others as threatening, thereby increasing “defensive activity”.⁷⁰⁷ In other words, a drunken person may act violently, mistakenly believing himself to be under attack.⁷⁰⁸ What is the position where such a person makes a mistake as to a “defence”?

With regard to self-defence, it was held in *O’Grady*⁷⁰⁹ that a person who makes a drunken mistake in thinking that he is being attacked is not entitled to a defence.⁷¹⁰ This is confirmed by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(5): a defendant cannot “rely on any mistaken belief attributable to intoxication that was voluntarily induced”. The rationale behind this approach can be found in the judgment of Lord Lane CJ in O’Grady where he stated:

“This brings us to the question of public order. There are two competing interests. On the one hand the interest of the defendant who has only acted according to what he believed to be necessary to protect himself, and on the other hand that of the public in general and the victim in particular who, probably through no fault of his own, has been injured or perhaps killed because of the defendant’s drunken mistake. Reason recoils from the conclusion that in such circumstances a defendant is entitled to leave the Court without a stain on his character.”

It should be stressed that if defendants make reasonable mistakes as to the need for selfdefensive action, they will not automatically be denied the defence of self-defence simply because they happened to be intoxicated. Under s.76(5) the mistaken belief must be “attributable” to their intoxication. If the belief is only caused by (“attributable to”) the intoxication, it could never qualify as a reasonable belief.

This whole approach is, seemingly, at odds with the general rules on intoxication as a (partial) “defence”. It is difficult to see any material distinction in culpability between a defendant who makes a drunken mistake about the actus reus and one who makes a similar mistake concerning a defence element. As Dingwall comments on the common law cases:

“[A]n intoxicated individual who kills in mistaken self-defence is potentially in a worse position than an intoxicated individual who kills without this belief ... It should be noted that allowing a defendant to rely on intoxicated mistake does not mean that he also has a complete defence to manslaughter ... [T]here is no reason why he should not be convicted of manslaughter if he was grossly negligent in making the mistake.”⁷¹¹

4-336

The law has adopted a similar approach with regard to other mistakes. In Fotheringham,⁷¹² the defendant made a drunken mistake when having non-consensual intercourse with his 14-year-old baby-sitter; he thought she was his wife. It was held that such a drunken mistake was no defence. Presumably, the same approach will be adopted with other drunken mistakes: for example, in duress where the defendant, because of his intoxication, believes he has been subjected to threats of death or grievous bodily harm. For duress, there has to be a reasonable belief in the existence of the threats. If the defendant’s belief in such threats is because of his intoxication, it is unlikely to be a reasonable belief.

However, the law in this regard is riddled with inconsistencies. In Richardson and Irwin,⁷¹³ the defendants, who were students, dropped the victim from a balcony causing him to be seriously injured. The Court of Appeal held that their drunken mistake that the victim was consenting to this “horseplay” could be a defence to inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.20. Whether one adopts the general rule that intoxication is no answer to basic intent crimes (of which s.20 is undoubtedly one) or one adopts the rule in O’Grady that all drunken mistakes are irrelevant, the defendants ought to have been convicted. The authority of this decision must be in serious doubt.

Finally, there are certain statutes that expressly provide that a defendant has a defence if she holds a particular belief. For example, the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.5(2) provides that a person has a defence (or a “lawful excuse” as per s.1(1)) to a charge of criminal damage if she believed that she had the consent of the person entitled to give consent and s.5(3) provides that “it is immaterial whether a belief is justified or not if it is honestly held”. What is the position where a defendant only holds such a belief because of their drunkenness?

JAGGARD V DICKINSON [1981] Q.B.
527 (QUEENS BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

4-337

The appellant while drunk broke two windows and damaged a curtain in another person’s house. She honestly believed that the house belonged to a friend who would have consented to her breaking in and causing the damage.

MUSTILL J:

“Her defence is founded on the state of belief called for by section 5(2). True, the fact of the appellant’s intoxication was relevant to the defence under section 5(2), for it helped to explain what would otherwise have been inexplicable, and hence lent colour to her evidence about the state of her belief. This is not the same as using drunkenness to rebut an inference of intention or recklessness. Belief, like intention or recklessness, is a state of mind: but they are not the same states of mind.

Can it nevertheless be said that, even if the context is different, the principles established by R. v Majewski ... ought to be applied to this new situation? If the basis of the decision in R. v Majewski had been that drunkenness does not prevent a person from having an intent or being reckless, then there would be grounds for saying that it should equally be left out of account when deciding on his state of belief. But this is not in our view what R. v Majewski decided. The House of Lords did not conclude that intoxication was irrelevant to the fact of the defendant's state of mind, but rather that, whatever might have been his actual state of mind, he should for reasons of policy be precluded from relying on any alteration in that state brought about by self-induced intoxication ... But these considerations do not apply to a case where Parliament has specifically required the court to consider the defendant's actual state of belief, not the state of belief which ought to have existed. It seems to us that the court is required by section 5(3) to focus on the existence of the belief, not its intellectual soundness; and a belief can be just as much honestly held if it is induced by intoxication as if it stems from stupidity, forgetfulness or inattention ...

