Between the ages of ten and 13, offenders are categorised as children, and between 14 and 17 years old as young persons.⁷⁷³ The sentencing options available to the youth court⁷⁷⁴ depend upon this categorisation. A further, transitional category, referred to in the preceding White Paper⁷⁷⁵ as “near adults” has been included in the young person category. The courts are given additional sentencing powers for 16–17 year olds whose maturity warrants such treatment. Courts must “have regard to the welfare of the child or young person”⁷⁷⁶ but as this is not the only consideration, the court may find persuasive, for example, the need to protect the public.

X. Sundry Defences

4–365

In addition to the general defences discussed in this chapter, there are numerous other defences which are beyond the scope of this book. Such defences are more specific: it is, for example, a defence to a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm to show reasonable excuse or lawful authority.⁷⁷⁷ Likewise, it is a defence to the offence of failing to provide a specimen of breath or blood or urine (for the purposes of the offence of driving or being in charge of a vehicle with a blood/alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit) to show a reasonable excuse.⁷⁷⁸

Another example of a specific defence is that a police officer may use such force as is reasonable in effecting a lawful arrest.⁷⁷⁹

-
- 1 W. Wilson, "How Criminal Defences Work" in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (London: Routledge 2014).
 - 2 e.g. Singapore and Malaysia: see K. L. Koh, C. M. V. Clarkson and N. A. Morgan, Criminal Law in Singapore and Malaysia: Text and materials (Singapore: Malayan Law Journal 1989), p.103.
 - 3 Bratty v Att-Gen of Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386.
 - 4 Homicide Act 1957 s.2(2).
 - 5 Woolmington v DPP [1935] A.C. 462; see D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.31.
 - 6 J. Horder, Excusing Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2004), p.2.
 - 7 But see W. Wilson, "The Structure of Defences" [2005] Crim. L.R. 108, where he argues that the best way of improving the doctrinal stability, coherence and consistency of defences is to focus upon a common template for the structure of defences rather than searching for an underlying unifying rationale for them.
 - 8 The distinction was important before 1828 as, under the common law, a killer's goods were forfeited if the killing was excusable but not if it was justifiable. In 1828 forfeiture was abolished. See further, J. C. Smith, Justification and Excuse in the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1989), p.7. The revived interest in the distinction can largely be traced back to the publication in 1978 of G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978).
 - 9 R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2007).
 - 10 See, e.g. Robert Walker LJ in Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Operation) [2000] 4 All E.R. 961 at 1064.
 - 11 See further, C. M. V. Clarkson, "Necessary Action: A New Defence" [2004] Crim. L.R. 81 and contra W. M. Chan and A. P. Simester, "Duress, Necessity: How Many Defences?" (2005) 16 K.C.L.J. 121. Some commentators have found the classification so flawed that they have almost entirely abandoned it: see A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan's Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn, (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), pp.687–692.
 - 12 J. Gardner, "Justifications and Reasons" in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.122. See further, A. Simester, "On Justifications and Excuses" in L. Zedner and J. Roberts (eds), Principles and Values in the Criminal Law and Criminal Justice: Essays in Honour of Andrew Ashworth (Oxford: OUP, 2012).
 - 13 G. Williams, "The Theory of Excuses" [1982] Crim. L.R. 732, 735.
 - 14 J. Gardner, "Justifications and Reasons" in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.111.
 - 15 V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.265. Excuses, on the other hand, operate where the defendant has not acted for good reason. Tadros agrees with Gardner that the defendant must have not just been aware of the good reasons for acting but also must have been motivated by them in order for the reasons that the - criminal prohibition should not be breached to be counterbalanced (pp.273–280).

- 16 V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.280–290.
 - 17 R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2007), p.276. Warrants are “close relatives” of justifications (p.266).
 - 18 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.858.
 - 19 G. Williams, “The Theory of Excuses” [1982] Crim. L.R. 732, 739.
 - 20 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code s.3.02; N.Y. Penal Law s.35.05.
 - 21 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] A.C. 417.
 - 22 Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 cl.44(1) (Law Com. No.177).
 - 23 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Proposed Official Draft (1962) s.308(1)(a). That this is a “superior interest” has become deeply contested. (Tyrer v United Kingdom (1978) Eur.Ct. Series A. Vol.26; Campbell and Cosans v United Kingdom (1980) 3 E.H.R.R. 531).
 - 24 R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2007), p.287.
 - 25 V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.293.
 - 26 See H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 1968).
 - 27 See, e.g. N. Lacey, “Partial Defences to Homicide” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking Homicide Law (New York: OUP, 2000), pp.115–117; G. Mousourakis, Criminal Responsibility and Partial Excuses (Aldershot: Ashgate, 1998), pp.48–58.
 - 28 J. Horder, Excusing Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2004), p.108 acknowledges that no theory is free from difficulty but defends capacity theory as the most important (pp.123–137). He comments that the courts have veered between 2 capacity theories—subjective and objective versions (p.131). His preference is for an objective version of the capacity theory.
 - 29 Gardner further argues (pp.580–587) that one cannot distinguish the capacity to act, say with the character trait of courage, from acting courageously. One either acts courageously or not; there is no underlying capacity to act courageously that does or does not kick into operation. This view has been challenged by V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.294–297.
 - 30 See also R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2007) (who favours a capacity based account of responsibility), where he argues that a person “offering an excuse does not claim that her action was itself reasonable; she admits that it was unreasonable: but she claims this was a reasonable unreasonableness ... even a reasonable person ... might have acted in that unreasonable way in that situation” (p.289).
 - 31 See further, J. Gardner, “The Mark of Responsibility” (2003) 23 O.J.L.S. 157, 161 where he argues that responsibility in “the basic sense is none other than an ability to offer justifications and excuses ... It is exactly what it sounds like: response-ability, an ability to respond”.
 - 32 J. Gardner, “The Gist of Excuses” (1998) 1 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 575, 590. This idea that there is a normative priority to defences has been criticised but has also been answered by J. Gardner in “Reply to Critics” in Offences and Defences: Selected Essays in the Philosophy of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2007), pp.269–276. See also, J. Gardner, “The Logic of Excuses and the Rationality of - Emotions” (2009) 43 Value and Inquiry 313 and C. Bennett, “Excuses, Justifications and the Normativity of Expressive Behaviour” (2012) 32 O.J.L.S. 563.

- 33 V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.293. This is a revision of the views Tadros expressed in “The Characters of Excuse” (2001) 21 O.J.L.S. 495 due to the fact that Tadros now characterises the defendant who acts under a reasonable mistake as justified. This leaves very little scope for the category of excuses as developed by Gardner.
- 34 G. R. Sullivan, “Making Excuses” in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996).
- 35 Horder has since argued in favour of “a greatly enhanced role” for partial excuses; J. Horder, Excusing Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2004), pp.102, 139–190.
- 36 S. H. Kadish, “Excusing Crime” (1987) 75 Cal. L. Rev. 257.
- 37 Law Commission, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide, Law Com. No.304 (2006), para.6.21.
- 38 Some commentators have focused upon the particular problem of “involuntary” intoxication where the defendant still has mens rea, to construct a variety of arguments concerning the role of defences. While such defendants would currently be found guilty, Sullivan has argued that a defence of blamelessness ought to be available, conjoining a lapse from previous good character with circumstances of destabilisation: G. R. Sullivan, “Making Excuses” in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.131. See further, V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.297–302; and A. P. Simester, “Intoxication is Never a Defence” [2009] Crim. L.R. 3 where the author argues that intoxication should be conceived of as a completely different doctrine that imposes constructive liability upon offenders.
- 39 R. v Martin (Colin) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 343 at 346.
- 40 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Tent. Draft No.8 (1958), Comments to art.3 pp.8–9.
- 41 Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 paras 6.7–6.8.
- 42 J. Gardner, “The Gist of Excuses” (1998) 1 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 575, 589. See also R. A. Duff, Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2007), pp.284–292.
- 43 Below, para.4–261.
- 44 N. Lacey, “Partial Defences to Homicide” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking Homicide Law (New York: OUP, 2000), pp.119–120.
- 45 J. Gardner, “The Gist of Excuses” (1998) 1 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 575, 591. This view is challenged by J. Horder, Excusing Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2004), pp.153 onwards.
- 46 See also K. J. M. Smith and W. Wilson, “Impaired Voluntariness and Criminal Responsibility: Reworking Hart’s Theory of Excuses—the English Judicial Response” (1993) 13 O.J.L.S. 69, 70–74; J. Child and A. Reed, “Automatism is never a defence” (2014) 65 (2) NILQ 167.
- 47 See further, V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.372.
- 48 W. Wilson, “How Criminal Defences Work” in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (London: Routledge 2014), p.22.
- 49 V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.266.

- 50 But see Tadros who argues “that there is no clear relationship between the fact that D has a justification defence and the rights of third parties to assist D. Where D reasonably believes that a jogger is a mugger, in order for D2 to be justified in assisting D, D2 must also reasonably believe that the jogger is a mugger”. (See V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.291).
- 51 R. v Quick (William George); R. v Paddison (William) [1973] Q.B. 910.
- 52 Above, para.2-263.
- 53 M. Sornarajah, “Defences to Strict Liability Offences in Singapore and Malaysia” (1985) 27 Mal.L.R. 1.
- 54 K. L. Koh, C. M. V. Clarkson and N. A. Morgan, Criminal Law in Singapore and Malaysia: Text and materials (Singapore: Malayan Law Journal 1989), p.96.
- 55 See paras 3-021–3-024.
- 56 As we have seen, other commentators, such as Gardner, would not subscribe to this view.
- 57 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.1.
- 58 DPP v Morgan [1976] A.C. 182.
- 59 S. Shute, “The Second Law Commission Consultation Paper on Consent: Something Old, Something New, Something Borrowed: Three Aspects of the Project” [1996] Crim. L.R. 684, 690.
- 60 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212.
- 61 See also R. v Kimber (David Michael) (1983) 77 Cr. App. R. 225 where it was implicit in the decision of the court that consent is not truly a defence. cf. S. Cowan, “Criminalizing SM: Disavowing the Erotic, Instantiating Violence” in R. A. Duff, L. Farmer, S. E. Marshall, M. Renzo and V. Tadros, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011), Ch.4.
- 62 The main difference between these 2 modes of analysis relates to cases where the defendant mistakenly believes his victim has consented. See above, paras 2-257–2-262. As to whether there is a difference in the burden of proof, see above, para.4-001.
- 63 J. C. Smith, “Commentary to Brown” [1993] Crim. L.R. 585.
- 64 This is the term adopted by Lord Mustill in R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 (below, paras 4-056–4-058), in preference to the term “victim” because of the presence of consent. Significantly, the majority (with the exception of Lord Jauncey) tend to refer to the consenting participant as a “victim”.
- 65 L. Alexander, “The Moral Magic of Consent” (1996) 2 Legal Theory 165.
- 66 In R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212, Lord Templeman (at 235) sought to cast doubt on the consent of the participants, describing it as “dubious or worthless.” In fact, there was some doubt as to consent in one incident only. For the rest, as Lord Slynn stated (at 281): “Astonishing though it may seem, the persons involved positively wanted, asked for, the acts to be done to them.” As to the description “worthless”, one is presumably to interpret this as irrelevant, rather than as casting doubt on the responsibility of the participants.
- 67 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.74.
- 68 See, e.g. R. v Doyle (Danny) [2010] EWCA Crim 119; R. v C [2012] EWCA Crim 2034.
- 69 R. v McNally (Justine) [2013] EWCA Crim 1051 at [24]. See J. Herring, “Mistaken Sex” [2005] Crim. L.R. 511 for a critique of the current law in relation to this issue.

- 70 The defendant was convicted and sentenced to 4.5 years' imprisonment.
- 71 R. v Konzani (Feston) [2005] EWCA Crim 706. See also R. v Barnes (Mark) [2004] EWCA Crim 3246 and Cort [2004] Q.B. 388.
- 72 R. v Konzani (Feston) [2005] EWCA Crim 706 at [41]. Exceptionally, informed consent might result even where there had been non-disclosure by the defendant if, for example, the relationship had developed between the person and the defendant while in hospital receiving treatment for the condition: at [44].
- 73 R. v Konzani (Feston) [2005] EWCA Crim 706 at [41]. See further, M. Weait, "Knowledge, Autonomy and Consent: R v Konzani" [2005] Crim. L.R. 763 and A. Pedain, "HIV and Responsible Sexual Behaviour" [2005] 64 C.L.J. 540 for contrasting critiques of the decisions in R. v Dica (Mohammed) [2004] Q.B. 1257 and Konzani. cf. G.R. Mawhinney, "To be ill or to kill: the criminality of contagion" (2013) 77 J. Crim. L. 202–214 and M. Brazier, "Do no harm—do patients have responsibilities too?" [2006] 43 C.L.J. 397–422, 408–409, who suggest that legal responsibility for the reckless transmission of disease might be extended.
- 74 In 2008, Ercan Yasar was sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment for reckless transmission of hepatitis: "Man jailed for passing on hepatitis B" The Times 19 November 2008. In 2011, David Golding was sentenced to custody for giving his girlfriend genital herpes: reduced on appeal to 3 months' imprisonment: R v Golding (David) [2014] EWCA Crim 889.
- 75 R. v B [2006] EWCA Crim 2945; [2007] 1 W.L.R. 1567, considered below, para.7-129. cf. S. Cowan, "Offences of Sex or Violence? Consent, Fraud and HIV Transmission" (2014) 17 New Crim. L. Rev. 135.
- 76 Assange v Sweden [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin) at [88]–[90].
- 77 R. (on the application of F) v DPP [2013] EWHC 945 (Admin) at [26]. In this case, F was challenging the CPS's decision not to prosecute her husband for rape. For a critique of the judgments in Assange v Sweden and R. (on the application of F) v DPP, see J. Rogers, "Further Developments Under the Sexual Offences Act" [2013] Archbold Review 7.
- 78 R. v McNally (Justine) [2013] EWCA Crim 1051. See A. Sharpe, "Criminalizing sexual intimacy: transgendered defendants and the legal construction of non-consent" [2014] Crim L.R. 207–223. For further discussion in relation to deception and consent to sexual activity, see below, paras 7-122–7-128.
- 79 R. v McNally (Justine) [2013] EWCA Crim 1051 at [26].
- 80 R. v McNally (Justine) [2013] EWCA Crim 1051; R. (on the application of F) v DPP [2013] EWHC 945 (Admin) at [26].
- 81 See A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan's Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn, (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), p.791.
- 82 F v West Berkshire HA [1990] 2 A.C. 1 per Lord Donaldson MR (CA) at 13. The House of Lords held that such action was justified by necessity: see Lord Goff at 76, and below para.4-213. Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.5, provides a statutory defence in respect of treatment provided without consent to persons 16 and over, provided that the treating person before doing the act takes reasonable steps to establish whether the patient (P) lacks capacity, and reasonably believes that P lacks capacity and that the treatment is in P's best interests.
- 83 Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.2 provides a statutory test for incapacity: "a person lacks capacity in relation to a matter if at the material time he is unable to make a decision for himself in relation to the matter because of an impairment of, or a disturbance in

- the functioning of, the mind or brain”.
- 84 St George’s Healthcare NHS Trust v S [1998] 3 All E.R. 673. Persons are not treated as lacking capacity merely because they make an unwise decision: the Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.1(4). See further, Hale LJ, “A Pretty Pass: When is There a Right to Die?” (2003) 32 C.L.W.R. 1, 7.
 - 85 Re S (Adult: Refusal of Treatment) [1992] 3 W.L.R. 806; Bolton Hospitals NHS Trust v O [2002] EWHC 2871 (Fam); Great Western Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust v AA [2014] EWHC 132 (Fam). cf. M. Thorpe, “The Caesarean Section Debate” (1997) 27 Family Law 663, 663–664.
 - 86 Jenkins, unreported, Central Criminal Court, 10–12 January 2000. Cited in Law Commission, Consent in Sex Offences, A Report to the Home Office Sex Offences Review (2000), paras 4.66–4.67.
 - 87 See also Law Commission, Mental Incapacity, Law Com No.231 (1995) and the Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.3. The Sexual Offences Act 2003 creates offences which extend the protection afforded to those suffering from mental disorder (ss.30–41). While the provisions are welcome in many respects there is concern that they may criminalise the consensual sexual activities of people with learning difficulties. See, e.g. B. E. McGuire and A. A. Bayley, “Relationships, sexuality and decision-making capacity in people with an intellectual disability” (2011) 24 Current Opinion in Psychiatry 398–402.
 - 88 R. v C [2009] UKHL 42; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 1786, considered below, para.7-157–7-164. In this case, the defendant was charged with the offence under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.30, of sexual activity with a person with a mental disorder.
 - 89 R. v C [2009] UKHL 42; [2009] 1 W.L.R. 1786 at [27]. This approach has not been followed by the civil courts: IM v LM (Capacity to Consent to Sexual Relations) [2014] EWCA Civ 37.
 - 90 Below, paras 4-052–4-054.
 - 91 R. v Howard (Robert Lesarian) [1966] 1 W.L.R. 13.
 - 92 Sexual Offences Act 2003 ss.5–7 creates offences of rape, assault by penetration and assault (by touching) of a child under 13 years old where the issue of consent is irrelevant. There is concern that the irrelevance of consent means that (consensual) sexual exploration between two 12-year-olds is always criminalised and that whether prosecutions are brought will depend upon the approach taken by the CPS. See further, paras 7-157–7-164.
 - 93 R. v Sutton (Terence) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1086. But see now the Protection of Children Act 1978 s.1(1)(a), which prohibits the taking of indecent photographs of children. See J. Hall, “Can Children Consent to Indecent Assault?” [1996] Crim. L.R. 184, where he argues that Sutton was wrongly decided.
 - 94 The offence of indecent assault upon boys under the Sexual Offences Act 1956 s.14 (where the consent of a boy under the age of 16 is regarded as irrelevant for the purposes of determining whether there has been an indecent assault) was repealed by the Sexual Offences Act 2003.
 - 95 Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] A.C. 112.
 - 96 Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] A.C. 112 per Lord Scarman at 189. This test is approved by the Law Commission in Consultation Paper No.139, Consent in the Criminal Law (1995), para.5.21. See also R. (on the application of Axon) v Secretary of State for Health [2006] Q.B. 539. See further, E. Jackson, Medical Law: Text, Cases and materials, 4th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2016), pp.288–290.

- 97 R. v D (Ian Malcolm) [1984] A.C. 778.
- 98 B. M. Hoggett, Parents and Children, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1993), p.16.
- 99 Re W (A Minor) (Medical Treatment: Court's Jurisdiction) [1993] Fam. 64. See further, Re R (A Minor) (Wardship: Consent to Treatment) [1992] Fam. 11; Re J [1992] 3 W.L.R. 521. Once minors reach the age of 16, the Family Law Reform Act 1969 s.8 provides that their consent to medical treatment "shall be as effective" as if they were an adult. However, s.8(3) provides that this does not render ineffective "any consent which would have been effective if this section had not been enacted". The section is also silent in relation to treatment refusals.
- 100 Re R (A Minor) (Wardship: Consent to Treatment) [1992] Fam. 11; Re K W and H (Minors) (Consent to Medical Treatment) [1993] 1 F.L.R. 845. A proper examination of this complex issue is beyond the scope of this book. See further, S. Gilmore and J. Herring, "'No' is the hardest word: consent and children's autonomy" (2011) 23 C.F.L.Q. 3–25; E. Cave, "Goodbye Gillick? Identifying and resolving problems with the concept of child competence" (2014) 34 L.S. 103–122; Moreton, K. L. "Gillick reinstated: judging mid-childhood competence in healthcare law" (2015) 23 (2) Med.L.Rev. 303–14.
- 101 B. M. Hoggett, Parents and Children, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1993), p.16.
- 102 R. v Coney (1882) 8 Q.B.D. 549.
- 103 Or, possibly, manslaughter if the defendant is able to plead diminished responsibility. See also R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2013] EWCA Civ 961 at [25]; R. v Gnango (Armel) [2011] UKSC 59; [2012] 1 A.C. 827 at [53], [59] and [69]–[71]; Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] A.C. 789 per Lord Mustill at 892–893. In Nicklinson, the Court of Appeal rejected an argument based on necessity: see below, paras 8-151-8-155. In Stark's view, Nicklinson should have been argued on the ground that the defence of consent would be available to a doctor assisting him to die, conceding, however, that such an argument would have been "doomed to fail": F. Stark, "Case Comment: Necessity and Nicklinson" [2013] Crim LR 949–965, 949, 964. Consent would appear to be the more appropriate defence, since the essential plank of the case made by Nicklinson (and Pretty and Purdy) was that their autonomous wish to end their lives should be respected. The Supreme Court has since made it clear that any changes to the law in this area are for Parliament to determine, R. (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38.
- 104 Suicide Act 1961 s.1.
- 105 Criminal Law Revision Committee, 14th Report, Offences Against the Person (Cmnd.7844, 1980), para.128. The German Penal Code St.G.B. art.216 creates a special lesser offence of "killing on request" on the basis that the victim's consent reduces the wrongfulness of the killing. See further, V. Bergelson, "The Right to be Hurt: Testing the Boundaries of Consent" (2007) 75 George Washington L.R. 165–236, 166–167. See G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), pp.332–334, where he distinguishes between voluntary, involuntary, passive and active euthanasia.
- 106 Law Commission, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (HMSO 2006), Law Com. No.304, fn.37 para.7.33. See paras 7.1–7.37. cf. H. Keating and J. Bridgeman, "Compassionate Killings: The Case for a Partial Defence" (2012) 75 M.L.R. 697. Whilst murder carries a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment, in setting the minimum term the offender must serve, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.269 and

- Sch.21 para.11(f) identifies one of the mitigating factors the judge should consider as the offender's belief that the killing was an act of mercy. See, e.g. R. v Inglis (Frances) [2010] EWCA Crim 2637; [2011] 1 W.L.R. 1110.
- 107 R. (on the application of Pretty) v DPP (Secretary of State for the Home Department Intervening) [2002] 1 A.C. 800; R (on the application of Purdy) v DPP [2009] UKHL 45; R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38, CPS, Policy for Prosecutors in Respect of Cases of Assisted Suicide at http://www.cps.gov.uk/publications/prosecution/assisted_suicide.html [Accessed March 2017]. cf. A. Norrie, "Legal Form and Moral Judgement: Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide" in R. A. Duff, L. Farmer, S. E. Marshall, M. Renzo and V. Tadros, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011), Ch.7.
- 108 A 2010 YouGov survey found that 88 % of (3,874) people questioned supported assisted suicide in at least some circumstances: The Commission on Assisted Dying, Final Report (2012) at: http://www.demos.co.uk/files/476_CoAD_FinalReport_158x240_I_web_single-NEW_.pdf?1328113363 [Accessed March 2017]. The Assisted Dying Bill 2013–14, a Private Member's Bill to enable competent adults who are terminally ill to be provided at their request with specified assistance to end their life, failed to pass second reading in 2015.
- 109 Of 115 cases of people being assisted to travel to Switzerland, only 8 were referred to the DPP (per Lord Hope in Purdy at [30]). In 56 of these cases, the decision not to prosecute was based upon a lack of evidence. In 2 cases, it was held to be not in the public interest to bring a prosecution: see, e.g. CPS: Decision on Prosecution—The Death by Suicide of Daniel James (2008); No charges following the deaths of Sir Edward and Lady Downes (2010), and no charges following the death of Raymond Cutkelvin (2010) at http://www.cps.gov.uk/publications/prosecution/assisted_suicide.html [Accessed March 2017].
- 110 Re B (Adult: Refusal of Medical Treatment) [2002] 2 All E.R. 449.
- 111 See further, Hale LJ, "A Pretty Pass: When is There a Right to Die?" (2003) 32 C.L.W.R. 1.
- 112 See, e.g. Re J (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment) [1991] 2 W.L.R. 140; Re B (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 1421; Re Wyatt [2006] EWHC 319 (Fam); Re OT [2009] EWHC 633 (Fam); NHS Trust v Baby X [2012] EWHC 2188 (Fam). See further, E. Jackson, Medical Law: Text, Cases and materials, 4th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2016), p.258.
- 113 See, e.g. Re Quinlan (1976) 355 A. 2d 647; Superintendent of Belchertown State School v Saikewicz, 370 N.E. 2d 417; In re Schiavo (2003) 851 So.2d 182.
- 114 See further, W. Wilson, "Is Life Sacred?" (1995) 17 J. of Soc. Wel. and Fam. Law 131; M. Donnelly, Healthcare Decision-making and the Law: Autonomy, Capacity and the Limits of Liberalism (Cambridge: CUP, 2010).
- 115 F v West Berkshire HA [1990] 2 A.C. 1; Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] A.C. 789.
- 116 Mental Capacity Act 2005 Code of Practice, paras 8.18–8.19, provide that as a matter of practice all decisions about the proposed withholding or withdrawal of artificial nutrition and hydration from patients in a persistent vegetative state should be brought before the Court of Protection for approval.
- 117 Aintree University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust v James [2013] UKSC 67. Mental Capacity Act 2005, Explanatory Notes para.28. Where a court is making a decision in relation to life-sustaining treatment, it must not, “in considering whether the treatment is in the best interests of the person concerned, be motivated by a desire to bring about his death”, the Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.4(6).

- 118 Aintree University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust v James [2013] UKSC 67 at [38] and [45]; The Mental Capacity Act 2005 s.4.
- 119 Re A (Children) (Conjoined Twins: Medical Treatment) (No.1) (2001) 57 B.M.L.R. 1 at 13.
- 120 Re A (children) (conjoined twins) [2000] 4 All E.R. 961 per Ward LJ at 1027 (cf. Brooke LJ at 1027, Robert Walker LJ at 1060–1062).
- 121 Below paras 4-126–4-230.
- 122 See further, D. P. Price, “What shape to euthanasia after Bland? Historical, contemporary and futuristic paradigms” (2009) 125 L.Q.R. 142, 155–157. See also L. Oates, “Life, Death and the Law” (2007) 36 Common Law World Review 1 (Laurence Oates was the Official Solicitor at the time of Re A).
- 123 Including matters of contested social utility, such as boxing.
- 124 Wright (1603) Co.Lit.f. 127 a–b; R. v Cato (Ronald Philip) [1976] 1 All E.R. 260; R. v Andrews (Christopher Kenneth) [2003] Crim. L.R. 477 and R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212.
- 125 Leach The Times 15 January 1969.
- 126 Offences contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 ss.47 and 20. Whether this applies in all cases or only in cases where the harm is deliberately inflicted is discussed below, para.4-069.
- 127 With due respect to his Lordship, it is only murder if the defendant intentionally causes the death of the “victim”. It is manslaughter if both had intended to die and the defendant unexpectedly survives. In other circumstances the crime involved is aiding and abetting suicide, contrary to the Suicide Act 1961 s.2.
- 128 See L. Bibbings and P. Alldridge, “Sexual Expression, Body Alteration, and the Defence of Consent” (1993) 20 J. Law and Society 356. The appellants attempted to rely (unsuccessfully) upon the European Convention on Human Rights (most importantly, upon art.8 which guarantees respect for private and family life) during the course of their defence. Subsequently, the European Court of Human Rights unanimously held that there had been no violation of art.8 (Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v United Kingdom (1997) 24 E.H.R.R. 39). cf. D. Baker, “The Moral Limits of Consent as a Defence in the Criminal Law” (2009) 12 New Crim. L.Rev. 93; E. Craig, “Capacity to Consent to Sexual Risk” (2014) 17 New Crim. L.Rev. 103 and S. Cowan, “Criminalizing SM: Disavowing the Erotic, Instantiating Violence” in R. A. Duff, L. Farmer, S. E. Marshall, M. Renzo and V. Tadros, The Structures of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2011).
- 129 In the unreported case of Oversby, Judge Rant QC ruled that the piercing of other parts of the body for decorative or cosmetic purposes was lawful, but that body piercing for sexual gratification was unlawful (cited in Law Commission, Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97, para.9.7). Cosmetic piercing is regulated by the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 s.15 (as amended by the Local Government Act 2003 s.120). The Government has produced guidance for local authorities regulating piercing businesses, and model bylaws, which have been adopted by over a hundred authorities: L. Smith, Regulation of Tattooing and Body Piercing Businesses, House of Commons Standard Note SN/SC/5079. The Guidance follows the approach in Oversby: Department of Health, Local Government Act 2003: Regulation of Cosmetic Piercing and Skin Colouring Businesses: Guidance on

- Section 120 and Schedule 6* (2004), para.20. Since cosmetic nipple and genital piercing (on those over the age of 16) appear to be lawful, it is suggested that the motive of the person obtaining the piercing ought to be irrelevant. The Oversby approach is unworkable in practice and based on an outmoded attitude towards body modification and unacceptable legal moralism.
- 130 As P. Roberts points out (“Consent to Injury: How Far Can You Go?” [1997] 113 L.Q.R. 27, 31), there is no authority that branding is an exception to the general liability rule and, thus, “Russell LJ was obliged to look for a new exception to cover Mr Wilson’s handiwork”.
- 131 R. v Boyea (1992) 156 J.P. 505.
- 132 E. L. James, Fifty Shades of Grey (London: Arrow Publications, 2012), a novel about a heterosexual relationship which involves sado-masochistic sexual activity.
- 133 T. Farmery, “Fifty Shades of Grey ‘Master’ is cleared of assault” The Times 23 January 2013, p.11. cf. the case of M(M), tried at Woolwich Crown Court, where the defendant was acquitted of charges of assault by penetration, sexual assault and assault occasioning actual bodily harm arising out of sado-masochistic behaviour on one occasion: P. Murphy, “Flogging live complainants and dead horses: we may no longer need to be in bondage to Brown” [2011] Crim L.R. 758–765. cf. R. v Meachen (David Nigel) [2006] EWCA Crim 2414 and Slingsby [1995] Crim. L.R. 570, discussed below, para.4-069 .
- 134 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 267.
- 135 M. Foster, Crown Cases, 3rd edn (M. Dodson, 1792), p.260.
- 136 R. v Billinghamurst [1978] Crim. L.R. 553. See further, J. Anderson, “No Licence for Thuggery: Violence, Sport and the Criminal Law” [2008] Crim. L.R. 751.
- 137 R. v Barnes (Mark) [2004] EWCA Crim 3246.
- 138 R. v Barnes (Mark) [2004] EWCA Crim 3246 at [12], [15] and [16]. The defendant’s appeal against conviction was allowed on the basis that the judge’s direction to the jury (in terms of deciding whether the incident had not been done by way of legitimate sport) had been inadequate. See further, B. Livings, “A Different Ball Game” [2007] 71 J. Crim. L. 534 and M. James, Sports Law, 2nd edn (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2013), Ch.6. Since Barnes there have been a number of criminal prosecutions of amateur football and rugby players, and it has been suggested that some confusion remains as to what acts warrant criminal prosecution: A. Pendlebury, “The Regulation of on-the-ball Offences: Challenges in Court” (2012) 10 Entertainment and Sports Law Journal 279–294.
- 139 See, e.g. R. v Birkin (Paul Abbey) [1988] Crim. L.R. 854; Bowyer [2001] EWCA Crim 1835; R. v Cotterill (James Michael) [2007] EWCA Crim 526; R. v Lawrence (Jerome) [2011] EWCA Crim 3129; R. v Brown (Paul Brian) [2011] EWCA Crim 786.
- 140 Per Lord Mustill in R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 265. See further, M. Gunn and D. Ormerod, “The Legality of Boxing” (1995) 15 Legal Studies 181; J. Anderson, The Legality of Boxing: A Punch Drunk Love? (Abingdon: Birkbeck Law Press, 2007) and J. Anderson, “The right to a fair fight: sporting lessons on consensual harm” (2014) 17 New Crim.L.Rev 103. There are a number of martial arts activities which expose the participants to just as much potential risk as boxing, often without the same strict regulatory control (Law Commission Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97 para.1.6).
- 141 H v Crown Prosecution Service [2010] EWHC 1374 (Admin); [2012] Q.B. 257.
- 142 H v Crown Prosecution Service [2010] EWHC 1374 (Admin); [2012] Q.B. 257 per Cranston J at [21].

- 143 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97 para.3.25. cf. M. Fox and M. Thompson, “A Covenant with the Status Quo? Male Circumcision and the New BMA Guidance to Doctors” (2005) 31 Journal of Medical Ethics 463. Feldman has argued that nontherapeutic circumcision conducted without the consent of the patient may violate the European Convention on Human Rights art.3: D. Feldman, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2002), p.272. cf. H Gilbert, “Time to Reconsider the Lawfulness of Ritual Male Circumcision” [2007] E.H.R.L.R. 279.
- 144 L. Bibbings and P. Alldridge, “Sexual Expression, Body Alteration, and the Defence of Consent” (1993) 20 J. Law and Society 356.
- 145 Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003 s.1. The offence carries a maximum sentence of 14 years’ imprisonment. However, cosmetic genital surgery (e.g. labiaplasty) is lawful and apparently increasingly popular: C. Smyth, “Porn fuels rise in girls having risky genital cosmetic surgery” The Times 15 November 2013. See T. Elliott, “Body Dysmorphic Disorder, Radical Surgery and the Limits of Consent” (2009) 17 Medical Law Review 149, 178–181.
- 146 This latter view is taken by Lord Mustill in R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 266.
- 147 “News: Surgeon Amputated Healthy Legs” (2000) British Medical Journal 320. The surgeon, Robert Smith, effectively barred from performing any more such operations in the UK because no hospital will permit this surgery to take place on their premises, has argued that the condition (now usually known as Body Integrity Identity Disorder) is analogous to Gender Identity Disorder and, thus, may be appropriately treated by surgery: G. M. Furth and R. Smith, Amputee Identity Disorder: Information, Questions, Answers and Recommendations about Self-Demand Amputation (First Books Library, 2002); C. Fracassini, “Call for NHS Amputation of Healthy Limbs” The Times 23 November 2003. The legality of gender reassignment surgery is well established, see, e.g. Corbett v Corbett [1971] P. 83; Bellinger v Bellinger [2003] 2 A.C. 467; Law Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97 paras 8.28–8.29. See further, T. Elliott, “Body Dysmorphic Disorder, Radical Surgery and the Limits of Consent” (2009) 17 Medical Law Review 149.
- 148 R. v Jones (Terance) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 375. See also R. v Aitken (Thomas Adam) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1006 and Law Commission Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97 paras 14.1–14.21.
- 149 Per Lord Mustill in R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 267.
- 150 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 267.
- 151 R. v P [2005] EWCA Crim 1960.
- 152 The defence may even operate where the defendants make a drunken mistake as to the consent of the victim: see R. v Richardson (Nigel John) and Irwin (Sean Anthony) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 392. Below, para.4-335.
- 153 Per Lord Templeman in R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 237.
- 154 R. v Savage (Susan) [1992] 1 A.C. 699.
- 155 In R. v Emmett Case No. 9901191 ZR The Times 15 October 1999, it was stated that the issue was whether the line should be drawn between assault and s.47 “or at some higher level”.
- 156 J. C. Smith, “Commentary to Brown” [1993] Crim. L.R. 585: “It is important to note that [the decision in R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph)] is limited to the intentional infliction of bodily harm”.

- 157 Lord Templeman: “in principle there is a difference between violence which is incidental and violence which is inflicted for the indulgence of cruelty” (at 236). Lord Lowry: “If in the course of buggery ... one participant, either with the other participant’s consent or not, deliberately causes actual bodily harm to that other, an offence against s.47 has been committed”. (at 256, emphasis added).
- 158 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.6 of 1980) [1981] Q.B. 715 at 719.
- 159 Support for this proposition comes from the case of R. v Boyea (1992) 156 J.P. 505. See further, M. J. Allen, “Consent and Assault” [1994] 58 J. Crim. L. 183.
- 160 R. v Meachen (David Nigel) [2006] EWCA Crim 2414.
- 161 See also Slingsby [1995] Crim. L.R. 570, where the court gave some indication that it would restrict the negation of consent to those injuries which were intentionally or recklessly inflicted. Further, it may have been material that the court in R. v Emmett Case No. 9901191 ZR The Times 15 October 1999 stressed that the defendant was “plainly aware of the danger”.
- 162 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.6 of 1980) [1981] Q.B. 715.
- 163 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 248.
- 164 The Law Commission’s view is that “D cannot be guilty of this [s. 47] offence if D did not intend or foresee any injury and V consented to the act which would otherwise be an assault or battery.” Law Commission, Reform of Offences against the Person, Law Com. No 361 (2015), paras 2.27, and 2.24.
- 165 Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97, para.2.17.
- 166 Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97, para.2.15.
- 167 Thus, the question of whether the injury is seriously disabling would have to be established in addition to grievous bodily harm in cases where consent is claimed. See, D. Ormerod and M. Gunn, “Consent—A Second Bash” [1996] Crim. L.R. 694, 701, where they argue that this is too complex, confusing and unnecessary.
- 168 With, e.g. the concept of “horseplay”: Consultation Paper No.139, fn.97, paras 14.1–14.21.
- 169 Law Commission, Reform of Offences against the Person, Law Com. No 361 (2015) paras 5.20-5.26. Note that the Commission did not examine in detail the defence of consent within either the consultation paper or the final report.
- 170 Law Commission, Reform of Offences against the Person, Law Com. No 361 (2015) para 5.26.
- 171 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), pp.857–858. See also, S. Uniacke, Permissible Killings: The Self-Defence Justification for Homicide (Cambridge: OUP, 1994), Chs 4 and 5 where she rejects the argument that killings in self-defence are morally permissible because they are unintended (but merely foreseen) and argues that they are permissible because of “the moral asymmetry between the parties” (p.229)—a development of the theory of forfeiture.
- 172 J. Gardner, “Justifications and Reasons” in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.108.
- 173 R. v Abraham (Alan) [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1270; R. v Williams (Gladstone) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 276.
- 174 Above, para.2-263.
- 175 Below, paras 7-002 and 8-002.

- 176 R. v Rashford (Nicholas) [2006] Crim. L.R. 547; R. v Keane [2010] EWCA Crim 2514.
- 177 See K. O'Donovan, "Defences for Battered Women Who Kill" (1991) 18 J. L. and Soc. 219; C. Wells, "Domestic Violence and Self-Defence" (1990) 140 N.L.J. 127; L. J. Taylor, "Provoked Reason in Men and Women: Heat of Passion Manslaughter and Imperfect Self-Defence" (1986) 33 U.C.L.A. Law Rev. 1679.
- 178 See N. Wake, "Battered women, startled householders and psychological self-defence: Anglo-Australian perspectives" (2013) 77 J. Crim. L. 433.
- 179 See, e.g. the discussion in I. Dennis, "Editorial: Defending Self-Defence" [2010] Crim. L.R. 167.
- 180 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(9).
- 181 I. Dennis, "Editorial: A Pointless Exercise" [2008] Crim. L.R. 507.
- 182 J. Rogers, "Have-a-go heroes" [2008] 158 N.L.J. 318, 318.
- 183 These provisions are discussed below, paras 4-105–4-107. See further clarification of the new provision in R. (on the application of Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin).
- 184 S. Uniacke, "Was Mary's Death Murder?" (2001) Med. L.R. 208, 214.
- 185 S. Uniacke, Permissible Killings: The Self-Defence Justification for Homicide (Cambridge: OUP, 1994).
- 186 J. Horder, "Self-Defence, Necessity and Duress: Understanding the Relationship" (1998) XI Canadian Journal of Law and Jurisprudence 143.
- 187 T. M. Funk, "Justifying Justifications" (1999) 19 O.J.L.S. 631, 63.
- 188 J. Gardner, "Justifications and Reasons" in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996).
- 189 Below, paras 4-225–4-227.
- 190 DPP v Bayer [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. 38.
- 191 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(10)(b) makes it clear that references to self-defence also includes the defence of other people.
- 192 The overlap is not complete, e.g. if one defends oneself against an infant's attack, one is not preventing a "crime".
- 193 Devlin v Armstrong [1971] N.I. 13 at 35–36. Bernadette Devlin MP's relationship with her Londonderry constituents was held not to be sufficient.
- 194 R. v Williams (Gladstone) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 276; Tooley (1709) 11 Mod. at 250; 88 E.R. at 1020; Prince (1875) 2 C.C.R. at 178; People v Keatley [1954] I.R. 12.
- 195 Hussey (1924) 18 Cr. App. R. 160. See further, J. C. Smith, Justification and Excuse in the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1989), pp.109–112.
- 196 It is clear that if self-defence arises on the facts it should be put to the jury even though the defence has not been raised by the defendant (DPP v Bailey [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 257). The judge should also explain that the prosecution has to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant was not acting in self-defence (Anderson [1995] Crim. L.R. 430).
- 197 However, it is not just offences of violence where the defence can be applied. For instance, in the case of R. v Riddell [2017] EWCA Crim 413; [2017] All E.R. (D) 45 the court stated, in obiter, that self-defence could apply to dangerous or careless driving offences. While it was likely to be a rare case where the defence would arise,

- it was in principle, capable as a matter of law of being available for such offences.
- 198 The final exception is: (c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection. Clearly, all 3 exceptions may be relevant when considering the defence of prevention of crime.
- 199 J. C. Smith, “The Use of Force in Public or Private Defence and Article 2” [2002] Crim. L.R. 956, 957 citing Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation) [2001] Fam. 147 as the authority.
- 200 R. (on the application of Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London [2006] EWHC 196 (Admin). The court added, however, that it was “not obvious that the absolute necessity requirement is appropriate where the death was neither intended nor foreseeable as an inevitable consequence of the force used” at [22]. See also F. Leverick, “Is English Law Incompatible with Article 2 of the ECHR” [2002] Crim. L.R. 347 and F. Leverick, “The Use of Force in Public or Private Defence and Article 2: A Reply to Professor Sir John Smith” [2002] Crim. L.R. 961.
- 201 Davis v Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis [2016] EWHC 38 (QB).
- 202 See also R. (on the application of Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin).
- 203 R. (on the application of Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London [2006] EWHC 196 (Admin) at [27]. On appeal, the Court of Appeal upheld the decision without discussing these particular issues: [2007] EWCA Civ 617.
- 204 S. Foster and G. Leigh, “Self-defence and the right to life; the use of lethal or potentially lethal force, UK domestic law, the common law and article 2 EHRC” (2016) E.H.R.L.R. 398, 9.
- 205 A v United Kingdom (1999) 28 E.H.R.R. 603; below, para.4-128.
- 206 See Leverick, “Is English Law Incompatible with Article 2 of the ECHR” [2002] Crim. L.R. 347, 358–359.
- 207 See further discussion below under (ii) Householder cases.
- 208 See also, R. v Rashford (Nicholas) [2006] Crim. L.R. 547. It is clear, however, that the defence will not succeed where the defendant uses force which, unknown to him, is justified by the circumstances: Dadson (1850) 4 Cox C.C. 358. See B. Hogan, “The Dadson Principle” [1989] Crim. L.R. 679 and R. L. Christopher, “Unknowing Justification and the Logical Necessity of the Dadson Principle in Self-Defence” (1995) 15 O.J.L.S. 229.
- 209 e.g. Rose (1884) 15 Cox 540, where the defendant shot and killed his father whom he mistakenly thought was killing his mother by cutting her throat; Albert v Lavin [1982] A.C. 546.
- 210 R. v Williams (Gladstone) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 276.
- 211 This was confirmed in Beckford v The Queen [1988] A.C. 130 and applied, e.g. in R. v Drane (Paul) [2008] EWCA Crim 1746 and R. v Faraj (Shwan) [2007] EWCA Crim 1033.
- 212 R. v Oatridge (Ganor) [1992] Crim. L.R. 205 at 206.
- 213 Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(3), (4) and (5). See below, para.4-097. As Rogers comments, “neither in principle nor on policy grounds can one defend treating the drunkard more harshly” than, e.g. the incorrigible racist who wrongly believes himself to be under attack for that reason: fn.182 above.
- 214 See further, S. Uniacke, Permissible Killings: The Self-Defence Justification for Homicide (Cambridge: OUP, 1994), Ch.2 where she offers a more complex analysis

- of justification and excuse, based in part on a distinction between objective and agent-perspectival viewpoints.
- 215 This is broadly what occurred in Finch and Jardine (unreported, Central Criminal Court, 12–19 October 1982). See also Davis v Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis [2016] EWHC 38 (QB).
- 216 McCann v United Kingdom (1996) 21 E.H.R.R. 97; Andronicou v Cyprus (1998) 25 E.H.R.R. 491; Gul v Turkey (2002) 34 E.H.R.R. 28.
- 217 Bubbins v UK (2005) 41 E.H.R.R. 24.
- 218 Davis v Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis [2016] EWHC 38 (QB).
- 219 See also R. (on the application of Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London [2006] EWHC 196 (Admin).
- 220 Although, of course, this may provide evidence that the defendant did not in fact honestly believe force was required.
- 221 See R. v Morris (Daryl Howard) [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. 9. where it was held that a taxi driver had acted to prevent the offence of making off without payment by driving onto a pavement whereby he injured a passenger. Note s.3 is not available where the relevant crime has been completed by the time force is applied, R. v Attwater (Mark Victor) [2011] R.T.R. 12; See also R. v Jones (Margaret) [2006] 2 All E.R. 741 which decided that a crime for the purposes of s.3 was restricted to crimes under domestic law and not international law.
- 222 As amended by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 s.148 and the Crime and Courts Act 2013 s.43.
- 223 D. L. Creach, “Partially Determined Imperfect Self-Defense: The Battered Wife Kills and Tells Why” (1982) 34 Stan. L.R. 616, 632.
- 224 R. v Shannon (James Russell) (1980) 71 Cr. App. R. 192.
- 225 R. v Whyte (Ese Etenyin) [1987] 3 All E.R. 416.
- 226 R. v Scarlett (John) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 290. See also Att-Gen’s Reference (No.2 of 1983) [1984] 2 W.L.R. 465.
- 227 See also R. v Yaman (Tolga) [2012] EWCA Crim 1075 where the court held that the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76 makes it clear that the trigger for using force is assessed subjectively while the defendant’s response to it must be assessed objectively.
- 228 Andronicou v Cyprus (1998) 25 E.H.R.R. 491. See commentary by A. Ashworth [1998] Crim. L.R. 823.
- 229 R. (on the application of Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner South London [2006] EWHC 196 (Admin) at [25], upheld on appeal at [2007] EWCA Civ 61. See also Bubbins v United Kingdom (2005) 41 E.H.R.R. 24.
- 230 In Palmer v The Queen [1971] A.C. 814 (Privy Council) the phrase “most potent evidence” was used.
- 231 The courts have noted that the jury, in particular, should be directed as to this principle, R. v Yaman (Tolga) [2012] EWCA Crim 1075.
- 232 I. Dennis, “Editorial: A Pointless Exercise” [2008] Crim. L.R. 507, 507–508.
- 233 For a theoretical exploration of objective, subjective and “hybrid” tests for self-defence, see H. Frowe, “A Practical Account of Self-Defence” (2010) 29 Law & Phil. 245.

- 234 R. v Martin (Anthony Edward) [2002] 2 W.L.R. 1. See below, para.4-109.
- 235 S. Yeo, “Killing in Defence of Property” (2000) N.L.J. 730 cites a poll indicating that fewer than 4% of people were in favour of Martin’s conviction and sentence. The Government responded to the publicity by issuing “reassurance” to the public about the law (HO Press Release No. 004/2005, 12 January 2005) and the CPS has issued new guidance (below, para.4-127).
- 236 R. v Faraj (Shwan) [2007] EWCA Crim 1033.
- 237 Hansard, HC, Vol.449 col.641 (14 January 2013).
- 238 The court does make it clear that force that is grossly disproportionate can never be reasonable. Whether force is grossly disproportionate may depend on whether the defendant went “completely over the top” at [21].
- 239 M. P. Thomas, “Defenceless castles: the use of grossly disproportionate force by householders in light of R. (Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice” (2016) 80(6) J. Crim. L. 407.
- 240 R. v Oye [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 11.
- 241 R. v Oye [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 11 at [47].
- 242 R. v Oye [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 11 at [45]. The defendant could, however, rely on the defence of insanity. Note that the physical characteristics of the defendant can be considered. e.g. if the defendant is physically handicapped or is a pregnant woman (to borrow examples from duress) and less able to escape or use lesser force, this can be taken into account in assessing whether the actions were reasonable. This approach opens up the possibility of (weaker) women being permitted a wider range of defensive action against (stronger) men.
- 243 Subject to certain exceptions: a person was not under a duty to retreat if he was in his own home or if it would leave his family or friends in danger.
- 244 R. v Julien (Thomas) (1969) 53 Cr. App. R. 407 at 411.
- 245 R. v McInnes (Walter) (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 551.
- 246 R. v Bird (Debbie) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 816.
- 247 [2011] 2 Cr.App.R.26 at [31]. See also, R. v Keane [2010] EWCA Crim 2514, discussed above.
- 248 Beckford v The Queen [1988] A.C. 130 at 144. In R. v Murphy (Michael Anthony) [2007] EWCA Crim 2810, the Court of Appeal held that the jury does not necessarily have to be explicitly informed that pre-emptive force may be used in self-defence.
- 249 R. v Georgiades (Michael) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 759.
- 250 See also Att-Gen’s Reference (No.2 of 1983) [1984] 2 W.L.R. 465 where the court held “[t]he defence of lawful object is available to a defendant against whom a charge under section 4 of the [Explosive Substances] Act of 1883 has been preferred, if he can satisfy the jury on balance of probabilities that his object was to protect himself or his family or his property against imminent apprehended attack and to do so by means which he believed were no more than reasonably necessary to meet the force used by the attackers”. See further, D. Lanham, “Offensive Weapons and Self-defence” [2005] Crim. L.R. 85.
- 251 See also R. v Salih (Guner) [2007] EWCA Crim 2750. See also D. Ormerod, “Firearms: possessing a firearm with intent to endanger life” [2008] Crim. L.R. 386.
- 252 C. P. Ewing, Battered Woman Who Kill: Psychological Self-Defence as Legal Justification (Lanham: Lexington Books, 1987).

- 253 R. v Ahluwalia (Kiranjit) (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 133.
- 254 R. v Thornton (Sara Elizabeth) (No.1) (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 112.
- 255 Below, paras 8-096–8-150.
- 256 Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 1983), p.503.
- 257 Criminal Law Revision Committee, 14th Report, fn.106 above, para.286.
- 258 Law Com. No.177 (1989), fn.22 cl.44.
- 259 Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993, Law Com. No.218 (1993), paras 39.6–39.7.
- 260 See further, S. S. M. Edwards, “Abolishing Provocation and Reframing Self-Defence—the Law Commission’s Options for Reform” [2004] Crim. L.R. 181 where the law is condemned as “exorbitantly gendered”.
- 261 See, e.g. N. Lacey, “Partial Defences to Homicide” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking Homicide Law (New York: OUP, 2000), pp.124, 129.
- 262 McKay [1957] V.R. 560; Howe [1958] 100 C.L.R. 448. The Report of the Select Committee on Murder and Life Imprisonment, HL Paper 78–1, 1989, para. 89 expressed support for this approach. For a comparative analysis of householder’s right to kill in England and Wales and Australia, see I. Dobinson and E. Elliott, “A householder’s right to kill or injure an intruder under the Crime and Courts Act 2013: an Australian comparison” (2014) 78 J. Crim. L. 80.
- 263 Viro (1976–78) 141 C.L.R. 88 at 139 per Mason J.
- 264 Zecevic (1987) 71 A.L.R. 641. See D. Lanham, “Death of a Qualified Defence?” (1988) 104 L.Q.R. 239.
- 265 See also, Law Commission, Partial Defences to Murder, Law Com. No.290 (2004), paras 4.1–4.31.
- 266 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.55(3).
- 267 CPS, Self-Defence and the Prevention of Crime at http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/s_to_u/self_defence/ [Accessed March 2017].
- 268 First report, Murder: the Mandatory Life Sentence (H.C. 111, 1995), paras 23–27, 55–58. The Government’s Reply, Murder: the Mandatory Life Sentence (Cmnd.3346, 1996).
- 269 Subsequently, new evidence was produced which suggested that Clegg may not have fired when the car had passed and a re-trial was ordered.
- 270 Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21, 11(e). See R. v Roe (Thomas Patrick) [2008] EWCA Crim 2946.
- 271 By nature, duration, degree or inflicted for the gratification of rage: R. v Hopley (1860) 2 F.& F. 202.
- 272 A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 E.H.R.R. 611. See also Campbell and Cosans v United Kingdom (1980) 3 E.H.R.R. 531 and Costello- Roberts v United Kingdom (1993) 19 E.H.R.R. 12.
- 273 The court did not go so far as to state that all physical punishment of children breached the European Convention on Human Rights art.3.
- 274 Protecting Children, Supporting Parents: A Consultation Document on the Physical Punishment of Children (London: Department of Health 2000).
- 275 In order to constitute a breach, the ill-treatment would have to reach a minimum level of severity depending on all the circumstances identified here: para.5.3.

- 276 On the basis that with the implementation of the Human Rights Act 1998 courts would, in any event, have to apply A v United Kingdom: Department of Health Press release, 8 November 2001. See R. v H (Assault of Child: Reasonable Chastisement) [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 59.
- 277 See further, H. Keating, “Protecting or Punishing Children: Physical Punishment, Human Rights and English Law Reform” [2006] 26 Legal Studies 394.
- 278 See below, para.7-032.
- 279 Above, fn.274, para.2.14.
- 280 Protecting Children, Supporting Parents: A Consultation Document on the Physical Punishment of Children (London: Department of Health 2000), para.2.9. Fewer than 1% of respondents thought punishment reasonable if it left marks and bruises which lasted for more than a few days.
- 281 L. Radford, S. Corral, C. Bradley, H. L. Fisher, C. Bassett, N. Howat, and S. Collishaw, Child abuse and neglect in the UK today (London: NSPCC, 2011).
- 282 L. Radford, S. Corral, C. Bradley, H. L. Fisher, C. Bassett, N. Howat, and S. Collishaw, Child abuse and neglect in the UK today (London: NSPCC, 2011).
- 283 G. Hinsliff “Outlaw smacking now, say parents” (2002) The Observer 17 February 2002 at: <https://www.theguardian.com/politics/2002/feb/17/uk.socialsciences> [Accessed March 2017].
- 284 A. Heilmann, Y. Kelly and R. G. Watt, Equally Protected? A review of the evidence on the physical punishment of children (NSPCC Scotland, Children 1st, Barnardo’s Scotland and the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland, 2015) p.7.
- 285 P. Newell, Children are People Too: Case Against Physical Punishment (London: Bedford Square, 1989),p.12.
- 286 A. Heilmann, Y. Kelly and R. G. Watt, Equally Protected? A review of the evidence on the physical punishment of children (NSPCC Scotland, Children 1st, Barnardo’s Scotland and the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland, 2015) p.15.
- 287 Sweden abolished physical punishment over 30 years ago: see J. E. Durrant, A Generation without Smacking: the Impact of Sweden’s Ban on Physical Punishment (London: Save the Children Fund, 2000). Scotland came close to introducing a complete ban on hitting children aged under 3 in 2002. In the event, hitting anyone under the age of 16 on the head, shaking them or using an implement was made illegal: Criminal Justice Act (Scotland) 2003 s.51. See R. Smith, “‘You can’t hitime now’: reforming the law of Scotland on the physical punishment of children” (2002) 17 S.L.T. 145.
- 288 The Welsh Government, e.g. is committed to securing cross-party support for the abolition of the defence. See further, H. Keating, Legislating to prohibit parental physical punishment of children (Public Policy Institute of Wales, forthcoming). The report recommends that removal of the defence needs to be accompanied by sustained information campaigns and support for parents in order to be effective.
- 289 Review of Section 58 of the Children Act 2004 Report (Cmnd.7232, 2007), para 55. See further, C. Barton, “Hitting your children: common assault or common sense?” [2008] Fam Law 65.
- 290 Amending Education Act 1996 s.548. This legislation applies to nursery schools as well as to those providing education for children of compulsory school age and to independent schools as well as state schools.
- 291 R. (on the application of Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education and Employment [2005] 2 A.C. 246.

- 292 R. v Hudson and Taylor [1971] 2 Q.B. 202.
- 293 It should be noted that the decision in R. v Hudson and Taylor [1971] 2 Q.B. 202 was disapproved in the case of R. v Hasan [2005] UKHL 22; [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 22 at [27], because there were opportunities available to avoid complying with the threat.
- 294 This seems to have happened during the sinking of the Herald of Free Enterprise, The Times 13 June 1988. See Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Operation) [2000] 4 All E.R. 961 at 1041.
- 295 Buckoke v Greater London Council [1971] Ch. 655 at 668.
- 296 R. v Martin (Colin) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 343 at 344.
- 297 Quayle [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 527 at [35].
- 298 R. v Jones (Margaret) [2005] Q.B. 259. In fact, this defence was denied to the defendants; below, p.383. See further, J. Gardner, “Direct Action and the Defence of Necessity” [2005] Crim. L.R. 371.
- 299 C. M. V. Clarkson, “Necessary Action: A New Defence” [2004] Crim. L.R. 81, 89.
- 300 Quayle [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 527. See also W. M. Chan and A. P. Simester, “Duress, Necessity: How Many Defences?” (2005) 16 K.C.L.J. 121, where support is expressed for maintaining the distinctions between both justification and excuse and different defences.
- 301 It is partly because of this that the Law Commission has recommended that if duress becomes a defence to murder and attempted murder that the burden should be placed upon the defendant to show, on balance of probabilities, that they acted under duress: Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 above, para.6.101.
- 302 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [20] and [22] per Lord Bingham. The Court of Appeal has followed this lead: see, e.g. R. v van Dao (Vinh) [2012] EWCA Crim 1717 at [44]–[49] per Goss LJ.
- 303 See: Criminal Procedure & Investigations Act 1996 Pt 1, which requires the defence to serve upon the prosecution a defence statement setting out the nature of the defence, the matters on which issue is taken with the prosecution, and why, and any facts or points of law on which the defence intend to rely. Notice must also be given of any defence witnesses (s.6C), P. J. Richardson, Archbold Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Procedure, 2017 edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell), 12-62–12-72.
- 304 See, e.g. DPP v Chorley Justices [2006] EWHC 1796 (Admin) at [28]; Whittle v DPP [2009] EWHC 236 (Admin) at [15]; R. v Penner [2010] EWCA Crim 1155 at [6] and R. v Farooqi [2013] EWCA Crim 1649 at [114].
- 305 Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 para.6.9.
- 306 M. Wasik, “Duress and Criminal Responsibility” [1977] Crim. L.R. 453; I. Dennis, “Duress, Murder and Criminal Responsibility” (1980) 96 L.Q.R. 208, 235–237. In R. v A [2012] EWCA Crim 434, the Court of Appeal found that there had been no viable case of duress but that the pressure the defendant had experienced had provided powerful mitigation in relation to the sentence for the offence of perverting the course of justice (at [63]).
- 307 Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21.
- 308 The other utilitarian arguments hardly seem applicable here. A person who has committed a crime because of duress does not need rehabilitation. He is also not a danger to society needing incapacitation (unless, as Lord Salmon suggested in Abbott v The Queen [1977] A.C. 755, he was to be continually subjected to threats to induce him to commit crimes; this is highly unlikely—a terrorist or gang leader would be extremely foolish to use the same “agent”, to whom the police were now alerted, more than once).

- 309 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Tent. Draft No.10 (1960), Comments.
- 310 D. Baker, Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2015), 28-015.
- 311 Above, fn.309.
- 312 R. v Kray (Ronald) [1970] 1 Q.B. 125.
- 313 R. v Hudson and Taylor [1971] 2 Q.B. 202.
- 314 As was suggested by Lord Goddard CJ in R. v Bourne (Sidney Joseph) (1952) 36 Cr. App. R. 125. Fisher [2004] Crim. L.R. 938 confirms that duress does not negate either the actus reus or the mens rea. cf. R. F. Schopp, Justifications, Defenses and Just Convictions (Cambridge: CUP, 1998), Ch.5.
- 315 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] 1 A.C. 417; see also Lord Bridge’s similar comments in Howe at 436.
- 316 J. Horder, “Occupying the Moral High Ground? The Law Commission on Duress” [1994] Crim. L.R. 334, 340–341.
- 317 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.803.
- 318 However, it is clear that moral involuntariness is not actually a requirement for the operation of the defence. If it were “the well-established requirements for duress as a defence (e.g. reasonable steadfastness) could have no place in a completely subjectively orientated defence where the only concern was whether the defendant’s actions were ‘morally involuntary’.” C. M. V. Clarkson, “Necessary Action: A New Defence” [2004] Crim. L.R. 81, 83.
- 319 With the exception of murder, attempted murder and some forms of treason.
- 320 A. Norrie, Crime, Reason and History: A Critical Introduction to Criminal Law (Cambridge: CUP, 1993), p.166.
- 321 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] 1 A.C. 417; R. v Shepherd (Martin Brian) (1988) 86 Cr. App. R.47.
- 322 There are elements of a justificatory defence, however, which further illustrates the difficulties inherent in classification in relation to this area of law. In Lord Hailsham’s speech in R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] A.C. 417, e.g. he spoke of the defendant possibly regarding their choice “as the lesser of two evils”. In other words, the defendant claims to have done the right thing (or, at least, the only reasonable thing) in the circumstances; this is a justificatory claim. The Law Commission rejected the notion of a balancing of harms approach; below, para.4-156. But see further, J. Horder, “Autonomy, Provocation and Duress” [1992] Crim. L.R.706.
- 323 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [19] per Lord Bingham. S. Kadish, “Excusing Crime” (1987) 75 Cal. L. Rev. 257; K. J. M. Smith, “Must Heroes Behave Heroically?” [1989] Crim. L.R. 622.
- 324 H. Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (New York: OUP, 1979), p.276.
- 325 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.804.
- 326 Threats to property are surprisingly not included. The Commentary (To Tent. Draft No.8 1958) points out that threats to property are covered by the necessity defence in s.3.02.

- 327 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Proposed Official Draft (1962) s.2.09(1).
- 328 DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 at 681.
- 329 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] 1 A.C. 417 at 432–433.
- 330 R. v Hudson and Taylor [1971] 2 Q.B. 202; DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653; R. v Conway (Francis Gerald) [1988] 3 W.L.R. 1238; R. v Martin (Colin) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 343; DPP v Davis; DPP v Pittaway [1994] Crim. L.R. 600.
- 331 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [22] per Lord Bingham; Law Commission, Report on Defences of General Application, Law Com. No.83 (1977), para.2.18.
- 332 R. v Ireland (Robert Matthew); R. v Burstow (Anthony Christopher) [1998] A.C. 147.
- 333 R. v Baker (Janet); R. v Wilkins (Carl) [1997] Crim. L.R. 497.
- 334 R. v Shayler (David Michael) [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2206.
- 335 See further, J. Loveless, “Domestic Violence, Coercion and Duress” [2010] Crim. L.R. 93 where it is argued that this reduces the possibility of female victims of domestic violence pleading duress. See also R. v A [2012] EWCA Crim 434 and R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472.
- 336 R. v A [2012] EWCA Crim 434 per Lord Judge CJ at [63].
- 337 R. v van Dao (Vinh) [2012] EWCA Crim 1717 at [33], followed in R. v Brandford (Olivia) [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [32].
- 338 Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [32].
- 339 R. v Rodger (Andrew); R. v Rose (Keith John) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R.143. cf. R. v Hammond (Dean Paul) [2013] EWCA Crim 2709 where it was held that the defence of duress was unavailable to a defendant who claimed that he needed to escape from prison because otherwise he would not be able to resist attacking a man who has made sexual advances to him.
- 340 This requirement has been insisted upon in Quayle [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 527 in which the “necessity” of using cannabis for pain relief was the basis of defences in a number of appeals heard together. The plea of necessity was rejected: below, para.4-203.
- 341 Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 paras 6.73–6.76.
- 342 N. Padfield, “Duress, Necessity and the Law Commission” [1992] Crim. L.R. 778, 782. See also Shortland [1996] 1 Cr. App. R.1 16 where it was held that the defence of marital coercion under the Criminal Justice Act s.47 is quite distinct from duress and not confined to threats of physical harm.
- 343 Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.5(2)(b). R. v Jones (Margaret) [2005] Q.B. 259; R. v Baker (Janet); R. v Wilkins (Carl) [1997] Crim. L.R. 497. See Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 cl.28(2)(e), Law Com. No.122 (1992).
- 344⁵³⁷ Hudson and Taylor (1972) 56 Cr. App. 1 at 2. cf. R. v Safi (Ali Ahmed) [2003] EWCA Crim 1809 at [28]. Both cases are considered in Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [39].
- 345 R. v Brandford (Olivia) [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [39].
- 346 R. v Valderrama-Vega [1985] Crim. L.R. 220. For discussion of this case see: P. Alldridge, “Developing the defence of duress” [1986] Crim. L.R. 433.
- 347 R. v Ortiz (Fernando) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 173.

- 348 See also DPP v Bell (Derek) [1992] Crim. L.R. 176.
- 349 R. v Ortiz (Fernando) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 173: threats to wife and child sufficed; R. v K (1984) 148 J.P. 410: implicit threat to mother sufficed.
- 350 R. v Wright (Shani Ann) [2000] Crim. L.R. 510: threat to boyfriend sufficed.
- 351 R. v Conway (Francis Gerald) [1988] 3 W.L.R. 1238; R. v Martin (Colin) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 343.
- 352 Law Commission, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences Against the Person and General Principles, Law Com. No.218 (1993), cl.25(2)(a).
- 353 On appeal, the House of Lords declined to discuss these issues on the basis that the facts were “not within measurable distance of affording him a defence of necessity or duress of circumstances” (R. v Shayler (David Michael) [2002] 2 All E.R. 477 at 491).
- 354 This test was adopted by the House of Lords in R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467: see Lord Bingham’s speech below, para.4- 181, and by the Court of Appeal in Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [32].
- 355 R. v Cole [1994] Crim. L.R. 582.
- 356 This approach was followed in R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467, where it was stated that, for duress to apply, the criminal conduct sought to be excused must be “directly caused by the threats which are relied upon” [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [3]. In R. v Ryan [2013] S.C.C. 3, the appellant had been the victim of abusive and controlling behaviour by her husband. Believing that her husband would kill or cause serious bodily harm to either her, or her daughter, she paid a “hitman” (who was, in fact, an undercover police officer) to kill her husband. The Canadian Supreme Court held that the defence of duress was only available where a defendant commits an offence under compulsion of a threat made for the purpose of compelling her to commit a specific offence. See: J. Maclean, N. Verrelli and L. Chambers, “Battered women under duress: The Supreme Court of Canada’s abandonment of context and purpose in R. v Ryan” [2017] 29 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law, online first edition.
- 357 R. v Martin (Colin) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 343.
- 358 Although in the light of the House of Lords decision in R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 it is highly unlikely that this approach would be favoured by a court.
- 359 The threat will usually be express but an implied threat can suffice: see R. v N [2007] EWCA Crim 3479.
- 360 R. v Williams (Gladstone) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 276.
- 361 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] 1 A.C. 417.
- 362 e.g. in DPP v Davis; DPP v Pittaway [1994] Crim. L.R. 600; R v Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794.
- 363 R. v Martin (David Paul) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 42 and R. v Safi (Ali Ahmed) [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. 14.
- 364 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [23].
- 365 In relation to duress as a defence to murder and attempted murder, Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 paras 6.77–6.82. The Law Commission takes the view that this would not prevent the particular circumstances of the defendant being taken into account in determining whether the belief was reasonably held.
- 366 In R. v Cairns (John) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 137, a duress of circumstances case, it was emphasised that the defendant must reasonably believe that there was a threat of death or serious injury.

- 367 R. v Hegarty [1994] Crim. L.R. 353 (evidence of emotional instability and a grossly elevated neurotic state inadmissible); R. v Horne [1994] Crim. L.R. 584 (evidence that unusually pliable and vulnerable to pressure inadmissible); R. v Hurst (Marnie Michelle) [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 82 (evidence of possible effects upon defendant of child abuse as a child inadmissible); and R. v Flatt (David Sean) [1996] Crim. L.R. 576 (evidence of drug addiction excluded as a self-induced condition not a characteristic).
- 368 R. v Emery (Sally Lorraine) (1993) 14 Cr. App. R. (S.) 394. The condition is also known as post-traumatic stress disorder. The defendant was convicted but her sentence was reduced on appeal from 4 years to 30 months. See also Antar [2004] All E.R. (D) 412.
- 369 This relaxation of the standard could not, however, assist the 13-year-old defendant in R. v W [2007] EWCA Crim 1251 because he was charged with murder. See further A. Ashworth, “Murder: defence—young defendant—intention to kill—defendant’s father instructing him to assist—murder” [2008] Crim. L.R. 138.
- 370 See below, Ch.8 paras 8-124–8-129. Similarly, characteristics relevant to relation to the loss of control defence under the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.54, because they relate to the defendant’s circumstances and have a relevance beyond the defendant’s general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint, are not necessarily relevant to the defence of duress.
- 371 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472. cf. R. v A (PJ) [2012] EWCA Crim 434; [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. 8, where it was held that although A had suffered domestic abuse, there was no evidence of duress (A’s appeal to the ECtHR was ruled inadmissible: RA v United Kingdom (Admissibility) (73521/12) (2016) 63 E.H.R.R. SE5).
- 372 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472 at [26].
- 373 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472 at [27].
- 374 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472 at [50].
- 375 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472 at [49].
- 376 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472 at [51].
- 377 R. v GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472.
- 378 For further discussion see: J. Loveless, “R v GAC: battered woman ‘syndromization’” [2014] Crim. L.R. 655. cf. D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.397.
- 379 Law Com No.304 (2006), fn.37 paras 6.83–6.86.
- 380 R. v Gill (Samuel James) (1963) 47 Cr. App. R. 166. See also R. v Cole [1994] Crim. L.R. 582.
- 381 DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 at 668.
- 382 A. Ashworth, “Reason, Logic and Criminal Liability” (1975) 91 L.Q.R. 102, 104.
- 383 See also Law Commission, Defences of General Application, Law Com. No.83 (1977), paras 2.29–2.3 1.
- 384 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] A.C. 417 at 433.
- 385 D. Baker, Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2015), para.28-035. In R. v Heath (Patrick Nicholas) [2000] Crim. L.R. 109 the defence was denied to a defendant who had “more than one avenue of escape

- open to him” on the basis that he could have gone to the police or his parents. See also R. v Baker and Ward [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 335; R v Batchelor (William Lucas) [2013] EWCA Crim 2638; Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [32], above para.4-159.
- 386 See also R. v Aldridge (Jonathan) [2006] EWCA Crim 1970 and R. v N [2007] ECA Crim 3479.
- 387 R. v Abdul-Hussain (Mustafa Shakir) [1999] Crim. L.R. 570.
- 388 Alternatively, it is possible that R. v Abdul-Hussain (Mustafa Shakir) [1999] Crim. L.R. 570, has been impliedly overruled by R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [27].
- 389 This passage was approved in R. v Shayler (David Michael) [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2206.
- 390 Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation) [2001] Fam. 147.
- 391 On the basis that the jury was entitled to assistance from the trial judge in identifying the issues of fact which arose for their decision and the judge, by not answering the questions they had asked him, had failed to give them this assistance.
- 392 Under the Draft Criminal Law Bill 1993 cl.25(4), the defence is not available to a person who has knowingly and without reasonable excuse exposed themselves to the risk of a threat (Law Com. No.218 (1993), above fn.352). In its report on homicide, the Law Commission commented that the narrower approach adopted in R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 “will serve to exclude the most unmeritorious cases where the defence should simply not be available”, Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 para.6.52.
- 393 In Brandford it was observed that Lord Bingham had “cast the net of voluntary association deliberately wide” [2016] EWCA Crim 1794 at [34].
- 394 Judicial College, The Crown Court Compendium: Part 1, Jury and Trial Management and Summing Up (2017) pp.18-10–18-14 at <https://www.judiciary.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/06/crown-court-compedium-pt1-jury-and-trial-management-and-summing-up-feb2017.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 395 D. Ibbetson, “Duress Revisited” [2004] 64 C.L.J. 530, 531. See also the speech of Baroness Hale in R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [77].
- 396 It has been applied, e.g. in R. v Ali (Israr) [2008] EWCA Crim 716, R. v Hussain (Mohammed) [2008] EWCA Crim 1117 and Brandford (Olivia) [2016] EWCA Crim 1794.
- 397 DPP v Davis; DPP v Pittaway [1994] Crim. L.R. 600.
- 398 See R. v Pommell [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 607; DPP v Bell (Derek) [1992] Crim. L.R. 176; DPP v Jones [1990] R.T.R. 33; DPP v Tomkinson [2001] R.T.R. 38; DPP v Mullally [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin) and CPS v Brown [2007] EWHC 3274 (Admin) where similar reasoning was applied in duress of circumstances cases.
- 399 R. v Gotts [1992] 2 A.C. 412.
- 400 “Prosecutions for treason are virtually confined to the circumstances of war. Perhaps in war even the private citizen is expected to cast himself in a heroic mould.” (D. Baker, Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2015), 28-010). There are, however, dicta in DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 to the effect that duress could in some circumstances be a defence to treason. See, e.g. Lord Morris at 672.
- 401 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] 1 A.C. 417.

- 402 The defendant was sentenced to 3 years' probation, so clearly some recognition was taken of his plight.
- 403 R. v W [2007] EWCA Crim 1251.
- 404 A. Ashworth, "Reason, Logic and Criminal Liability" (1975) 91 L.Q.R. 102, 139. The Law Commission considered whether there should be a special provision for duress affecting juveniles and young persons (although this received little support) (Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 para.6.142). If duress were to become a defence to murder, the Law Commission's recommendation is that youth should continue to be a relevant characteristic.
- 405 R. v Gotts (Benjamin) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 269 at 276.
- 406 D. Ormerod, "Duress: conspiracy to murder" [2011] Crim. L.R. 645.
- 407 R. v Gotts (Benjamin) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 269, 273. cf. the position in Canada, where the defence of "acting under compulsion by threats of bodily harm" is inapplicable to a wide range of offences, including sexual assault, robbery and arson: Criminal Code, RSC 1985, cC-46 s.17 at <http://canlii.ca/en/ca/laws/stat/rsc-1985-c-c-46/latest/rsc-1985-c-c-46.html> [Accessed March 2017].
- 408 R. v Gotts [1992] 2 A.C. 412 at 441.
- 409 See J. Gardner, "Duress in Attempted Murder" (1991) 107 L.Q.R. 389, 391; J. Gardner, "Duress in the House of Lords" (1992) 108 L.Q.R. 349.
- 410 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), pp.407–408; P. Aldridge, "Duress, Murder and the House of Lords" (1988) 52 Jo.C.L. 186; H. P. Milgate, "Duress and the Criminal Law: Another About Turn by the House of Lords" [1988] C.L.J. 61; L. Walters, "Murder under Duress and Judicial Decision-making in the House of Lords" (1988) 8 Legal Studies 61. See also: A. Reed, "Duress and Normative Moral Excuse: Comparative Standardisations and the Ambit of Affirmative Defences" in A. Reed and M. Bohlander, General Defences In Criminal Law: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (London: Routledge, 2014), Ch.7; K. J. Arenson, "The paradox of disallowing duress as a defence to murder" [2014] Jo. Crim. L. 65.
- 411 The sentencing guidelines for murder under the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.269 and Sch.21 remove much of the discretion formerly permitted judges and do not even include duress as a mitigating factor. The sentencing guidelines for attempted murder specifically mention "the use of duress or threats against another person to facilitate the commission of the offence" as a specific aggravating factor, but do not mention duress as a mitigating factor: Sentencing Guidelines Council, Attempted Murder: Definitive Guideline (2009), p.7.
- 412 See the prosecution that was brought in Anderton v Ryan [1985] A.C. 560—exactly the sort of case in which the Law Commission (Law Com. Working Paper No.102) had predicted that a prosecution would never be brought.
- 413 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467.
- 414 However, the Law Commission proposes that the burden of proof would lie with the defendant. This is controversial: see A. Ashworth, "Principles, Pragmatism and the Law Commission's Recommendations on Homicide Law Reform" [2007] Crim. L.R. 333, 340–342.
- 415 Abbott v The Queen [1977] A.C. 755 at 766; see G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.832.
- 416 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] A.C. 417 at 456; see L. Walters, "Murder under Duress and Judicial Decision-making in the House of Lords" (1988) 8 Legal Studies

61.

- 417 L. Katz, Bad Acts and Guilty Minds (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), p.65.
- 418 D. W. Elliott, “Necessity, Duress and Self-Defence” [1989] Crim. L.R. 611, 612.
- 419 R. v Abdul-Hussain (Mustafa Shakir) [1999] Crim. L.R. 570 and R. v Cairns (John) [1999] Cr. App. R. 137, respectively.
- 420 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.409.
- 421 R. v Willer (Mark Edward) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 225.
- 422 See also R. v Denton (Stanley Arthur) (1987) 131 S.J. 476.
- 423 R. v Conway (Francis Gerald) [1988] 3 W.L.R. 1238. See P. Alldridge, “Duress, Duress of Circumstances and Necessity” (1989) 139 N.L.J. 911. cf. R v Riddell (Tracey) [2017] EWCA Crim 413.
- 424 DPP v Bell (Derek) [1992] Crim. L.R. 176. See also DPP v Jones [1990] R.T.R. 33 at 39. In DPP v Tomkinson [2001] R.T.R. 34 (DC), the defendant’s claim of duress of circumstances in relation to a charge of driving with excess alcohol in her breath was rejected on appeal because there was no basis for the justices to conclude that a sober woman of reasonable firmness would have driven the 72 miles driven by the defendant having consumed alcohol above the legal limit.
- 425 e.g. R. v Cairns (John) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 137, and R. v Abdul-Hussain (Mustafa Shakir) [1999] Crim. L.R. 570, above. In Hampshire CC v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin) the court expressed some doubt about whether duress of circumstances could be pleaded in relation to an offence of strict liability (the crime in question being that of failing to secure the attendance of a child at school under Education Act 1996 s.444(1)), however, the better view is that it can be. In R. v Gregory (Thomas Dennis) [2011] EWCA Crim 1712, e.g. the court accepted that there might be circumstances when the defence might arise in answer to a charge of possession of a firearm without a certificate (the Firearms Act 1968 s.1).
- 426 N. Padfield, “Duress, Necessity and the Law Commission” [1992] Crim. L.R. 778.
- 427 R. v Jones (Margaret) [2005] Q.B. 259.
- 428 The case subsequently went to the House of Lords but did not deal with the issue of necessity of circumstances: [2006] UKHL 16.
- 429 R. v Shayler (David Michael) [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2206.
- 430 In both Shayler and Jones the defence failed. In Jones, the Court of Appeal held that the defence was limited to situations where the defendant was faced with a crime under domestic law. This has rightly been criticised. D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), points out that the defence “was available to Martin when his wife was threatening suicide (not a crime)” (p.412). See further, J. Gardner, “Direct Action and the Defence of Necessity” [2005] Crim. L.R. 371.
- 431 Quayle [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 527.
- 432 This approach was followed in CS [2012] EWCA Crim 389 where it was held that it was not possible to plead necessity/duress of circumstances (the court left open the question of whether there was a difference between them) in answer to a charge of child abduction under the Child Abduction Act 1984 s.1 as the purpose of the legislation was to prevent removal of a child from the jurisdiction so that he or she could remain under the protection of the court (at [13]). See further, D. Ormerod, “R

- v S: removing a child from the jurisdiction” [2012] Crim. L.R. 624.
- 433 R. v Hasan (Aytach) [2005] 2 A.C. 467 at [81].
- 434 R. v Altham (Lee) [2006] EWCA Crim 7.
- 435 Law Com. No.218 (1993), fn.352 cl.26. The defence would be available to all crimes—even murder—as with duress by threats (Law Com. Consultation Paper No.122, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences Against the Person and General Principles (1992), para.19.9, confirmed in Law Com. No.218 (1993), fn.352 para.35.10).
- 436 Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 para.6.6.
- 437 Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 para.6.8.
- 438 United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime 2000, ratified by the UK on 9 February 2006; Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings 2005, ratified by the UK on 17 December 2008, in force from 1 April 2009; Directive 2011/36, directly effective from 6 April 2014. In Rantsev v Cyprus and Russia (2010) 51 E.H.R.R. 1 at [282]–[289], it was held that the ECHR art.4 required States to put in place effective means to protect the rights of victims of trafficking. For discussion of these measures see R v VSJ [2017] EWCA Crim 36 at [8]–[14].
- 439 Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings 2005 art.26.
- 440 The first policy was developed in 2007: R v VSJ [2017] EWCA Crim at [17]–[18]. The current policy guidance, Human Trafficking, Smuggling and Slavery (2015) is at www.cps.gov.uk/legal/htok/human_trafficking_and_smuggling/ [Accessed March 2017].
- 441 Karen Bradley, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, Hansard (2014) 11 September, col.nos 363– 364.
- 442 Modern Slavery Act 2015 Sch.4 paras 1–4.
- 443 Modern Slavery Act 2015 Sch.4 para.7.
- 444 Modern Slavery Act 2015 Sch.4 para.15.
- 445 Modern Slavery Act 2015 Sch.4 para.14.
- 446 Modern Slavery Act 2015 Sch.4 para.33.
- 447 Modern Slavery Act 2015 Explanatory Notes para.211
- 448 K. Laird, “Evaluating the relationship between section 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and the defence of duress: an opportunity missed?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 395, 396.
- 449 Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45(1)–(3).
- 450 Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45(4).
- 451 K. Laird, “Evaluating the relationship between section 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and the defence of duress: an opportunity missed?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 395, 399.
- 452 Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45(2).
- 453 Defined in Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45(5) as exploitation (within the meaning of s.3) that is attributable to D being, or having been, a victim of human trafficking.
- 454 K. Laird, “Evaluating the relationship between section 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and the defence of duress: an opportunity missed?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 395, 398.
- 455 K. Laird, “Evaluating the relationship between section 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and the defence of duress: an opportunity missed?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 395, 399–400.

- 456 K. Laird, “Evaluating the relationship between section 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and the defence of duress: an opportunity missed?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 395, 400. See the discussion above re Bowen, duress and characteristics, at paras x-xxx–x-xxx.
- 457 Modern Slavery Act 2015 s.45 came into force on 31 July 2015.
- 458 R v VSJ [2017] EWCA Crim 36, [26].
- 459 R. v van Doo [2012] EWCA Crim 1717. See R. v VSJ [2017] EWCA Crim 36 at [29].
- 460 R v VSJ [2017] EWCA Crim 36 at [28].
- 461 State v Green 470 S.W.2d 565 (1971).
- 462 R. v Shayler (David Michael) [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2206, above, para.x-xxx.
- 463 See C. M. V. Clarkson, “Necessary Action: A New Defence” [2004] Crim. L.R. 81, where it is argued that the defences of self-defence, duress, duress of circumstances and necessity should be combined as one defence of “necessary action”. This would have the advantage of simplicity and allow the focus to be upon the issue that unites all the defences: whether the defendant’s response was reasonable and proportionate. See the critique of this proposal by W. M. Chan and A. P. Simester, “Duress, Necessity: How Many Defences?” (2005) 16 K.C.L.J. 121. cf. S. Edwards, “The Claims of Necessity: Good and Hard, Excuse and Justification and the Moral Narratives of Necessity”, in A. Reed and N. Wake (eds), General Defences In Criminal Law: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (London: Routledge, 2014), Ch.6.
- 464 See, e.g. R. v S Ltd; R. v L Ltd [2009] EWCA Crim 85 and comment thereto by D. Ormerod at [2009] Crim. L.R. 723.
- 465 Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation) [2001] Fam. 147.
- 466 R. v Dudley and Stephens (1884) 14 Q.B.D. 273 is usually cited to support this proposition. It has been argued that the facts of that case did not disclose a true case of necessity: D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.418, but it is submitted that the overall tenor of the judgment indicates that Lord Coleridge was simply not prepared to accept necessity as a defence to murder. The House of Lords in R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] 1 A.C. 417 (below, p.389) interpreted the case in this way.
- 467 R. v O’Toole (Robert John) (1971) 55 Cr. App. R. 206.
- 468 Wood v Richards [1977] Crim. L.R. 295.
- 469 cf. Johnson v Phillips [1976] 1 W.L.R. 65 where necessity was accepted as a basis for convicting a defendant.
- 470 R. v Kitson (Herbert) (1955) 39 Cr. App. R. 66.
- 471 Southwark LBC v Williams [1971] Ch. 734 at 744.
- 472 Southwark LBC v Williams [1971] Ch. 734 at 745–746.
- 473 Southwark LBC v Williams [1971] Ch. 734 at 746.
- 474 Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] A.C. 112.
- 475 J. C. Smith, Justification and Excuse in the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 1989), pp.64–68. Smith argues that there are many other “concealed defences” in the criminal law (pp.61–72).
- 476 F v West Berkshire HA [1990] 2 A.C. 1.
- 477 To similar effect, see R. v Bournemouth Community and Mental Health NHS Trust Ex

p. L (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [1999] A.C. 458. The common law in relation to the treatment and care of Incapacitated adults has been superseded by the Mental Capacity Act 2005.