Parliament has specifically isolated one subjective element, in the shape of honest belief, and has given it separate treatment, and its own special gloss in section 5(3). This being so, there is nothing objectionable in giving it special treatment as regards drunkenness, in accordance with the natural meaning of the words.”

Appeal allowed

4-338

This whole approach does seem distinctly odd. Where a defendant causing criminal damage makes a drunken mistake, her entire criminal liability depends on the precise form of her mistake. For instance, if she makes a mistake and thinks the property is her own, she will be liable as drunkenness is no answer to a charge of criminal damage. If, however, because of her drunkenness she believes that the owner would consent to the damage to the property, then s.5(3) applies and, as in Jaggard v Dickinson, the defendant will escape liability.⁷¹⁴

It is interesting to compare s.5(3) with the Criminal Justice Act 1967 s.8. In Majewski, Lord Elwyn-

Jones held that drunkenness could not be taken into account under s.8:

“Its purpose and effect [section 8] was to alter the law of evidence about the presumption of intention to produce the reasonable and probable consequences of one’s acts. It was not intended to change the common law rule. In referring to ‘all the evidence’ it meant all the relevant evidence. But if there is a substantive rule of law that in crimes of basic intent, the factor of intoxication is irrelevant (and such I hold to be the substantive law), evidence with regard to it is quite irrelevant.”⁷¹⁵

It has been commented that it “is difficult to see that section 5(3) performs any different function in relation to lawful excuse than section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 performs in relation to intention and recklessness”.⁷¹⁶ If evidence of drunkenness is irrelevant to an ascertainment of intention or foresight, it is difficult to understand why it is relevant to determining whether one believes another has consented to the property being damaged.⁷¹⁷

F. INVOLUNTARY INTOXICATION

4-339

Where a defendant is reduced to a state of intoxication through no fault of his own (because, for example, his drinks were “laced”), he cannot be “blamed” for his actions and will accordingly have a defence to any criminal charge. However, this protection extends only to the defendant who is so intoxicated that he does not form mens rea.

R. v KINGSTON [1995] 2 A.C. 355 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-340

The appellant, his drink having been laced with drugs, indecently assaulted a 15-year-old boy. He was convicted after the judge directed the jury that they should acquit if they found that he was so affected by the drugs that he lacked intent, but to convict if he had intent. The defendant appealed, claiming that he would not have committed the offence but for the drugs. The Court of Appeal upheld his appeal on the basis that the “operative fault” was not his. The Crown appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD MUSTILL:

“[T]he general nature of the case is clear enough. In ordinary circumstances the respondent’s paedophilic tendencies would have been kept under control, even in the presence of the sleeping or unconscious boy on the bed. The ingestion of the drug (whatever it was) brought about a temporary change in the mentality or personality of the respondent which lowered his ability to resist temptation so far that his desires overrode his ability to control them. Thus we are concerned with a case of disinhibition ...

On these facts there are three grounds on which the respondent might be held free from criminal responsibility. First, that his immunity flows from general principles of the criminal law. Secondly, that this immunity is already established by a solid line of authority. Finally, that the court should, when faced with a new problem acknowledge the justice of the case and boldly create a new common law defence.

It is clear ... that the Court of Appeal adopted the first approach. The decision was explicitly founded on general principle ...:

‘the law recognises that, exceptionally, an accused person may be entitled to be acquitted if there is a possibility that although his act was intentional, the intent itself arose out of circumstances for which he bears no blame.’ ...

My Lords, with every respect I must suggest that no such principle exists or, until the present case, had ever in modern times been thought to exist. Every offence consists of a prohibited act or omission coupled with whatever state of mind is called for by the statute or rule of the common law which creates the offence. In those offences which are not absolute the state of mind which the prosecution must prove to have underlain the act or omission—the ‘mental element’—will in the majority of cases be such as to attract disapproval. The mental element will then be the mark of what may properly be called a 'guilty mind' ... [His Lordship then surveyed cases both here and in other jurisdictions and concluded that there was no basis] for holding that the defence relied upon is already established by the common law, any more than it can be derived from general principles. Accordingly I agree with the analysis of Professor Griew, Archbold News, May 28 1993, pp.4–5:

'What has happened is that the Court of Appeal has recognised a new defence to criminal charges in the nature of an exculpatory excuse. It is precisely because the defendant acted in a prohibited way with the intent (the mens rea) required by the definition of the offence that he needs this defence.' ...

To recognise a new defence of this type would be a bold step ... I can only say that the defence runs into difficulties at every turn. In point of theory, it would be necessary to reconcile a defence of irresistible impulse derived from a combination of innate drives and external disinhibition with the rule that irresistible impulse of a solely internal origin (not necessarily any more the fault of the offender) does not in itself excuse although it may be a symptom of disease of the mind ... Equally, the state of mind which founds the defence superficially resembles a state of diminished responsibility ... On the practical side there are serious problems ...

My Lords, the fact that a new doctrine may require adjustment of existing principles to accommodate it ... is not of course a ground for refusing to adopt it, if that is what the interests of justice require. Here, however, justice makes no such demands, for the interplay between the wrong done to the victim, the individual characteristics and frailties of the defendant, and the pharmacological effects of whatever drug may be potentially involved can be far better recognised by a tailored choice from the continuum of sentences available to the judge than by the application of a single yea-or-nay jury decision.

... I consider that both the ruling and the direction of the judge were correct."

Appeal allowed

Many commentators condemned the Court of Appeal decision in Kingston as surprising, dangerous and contrary to principle,⁷¹⁸ and favoured the narrower view of blame adopted by the House of Lords. However, others have argued that a new exculpatory defence should be developed for circumstances such as those in Kingston. Many persons might have secret urges to commit criminal acts, but blame is inappropriate if they exercise control and restraint. If the only reason their inhibitions are removed is because someone else has secretly laced their drink, they are no longer able to evaluate their actions⁷¹⁹ and should not be blamed. It has been suggested that such a defence, if it were to be afforded, should depend upon an assessment whether the conduct was “out of character”.⁷²⁰ This would involve comparing the defendant’s “settled” character with the defendant’s intoxicated character. If the involuntary intoxication “destabilises” his character so that he commits an offence he should have an excuse.⁷²¹ Such an approach, however, is perceived by others to be blaming persons for what they are rather than what they have done. Apart from difficulties of proof (for example, establishing whether or not Kingston had abused children on previous occasions), the fact is that the evidence established on this occasion that Kingston only gave way to his desires because of the unforeseen actions of a third party. The real blame should be directed at that third party. Where a person commits a crime because of threats by another, we blame that other person and allow the defendant a defence of duress. We do not enquire whether the actions were “out of character”. The same approach should be adopted to those whose inhibitions are removed by the secret acts of others.

Criminal liability should generally only be imposed upon blameworthy actors who cause prohibited harms. It was seen in Ch.2 that mens rea is increasingly being given a normative meaning, equating it with blameworthiness or culpability—rather than bearing its cognitive meaning as involving intention or foresight. Following this, it is appropriate to blame actors who voluntarily become intoxicated—even though they might lack cognitive mens rea. On this basis, however, we ought not to blame people such as Kingston. As the Court of Appeal put it, “the law should exculpate him because the operative fault is not his”.⁷²² Judicial developments to date, however, suggest that while courts are prepared to expand the concept of mens rea to inculcate blameworthy actors, they are unwilling to restrict mens rea to exclude non-blameworthy actors such as Kingston. Accordingly, an alternative might be to reflect the lack of fault on the part of an actor like Kingston through the creation of a new defence. Lacey, for example, has argued for the creation of a new defence of “blocked evaluation” which, rather than operating on the basis of lapse of character, could be thought of in “terms of temporary lapses of normal conditions of agency, given that the lapse is of the kind which removes or seriously undermines the normal reasoning process.”⁷²³ Such a defence might not only be available to those defendants (with mens rea) pleading involuntary intoxication.⁷²⁴ The House of Lords, has, however, rejected any such approach and, clinging to orthodoxy, proclaimed that Kingston must be liable as he acted with mens rea and no established defence was applicable. It must be seriously doubted whether this severing of the link between moral fault and blame can be justified.

4-342

Despite these concerns, the Law Commission has endorsed the rule in Kingston, agreeing with their Lordships’ reasoning and approach.⁷²⁵ It believes that the common law position should be retained and “that there should be no defence of reduced inhibitions or blurred perception of morality where D’s condition was caused by involuntary intoxication”.⁷²⁶

In relation to involuntary intoxication more generally, the Law Commission’s proposals also restate the common law but do provide a non-exhaustive list of situations which would count as involuntary intoxication, such as where intoxication results from the administration of an intoxicant under duress, or where intoxication results from taking an intoxicant for a proper medical purpose.⁷²⁷

G. “DUTCH COURAGE” INTOXICATION

4-343

Where persons deliberately reduce themselves to a state of intoxication to give themselves “Dutch courage” to commit a crime, their intoxication will not be a defence even to crimes that can only be committed with a specific intention. They are to be “blamed” to the same extent as the person who intentionally commits a crime. As Lord Denning stated in Gallagher:

“If a man, whilst sane and sober, forms an intention to kill ... and then gets himself drunk so as to give himself Dutch courage to do the killing ... he cannot rely on his self-induced drunkenness as a defence to a charge of murder, nor even as reducing it to manslaughter ... the wickedness of his mind before he got drunk is enough to condemn him, coupled with the act which he intended to do and did do.”⁷²⁸

LAW COMMISSION, LEGISLATING THE CRIMINAL CODE, INTOXICATION AND
CRIMINAL LIABILITY (LAW COM.
NO.229) (1995), PARAS 6.51–6.52:

4-344

“[T]he situation is far-fetched in the extreme ... Lord Denning was concerned with the defendant who becomes intoxicated in order to give himself courage to carry out his intention—not in the hope that he will lose all control of his actions but will nevertheless somehow happen to do the very thing that he lacks the courage to do while conscious. If his purpose is to give himself ‘Dutch courage’ rather than to turn himself into an automaton, we do not think it right that he should be regarded, at the time when he causes the consequence he desires, as intending that consequence. He cannot fairly be deemed to have had, at that later time, the intention that he in fact had when he became intoxicated ... We have considered whether to propose a special rule for the case of the person who becomes intoxicated in order to turn himself into an automaton, hoping that while in that state he will commit the actus reus of an offence requiring intention; but we have concluded that such a rule would be of no practical value ... [I]t is almost inconceivable that the case envisaged could ever arise; certainly we are unaware of any such case.”