- 478 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.122, (1992), fn.352 para.19.5.
- 479 F v West Berkshire HA [1990] 2 A.C. 1 at 74. In Pipe v DPP [2012] EWHC 1821 (Admin), it was held that justices had been wrong to reject a defence of necessity to a charge of driving at an excessive speed in circumstance where the defendant had broken the speed limit to get a young boy with a broken leg to hospital. The boy had sustained a serious injury, was in severe pain and was in urgent need of treatment.
- 480 Law Com. No.218 (1993), fn.352 above.
- 481 Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 s.87.
- 482 Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 2016 (SI 2016/362) Sch.14 Pt 1 reg.5(3)–(6).
- 483 DPP v Harris (Nigel) [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 170. In such cases, if there is a threat of death or serious injury, duress of circumstances can be pleaded (R. v Backshall (David Anthony) [1999] Cr. App. R. 35).
- 484 Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.5(2)(b).
- 485 M. McCarthy, “Cleared: Jury decides that threat of global warming justifies breaking the law” The Independent 11 September 2008.
- 486 See now the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 s.16(2).
- 487 R. v Wuyts (Nicholas Charles) [1969] 2 Q.B. 474. See also R. v Jones (Margaret) [2005] Q.B. 259.
- 488 For a full discussion of the circumstances when a statute can be construed to cover situations of necessity, see P. R. Glazebrook, “The Necessity Plea in English Criminal Law” [1972] C.L.J. 87.
- 489 P. Alldridge, “Duress, Murder and the House of Lords” (1988) 52 Jo.C.L. 186.
- 490 L. Katz, Bad Acts and Guilty Minds (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), p.27.
- 491 Law Commission Working Paper No.55, Defences of General Application (1974), para.57.
- 492 Law Com. No.83 (1977), fn.331 para.4.27.
- 493 F. Stark, “Case Comment: Necessity and Nicklinson” [2013] Crim LR 949–965, 960. See also, S. Ost, “Euthanasia and the Defence of Necessity: Advocating a More Appropriate Legal Response” [2005] Crim. L.R. 355.
- 494 R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2013] EWCA Civ 961 at [63]. The court further states that “it is simply not appropriate for the court to fashion a defence of necessity in such a complex and controversial field; this is a matter for Parliament” (at [56]). See below, para.8-155. The necessity argument was not pursued when the case was appealed to the Supreme Court: see Nicklinson v UK (2015) 61 E.H.R.R. SE7 at [24], although Lord Neuberger expressed approval of the Court of Appeal’s approach to this issue: “... to extend the defence of necessity to a charge of assisted suicide would be a revolutionary step, which would be wholly inconsistent with both recent judicial data of high authority, and the legislature’s intentions”, R. (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38 at [130]. For further discussion, see: J. Rogers, “Assisted Suicide Saga-The Nicklinson Episode” (2014) 7 Archbold Review 7.

- 495 Of course, if the recommendations of the Law Commission become law, duress (including duress of circumstances) would be a defence to murder. In fact, one of the illustrations given by the Law Commission is a classic illustration of necessity: Law Com. No.304 (2006), fn.37 para.6.61.
- 496 See D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), pp.421–422. See further, M. Bohlander, “In extremis—Hijacked Airplanes, ‘Collateral Damage’ and the Limits of the Criminal Law” [2006] Crim. L.R. 579 and D. Ormerod, “Letter to the Editor” [2006] Crim. L.R. 786 (responding to Bohlander’s article); T. Hörnle, “Hijacked Planes: May They Be Shot Down?” (2007) 10 New Crim. L.R. 582. In Germany, the Act that allowed the Minister of Defence to order the shooting down of a plane in such circumstances (Aviation Security Act s.14(3)) has been held to be unconstitutional: K. Moler, “On Treating People as Means: The German Aviation Security Act, Human Dignity, and the German Federal Constitutional Court” [2006] P. L. 457. See further, P. Gaeta, “May Necessity be Available as a Defence for Torture in the Interrogation of Suspected Terrorists?” [2004] 2 J. Int'l Crim. Just. 785; N. Tamblyn, “Necessity and Murder” (2015) J. Crim. L. 46; U. Neumann, “Necessity/Duress” in M. D. Dubber and T. Hörnle (eds), The Oxford Handbook of Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2014) Ch.26.
- 497 Abbott v The Queen [1976] 3 W.L.R. 462 at 469.
- 498 R. v Howe (Michael Anthony) [1987] A.C. 417 at 427.
- 499 Chiu-Cheung v The Queen [1995] 1 A.C. 111.
- 500 Chiu-Cheung v The Queen [1995] 1 A.C. 111 at 118.
- 501 R. v Clegg [1995] 1 A.C. 482 at 498. See S. Skinner, “Citizens in Uniform: Public Defence, Reasonableness and Human Rights” [2000] P.L. 266.
- 502 Or subject to a criminal charge.
- 503 The soldier may claim further that he would have been shot for disobedience (Nazi war criminals included this in their defences), thereby pleading duress.
- 504 United States v Kinder (1953) A.C.M. 7321; 14 C.M.R. 742; United States v Quarles 350 U.S. II (1955). Both cases arose from incidents in the Korean War.
- 505 I. D. Brownlie, “Superior Orders—Time for a New Realism?” [1989] Crim. L.R. 396, 396. Cf. Z. Bohrer, “England and the superior orders defence- choosing the middle path” (2012) 12 O.U.C.L.J. 273.
- 506 In the New York Times 10 April 1971, Marshall Burke argued that to hold Calley personally accountable was unjust; it was the whole nation that was accountable and ought to push for the end of the war. Goldstein argued against this view: “if future wars must be fought, there [must] be some expectation that each participant will abide by minimum standards of conduct which a law of crimes is designed to maintain”. (“The Meaning of Calley” 194 (19) The New Republic 13–14.)
- 507 Banda (1990) (3) S.A. 466 at 494.
- 508 See further, S. Wallerstein, “Why English Law Should Not Recognise a Defence of Superior Orders” [2010] Crim. L.R. 109, 110–114.
- 509 See fn.497, paras 4-093–4-099.
- 510 Ashworth and Horder, Principles of Criminal Law, 7th ed, (Oxford: OUP, 2013), p.86.
- 511 J. Horder, “Pleading Involuntary Lack of Capacity” (1993) 52 C.L.J. 298, 300. See also: J. J. Childs and A. Reed, “Automatism Is never defence” (2014) 65 N.I.L.Q. 167.

- 512 Law Commission, Criminal Liability: Insanity and Automatism, A Discussion Paper (2013), p.416.
- 513 Cogden (1950) unreported. See N. Morris, “Somnambulistic Homicide: Ghosts, Spiders and North Koreans” (1951) V Res Judicatae 29.
- 514 Bratty v Att-Gen of Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386.
- 515 Citing Stable J in Cooper v McKenna [1960] Q.L.R. 406 at 419.
- 516 Broome v Perkins [1987] Crim. L.R. 271.
- 517 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.2 of 1992) (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 429 at 431.
- 518 Coley (Scott) v The Queen [2013] EWCA Crim 223 at [22]. Hughes LJ drew a distinction between the involuntary conduct required for a plea of automatism and the irrational conduct of the defendant (brought on by self-induced intoxication) at [22]–[23]. In McGhee (Colin) v The Queen (an appeal heard at the same time as Coley, Hughes LJ also distinguished automatism from disinhibited behaviour brought on by intoxication: at [46]. See further, R. Mackay, “R. v Coley; R. v McGhee; R. v Harris: insanity–distinction between voluntary intoxication and disease of the mind caused by voluntary intoxication” [2013] Crim. L.R. 923.
- 519 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.5.29.
- 520 R. v Quick (William George); R. v Paddison (William) [1973] 1 Q.B. 910 at 922. For further discussion of the use of the defence in cases of hypoglycaemia, see: V. Marks, “Hypoglycaemia and automatism” (2015) 55 Medicine, Science and the Law 186.
- 521 For the meaning of this term, see below, paras 4-311–4-333.
- 522 R. v Bailey (John Graham) [1983] 1 W.L.R. 760.
- 523 The appeal was in fact dismissed because of insufficient evidence that the defendant’s actions had been involuntary. cf. R. v de Boise (Anthony Peter) [2014] EWCA Crim 1121, where the Court of Appeal stated that It was not sufficient to show a mere “possibility” that the defendant was suffering from hypoglycaemia at the time that he committed a number of Indecent assaults.
- 524 R. v Allen (Kevin) [1988] Crim. L.R. 698. cf. R. v Coley (Scott) [2013] EWCA Crim 223 at [24]: “... the voluntary consumption of intoxicants leading to an acute condition is the prime example of self-induced behaviour”. The defendant had repeatedly stabbed his neighbour’s partner with a knife after smoking “ a good deal of cannabis”.
- 525 R. v Hardie (1985) 80 Cr. App. R. 157. But cf. R. v McKay (Peter) [2015] EWCA Crim 2098 where the defendant had claimed to be in a state of automatism following the Ingestion of alcohol and a prescribed sedative.
- 526 See further, K. J. M. Smith and W. Wilson, “Impaired Voluntariness and Criminal Responsibility: Reworking Hart’s Theory of Excuses—the English Judicial Response” (1993) 13 O.J.L.S. 69. cf. F. Stark, “Prior fault” (2014) 73 C.L.J. 8; N. Wake and A. Loughnan, “Of Blurred Boundaries and Prior Fault: Insanity, Automatism and Intoxication” in A. Reed and N. Wake (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (London: Routledge, 2014), Ch.8.
- 527 See Kay v Butterworth (1947) 173 L.T. 191; Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 Q.B. 277. In Alexander v Dunn [2016] HCJAC 3, the Scottish High Court of Justiciary stated that: “a driver who knows of his medical condition, and can foresee that he may fall asleep, will be precluded from relying on that condition” at [5]. cf. R. v Lusher (Stuart Thomas) [2016] EWCA Crim 2055.

- 528 R. v Marison (Lee John) [1996] Crim. L.R. 909.
- 529 See further, J. Rumbold and M. Wasik, “Diabetic drivers, hypoglycaemic unawareness, and automatism” [2011] Crim. L.R. 863.
- 530 This is despite the fact that there are only approximately 20–30 findings of insanity per year (R. D. Mackay, “Ten more years of the Insanity Defence” [2012] Crim. L.R. 946); R. D. Mackay, “The Insanity Defence in Operation” [2014] 65 N.I.L.Q. 155.
- 531 H. Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (New York: OUP, 1979), pp.361–362, points out that three contentions may be involved. It may, first, be thought that it is wrong in these situations to punish the accused for being sick, or, secondly, that it is wrong to punish someone for what they do as a result of being sick, or, lastly, that it is cruel to add to the suffering of someone who is sick: in other words, that it is wrong to punish someone when they are sick.
- 532 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.1.52, taking the view that this is the true rationale of the defence rather than simply a denial of mens rea.
- 533 See V. Tadros, “Insanity and the Capacity for Criminal Responsibility” (2000) 5 Edinburgh Law Review 325 for an analysis of the significance of the difference between capacity and attribution responsibility.
- 534 Criminal Lunatics Act 1800. S. White, “Insanity Defences and the Magistrates’ Courts” [1991] Crim. L.R. 501, 502.
- 535 S. White, “Insanity Defences and the Magistrates’ Courts” [1991] Crim. L.R. 501, R. v Horseferry Road Magistrates Court Ex p. K [1996] 2 Cr. App. R. 574 confirms that it is still possible to raise the insanity defence at summary trial. See further, comment by J. C. Smith [1997] Crim. L.R. 132; S. White and P. Bowen, “Insanity Defences in Summary Trials” [1997] 61 J. Crim. L. 198. See, e.g. R. (on the application of Surat Singh) v (1) Stratford Magistrates’ Court (2) Crown Prosecution Service (Interested Party) [2007] EWCA 1582 (Admin).
- 536 Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s.1. On the origins of the special verdict, see A. Loughnan, “‘Manifest madness’: towards a new understanding of the insanity defence” (2007) 70 M.L.R. 379.
- 537 A. S. Goldstein, The Insanity Defense (London: Yale University Press, 1967), p.19.
- 538 See further, R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), pp.216–219.
- 539 The issue of fitness may be raised by the prosecution or the defence or by the judge. On the origins of the concept of fitness to plead, see D. Grubin, “What Constitutes Fitness to Plead?” [1993] Crim. L.R. 748.
- 540 Dyson (1831) 7 C. & P. 305; Pritchard (1836) 7 C. & P. 303. R. v Podola (Guenther Fritz Erwin) [1960] 1 Q.B. 325 decided that the burden of proof rests upon the defence if they raise the issue of fitness.
- 541 D. Grubin, “What Constitutes Fitness to Plead?” [1993] Crim. L.R. 748, 753. In R. v Moyle (Peter Geoffrey) [2009] Crim. L.R. 586 the court confirmed that paranoid delusions will not necessarily prevent a defendant being found fit to plead: it will depend upon the nature of the delusions the defendant experiences.
- 542 Davies (1853) C.L.C. 326.
- 543 M [2003] All E.R. (D) 199.
- 544 SC v United Kingdom [2005] 1 F.C.R. 347. See also R. v Miller (Scott William) [2006] EWCA Crim 2391 where the defendant was found fit to plead despite having an IQ of 66 which placed him in the bottom 2.5% of the population.

- 545 SC v United Kingdom [2005] 1 F.C.R. 347 at [29]. See further, T v United Kingdom [2002] 2 All E.R. 1024.
- 546 See further, D. Grubin, “What Constitutes Fitness to Plead?” [1993] Crim. L.R. 748. A further problem relates to hysterical amnesiacs who can recall nothing of the crime they are alleged to have committed. According to R. v Podola (Guenther Fritz Erwin) [1960] 1 Q.B. 325, they will be found fit to plead.
- 547 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.197, Unfitness to Plead (2010).
- 548 R. D. Mackay, “On being Insane in Jersey Part Three” [2004] Crim. L.R. 291, discussing the decision of O’Driscoll in which Jersey adopted a test based upon “effective participation”. See also, Mackay, “Unfitness to plead—some observations of the Law Commission’s consultation paper” [2011] Crim. L.R. 433.
- 549 Law Commission, Unfitness to Plead, Vol.1: Report (2016) para.1.45.
- 550 Law Commission, fn.549 para.1.48.
- 551 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 paras 1.10–1.15.
- 552 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 paras 1.10–1.15. For discussion in relation to these tests, see: H. Howard, “Lack of capacity: reforming the law on unfitness to plead” (2016) J. Crim. L. 428; A. Loughnan, “Between fairness and ‘dangerousness’: reforming the law on unfitness to plead” (2016) Crim. L.R. 451.
- 553 H. Howard, “Lack of capacity: reforming the law on unfitness to plead” (2016) J. Crim. L. 428, 430; A. Loughnan, “Between fairness and ‘dangerousness’: reforming the law on unfitness to plead” (2016) Crim. L.R. 451, 457–458.
- 554 R. v Marcantonio (Robert) [2016] EWCA Crim 14, [8]. cf. R. v Orr (Patrick Neal) [2016] EWCA Crim 889 at [23]–[25], discussed by R. Mackay [2016] Crim. L.R. 865.
- 555 A. Loughnan, “Between fairness and ‘dangerousness’: reforming the law on unfitness to plead” (2016) Crim. L.R. 451, 457–458. See also: H. Howard, “Lack of capacity: reforming the law on unfitness to plead” (2016) J. Crim. L. 428, 450; A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine (Oxford: Hart, 2016), 730.
- 556 Prior to the Domestic Violence, Crimes and Victims Act 2004 s.22, a jury performed this function. Under the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s.4(5), as amended by the Domestic Violence, Crimes and Victims Act 2004 s.22, the court may not make a determination of fitness except upon the evidence of 2 or more registered practitioners (one of whom is duly approved under the Mental Health Act 1983). Thus, as Ormerod notes, “if the accused simply asserts that he is unfit, without the medical evidence of two registered practitioners, the judge may continue with the trial, at his discretion. In doing so the judge is not determining whether D is ‘fit’ to be tried, but is simply not satisfied to the relevant standard and in accordance with the prescribed statutory procedure that the accused is ‘unfit’”, D. Ormerod, “Unfitness to plead: The Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s.4, as amended—unfitness to plead” [2010] Crim. L.R. 796, 798 (commenting on R. v Ghulam (Habib) [2009] EWCA Crim 2285). The Law Commission has recommended that the requirement for two medical practitioners be relaxed, and, under the Criminal Procedure (Lack of Capacity) Bill cl.2 the requirement is for the written or oral evidence of one duly appointed registered medical practitioner and one “qualified person” (a registered medical practitioner, registered psychologist or a person who has a qualification specified by the Secretary of State by regulations), or a second duly approved registered medical practitioner.
- 557 Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 s.2, substituting a new s.4A(4) to the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964.

- 558 In R. v Norman (Leslie) [2008] EWCA Crim 1810, the court made recommendations as to the conduct of such cases. Because of concerns over public safety, it also urged the government to consider granting the courts a power to order retrial of the issue as to whether the defendant did the act where the original finding has to be quashed at [34]. This lacuna was also highlighted in R. v McKenzie (Michael Anthony) [2011] EWCA Crim 1550.
- 559 R. v Antoine (Pierre Harrison) [2001] 1 A.C. 340. See also Att-Gen's Reference (No. 3 of 1998) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 214.
- 560 R. v Egan (Michael) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 121.
- 561 See further, R. D. Mackay and G. Kearns, "The Trial of the Facts and Unfitness to Plead" [1997] Crim. L.R. 644.
- 562 R. v Wells (Marc Martin) [2015] EWCA Crim 2 at [12]. cf. A. Loughnan, "Between fairness and 'dangerousness': reforming the law on unfitness to plead" (2016) Crim. L.R. 451, 459–460.
- 563 R. v B [2012] EWCA Crim 770.
- 564 R. v Kail (Tony Nicholas Alan) [2015] EWCA Crim 2 at [68]. cf. the case of Wells (Marc Martin) [2015] EWCA Crim 2, heard as a conjoined appeal with Kail, in which the Court of Appeal rejected the appellant's claim that evidence of self-defence should have been considered by the jury, because there was no objective evidence upon which to base such a defence. See also the case comment by R. Mackay [2015] Crim. L.R. 360.
- 565 Martin [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 332. cf. R. v Hone (Susan) [2015] EWCA Crim 2.
- 566 Law Commission, fn.549 para. 5.64.
- 567 Law Commission, fn.549 paras 5.28, 5.85 and Criminal Procedure (Lack of Capacity) Bill cl.9 and 38.
- 568 Criminal Procedure (Lack of Capacity) Bill cl.22.
- 569 Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s.5 amended by the Domestic Violence, Crimes and Victims Act 2004 s.24. The same forms of disposal are now also available where the charge is murder. However, under s.5(3) where the court has the power to make a hospital order (broadly, because of the nature of the defendant's condition) a hospital order with a restriction order must be made. The reforms made by s.24 mean that the law relating to disposal is now compatible with the right to liberty under the European Convention on Human Rights art.5. There is currently no power to make a restraining order under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 s.5: R. v Chingewundoh [2015] EWCA Crim 109, although the Law Commission has recommended that such an order be made available where an allegation is proved against a defendant following the alternative finding procedure, and that additional restrictive, risk assessment, monitoring and review requirements be available to be incorporated into supervision orders: Criminal Procedure (Lack of Capacity) Bill, cl.59, 66 and Sch.1. Where a hospital order with restrictions is made in relation to a person found to be under a disability, and that person later recovers, the Secretary of State can remit the case to the Crown Court for trial, but this does not apply where a hospital order is made without restrictions: S v The Queen [2014] EWCA Crim 2648 at [9]. The Law Commission has recommended that there be a right for an individual to apply for a prosecution to be resumed if they become fit to plead: Law Commission, fn.549 para 1.47, Criminal Procedure (Lack of Capacity) Bill cl.16.
- 570 R. D. Mackay, "A continued upturn in unfitness to plead—more disability in relation to trial under the 1991 Act" [2007] Crim. L.R. 530. See also Appendix C of the Law - Commission Consultation Paper, fn.547: Mackay's research reveals that there were 725 findings of unfitness to plead between 2002 and 2008. Currently about 100 individuals per year are found to be unfit to plead in England and Wales: R. D. Mackay, "Unfitness to Plead—Data on Formal Findings from 2002 to 2014" Law Commission, Unfitness to Plead, Appendix A (2016) at <http://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/unfitness-to-plead/> [Accessed 17 May 2017].

- 571 H [2003] All E.R. (D) 293. See also: R. v Lederman (Geoffrey) [2015] EWCA Crim 1308 at [32].
- 572 Even if the current law is safe from a challenge under ECHR art.6, it is not compliant with the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD). The Law Commission's view is that its proposals and draft bill are not incompatible with the UK's duties under the CRPD: Law Commission, fn.549 paras 3.166–3.179.
- 573 The Law Commission has recommended a large number of reforms to assist defendants to participate in their trial, including the use of reasonable adjustments under the Criminal Procedure Rules and Criminal Practice Directions, the use of special measures under the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, statutory entitlement to the assistance of a defence intermediary, and mandatory training of the judiciary and legal representatives: Law Commission, fn.549 Ch.2.
- 574 A. Loughnan, "Between fairness and 'dangerousness': reforming the law on unfitness to plead" (2016) Crim. L.R. 451, 465–466.
- 575 Woolmington v DPP [1935] A.C. 462 at 475–476. The same is true for diminished responsibility: the Homicide Act 1957 s.2(2). There are difficulties with this exception. e.g. if a defendant pleads (simple) lack of mens rea the burden of proof rests with the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that he did have mens rea; however, if the defendant adds that the absence of mens rea was due to a disease of the mind the burden then shifts to the defendant. If the defendant pleads automatism the burden will only shift in cases of insane automatism. See further, T. Jones, "Insanity, Automatism and the Burden of Proof on the Accused" [1995] 111 L.Q.R. 475.
- 576 R. v Foye (Lee Robert) [2013] EWCA Crim 473.
- 577 R. v Wilcocks (Callum Paul) [2016] EWCA Crim 2045; [2017] 4 W.L.R. 39.
- 578 R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), p.97.
- 579 R. v Kemp (Albert) [1957] 1 Q.B. 399.
- 580 For an informative discussion of the medical background to this case, see N. Eastman, "Defending the Mentally Ill" in R. D. Mackay and K. Russell (eds), Psychiatry and the Criminal Process (Leicester: Miltak Ltd, 1986).
- 581 I. D. Ebrahim, P. B. Fenwick, R. L. Marks and K. W. Peacock, "Violence, Sleepwalking and the Criminal Law: Part 1: The Medical Aspects" [2005] Crim. L.R. 601, 603. See also R. D. Mackay, "Sleepwalkers are Not Insane" (1992) 55 M.L.R. 71, cf. I. Ebrahim and J. Rumbold, "Medico-legal evaluation of sleep-related automatism" (2015) 55 Medicine, Science and the Law 168.
- 582 The Independent 21 November 2009. In Bilton, The Independent 20 December 2005, the defendant was acquitted of rape; in Davies, The Times 11 February 2006, the defendant was acquitted of sexual assault but in Lowe, The Times 19 March 2005, a plea of insane automatism was accepted. A number of additional cases have been reported in the tabloid press, see, e.g.: T. Payne, "Gulf war veteran cleared of rape because he suffered sexsomnia" Daily Mail 10 February 2017; T. Palmer, "'Sleepwalking' transsexual Met worker cleared of murder bid" Evening Standard 11

- August 2015. See further, R. D. Mackay and B. J. Mitchell, “Sleepwalking, Automatism and Insanity” [2006] Crim. L.R. 901; J. De Silva, “The curious case of the homicidal somnambulist” (2014) 178 CL & J Weekly 9.
- 583 W. Wilson, “Violence, Sleepwalking and the Criminal Law: Part 2: The Legal Aspects” [2005] Crim. L.R. 614, 617.
- 584 See further, R. D. Mackay and M. Reuber, “Epilepsy and the Defence of Insanity: Time for Change?” [2007] Crim. L.R. 782.
- 585 R. v Quick (William George); R. v Paddison (William) [1973] Q.B. 910. See also R. v Bailey (John Graham) [1983] 1 W.L.R. 760.
- 586 V. Marks, “Hypoglycaemia and automatism” (2015) 55 Medicine, Science and the Law 186.
- 587 R. v Hennessy (Andrew Michael) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 287.
- 588 Bratty v Att-Gen of Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386 at 412.
- 589 R. v Clarke (May) [1972] 1 All E.R. 219.
- 590 C. S. Kenny, Outlines of Criminal Law, 17th edn (Cambridge: OUP, 1958), p.76. Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386 at 412. R. v Clarke (May) [1972] 1 All E.R. 219.
- 591 In Harris (Darren) v The Queen [2013] EWCA Crim 223, the defendant was convicted of arson. His conviction was quashed on the basis that although he was affected by a mental disorder he knew what he was doing and that it was wrong, so insanity did not arise, nevertheless, his claim that he did not foresee the risk because of mental disorder (i.e. a claim of lack of mens rea) should have been put to the jury (at [56]).
- 592 R. v Windle (Francis Wilfred) [1952] 2 Q.B. 826.
- 593 R. D. Mackay and G. Kearns, “More Fact(s) about the Insanity Defence” [1999] Crim. L.R. 714.
- 594 R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), p.104.
- 595 See fn.594.
- 596 R. D. Mackay and G. Kearns, “More Fact(s) about the Insanity Defence” [1999] Crim. L.R. 714, 723.
- 597 R. v Johnson (Dean) [2007] EWCA Crim 1978. See D. Ormerod, “Insanity: knowledge of right and wrong—‘wrong’ meaning against the law” [2008] Crim. L.R. 132 and M. Hathaway, “The Moral Significance of the Insanity Defence” (2009) 73 J. Crim. L. 310.
- 598 The court referred to the Australian decision of Stapleton (1952) 86 C.L.R. 358 where R. v Windle (Francis Wilfred) [1952] 2 Q.B. 826 was held to be wrongly decided. See further, R. D. Mackay, “Righting the Wrong?—Some Observations on the Second Limb of the M’Naghten Rules” [2009] Crim. L.R. 80 where the retreat from the test is Windle in various jurisdictions is discussed.
- 599 R. v Windle (Francis Wilfred) [1952] 2 Q.B. 826 at [24]. The court also commented that given the genesis of the Rules (as answers to questions) “it has always been recognised that the M’Naghten Rules ... have to be approached with some caution”.
- 600 R. D. Mackay, “Fact and Fiction about the Insanity Defence” [1990] Crim. L.R. 247, 251; E. Baker, “Human Rights, M’Naghten and the 1991 Act” [1994] Crim. L.R. 84, 86.
- 601 Although see A. Loughnan, “Between fairness and ‘dangerousness’: reforming the - law on unfitness to plead” (2016) Crim. L.R. 451 for a discussion of the role that collective, lay knowledge of madness has in understandings of insanity in the criminal trial.

- 602 Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, Cmnd.8932 (1953), p.104.
- 603 P. Fennell, “The Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991” (1992) 55 M.L.R. 547, 549.
- 604 Below, para.4-277. See further, E. Baker, “Human Rights, M’Naghten and the 1991 Act” [1994] Crim. L.R. 84.
- 605 Law Com. No.177 (1989), fn.22 paras 11.26–11.28.
- 606 R. D. Mackay and G. Kearns, “More Fact(s) about the Insanity Defence” [1999] Crim. L.R. 714. A follow up study, examining the use of the insanity plea in the years 1997–2001, confirmed the finding that juries “have little real deliberative role to play” in such cases: K. D. Mackay, B. J. Mitchell and L. Howe, “Yet More Facts About the Insanity Defence” [2006] Crim. L.R. 399, 404.
- 607 R. D. Mackay, “Fact and Fiction about the Insanity Defence” [1990] Crim. L.R. 247, 251–255 and R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), pp.104–105.
- 608 Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s.5 as amended by the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 and the Domestic Violence, Crimes and Victims Act 2004. If the charge is one of murder and the court has the power to make a hospital order (broadly, because of the nature of the condition of the defendant) a hospital order with a restriction order must be made (s.5(3)).
- 609 There is an argument, canvassed earlier, that s.1 of the Act does effect a change. Above, para.4-272.
- 610 Mackay’s research (over a 10-year period between 1991–2001) revealed that in over 50% of cases a community-based order was made: K. D. Mackay, B. J. Mitchell and L. Howe, “Yet More Facts About the Insanity Defence” [2006] Crim. L.R. 399, 407.
- 611 In the first 5 years of Mackay’s research there was an average of 8.8 findings per year of not guilty by reason of insanity; by 1997–2001 this had risen to an average of 14.4 per year: K. D. Mackay, B. J. Mitchell and L. Howe, “Yet More Facts About the Insanity Defence” [2006] Crim. L.R. 399, 400. The average is now approximately 20–30 per year: R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), R. D. Mackay, “The Insanity Defence in Operation” [2014] 65 N.I.L.Q. 155.
- 612 See also Lord Devlin, “Mental Abnormality and the Criminal Law” in St. J. MacDonald (ed), Changing Legal Objectives (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1963).
- 613 Winterwerp v The Netherlands (1979) 2 E.H.R.R. 387. See further, R. v Grant (Heather) [2002] Q.B. 1030, R. (on the application of David Grant Juncal) v Secretary of State for the Home Department et al [2008] EWCA Civ 869 and P. J. Sutherland and C. A. Gearty, “Insanity and the European Court of Human Rights” [1992] Crim. L.R. 418.
- 614 Indeed, this view was accepted in Jersey at first instance (R. D. Mackay and C. A. Gearty, “On Being Insane in Jersey—the case of Att-Gen v Jason Prior” [2001] Crim. L.R. 560). However, the appeal court disagreed (R. D. Mackay, “On Being Insane in Jersey Part Two—the Appeal in Jason Prior v Att-Gen” [2002] Crim. L.R. 728). By negating the criminal responsibility of an individual based on his mental disability or lack of capacity, the current defence of insanity also fails to comply with the requirements of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities: see

- e.g. T. Minkowitz, “Rethinking criminal responsibility from a critical disability perspective: The abolition of insanity/incapacity acquittals and unfitness to plead, and beyond” (2014) 23 G.L.R. 434.
- 615 Cmnd.6244 (1975).
- 616 Law Com. No.177 (1989), fn.22 cll.35–336, largely drawing upon the Butler recommendations.
- 617 Law Commission, Insanity and Automatism, A Scoping Paper (2012). See further, J. Peay, “Insanity and Automatism: questions from and about the Law Commission’s Scoping Paper” [2012] Crim. L.R. 927.
- 618 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.1.10.
- 619 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.1.84.
- 620 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.1.85.
- 621 It would, however, exclude “acute intoxication”. See below, paras 4-345–4-349.
- 622 “Wrongfulness” would not be limited to illegality as under the existing law: Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.525 para.4.33.
- 623 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.1.93.
- 624 A. Ashworth, “Editorial, Insanity and automatism: a discussion paper” [2013] Crim. L.R. 787, 788.
- 625 Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 s.168, inserting a new s.51A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. See also: Murphy (Charles) v HM Advocate [2016] HCJAC 118; E. Shaw, “Automatism and mental disorder In Scots criminal law” (2015) Edin. L.R. 211; J. Chalmers, “Insanity and automatism: notes from over the border and across the boundary” (2014) 65 N.I.L.Q. 205.
- 626 Other jurisdictions have also amended or rejected the M’Naghten Rules: see, e.g. Phillip (Francis) and John (Kim) v The Queen [2007] UKPC 31 where the Privy Council had to consider the reformed law of St Lucia.
- 627 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Proposed Official Draft (1962), s.4.01 was approved by statute in 29 states and all federal courts by 1982. 18 states, including New York, currently use the Model Penal Code rule or a variation thereof.
- 628 This is still the case in Texas.
- 629 USA v Hinckley Criminal No.81, 306 US Dt. Ct. for the District of Columbia, 525 F. Supp. 1342, 17 November 1981.
- 630 A. P. Brooks, “The Merits of Abolishing the Insanity Defense” (1985) 477 The Annals 125, 126.
- 631 H. J. Steadman, “Empirical Research on the Insanity Defense” (1985) 477 The Annals 58; M. Perlin, The Jurisprudence of the Insanity Defense (Durham: Carolina Academic Press, 1994).
- 632 National Advisory Commission, Myths and Realities: A Report of the National Commission on the Insanity Defense (1983).
- 633 e.g. Indiana: Ind. Stat. 35–36–2–3 s.3(3).
- 634 About two-thirds of those states which accept the insanity defence now place the burden of proof upon the defendant, normally by a preponderance of the evidence (R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), p.117).
- 635 e.g. in Arizona the defendant must prove insanity by “clear and convincing evidence”

- (Ariz. Rev. Stat. An. s.13–502(b) (1984)). The constitutionality of Arizona’s test for insanity (which relates to the accused’s moral capacity only and not cognitive capacity) was upheld in Arizona v Clarke (2006) 548 US 735. See further, Law Commission Scoping Paper (2012), fn.617 Appendix C
- 636 Federal law was changed by the Insanity Reform Act 1984 (see Title 18 of the United States Code). In relation to state law see, e.g. California Penal Code (supp. 1987), s.25(b). Research has shown that such revised tests had little impact upon the number of successful insanity pleas: H. J. Steadman, Before and After Hinckley: Evaluating Insanity Defense Reform (New York: Guildford Publications, 1993), p.142. cf. P. H. Robinson, “The effect of mental illness under US criminal law” (2014) 65 N.I.L.Q. 229.
- 637 The additional verdict was introduced to give juries a choice and to reduce the number of acquittals on the basis of insanity.
- 638 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.845.
- 639 Above, para.4-278.
- 640 Montana (Mont. Code s.46–14–214 (2001)), Idaho (Idaho Code 181–207 (1997)), Kansas (KSA 22–3220 (1995)) and Utah (Utah Code s.76-(1999)). In Montana, following the reform, the numbers found unfit to plead increased, one interpretation being that the courts were “trying to compensate for not being able to acquit the accused by diverting him or her from the criminal trial by a procedural mechanism.” Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.2.4, citing P. Appelbaum, Almost a Revolution: Mental Health Law and the Limits of Change (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004), pp.173–175, 181–183. See also: P. H. Robinson, “The effect of mental illness under US criminal law” (2014) 65 N.I.L.Q. 229.
- 641 Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 Q.B. 277.
- 642 R. v T [1990] Crim. L.R. 256.
- 643 She was convicted.
- 644 Rabey [1980] S.C.R. 513 (Canada).
- 645 In R. v Huckerby (Graham) [2004] EWCA Crim 3251, the issue was not one of automatism but the Court of Appeal did conclude that a conviction for robbery was unsafe because the trial court had not heard evidence about the full impact (including post-traumatic stress) an earlier robbery upon the defendant might have had upon him.
- 646 R. v Quick (William George); R. v Paddison (William) [1973] 1 Q.B. 910.
- 647 K. D. Mackay, B. J. Mitchell and L. Howe, “Yet More Facts About the Insanity Defence” [2006] Crim. L.R. 399, 400.
- 648 Consequently, the Law Commission requested information about the use of the plea of automatism in its scoping paper on insanity and automatism: fn.617 above.
- 649 Law Com, No.177 (1989), fn.22 cl.33. See further, R. D. Mackay, “Craziness and Codification—Revising the Automatism and Insanity Defences” in I. Dennis (ed), Criminal Law and Justice (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1987), pp.112–118 and W. Wilson, “Violence, Sleepwalking and the Criminal Law: Part 2: The Legal Aspects” [2005] Crim. L.R. 614.
- 650 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.5.111. For an overview of the provisions, see: D. Ormerod, “The Law Commission’s proposals for the reform of the defences of Insanity and automatism” (2015) 55 Medicine, Science and the Law 156.
- 651 Law Commission Scoping Paper, fn.617 para.5.124.

- 652 Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.1.113.
- 653 The American Law Institute, Model Penal Code, Tent. Draft No.4 (1955), Comments to s.2.01 at p.122.
- 654 HM Advocate v Fraser (1878) 4 Couper 70. But see now Carmichael v Boyle [1985] S.L.T. 399.
- 655 Griew argues that public education would be necessary. E. Griew, “Let’s Implement Butler on Mental Disorder and Crime” [1984] C.L.P. 47, 52. We would tend to agree with Mackay that this is unlikely to be successful: R. D. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), p.115.
- 656 E. Baker, “Human Rights, M’Naghten and the 1991 Act” [1994] Crim. L.R. 84, 90.
- 657 A. Cretney and G. Davis, Punishing Violence (Oxford: Routledge, 1995), p.26. See also, G. Dingwall, Alcohol and Crime (Cullompton: Willan Publishing, 2006) and Law Commission, Intoxication and Criminal Liability, Law Com. No.314 (Cmnd.7526, 2009), para.1.1.
- 658 R. v Lipman (Robert) [1970] 1 Q.B. 152.
- 659 Brennan v HM Advocate (1977) S.L.T. 151.
- 660 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.1.56.
- 661 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.1.61. See also R. Williams, “Voluntary intoxication—a lost cause?” (2013) 129 L.Q.R. 264, 288–289.
- 662 R. v Sheehan (Michael); R. v Moore (George Allen) [1975] 1 W.L.R. 739; see further, R. v Stubbs (Kevin John) (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 53.
- 663 R. v Pordage [1975] Crim. L.R. 575; Cole [1993] Crim. L.R. 300; R. v Hayes (Dennis Francis) [2002] EWCA Crim 1945.
- 664 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.1.15.
- 665 In the light of this there is an argument for removing the discussion of intoxication from a chapter on defences. However, given that it has long been referred to as a “defence” and pending enactment of the Law Commission’s proposals, it is to be retained in this chapter.
- 666 R. v Allen (Kevin) [1988] Crim. L.R. 698.
- 667 Law Commission, Legislating the Criminal Code: Intoxication and Criminal Liability, Law Com. No.229 (1995), para.5.42. See also, Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 paras 1.25, 2.85–2.86.
- 668 Draft Criminal Law (Intoxication) Bill 1995 cl.4.
- 669 Draft Offences Against the Person Bill 1998 cl.19.
- 670 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.3.123.
- 671 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443.
- 672 DPP v Beard [1920] A.C. 479; Att-Gen of Northern Ireland v Gallagher (Patrick) [1963] A.C. 349; Bratty v Att-Gen of Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386.
- 673 For crimes requiring specific intent, intoxication will be part of all the evidence that the jury must consider in determining whether the prosecution has established that the defendant had the necessary mens rea (earlier dicta in Beard [1920] A.C. 479 that the onus of proof is on the defendant cannot now be relied upon). If the issue of intoxication emerges as a material factor at the trial, the judge should direct the jury on it, even if the defendant does not raise the issue themselves: Bennett [1995] Crim. L.R. 877; Groark [1999] Crim. L.R. 669; R. v Hayes (Dennis Francis) [2002] EWCA

- Crim 1945. However, the key decision as to whether it is “material” rests with the judge and there is some indication that the threshold is being raised: see R. v Porceddu (Stefano) [2004] EWCA Crim 1043 and D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.354.
- 674 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.849.
- 675 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 479.
- 676 Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.38.
- 677 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 475 (Lord Elwyn-Jones).
- 678 R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034.
- 679 See further, R. Williams, “Voluntary intoxication—a lost cause?” (2013) 129 L.Q.R. 264, 267–274.
- 680 Below, paras 4-319-paras 4-320.
- 681 DPP v Beard [1920] A.C. 479; Att-Gen of Northern Ireland v Gallagher (Patrick) [1963] A.C. 349; DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443.
- 682 This was certainly a plausible interpretation of Hyam v DPP [1975] A.C. 55.
- 683 J. Sellers, “Mens Rea and the Judicial Approach to ‘Bad Excuses’ in the Criminal Law” (1978) 41 M.L.R. 245, 261.
- 684 R. v Pordage [1975] Crim. L.R. 575; DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443; R. v Bailey (John Graham) [1983] 1 W.L.R. 760; R. v Davies [1991] Crim. L.R. 469.
- 685 It is conceded that in none of these cases (above, fn.684) was the charge causing grievous bodily harm with intent to cause grievous bodily harm.
- 686 Theft Act 1968 s.1. Ruse v Read [1949] 1 K.B. 377; Lord Salmon in DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 482.
- 687 Theft Act 1968 s.8.
- 688 Theft Act 1968 s.9.
- 689 R. v Durante (Reginald William) [1972] 3 All E.R. 962.
- 690 In R. v Durante (Reginald William), above, endeavouring to obtain money on a forged instrument was accepted as a crime of specific intent; this is analogous to an attempt to commit a crime.
- 691 Public Order Act 1986 s.6(5).
- 692 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.1.
- 693 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 474–475. In R. v Kingston [1995] 2 A.C. 355 at 369 Lord Mustill stated that he was not required to decide how this rationalisation (or that of the defendant being estopped from relying on his self-induced incapacity) stood up to attack.
- 694 A. Dashwood, “Logic and the Lords in Majewski” [1977] Crim. L.R. 532, 591, 540.
- 695 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 476. See also Hughes LJ in Coley (Scott) v The Queen; McGhee (Colin) v The Queen; Harris (Darren) v The Queen [2013] EWCA Crim 223 at [82].
- 696 R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034.
- 697 In Harris (Darren) v The Queen [2013] EWCA Crim 223, the Crown argued that this should be extended to defendants who commit offences whilst affected by mental disorder brought on by past voluntary drinking even if not intoxicated at the time. Hughes LJ agreed that there while there “is scope for the argument that an illness caused by ... [D's] own fault ought as a matter of policy to be treated in the same way as drunkenness at the time of the offence ... this would represent a significant extension of DPP v Majewski" (at [59]).