H. INTOXICATION CAN CAUSE INSANITY OR DIMINISHED RESPONSIBILITY

4–345

Drunkenness can cause a disease of the mind sufficient to bring the defendant within the insanity rules.⁷²⁹ It can cause, for example, a delirium tremens. However, the defence is rarely successful in England. In Burns,⁷³⁰ a psychiatrist testified that Burns had a disease of the mind because his brain was damaged by alcohol with the result that on the occasion of the alleged crime he was suffering from “amnesia in the sense that the thing does not register at the time because the brain function is impaired” which meant that Burns did not know what he was doing, or that it was wrong. It was accepted that this defence could result in an insanity verdict, but the jury rejected the psychiatric evidence and concluded that Burns knew what he was doing.

Although the new greater flexibility in sentencing options upon a finding of “not guilty by reason of insanity” has led to an increase in the number of such verdicts, it is not clear whether this has led to insanity caused by drunkenness to be pleaded more frequently.⁷³¹ In Bromley,⁷³² the defendant suffered from brain damage which could motivate him into violence upon consuming a small quantity of alcohol. On a charge of attempted rape, it was held that the drink had made him temporarily insane. Pursuant to the court’s powers⁷³³ he was given an absolute discharge.

Can alcoholism amount to a disease of the mind for the purposes of the insanity defence? This issue is problematic because the medical and sociological literature is still divided as to whether alcoholism is a disease or learned behaviour.

JULIA TOLMIE, “ALCOHOLISM AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY” (2001) 64
M.L.R. 688, PP.689–708:

“[These] two competing conceptualisations of the phenomenon ... can be labelled the ‘disease model’ and the ‘habit model’ ...

[T]he disease model views alcoholism as an abnormal mental condition, whereas the habit model views alcoholics as involved in normal human processes but making bad choices ... [S]ome disease models of alcoholism view the condition as involving a total loss of control over drinking, whereas some disease models and all habit models view an alcoholic’s control over their drinking as impaired rather than totally lost ... The model of criminal responsibility that purportedly underpins the criminal justice system is premised on the notion that people have free will and rationality ... Intoxication can impair one’s capacity for choice on a number of ... levels. However, even if it has, as a matter of public policy the defendant is often not exonerated in spite of that impairment. It is considered that their choice to get dangerously intoxicated in the first place is sufficiently morally culpable to supply criminal responsibility in spite of their lack of choice at the time of the crime. The condition of alcoholism is interesting because it challenges this assumption. Unlike other people who choose to get drunk, alcoholics belong to a category of people who have impaired choice around even the decision to get intoxicated.

How the defendant’s alcoholism should shift the normal calculation of criminal liability based on their intoxication differs depending on the model of alcoholism that one adopts. For example, if one views alcoholism as a habit that has impaired the defendant’s choices to drink but still left them with choice, it is extremely difficult to argue that there should be reduced criminal liability based on the condition. On the other hand if one views alcoholism as an abnormal mental condition which either totally deprives the defendant of the choice to drink, or leaves them with both an impaired choice and disordered thinking around what degree of choice they do have, then there is a strong argument for taking into account the alcoholic’s intoxication when considering their criminal liability ...

If a history of alcoholism produces an independent and recognised pathological condition then it is uncontroversial that this can form the foundation of an insanity defence. Thus delirium tremens and alcohol withdrawal psychosis can be the basis of a successful insanity defence. What is not so clear is whether alcoholism per se, along with states of intoxication which result from it, can form the basis of the insanity defence ...

Once again the strongest argument for alcoholism forming the foundation of the insanity defence applies if the disease model of alcoholism is adopted ... On the other hand, if the habit model of alcoholism is adopted then there is little argument for alcoholism forming the foundation of an insanity defence ...

So from a policy point of view it appears to make the most sense to treat an alcoholic defendant within the auspices of the criminal justice system, releasing them if treatment is successful and they are likely to be reintegrated as a contributing and functional member of the community, but requiring them to serve out the standard sentence for their crime if they are not treatable at that point in time. There are two ways of achieving this result.

The first is to deal with the alcoholic's condition at the point of trial and impose treatment in the place of punishment as a matter of liability rather than sentence. Insanity is a defence that effectively achieves this result ... The second way of dealing with the issue is to hold an alcoholic fully responsible for the crimes that they have committed and then deal with their condition as a sentencing issue."

4-347

Although the matter is unresolved in English law, the better approach would be to follow the lead provided in the US⁷³⁴ and regard alcoholism as capable of amounting to a disease of the mind—bearing in mind that a defence of insanity will not succeed in such cases unless the other rigorous requirements of the M’Naghten Rules have been satisfied.

Can intoxication give rise to a defence of diminished responsibility? In Tandy,⁷³⁵ it was indicated that alcoholism could bring a defendant within the scope of the Homicide Act 1957 s.2: (i) “if the alcoholism had reached the level at which her brain had been injured by the repeated insult from intoxicants so that there was gross impairment of her judgment and emotional responses”⁷³⁶; and (ii) if “the appellant’s drinking had become involuntary, that is to say she was no longer able to resist the impulse to drink”. It has been argued that the court:

“effectively required a defendant who wants to base a defence of diminished responsibility on their alcoholism to demonstrate a total impairment of control at all times around alcohol. What this means is that the court was setting a requirement that even the most chronic alcoholic will find difficult to meet.”⁷³⁷

The decision appeared to be inconsistent with s.2 which then required only a substantial, and not total, impairment of mental responsibility.⁷³⁸

It is clear that the transient effect of drink or drugs, even if the intoxication is acute, is insufficient.⁷³⁹ However, more problematic is the situation where the defendant pleads mental abnormality but is also heavily intoxicated at the time of the offence.

R. v DIETSCHMANN [2003] 1 A.C. 1209 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

4-348

The defendant was suffering from a mental abnormality (an adjustment disorder which was a depressed grief reaction to a bereavement) but was also heavily intoxicated at the time of the killing.

LORD HUTTON:

“The policy of the criminal law in respect of persons suffering from mental abnormality is to be found in the words of section 2 ... [A] brain-damaged person who is intoxicated and who commits a killing is not in the same position as a person who is intoxicated, but not brain-damaged, and who commits a killing ... I consider that the jury should be directed along the following lines:

‘Assuming that the defence have established that the defendant was suffering from mental abnormality as described in section 2, the important question is: did that abnormality substantially impair his mental responsibility for his acts in doing the killing? You know that before he carried out the killing the defendant had had a lot to drink. Drink cannot be taken into account as something which contributed to his mental abnormality and to any impairment of mental responsibility arising from that abnormality. But you may take the view that both the defendant's mental abnormality and drink played a part in impairing his mental responsibility for the killing and that he might not have killed if he had not taken drink. If you take that view, then the question for you to decide is this: has the defendant satisfied you that, despite the drink, his mental abnormality substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his fatal acts, or has he failed to satisfy you of that? If he has satisfied you of that, you will find him not guilty of murder but you may find him guilty of manslaughter.”⁷⁴⁰

4-349

While this is clearly in line with other policy decisions in relation to intoxication, this is not an easy exercise for the jury. The fact that the defendant is intoxicated is not to be taken into account. The jury must focus on the pre-existing abnormality of mind and assess whether that abnormality substantially impaired his mental responsibility. But, given the fact that the drink may also have “played a part in impairing his mental responsibility”,⁷⁴¹ it is surely far-fetched to expect a jury to be able to discriminate between the two causes of impairment. The short answer is that juries will continue to do what they normally do when dealing with diminished responsibility in the minority of cases where there is not a guilty plea and simply accept the views of the medical experts.⁷⁴² The practical importance of this decision is that it confirms that drunken defendants with mental abnormalities are not barred from pleading diminished responsibility.

I. REFORM OF THE LAW

4-350

As will be clear from the above discussion, the law on intoxication has long been considered to be in need of reform.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.847-848:

“His fault in rendering himself non-responsible at the time of the violent act is constant, whether he commits a burglary, a rape, or a murder. To bring the scope of his liability into line with his culpability in getting drunk, the law seeks a compromise. There has to be some accommodation between (1) the principle that if someone gets drunk, he is liable for the violent consequences, and (2) the principle that liability and punishment should be graded in proportion to actual culpability.

German law and American law reveal two different approaches to reconciling these conflicting principles. German law includes intoxication along with mental illness as a basis for denying the capacity to be held accountable for a wrongful act. Deference to the conflicting principle of liability for the risk implicit in getting drunk is found in a special section of the Code, which is here translated in full:

(1) Whoever intentionally or negligently becomes intoxicated through the use of alcohol or other intoxicating substances is punishable up to five years in prison, if while in that intoxicated condition he commits a wrongful act and if by virtue of the intoxication is not responsible for that act (or his non-responsibility is a possibility).

(2) In no event may the punishment be greater than that for the wrongful act committed in the state of intoxication.

The concept of negligence underlying this provision is negligence as to the risk of committing a crime while intoxicated. If the suspect takes adequate precautions against committing a crime while intoxicated, there is no negligence. If, for example, he hires someone to supervise his conduct while he is intoxicated and the hired person unexpectedly fails to restrain him, there would be a good case against liability. If he gets drunk in a bar and while in a state of non-responsibility he throws a bottle at a valuable mirror, he is not punished for the wrongful act of intentionally destroying the property of another; rather he is punished for the wrongful act of creating a risk that he would behave non-responsibly and intentionally destroy property ...

[T]he theory of the provision is not simply that he negligently take the risk that he might do some harm. The requirement of a wrongful act while intoxicated is an important limitation.