- 698 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 498 (emphasis added).
- 699 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 478.
- 700 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.676 paras 1.55, 1.61.
- 701 A. P. Simester, Intoxication is never a defence"[2009] Crim. L.R. 3, 7.
- 702 Law Com. No.229 (1995), fn.667 para.3.27. e.g. in DPP v Kellett [1994] Crim. L.R. 916 the court had to decide whether the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 s.1(7) created an offence of basic or specific intent. It was held to be the former.
- 703 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.1.28.
- 704 See C. M. V. Clarkson, "Drunkenness, Constructive Manslaughter and Specific Intent" (1978) 41 M.L.R. 478.
- 705 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 499.
- 706 A common circumstance is that of "stealing" a vehicle whilst drunk. Even if the defendant was drunk enough to be acquitted of a charge of theft, he would still be liable for the offence of taking and driving away, contrary to the Theft Act 1968 s.12.
- 707 R. Gustafson and H. Kallinen, "Changes in the Psychological Defence System as a Function of Alcohol Intoxication in Men" (1989) 84 B.J. Addict. 1515.
- 708 A. Cretney and G. Davis, Punishing Violence (Oxford: Routledge, 1995), p.27.
- 709 R. v O'Grady (Patrick Gerald) [1987] Q.B. 995.
- 710 See also, R. v O'Connor [1991] Crim. L.R. 135; R. v Hatton (Jonathan) [2006] 1 Cr. App. R.16. See A. Ashworth, "Self-defence: Murder—Self-induced Intoxication" [2006] Crim. L.R. 353.
- 711 G. Dingwall, "Intoxicated Mistakes and the Need for Self-Defence" (2007) 70 M.L.R. 127, 132.
- 712 R. v Fotheringham (1989) 88 Cr. App. R. 206. cf. Magee v Crown Prosecution Service [2014] EWHC 4089 (Admin), where It was held that the defendant could not rely upon an intoxicated mistaken belief that an accident had occurred, for the purposes of the offence of failing to stop after an accident under the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.170(4).
- 713 R. v Richardson (Nigel John) and Irwin (Sean Anthony) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 392.
- 714 In Magee v Crown Prosecution Service [2014] EWHC 4089 (Admin) at [32], Elias LJ expressed the view that there was "considerable doubt whether Jaggard is still good law in the light of such cases as O'Connor ... and Hatton ...".
- 715 DPP v Majewski [1977] A.C. 443 at 475–476.
- 716 C. Wells, "Swatting the Subjectivist Bug" [1982] Crim. L.R. 209.
- 717 The Law Commission finds no justification for the anomalous result and recommends that the same rules apply to both statutory and general defences: Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 paras 3.81–3.83.
- 718 e.g. J. C. Smith [1993] Crim. L.R. 784; E. Griew, Archbold News, 28 May 1993.
- 719 J. Horder, "Pleading Involuntary Lack of Capacity" (1993) 52 C.L.J. 298. See also, R. Smith and L. Clements, "Involuntary Intoxication, the Threshold of Inhibition and the Instigation of Crime" [1995] 46 N.I.L.Q. 210. cf. T. Brooks, "Involuntary Intoxication: a new six-step procedure" (2015) J. Crim. L. 138.

- 720 See G. R. Sullivan, “Involuntary Intoxication and Beyond” [1994] Crim. L.R. 272 and W. Wilson, “Involuntary Intoxication: Excusing the Inexcusable” [1995] 1 Res Publica 25.
- 721 G. R. Sullivan, “Making Excuses” in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.131. See also V. Tadros, Criminal Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.502–506.
- 722 R. v Kingston (Barry) (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 401.
- 723 N. Lacey, “Partial Defences to Homicide” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking Homicide Law (New York: OUP, 2000), p.107 at 120.
- 724 Lacey discusses whether it could be used in situations of mercy-killing, e.g. where the extreme distress or despair edges out the normal processes of reasoning: N. Lacey, “Partial Defences to Homicide” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking Homicide Law (New York: OUP, 2000), pp.123–125.
- 725 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.4.25.
- 726 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.4.8.
- 727 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 paras 3.121–3.136.
- 728 Att-Gen of Northern Ireland v Gallagher (Patrick) [1963] A.C. 349.
- 729 Davis (1881) 14 Cox C.C. 563; DPP v Beard [1920] A.C. 479; Att-Gen of Northern Ireland v Gallagher (Patrick) [1963] A.C. 349.
- 730 R. v Burns (Dafydd John) (1974) 58 Cr. App. R. 364.
- 731 Research into the special verdicts between the years 1997 and 2001 revealed only one case where the diagnosis had been delirium tremens: K. D. Mackay, B. J. Mitchell and L. Howe, “Yet More Facts About the Insanity Defence” [2006] Crim. L.R. 399, 400.
- 732 Bromley (1992) 142 N.L.J. 116 (Winchester Crown Court).
- 733 Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s.5(2)(b)(iii), as substituted by the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991.
- 734 Salzman v United States, 405 F.2d 358 (1968).
- 735 R. v Tandy (Linda Mary) (1988) 87 Cr. App. R. 45.
- 736 See also R. v Inseal [1992] Crim. L.R. 35.
- 737 J. Tolmie, “Alcoholism and Criminal Liability” (2001) 64 M.L.R. 688, 699.
- 738 J. Tolmie, “Alcoholism and Criminal Liability” (2001) 64 M.L.R. 688, 700. The Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.52 amends s.2 so that the defence no longer requires a substantial impairment of mental responsibility but a substantial impairment of the defendant’s ability to understand the nature of their conduct, form a rational judgment or exercise self-control. See below, paras 8-137–paras 8-147.
- 739 R. v Di Duca (David Lancelot) (1959) 43 Cr. App. R. 167; R. v Fenton (Martin Charles) (1975) 119 S.J. 695; R. v Dowds (Stephen Andrew) [2012] EWCA Crim 281. See N. Wake, “Diminished Responsibility and Acute Intoxication: Raising the Bar?” (2012) 76 J. Crim. L.197. The Law Commission supports the view that acute intoxication, of itself, should not be regarded as a “recognised medical condition”: Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.512 para.4.92.
- 740 R. v Hendy (Jason Geoffrey) [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 33 confirms that R. v Dietschmann [2003] 1 A.C. 1209 merely explained the law in the earlier case of R. v Gittens (Charlesworth Alexander) [1984] Q.B. 698 and did not represent a change in the law.

- 741 R. v Dietschmann [2003] 1 A.C. 1209. In R. v Wood (Clive) [2008] EWCA Crim 1305, the court applied the reasoning of Dietschmann to a situation where the underlying condition was itself connected to the alcohol abuse. See also: R. v Lindo (Malachi Noel Michael) [2016] EWCA Crim 1940. As Ashworth has commented, the task then for the jury is “fearsomely difficult”: A. Ashworth, “Diminished Responsibility: defendant diagnosed as suffering from alcohol dependency syndrome but having sustained no brain damage as result” [2008] Crim. L.R. 976. See also R. v Stewart (James) [2009] EWCA Crim 593, in which the court endeavours to clarify the jury’s task and A. Ashworth, “R. v Stewart: manslaughter—diminished responsibility—alcohol dependency” [2009] Crim. L.R. 807.
- 742 Below paras 8-140–8-146.
- 743 For a more recent analysis favouring a separate offence, see R. Williams, “Voluntary intoxication—a lost cause?” (2013) 129 L.Q.R. 264, 274–289. cf. J. Child, “Prior Fault: Blocking Defences or Constructing Crime” in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (London: Routledge, 2014), Ch.3.
- 744 Law Com. No.177 (1989), fn.22.
- 745 Draft Offences Against the Person Bill 1998 cl.19.
- 746 See also, S. Gough, “Intoxication and Criminal Liability” (1996) 112 L.Q.R. 335; J. O’Leary, “Lament for the Intoxication ‘Defence’” [1997] 48 N.I.L.Q. 152 and S. Gough, “Surviving without Majewski” [2000] Crim. L.R. 719.
- 747 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.1.67.
- 748 I. Dennis, “Editorial: Intoxication and Criminal Liability” [2009] Crim. L.R. 133.
- 749 Law Com. No.314 (2009), fn.657 para.1.28.
- 750 Law Commission, “current project status” at www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/intoxication-and-criminal-liability-2009/ [Accessed March 2017].
- 751 J. Fionda, Devils and Angels (London: Blackwell, 2005), pp.59–69; A. Rutherford, Growing out of Crime: The New Era (Winchester: Waterside Press, 2002).
- 752 Civil law reflects this by reference to the test of “Gillick-competence”: Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] A.C. 112. See further, H. Keating, “The Responsibility of Children in the Criminal Law” (2007) 19 C.F.L.Q. 183. The Law Commission favours consideration being given to a defence of “developmental immaturity”: Law Commission Discussion Paper (2013), fn.525 paras 9.1–9.24, cf. Law Commission, Unfitness to Plead, Volume I: Report, L.Com No.364, HC 714-1 (2016), para.7.54 .
- 753 The Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.50 as amended by the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 s.16. At common law the age of criminal responsibility was seven. The Children and Young Persons Act 1969 s.4, raised the age of responsibility to 14 but this was never implemented and was repealed by the Criminal Justice Act 1991 s.72. Lord Dholakia has, on 3 occasions, introduced a private member’s Bill (The Age of Criminal Responsibility Bills 2013–2014, 2015–2016 and 2016–2017) with the aim of raising the age of criminal responsibility to 12. On the first 2 occasions, Bills did not proceed beyond initial debate in the House of Lords: see further H. Keating, “Children’s Rights and Children’s Criminal Responsibility” in A. Diduck and H. Reece, Essays in Honour of Michael Freeman (Cambridge: CUP, 2014). At the time of writing, the second reading of the Age of Criminal Responsibility Bill 2016-2017 has yet to be scheduled, see: <http://services.parliament.uk/bills/2016-17/ageofcriminalresponsibility.html>

[Accessed March 2017].

- 754 In Scotland, the age of criminal responsibility is still eight: it is conclusive presumed that no child below that age can be guilty of any offence: The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, s.41. However, as a result of legislation in 2010, no child can be prosecuted below the age of 12 although a child may be the subject of a Children's Hearing (the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, s.52). Ireland increased the age of criminal responsibility to 12 in 2006 (the Criminal Justice Act 2006 s.129, amending the Children Act 2001, s.52) although it remains at 10 for murder, manslaughter, rape or aggravated sexual assault.
- 755 C (A Minor) v DPP [1996] A.C. 1.
- 756 These views were not shared by all commentators: see, e.g. P. Cavadino, "Goodbye doli, Must we Leave You?" (1997) 9 C.F.L.Q. 165 and S. Bandalli, "Abolition of the Presumption of doli incapax and the Criminalisation of Children" (1998) 37 Howard Journal 114.
- 757 C (A Minor) v DPP [1996] A.C. 1 at 40.
- 758 N. Walker, "The End of an Old Song" (1999) 149 N.L.J. 64.
- 759 CPS v P [2007] EWHC 946 (Admin). See also D. Ormerod, "Young person: young person having low IQ" [2008] Crim. L.R. 165.
- 760 R. v JTB [2009] UKHL 20. See F. A. R. Bennion, "Mens rea and defendants below the age of discretion" [2009] Crim. L.R. 757 and A. Ashworth, "R. v T: Children and Young Persons—doli incapax—Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.34" [2009] Crim. L.R. 581. 761 Without a corresponding increase in emphasis upon the rights of natural justice such as those pertaining to the trial of adults (M. D. A. Freeman, "The Rights of Children When They Do Wrong" (1981) 21 Brit. J. Criminol. 210). 762 In 2012, 262 children aged 10 and 11 were proceeded against at court (Hansard, HL Deb, Vol.749 col.488 (8 November 2013)).
- 763 J. Fionda, Devils and Angels (London: Blackwell, 2005), pp.88–97.
- 764 Crime and Disorder Act 1998 ss.61 and 62 replaced cautioning with a statutory scheme of reprimands and warnings. This scheme was abolished by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, which has introduced a scheme of youth cautions (s.135, inserting s.66ZA into the Crime and Disorder Act 1998).
- 765 R. v Secretary of State for the Home Department Ex p. Venables; Secretary of State for the Home Department Ex p. Thompson [1997] 3 All E.R. 97. On the issue of child homicides (and their scarcity) see, Justice, Children and Homicide (London: Justice, 1996), P. Cavadino, Children Who Kill: an examination of the treatment of Juveniles (Winchester: Waterside Press, 1996) and C. McDiarmid, "Children who Murder" [2000] Crim. L.R. 547. See also the debate engendered by the trial of two boys, aged 10 and 11, who were convicted of causing grievous bodily harm with intent contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.18 to 2 other young children: The Independent 23 January 2010 and The Telegraph 23 January 2010.
- 766 A. Rutherford, "Young People and the Penal System" (1997) 147 N.L.J. 771, 772. In addition to other changes identified in this section, the Government has, e.g. introduced secure training centres for 12–14 year olds by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and has extended the range of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.53(1).
- 767 See, e.g. UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, Concluding Observations: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (49th session), (2008), paras 77–80 and H. Keating, "The Responsibility of Children in the Criminal Law" (2007) 19 C.F.L.Q. 183. 768 UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, Concluding observations on the fifth periodic report of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (CRC/C/GBR/CO/5), (2016), para.79(a). The Law Commission has expressed the view that there “may be sound policy reasons for looking afresh at the age of criminal responsibility”: Law Commission, Unfitness to Plead, Volume I: Report, L.Com No.364, HC 714-1 (2016), para.7.54 .

769 Children Act 1989 s.31(2).

770 Care orders in criminal proceedings were abolished by Children Act 1989 Sch.12(I) para.1, repealing the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 s.12AA.

771 Under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 ss.8–15, e.g. child safety orders, curfews, and parenting orders may be imposed.

772 Home Office, Tackling Youth Crime: A Consultation Paper (1997), paras 98–99.

773 Criminal Justice Act 1991 s.68, Sch.8.

774 Criminal Justice Act 1991 s.70(1). The youth court hears all cases involving young offenders except where the offence is homicide or a “grave crime” or where the child is charged jointly with an adult or there is other adult involvement in the crime (see the Powers of Criminal Courts Act (Sentencing) Act 2000 ss.90, 91).

775 Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public (Cmnd.965, 1990), para.8.16.

776 Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.44(1), as amended. This must be read subject to the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.37, which states that the principal aim of the youth justice system is to prevent offending by children and young persons.

777 Firearms Act 1968 s.17(2).

778 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.7(6).

779 Criminal Law Act 1967 s.3(1).

Chapter 5

Inchoate Offences

I. Introduction

5-001

An inchoate crime is one that is “committed by doing an act with the purpose of effecting some other offence”.¹ It is committed when the defendant takes certain steps towards the commission of a crime. There are three main inchoate offences in English law—attempt, conspiracy and encouraging or assisting crime (formerly, incitement)—and the nature of the requisite steps that need be taken varies with each. With attempt the defendant must have tried to commit the offence and have got relatively close to achieving the objective. With conspiracy at least two people must have agreed to commit a crime. With encouraging or assisting crime the defendant must have encouraged or assisted another to commit a crime.

An inchoate offence is one that is “relative to the offence-in-chief”.² It consists of actions falling short of the consummated crime. It is thus not a crime existing in the abstract. One cannot be charged with “conspiracy” or “attempt”. The indictment must be drafted with reference to the complete offence, for example, conspiracy to murder or attempt to steal.

There are many other offences in English law that might be thought of as inchoate in the sense that they penalise conduct that might be preparatory to the commission of other offences. For example, under the Terrorism Act 2006 s.5, there is an offence of preparation of terrorist acts. These offences are, however, “crimes in themselves” and are charged as such without reference to any further offence. Such offences are commonly described as endangerment offences.

Both inchoate and endangerment offences share a common element. No harm is caused, in the ordinary sense of the word; no person need be injured; no proprietary interest is damaged. A crucial question, therefore, running through the analysis of such offences will be: how can one justify the existence of these offences and how should they be punished in comparison with the complete offence?

II. Attempt

A. SHOULD THERE BE A LAW OF ATTEMPT?

5-002

Generally, criminal liability is imposed upon a blameworthy actor who causes a prohibited harm. With attempts, the blameworthiness element is clearly satisfied. The person who attempts to commit an offence clearly has the mens rea of that full offence.³ But no harm has been caused in the usual sense of the word: for instance, the victim has not died or has not lost any property. Are we justified in imposing criminal liability upon an actor who has caused no such harm?

There are two quite distinct ways of answering this question—both leading to the conclusion that criminal liability should be imposed for attempts:

1. In terms of desert, an attempter's "moral culpability is (broadly) comparable to that of a successful offender".⁴ As Ashworth puts it:

"A person who tries to cause a prohibited harm and fails is, in terms of moral culpability, not materially different from the person who tries and succeeds: the difference in outcome is determined by chance rather than choice, and a censoring institution like the criminal law should not subordinate itself to the vagaries of fortune by focusing on results rather than culpability."⁵

Further, where a crime is attempted, there is a harm, namely, a threat to security. We all have rights to bodily and proprietary security. An attempt to commit a crime represents a danger to these rights. Our right to security has been infringed. This infringement of our rights constitutes, in itself, a harm that the criminal law seeks to punish. Gross expresses the point well:

“Where there is only attempt liability, the conduct itself may usefully be regarded as a second order harm: in itself it is the sort of conduct that normally presents a threat of harm; and that, by itself, is a violation of an interest that concerns the law. The interest is one in security from harm and merely presenting a threat of harm violates that security interest.”⁶

5-003

2. In utilitarian terms, criminal liability for attempts may be justified in the absence of any harm. A person who attempts to commit a crime is dangerous and needs restraining. Such a person is also in need of rehabilitation and punishment for individual deterrence, otherwise they might try to commit the crime again being more careful the next time. There is also a final important instrumental justification here: the police should be given every encouragement to prevent crime, not simply to detect it. On this basis the police should be empowered to arrest and the Crown Prosecution Service to prosecute, for attempts to commit crimes.

Of course, whenever arguments such as these are raised, we find ourselves faced with the same central question: while utilitarian considerations might explain the purpose of punishment, are we ever justified in punishing exclusively for such reasons? Or may we only punish offenders who deserve punishment? If the latter, then we are back to our starting point that, generally, punishment is only deserved where there is a combination of blame and harm. However, this is not a cast-iron rule. With crimes of strict liability, the law is prepared to dispense with the element of blame in imposing liability. It could be that with crimes of attempt, the utilitarian arguments for punishment are so strong that we are prepared to dispense with the element of harm, and assert that punishment is justified (i.e. deserved) on the basis of the blame element alone.

Thus under either of these explanations it is possible to justify the existence of a law of attempt. The contours of such a law will vary, however, depending on which of the two views is accepted. This is because the first view focuses on attempts as threats to people's interests in security from interference. Thus, unless the attempter gets near to completing the crime (and, generally, unless the crime is possible), no interests are threatened and criminal liability is not justified. But the emphasis in the second view is on the mens rea of the attempter: if they have the requisite mens rea, they need not get near to committing the complete offence (and, generally, it will be irrelevant whether the crime is possible). The tensions between these two approaches and their impact upon the law will be explored further when we examine the actus reus of attempt.

Can there be an attempt to commit all crimes? The Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(4) provides that there can only be criminal liability for attempts to commit "any offence which, if it were completed, would be triable ... as an indictable offence". This includes offences "triable either way".⁷ So, even if the substantive offence is one that punishes only acts of preparation, there can be liability for attempt to commit such a crime. For example, the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.14 creates the offence of arranging or facilitating the commission of a child sex offence. In Robson, it was held that:

"although the acts criminalised by s.14 are acts of preparation, it is nonetheless a substantive offence and there is no reason why there should not be an attempt to commit such a substantive offence."⁸

Criminal liability for attempts to commit summary offences was excluded because there is:

"no social need to extend the punishment of attempt outside the class of serious crime. The amount of time spent considering complicated questions would be out of all proportion to the advantage accruing from allowing the law to intervene at an early stage."⁹

5-004

It is submitted that such an approach is justifiable. With attempts, criminal liability is imposed in the absence of any direct harm (other than a threat to security). When dealing with serious offences we are arguably justified in dispensing with the requirement of harm. However, when dealing with the lesser summary offences which pose less of a threat to security, we should insist on harm actually occurring as a prerequisite to any criminal liability.¹⁰ The Law Commission has proposed that there should be liability for attempts to commit a summary offence because some summary offences are relatively serious and the demarcation line between indictable and summary offences is somewhat arbitrary.¹¹ However, after consultation, this proposal has been abandoned. It would have involved an increase in the reach of the substantive criminal law and there was no broad consensus amongst consultees for such an extension of the law.¹²

Section 1(4) of the Act also excludes liability for attempted: (a) conspiracy; (b) aiding, abetting, counselling, procuring or suborning an offence;¹³ and (c) offences under s.4(1) (assisting offenders) or s.5(1) (accepting or agreeing to accept consideration for not disclosing information about an arrestable offence) of the Criminal Law Act 1967. In Goldman,¹⁴ it was held that there could be liability for attempting the (now repealed) offence of incitement. There probably can be liability for attempting the new offences of encouraging or assisting crime.¹⁵ The worrying development of double inchoate liability is considered at the end of this chapter.

It has been suggested that we do not need a general law of attempt. Each substantive offence could be defined, or redefined, so as to include attempts to commit that offence.¹⁶ For instance, the crime of handling stolen goods is defined by the Theft Act 1968 s.22 in the following terms:

“(1) A person handles stolen goods if ... he receives the goods, or ... undertakes or assists in their retention, removal, disposal or realisation ..., or if he arranges to do so.” (Emphasis added)

5-005

Arranging to receive stolen goods is part of the substantive offence. Without this provision many such arrangements would have constituted attempts to commit the offence. If all offences were defined in a comparable manner, a general law of attempt would be unnecessary. Such an approach, however, poses immense problems. First, is it realistic to expect that all criminal offences could be defined (and all existing offences redefined) so as to include attempts within their definition? Secondly, and most importantly, if, as will be suggested in the next section, attempts are to be regarded as less serious than completed offences, we surely do not wish to collapse the distinction between the two. One way of avoiding this would be to increase the number of separate offences of ulterior intent, such as committing an offence with intent to commit a sexual offence.¹⁷ This would have the advantage of fair labelling in the sense that it accurately reflected what the defendant did,¹⁸ but it would lead to a plethora of offences. Ulterior intent crimes have their place but a general law of attempt, separate from the complete crime, is still needed for reasons of fair labelling—it is an attempt rather than the complete offence—and punishment.¹⁹

B. PUNISHMENT OF ATTEMPTS

CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS ACT 1981

S.4(1):

5-006

“A person guilty ... of attempting to commit an offence shall—

- (a) if the offence attempted is murder or any other offence the sentence for which is fixed by law, be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life; and
- (b) if the offence attempted is indictable but does not fall within paragraph (a) above, be liable on conviction on indictment to any penalty to which he would have been liable on conviction on indictment of that offence; and
- (c) if the offence attempted is triable either way, be liable on summary conviction to any penalty to which he would have been liable on summary conviction of that offence.”

CALIFORNIA PENAL CODE S.664:

“Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in its perpetration shall be punished, where no provision is made by law for the punishment of those attempts, as follows:

- (a) If the crime attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, the person guilty of such attempt shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for one-half the term of imprisonment prescribed upon a conviction of the offense so attempted. However, ... if the crime attempted is any other one in which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death, the person guilty of the attempt shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for five, seven or nine years ...
- (b) If the crime attempted is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail, the person guilty of the attempt shall be punished by imprisonment in a county jail for a term not exceeding one-half the term of imprisonment prescribed upon a conviction of the offense attempted.
- (c) If the offense so attempted is punishable by a fine, the offender convicted of that attempt shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one-half the largest fine which may be imposed upon a conviction of the offense attempted.”

The completed crime of theft carries a maximum sentence of seven years' imprisonment in England and Wales and attempted theft can similarly be punished, on conviction on indictment, up to this maximum of seven years' imprisonment. But in California, if theft there carried a presumptive penalty of seven years' imprisonment in the state prison, attempted theft would carry a presumptive penalty of three-and-a-half years' imprisonment. This divergence of approach raises the fundamental question: should attempts be punished to the same, or to a lesser, extent as the completed crime? On what basis can either of these approaches be rationalised?

JAMES BRADY, “PUNISHING ATTEMPTS” (1980) 63 THE MONIST
246, 247–250:

5–009

“2. Equal harm

According to Becker (‘Criminal Attempt and the Law of Crimes’, Philosophy and Public Affairs, Vol.3 (Spring, 1974): pp.262–294), we need to distinguish between the private harm done to the individual, which, of course, is different in the case of attempts and completions, and the ‘social’ harm to which the criminal law is mainly addressed. The harm which is the concern of the criminal law is that which disrupts social stability and arouses self-defensive reactions within persons in the society. One’s assurance that one will not be interfered with is perceived to be threatened equally by an attempt on others and by completed crimes. Thus, in general, attempts and completed crimes are equal in what Becker calls their ‘social volatility’; the criminal harm is the same ...

However ... his claim ... is unfounded. The fear, resentment, and apprehension occasioned when harm, in its ordinary sense, occurs does appear to be different than when, even by accident, no harm occurs. These attitudes seem to be what Becker has in mind when he talks of the ‘social volatility’ of conduct. Therefore, on Becker’s own theory we should, contra his position, treat attempts differently ...

3. Equal dangerousness

A more plausible claim than the argument that attempts and the completed crime do not differ in the harm done, is the claim that, in general, attempts pose no less danger to the legally protected interest than does the completed crime. If the general purpose in punishing is to prevent harm, the law should identify, at the earliest feasible moment, the dangerous individual who is likely to cause harm. In such a theory, conduct might be required before such intervention is justifiable, but the primary function of the conduct requirement would be evidentiary, serving as proof of the intent which is an index to the dangerousness of the offender.

If the dangerousness of the offender is the key element in grading offenses, then it follows that two equally dangerous offenders should be treated the same. If there is no difference in dangerousness between the successful offender and the person who fails to cause harm because he is prevented by some external circumstance, the law should treat them equally. Being equally dangerous, they are equally in need of treatment and reform.

There is, of course, the chance that the person who attempts a crime might be deterred from completing it if he were to receive a more severe penalty for the successful crime than if the penalty for attempts and the completed crime are the same.²⁰ If he is already liable to the full penalty for the attempt, then he has no motive to desist from completing the crime. But this does not provide an argument, under an equal dangerousness theory, for punishing attempts, in general, less than the completed crime. To take care of these special and probably rare cases, it would seem to be better to provide, as the Model Penal Code does, an affirmative defense of abandonment or, renunciation of purpose. Such a defense is a defense to the crime of attempt.²¹ If the defendant is successful in proving the defense, he receives no punishment at all. Thus, the offender has an even greater motive for not carrying out his purpose than if the law merely provided an across-the-board reduction in punishment for attempts.

[But if this] equal dangerousness argument were to be followed consistently, crimes of unequal culpability should also be treated the same. The focus of a dangerousness approach is on the characteristics of a person which identify him as presenting a threat of harm to society. Negligent or reckless offenders may pose as much of a continuing threat of harm and may require as much treatment and reform to 'neutralize' their dangerousness as the intentional offender. Thus, if we accept the equal dangerousness rationale for punishing attempts, it would appear that we should also accept the premise that offenses should not be ranked according to culpability elements such as intention, recklessness, and negligence. We could, of course, simply accept this conclusion that intentional offenses should be classified as being of the same criminal 'degree' as reckless or negligent offenses where there is reason to believe that there is no difference in the dangerousness of the offender. But this would entail a radical reform of the criminal law; indeed, to follow a dangerous rationale consistently would be, in effect, to abolish the system of control now known as the criminal law and substitute a system of treatment and prevention.

4. Equal culpability

... [This] assumes that the sole determining factor in assessing the degree of blame in attempts is the person's intention. If the offender has done everything in his power to carry out his intention to cause harm and fails through some fortuity, then he should be considered as culpable as if he had succeeded. The first version holds, moreover, that cases of attempts other than the extreme case should also be ranked equally with the extreme case and with the completed offense. After all, what difference in intent is discernible between a person who is apprehended before he has taken the last step towards the commission of the offense, if we are convinced that he had the intention or the 'fixed' intention to commit the offense, and one who has taken that step in furtherance of his intent? On this view, how can there be any difference in culpability between the person apprehended while 'lying in wait', or at an even earlier stage of preparation, and the person who shoots but misses? Under this version, punishment for attempts should be the same whenever we are satisfied that intent or 'fixed' intent is present, the conduct requirement serving as evidence of that intent."

ANDREW ASHWORTH, "BELIEF, INTENT AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY" IN
J. EEKELAAR AND J. BELL (EDS),
OXFORD ESSAYS IN JURISPRUDENCE
(1987), PP.16-17:

"Is A, who shoots at X intending to kill him but misses because X unexpectedly moves, any less culpable than B, who shoots at Y intending to kill him and does so? An external description of both sets of events would probably not suggest that they have 'done' the same thing, whereas an account which paid more attention to the actor's point of view and to matters which lay within the actor's control would suggest that they both intended and tried, to the same extent, to do the same thing. The argument here is that, because of the element of uncertainty in the outcome of things which we try to do, it would be wrong for assessments of culpability to depend on the occurrence or non-occurrence of the intended consequences.

‘Success or failure ... makes no difference at all to [an agent’s] moral status in relation to his original act. His original act, strictly considered, was simply his trying and that is what moral assessment must concern itself with’ (Winch, Ethics and Action, 1972, p.139).

... Moral blame and criminal liability should be based so far as possible on choice and control, on the trying and not on what actually happened thereafter.

What are the reasons for wishing to reduce the influence of chance upon criminal liability? It cannot be doubted that luck plays a considerable part in everyday events. Actual results also play a considerable part in judgments of others, and tend to dominate assessments in such fields as business, sport, and education. Those who try hard but are unsuccessful often receive less recognition than those who achieve goals (no matter how little effort they put into it). But these are not moral assessments of the individuals or their characters. If one turns to moral and social judgments, it is doubtful whether outcomes should be proper criteria. It may be desirable overall to have fewer bad outcomes and more good outcomes in society, but that does not lead to the conclusion that moral praise and blame should be allocated solely according to result. Indeed, a bad outcome stemming from a good intent may be a better predictor of good outcomes than a good outcome born of a bad intent. From time to time we may praise someone for producing a good result, even though it was not what he was trying to do, but this is more a reflection of our pleasure at the outcome than an assessment of his conduct and character. If we turn to blaming, is it not unacceptable to blame people for causing results irrespective of whether they were caused intentionally, negligently, or purely accidentally? Blaming is a moral activity which is surely only appropriate where the individual had some choice or control over the matter. For this reason the criminal law should seek to minimize the effect of luck upon the incidence and scale of criminal liability.”

5-012

A relatively common view is that punishment for attempts should depend upon the dangerousness of the defendant’s actions; this is measured by determining how imminent the threatened harm is and by examining the reason for failure.

SIR RUPERT CROSS AND ANDREW
ASHWORTH: THE ENGLISH
SENTENCING SYSTEM, 3RD EDN
(1981), PP.154–155:

5–013

“[T]he question whether an attempt should be punished less severely than the completed crime is largely dependent on the reason why the attempt failed. If it failed because the attempter voluntarily abandoned the attempt, he should be punished less because he is less wicked or needs less deterring. If it failed because of his incompetence, either in executing his design clumsily or in choosing a method which, owing to his failure to appreciate the true facts, proved to be impossible, he may be punished less on the ground that he represents less of a social danger than successful criminals. If it failed because of someone’s intervention before he had done all he set out to do, he may be treated more leniently than the successful criminal: his wickedness may be less, since (as Blackstone said) it takes more wickedness to carry through a plan than to conceive it, and it may be desirable (on a utilitarian view) to mark each stage of an attempt by a portion of punishment in order to deter the attempter from pursuing his criminal design to its conclusion. There remain difficulties, however, with cases ... where the attempter has done all the acts he intended and has failed to produce the planned result ... On principle ... there is no distinction in point of either wickedness or social danger between the successful criminal and the unsuccessful attempter in this last class. Chance may well be the only explanation of why one attempt succeeded and the other failed, and a sound sentencing policy should take little notice of a factor which lies outside the offender’s control. He should be judged on the basis of what he intended to do, believed he was doing or knowingly risked.”

5–014

Gross pushes the argument to its logical conclusion by asserting:

“In some cases, then, attempt liability will be as extensive as liability for the completed crime, and may even be greater, for sometimes, even though harm does not occur, the conduct of the accused was more dangerous than in a case in which harm does occur. In other cases of attempt the conduct is less dangerous and so liability is less extensive.”²²

It is our submission that it can never be justifiable to impose greater punishment for an attempt than for the completed crime. Indeed, it is our submission that attempts should always be punished to a lesser extent than the completed crime. This is because the paradigm of criminal liability is the combination of blame and harm and the absence of one of these should be reflected by, at least, less punishment. In relation to the law of attempt there is no harm (or, at most, there is only a second-order harm) so punishment should be lower than for the completed crime.²³ The reasons for this view need to be explored. Why should the causing of harm be regarded as so significant?

MICHAEL DAVIS, “WHY ATTEMPTS DESERVE LESS PUNISHMENT THAN COMPLETE CRIMES” 5 LAW & PHIL.
(1986) 1, 28–29:

5–015

“Someone who attempts a crime but fails to do the harm characteristic of success still (ordinarily) risks doing that harm. He deserves punishment for risking that harm because even risking such harm is an advantage the law-abiding do not take. He deserves less punishment for the attempt than he would for the complete crime because being able to risk doing harm is not as great an advantage as being able to do it. To attempt murder is, for example, not worth as much as to succeed. The successful murderer has the advantage of having done what he set out to do. The would-be murderer whose attempt failed has only had the chance to do what he set out to do. The difference is substantial.”

J.C. SMITH, “THE ELEMENT OF CHANCE IN CRIMINAL LIABILITY”

“Ought we then to get rid of the element of harm and base liability purely on fault? ...

Even the most ardent advocate for the re-introduction of capital punishment did not—so far as I know—want it for attempted murder as well as murder. Yet the only difference between the attempt and the full offence is that in the latter the harm which it is the object of the law to prevent is caused, in the former it is not; but it seems to be generally accepted that this justifies a difference in the gravity of the offence and the punishment which may be imposed ...

[This] suggests that great significance is still attached to the harm done, as distinct from the harm intended or foreseen. Perhaps the significance of the harm done derives from our emotional reaction to the acts of others. If one of my small boys, not looking what he is doing, throws a stone which just misses the dining room window, I shall be very cross with him; but if the stone breaks the dining room window, I shall be absolutely furious. His behaviour is just as bad and just as dangerous in the one case as in the other; but my indignation is much greater in the case where he has caused the harm than in that where he has not ...

Stephen J. thought ... there was nothing irrational in basing liability on the harm done:

‘If two persons are guilty of the very same act of negligence, and one of them causes thereby a railway accident, involving the death and mutilation of many persons, whereas the other does no injury to anyone, it seems to me that it would be rather pedantic than rational to say that each had committed the same offence, and should be subjected to the same punishment. Both certainly deserve punishment, but it gratifies a natural public feeling to choose out for punishment the one who actually has caused great harm, and the effect in the way of preventing a repetition of the offence is much the same as if both were punished’.

H. L. A. HART, PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY (ESSAYS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW) (1968), P.131:

5-017

“It is pointed out that in some cases the successful completion of a crime may be a source of gratification, and, in the case of theft, of actual gain, and in such cases to punish the successful criminal more severely may be one way of depriving him of these illicit satisfactions which the unsuccessful have never had ...

My own belief is that this form of retributive theory appeals to something with deeper instinctive roots than the last mentioned principle. Certainly the resentment felt by a victim actually injured is normally much greater than that felt by the intended victim who has escaped harm because an attempted crime has failed.”

JAMES BRADY, “PUNISHING
ATTEMPTS” (1980) 63 THE MONIST
246, 255:

5-018

“[F]eelings of guilt and remorse are significantly different in the case where one has actually caused harm than in the case where, acting with the same intent, one has not been the cause of harm. Feelings of guilt and remorse do vary in degree when one has, for example, through reckless driving caused a death and where one has acted with equal recklessness but there has been no victim. In this case, as with the unsuccessful attempt, there is a kind of ‘space’ in which the person is allowed to express relief that he has not been the cause of harm.”

C. M. V. CLARKSON, “AGGRAVATED
ENDANGERMENT OFFENCES” (2007)
60 CURRENT LEGAL PROBLEMS 278, 282-283:

5-019

“If the sole focus were to be on the culpability/wrongdoing of the defendant, one could abolish all result crimes such as murder. People who try to kill should be punished for their endeavours irrespective of whether they succeed. The crime of attempted murder could cover all such cases. The result could be dismissed as irrelevant and the possible product of luck. Such an approach would be totally inconsistent with the whole structure of the criminal law. The criminal law has a communicative function: it communicates what conduct is unacceptably wrong. This communication is both to the public ... and to the defendant and the victim explaining the nature of the wrong. It is a formal way of saying: “look what you did” ... What should be communicated to a successful criminal is not merely that she culpably tried to do some wrongful harm, but that she actually did it ... what she must repent and be grieved by is the harm she has done’ (R. A. Duff, Criminal Attempts (1996), p.352).”

R. A. DUFF, CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS
(1996), PP.351–352, 354:

5–020

“Our moral responses to an agent and her action, including such responses as blame or reproach, are commonly conditioned partly by her action’s actual outcome; rather than seeing this as a regrettably irrational infection of our moral judgments of culpability by our natural concerns for actual outcomes, we should recognise it as an appropriate structuring of the moral responses of people living a human social life ... [This involves] portraying moral blame as a social, communicative response to another’s wrongdoing: an attempt to communicate to him, to persuade him to accept, an adequate moral understanding of the implications of what he has done ... On a communicative conception of punishment, the punishment which an offender receives should itself aim to communicate to her an appropriate understanding of the wrong that she did: to give forceful and symbolic expression to the message which her conviction itself aimed to communicate ... One who tried but failed to do some criminal harm should ... understand and repent the wrong that she did; if she attempted to commit a serious crime, that wrong was itself serious. Our understanding of her wrongdoing is, however, conditioned by its failure: we are relieved that she has failed.

If she is to come to an adequate moral understanding of what she has done, she must therefore come to share that relief ...

If the law ignored actual outcomes at the stage of conviction or of sentencing, it would in effect be saying that it does not matter whether the defendant actually caused harm, actually killed his victim, or actually damaged another's property."²⁴

5-021

Before ending this section it is perhaps worth pausing to consider briefly the concept of "blame" as applied in the field of attempts, and to question the assumption that the blameworthiness of those who attempt and those who succeed is necessarily the same. It is a prerequisite of criminal liability for attempts that the attempter intends to commit the criminal offence. But while many attempters appear for legal purposes to possess this necessary intention, closer examination reveals that this might not necessarily be so. As Menninger has written: "[T]he failure to achieve success ... is apt to express accurately the mathematical resultant of component wishes—conscious and unconscious—acting as vectors".²⁵ And Freud wrote that:

"Errors ... are not accidents; they are serious mental acts; they have their meaning; they arise through the concurrence—perhaps better, the mutual interference—of two different intentions."²⁶

STEPHEN J. SCHULHOFER, "HARM AND PUNISHMENT: A CRITIQUE OF EMPHASIS ON THE RESULTS OF CONDUCT IN THE CRIMINAL LAW"
(1974) 122 UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA L. REV. 1497, 1590:

5-022

"A slightly different dimension is added by psychological theories concerning the interplay between conscious and unconscious intentions. Freud argued that divergence between an actor's conscious purpose and the results he actually achieves will often be explained by an unconscious intention to further a different purpose. A defendant who attempted to shoot his victim but missed may, of course, have failed because of his inherent lack of skill or because the victim suddenly moved away. But he also may have failed because an unconscious desire not to kill interfered with his conscious purpose, causing him to aim poorly and miss a shot that would have given him no difficulty under other circumstances. And even the first group of explanations is not inconsistent with the possibility that the defendant's intention was ambivalent. If the defendant had always been a poor shot, his decision not to choose a weapon better suited to his talents may have been influenced by an unconscious intention that the plan fail; similarly, the victim may be lucky enough to move out of the way only because the defendant waited unnecessarily long before firing. Even if success is prevented only by police intervention at the last moment, it cannot always be said that the defendant's intention was unequivocal; he may have purposely, though unconsciously, chosen to execute his plan at a time when apprehension was especially likely."²⁷

5-023

However, while many attempts might have failed as a result of the attempter exercising internal control at the unconscious level (and thus arguably deserving less punishment), it is clear that in some cases the attempt only fails as a result of factors lying outside the attempter's control, namely, chance. Even in that respect it has already been argued that attempts ought on principle to be punished to a lesser extent than the completed crime.

It is difficult to establish sentencing levels for attempts because the statistics only cover attempted murder. In 2000, the average sentence for attempted murder was 9.7 years' imprisonment.²⁸ The Criminal Justice Act 2003 introduced "starting points" or minimum sentences to be served by all persons convicted of murder. In Ford,²⁹ the Court of Appeal broadly endorsed an approach that an attempted murderer should receive a sentence that would result in a term of about one-half of the minimum sentence for the complete crime being served. Sentencing guidelines for attempted murder were issued by the Sentencing Guidelines Council in 2009.³⁰ These guidelines reflect the fact that for attempted murder there must be an intention to kill (whereas for murder an intention to cause grievous bodily harm will suffice) and so, even when no injury has been caused, “an offence of attempted murder will be extremely serious”. The starting points are heavily influenced by whether serious physical or psychological harm is caused. For the worst cases, that would have attracted a starting point of either a whole life order or 30 years’ custody had the victim died, the starting point for attempted murder ranges from 15 years’ custody (where there is little or no physical or psychological harm) to 30 years’ custody (where there is serious and long-lasting physical or psychological harm). Bearing in mind that the minimum terms set for murder must be served in full, while for determinate sentences (such as those for attempt) the defendant will be released on licence after serving one-half of the set term, the net result is that for attempted murders the offender will generally serve less than half the sentence that would have been served had the victim died.