Indeed the limitation suggests that the theory underlying the provision is not simply one of negligently endangering other persons. If risk-taking were the essence of the crime, there would be no concern about the wrongfulness of the intoxicated act and indeed it would be hard to explain why the subsequent act should be required at all.”

4-352

Over the past few decades, English law reform bodies have vacillated between proposals to modify Majewski and the more radical proposal of abolishing Majewski and replacing it with a separate offence.

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, 14TH REPORT,
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON
(CMND.7844, 1980), PARAS 259-264:

4-353

“259. ... What calls for punishment is getting intoxicated and when in that condition behaving in a way which society cannot, and should not, tolerate. An offence which covers this situation must make some reference to the harm caused, and cannot be expressed simply in terms of getting dangerously intoxicated, however gross the intoxication may have been. Furthermore, the harm needs to be identified to some extent: the drunken man who on arrest punches a police officer should not be labelled with the same offence as the alcoholic who kills a child when trying to interfere with her sexually. It is doubtful whether any solution to the problem based solely upon legal principle would be generally acceptable. Policy has to be taken into account ...

260. The Butler Committee considered offences committed while voluntarily intoxicated ... and they proposed the creation of a strict liability offence where a person while voluntarily intoxicated does an act (or makes an omission) that would amount to a dangerous offence if it were done or made with the requisite state of mind for that offence. Their proposal is that the offence should not be charged in the first instance. On indictment the jury would be directed to find on this offence in the event of intoxication being successfully raised as a defence to the offence originally charged ... On this proposal the jury would have no option but to convict of the dangerous intoxication offence. On conviction of the offence on indictment the maximum penalty suggested is one year's imprisonment for a first offence or three years' imprisonment for a second or subsequent one; on summary trial the maximum sentence of imprisonment would be six months.

261. One of the defects in the Butler Committee proposal is, in our opinion, the problem of the nomenclature of the offence. A conviction of the Butler Committee offence would merely record a conviction of an offence of committing a dangerous act while intoxicated. This is insufficient. The record must indicate the nature of the act committed, for example whether it was an assault or a killing. It would be unfair for a defendant who has committed a relatively minor offence while voluntarily intoxicated to be labelled as having committed the same offence as a defendant who has killed. The penalty suggested is also in our opinion insufficient to deal with serious offences such as killings or rapes while voluntarily intoxicated by drink or drugs.

262. Professors Smith and Glanville Williams support the proposal of a separate offence because in the first place they consider it to be a fundamental principle that a person should not be convicted of an offence requiring recklessness when he was not in fact reckless. In such a case the verdict of the jury and the record of the court do not represent the truth. Secondly, they think it important that the verdict of the jury should distinguish between an offender who was reckless and one who was not because that is relevant to the question of sentence ...

The majority of us feel, however, that [the Smith and Williams' proposal for a special offence carrying the same punishment as the complete offence] would also create problems. The separate offence would add to the already considerable number of matters which a jury often has to consider when deciding whether the offences charged have been proved, and some of us feel that the separate offence would make the jury's task even more difficult than it is at present in some cases ... It seems likely moreover, that if the separate offence is created there would be many more trials in which defendants would raise the issue of drunkenness ... [M]any defendants might seek to plead to the special offence rather than the offence charged, either because they might prefer to be convicted of the special offence rather than the offence charged (as for example rape), or because the special offence might tend to be regarded as a less serious offence ... We also consider that it is artificial and undesirable to have a separate offence for which conviction is automatic but which carries the same maximum penalty as the offence for which a defendant would have been convicted but for the lack of proof of the required mental element due to intoxication. It is also important to consider the public reaction to the creation of a separate offence: we are of the opinion that they would be confused by it.”⁷⁴³

4-354

The majority of the Criminal Law Revision Committee accordingly rejected the proposal for a special intoxication offence and instead recommended a codification of the law, endorsing the “recklessness test” discussed above, namely, that intoxication should never be a defence to crimes that can be committed recklessly; it could at most negate the mental element of intention required for the commission of an offence. This proposal was reproduced by the Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 cl.22⁷⁴⁴ and in the Law Commission’s proposals in 1995.

LAW COMMISSION, LEGISLATING THE CRIMINAL CODE, INTOXICATION AND
CRIMINAL LIABILITY (LAW COM.
NO.229) (1995), PARAS 6.6–6.7:

4-355

“6.6 We ... have concluded that the best way of codifying the present law, whilst avoiding the problems inherent in the present distinction between offences of specific and basic intent, is to confine the Majewski principle, broadly speaking, to offences for which proof of recklessness (or awareness of risk) is sufficient ...

6.7 This policy may represent the present law, although it is difficult to state this with any certainty ... [I]t has the advantages of simplicity and clarity, both matters of great importance in any system of criminal law. Finally, this change in the law will have a negligible practical effect in relation to crimes already judicially categorised as being of basic or specific intent, since most crimes designated as being of basic intent are capable of reckless commission.”

This recommendation (which was substantially adopted in the subsequent Government proposals⁷⁴⁵) has been criticised.

JEREMY HORDER, “SOBERING UP?
THE LAW COMMISSION ON CRIMINAL
INTOXICATION” [1995] 58 M.L.R. 534, 535–536:

“Despite the radical change of direction since the Consultation Paper, one thing has not changed in the Commission’s final Report. This is, ironically, the attitude of uncomprehending hostility towards the common law’s attempt to express, in its division of crimes between those of basic and of specific intent, the very distinctions between offences on which the Commission’s new proposals are broadly based. Despite the views of those working in the criminal justice system that the current law works fairly, as well as without difficulty, the Commission makes little effort to discern any deeper principles underlying the common law that might explain why its rules can be regarded as fair. They endorse the view that ‘the designation of crimes as requiring, or not requiring, specific intent is based on no principle at all’ (3.27; 5.36). How is it, then, that the Commission has thought it right to track the designation so closely in its own proposals? For the kinds of mentes reae mentioned in clause 1(2), allegations of which may be met by leading evidence of voluntary intoxication, bear a striking resemblance to the mentes reae of crimes of specific intent, allegations of which can presently be rebutted by such evidence at common law.

The answer is that the Commission regards the case for restricting the ability of a defendant to deny mens rea through pleading voluntary intoxication as founded on pure and simple policy considerations. They side with J. C. Smith in taking the view that ‘the real reason for punishing [the defendant, by applying Majewski] is the outrage that would quite reasonably be felt if serious injury caused to an innocent person by a drunk were to go unpunished’ (5.23). In a sense, thus, the Commission’s proposals are purely defensive. The main bulk of the provisions are designed to fend off public criticism rather than to provide a principled basis on which the law can operate. If this is true (as it seems to be), then to allow evidence of voluntary intoxication to negative mens rea in any crime, particularly a serious crime of violence, looks perverse ... By allowing a concern for policy to dominate its -thinking, the Commission simply clears the way for a Government obsessed with ‘crime control’ to take that concern to its logical conclusion, which is that the Commission’s proposals should be ignored and voluntary intoxication should make no impact whatsoever on criminal liability. Yet this is the very conclusion the Commission and its consultees thought most undesirable.”⁷⁴⁶

4–358

Almost 15 years later, the author of this extract, Jeremy Horder, as Law Commissioner, was in a position to try to identify the principles underlying the common law and to base new proposals upon them. The Law Commission now accepts that its earlier proposals might have been too complex⁷⁴⁷ and has “returned to the subject with a stripped down approach”.⁷⁴⁸ As noted earlier, it believes that the rationale of the law is and ought to be that the subjective recklessness involved in becoming intoxicated (and thus more dangerous to society) is the moral equivalent of the subjective recklessness usually required for liability. It takes the view now that the concepts of specific and basic intent are “ambiguous, confusing and misleading” and proposes to abandon them.⁷⁴⁹ However, the substance of the distinction is retained.

LAW COMMISSION, INTOXICATION AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY (LAW
COM. NO.314) (CMND.7526, 2009),
PARAS 3.35–3.48:

4–359

“Recommendation 1: the Majewski rule

3.35 There should be a general rule that:

(1) if D is charged with having committed an offence as a perpetrator;

(2) the fault element of the offence is not an integral fault element (for example, because it merely requires proof of recklessness); and

(3) D was voluntarily intoxicated at the material time;

then, in determining whether or not D is liable for the offence, D should be treated as having been aware of anything which D would have been aware of but for the intoxication.

3.36 The approach we recommend would apply regardless of the degree to which D was intoxicated and regardless of whether D's state of intoxication was caused by alcohol or some other drug or substance (such as a solvent) or any combination of intoxicants.

3.37 We include recklessness within the scope of this general rule as an 'example', but the practical effect of the rule ... would be to limit the application of the rule to allegations of recklessness ...

3.38 If the allegation is one of subjective recklessness, D would be treated as having been aware of any risk or circumstance D would have been aware of but for his or her self-induced state of intoxication ...

Recommendation 2: the rule for integral fault elements

3.42 If the subjective fault element in the definition of the offence, as alleged, is one to which the justification for the Majewski rule does not apply, then the prosecution should have to prove that D acted with that relevant state of mind.

3.43 ... For such fault elements, evidence of D's voluntary intoxication should be taken into consideration by the court when determining whether the prosecution has proved that D acted (or failed to act) with the required state of mind. We list the integral fault elements below under our next recommendation.

3.44 Importantly, it would be the particular state of mind alleged by the prosecution, not the offence itself, which would determine whether the general rule applies. Our recommendation would abandon the courts' unhelpful categorisation which distinguishes between offences of 'specific intent' and offence of 'basic intent' ...

3.45 If recklessness is alleged then, as explained above, the general rule would apply. But if the prosecution alleges that D acted with an integral fault element, it would be necessary to prove that D had that required state of mind at the relevant time; and the jury would be directed that D's intoxication should be taken into account in determining whether the allegation has been proved.

Recommendation 3: the integral fault elements

3.46 The following subjective fault elements should be excluded from the application of the general rule and should, therefore, always be proved:

- (1) intention as to a consequence [but not intention as to conduct];
- (2) knowledge as to something;
- (3) belief as to something (where the belief is equivalent to knowledge as to something);
- (4) fraud; and
- (5) dishonesty.