In most of these, and other, attempt cases it ought to be borne in mind that the sentence is reflecting not just the “pure attempt” but the fact that there has usually been very serious injury caused (in attempted murder cases) or severe fear and degradation (in attempted rape cases). Further, in some attempted theft cases it seems that the court is sentencing defendants as “professional pickpockets”. The fact that there is only evidence to support a charge of attempt is effectively ignored.³¹ One of the few reported cases where there was no other injury, fear or distress (at least at the time of the crime) is Cooper where the defendant attempted to rape a drunk girl who was largely unaware of what was happening. A sentence of 18 months’ youth custody was imposed on appeal.³² Had the crime been completed the defendant would have received a sentence more in the region of the three years’ youth custody originally imposed.

C. THE LAW

1. Actus reus

(i) Act must be more than merely preparatory

CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS ACT 1981

S.1(1):

5-024

“If, with intent to commit an offence to which this section applies, a person does an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence, he is guilty of attempting to commit the offence.”

5-025

This is similar to the common law rule as laid down by Baron Parke in Eagleton that:

“[S]ome act is required ... Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence are not to be considered as attempts to commit it; but acts immediately connected with it are.”³³

Suppose a defendant wakes up one morning and decides to kill his wife by poisoning her. He walks to a shop where he purchases some rat poison. He returns home and adds the poison to the whisky in his whisky decanter. That evening he offers his wife a drink of whisky; she accepts. He pours the poisoned whisky into a glass and hands it to her. She starts drinking the whisky. At what point in this chain of actions could he be said to have done an act which was “more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence”? When he handed her the whisky? When he put the poison in the decanter? When he purchased the poison?

Questions such as these cannot be answered in a theoretical vacuum; they, and all the contours of the law of attempt, can only be determined by reference to the underlying justification (and policy) of the law of attempt. Thus, if attempts are viewed as being threats to people’s interests in security from interference (the “second order harm” discussed earlier), one ought to insist on the attempter getting near to completing the crime. Until he has got near to committing the complete crime, the wife's interests in security from interference are not threatened. On the other hand, if the law of attempt is justified on the utilitarian bases canvassed above, then the emphasis is on the mens rea of the attempter and liability can be imposed at a much earlier stage in the chain of actions. Of course, such an approach still does not tell us exactly when the husband has done enough to threaten the wife's interests; or when his mens rea is sufficiently manifest to justify the imposition of criminal liability for attempt, but adoption of one or other of these views does provide an important indication of how to try to answer the question.

Fletcher and Duff suggest another approach, not dissimilar in its effect.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.138–139:

5–026

“The critical question ... is the elementary issue whether the act of attempting is a distinct and discernible element of the crime of attempting. To say that the act is a distinct element is to require that the act conform to objective criteria defined in advance. The act must evidence attributes subject to determination independently of the actor's intent. In short, there must be features of the attempt as palpable as the death of the victim in homicide or a trespassory taking in larceny. We shall refer to the set of arguments favoring this approach as the ‘objectivist’ theory of attempts. Though the term ‘objective’ may have a different connotation in some contexts, we shall use the term to mean a legal standard for assessing conduct that does not presuppose a prior determination of the actor's intent.

The opposing school is appropriately called ‘subjectivist’, for it dispenses with the objective criteria of attempting. The act of execution is important so far as it verifies the firmness of the intent. No act of specific contours is necessary to constitute the attempt, for any act will suffice to demonstrate the actor's commitment to carry out his criminal plan.

As we delve more deeply into objectivist and subjectivist theories of liability for criminal attempts, we shall discover that objectivists tend to favor a minimalist approach, subjectivists, a maximalist approach to liability ... [T]his means that objectivists tend to draw the line of liability as close as possible to consummation of the offense and tend, further, to be sympathetic to claims of impossibility as a bar to liability. This combination of views generates a minimalist approach to liability. Subjectivists, in contrast, tend to push back the threshold of attempting and reject the relevance of impossibility—a stance that yields a maximalist net of liability. In turning to a more detailed study of objectivist and subjectivist theories, we should keep in mind that the watershed between them is the question whether the act of attempting is a distinct element of liability.”

5-027

Thus there are two competing theories underlying the law of attempt. First, the “objectivist” theory requires the defendant to have come sufficiently close to committing the crime for their conduct to generate apprehension and thus amount to a “second order harm”. Duff supports this objectivist approach because, by insisting that conduct comes close to the actual commission of the offence, one is affording intending criminals an opportunity to abandon their criminal enterprise. By doing this, even if we think it unlikely they will desist, we are according the person respect as a responsible agent “who is in principle susceptible to rational persuasion”.³⁴ Secondly, there is the “subjectivist” theory which stresses the mental element of the defendant: if they have mens rea they are dangerous and need restraining. Liability can accordingly be imposed at a much earlier stage (which will facilitate the task of the police and other law enforcement agencies). The only conduct required would be some action that would be corroborative of this intention. The tensions between these two theories is demonstrated by a consideration of the various “tests” employed by English law in its effort to demarcate how much action is required for the actus reus of attempt.

(a) The common law

5-028

Until 1981 the common law flirted with various tests. One of these was the “equivocality test” under which a defendant had to take sufficient steps towards the crime for their actions clearly and unequivocally to indicate that their purpose was to commit the crime.³⁵ This was clearly in accord with the “second order harm” view and the objectivist theory. The defendant had to get sufficiently close to committing the offence for their actions to be “manifestly criminal ... [and] unnerving to the community”.³⁶ This test was eventually abandoned because a defendant could be on the point of committing a crime (for example, about to break into a car) but the actions could still be equivocal (for example, were they going to steal the car or vandalise it?).

An alternative test, suggested by the Law Commission in 1973, was the “substantial step test” where the focus was on whether the defendant had taken a substantial step towards the crime, for example, reconnoitring the place contemplated for a burglary.³⁷ This test, consistent with the subjectivist theory of attempts because the focus was on the action only having to be sufficient to provide evidence of the defendant’s intention, was never adopted as it would have amounted to casting the net of liability far too wide in the sequence of actions.³⁸

Another test was Stephen’s “series of acts” test under which it was necessary to determine whether the defendant had committed an act which was one of a series of acts that would lead to the crime if it were not interrupted. This test was also of little utility: it was too imprecise and could have led to the imposition of liability at an intolerably early state.

The test finally adopted by the common law³⁹ was the “proximity test”. The defendant’s actions had to be proximate to the completed offence in the sense of being “immediately and not merely remotely, connected”⁴⁰ with the completed offence. In Robinson a jeweller, who had insured his stock against burglary, hid the jewellery, tied himself up, called for help and represented to the police that his premises had been burgled. His object was to obtain policy money from his insurance company. It was held that his actions were still merely preparatory; they were “only remotely connected with the commission of the full offence, and not immediately connected with it”.⁴¹ He would have needed to have communicated with the insurance company before an attempt could be committed. In Stonehouse, Lord Diplock stated that in order to have passed the threshold of proximity, the defendant must have “crossed the Rubicon and burnt his boats”.⁴² All the cases confirming this test emphasised that the defendant had to get very close to committing the offence; in some cases such as Robinson it appeared that the defendant would only be liable if he had committed the last act dependent upon himself—although from other cases it is clear that the proximity test did not demand as a matter of law that the defendant go so far.⁴³ This proximity test was very much in tune with Fletcher’s objectivist theory of attempts: the emphasis was on the objective acts and not on the intentions of the defendant.

(b) Criminal Attempts Act 1981

5-029

Section 1(1) states that the defendant must do “an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence”. Is this different in any way from the proximity test developed by the common law?

One view is that no real change in the law was intended by the enactment of s.1(1). The Government, in the course of the parliamentary proceedings, took the view that the law on this matter was not being altered.⁴⁴ The Law Commission, whose Report led to the legislation, felt that it was “undesirable to recommend anything more complex than a rationalisation of the present law”.⁴⁵ Under Eagleton, the common law always distinguished between preparatory and non-preparatory acts and non-preparatory acts were simply called “proximate” acts.

However, the Law Commission at the same time did recommend abandoning the phrase “proximate” as its literal meaning was “nearest, next before or after ... [and] thus would clearly be capable of being interpreted to exclude all but the ‘final act’”.⁴⁶ The Law Commission disapproved of such an approach and felt that the new terminology could open the door to conviction in cases such as Robinson. If the Act had not altered the law, reference to the common law cases would presumably be permissible. However, the leading cases since the Act have stressed that discussion of the old cases is impermissible, suggesting that a new test for the actus reus of attempts is being evolved. Further, it can be argued that a change in the law has been brought about by the insertion of the word “merely”. Unlike the position at common law, not all preparatory acts are excluded; only merely preparatory acts do not suffice.⁴⁷ Indeed, in *Tosti*⁴⁸ it was stated that the defendants “had committed acts which were preparatory, but not merely so”.

Before examining the cases, it is important to stress that the ultimate decision here is one for the jury. The Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.4(3) provides:

“Where ... there is evidence sufficient in law to support a finding that he did an act falling within [section 1(1)] ..., the question whether or not his act fell within that subsection is a question of fact.”

5-030

So the judge, using the law about to be outlined, must decide whether there is sufficient evidence that the defendant could come within the law of attempt, and then, if so, it must be left to the jury to decide whether the acts did or did not come within the definition of the actus reus provided in s.1(1). Not only will this lead to inconsistency of jury verdicts, with one jury deciding that a defendant like Robinson did commit the actus reus of attempt while another jury decides that he did not, but also it involves the jury having to decide what is essentially a matter of law. Whether certain acts satisfy certain legislative criteria (“more than merely preparatory”) so as to amount in law to a crime, is a question of law which ought to be left to the judges to develop.⁴⁹ The Law Commission in 2007 recommended that s.4(3) be repealed and that the test become a legal one for the judge to determine.⁵⁰ This proposal was not supported strongly enough and the Law Commission has now abandoned it.⁵¹

The following is the leading case which has been cited in most subsequent decisions.

R. V GULLEFER (1990) 91 CR. APP. R.
356 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION):

During a race at a greyhound racing stadium the appellant climbed on to the track in front of the dogs and attempted to distract them by waving his arms. His efforts were only marginally successful and the stewards decided it was unnecessary to declare “no race”. The appellant told the police he had attempted to stop the race because the dog on which he had staked £18 was losing. He had hoped for a no-race declaration and the recovery of his stake. He was convicted of attempted theft and appealed on the ground that his acts were not “sufficiently proximate to the completed offence of theft to be capable of comprising an attempt to commit theft”.

LANE LCJ:

“The first task of the court is to apply the words of the Act of 1981 to the facts of the case. Was the appellant still in the stage of preparation to commit the substantive offence, or was there a basis of fact which would entitle the jury to say that he had embarked on the theft itself? Might it properly be said that when he jumped on to the track he was trying to steal £18 from the bookmaker?

Our view is that it could not properly be said that at that stage he was in the process of committing theft. What he was doing was jumping on to the track in an effort to distract the dogs, which in its turn, he hoped would have the effect of forcing the stewards to declare ‘no race’, which would in turn give him the opportunity to go back to the bookmaker and demand the £18 he had staked. In our view there was insufficient evidence for it to be said that he had, when he jumped on to the track, gone beyond mere preparation ...

[His Lordship considered the common law proximity test and Stephen’s “series of acts” test.]

It seems to us that the words of the Act of 1981 seek to steer a midway course. They do not provide, as they might have done, that the Eagleton test is to be followed, or that, as Lord Diplock suggested, the defendant must have reached a point from which it was impossible for him to retreat before the actus reus of an attempt is proved. On the other hand the words give perhaps as clear a guidance as is possible in the circumstances on the point of time at which Stephen’s “series of acts” begin. It begins when the merely preparatory acts come to an end and the defendant embarks upon the crime proper. When that is will depend of course upon the facts in any particular case.”

Appeal allowed

5-032

Lord Lane clearly thought he was pushing back the point at which liability could be imposed. In adopting his “midway course” he rejected the “Rubicon test”. But what else was there left for the defendant to do? Assuming his efforts had been successful and the race declared void, all that remained for him to do was to claim his refund which would have been his last act, comparable to Robinson filing a claim with his insurance company. Accordingly, the approach adopted in Gullefer looks indistinguishable from that adopted in the much-criticised common law decision of Robinson.

The test laid down in Gullefer is that the defendant must have “embarked on the crime proper”. Defendants must have started committing the crime. They must be “on the job”.⁵² Such a test works well when applied to some cases. In Boyle and Boyle,⁵³ the defendants had broken down a door in their effort to commit burglary. Burglary requires an entry as a trespasser. To break down a door means that you have embarked on the process of securing entry to the building and can clearly amount to embarking on committing the crime. This approach was extended in *Tosti*⁵⁴ where it was held that a defendant who was merely examining a padlock (having hidden oxyacetylene equipment behind a hedge) was liable for attempted burglary. Similarly, in Toothill,⁵⁵ it was held that a defendant who knocked at the proposed victim’s door was in the “executory stage of his plan” and liable for attempted burglary. In Litholetovs,⁵⁶ the defendant was liable for attempted arson when he poured petrol over the door of a house—even though he had not produced or lit the cigarette lighter that he had on him.

In other cases, the application of the test of embarking on the crime proper has not been so straightforward. In Rowley,⁵⁷ the defendant left notes in public places offering money and presents to boys. These notes, which were not indecent in themselves and did not contain any propositions, were designed to lure boys for immoral purposes. On appeal, he was found not liable for attempted incitement of a child under the age of 14 years to commit an act of gross indecency. His actions were merely preparatory as they “went no further than to seek to engineer a preliminary meeting”. He was “at most preparing the ground for an attempt”. It was stated that an attempted incitement would require, for example, a posted letter inviting a boy to commit gross indecency which did not reach the boy.⁵⁸

The problem with this decision is that had he met the boys and said anything suggestive, he would have committed the full offence of incitement. The example of the non-arriving letter is a classic instance of a defendant having performed the last act there was for him to do. Again, it appears that the 1981 Act has not effected any change to the law.

R. V JONES (1990) 91 CR. APP. R. 351
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-033

The appellant, a married man, had an affair with a woman who then started a relationship with another man, Foreman. When she refused to resume their association the appellant applied for a shotgun certificate and three days later bought some guns. He shortened the barrel of one of them and test fired it twice. Three days later he told his wife he was going to Spain to work on their chalet and left home dressed normally for work. He then changed into a disguise of overalls and a crash helmet with the visor down. He waited outside a school where Foreman dropped his daughter off and then jumped into the rear seat and asked Foreman to drive on. They drove to a grass verge where the appellant took the loaded sawn-off shotgun from a bag and pointed it at Foreman at a range of some 10–12 inches and said: “You are not going to like this”. The safety catch of the shotgun was in the on position. Foreman grabbed the end of the gun and after a struggle managed to throw it out of the window and escape. The appellant was convicted of attempted murder and appealed on the ground that he had not yet committed the actus reus of this offence.

TAYLOR LJ:

“[At his trial the defence had argued] that since the appellant would have had to perform at least three more acts before the full offence could have been completed, i.e. remove the safety catch, put his finger on the trigger and pull it, the evidence was insufficient to support the charge ...

The 1981 Act is a codifying statute. It amends and sets out completely the law relating to attempts and conspiracies. In those circumstances the correct approach is to look first at the natural meaning of the statutory words, not to turn back to earlier case law and seek to fit some previous test to the words of the section ... [He then cited Gullefer with approval.] We respectfully adopt those words. We do not accept ... [the] contention that section 1(1) of the 1981 Act in effect embodies the ‘last act’ test derived from Eagleton

[T]he 1981 Act followed a report from the Law Commission [No. 102] [which] states:

‘... the definition must cover those instances where a person has to take some further step to complete the crime, assuming that there is evidence of the necessary mental element on his part to commit it; for example, when the defendant has raised the gun to take aim at another but has not yet squeezed the trigger.’

Clearly, the draftsman of section 1(1) must be taken to have been aware of ... the Law Commission’s report. The words ‘an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence’ would be inapt if they were intended to mean ‘the last act which lay in his power towards the commission of the offence.’ ... Clearly his actions in obtaining the gun, in shortening it, in loading it, in putting on his disguise, and in going to the school could only be regarded as preparatory acts. But, in our judgment, once he had got into the car, taken out the loaded gun and pointed it at the victim with the intention of killing him, there was sufficient evidence for the consideration of the jury on the charge of attempted murder.”

Appeal dismissed

5-034

While, despite the comments in the above case, the common law was not rigidly committed to any “last act” doctrine, on facts not dissimilar to these, a St Helena Court of Appeal decision, applying the English common law, held that there was no liability for attempted murder.⁵⁹

R. V CAMPBELL (1991) 93 CR. APP. R.
350 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-035

The appellant planned to rob a sub-post office. He drove a motorbike near to the post office, parked it and approached, wearing a disguise of sun glasses and a crash helmet, although he later placed the sunglasses in his pocket. He was carrying an imitation gun and a threatening note which he planned to pass to the cashier in the sub-post office. He was walking down the street and when one yard from the post office door, police, who had been tipped off, grabbed the appellant and arrested him. He was convicted of attempted robbery and appealed.

WATKINS LJ:

“[His Lordship repeated the Gullefer test that the 1981 Act was steering a ‘midway course’ and that preparatory acts ended when the defendant ‘embarks on the crime proper’. He endorsed the stance in Jones that judges ‘should stick to the definition of an attempt in the Act itself’ and that it was ‘wholly unnecessary’ to refer to the common law.]

Looking at the circumstances here it was beyond dispute that the appellant, at the material time, was carrying an imitation firearm which he made no attempt to remove from his clothing. He was not, as he had done previously that day, wearing, as a form of disguise, sunglasses. It was not suggested that he had, in the course of making his way down the road ..., moved towards the door of the post office so as to indicate that he intended to enter that place.

In order to effect the robbery it is equally beyond dispute it would have been quite impossible unless obviously he had entered the post office, gone to the counter and made some kind of hostile act—directed, of course, at whoever was behind the counter and in a position to hand him money. A number of acts remained undone and the series of acts which he had already performed—namely, making his way from his home ..., dismounting from the cycle and walking towards the post office door—were clearly acts which were, in the judgment of this court, indicative of mere preparation ... If a person, in circumstances such as this, has not even gained the place where he could be in a position to carry out the offence, it is extremely unlikely that it could ever be said that he had performed an act which could be properly said to be an attempt.”

Appeal allowed

5-036

There can only be an attempt when the defendant has “embarked on the crime proper” and in this case, it is suggested that the defendant could have embarked on the crime of robbery when he entered the sub-post office. Robbery involves the use of force or threatened force.⁶⁰ It is difficult to see how someone who has entered a post office, but has not yet reached the counter or issued any threats can be said to have embarked on the crime of robbery. Clearly, the court in Campbell was adopting a more flexible approach to the notion of “embarking on the crime proper”. This flexibility was reinforced in the following case.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL’S REFERENCE
(NO.1 OF 1992) (1993) 96 CR. APP. R.
298 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-037

The defendant, walking a girl home (both of them drunk), pulled her behind a hedge, forced her to the ground and lay on top of her. She lost consciousness. He then dragged her up some nearby steps to a shed. The girl, who had regained consciousness, was crying and trying to scream. The defendant had lowered his trousers and interfered with her private parts but had not actually attempted penetration because his penis was flaccid. He claimed he was unable to have intercourse “cause I was drunk, so I couldn’t, could I?” The trial judge directed an acquittal because there was no evidence of an actual physical attempt at penetration. The Attorney-General referred the following point of law for the opinion of the Court of Appeal:

“Whether, on a charge of attempted rape, it is incumbent upon the prosecution, as a matter of law, to prove that the defendant physically attempted to penetrate the woman’s vagina with his penis.”

TAYLOR LCJ:

“The words [in the 1981 Act] are not to be interpreted so as to re-introduce either of the earlier common law tests. Indeed one of the objects of the Act was to resolve the uncertainty those tests created ...

It is not, in our judgment, necessary, in order to raise a prima facie case of attempted rape, to prove that the defendant with the requisite intent had necessarily gone as far as to attempt physical penetration of the vagina. It is sufficient if there is evidence from which the intent can be inferred and there are proved acts which a jury could properly regard as more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence. For example, and merely as an example, in the present case the evidence of the young woman’s distress, of the state of her clothing, and the position in which she was seen, together with the respondent’s acts of dragging her up the steps, lowering his trousers and interfering with her private parts, and his answers to the police, left it open to a jury to conclude that the respondent had the necessary intent and had done acts which were more than merely preparatory. In short that he had embarked on committing the offence itself.”

Opinion accordingly

5-038

Clearly, when the defendant is trying to commit the offence, that is, trying to penetrate the woman, he can be said to have embarked on the crime. However, in this case it is stated that even prior to that the defendant can be held to have “embarked on the crime proper”. This decision is understandable in both common sense and policy terms in that the defendant had progressed relatively far in the series of acts that might have culminated in penetration: in particular, he had lowered his trousers and interfered with her private parts. However, in Patnaik,⁶¹ it was held that it was unnecessary for the defendant to have removed any clothing or to have done “some unequivocal sexual act”. In this case, the defendant had not undone any of his clothing and had not indecently disarranged the woman’s clothing or intimately touched her. It was held that pushing her over a wall, straddling her legs and attempting to kiss her amounted to sufficient evidence to go to the jury that his acts were more than merely preparatory to the crime of rape: “the threshold was essentially a matter for the judge’s judgment of the facts of the case”. Similarly, in Dagnall,⁶² it was held that by telling a woman that he wanted to “fuck her”, pulling her hair and pushing her against a fence and causing her to feel that rape was inevitable, the acts of the defendant were capable of being more than merely preparatory despite the fact that the girl’s clothing had not been disarranged and that the defendant might not have touched her in a sexual way.

Such an approach renders the test of “embarking on the crime” useless. The defendant in Patnaik had clearly embarked on the crime of sexual assault in trying to kiss the woman and, in his other actions, had committed several complete offences. Similarly, the defendant in Dagnall had committed a common assault (and possibly a sexual assault) on the woman. Such defendants would now clearly be liable for the offence committing an offence with intent to commit a sexual offence contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.62. It is not easy to see, however, that these men had embarked on the crime of rape.

The difficulty of applying this test is revealed by a consideration of two final cases, not involving attempted rape. In Griffin,⁶³ a mother planning to abduct her children and take them out of the country, bought ferry tickets to Ireland and went to the children’s school and told the teacher she had come to take them to the dentist. These actions were held to constitute an attempt to abduct children. The full offence here, under the Child Abduction Act 1984 s.1(1), is only committed if the child is taken or sent out of the UK. The court rejected an argument that the mother would at least have had the children in her custody and have embarked on the journey. In Geddes,⁶⁴ the defendant, with no legitimate purpose for being there, was seen on school premises, equipped with a knife, lengths of rope and masking tape. In quashing the defendant's conviction for attempted false imprisonment, Lord Bingham CJ stated:

“[T]here is not much room for doubt about the appellant's intention. Furthermore, the evidence is clearly capable of showing that he made preparations, that he equipped himself, that he got ready, that he put himself in a position to commit the offence charged ... But was the evidence sufficient in law to support a finding that the appellant had actually tried to or attempted to commit the offence of imprisoning someone? Had he moved from the realm of intention, preparation and planning into the area of execution or implementation? ... [I]t is true that the appellant had entered the school but he had never had any contact or communication with any pupil; he had never confronted any pupil at the school in any way ... The whole story is one which fills the court with the gravest unease. Nonetheless, ... we feel bound to conclude that the evidence in law was not sufficient to support a finding that the appellant did an act which was more than merely preparatory ...”⁶⁵

5-039

It is, of course, inevitable that fine distinctions have to be drawn in determining liability for attempt but as a result of these cases it is virtually impossible to predict at what stage the defendant will have passed beyond the point of mere preparation and have “embarked on the crime proper”.

Finally, it ought perhaps to be emphasised that, apart from Gullefer, all of the above cases concerned attempts to commit offences against the person. In Qadir and Khan,⁶⁶ it was stated that because attempted killing or wounding concentrates on a particular moment, acts earlier in time are more likely to be merely preparatory. On the other hand, with attempts to commit offences involving deception or evasion then there is more likely to be a “stratagem carried on over a period of time” and thus the moment of embarkation on the crime “may be quite remote in time from its final outcome”.

(c) Conclusion

5-040

It is almost impossible to extract any clear principles from the cases interpreting s.1(1). Three points can be stated with confidence, although quite where they lead and what they mean in real cases is another matter.

First, the courts are striving at some sort of half-way house between the old proximity test and Stephen's "series of acts" tests. The problem with this is that it is impossible to find a "midway" point between proximity (which meant different things to different judges) and something completely unascertainable (which is all that can be said for Stephen's test). In short, talk about a "midway" point is rhetoric disguising the judges' desire to give themselves maximum flexibility.

Secondly, the "Rubicon test" has been abandoned.⁶⁷ A defendant need not have reached the point of no-return. Similarly, the fact that he has reached such a point will not necessarily indicate that his actions are more than merely preparatory. When a defendant climbs on to a race track in front of racing dogs and waves his arms at the animals it would surely be permissible to assert that he has "crossed the Rubicon and burnt his boats". This is what the defendant did in Gullefer and yet it was insufficient for liability.

Thirdly, the test now appears to be whether the defendant has "embarked on the crime proper". As seen from the above cases, however, there is no clear view as to what "embarking on the crime proper" means.

A theme uniting many of the cases where there has been liability for attempt is that there has been a "confrontation" with the victim or the property, whereas in the cases where acts have been held to be merely preparatory there has been no such confrontation. For example, in Geddes and Rowley the defendant had not met any of the children; in Gullefer, the defendant, who was charged with attempted theft, had not confronted the bookmakers. In Campbell, there had been no confrontation with the cashier. On the other hand, in Jones and the attempted rape cases there had been such a confrontation and in Boyle and Boyle and the other attempted burglary cases there had been a "confrontation" with the building.

However, confrontation can be no more than evidence that acts are more than merely preparatory. In an attempted rape scenario, a man might confront a woman and pull her arm. Even under the broadest approach adopted above, this could never amount to acts more than merely preparatory to the crime of rape.

As the above cases demonstrate, in many instances this test of “embarking on the crime proper” is problematic and appears to be little more than yet another smoke-screen behind which policy can dictate when liability should be imposed.

(ii) Reform

5-041

The Law Commission in 2007⁶⁸ argued that there are two main defects to the present law of attempt. First, the “more than merely preparatory” test of proximity has proved to be too vague and uncertain.⁶⁹ Secondly, many leading decisions such as Geddes and Campbell have rendered the offence unduly narrow.⁷⁰ Too much emphasis has “been placed on the offence’s label (‘attempt’)—and therefore on the notion of ‘trying’ to commit an offence”.⁷¹ Accordingly, the Law Commission proposed that the present law of attempt should be repealed and replaced by two separate inchoate offences:

- (1) an offence of criminal attempt which would be limited to last acts needed to commit the intended offence; and
- (2) an offence of criminal preparation, limited to acts of preparation which are “properly to be regarded as part of the execution of the plan to commit the intended offence”.⁷²

With regard to the proposed restricted offence of attempt, the Law Commission emphasised that “‘last acts’ should not be understood to extend only to the very last act that was required”.⁷³ It argued that this new offence would accord with society’s understanding of the word and would not involve any narrowing of the offence as “in practice, most cases charged as attempts will have involved a last act or acts needing to be done”.⁷⁴ The new offence of criminal preparation would not cover mere preparation. The defendant would only be liable if they were “in the process of executing his or her plan to commit an intended offence”⁷⁵; there had to be “on the job”⁷⁶ preparation. The Law Commission proposed that both these new offences should carry the same maximum penalty.⁷⁷

There were many objections to this proposal to subdivide the present law of attempt into two separate offences.⁷⁸ For example, separate offences should capture different wrongs but both the proposed new offences are aimed at the same wrongdoing; the offence of attempt, being restricted to last acts, would become very narrow; there would be immense difficulty in distinguishing attempts from criminal preparation; the new crime of preparation would be too broad and could lead to the risk of over-criminalisation; there is the danger of introducing confusing labels and so on. Accordingly, in its final Report, the Law Commission has abandoned this proposal and, with one exception,⁷⁹ is no longer recommending any reform of the conduct element of attempts.⁸⁰

(iii) Abandonment

5-042

What is the position if a defendant, with intention to commit the complete offence, does an act which is more than merely preparatory, but then decides to abandon the criminal enterprise? For example, in one US case, a man who was about to rape a woman discovered that she was pregnant and, in response to her pleas that he would hurt her baby, abandoned the plan.⁸¹ Should such a defendant be guilty of attempted rape? Would it make any difference if, instead of discovering the woman was pregnant, the defendant had simply been struck by remorse and had desisted saying: “I won’t do it; God has stayed my hand”?⁸²

It is clear that there is no “defence” of abandonment in English law.

HAUGHTON V SMITH [1975] A.C. 476 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

5-043

LORD HAILSHAM:

“First [the defendant] may simply change his mind before committing any act sufficiently overt to amount to an attempt. Second, he may change his mind, but too late to deny that he had got so far as an attempt. In the first case no criminal attempt is committed. At the relevant time there was no mens rea since there had been a change of intention, and the only overt acts relied upon would be preparatory and not immediately connected with the completed offence. In the second case there is both mens rea and an act immediately connected with the completed offence ... It follows that there is a criminal attempt.”

THE LAW COMMISSION (LAW COM.
NO.102), ATTEMPT (1980):

5-044

“2.132. There is no authority to suggest that withdrawal from an attempt to commit an offence may at present be raised as a defence. Any interruption of the defendant’s acts, whether or not due to his voluntary desistance, is not material to whether there has been an attempt, although it might show that there was not the mens rea necessary for liability. As the Working Party pointed out, an attempt is committed as soon as there are proximate acts accompanied by the necessary intent; thus even though withdrawal might result in the completed offence not being committed, it could not undo the fact that at some stage the defendant would have committed the inchoate offence ... In favour of the defence was the suggestion that it could operate as an inducement to one who had embarked upon criminal conduct to desist from the completion of the offence by enabling him to raise a complete defence to criminal charges. On the other hand, it was suggested that, since the principal justification for provision of inchoate offences lay in the opportunity they gave for intervention by the police at an early stage in criminal activity, there would be an inherent contradiction in providing a defence when that activity had already reached a stage sufficiently advanced to warrant such intervention. The social danger already manifested by the defendant’s conduct made it appropriate that any effort he might make to nullify its effects should instead be reflected by mitigation of penalty.

2.133 ... We believe that provision of a defence could only be justified if there were decisive arguments in its favour; particularly in the context of attempt, the defence could raise difficulties for law enforcement authorities still greater than those which already exist in deciding where the law may impose criminal sanctions.

For these reasons we do not recommend any defence of withdrawal in relation to attempt.”

Such a defence, however, is widely accepted in the US.

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, MODEL
PENAL CODE, PROPOSED OFFICIAL
DRAFT S.5.01(4):

5-045

“Renunciation of criminal purpose. When the actor’s conduct would otherwise constitute an attempt ... It is an affirmative defence that he abandoned his effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevented its commission, under circumstances manifesting complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal purpose ...

Within the meaning of this Article, renunciation of criminal purpose is not voluntary if it is motivated, in whole or in part, by circumstances, not present or apparent at the inception of the actor’s course of conduct, which increase the probability of detection or apprehension or which make more difficult the accomplishment of the criminal purpose. Renunciation is not complete if it is motivated by a decision to postpone the criminal conduct until a more advantageous time or to transfer the criminal effort to another but similar objective or victim.”

Should English law follow this lead and allow such a defence?

MARTIN WASIK, “ABANDONING CRIMINAL INTENT” [1980] CRIM. L.R.
785, 787–788, 790–794:

5-046

“It is clear that the voluntary nature of the abandonment is an essential requirement for the success of any excuse in this area ... [T]wo reasons [are put forward] for the central importance of the requirement of voluntariness. Sometimes it is argued that voluntary desistance provides clear evidence that the actor lacked the resolve to carry out the crime, and hence was not truly dangerous, and sometimes it is said that voluntary desistance is a 'good act' which somehow compensates for or erases the initial criminal act, thus making an acquittal appropriate.⁸³

... One argument in favour of excusing the defendant who renounces a criminal purpose is in terms of negation of mens rea. According to Glanville Williams (Criminal Law: The General Part (1961), pp.620–621) 'where the accused has changed his mind, it would only be just to interpret his previous intention where possible as only half-formed or provisional, and hold it to be an insufficient mens rea ' ... Any [such] suggestion ... would greatly undermine the law of attempt. There must be few cases where the defendant would not accept the need to give up the attempt in certain circumstances ... [Also] the problems of proof would be considerable ...

[W]hat other reasons exist for allowing [the excuse] to relieve the defendant of responsibility? First, it is argued that any dangerousness of character is negated by clear evidence of abandonment. An acceptance of abandonment as an excuse would ... show that the psychological barrier had not been crossed. Under English law, as we have seen, such late abandonment could not amount to an excuse because a proximate act has already been committed. On the other hand such questions of individual psychology and relative dangerousness are the very stuff of mitigation and sentencing policy ...

The second reason often advanced for allowing a defence of withdrawal is one of legal policy. It is claimed that since it is a prime purpose of the criminal law to prevent the occurrence of harm, it makes sense to provide a reasonable inducement for the attempter to desist before any real harm is done ... The importance of the argument turns upon how realistic it is. How likely is it that a man who is sufficiently far along the path towards committing a criminal offence, that he would be guilty of an attempt if stopped, and who then decides not to commit it, would change his mind again and decide to carry on, since he realises he is guilty of the attempt anyway? The argument is far-fetched.⁸⁴ ...

It has been strongly argued, then, that mitigation is not enough in cases of voluntary abandonment and that 'No argument of deterrence, reformation or prevention seems to require the punishment of one who is truly repentant and has done no harm.’

[Wasik, nevertheless, concludes that abandonment should only be relevant in mitigation of sentence.]”

R. A. DUFF, CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS
(1996), PP.395–396:

5–047

“The intending rapist, murderer, or wounder who voluntarily abandons his attempt at the last moment has already attacked his victim, even if he aborted the attack himself ... Surely he should not be able to escape all criminal liability by his abandonment? ... [W]e should retain a narrow general law of attempts, supplemented (when necessary) by more specific offences capturing particularly wrongful kinds of conduct which fall outside its scope.”

5–048

Thus, Duff’s objectivist account would not necessarily lead to the complete acquittal of those who abandon their attempts (as they would be guilty of other offences) but would restrict the crime of attempt itself. Is such an approach preferable to that of the current law’s reliance upon judicial discretion at the sentencing stage?

2. Mens rea

5–049

Section 1(1) of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 provides that the defendant must act “with intent to commit an offence”.

MERRIT V COMMONWEALTH, 164 VA.
653, 180 S.E. 395 (1935) (SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS OF VIRGINIA):

5–050

“[W]hile a person may be guilty of murder though there was no actual intent to kill, he cannot be guilty of an attempt to commit murder unless he has a specific intent to kill ...

When we say that a man attempted to do a given wrong, we mean that he intended to do it specifically; and proceeded a certain way in the doing. The intent in the mind covers the thing in full; the act covers it only in part.

... To commit murder, one need not intend to take life; but to be guilty of an attempt to murder, he must so intend. It is not sufficient that his act, had it proved fatal, would have been murder.”

5-051

In Whybrow,⁸⁵ the defendant constructed a device and administered an electric shock to his wife while she was taking a bath. The Court of Appeal held that while an intention to kill or to cause grievous bodily harm would suffice for the completed crime of murder, for attempted murder an intention to kill was necessary. This was because for attempted murder “the intent becomes the principal ingredient of the crime”. In O’Toole,⁸⁶ the defendant was charged with attempted arson (causing criminal damage by fire). It was held that while recklessness would suffice for the completed offence,⁸⁷ there had to be intention for the attempted offence.

If the complete crime can be committed recklessly or negligently, why does this same mens rea not suffice for an attempt to commit the crime?

R. V MOHAN [1976] Q.B. 1 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-052

JAMES LJ:

“In our judgment it is well established law that intent (mens rea) is an essential ingredient of the offence of attempt ...

An attempt to commit crime is itself an offence. Often it is a grave offence. Often it is as morally culpable as the completed offence which is attempted but not in fact committed. Nevertheless it falls within the class of conduct which is preparatory to the commission of a crime and is one step removed from the offence which is attempted. The court must not strain to bring within the offence of attempt, conduct which does not fall within the well-established bounds of the offence. On the contrary, the court must safeguard against extension of those bounds save by the authority of Parliament.”

DONALD STUART, “MENS REA, NEGLIGENCE AND ATTEMPTS” [1968]
CRIM. L.R. 647, 656, 658–659, 661–
662:

5–053

“Many writers rely heavily on the fact that the word ‘attempt’ refers to an endeavour or an effort to commit a crime. It is argued that there cannot be an attempt unless the defendant was trying to commit the crime and that, in legal terms, this necessarily means that there must have been an intention of the ‘purpose’ type to commit the crime. Even Howard (Australian Criminal Law (1965) 253) says:

‘Attempt implies purpose. To say that D is attempting to do something means that he is acting with the purpose of accomplishing that which he is said to be attempting. There is no disagreement that purpose must be proved for conviction of attempts but different views have been expressed on the scope of the purpose.’

It is, however, difficult to see why there is such magic in the popular meaning of the word ‘attempt’ but not in the words ‘murder’, ‘assault’ or ‘rape’—crimes for which recklessness is now sufficient mens rea ...

Do any of the theories of punishment offer an explanation of why it is that only direct intention will suffice in these cases of attempt? ... It is difficult to challenge Professor Hart’s (Punishment and Responsibility, p.127) assertion that:

‘No calculation of the efficacy of deterrence or reforming measures, and nothing that would ordinarily be called retribution seems to justify this distinction. In the attempt case, for example, the variant where the intention is indirect seems equally wicked, equally harmful, and equally in need of discouragement by the law.’

There seems, furthermore, to be every reason to apply the full notion of mens rea (embracing intention and recklessness) ... to attempts ...

If a fanatical punter contrives to half-sever the stirrup on the saddle of the favourite horse before a race he would be guilty of recklessly assaulting the jockey if the stirrup broke during the race and the jockey fell and was trampled. If, however, the mischief was unearthed before the race was run the punter should surely be guilty of recklessly attempting an assault even though he was aiming, not to injure the jockey, but merely to stop the horse from winning ...

Further there is much to be said for ... [the] suggestion that a negligent attempt to commit a crime of negligence should be punished. Negligence is a failure to measure up to a standard and if this failure occurs or is stopped short of the completed offence there seems to be no reason of policy why it should escape punishment. This would lead to the view, at present widely rejected, that it is possible to attempt to commit the crime of involuntary manslaughter. If a pharmacist is grossly negligent in making up a prescription and the patient dies as a result of taking the dosage on the bottle the pharmacist is clearly guilty of manslaughter. Surely the policy considerations which dictate such a conviction apply equally if, through chance, the negligent error is discovered before any damage is done. There seems to be every reason for a verdict of attempted manslaughter.

If, in the Code of the Brave New World, the codifiers are prepared to cast off the traditional misplaced fear of liability based on negligence, there is, then, a strong case for declaring that the mental element for an attempt may consist in the mental element—here including negligence—required for the completed crime.”

5-054

In some jurisdictions, this approach is followed. For example, in Colorado persons can be liable for a criminal attempt if they act “with the kind of culpability otherwise required for commission of an offence”.⁸⁸ Such an approach is, however, unacceptable. Apart from the semantic argument that it is linguistic nonsense to speak of someone attempting to commit a crime unless he is trying to commit that crime, there is a more important argument of principle. With attempts we are punishing in the absence of any harm (or “first order harm”). While such an approach can be justified, it is surely only permissible when dealing with the highest degree of blame. Exceptions to the paradigm of criminal liability involve extensions of liability and should be rigidly controlled. As attempt is essentially a crime of mens rea, with the actus reus performing only a secondary or subsidiary role, only the clearest form of mens rea should suffice, namely, intention.

This latter reasoning was given statutory force by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(1). It is now clear that even for attempting a crime of strict liability, the defendant must intend to produce the prohibited consequence.⁸⁹

What meaning is to be attributed to the word “intention” in s.1(1)? In Mohan,⁹⁰ it was held that this involved “proof of specific intent, a decision to bring about, in so far as it lies within the accused’s power, the commission of the offence which it is alleged the accused attempted to commit, no matter whether the accused desired that consequence of his act or not”. This was approved, after the coming into force of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, in Millard and Vernon,⁹¹ where it was stated that a direct or purposive intention was required. Intention had to bear its “ordinary meaning”, namely, that the defendant must have “decided, so far as in him lay, to bring about” the result. It would, of course, be possible (albeit messy) for intention to bear different meanings in different contexts and for direct intent to be required here as the concept of an “attempt” connotes trying or meaning to achieve a result. However, the courts have rejected such an approach holding that “intention” bears the same meaning, whether for a completed crime or an attempt.

R. V PEARMAN (1984) 80 CR. APP. R.
259 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-055

STUART-SMITH J:

“We see no reason why the passing of the 1981 Act should have altered the law as to what is meant by the word ‘intent’. The purpose of the Act was to deal with other matters rather than the content of the word 'intent'. We can see no reason why the judgment of the court in that case [Mohan] should not still be binding upon this court.

The words of James LJ [in Mohan] which he used at the end of that passage, namely 'no matter whether the accused desired that consequence of his act or not', are probably designed to deal with a case where the accused has, as a primary purpose, some other object, for example, a man who plants a bomb in an aeroplane, which he knows is going to take off, it being his primary intention that he should claim the insurance on the aeroplane when the freight goes down into the sea. The jury would not be put off from saying that he intended to murder the crew simply by saying that he did not want or desire to kill the crew, but that was something that he inevitably intended to do. Similarly, for example, a man who is cornered by the police when he is in a car may have the primary purpose of simply escaping from that situation. If he drives straight at the police officers at high speed, a jury is likely to conclude that he intended to injure a police officer and maybe cause him serious grievous bodily harm."