3.47 Two other states of mind we recommend for inclusion ... [relate to specific recommendations for those who assist or encourage crime].

3.48 The list of integral fault elements we recommend would be exhaustive.”

4-360

The term “integral fault element” is not perhaps the most felicitous of expressions but otherwise the recommendations bring greater clarity to the underlying rationale of intoxication (very much like the analysis adopted by Simester discussed earlier) and to the law. The Government rejected these proposals.⁷⁵⁰

IX. Lack of Age

A. INTRODUCTION

4-361

Crime (particularly less serious forms of crime) is predominantly a youthful phenomenon. Both official statistics and self-report studies confirm that the peak age of offending is in mid-teens and that most such offenders (particularly females) will “grow out of crime”.⁷⁵¹ The response of the criminal justice system to crime by children has fluctuated sharply and has been fundamentally affected by political considerations. The pendulum has swung between a punitive approach (which holds a child responsible as if an adult) and one based upon considerations of welfare. As part of an ever-changing uneasy balance between the two, the law does take some account of the different stages of childhood. Of course, in reality, the process of maturation is a gradual one.⁷⁵² The criminal law is rather less subtle than this: it recognises that very young children should not be held responsible for their actions and so there is a fixed age limit below which they will be excused liability.

The age of criminal responsibility is currently set at ten.⁷⁵³ This is considerably lower than many other European countries, where the average age at which responsibility is imposed is 14 years old.⁷⁵⁴ There was also a transitional phase between the ages of ten and 14, during which time the child used to be presumed to be “doli incapax”. Only if the prosecution could rebut the presumption by proof that the child knew what she was doing was seriously or gravely wrong and not merely naughty or mischievous could the child be held criminally responsible for her actions.⁷⁵⁵ Although entirely sound in relation to the underlying principles of the criminal law, the presumption increasingly came under fire as illogical, lacking in common-sense, out-dated, a serious disservice to the law and unnecessary.⁷⁵⁶ In C v DPP, the House of Lords urged that the presumption be subject to “parliamentary investigation, deliberation and legislation”.⁷⁵⁷ With less deliberation than was warranted by the significance of the reform, the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.34 was passed. This states that “[t]he rebuttable presumption of criminal law that a child aged ten or over is incapable of committing an offence is hereby abolished”. On a strict reading, this section abolished the presumption only and it was thus argued that it was still open to a child between the ages of ten and 14 to show that she did not understand that what she had done was seriously wrong.⁷⁵⁸ In CPS v P, Smith LJ expressed the view (obiter) that the defence remained in existence but also flagged up the issue for another court to consider fully.⁷⁵⁹ The House of Lords has now done so in R. v JTB.⁷⁶⁰ Whilst their Lordships acknowledged the ambiguity of the provision, it has ruled that s.34 abolished both the presumption and the defence of doli incapax entirely for children aged ten and over. It is regrettable that such an important change in the law's approach to the criminal responsibility of children should have been achieved in such an ambiguous manner.

4–362

This reform was a very significant part of a policy which over the last 20 years or so has sought to make children—even very young children—increasingly liable for their actions.⁷⁶¹ Despite the fact that only a small number of very young children are brought before the courts⁷⁶² and that the 1980s saw considerable success in diverting children away from custody and from the courts by use of formal cautioning etc,⁷⁶³ the perception has grown that children are out of control. Concerns about the use of multiple cautions⁷⁶⁴ and the perceived growth in both the prevalence and gravity of young children's crime, fed, in part, by the highly-publicised killing of James Bulger by two ten-year-olds⁷⁶⁵ have led to a flurry of punitive initiatives. “In the space of only five years the young person in the arms of the criminal law has been largely reconstructed within the ‘little adult’ imagery of the Victorian era”.⁷⁶⁶ The measures adopted have led to intense criticism both domestically and internationally.⁷⁶⁷ In particular, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has recommended that the UK “Raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility in accordance with International standards”, as one of a number of recommended measures to bring its juvenile justice system into line with standards required by the Convention on the Rights of the Child.⁷⁶⁸

B. BELOW THE AGE OF TEN

4–363

Children below this age are irrebuttably presumed to be incapable of committing crime. Care proceedings may be brought if it is thought that the child “is suffering or is likely to suffer significant harm and that the care given to him is not what it would be reasonable to expect a parent to give, or the child is beyond parental control”.⁷⁶⁹ These proceedings are entirely civil and decisions are based upon the welfare of the child.⁷⁷⁰ However, over the last decade an increasing number of other measures have been introduced with the aim of controlling the antisocial behaviour of children under the age of ten (and their parents).⁷⁷¹ Although these measures are said to be to “protect young children from being drawn into crime” and to “help them change their bad behaviour”⁷⁷² there can be little doubt that they are experienced as punishment, and are part of a deeply unsatisfactory trend which could render the concept of the age of criminal responsibility meaningless.

C. ABOVE THE AGE OF TEN

4–364