R. V WALKER AND HAYLES (1990) 90
CR. APP. R. 226 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-056

The defendants threw the victim from a third floor balcony. At their trial for attempted murder the judge directed the jury that they had to be sure that the defendant intended and tried to kill. The jury asked for clarification and the judge directed them in Moloney/Hancock terms (the appropriate test before Woollin) that if:

- (1) there was a very high degree of probability that the victim would be killed, and
- (2) the defendant knew there was such a high risk, then
- (3) they were entitled to draw the inference that the defendants intended to kill.

The defendants appealed against this direction.

LLOYD LJ:

“By the use of the word ‘entitled’ [the recorder] was making it sufficiently clear to the jury that the question whether they drew the inference or not was a question for them ... [He was not] equating foresight with intent ... He was perfectly properly saying that foresight was something from which the jury could infer intent. He was treating the question as part of the law of evidence, not as part of the substantive law of attempted murder ...

[I]n the great majority of cases of attempted murder, as in murder, the simple direction will suffice, without any reference to foresight. In the rare case where an expanded direction is required in terms of foresight, courts should continue to use virtual certainty as the test, rather than high probability.”

Appeals dismissed

5-057

This case must now be read in the light of Woollin under which an inference of intention can only be drawn if the consequence is foreseen as virtually certain (or, under the alternative interpretation, foresight of a virtual certainty is intention).⁹² In Hales,⁹³ it was accepted that the Woollin test of intention applied to attempted murder but, on the facts, a Woollin direction was not necessary. Accordingly, it seems clear now that the concept of “intention” bears the same meaning here as elsewhere in the criminal law. The Law Commission has endorsed this approach, stating that it would be inappropriate to have a special test for “intent” that differed from that applied to all other criminal offences. Intention “should not be limited to purpose but should encompass ‘Woollin’ intent”.⁹⁴

What mens rea is required with regard to relevant surrounding circumstances? The position at common law appears to have been that while the consequence had to be intended, recklessness with regard to circumstances would suffice for attempt, provided such recklessness would suffice for the completed offence.⁹⁵ Thus if a defendant, being reckless as to whether his first wife was alive, were about to go through a second marriage ceremony, he could be convicted of attempted bigamy. The 1981 Act draws no distinction between consequences and circumstances, but simply states that the defendant must act “with intent to commit an offence”. Despite the wording of this statute, the common law approach was confirmed in the following decision.

R. V KHAN [1990] 2 ALL E.R. 783
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-058

The appellant attempted to have sexual intercourse with a non-consenting girl, but failed. The trial judge directed the jury that recklessness as to whether the girl consented was sufficient for attempted rape. The appellant appealed on this point.

RUSSELL LJ:

“The only difference between the two offences is that in rape sexual intercourse takes place whereas in attempted rape it does not, although there has to be some act which is more than preparatory to sexual intercourse. Considered in that way, the intent of the defendant is precisely the same in rape and in attempted rape and the mens rea is identical, namely an intention to have intercourse plus a knowledge of or recklessness as to the woman’s absence of consent. No question of attempting to achieve a reckless state of mind arises; the attempt relates to the physical activity; the mental state of the defendant is the same. A man does not recklessly have sexual intercourse, nor does he recklessly attempt it. Recklessness in rape and attempted rape arises not in relation to the physical act of the accused but only in his state of mind when engaged in the activity of having or attempting to have sexual intercourse.

If this is the true analysis, as we believe it is, the attempt does not require any different intention on the part of the accused from that for the full offence of rape. We believe this to be a desirable result which in the instant case did not require the jury to be burdened with different directions as to the accused’s state of mind, dependent on whether the individual achieved or failed to achieve sexual intercourse.

We recognise, of course, that our reasoning cannot apply to all offences and all attempts. Where, for example as in causing death by reckless driving or reckless arson, no state of mind other than recklessness is involved in the offence, there can be no attempt to commit it.

In our judgment, however, the words ‘with intent to commit an offence’ to be found in s.1 of the 1981 Act mean, when applied to rape, ‘with intent to have sexual intercourse with a woman in circumstances where she does not consent and the defendant knows or could not care less about her absence of consent’. The only ‘intent’, giving that word its natural and ordinary meaning, of the rapist is to have sexual intercourse. He commits the offence because of the circumstances in which he manifests that intent, i.e. when the woman is not consenting and he either knows it or could not care less about the absence of consent.”

Appeal dismissed

5-059

It is possible to support such an approach. If recklessness as to surrounding circumstances suffices for the complete offence it should also suffice for an attempt, as “the mens rea of the complete crime should be modified only in so far as it is necessary in order to accommodate the concept of attempt”.⁹⁶

The approach adopted in Khan was followed in *Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 1992)*⁹⁷ where it was held that on a charge of attempted arson contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2) it was sufficient to prove an intention to cause damage by fire and that the defendant was reckless as to whether life would thereby be endangered. It was stated that for an attempt “it must be shown that the defendant intended to achieve that which was missing from the full offence”. In Khan, what was missing was sexual intercourse. In Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 1992) what was missing was damage to property. Intention must be proved in relation to these missing elements but beyond that only the same mens rea as for the full crime need be proved.

However, Khan and Attorney-General's Reference (No.3 of 1992) are distinguishable from each other. Khan was clearly dealing with a surrounding circumstance: whether the woman was consenting. In Attorney-General's Reference (No.3 of 1992) the offence element of “whether the life of another would be thereby endangered” can be viewed as a consequence. Under s.1(2), two consequences need to be achieved: damage to property and a state of affairs perceived to be life-threatening by an ordinary prudent person. While intention is required for the first consequence (damage to property) because that was what was “missing”, recklessness with regard to the second consequence (creating a life-threatening situation) suffices. If this reading of the case is adopted, “[t]he cases decided prior to Attorney-General's Reference (No.3 of 1992) are reconcilable on the basis that, in the earlier decisions, the relevant consequences had always been a ‘missing element’, i.e. something that had not materialised”. But this nevertheless represents a significant extension of the law.⁹⁸

What mens rea is required for surrounding circumstances in offences of negligence (for example, rape) or strict liability (for example, rape of a child under 13)? On a “simplistic”⁹⁹ reading of Attorney-General's Reference (No.3 of 1992) there only need be intent with regard to “what is missing” and, beyond that, only that mens rea (or lack of it) required for the full offence need be established. So, for attempted rape the defendant would need to intend penetration but negligence as to consent would suffice. For attempted rape of a child under 13, the defendant would need to intend penetration but his honest and reasonable belief that the child was 16 would not exculpate. The Law Commission proposes that for crimes that require recklessness or negligence or strict liability a defendant should only be liable for an attempt to commit that crime if he was subjectively reckless as to the circumstances:

“[T]here may be very good reasons for defining a substantive offence with a requirement of objective fault, or with no fault at all, but the justification may be substantially weaker when applied to an inchoate offence of attempt.”¹⁰⁰

On the other hand, it can be argued that recklessness should not suffice even for clear circumstances such as those in Khan. The 1981 Act specifies very clearly that the defendant must act “with intent to commit an offence” and thus for surrounding circumstances, knowledge (the general equivalent to intention when dealing with surrounding circumstances).¹⁰¹ This is the approach which has been taken in the case of Pace,¹⁰² which is inconsistent with the earlier decisions in Khan and Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 1992).

R. V PACE [2014] EWCA CRIM 186
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-060

The defendants, who were scrap metal dealers, received a series of visits from undercover police officers in pursuance of a police operation to test whether scrap metal yards would accept purportedly stolen items. The defendants bought metal items such as earthing tape and power cables described to them by the officers as “having been stolen from the back of a van”. It was an agreed fact that the property was not stolen but belonged to the police. The defendants were charged with attempting to convert criminal property contrary to s.327 of Pt 7 (Money Laundering) of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, the state of mind applicable to the substantive offence being knowledge or suspicion (s.340(3)). The defendants were convicted and appealed.

DAVIS LJ:

“1. The principal issue raised on these two appeals relates to the mental element required for criminal attempt. It is one that, albeit in the context of differing underlying substantive criminal offences, has caused difficulties over the years. Various decisions of the courts in those years do not always reveal a consistency in approach and sometimes, it has to be said, reveal a possible inconsistency in approach. It is also an area which has attracted much academic debate; and there too considerable divergences in approach have been manifested.

2. This issue requires consideration of the meaning and effect of s.1

of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 ('the 1981 Act'): a section which in the past has been judicially described as 'winning no prize for lucidity' ...

3. The trial judge decided that in this case the applicable mens rea for the offences of [attempting to conceal, disguise or convert criminal property] ... was capable of being suspicion. ...

21. ... [The trial judge told the jury]

'The law is clear: the prosecution must prove against each defendant on each count in which they are allegedly involved that at the time of accepting, checking, weighing or paying for the goods he either knew or suspected that they were stolen or had otherwise been obtained dishonestly' ...

He went on to explain to the jury, among other things, that 'suspicion ... falls below knowledge or belief'. He further instructed them that the suspicion did not need to be firmly grounded or even based on reasonable grounds.

22. Complaint is made by the appellants with regard to these directions ...

35. That, then, leads to what is at the heart of these appeals: the mens rea which the prosecution was, in law, required to prove if it could make out its case of attempting to conceal, disguise or convert criminal property. (For shorthand, we will hereafter describe it as attempting to convert criminal property) ...

46. A convenient starting point is this. Where the substantive criminal offence specifically requires the consequence of an act, it is well established that an attempt to commit that offence ordinarily requires proof of intent as to that consequence. To take a familiar example, the required intent for murder is either an intent to kill or an intent to cause really serious injury. The required consequence of the act is, of course, death. Accordingly, for a charge of attempted murder to be made out the intent which must be proved is an intent to kill: see Whybrow (1951) 35 Cr App R 141. That remains the case since the 1981 Act. Of course, that is an offence different from the present case. But ... [counsel for the appellants] is at least entitled to make the point that that case is an illustration of the proposition that the mental element required to make a person guilty of an attempted offence may well be different from, and at a higher level than, that applicable to the substantive offence itself ...

48. We next turn to the decision in Khan, which did post-date the Act ...

52. One can see the potential support for [counsel for the Crown's] argument that Khan affords. He would thus seek to derive from it the proposition that, assuming the acts here were more than preparatory, in the present cases the intention here was to convert the scrap metal (the act) and the required mental state was knowledge or suspicion that the scrap metal was stolen. But the authority of Khan is not decisive for present purposes ... In Khan, the substantive offence admitted of recklessness as the mens rea: which is not the case here. In Khan, moreover, the appellants were charged with attempted rape solely because they had not succeeded in penetrating the victim, which is what they had intended to do. Had they succeeded in that act, as they had intended, the full offence of rape would have been made out. But that is not so in the present case. The two appellants here could never have been guilty of the substantive offence of converting criminal property: just because the property in question did not constitute or represent benefit from criminal conduct. Furthermore, the court in Khan had been careful to say (at p.35):

‘We recognise, of course, that our reasoning cannot apply to all offences and all attempts. Where, for example, as in causing death by reckless driving or reckless arson, no state of mind other than recklessness is involved in the offence, there can be no attempt to commit it.’

5-061

53. We were also referred to ... the decision of another constitution of this court in A-G's Reference (No.3 of 1992) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 383, which adopted broadly the same approach as in Khan. That too was a decision in a context different from the present case. It related to attempted arson being reckless whether life be endangered, contrary to s.1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. We have to say that we found, with respect, some of the passages in the judgment somewhat elliptical, if not selfcontradictory ... We do not, at all events, think that it materially advances the Crown's argument. It is true that, in giving the judgment of the court, Schiemann J said (somewhat tentatively, on one view) at 390:

‘One way of analysing the situation is to say that a defendant, in order to be guilty of an attempt, must be in one of the states of mind required for the commission of the full offence and did his best, as far as he could, to supply what was missing from the offence.’

But [counsel for the appellants] was in a position to seek to cull from the decision at least some support for his own argument. For at 390 Schiemann J then went on to say this:

‘If the facts are that, although the defendant has one of the appropriate states of mind required for the complete offence, but the physical element required for the commission of the complete offence is missing, the defendant is not to be convicted unless it can be shown that he intended to supply the physical elements.’

...

[Counsel for the appellants’] submission was that the ‘physical element’ in the present case which was missing was conversion of criminal property: and it was the ‘supply’ of that which had to be shown to be intended.

54. This, at all events, leads on to another line of authority which also bears on the present problem. That relates to cases where the attempt is to commit the ‘impossible’—the position here ... [His Lordship then reviewed the leading cases, considered below at pp.496–498.]

60. Against that citation of authority we turn to the disposal of these two appeals.

61. The starting point has to be section 1(1) of the 1981 ... Mr Farrell [leading counsel for the prosecution] did at one stage ... suggest that section 1(3) of the 1981 Act of Itself provided a complete answer in favour of the Crown. But this cannot be right. That subsection only applies where ‘the facts of the case’ had been as the accused had believed them to be. But in the present proceedings the Crown’s case had been put not on the basis of belief but on the basis of suspicion. Accordingly, one has to revert to section 1(1). That said, we would at least agree with Mr Farrell’s acceptance that the ‘intention’ referred to in section 1(3) must be the same as the intention referred to in section 1(1): that is to say, an intent to commit the offence.

62. Turning, then, to s.1(1) [of the 1981 Act] we consider that, as a matter of ordinary language and in accordance with principle, an ‘intent to commit an offence’ connotes an intent to commit all the elements of the offence. We can see no sufficient basis, whether linguistic or purposive, for construing it otherwise.

5-062

63. Once that is appreciated, the fault line in the Crown’s argument is revealed. A constituent element of the offence of converting criminal property is, as we have said, that the property in question is criminal property. That is an essential part of the offence. Accordingly, an intent to commit the offence involves, in the present case, an intent to convert criminal property: and that connotes an intent that the property should be criminal property. But the Crown’s argument glosses over that. Its argument connotes that the property in question which it is intended to be converted is property known or suspected to constitute or represent benefit from criminal conduct. It ignores the requirement for the substantive offence that the property concerned must be criminal property (as defined). The Crown, in effect, thus seeks to make it a criminal offence to intend to convert property suspecting, if not knowing, that it is stolen. But that is not what s.327, read with s.340(3), provides.

64. Reflecting this difficulty in the Crown’s argument, there is this further point to be made. For the purpose of the substantive offence, a person may in point of fact convert property intending and believing that it is criminal property: yet he will not be guilty of the substantive offence if, in fact, it is not criminal property (Montila [2004] UKHL 50). It is most odd that, on the Crown’s case, such a person who cannot on such a scenario be liable for the substantive offence can nevertheless be made liable, where his state of mind is one of suspicion only, if what is charged is, instead, an attempt to commit the offence. We have the greatest difficulty in seeing that the provisions of s.1 of the 1981 Act were designed to bring about such a result.

65. We further consider ... that such a conclusion is supported by the approach of Parliament taken to conspiracy cases as enunciated in s.1 of the 1977 Act, as amended, and as interpreted by the courts ...

66. We say that for the following reasons.

- i) First, the provisions of s.1 of the 1977 Act, as amended, were introduced by the 1981 Act itself. One would therefore be predisposed to anticipate a coherence of approach in the relevant provisions of the two statutes in this regard.
- ii) Second, offences of criminal attempt and offences of criminal conspiracy are both inchoate offences. Both have in common that they are looking to what is planned for the future. That remains so even if counts formulated as conspiracy counts are commonly sought to be proved by proof of the commission of substantive offences.
- iii) Third, it is not difficult to envisage scenarios—not least, as it happens, in money laundering cases—where what may be charged as an attempt would be capable of being charged as conspiracy, and vice versa.

5-063

67. In this regard, we think that the approach taken by the courts to s.1 of the 1977 Act is most revealing. [His lordship then reviewed the case-law, including Saik, discussed above at 512] ...

74. [T]his authority establishes that a conspiracy to commit an offence under s.327 of the 2002 Act ... can require a higher level of mens rea than that applicable to the actual commission of the substantive offence itself. True it is that the language of s.1 of the 1977 Act is not precisely the same as s.1 of the 1981 Act. Even so ... s.1 of the 1977 Act can properly be read so as to take account of the 1981 Act, and vice versa. Accordingly it makes it, in our view, all the more principled to conclude that likewise in the case of attempt a higher level of mens rea may be required under s.1(1) than is applicable to the substantive offence itself: and thus that, in the present case, proof of suspicion will not suffice on a count of attempted money laundering ...

78. For the reasons we have given, we conclude that the appeals must be allowed. For the purposes of a count of attempted money laundering proof of a mental element of suspicion (only) does not suffice ...

79. We do appreciate the anxieties of the Crown in the context of money laundering. Such cases are not always easy of proof ... But, ... the policy behind the substantive offences of money laundering cannot be allowed to distort the meaning of s.1 of the 1981 Act ...

81. That may or may not create problems for prosecutors. However, we observe that there in any event may well be ... other charges potentially available¹⁰³ ... [Further] the margin between knowledge and suspicion is perhaps not all that great, at all events where the person has reasonable grounds for suspicion. Where a defendant can be shown deliberately to have turned a blind eye to the provenance of goods and deliberately to have failed to ask obvious questions, that can be capable, depending on the circumstances, of providing evidence going to prove knowledge or belief ...”

Appeal allowed

5-064

Attempt is essentially a crime of mens rea. Given this, there is a strong argument that it ought to be restricted to those who act with intent (or its equivalent, knowledge or, it seems, according to Pace, belief) in relation to all the elements of the offence: “the mens rea elements of criminal attempts do significant work in preventing over-criminalisation, and ought not to be narrowed without statutory authority”.¹⁰⁴ Such an approach may be seen as being compatible with the wording of the Criminal Attempts Act and as achieving “a coherent model of attempts liability”¹⁰⁵:

”The Criminal Attempts Act locates the wrong of attempt as acting with the ‘Intent’ to commit an offence. This approach Isolates that wrong.”¹⁰⁶

It also has the merit of observing the rule of statutory interpretation that “where there is uncertainty, criminal statutes should be interpreted in the way least favourable to the prosecution”.¹⁰⁷ Thus, the decision in Pace, that a conviction for attempt cannot be based upon suspicion is to be supported. However, although the Court of Appeal was critical of aspects of the decision in Khan it did not overrule it.¹⁰⁸ Instead, it was distinguished on the questionable basis that, unlike Khan, in which the full offence of rape would have been committed if the defendants had succeeded in penetrating the victim, the case before it concerned an impossible attempt, since the “scrap” metal involved belonged to the police and was not criminal property.¹⁰⁹ The Court of Appeal certified a point of general public importance, but refused permission to appeal. Although commentators have highlighted the desirability of the Supreme Court considering the case, in order to clarify the mens rea of attempt,¹¹⁰ the prosecution did not pursue an appeal to the Supreme Court.¹¹¹ In the meantime, we are in the difficult position of having “a trio of appeal cases, in Khan, Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 1992) and Pace, that sound wholly conflicting notes”,¹¹² with Khan apparently dealing with possible attempts and Pace with those which are impossible.¹¹³ Further, as Attorney-General’s Reference (No.3 of 1992) demonstrates, it is difficult to draw a clear distinction between consequences and circumstances. For example, it could be argued that s.1(2) requires the causing of criminal damage to be committed in the circumstances of it being life-endangering. It is highly inappropriate to make criminal liability hinge on such fine distinctions that have no bearing on culpability.

A final problem remains: will a so-called “conditional intention” suffice for attempt? If a defendant opens a suitcase, intending to steal its contents “on condition they are of some value”, can she be convicted of attempted theft?¹¹⁴

THE LAW COMMISSION (LAW COM. NO.102) ATTEMPT, 1980, APPENDIX E, “‘CONDITIONAL INTENT’ AND R. V HUSSEYN”:

5-065

“4. In delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the attempted theft case of R. v Husseyn, Lord Scarman stated ((1978) 67 Cr.App.R.131, 132) ‘it cannot be said that one who has it in mind to steal only if what he finds is worth stealing has a present intention to steal’.

5. This simple statement, taken by itself and out of context, was the origin of the difficulties. It gave rise to the doctrine that ‘conditional intent’ in the sense of ‘intending to steal whatever one might find of value or worth stealing’ was not a sufficient mental element in these theft-related offences; the prosecution must aver and prove that at the time of attempting, entering as a trespasser, etc, the accused had a settled intention to steal some particular and specified object existing or believed by him to exist in his target area.

6. In such a form, the doctrine was obviously capable of mischievous results. In particular, it excluded from criminal liability the large majority of sneak thieves and burglars who conduct their operations 'on spec'. Without knowing what a handbag, a package left in a car, or a house contains, they nevertheless proceed in the hope or expectation that they will find something of value or worth stealing there, and intend, in that event, to steal it. As Geoffrey Lane LJ pungently remarked (R. v Walkington [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1169 at 1179), after setting out the reasoning that led to the acquittal of one burglar, 'a reading of that would make the layman wonder if the law had taken leave of its senses ... Nearly every prospective burglar could no doubt truthfully say that he only intended to steal if he found something in the building worth stealing.'

7. Unfortunately, several factors obscured the clarity of the issue. As reported, R. v Husseyn gave no indication that the charge of attempted theft in that case had related to specific identifiable objects, and although Lawton LJ did stress that the indictment in the subsequent case of R. v Hector ((1978) 67 Cr. App. R. 224) also charged attempted theft of particular objects, the report was headed 'Whether conditional intention enough', a phrase not used in the judgment. So it was not realised that Lord Scarman's statement related only to the facts of the case before him or that the decision in both cases rested on the basic rule of criminal pleading that an allegation that the accused attempted to steal a particular item involves proof that that item was what he intended to steal; in such a case it is not enough to show that he intended to steal whatever he found worth stealing ...

8. Whatever the reasons, within a few months of the decision in R. v Husseyn, submissions that 'conditional intent is not enough' were being accepted by magistrates and Crown Court judges in all these theft-related offences, causing frustration and perplexity to prosecuting authorities and bringing the criminal law into disrepute ...

9. Study of the relevant indictments and transcripts convinced us that, once the complications mentioned in paragraph 7 had been cleared out of the way, the matter could be put right without recourse to legislation and that the appropriate way to proceed was by way of Attorney General's References to the Court of Appeal under section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1972 ...

10. The two References were decided by the Court of Appeal as Attorney-General's References (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979) ([1979] 3 W.L.R. 577) ... and ... restore clarity and common sense to the law. Where the accused's state of mind is that of intending to steal whatever he may find worth stealing in his target area, there is no need to charge him with attempting to steal specific objects. In appropriate cases of attempted theft a charge of attempting to steal some or all of the contents of (for example) a car or a handbag will suffice. In cases where the substantive offence does not require anything to be stolen, it is not necessary to allege more than 'with intent to steal'. The important point is that the indictment should correctly reflect that which it is alleged the accused did and that the accused should know with adequate detail what he is alleged to have done (at 590). The result, in the Commission's view, is that it is now possible to state with confidence that in cases where an intention to steal anything of value or worth stealing accurately reflects the accused's state of mind at the time of the actus reus, this is sufficient to constitute 'an intention to steal' and applies equally to all the theft-related offences."

5-066

The law on this point is unaffected by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, which abolishes "the offence of attempt at common law" (s.6(1)). These developments on "conditional intention" are best regarded as part of the "common law of intention"; some of the important decisions on this point were not delivered in the context of attempted crime at all.¹¹⁵ It is simply that the point is of particular importance when dealing with attempts.

The Law Commission has proposed that an "intention to commit an offence includes a conditional intent to commit it".¹¹⁶ As they state:

"If D breaks into a car intending to steal if he or she finds something worth stealing, that is intention to steal. Such an intention is functionally equivalent to the intention of someone who drops a stone off a tall building, saying, 'I intend this stone to hit anyone who happens to be passing below'. Such a person intends to strike someone with the stone.”¹¹⁷

(iv) Impossibility

(a) Introduction

5-067

Can there be criminal liability for attempting the impossible? If a defendant shoots at his victim trying to kill her but unknown to him the victim has had a heart attack and is already dead, can the defendant be liable for attempted murder?

Before exploring the present law, it is helpful briefly to outline the position at common law before the enactment of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981.

(b) The common law

5-068

The common law utilised a three-fold classification.

1. Legal impossibility

5-069

This is where the defendant performs all the physical actions he intends to perform, but, unknown to him, what he has done does not amount to a crime. For example, he intends to steal an umbrella but unknown to him, the umbrella turns out to be his own.

In Haughton v Smith,¹¹⁸ the defendant was charged with attempting to handle stolen goods contrary to the Theft Act 1968 s.22. The defendant had actually handled the goods but, unknown to them, they were not stolen goods.¹¹⁹ The House of Lords unanimously held that there could be no liability for attempt in such circumstances. Lord Hailsham stated:

“there must be an overt act of such a kind that it is intended to form and does form part of a series of acts which would constitute the actual commission of the offence if it were not interrupted. In the present case the series of acts would never have constituted and in fact did not constitute an actual commission of the offence, because at the time of the handling the goods were no longer stolen goods.”¹²⁰

Lord Reid:

“The crime is impossible in the circumstances, so no acts could be proximate to it. [H]e took no step towards the commission of a crime because there was no crime to commit.”¹²¹

Lord Morris:

“His belief that the goods were stolen did not make them stolen goods ... To convict him of attempting to handle stolen goods would be to convict him not for what he did but simply because he had had a guilty intention.”¹²²

2. Physical impossibility

5-070

This is where it is physically impossible for the defendant to commit the complete crime, whatever means he adopts. For example, he intends to pick a pocket and places his hand in the victim’s pocket, but it is empty; there is nothing to steal. In Partington v Williams, it was held that there could be no liability in such cases because the commission of the substantive offence was, in the circumstances, impossible.¹²³

The House of Lords in DPP v Nock,¹²⁴ a conspiracy case, considered obiter “the proper limits” of Haughton v Smith and attempts to commit the impossible, and held that liability depended on the manner in which the particular indictment was framed. If, in an attempted theft case, the indictment was limited to an attempt to steal specific property or property from a specific place, then if the property was not there, the actus reus of the complete crime, namely, the appropriation of the specific property belonging to another, would be incapable of proof. The defendant would escape liability. On the other hand, if the indictment alleged an attempt to steal from the person generally, then the pickpocket who puts his hand in an empty pocket could be liable for attempted theft. This would be a mere “transient frustration”. The crime would still be possible; the pickpocket, if undetected, would continue his attempts until successful.

This purported limitation of the Haughton v Smith principle did not stand up to close analysis. First, it ignored the immense difficulties involved in proving the requisite general intent to continue until the crime is eventually completed successfully, and, secondly, it overlooked the necessity to prove that the defendant’s actions were more than merely preparatory to the complete offence.

3. Impossibility through ineptitude

5–071

This is where the crime is impossible in the circumstances because of the defendant’s ineptitude, inefficiency or the adoption of insufficient means. For example, he tries to force open a door with an iron bar, but the iron bar is too weak ever to do so. Here the common law took a different approach from that adopted in relation to the above two categories of impossibility and held that there could be criminal liability for attempt. The reasoning was that such crimes were not really “impossible” because the crime was possible with different means. The defendant could open the door; he simply needed to fetch and use a stronger iron bar.¹²⁵

In Farrance,¹²⁶ the defendant had been convicted of attempting to drive with a blood alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1972 s.6(1). The clutch of his car had burnt out so that he could not drive the car. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction on the ground that a burnt out clutch was only an impediment to the commission of a crime similar to the inadequate burglar’s tool or the poisoner’s insufficient dose. In the Brunei case of Zainal Abidin b Ismail,¹²⁷ the defendant’s impotence prevented him from raping a woman. This was regarded as an instance of impossibility by ineptitude and the defendant was convicted of attempted rape.

Holding that there could be liability in these cases, but not in cases of attempting the physically impossible, posed immense problems. Suppose a defendant fired their gun at a victim who was out of range. Was this ineptitude or physical impossibility?

Did it matter whether his victim was only just out of range or miles out of range? Or suppose that a defendant tried to kill his victim with a weak solution of poison; this was presumably ineptitude, but what if the solution was so weak that it could cause no harm at all? Or if the solution was entirely innocent, as where water was administered in mistake for cyanide? At what point did ineptitude become transformed into impossibility?

(c) Criminal Attempts Act 1981

CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS ACT 1981 S.1:

5-072

“(2) A person may be guilty of attempting to commit an offence to which this section applies even though the facts are such that the commission of the offence is impossible.

(3) In any case where—

(a) apart from this subsection a person’s intention would not be regarded as having amounted to an intent to commit an offence; but

(b) if the facts of the case had been as he believed them to be, his intention would be so regarded,

then, for the purposes of subsection (1) above, he shall be regarded as having had an intent to commit that offence.

(4) This section applies to any offence which, if it were completed, would be triable in England and Wales as an indictable offence ...”

5-073

Section 1(2) provides that there can be liability for attempting the impossible, irrespective of the category of impossibility. Section 1(3) purports to confirm the self-evident proposition that where a person believes the facts to be such that they would be committing a crime, they are to be regarded as having the necessary intention to commit the offence. This means that a defendant who intends to handle a particular mobile phone believing it to be stolen, when in fact it is not stolen, cannot argue that he intended to handle a “non-stolen mobile phone”.

Section 1(3) makes it plain that if he believed the mobile phone was stolen, he intended to handle a “stolen mobile phone”. This provision is actually completely redundant. Intention relates purely to a defendant’s subjective state of mind. An intention to handle a stolen mobile phone is just that: an intention to handle a mobile phone believed to be stolen. The objective status of the goods (stolen or not stolen) has no bearing upon the defendant’s intention.

These provisions represent a clear and emphatic victory for the “subjectivist” theory of attempts where emphasis is placed on the intention of the defendant and the firmness of that intention. However, the House of Lords was initially not prepared to accept such blatant subjectivism and, in an extraordinary judgment, declared that the statute would lead to “asinine” results and proceeded to subvert the legislation from its original purpose.

ANDERTON V RYAN [1985] A.C. 560 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

5-074

The defendant was convicted of dishonestly attempting to handle a stolen video recorder. She had purchased the recorder believing it was stolen and had confessed this to police investigating a burglary at her home. There was, however, no evidence that the recorder had been stolen and it therefore had to be treated as if it were not stolen. She appealed against her conviction.

LORD BRIDGE:

“Does section 1 of the Act of 1981 create a new offence of attempt where a person embarks on and completes a course of conduct which is objectively innocent, solely on the ground that the person mistakenly believes facts which, if true, would make that course of conduct a complete crime? If the question must be answered affirmatively it requires convictions in a number of surprising cases: the classic case ... of the man who takes away his own umbrella from a stand, believing it not to be his own and with intent to steal it; the case of the man who has consensual intercourse with a girl over 16 believing her to be under that age; the case of the art dealer who sells a picture which he represents to be and which is in fact a genuine Picasso, but which the dealer mistakenly believes to be a fake.

The common feature of all these cases, including that under appeal, is that the mind alone is guilty, the act is innocent. I should find it surprising that Parliament, if intending to make this purely subjective guilt criminally punishable, should have done so by anything less than the clearest express language, and, in particular, should have done so in a section aimed specifically at inchoate offences.

... [S]ection 1(1) and (4) of the Act of 1981 provide a statutory substitute for the common law offence of attempt ...

It is sufficient to say of subsection (2) that it is plainly intended to reverse the law ... that the pickpocket who puts his hand in an empty pocket commits no offence. Putting the hand in the pocket is the guilty act, the intent to steal is the guilty mind, the offence is appropriately dealt with as an attempt, and the impossibility of committing the full offence for want of anything in the pocket to steal is declared by the subsection to be no obstacle to conviction ...

It seems to me that subsections (2) and (3) are in a sense complementary to each other. Subsection (2) covers the case of a person acting in a criminal way with a general intent to commit a crime in circumstances where no crime is possible. Subsection (3) covers the case of a person acting in a criminal way with a specific intent to commit a particular crime which he erroneously believes to be, but which is not in fact, possible. Given the criminal action, the appropriate subsection allows the actor's guilty intention to be supplied by his subjective but mistaken state of mind, notwithstanding that on the true facts that intention is incapable of fulfilment. But if the action is throughout innocent and the actor has done everything he intended to do, I can find nothing in either subsection which requires me to hold that his erroneous belief in facts which, if true, would have made the action a crime makes him guilty of an attempt to commit that crime."

Appeal allowed

C. M. V. CLARKSON,

UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW,
4TH EDN (2005), PP.171–172:

5–075

“This distinction between ‘objectively innocent’ acts, on the one hand, and ‘criminal’ or ‘guilty’ acts on the other is particularly interesting. It would appear that a ‘criminal’ or ‘guilty’ act is one that looks manifestly criminal. (This cannot refer to actual crimes. The defendant stabbing the pillow believing he is stabbing his victim commits no offence if it is his own bedding and pillow that he is damaging. Yet Lord Roskill clearly held that there would be liability for attempt in such a situation.) Fletcher (1978) states that ‘manifestly criminal’ activities must exhibit at least the following essential features. First, the criminal act must manifest, on its face, the actor’s criminal purpose. Secondly, the conduct should be ‘of a type that is unnerving and disturbing to the community as a whole’. These requirements are clearly satisfied in the pickpocket and defendant stabbing the pillow cases. The actions manifest the defendant’s unlawful purpose and are ‘unnerving and disturbing’ to the community. This requirement of manifest criminality is, of course, one that lays emphasis on harm, albeit of a second-order nature. It insists that actions infringe another’s security interests; they must seemingly pose real and objective threats of harm.

On the other hand, ‘objectively innocent’ activities such as those of Mrs Ryan or the defendant having sexual intercourse with the 16-year-old girl believing her to be under 16 pose no threat of harm to anyone. Nobody’s security interests are being violated thereby. At most, he is manifesting a generalised dangerousness, in the sense that he has shown that he could perhaps commit the crime at another time and place. If criminal liability were to be imposed in such cases it would be in the complete absence of any degree of harm, however defined. On this basis it can be suggested that the House of Lords in Anderton v Ryan (1985), despite blatantly ignoring Parliament’s intentions and creating confused distinctions, did lend its weight to the view ... that the causing of harm is an essential prerequisite in the general formula for the construction of criminal liability.”

5–076

In one of the most dramatic about-turns in English law, the House of Lords within months overruled itself and held that there could be criminal liability in all cases of attempting the impossible.

R. V SHIVPURI [1987] A.C. 1 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

5-077

The defendant thought he was dealing in prohibited drugs but it transpired that the substance in his possession was only snuff or similarly harmless vegetable matter. He was convicted of attempting to be knowingly concerned in dealing with prohibited drugs, contrary to the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(1) and the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 s.170(1)(b). He appealed against his conviction.

LORD BRIDGE:

“[T]he first question to be asked is whether the appellant intended to commit the offences of being knowingly concerned in dealing with and harbouring drugs of Class A or Class B with intent to evade the prohibition on their importation. Translated into more homely language the question may be rephrased, without in any way altering its legal significance, in the following terms: did the appellant intend to receive and store (harbour) and in due course pass on to third parties (deal with) packages of heroin or cannabis which he knew had been smuggled into England from India? The answer is plainly yes, he did. Next, did he in relation to each offence, do an act which was more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence? The act relied on in relation to harbouring was the receipt and retention of the packages found in the lining of the suitcase. The act relied on in relation to dealing was the meeting at Southall station with the intended recipient of one of the packages. In each case the act was clearly more than preparatory to the commission of the intended offence; it was not and could not be more than merely preparatory to the commission of the actual offence, because the facts were such that the commission of the actual offence was impossible. Here then is the nub of the matter. Does the ‘act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence’ in section 1(1) of the Act of 1981 (the actus reus of the statutory offence of attempt) require any more than an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence which the defendant intended to commit? Section 1(2) must surely indicate a negative answer; if it were otherwise, whenever the facts were such that the commission of the actual offence was impossible, it would be impossible to prove an act more than merely preparatory to the commission of that offence and subsections (1) and (2) would contradict each other.

This very simple, perhaps over simple, analysis leads me to the provisional conclusion that the appellant was rightly convicted of the two offences of attempt with which he was charged. But can this conclusion stand with Anderton v Ryan? ...

Running through Lord Roskill's speech and my own in Anderton v Ryan is the concept of 'objectively innocent' acts which, in my speech certainly, are contrasted with 'guilty acts'.

I am satisfied on further consideration that the concept of 'objective innocence' is incapable of sensible application in relation to the law of criminal attempts. The reason for this is that any attempt to commit an offence which involves 'an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence' but for any reason fails, so that in the event no offence is committed, must ex hypothesi, from the point of view of the criminal law, be 'objectively innocent'. What turns what would otherwise, from the point of view of the criminal law, be an innocent act into a crime is the intent of the actor to commit an offence ... A puts his hand into B's pocket. Whether or not there is anything in the pocket capable of being stolen, if A intends to steal, his act is a criminal attempt; if he does not so intend, his act is innocent. A plunges a knife into a bolster in a bed. To avoid the complication of an offence of criminal damage, assume it to be A's bolster. If A believes the bolster to be his enemy, B, and intends to kill him, his act is an attempt to murder B; if he knows the bolster is only a bolster, his act is innocent. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the distinction sought to be drawn in Anderton v Ryan between innocent and guilty acts considered 'objectively' and independently of the state of mind of the actor cannot be sensibly maintained.

canvassed in argument, both in Anderton v Ryan and in the instant case, though no trace of it appears in the speeches in Anderton v Ryan, is a distinction which would make guilt or innocence of the crime of attempt in a case of mistaken belief dependent on what, for want of a better phrase, I will call the defendant's dominant intention. According to the theory necessary to sustain this distinction, the appellant's dominant intention in Anderton v Ryan was to buy a cheap video recorder; her belief that it was stolen was merely incidental. Likewise in the hypothetical case of attempted unlawful sexual intercourse, the young man's dominant intention was to have intercourse with the particular girl; his mistaken belief that she was under 16 was merely incidental. By contrast, in the instant case, the appellant's dominant intention was to receive and distribute illegally imported heroin or cannabis.

Whilst I see the superficial attraction of this suggested ground of distinction, I also see formidable practical difficulties in its application. By what test is a jury to be told that a defendant's dominant intention is to be recognised and distinguished from his incidental but mistaken belief? But there is perhaps a more formidable theoretical difficulty. If this ground of distinction is relied on to support the acquittal of the appellant in Anderton v Ryan, it can only do so on the basis that her mistaken belief that the video recorder was stolen played no significant part in her decision to buy it and therefore she may be acquitted of the intent to handle stolen goods. But this line of reasoning runs into head-on collision with section 1(3) of the Act of 1981. The theory produces a situation where, apart from the subsection, her intention would not be regarded as having amounted to any intent to commit an offence. Section 1(3) (b) then requires one to ask whether, if the video recorder had in fact been stolen, her intention would have been regarded as an intent to handle stolen goods. The answer must clearly be yes, it would. If she had bought the video recorder knowing it to be stolen, when in fact it was, it would have availed her nothing to say that her dominant intention was to buy a video recorder because it was cheap and that her knowledge that it was stolen was merely incidental. This seems to me fatal to the dominant intention theory.¹²⁸

I am thus led to the conclusion that there is no valid ground on which Anderton v Ryan can be distinguished. I have made clear my own conviction ... that the decision was wrong.”

Appeal dismissed

5-079

The law is now clear. There can be liability in all cases of attempting the impossible. In Attorney-General's Reference (Nos.3 and 4 of 2005),¹²⁹ the defendant was convicted of attempting to cause grievous bodily harm when he kicked a man who was already dead. In Jones,¹³⁰ the defendant was convicted of attempting to incite (by text message) a child under the age of 13 to engage in sexual activity contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.8. On the facts the crime was impossible as the recipient of the message was an adult policewoman pretending to be a child under the age of 13.

Is such an approach justifiable?

THE LAW COMMISSION (LAW COM.
NO.102), ATTEMPT (1980), PARAS
2.96–2.98:

5-080

“2.96. We think it would be generally accepted that if a man possesses the appropriate mens rea and commits acts which are sufficiently proximate to the actus reus of a criminal offence, he is guilty of attempting to commit that offence. Where, with that intention, he commits acts which, if the facts were as he believed them to be, would have amounted to the actus reus of the full crime or would have been sufficiently proximate to amount to an attempt, we cannot see why his failure to appreciate the true facts should, in principle, relieve him of liability for the attempt. We stress that this solution to the problem does not punish people simply for their intentions. The necessity for proof of proximate acts remains. The fact that the impossibility of committing the full crime reduces the social danger is adequately reflected in the generally milder penalty which an attempt attracts instead of that for the full offence. And even if it is conceded that there may be some reduction in the social danger in cases of impossibility, it has to be borne in mind that a certain social danger undoubtedly remains.

Defendants in cases such as Haughton v Smith and Nock and Alford are prepared to do all they can to break the criminal law even though in the circumstances their attempts are doomed to failure; and if they go unpunished, they may be encouraged to do better at the next opportunity. Finally, if the solution under consideration is accepted, it makes it possible to dispense with the doctrine of 'inadequate means' and with stained efforts to catch those who might otherwise escape by resort to broadly drawn indictments and an 'inferred general intention'.

2.97. If it is right in principle that an attempt should be chargeable even though the crime which it is sought to commit could not possibly be committed, we do not think that we should be deterred by the consideration that such a change in our law would also cover some extreme and exceptional cases in which a prosecution would be theoretically possible. An example would be where a person is offered goods at such a low price that he believes that they are stolen, when in fact they are not; if he actually purchases them, upon the principles which we have discussed he would be liable for an attempt to handle stolen goods. Another case which has been much debated is that raised in argument by Bramwell B in R. v Collins (1864) 9 Cox C.C. 497. If A takes his own umbrella, mistaking it for one belonging to B and intending to steal B's umbrella, is he guilty of attempted theft? Again, on the principles which we have discussed he would in theory be guilty but in neither case would it be realistic to suppose that a complaint would be made or that a prosecution would ensue. On the other hand, if our recommendations were formulated so as to exclude such cases, then it might well be impossible to obtain convictions in cases such as Haughton v Smith, where a defendant handles goods which were originally stolen, intending to handle stolen goods, but where, unknown to him, the goods had meanwhile been restored to lawful custody. Another example of possible difficulty which has been suggested is where a person in the erroneous belief that he can kill by witchcraft or magic takes action such as sticking pins into a model of his enemy—intending thereby to bring about his enemy's death. Could that person be charged with attempted murder? It may be that such conduct could be more than an act of mere preparation on the facts as the defendant believes them to be; and in theory, therefore, it is possible that such a defendant could be found guilty. In the ordinary course, we think that discretion in bringing a prosecution will be sufficient answer to any problems raised by such unusual cases; but even if a prosecution ensued, it may be doubted whether a jury would regard the acts in question as sufficient to amount to an attempt.

2.98. A possible difficulty of another kind which we have considered is the distinction which it will be necessary to draw between impossibility arising from misapprehension as to the facts and impossibility arising from a misapprehension of the law in situations which at first sight appear to be similar. As we have seen, if the defendant believes, because of a mistake of law, that certain conduct constitutes an offence when it is not, he should not be liable for attempt if he acts in accordance with his intent. For example, the defendant intends to smuggle certain goods through the customs in the belief that they are dutiable; under the relevant law those goods are in fact not dutiable. He has made no mistake as to the nature of the goods; his error is solely one of law, and if he imports them he should not be liable for an attempt improperly to import goods without paying duty, since he had no intent to commit an offence known to the law.¹³¹ The position is different if the defendant is asked while abroad to smuggle into the country goods which he is assured by the person making the request are goods which are actually dutiable, but which are not in fact dutiable because they are not what he believes them to be. Here the defendant's error arises solely from his misapprehension as to the nature of the goods; it is a pure error of fact. He has every intention of committing an offence on the facts as he believes them to be, and if he succeeds in importing the goods or in getting sufficiently close to his objective, he must be liable for an attempt upon the principles which we have been considering. Fine as the distinction appears to be in these cases it is one which is in our view vital to make."

5-081

Supporters of the objective theory of attempts tend to reject such reasoning and assert that such "subjectivism" amounts to little more than punishing people for their guilty intentions. The Law Commission conceded the absurdity of there being liability in situations where a person buys legitimate goods but at such a low price that she thinks (wrongly) that they are stolen. It concluded that prosecutions would never be brought in such cases. Yet it was on broadly similar facts that a prosecution was brought in Anderton v Ryan forcing the House of Lords to adopt some highly innovative techniques to ensure an acquittal.

However, even the hardened "objectivist" concedes the necessity for liability in certain obvious cases. The problem is in isolating such situations.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.149–150, 152–154, 161–163, 165–166:

5–082

“It is agreed by all supporters of an objectivist approach to attempts that there should be no liability in the case of shooting at a tree stump with the intent to kill. Yet the courts have found liability in closely related situations ... [A] Missouri court convicted on a charge of attempted murder for shooting at the bed where the intended victim usually slept (State v Mitchell 170 Mo. 633, 71 S.W. 175 (1902)) ... Shooting at the intended victim’s bed and aiming a gun manifest the intent to kill. In shooting at a tree stump, in contrast, there is nothing in the facts to indicate that an attempt is under way. According to objectivist theory, attempting is not just an event of inner experience. It is an effort in the real world to accomplish one’s objective. Therefore, when the act is aptly related to that actor’s objective, the courts perceive a manifest attempt to commit an offense. Yet when the act is objectively unrelated to the intent, as in the case of shooting at a tree stump, judges and theorists properly balk at positing an act of attempting. The notion of aptness here is obviously closely related to the principle of manifest criminality ...

[T]he problem of aptness is one of assessing whether in the long run the type of conduct involved is likely to produce harm. If the type of conduct would produce harm in the long run, then the defendant’s act is apt and a punishable attempt, even though it is impossible under the circumstances ...

The principle that inapt efforts should be exempt from liability readily explains why the courts do not discern an act of attempting in the giving of an innocuous substance as an intended poison or abortifacient.

The difficult problem in these cases is drawing the distinction between giving the intended victim an innocuous substance and giving him too small a dosage of a noxious poison. It is the distinction between trying to kill by putting sugar in his coffee and trying to kill by administering a harmless dosage of cyanide. In the latter cases, the courts have been willing to convict, and as a result we are put to the challenge to explain why sugar makes the attempt inapt but a harmless dosage of cyanide makes it apt. As we discovered in our analysis of the shooting cases, the standard of aptness does not apply to isolated events, but rather to types or classes of acts. Apt attempts belong to a class of acts that are likely to generate harm. If the class is defined as administering a dosage of cyanide or other deadly poison, there is no doubt that the class of acts is likely to generate harm, and therefore we can regard every instance of the class as an apt attempt ...

[Dealing with the empty pocket cases] there is nothing inapt about these efforts. They are well calculated to provide a thief's income, even if it turns out that in the particular situation the bounty is not there ...

[However for other cases, for example, cases such as Haughton v Smith, Fletcher suggests an alternative theory—'the test of rational motivation'.] The thesis is this: mistaken beliefs are relevant to what the actor is trying to do if they affect his incentive in acting. They affect his incentive if knowing of the mistake would give him a good reason for changing his course of conduct ... Suppose the accused engages in sexual intercourse with a girl he takes to be under the age of consent; in fact, she is over age. Is he guilty of attempted statutory rape? In the normal case it would not be part of the actor's incentive that the girl be underage (again, one could imagine a variation in which the youth of the girl did bear upon the actor's motivation). If he is just as happy to have intercourse with a girl over age, then his mistake would not bear on his incentive and it would be incorrect to describe his act as trying to have intercourse with a girl under the age of consent ... The thesis is that there should be liability in a case of impossibility only if the actor fails in his purpose. The only way to determine whether the actor is attempting an act that includes a particular circumstance, X, is to inquire: what would the actor do if he knew that X was not so? If he would behave in precisely the same way, we cannot say that his mistaken belief in X bears on his motivation; and if it does not, we cannot say that he is attempting to act with reference to X ...

If applied to the cases of shooting at stumps and 'poisoning' with sugar, the test of rational motivation leads to convictions where the standard of aptness would favour an acquittal. It is obviously part of the actor's system of incentives that he believes the stump to be a person, or the dosage to be sufficient to kill. If told of the truth, he would presumably change his plans. So far as the standard of incentive is controlling, the person shooting at the stump is undoubtedly attempting to kill. The problem is whether the test of aptness should prevail over the theory of rational motivation in cases involving assaults on the core interests protected by the criminal law ...

One reason to believe that the principle of aptness is indispensable in a comprehensive theory of attempt liability is that there is no other way to solve one case in which virtually everyone agrees that there should be no liability. That is the case of nominal efforts to inflict harm by superstitious means, say by black magic or witchcraft. The consensus of Western legal systems is that there should be no liability, regardless of the wickedness of intent, for sticking pins in a doll or chanting an incantation to banish one's enemy to the nether world. Against the background of the fears and taboos prevailing in modern Western society, objectivist theorists take these cases to be inapt attempts, therefore exempt from punishment. Yet the theory of rational motivation points in the direction of liability. If the intending party knows the truth about black magic (namely, that it does not work), he would have a good reason to change his plan of attack. To account for the consensus favouring an exemption in this type of case, we need the principle of aptness to offset the implications of the competing theory of rational motivation.

The problem that remains to be resolved is determining the relative scope of these two competing theories.”

5-083

Duff supports an approach broadly similar to Fletcher's theory of rational motivation. Under his view, Mrs Ryan did not intend to handle a stolen video recorder as that played no motivational part in her conduct; her actions were not directed towards handling stolen goods; the fact that the goods were stolen was merely a side-effect.¹³² Both of these approaches are similar to the “dominant intention” theory rejected in Shivpuri. The problem with these theories is that they boil down to making liability dependent on motive. This is problematic in evidential terms and questionable in moral terms. Further, as Fletcher points out, it leads to liability in the shooting at the tree-stump case. Duff rejects liability in such cases on the ground that the attack “fails so radically to engage with the world that it does not even amount to a failed attack”. Fletcher’s theory of aptness would similarly resolve some of these issues, but the real problem with his analysis is the failure to spell out the exact circumstances in which the theory of aptness is applicable and those in which it is appropriate to apply the theory of rational motivation.

English law has rejected the dominant intention (rational motivation) theory. The theory of aptness is broadly similar to the “objectively innocent” v “guilty acts” approach approved in Anderton v Ryan. This was rejected in Shivpuri. It is, of course, extremely difficult to capture these notions in a practicable statutory formulation.¹³³ However, it must remain questionable whether English law has adopted the right solution in ignoring these important considerations of principle and imposing liability in all these situations and then relying on prosecutorial discretion to avoid injustice.

III. Conspiracy

A. INTRODUCTION

5-084

Conspiracy is an inchoate crime because, like attempt, it penalises steps towards the commission of a crime. In the case of conspiracy, an agreement is the essence of the offence. The agreement may be to commit murder as part of a terrorist plot, to launder money derived from drug trafficking, to cause damage as part of an animal rights campaign or to publish names and information about prostitutes. It is not possible to get accurate figures about the use of conspiracy charges because of the way in which criminal statistics are compiled¹³⁴ but, impressionistically, the use of conspiracy laws appears to have been increasing. It is frequently used, for example, in relation to organised crime. It is likely that one response to the threat from terrorists is that the use of conspiracy charges will continue to increase.¹³⁵

The law on conspiracy has been described as “the least systematic, the most irrational branch of English penal law”.¹³⁶ Whilst some reform has taken place since that statement was made, it is still the case that in terms of its rationale, its content and its use, the crime of conspiracy is highly suspect. In the light of concerns about the offence, in 2006, the Government asked the Law Commission to review the law. Its report¹³⁷ recommended some important changes to conspiracy but although they have been accepted, they will not be implemented.

B. SHOULD THERE BE A LAW OF CONSPIRACY?

RICHARD CARD, “REFORM OF THE LAW OF CONSPIRACY” [1973] CRIM. L.R. 674, 675–676:

5–085

“It may be asked whether it is desirable that criminal liability should attach to persons who, albeit at the time of the agreement intend to carry it out, never get beyond the stage of agreement. To take an extreme case, suppose that there is a bare agreement, the details remaining to be agreed, and that the next day the parties withdraw from their agreement; is this really conduct deserving of punishment?

It must be admitted that in practice a conviction for conspiracy in such a case will not generally be possible because of the difficulty of proving the agreement. Convictions for conspiracy usually depend on inferences from overt acts said by the prosecution to have been performed in pursuance of the agreement. In practical terms liability often arises by virtue of overt acts done in pursuance of the agreement ... In such cases, ... the offence of conspiracy would seem to be in part redundant. If these further acts constitute an attempt the conspirators who commit them can be convicted of attempt (to which any other conspirator would be an accomplice). On the other hand, if the further acts are insufficient to constitute an attempt, the punishment of the conspirators, both those who committed the overt acts and those who did no more than enter the agreement, can only be justified on the basis that it is the combination of persons which aggravates their conduct and produces liability

It is merely suggested that criminal liability should not attach to those who merely agree, ... where no further steps are taken to effect it. Such a rule has been adopted in part in the Model Penal Code of the American Law Institute. Article 5.03 provides:

‘Overt Act. No person may be convicted of conspiracy to commit a crime, other than a felony of the first or second degree, unless an overt act in pursuance of such conspiracy is alleged and proved to have been done by him or by a person with whom he conspired.’

Conspiracy has another rationale besides that of ‘nipping crime in the bud’. This is that it is an appropriate offence to charge where a series of crimes have been committed at different times by different people pursuant to a prior agreement. The series of crimes may be so large that there would be great difficulty in indicting for all of them. In addition, each offence taken on its own may be relatively trivial but the gravity of the conduct of those involved greatly increased by viewing their acts as part of a larger criminal enterprise. These matters can be dealt with at present by the use of a conspiracy charge. Such situations may well warrant the creation of a crime which specifically deals with such completed criminal enterprises but, it is submitted, they do not justify the continued existence of a crime where liability is based on agreement and no more.

If it was accepted that there should no longer be a crime of conspiracy based on mere agreement to commit a crime, it is submitted that the criminality of acts done pursuant to that agreement (which did not result in the commission of a substantive offence) should be dealt with by the law of attempt.”

PHILLIP JOHNSON, “THE UNNECESSARY CRIME OF CONSPIRACY” (1973) 61 CAL. L. REV.
1137, 1157–1158:

5–086

“Conspiracy is also an inchoate or preparatory crime, permitting the punishment of persons who agree to commit a crime even if they never carry out their scheme or are apprehended before achieving their objective ...

The Model Penal Code commentary offers perhaps the most carefully stated justification for a doctrine of conspiracy that ‘reaches further back into preparatory conduct than attempt’:

First: The Act of agreeing with another to commit a crime, like the act of soliciting, is concrete and unambiguous; it does not present the infinite degrees and variations possible in the general category of attempts. The danger that truly equivocal behaviour may be misinterpreted as preparation to commit a crime is minimized; purpose must be relatively firm before the commitment involved in agreement is assumed.

Second: If the agreement was to aid another to commit a crime or it otherwise encouraged its commission, it would establish complicity in the commission of the substantive offense ... It would be anomalous to hold that conduct which would suffice to establish criminality, if something else is done by someone else is insufficient if the crime is never consummated. This is a reason, to be sure, which covers less than all the cases of conspiracy, but that it covers many is the point.

Third: In the course of preparation to commit a crime, the act of combining with another is significant both psychologically and practically, the former since it crosses a clear threshold in arousing expectations, the latter since it increases the likelihood that the offense will be committed. Sharing lends fortitude to purpose. The actor knows, moreover, that the future is no longer governed by his will alone; others may complete what he has had a hand in starting, even if he has a change of heart.”

NOTE, “THE CONSPIRACY DILEMMA: PROSECUTION OF GROUP CRIMES OR PROTECTION OF INDIVIDUAL
DEFENDANTS” (1948) 62 HARV. L.
REV. 276, 283–284:

“Several factors, seldom articulated by the courts, seem to underlie this concept of the unique criminality of group action. Basic is the increased danger to the public welfare and safety that exists in the combination of united wills to effect a harmful object, as contrasted with the menace of the criminal purpose of a single individual. Reliance on the co-operation of co-conspirators and the intent to support and aid them in the future increases the likelihood of criminal conduct on the part of individual conspirators. And it is more difficult to guard against the antisocial designs of a group of persons than those of an individual. Thus, the crucial importance of the conspiracy weapon stems from its effectiveness in reaching organized crime. The advantages of division of labor and complex organization characteristic of modern economic society have their counterparts in many forms of criminal activity. Manufacture or importation and distribution of contraband goods, for example, often demands a complicated organization. The interrelations of the parties in schemes to defraud may be highly complex. Except for the conspiracy device, society would be without protection until the criminal object is actually executed or at least sufficiently approached to become indictable as an attempt; and even then often only the actual perpetrator and perhaps his immediate accessories could be reached. Through the conspiracy dragnet, all participants in gang operations, the catspaw and his principal, those who contribute from afar as well as the immediate actors can be punished often before the evil design has fully matured into the criminal act.”

5-088

The arguments for retaining a crime of conspiracy can thus be grouped into three main strands:

1. The prevention of crime including, increasingly, the assistance of intelligence-led policing: if these are now regarded as key objectives (the view taken by the Law Commission¹³⁸) then it would seem to follow that the agreement should be to do something that would be criminal if completed. As we shall see, the Criminal Law Act 1977 only partially succeeded in reducing conspiracy to this formula. But these justifications depend to a significant degree on the ambit of other inchoate offences. If English law had adopted the substantial step test¹³⁹ for determining the extent of action required for an attempt, this justification for conspiracy would have been undermined: in most cases the only evidence of the agreement will be overt acts that could have satisfied the substantial step test. However, this test has not been adopted by English law (instead requiring the defendant to have done acts that are more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence) and until very recently, therefore, it was possible, in crime prevention terms, to justify a crime of conspiracy. With the introduction of three new inchoate offences dealing with encouraging or assisting crime in the Serious Crime Act 2007,¹⁴⁰ the crime prevention rationale has again come under scrutiny, although the Law Commission has rejected the argument that these offences are so broad that conspiracy, as a preventative tool, has become redundant on the ground that it facilitates “the effective use of intelligence-led policing”.¹⁴¹ Despite this, the fact that large numbers of conspiracy charges are brought after the crime has been completed¹⁴² does support the view that other justifications are increasingly important in responding to serious crime.¹⁴³

2. The “full story” rationale: a conspiracy charge enables a number of crimes, which may or may not be serious in themselves, to be brought before the court in their “true” light.¹⁴⁴ It enables larger numbers of those involved to be held responsible. However, this largely ignores the role of the law relating to complicity and may lead to the conspiracy charge being abused.¹⁴⁵
3. The “general danger” rationale: that people working in concert with one another are more dangerous than lone actors. Not only are they able to commit more complex crimes but they will be more likely to carry out their intentions. It is this argument which enabled conspiracy to develop so as to embrace an agreement with others to do an act, such as trespass, which was not in itself criminal and while this is no longer the law, this claim remains problematic. However, it is notable that the Law Commission’s recent defence of conspiracy is influenced by research which lends some support to this justification: conspiracy may be justified on an economic basis (it permits a specialisation of labour) and a psychological basis (where a group loyalty and solidarity develops), both of which advance the criminal purpose.¹⁴⁶

5-089

One has to conclude that conspiracy is used as more than an inchoate crime.¹⁴⁷ The reality is that its use, when the crime has been completed, brings substantial advantages for the prosecution. Not only does it provide the prosecution with another chance of securing a conviction where the evidence relating to the completed crime is doubtful, but there are evidential benefits as well.¹⁴⁸ As we shall see, some doubt over the continued attractiveness to prosecutors of conspiracy charges, where the crime has occurred, has been cast by the House of Lords' decision in Saik.¹⁴⁹ In this case, Lord Hope refers to the device of bringing conspiracy charges where the crime has been completed as "trying to fit a square peg into a round hole"¹⁵⁰: the crime was not designed to be used in this way.

As with attempts, a conspiracy, if charged when the offence has not been completed, causes no actual harm. Bearing in mind the discussion of the rationale of the law of attempt, two questions need to be considered. Do conspiracies pose a "second order" harm—in the sense of posing a threat to security? Alternatively, is the blameworthiness of a conspirator so great as to justify dispensing with the requirement of harm which is normally required for the imposition of criminal liability? Or are there (and can there ever be) sufficient utilitarian arguments to justify dispensing with the requirement of harm?

C. PUNISHMENT OF CONSPIRACIES

5-090

At common law the punishment of those convicted of conspiracy was at the discretion of the court.¹⁵¹ In the case of those conspiracies which now fall within the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.1, punishment is limited to the maximum sentence for the complete crime which the defendants conspired to commit.¹⁵² In the case of common law conspiracies to defraud, the maximum sentence has been reduced to ten years.¹⁵³

SIR RUPERT CROSS AND ANDREW
ASHWORTH; THE ENGLISH
SENTENCING SYSTEM, 3RD EDN
(1981), P.156:

5-091

“Conspiracies might, however, be regarded as more serious crimes than attempts. Indeed, at common law it was held in Verrier v Director of Public Prosecutions ([1967] 2 A.C. 195) that some conspiracies might call for a greater punishment than could be imposed for the completed offence. Although s.3 of the Criminal Law Act now prohibits courts from exceeding the statutory maximum for the completed offence in conspiracy cases, a court still might wish to visit conspirators with more severe punishment than it would mete out to an individual committing the completed offence, whilst keeping within the statutory maximum. The argument is that the nature of the offence is exceptionally changed by the co-operation of large numbers in its commission, because of the greater chance of the occasioning of alarm and of the use of force. In fraud cases, the cooperation of different people in different places may facilitate both the execution and the concealment of the design. These considerations go to show that any offence, whether inchoate or completed, which is committed by a number of people acting in concert may be viewed as presenting a greater social danger than the same offence committed by an individual. On general deterrent grounds the sentence for ‘group’ offences may therefore be longer. Sentences for rape by gangs are on this account higher than those for rape by an individual.”

5-092

Consider, again, the discussion of the punishment for attempts and the significance of harm. It can be argued that those considerations have even greater force here if what is being punished is an agreement (that goes no further) to commit a crime. However, although the “dangerousness of collaboration argument” might be thought to be a weak one, it has certainly become more significant in a post-9/11 world; for example, in Barot (Dhiren) the defendant was given a life sentence with a minimum term of 30 years after having pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit mass murder in the UK and the US.¹⁵⁴ In relation to conspiracies where the crime has been completed (or where it has failed) there are different concerns. For evidential reasons the prosecution may fail to prove the complete crime but manage to secure a conviction for conspiracy. If the essence of the crime is the agreement, tempting though it might be to look beyond it in sentencing, this would amount to punishing somebody for something that has not been proven.

D. THE LAW

1. Types of conspiracy

5–093

At common law a conspiracy was an agreement between two or more persons “to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means”.¹⁵⁵ Thus it was not necessary to prove that there was an agreement to commit a crime; agreements to commit other “unlawful acts”, such as fraud, some torts or corruption of public morals, clearly sufficed. For instance, in Kamara v DPP,¹⁵⁶ an agreement to commit the tort of trespass to land, if accompanied by an intention to inflict more than merely nominal damage, was held to be a criminal conspiracy. Of course, it was virtually impossible to justify making it a crime to agree to do something that if actually done by one person acting alone would not have been criminal. Accordingly, the Criminal Law Act 1977 sought to limit conspiracy primarily to agreements to commit crimes. However, fearing that gaps might be created, and pending a comprehensive review of the law of fraud, obscenity and indecency, s.5 preserved certain common law conspiracies. We are thus left with the following rather unsatisfactory situation:

- (1) There are agreements to commit a crime. These are termed statutory conspiracies and are governed by the provisions of the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.1.
- (2) There are common law conspiracies governed by the old common law rules. Under the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.5, two species of common law conspiracy have been preserved. These are conspiracy to defraud and conspiracy to corrupt public morals or outrage public decency. Commentators have been saying since 1977 that these retentions were designed to be temporary. In 2002, the Law Commission proposed the abolition of the crime of conspiracy to defraud.¹⁵⁷ However, the Fraud Act 2006 does not give effect to this recommendation. Moreover, a 2012 report by the Ministry of Justice concludes that conspiracy to defraud works well alongside the Fraud Act and is an essential tool in combatting fraud.¹⁵⁸ It is now considered to be far too useful a charge to prosecutors where there are multiple offences¹⁵⁹ (especially if more than one jurisdiction is involved) to abolish it.

2. Common law conspiracies

(i) Conspiracy to defraud

5–094

The Criminal Law Act 1977 s.5(2) provides that common law rules continue to apply “so far as relates to conspiracy to defraud”. Two issues need to be addressed: the relationship between this common law conspiracy and statutory conspiracy and the width of this offence.¹⁶⁰

(a) Relationship to statutory conspiracy

5–095

Common law conspiracies to defraud will usually involve agreements to commit crimes. At one stage the House of Lords took the view that any conspiracy which involved an agreement to commit a crime had to be dealt with under the Criminal Law Act 1977 rather than the common law.¹⁶¹ This caused the prosecution considerable difficulties with both indictments and convictions for common law conspiracy being quashed when belatedly it was realised that the agreement was to commit an offence. The position now is that defendants may be charged with either offence in such cases.¹⁶²

(b) Width of the offence

5-096

In Scott v Metropolitan Police Commr, the leading case on conspiracy to defraud, the House of Lords stated:

“[I]t is clearly the law that an agreement by two or more by dishonesty to deprive a person of something which is his or to which he is or would be or might be entitled and an agreement by two or more by dishonesty to injure some proprietary right of his, suffices to constitute the offence of conspiracy to defraud.”¹⁶³

The following points need to be made in relation to this definition.

As indicated above, it embraces agreements to do an act which would not be an offence if completed. In 2002, the Law Commission provided an extensive list of conduct that could be prosecuted only as conspiracy to defraud.¹⁶⁴ Since then, however, the Fraud Act 2006 has expanded the reach of the law of completed offences. From the original list it would appear that only the following forms of conduct will not amount to the offence of fraud and so can only be prosecuted as conspiracy to defraud:

- (i) dishonestly obtaining a benefit which does not amount to property or services (as defined in the Fraud Act 2006) for example, obtaining confidential information;
- (ii) deception without an intention to obtain a gain, or cause a loss, but which prejudices another’s financial interests;
- (iii) deception for a non-financial purpose; and
- (iv) “fixing” an event on which bets have been placed.

In general, there need be no deception or false representation in order for the offence to be committed. In Scott, for example, the defendant agreed with employees of cinema owners temporarily to remove films so that he could make pirate copies which could be distributed commercially.¹⁶⁵ There was no deception played on the owners who were unaware of what was happening. The House of Lords rejected the idea that deception was a necessary ingredient of the offence. There must, of course, be dishonesty. However, the offence is so broad that many activities that would otherwise be legitimate can become fraudulent if the conduct is regarded as dishonest. As the Law Commission points out:

“In a capitalist society, commercial life revolves around the pursuit of gain for oneself and, as a corollary, others may lose out, whether directly or indirectly. Such behaviour is perfectly legitimate. It is only the element of ‘dishonesty’ which renders it a criminal fraud.”¹⁶⁶

Despite the width of the offence, there are some limits. In GG (Plc),¹⁶⁷ for example, in relation to a prosecution brought by the Serious Fraud Office, the House of Lords refused to accept that a large-scale price-fixing agreement amounted to a conspiracy to defraud even though it had been conducted secretly and, arguably, dishonestly. As a price-fixing agreement (prior to introduction of the cartel offence in the Enterprise Act 2002 s.188) was not criminal, aggravating factors such as misrepresentation needed to be proved upon which a conspiracy to defraud charge could be based.

It is clear that there is no requirement that actual economic loss be involved as long as the victim’s economic interests are put at risk¹⁶⁸:

“If the economic or proprietary interests of some other person are imperilled, that is sufficient to constitute fraud even though no loss is actually suffered and even though the fraudsman himself did not desire to bring about any loss.”¹⁶⁹

Theoretically, at least, the agreed offence needs to be one that will be committed by the parties to the agreement,¹⁷⁰ yet in practice it appears to be irrelevant that third parties will effect the defrauding.¹⁷¹

It now seems settled that there need be no intent to defraud in the sense of intending to cause another economic loss. The Privy Council has held that it is sufficient if the conspirators have dishonestly agreed to do something:

“which they realise will or may deceive the victim into so acting, or failing to act, that he will suffer economic loss or his economic interests will be put at risk.”¹⁷²

The defendants may not wish to harm the victim (they may even think they are acting with the best of motives)¹⁷³ but if they intend to bring about the state of affairs realising that the victim’s interests could be put at risk, they will be guilty.

Finally, conspiracy to defraud is not limited to situations where economic loss is involved or risked. It is also a conspiracy to defraud to agree dishonestly to deceive a public official into acting contrary to his public duties.¹⁷⁴

(ii) Conspiracy to corrupt public morals or outrage public decency

The Criminal Law Act 1977 s.5(3) provides that the common law rules continue to apply to conspiracies to corrupt public morals or outrage public decency provided that the object of the agreement does not amount to a crime. At the time, it was unclear whether outraging public decency and corrupting public morals were criminal offences in their own right although the Law Commission was of the view that they probably were.¹⁷⁵ The issue is now settled in relation to outraging public decency which is recognised as an offence by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.320. Accordingly, charges of conspiracy to outrage public decency will now be brought under the Criminal Law Act 1977 as statutory conspiracies.

The position is still unclear with regard to conspiracy to corrupt public morals. The House of Lords' decision of Shaw v DPP, in which the defendant agreed to (and did) publish a "Ladies' Directory" advertising information about named prostitutes, affirmed the existence of the offence of conspiracy to corrupt public morals.¹⁷⁶ It did not resolve the issue of whether there is a substantive offence of corrupting public morals.¹⁷⁷

Where does this leave us? Where the agreement involves a criminal offence (for example, under the Obscene Publications Act 1959) statutory conspiracy should be charged rather than conspiracy to corrupt public morals. There may well be gaps, however, where no criminal offence is involved and conspiracy to corrupt public morals currently occupies this space. This could be supported provided its use was confined to circumstances which "the jury might find to be destructive to the very fabric of society"¹⁷⁸ rather than being used for conduct which, by current standards of ordinary decent people, is mildly offensive. On the other hand, it is extremely difficult to justify the criminalisation of an agreement to do something which, if actually done, would not be criminal.

3. Statutory conspiracy

(i) Definition

CRIMINAL LAW ACT 1977 S.1:

5-100

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this Part of this Act, if a person agrees with any other person or persons that a course of conduct shall be pursued which, if the agreement is carried out in accordance with their intentions, either—

- (a) will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of any offence or offences by one or more of the parties to the agreement, or
- (b) would do so but for the existence of facts which render the commission of the offence or any of the offences impossible, he is guilty of conspiracy to commit the offence or offences in question.

(2) Where liability for any offence may be incurred without knowledge on the part of the person committing it of any particular fact or circumstance necessary for the commission of the offence, a person shall nevertheless not be guilty of conspiracy to commit that offence by virtue of subsection (1) above unless he and at least one other party to the agreement intend or know that that fact or circumstances shall or will exist at the time when the conduct constituting the offence is to take place.”

(ii) Agreement

5–101

There must be an agreement between at least two persons. There must have been a meeting of minds; decisions must have been communicated between the parties¹⁷⁹ although it is not necessary that each conspirator is aware of all the details of the conspiracy as long as there is a shared common purpose.¹⁸⁰

There must, of course, be at least two parties to the agreement. However, s.2(2) (a) provides that a husband and wife cannot be liable for conspiracy, if they are the only parties to the agreement.¹⁸¹ This provision was extended to civil partners by the Civil Partnership Act 2004,¹⁸² but does not apply to unmarried couples who live together in a relationship akin to marriage.¹⁸³ The Law Commission has proposed abolishing the archaic marital exception.¹⁸⁴ The Act also provides that a person cannot be liable if the only other party to the “agreement” is a person under the age of criminal responsibility (s.2(2)(b)) or is the intended victim of the offence (s.2(2)(c)). “Victim” is not defined in the Act but its meaning has now been considered by the Supreme Court in *Gnango*¹⁸⁵ where Lord Phillips argued that a narrow interpretation should be given to the word whereby ‘victim’ is confined to persons of a class the law intends to protect, otherwise:

“If ... [victim] is given the wide meaning it would seem to produce the surprising result that a conspiracy by two persons that one will commit a terrorist atrocity as a suicide bomber, or set fire to a house owned by one of them in furtherance of some ulterior motive, would appear not to subject either to criminal liability.”¹⁸⁶

Although obiter, it would seem likely that this approach would be followed if the issue were to come before a court. It also accords with the recommendation of the Law Commission that the exemption should be abolished for the non-victim conspirator but be retained for the victim where the conspiracy is to commit an offence which exists for the protection of a class of persons to which the victim belongs.¹⁸⁷ This would bring the law in line with the provisions in the Serious Crime Act 2007 and complicity.¹⁸⁸

As the law stands, it would thus appear that there can be liability if the defendant conspires with any other person having a defence (say insanity) other than the above, provided that such person is capable of reaching an agreement with the defendant.¹⁸⁹ Where a defendant and others are charged with conspiracy and those others are acquitted, s.5(8) provides that the defendant may nevertheless be convicted “unless under all the circumstances of the case his conviction is inconsistent with the acquittal of the other person or persons in question”.¹⁹⁰ This is sensible. There may be evidence admissible against the defendant that he conspired with A and B, but that evidence might not be admissible against A or B. Alternatively, it might be clear that he conspired with either A or B, but it is not certain which one it was. A and B must be given the benefit of the doubt and acquitted, but there is no reason why the defendant, whose guilt is beyond doubt, should be offered the same indulgence.¹⁹¹

(iii) Object of agreement

5–102

There must be an agreement that:

- (a) a course of conduct be pursued,
- (b) which if carried out in accordance with their intentions,

(c) will necessarily amount to (or involve) a crime.

Each of the phrases will now be examined in turn.

(a) Course of conduct be pursued

5–103

The phrase “course of conduct” here does not refer purely to physical actions, but must be taken to include intended consequences—in short, the plan. This point is best illustrated with an example. Suppose two persons agree to place a bomb under another’s car and detonate the bomb so as to kill the owner. The physical course of conduct agreed to, namely, the physical actions of planting the bomb, will not necessarily amount to the crime because the bomb may never go off. However, if the plan is carried out according to their intentions, the bomb will explode and the owner of the car will be killed. This necessarily amounts to a crime; killing someone in such circumstances is murder. The Law Commission has confirmed that this is the correct interpretation of the current law.¹⁹²

To say that the agreed course of conduct includes the planned consequences is also a limiting qualification. Only planned consequences can be included within the agreed course of conduct. Thus, as stated in Siracusa,¹⁹³ an agreement to cause grievous bodily harm is not sufficient to support a charge of conspiracy to murder even though an intention to cause grievous bodily harm is sufficient to support a charge of murder itself. In Siracusa it was held that although a person smuggling heroin could be convicted of a substantive offence if she thought that they were smuggling cannabis, the same was not true on a conspiracy charge: “the essence of the crime of conspiracy was the agreement and, in simple terms, one did not prove an agreement to import heroin by proving an agreement to import cannabis”.¹⁹⁴ The basis of this decision is that heroin and cannabis are different class drugs, involving separate offences. In Broad,¹⁹⁵ it was held to be immaterial that one conspirator thought heroin was to be produced while the other thought it would be cocaine. Both are Class A drugs; they had agreed to commit the same offence. It is further submitted that planned consequences mean intended consequences. If arson is planned between conspirators who are reckless as to whether anyone is killed during their fire, the death of those persons is not part of their plan. One does not plan for and intend an event possibly happening. Intention here, of course, should bear the same meaning as in other areas of law—bearing in mind that such intention may be inferred or established from foresight of a consequence as virtually certain.

The planned course of conduct also includes (and only includes) intended or known surrounding circumstances.¹⁹⁶ This phrase came under intense scrutiny in relation to conspiracies to traffic drugs¹⁹⁷ or to launder money. Under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.93C(2), defendants could be convicted of money laundering if they knew or had reasonable grounds to suspect that the property was the proceeds of crime.¹⁹⁸ Controversially, the Court of Appeal held that where defendants were charged with conspiracy to launder money, the prosecution need only establish that the defendant suspected (rather than knew) that the money was the proceeds of crime in order to convict.¹⁹⁹ This approach was ended by the following important decision.

R. v SAIK [2007] 1 A.C. 18 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

5-104

The facts appear from the judgment.

LORD NICHOLLS:

“[1] This appeal raises questions about the ingredients of the statutory offence of conspiracy and their application in the circumstances of this case. Shorn of its complexities the context is a charge of conspiracy to launder money brought against the Appellant, Mr Abdulrahman Saik. He operated a bureau de change in London, near Marble Arch. At his trial he pleaded guilty, subject to the qualification that he did not know the money was the proceeds of crime. He only suspected this was so. This qualified plea was accepted. The issue before your Lordships is whether the offence to which the Appellant pleaded guilty is an offence known to law. Reasonable grounds for suspicion are enough for the substantive offence of laundering money. But are they enough for a conspiracy to commit that offence?

[2] The mental ingredient in the statutory offence of conspiracy has given rise to difficulty. Some of the case law is confusing, and the academic commentators do not always speak with one voice ...

[4] ... [T]he mental element of the offence, apart from the mental element involved in making an agreement, comprises the intention to pursue a course of conduct which will necessarily involve commission of the crime in question by one or more of the conspirators. The conspirators must intend to do the act prohibited by the substantive offence. The conspirators' state of mind must also satisfy the mental ingredients of the substantive offence. If one of the ingredients of the substantive offence is that the act is done with a specific intent, the conspirators must intend to do the prohibited act and must intend to do the prohibited act with the prescribed intent ...

[6] Section 1(2) qualifies the scope of the offence created by section 1(1). This subsection is more difficult. Its essential purpose is to ensure that strict liability and recklessness have no place in the offence of conspiracy ...

[7] Under this subsection conspiracy involves a third mental element: intention or knowledge that a fact or circumstances necessary for the commission of the substantive offence will exist ...

[8] It follows from this requirement of intention or knowledge that proof of the mental element needed for the commission of the substantive offence will not always suffice on a charge of conspiracy to commit that offence. In respect of a material fact or circumstance conspiracy has its own mental element. In conspiracy this mental element is set as high as 'intend or know' ... In this respect the mental element of conspiracy is distinct from and supersedes the mental element in the substantive offence ...

[13] The rationale underlying this approach is that conspiracy imposes criminal liability on the basis of a person's intention. This is a different harm from the commission of the substantive offence. So it is right that the intention which is being criminalized in the offence of conspiracy should itself be blameworthy. This should be so, irrespective of the provisions of the substantive offence.

5-105

[14] Against this background I turn to some issues concerning the scope and effect of section 1(2). The starting point is to note that this relieving provision is not confined to substantive offences attracting strict liability. The subsection does not so provide. Nor would such an interpretation of the subsection make sense. It would make no sense for section 1(2) to apply, and only require proof of intention or knowledge, where liability for the substantive offence is absolute but not where the substantive offence has built into it a mental ingredient less than knowledge, such as suspicion.

[15] So much is clear. A more difficult question arises where an ingredient of the substantive offence is that the defendant must know of a material fact or circumstance. On its face section 1(2) does not apply in this case. The opening words of section 1(2), on their face, limit the scope of the subsection to cases where a person may commit an offence without knowledge of a material fact or circumstance.

[16] Plainly Parliament did not intend that a person would be liable for conspiracy where he lacks the knowledge required to commit the substantive offence. That could not be right. Parliament could not have intended such an absurd result. Rather, the assumption underlying section 1(2) is that, where knowledge of a material fact is an ingredient of a substantive offence, knowledge of that fact is also an ingredient of the crime of conspiring to commit the substantive offence.

[17] There are two ways this result might be achieved. One is simply to treat section 1(2) as inapplicable in this type of case ...

[18] The other route is to adopt the interpretation of section 1(2) suggested by Sir John Smith. The suggestion is that section 1(2) applies despite the opening words of the subsection ...

[19] The first route accords more easily with the language of section 1(2), but I prefer the second route for the following reason. A conspiracy is looking to the future. It is an agreement about future conduct. When the agreement is made the 'particular fact or circumstance necessary for the commission' of the substantive offence may not have happened. So the conspirator cannot be said to know of the fact or circumstance at that time. Nor, if the happening of the fact or circumstance is beyond his control, can it be said that the conspirator will know of that fact or circumstance.

[20] Section 1(2) expressly caters for this situation. The conspirator must 'intend or know' that this fact or circumstance 'shall or will exist' when the conspiracy is carried into effect. Although not the happiest choice of language, 'intend' is descriptive of a state of mind which is looking to the future ... Thus on a charge of conspiracy to handle stolen property where the property has not been identified when the agreement is made, the prosecution must prove that the conspirator intended that the property which was the subject of the conspiracy would be stolen property ...

[23] ... [In relation to conspiracy to launder money his Lordship continued] Hence, where the property has not been identified when the conspiracy agreement is reached, the prosecution must prove that the defendant intended that the property would be the proceeds of criminal conduct ...

[25] What, however, if the property to which the conspiracy relates was specifically identified when the conspirators made their agreement? In that event the prosecution must prove the conspirators 'knew' the property was the proceeds of crime. This is the next point of difficulty with the interpretation of section 1(2). [Does 'know' in this context mean 'believe'? ...

[26] I do not think ... [this] approach can be accepted. The phrase under consideration ('intend or know') in section 1(2) is a provision of general application to all conspiracies. In this context the word 'know' should be interpreted strictly and not watered down. In this context knowledge means true belief ...

[30] From what has been said above, it is evident that this conviction cannot stand. Suspicion is not sufficient in respect of a fact to which section 1(2) applies. Knowledge or intention regarding the provenance of the property must be proved or admitted."

Appeal allowed

5-106

This decision settles, for now at least, a number of the interpretative difficulties which had plagued s.1(2). We now know that s.1(2) applies to conspiracies to commit all offences. This is clearly right. We also know that mere suspicion will not suffice and that intention or knowledge must be proved. As Ormerod has commented:

“In this respect the offence of conspiracy is stricter than that of attempt where the courts have accepted that recklessness as to circumstances is a sufficient mens rea where that would suffice for the substantive crime attempted. This is not objectionable or illogical, it is submitted, since conspiracy is a distinct crime reflecting a different wrong from that involved in attempt.”²⁰⁰

So much is clear from Saik. Beyond this, however, as the Law Commission has commented, their Lordships held different views as to what would constitute “knowledge”.²⁰¹ Further, although Lord Nicholls distinguished between agreements relating to identified and as yet unidentified property (when in the latter case, the appropriate word for prosecutors to use would be “intend” and not “knowledge”), this distinction could give rise to difficulties.²⁰²

This more rigorous interpretation of the elements of conspiracy has the potential of reducing its usefulness to prosecutors where the completed crime has taken place.²⁰³ It was to be anticipated, therefore, that in light of Saik the Government would ask the Law Commission to review the law of conspiracy.

LAW COMMISSION, CONSPIRACY AND ATTEMPTS (CONSULTATION PAPER
NO. 183) (2007), PARAS 4.107–4.108:

5–107

“4.107 As a matter of statutory interpretation, on the facts the correct conclusion was reached by the majority of the House of Lords in Saik. As Lord Nicholls noted, ‘[a] decision to deal with money suspected to be the proceeds of crime is not the same as a conscious decision to deal with the proceeds of crime.’ Only the latter behaviour is prohibited on the correct construction of section 1(2).

4.108 However, in our view, this reading of section 1(2) renders the offence unacceptably narrow. If the prosecution have to prove in every case that, at the time of the agreement, the parties knew or intended that the relevant facts or circumstance existed, then the law is too generous to those who plan to engage in conduct that may well be criminal. It does not extend to highly blameworthy behaviour that we believe should be encompassed within the offence of conspiracy.”

5–108

Accordingly, as the law itself is regarded as defective, the Law Commission recommends that it should be changed so that:

“An alleged conspirator must be shown at the time of the agreement to be reckless whether a circumstance element of a substantive offence (or other relevant circumstance) would be present at the relevant time, when the substantive offence requires no proof of fault, or has a requirement for proof only of negligence (or its equivalent), in relation to that circumstance.”²⁰⁴

The Law Commission’s view is that this would:

“ensure that defendants such as Mr Saik, those who agree to commit rape believing that the victim ‘might not’ consent and those who agree to handle stolen goods believing that, should they do so, the goods will be stolen, would all be guilty of statutory conspiracy.”²⁰⁵

This change would also bring the law in this respect into line with the offences of encouraging or assisting crime and would accord with an interpretation of mens rea that has in the past been adopted in relation to attempt, although it is not consistent with the approach adopted in Pace.²⁰⁶

(b) If carried out in accordance with their intentions

5–109

What is the position if the parties’ intentions are equivocal? For example, they might agree to burgle a house if a window has been left open. The better view here is that the “plan” is a plan to burgle a house (albeit subject to a condition) and if that plan is carried out it will necessarily amount to a crime. As Lord Nicholls comments in Saik:

“An intention to do a prohibited act is within the scope of section 1(1) even if the intention is expressed to be conditional on the happening, or non-happening, of some particular event. The question always is whether the agreed course of conduct, if carried out in accordance with the parties' intentions, would necessarily involve an offence. A conspiracy to rob a bank tomorrow if the coast is clear when the conspirators reach the bank is not, by reason of this qualification, any less a conspiracy to rob. In the nature of things, every agreement to do something in the future is hedged about with conditions, implicit if not explicit."²⁰⁷

R. V JACKSON [1985] CRIM. L.R. 442
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

5-110

The appellants agreed to shoot their friend, W, in the leg if he was convicted of a burglary for which he was being tried. They thought this would provide mitigation. W was shot and permanently disabled. The appellants appealed against their conviction for conspiracy to pervert the course of justice on the ground that their agreement did not necessarily involve the commission of a crime, as everything depended on a contingency (W's conviction for burglary) which might not have taken place.

Held, "[P]lanning was taking place for a contingency and if that contingency occurred the conspiracy would necessarily involve the commission of an offence. 'Necessarily' is not to be held to mean that there must inevitably be the carrying out of an offence. It means, if the agreement is carried out in accordance with the plan, there must be the commission of the offence referred to in the conspiracy count."

Appeal dismissed

5-111

In O'Hadhmaill,²⁰⁸ the defendant, a member of the IRA, agreed to a bombing campaign if the cease-fire in Northern Ireland ended. This was held to be sufficient intention for the crime of conspiracy.

The approach adopted in all these cases is defensible. Virtually all agreements are conditional. It is implicit in most agreements to commit a crime that the actions will only be carried out if there is not the metaphoric “policeman at one’s elbow” at the scene of the crime. However, there is still some uncertainty about the precise scope of conditional intention in relation to s.1(2) that has been exposed by the decision in Saik. What if two defendants agree that they will have sex with a woman and they suspect that she may not consent? Although the issue of conditional intention did not fall to be determined in Saik it would appear that this state of mind will not now suffice for liability for conspiracy to rape. However, as Baroness Hale in her dissenting speech argues, the defendants have an intent to rape—they have agreed that they will go ahead even if at the time when they go ahead they know she is not consenting—and this ought to be a conspiracy to commit rape. If recklessness rather than intention or knowledge were required in relation to facts or circumstances, as proposed by the Law Commission, the liability of such defendants would be clear.²⁰⁹

The plan must also be carried out “in accordance with their intentions”. What does this mean? What is the position of a person who agrees to the commission of a crime and agrees to supply tools for the crime but who thereafter has no interest in what happens and indeed thinks the planned crime is over-ambitious and will never be committed? Or, what is the position of a plain-clothes police officer who, with a view to entrapping the others, “agrees” to a plan to commit a crime, but actually intends to prevent the crime at the last moment? In short, must each conspirator intend that the crime actually be carried out?

R. V ANDERSON [1986] A.C. 27 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

5–112

The defendant agreed for a fee to supply diamond wire to cut through bars in order to enable another person, Andaloussi, to escape from prison. He claimed that he only intended to supply the wire and then go abroad. He believed the plan could never succeed. He appealed against his conviction for conspiring with others to effect the release of one of them from prison claiming that as he did not intend or expect the plan to be carried out, he lacked the necessary mens rea for the offence of conspiracy.

LORD BRIDGE:

“[I]t is not necessary that more than one of the participants in the agreed course of conduct shall commit a substantive offence. It is, of course, necessary that any party to the agreement shall have assented to play his part in the agreed course of conduct, however innocent in itself, knowing that the part to be played by one or more of the others will amount to or involve the commission of an offence.

... The heart of the submission for the appellant is that in order to be convicted of conspiracy to commit a given offence ... the party charged should not only have agreed that a course of conduct shall be pursued which will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of that offence by himself or one or more other parties to the agreement, but must also be proved himself to have intended that that offence should be committed. Thus, it is submitted here that the appellant's case that he never intended that Andaloussi should be enabled to escape from prison raised an issue to be left to the jury, who should have been directed to convict him only if satisfied that he did so intend ...

I am clearly driven by consideration of the diversity of roles which parties may agree to play in criminal conspiracies to reject any construction of the statutory language which would require the prosecution to prove an intention on the part of each conspirator that the criminal offence or offences which will necessarily be committed by one or more of the conspirators if the agreed course of conduct is fully carried out should in fact be committed ... In these days of highly organised crime the most serious statutory conspiracies will frequently involve an elaborate and complex agreed course of conduct in which many will consent to play necessary but subordinate roles, not involving them in any direct participation in the commission of the offence or offences at the centre of the conspiracy. Parliament cannot have intended that such parties should escape conviction of conspiracy on the basis that it cannot be proved against them that they intended that the relevant offence or offences should be committed.

There remains the important question whether a person who has agreed that a course of conduct will be pursued which, if pursued as agreed, will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence is guilty of statutory conspiracy irrespective of his intention, and, if not, what is the mens rea of the offence. I have no hesitation in answering the first part of the question in the negative. There may be many situations in which perfectly respectable citizens, more particularly those concerned with law enforcement, may enter into agreements that a course of conduct shall be pursued which will involve commission of a crime without the least intention of playing any part in furtherance of the ostensibly agreed criminal objective, but rather with the purpose of exposing and frustrating the criminal purpose of the other parties to the agreement. To say this is in no way to encourage schemes by which the police act, directly or through the agency of informers, as agents provocateurs for the purpose of entrapment. That is conduct of which the courts have always strongly disapproved. But it may sometimes happen, as most of us with experience in criminal trials well know, that a criminal enterprise is well advanced in the course of preparation when it comes to the notice either of the police or of some honest citizen in such circumstances that the only prospect of exposing and frustrating the criminals is that some innocent person should play the part of an intending collaborator in the course of criminal conduct proposed to be pursued. The mens rea implicit in the offence of statutory conspiracy must clearly be such as to recognise the innocence of such a person, notwithstanding that he will, in literal terms, be obliged to agree that a course of conduct be pursued involving the commission of an offence ...

[B]eyond the mere fact of agreement, the necessary mens rea of the crime is, in my opinion, established if, and only if, it is shown that the accused, when he entered into the agreement, intended to play some part in the agreed course of conduct in furtherance of the criminal purpose which the agreed course of conduct was intended to achieve. Nothing less will suffice; nothing more is required.

Applying this test to the facts which, for the purposes of the appeal, we must assume, the appellant, in agreeing that a course of conduct be pursued that would, if successful, necessarily involve the offence of effecting Andaloussi's escape from lawful custody, clearly intended, by providing diamond wire to be smuggled into the prison, to play a part in the agreed course of conduct in furtherance of that criminal objective. Neither the fact that he intended to play no further part in attempting to effect the escape, nor that he believed the escape to be impossible, would, if the jury had supposed they might be true, have afforded him any defence.”

Appeal dismissed

5–114

One of the major reservations underlying all the inchoate offences is that no (first order) harm has been caused. How do we justify the invocation of the criminal law? We saw that (apart from arguments of there being a second order harm) the main case for criminalisation was on grounds of blameworthiness. With attempted crime the absence of harm is compensated by a requirement that the defendant intended to commit the complete offence; the highest degree of blame is required. An examination of the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.1 should lead one to a similar conclusion in relation to conspiracy—as, indeed, it has done in relation to s.1(2). One would have thought that no one could be convicted of an offence if he or she did not intend the consequences comprising the offence. Anderson refutes this view with the result that a defendant can be guilty of a serious criminal offence when there has been no conduct beyond a bare agreement and where the defendant never intended that the offence be carried out.

Subsequent decisions have appeared to share this concern and have not all followed Anderson. In McPhillips,²¹⁰ a defendant was acquitted of conspiracy to murder because he intended to give a warning before a bomb was exploded. It was held that he could only be liable if he had intended that the plan be carried out. Anderson was distinguished on the fairly unconvincing ground that in that case there had been no intention of frustrating the plan. In Edwards,²¹¹ the Court of Appeal stated that the trial judge had been right to direct the jury that the defendant could only be guilty of conspiring to supply amphetamine if he had intended to supply amphetamine. Anderson was again distinguished in the following Privy Council decision.

YIP CHIU-CHEUNG V THE QUEEN

The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to traffic in heroin contrary to common law and the Hong Kong Dangerous Drugs Ordinance. He appealed on the basis that his co-conspirator, Needham (who had not been prosecuted), was an undercover drugs enforcement agent who had had no intention that the crime would be committed.

LORD GRIFFITHS:

“[I]t was submitted that the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were wrong to hold that Needham, the undercover agent, could be a conspirator because he lacked the necessary mens rea or guilty mind required for the offence of conspiracy. It was urged upon their Lordships that no moral guilt attached to the undercover agent who was at all times acting courageously and with the best of motives in attempting to infiltrate and bring to justice a gang of criminal drug dealers. In these circumstances it was argued that it would be wrong to treat the agent as having any criminal intent, and reliance was placed upon a passage in the speech of Lord Bridge of Harwich [in Anderson above]; but in that case Lord Bridge was dealing with a different situation from that which exists in the present case. There may be many cases in which undercover police officers or other law enforcement agents pretend to join a conspiracy in order to gain information about the plans of the criminals, with no intention of taking any part in the planned crime but rather with the intention of providing information that will frustrate it. It was to this situation that Lord Bridge was referring in R. v Anderson. The crime of conspiracy requires an agreement between two persons to commit an unlawful act with the intention of carrying it out. It is the intention to carry out the crime that constitutes the necessary mens rea for the offence. As Lord Bridge pointed out, the undercover agent who has no intention of committing the crime lacks the necessary mens rea to be a conspirator.

The facts of the present case are quite different ... Needham intended to commit that offence by carrying the heroin through the customs and on to the aeroplane bound for Australia ... Naturally, Needham never expected to be prosecuted if he carried out the plan as intended. But the fact that in such circumstances the authorities would not prosecute the undercover agent does not mean that he did not commit the crime albeit as part of a wider scheme to combat drug dealing.”²¹²

Appeal dismissed

5-116

This decision is, of course, of persuasive authority only and, strictly, applies only to the common law offence of conspiracy. However, it restates the right principle and is the approach that should be adopted. In Saik, Lord Nicholls, without referring to Anderson, commented that the conspirators must intend to do the act prohibited by the substantive offence.²¹³

The defendant in Anderson was not truly a conspirator. Had he supplied the diamond wire (he was injured before he could even attempt to do so) it would have been appropriate to charge him with aiding and abetting a conspiracy.²¹⁴ In such circumstances, it is now possible to use the inchoate offences of encouraging or assisting crime. As the Law Commission states, this solution addresses the policy concerns identified by Lord Bridge in Anderson and means that the approach taken in that case is “no longer appropriate or necessary”.²¹⁵

On the facts of Anderson there were two or more other conspirators who did intend the offence to be committed, and, although the House of Lords does not seem to have regarded this as significant, it is submitted that this is crucial for a conviction under s.1. If this were not so, one could have a situation where there was a “conspiracy which no one intends to carry out [which would be] an absurdity, if not an impossibility”.²¹⁶ The solution adopted by the Draft Criminal Code (below) is that it is necessary for the accused and at least one other party to the agreement to intend that the offence be committed. More recently the Law Commission has indicated that each defendant must intend that the conduct and consequence element occur, an approach which would go a long way in restoring clarity to the law.²¹⁷

In addition to these difficulties, Anderson created a further problem. Lord Bridge refers to the requirement that each conspirator must have “assented to play his part in the agreed course of conduct”. It has never been part of the crime of conspiracy that all conspirators need to agree to play an active role and could place the godfathers of criminal conspiracies even further beyond the reach of the criminal justice system.”²¹⁸ Fortunately, in the case of King, the Court of Appeal has indicated (obiter) that it does not favour Lord Bridge’s “controversial” requirement being taken literally.²¹⁹

(c) Necessarily amount to (or involve) a crime

5–117

We have already examined the meaning of “necessarily”. It does not matter whether the actual conduct will in fact amount to a crime. What matters is whether the plan, if successfully carried out, will do so. It therefore follows that it is irrelevant whether the crime is even possible. As shall be seen, this is confirmed by the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.1(1)(b).

What is meant by “amount to or involve the commission of any offence or offences by one or more of the parties to the agreement”? In Hollinshead,²²⁰ the Court of Appeal held that this meant that one of the parties had to intend to commit the offence as a principal offender. This means that there cannot be a conspiracy to aid and abet an offence.²²¹

(iv) Impossibility

5–118

At common law the House of Lords in *Nock*²²² followed *Haughton v Smith*²²³ and held there could be no liability for a conspiracy to commit the impossible. This decision has now been reversed by the amendment to s.1(1) which states that there can be liability even though there exist facts which render the commission of the offence impossible. Thus, if two defendants agree to kill X, but unknown to them X is already dead, they can nevertheless still be liable for conspiracy to murder. This provision is, however, limited to statutory conspiracies. The result is somewhat anomalous: there can be liability for a statutory conspiracy to commit the impossible, but no liability for similar common law conspiracies. In relation to statutory conspiracies, the question must be asked again: when defendants have done no more than agree to commit a crime, and when it is quite impossible in any event for that crime to be committed, are we justified in imposing criminal liability?

(v) Repentance

5–119

If a conspirator repents and withdraws immediately after the agreement has been reached, it would appear that he is still guilty of conspiracy.²²⁴ In the light of the material on repentance in the law of attempt,²²⁵ should not a defendant who never gets further than agreeing to commit a crime, and who never does anything in pursuance of that agreement—indeed, who positively disassociates himself from it—be entitled to a defence? Unless one attaches very considerable significance to the “dangerousness of collaboration” argument, liability cannot be justified in such cases. It is disappointing, therefore, that the Law Commission has rejected the idea of withdrawal amounting to a defence.²²⁶

(vi) Jurisdiction

5–120

One of the justifications offered in support of conspiracy is that it is necessary to fight organised crime and, increasingly, organised crime involves trading in drugs. It is, therefore, likely that such conspiracies (and, with growing mobility, others as well) will contain an international element. More recently, there has been significant concern over international conspiracies to commit terrorist acts.

The position now is clear. If the agreement is made in this country and the defendant knows that the substantive offence will be committed in this country (such as the importation of controlled substances) then no problems of jurisdiction arise. If the agreement is made abroad the conspiracy is indictable in this country even though no overt act takes place here before the defendants are caught.²²⁷

The reverse situation, where there is an agreement in this country to commit a crime abroad, is dealt with by the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.1A.²²⁸ English courts will have jurisdiction over any conspiracy to commit a crime abroad. The agreed acts must amount to a crime in the country where they are to take place and must constitute an offence under English law were they to be committed here. This provision, aimed at terrorist organisations in England planning crimes abroad, is of wide effect and covers agreements to commit any crime abroad, no matter how trivial it might be.²²⁹

The Law Commission has recommended that all of these provisions be brought into line with the rules for the new offences of encouraging and assisting.²³⁰

IV. Encouraging or Assisting Crime

A. INTRODUCTION

5–121

At common law there was an inchoate offence of incitement²³¹ whereby the defendant persuaded or encouraged another to commit a crime. It could be used, for example, against defendants who encouraged others to view pornographic images of children, to grow cannabis or to attack unbelievers. However, the Law Commission formed the view that the offence of incitement was in need of clarification and reform²³² and in 2007 the common law offence was abolished and replaced with three new inchoate offences dealing with encouraging or assisting crime. These offences, contained within the Serious Crime Act 2007 Pt 2, were designed as part of the response to serious and organised crime, although they are not limited to such offences. They have been subject to sustained criticism from the beginning by academic commentators and by the House of Commons Justice Committee²³³ and the Court of Appeal.²³⁴ The provisions are undeniably complex and raise profound concerns about the breadth of the law.

B. RATIONALE OF LIABILITY AND REFORM

5–122

The need for a crime of incitement (or solicitation as it is commonly named, especially in the US) was always controversial.

WAYNE R. LAFAVE AND AUSTIN W. SCOTT, CRIMINAL LAW, 2ND EDN (1986), PP.488–489:

5–123

“One view is that a mere solicitation to commit a crime, not accompanied by agreement or action by the person solicited, presents no significant social danger. It is argued, for example, that solicitation is not dangerous because the resisting will of an independent agent is interposed between the solicitor and commission of the crime which is his object. Similarly, it is claimed that the solicitor does not constitute a menace in view of the fact that he has manifested an unwillingness to carry out the criminal scheme himself. There is not the dangerous proximity to success which exists when the crime is actually attempted, for, ‘despite the earnestness of the solicitation, the actor is merely engaging in talk which may never be taken seriously’ (1 National Commission of Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, Working Papers 370 (1970)).

On the other hand, it is argued:

‘that a solicitation is, if anything, more dangerous than a direct attempt, because it may give rise to that cooperation among criminals which is a special hazard. Solicitation may, indeed, be thought of as an attempt to conspire. Moreover, the solicitor, working his will through one or more agents, manifests an approach to crime more intelligent and masterful than the effort of his hireling.’ (Wechsler, Jones and Korn, (1961) 61 Colum. L. Rev. 571).

It is noted, for example, that the imposition of liability for criminal solicitation has proved to be an important means by which the leadership of criminal movements may be suppressed.

Without regard to whether it is correct to say that solicitations are more dangerous than attempts, it is fair to conclude that the purposes of the criminal law are well served by inclusion of the crime of solicitation within the substantive criminal law. Providing punishment for solicitation aids in the prevention of the harm which would result should the inducements prove successful, and also aids in protecting the public from being exposed to inducements to commit or join in the commission of crimes. As is true of the law of attempts, the crime of solicitation (a) provides a basis for timely law enforcement intervention to prevent the intended crime, (b) permits the criminal justice process to deal with individuals who have indicated their dangerousness, and (c) avoids inequality of treatment based upon a fortuity (here, withholding of the desired response by the person solicited) beyond the control of the actor.

Objections to making solicitation a crime ... are sometimes based upon the fear that false charges may readily be brought either out of a misunderstanding as to what the defendant said or for purposes of harassment. This risk is inherent in the punishment of almost all inchoate crimes, although it is perhaps somewhat greater as to the crime of solicitation in that the crime may be committed merely by speaking.”

5-124

Consider again our earlier discussion of the rationale and punishment of attempts and conspiracies.²³⁵ In relation to conduct that now falls within the description of “encouraging”, bear in mind that if the person encouraged agrees to commit the crime there will be a criminal conspiracy. Thus, the offence amounts to no more than an attempted conspiracy (an offence abolished by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(4)), and this raises the question of whether the existence of this form of inchoate liability is justified. Such persons clearly have indicated some degree of dangerousness and it is obviously desirable to deter people from encouraging others to commit crime, but, unlike attempt, such actors are far removed from the complete crime. It can be argued that their actions are not manifestly dangerous; they constitute no “second order” harm and, unlike conspiracy, there is not necessarily the “dangerousness of combination” argument that can justify the existence of the offence. In short, given the reasons why the law does not punish guilty intentions alone but insists upon a manifestation of those intentions, does the law push back the threshold of criminal liability too far? Or have we reached the point where serious and organised crime represents such a threat to society that liability is justified? Even if the crime could now be justified, surely for the same reasons, it could never be justifiable to impose the same sentence (let alone a greater one, as was possible under the common law) as for the completed crime.

That does not, however, conclude the discussion. Unlike the common law offence of incitement, the new offences criminalise the doing of acts which “assist” as well as encourage the commission of offences. Indeed, one of the main catalysts for reform was the absence of an offence of facilitating crime.

LAW COMMISSION, INCHOATE LIABILITY FOR ASSISTING AND ENCOURAGING CRIME (LAW COM.
NO. 300), (2006), PARAS 1.3–1.5:

5–125

“1.3 [W]e consider [this] to be a major defect of the common law. At common law if D encourages P to commit an offence that subsequently P does not commit or attempt to commit, D may nevertheless be criminally liable. By contrast, if D assists P to commit an offence, D incurs no criminal liability at common law if subsequently P, for whatever reason, does not commit or attempt to commit the offence:

Example 1A

D, in return for payment, lends a van to P believing that P will use the van in order to commit a robbery. The police arrest P in connection with another matter before P can even attempt to commit the robbery. D is not criminally liable despite the fact that he or she intended to bring about harm and, by lending the van to P, has manifested that intention. If, however, in addition to giving P the van, D had uttered words encouraging P to rob V, D would be guilty of incitement to commit robbery. The common law appears to treat words more seriously than deeds. Yet, it might be thought that seeking to bring about harm by assisting a person to commit an offence is as culpable as seeking to do so by means of encouragement.

1.4 Increasingly, the police, through the gathering of intelligence, are able to identify preliminary acts of assistance by D before P commits or attempts to commit the principal offence. Yet, the common law only partially reflects this significant development. As a result, if D assists but does not encourage P to commit an offence, the police may have to forego at least some of the advantages of more sophisticated and effective methods of investigation by having to wait until P commits or attempts to commit the offence before they can proceed against D.

1.5 In contrast to acts of assistance, if D encourages P to commit an offence which P does not go on to commit, D will be guilty of incitement provided he or she satisfies the fault element of the offence. However, the offence of incitement has a number of unsatisfactory features:

- (1) there is uncertainty as to whether it must be D's purpose that P should commit the offence that D is inciting;
- (2) the fault element of the offence has been distorted by decisions of the Court of Appeal. These decisions have focused, wrongly, on the state of mind of P rather than on D's state of mind;
- (3) there is uncertainty as to whether and, if so, to what extent it is a defence to act in order to prevent the commission of an offence or to prevent or limit the occurrence of harm;
- (4) there is uncertainty as to the circumstances in which D is liable for inciting P to do an act which, if done by P, would not involve P committing an offence, for example because P is under the age of criminal responsibility or lacks a guilty mind;
- (5) the rules governing D's liability in cases where D incites P to commit an inchoate offence have resulted in absurd distinctions;
- (6) D may have a defence if the offence that he or she incites is impossible to commit whereas impossibility is not a defence to other inchoate offences, apart from common law conspiracies."

Thus, the legislation attempts to remedy the defects of the common law and plug the gaps caused by the lack of a crime of facilitation (the absence of which, in the view of the Law Commission, had led to an unacceptable extension of the law of conspiracy²³⁶). In relation to the flaws with incitement, it has been commented that even the Law Commission acknowledged that they “rarely troubled the courts”²³⁷ and that although some statutory clarification might have been desirable, none of the reasons above provided “a compelling case for outright abolition of incitement”.²³⁸ Further, despite the Law Commission’s arguments, views are divided as whether there was a need to criminalise acts of assistance at all or in the way adopted. While some commentators argue that the broad approach is an understandable response to serious, organised and terrorist crime,²³⁹ others remain sceptical and believe that even if criminalisation might be justified, it could have been achieved in a much more straightforward way²⁴⁰ by simply creating a new inchoate offence of facilitation.²⁴¹

Finally, it should be noted that the proposals of the Law Commission in relation to incitement went hand in hand with their proposals in relation to complicity. Whilst the Government has taken up the first proposals it has failed to do so in relation to parties to crime. The Law Commission’s original proposals were an attempt to introduce a coherent range of measures where the width of the new encouraging and assisting offences was balanced by a narrowing of the law on complicity. It is most unfortunate that as a result of the Government’s response we are left with laws which significantly extend the net of liability.

C. THE LAW

The Serious Crime Act 2007 Pt 2 creates three offences of encouraging and assisting crime.²⁴² Despite the legislation having been in force since 2008, there is little case-law on the provisions,²⁴³ although the difficulties inherent in s.46 have now, as will be seen below, been subject to judicial scrutiny. However, use is increasingly being made of the provisions²⁴⁴—and this is certainly true in relation to prosecutions arising from the riots in August 2011.²⁴⁵

1. Common elements

5–128

The three offences share certain key words and phrases; notably “encouraging”, “assisting” and “capable of”. In a piece of legislation in which so much is spelt out one might have anticipated that these terms would have been defined. However, the Act does not define what acts²⁴⁶ are capable of being encouragement or assistance. In so far as “encouragement” is concerned, the Law Commission’s view was that it should carry the same broad meaning that incitement had had at common law²⁴⁷; thus, it will include persuading, suggesting, requesting, commanding or goading another person (P) to commit a crime.²⁴⁸ Section 65(1) does make clear that, just as with the common law, encouragement includes threatening another or otherwise putting pressure on P to commit the offence. Beyond this, the concept is one for the courts to develop. In relation to “assistance” the term is also undefined although the Law Commission’s view was that it “extends to any conduct on the part of D that, as a matter of fact, makes it easier for P to commit the principal offence”.²⁴⁹ It is also of concern that any act of assistance, however trivial, appears to suffice for liability if it is capable of assisting another.²⁵⁰

Under s.65(2), acts that are capable of encouraging or assisting can include “taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought in respect of that offence”. While the mischief aimed at by inchoate offences is acts done prior to the commission of the substantive offence, there is nothing in the wording of the statute to prevent acts done afterwards being prosecuted. It could be argued, for example, that the provision of a getaway car encourages the offence. Section 65(2)(b) states that the defendant is liable if he fails to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty—but only if the failure is a deliberate one rather than mere forgetfulness.²⁵¹ The Law Commission gave, as an example, a security guard who omits to turn on the burglar alarm with the intention of assisting another to burgle the premises.²⁵²

Further, under s.66 the defendant may be liable where their encouragement or assistance is indirect, for example, a gang leader who instructs a member of the gang to encourage another person to kill the victim would be liable under s.44.²⁵³

The third common phrase is that the defendant's act must be "capable of" encouraging or assisting another to commit an offence. As the focus is upon the defendant's conduct it is unnecessary for it, in fact to encourage or assist P to commit an offence. Indeed, it seems that it is unnecessary for P to be aware of the defendant's conduct as long as the act "is capable" of assisting or encouraging the commission of a crime.²⁵⁴ This means that these offences are wider than the old law of incitement where the acts constituting the incitement had to be communicated to the incitee.²⁵⁵

Given these common elements the key difference between the three new offences is in relation to the mens rea requirements.

2. Intentionally encouraging or assisting an offence

SERIOUS CRIME ACT 2007 S.44:

5-129

“(1) A person commits an offence if—

- (a) he does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence; and
- (b) he intends to encourage or assist its commission.

(2) But he is not to be taken to have intended to encourage or assist the commission of an offence merely because such encouragement or assistance was a foreseeable consequence of his act.”

By virtue of s.55 the offence is triable in the same way as the “anticipated offence” (the offence which the defendant is encouraging or assisting another to commit).

(i) Actus reus

5–130

The defendant's acts must be capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence and may include a "course of conduct".²⁵⁶ As noted above, the focus is very much upon the acts of the defendant and not upon the impact it has upon P. Unlike ss.45 and 46 below, the offence encouraged or assisted can be the other inchoate offences of conspiracy or attempt; thus, the defendant could be found liable for encouraging P to enter into a conspiracy if she possesses the necessary mens rea. The existence of this double inchoate liability is a worrying illustration of the width of this offence.

(ii) Mens rea

5–131

At first sight, the mens rea requirement under s.44 appears straightforward: the defendant must intend by his act to assist or encourage the commission of the offence. Section 44(2) states that such a defendant cannot be taken to have intended to encourage or assist merely because such encouragement or assistance was a foreseeable consequence of his conduct. Thus, only intention suffices.²⁵⁷ However, beyond this the provisions become much more complex.

SERIOUS CRIME ACT 2007 S.47:

5–132

"47 Proving an offence under this Part

(1) Sections 44, 45, and 46 are to be read in accordance with this section.

(5) In proving for the purposes of this section whether an act is one which, if done, would amount to the commission of an offence—

(a) if the offence is one requiring proof of fault, it must be proved that—

(i) D believed that, were the act to be done, it would be

- done with that fault;
- (ii) D was reckless as to whether or not it would be done with that fault; or
 - (iii) D's state of mind was such that, were he to do it, it would be done with that fault; and
- (b) if the offence is one requiring proof of particular circumstances or consequences (or both), it must be proved that—
- (i) D believed that, were the act to be done, it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences; or
 - (ii) D was reckless as to whether or not it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences.”

5-133

Section 44 penalises the encouragement or assistance of an offence; thus, where that offence requires proof of fault the defendant must also have mens rea in relation to it. By virtue of s.47(5)(a), for offences requiring proof of fault, it must be proved that: (i) the defendant intended²⁵⁸ or believed that the act would be done with the necessary fault, (ii) was reckless whether it would be done with that fault, or (iii) that the defendant's state of mind was such that, were they to do it, it would be done with that fault.²⁵⁹

Further, if the offence is one that requires proof of consequences or circumstances or both, s.47(5)(b) requires that the defendant believed or was reckless as to whether P's conduct would have those consequences or be done in those circumstances. The relationship between these two provisions is important. Suppose the defendant provides P with a baseball bat, intending that P use it to cause grievous bodily harm to the victim but P uses it intentionally to kill the victim. Under s.47(5)(a) the defendant has the requisite mens rea for encouraging murder but under s.47(5)(b) the defendant does not believe and is not reckless as to the consequence (death) and so cannot be liable for encouraging murder. Equally, he cannot be liable for encouraging manslaughter. While P (if he had a lesser mens rea) can be liable for constructive manslaughter if he performs a dangerous unlawful act which causes death, the defendant must foresee the consequence (death). There is no room for constructive liability here. In the baseball bat example, it is possible, however, that the defendant could be liable for encouraging grievous bodily harm, contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.18—provided this offence was specified in the indictment. According to the Explanatory Notes to the Act, it would be unfair to hold the defendant liable for encouraging and assisting murder, unless he also believed or was reckless as to whether the victim was killed.²⁶⁰ While this is a useful safeguard (and in the context of strict liability offences means rightly that the defendant cannot be liable without belief or recklessness as to circumstances), it does demonstrate how much overlap there now is between these inchoate offences and participatory liability: this example clearly suggests that the fact that the crime has been committed is no bar to bringing a prosecution for an inchoate offence.²⁶¹

Finally, if the defendant's act is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of more than one offence, under s.49(2) he can be charged with s.44 in relation to each of the offences he intends to encourage or assist to be committed.

3. Encouraging or assisting an offence believing it will be committed

SERIOUS CRIME ACT 2007 S.45:

5-134

“A person commits an offence if—

- (a) he does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence; and
- (b) he believes—
 - (i) that the offence will be committed; and
 - (ii) that his act will encourage or assist its commission.”

As with s.44, by virtue of s.55, the offence is triable in the same way as the “anticipated offence” (the offence which the defendant is encouraging or assisting another to commit).

(i) Actus reus

5–135

As with s.44, the defendant must do an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence. Reference should be made to the discussion above of common elements.

If the defendant's act is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission or more than one offence, by virtue of s.49(2) he can be charged with s.45 in relation to each of the offences he believes will be encouraged or assisted.

Finally, while it is possible for defendants to be charged under s.44 when they intend to encourage or assist in the commission of an inchoate offence, liability does not extend under s.45 to acts which a defendant merely believes will encourage or assist another inchoate offence.²⁶²

(ii) Mens rea

5–136

Two main features distinguish this offence from the offence in s.44. First, s.44 requires the defendant to have acted with the purpose of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence. Whether she believes that her endeavours will be successful is irrelevant. Under s.45, on the other hand, the defendant must believe that the offence that she is encouraging or assisting will be committed. If a person sells a gun to another (purely because she needs the money and hoping that the gun will not be used) she cannot be liable under s.44, but will be liable under s.45 if she believes the offence will be committed.

The second distinguishing feature is that, for an offence under s.45, the defendant must believe that her act will encourage or assist P to commit the offence. Under s.44, in contrast, as long as the defendant intends to encourage or assist the commission of the offence, it is irrelevant whether she believes that her acts will actually be successful in encouraging or assisting the commission of the crime.

The term "believes" is not defined by the Act and, as commentators have said, “its boundaries remain ambiguous, lying as it does between the equally vague concepts of suspicion and knowledge”.²⁶³ However, it is much closer to knowledge than mere suspicion and when coupled with the word will, “indicates a high level of confidence in D’s mind that P is going to commit the anticipated offence”.²⁶⁴ Where the offence is one involving fault, s.47(5) applies just as it does in relation to s.44.

4. Encouraging or assisting offences believing one or more will be committed

5–137

This offence is the:

“broadest, most complex and most controversial of the new offences. It is introduced to deal with the problem encountered in secondary liability where D gives assistance and D is aware that P is likely to commit one of a number of offences, but is unsure which. For example, D drives P to a public house, being unsure whether P is likely to commit robbery, murder, explosives offences or offences against the person.”²⁶⁵

SERIOUS CRIME ACT 2007 S.46:

5–138

- “(1) A person commits an offence if—
- (a) he does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more of a number of offences; and
 - (b) he believes—
 - (i) that one or more of those offences will be committed (but has no belief as to which); and
 - (ii) that his act will encourage or assist the commission of one or more of them.

It is immaterial for the purposes of subsection (1)(b)(ii) whether the person has any belief as to which offence will be encouraged or assisted.”

Under s.55(5) this offence is triable only on indictment.

(i) Actus reus

5–139

The defendant must do an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more offences. The only difference between this and the earlier sections is the need to establish that the act was capable of encouraging or assisting more than one offence (which the prosecution must specify in the indictment²⁶⁶). Other than this, reference should be had to the discussion above of common elements.

As with s.45, under Sch.3 a defendant cannot be found liable for acts which he believes will encourage or assist another inchoate offence such a conspiracy or attempt.

(ii) Mens rea

5–140

As with s.45 the mens rea is two-fold: the defendant must both believe that one or more offences will be committed (including reference to s.47(5)) and that his act will encourage or assist the commission of one or more of them. However, he need not have any belief as to which of the offences will be committed in fact. In Blackshaw, a defendant was convicted of this offence, having posted messages on Facebook encouraging both associates and the public to meet at a particular place and time. He believed that a number of different offences, including burglary, criminal damage and riot might be committed and that at least one would be committed.²⁶⁷

The offence has twice come under close scrutiny by the Court of Appeal in the case of Sadique. The defendant was alleged to have been involved in a national distribution business supplying chemical cutting agents (such as benzocaine) both to regional distributors of chemical cutting agents and to drug dealers. This supply was alleged to have been capable of encouraging or assisting one or more offences of supplying or being concerned in the supply of Class A or Class B drugs; that Sadique believed that one or more of these offences would be committed and that his act would assist the commission of one or more of the offences. He was charged with one count under s.46: that he assisted in the supply of Class A or Class B drugs. In an interlocutory appeal before the Court of Appeal, Sadique claimed that the offence was so vague as to be incompatible with the ECHR art.7. This argument was rejected. However, the reasoning which the court then adopted, interpreting the elements of the s.46 offence and providing guidance on the framing of indictments, divided commenters.²⁶⁸ It has now been found to have been flawed by a differently constituted Court of Appeal which heard Sadique's appeal against conviction.

R. V SADIQUE (OMAR) (NO.2) [2013] EWCA CRIM 1195 (COURT OF APPEAL):

5-141

JUDGE CJ:

“[18] ... [In the first case of Sadique] the court observed that s 46 ‘should only be used when the prosecution allege that D’s act is capable of encouraging or assisting more than one offence’, and continued that ‘.... the indictment need only specify two offences and could specify any number greater than two’. The court then explained s 46 in the context of a case in which it was alleged that the count in the indictment specified offence X, punishable by life imprisonment, Y, punishable by 14 years imprisonment, and Z, punishable by ten years imprisonment. In that context the court observed that:

“section 46 should only be used, and needs only to be used, when it may be that D, at the time of doing the act, believes that one or more of either offence X, or offence Y or offence Z will be committed, but has no belief as to which of one or ones of the three will be committed.’

In the case of a trial involving these issues, the court agreed with the prosecution that it would be better practice to have a separate s 46 count for X, Y and Z, and indeed went on to say ‘that there should always be separate counts if D pleads not guilty’ adding, however, that the failure to do so (that is to produce separate counts) ‘would not of itself affect the safety of the conviction’. On this basis the observations of the court were directed not to issues of substantive law, but to process.

[19] According to Professor Virgo, Encouraging or Assisting More Than One Offence (Archbold Review, 13 March 2012) the effect of the judgment, which was addressing the issue of vagueness and uncertainty has, ‘if anything made the offence vague, uncertain and effectively redundant’. The offence in s 46 was rendered ‘practically obsolete’. In issue 3 dated 12 April 2013 of Archbold News—Enough is Enough’ Professor Virgo returned to the impact of the decision which, he suggests:

‘... drives a coach and horses through the s 46 offence, bears out my concerns about the drafting and comprehensibility of the legislation, which has made the task of the senior judiciary very difficult in making sense of the law ... The effect of their (the judges’) decision is to render that offence otiose. Since each contemplated offence must now be charged as a separate count, the Defendant can only be convicted if he or she believed that a specific offence would be committed; that is the same as the conditions for conviction under s 45. It follows that a Defendant who contemplates a number of offences being committed but does not believe any specific crime would be committed, cannot be guilty of assisting or encouraging an offence. That is an unfortunate restriction on the ambit of liability and will cause problems in future ...’

5–142

[20] The problem, if we may say so, rightly identified by Professor Virgo arises, as it seems to us, from the starting point in the reasoning of the court, found at para 49 of the judgment:

‘D cannot be convicted of count 1 (the other ingredients being satisfied) unless at the time of doing the act:

(a) Either

(i) D believes that X will be committed; or

(ii) D believes that one or more of the offences specified in the indictment (X, Y and Z) will be committed but has no belief as to which; and

(b) D believes that his act will encourage or assist the commission of X; and

(c) D believes that X will be committed with the necessary fault for X.'

[21] We are concerned that in this analysis it appears that a reference to the offence created by s 45 of the Act has been included as an ingredient of the offence created by s 46. In this paragraph of the judgment (a)(i) 'D believes that X will be committed'; repeats the precise language in s 45(b)(i) that D believes that the offence will be committed. Section 45, of course, is directed to 'an offence' or 'the offence'. However the entire thrust of s 46 is directed to the encouragement or assistance of offences in the belief that one or more of a number of offences will be committed. As the offences created by ss, 44, 45 and 46 are distinct offences, we have concluded that the foundation for the analysis was flawed, and that we are not bound by obiter observations of the court directed to procedural matters relating to the indictment rather than the full ambit of the offence ...

[30] As we have already explained, the 2007 Act created three distinct offences. It is not open to the court to set one or other of them aside and the legislation must be interpreted to give effect to the creation by statute of the three offences. It may well be that the common law offence of inciting someone else to commit an offence was less complex. It may equally be that the purpose of the legislation could have been achieved in less tortuous fashion. Nevertheless these three distinct offences were created by the 2007 Act, with none taking priority over the other two. Section 46 creates the offence of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more offences. Its specific ingredients and the subsequent legislative provisions underline that an indictment charging a s 46 offence of encouraging one or more offences is permissible.

[31] This has the advantage of reflecting practical reality. A Defendant may very well believe that his conduct will assist in the commission of one or more of a variety of different offences by another individual without knowing or being able to identify the precise offence or offences which the person to whom he offers encouragement or assistance intends to commit, or will actually commit. As Professor Virgo explains in his most recent article, the purpose of the s 46 was ‘to provide for the relatively common case where a Defendant contemplates that one of a variety of offences might be committed as a result of his or her encouragement’. We entirely agree ...

[34] In our judgment the ingredients of the s 46 offence, and the ancillary provisions, and s 58(4)–(7) in particular, underline that an indictment charging a s 46 offence by reference to one or more offences is permissible, and covers the precise situation for which the legislation provides. Before the Appellant in the present case could be convicted, the jury had to be satisfied that:

- (a) he was involved in the supply of the relevant chemicals and
- (b) that, if misused criminally, the chemicals were capable of misuse by others to commit offences of supplying or being concerned in the supply of, or being in possession with intent to supply class A and/or class B drugs. None of this would be criminal unless it was also proved
- (c) that at the time when the relevant chemicals were being supplied, the Appellant believed that what he was doing would encourage or assist the commission of one or more of these drug related offences and
- (d) that he also believed that this was the purpose, or one of the purposes, for which the chemicals would be used by those to whom he supplied them. If those ingredients were established, as the chemicals could be used for cutting agents for class A drugs or class B drugs, or both, it was not necessary for the Crown to prove that he had a specific belief about the particular drug related offence which those he was encouraging or assisting would or did commit ...

[36] In our judgment count 1 of the indictment was appropriately charged and fell within the proper ambit of the s 46 offence created by the 2007 Act ...

[40] The Appellant was properly convicted of this offence. The appeal against conviction will therefore be dismissed ...”

Appeal dismissed

5–143

As has been commented, the fact that two differently constituted Court of Appeals could come to different interpretations of s.46 is not the fault of the judiciary.²⁶⁹ It illustrates the profound difficulties inherent with this provision. Whilst the second appeal restores purpose to the provision, not only are we left with a very wide offence, but also the interpretative difficulties have not been fully resolved: prosecutors are still likely to encounter difficulties in framing appropriate indictments.

5. Defences

5–144

As the three offences are inchoate it is, of course, no defence to put forward a defence that P did not actually commit an offence.²⁷⁰ But the Serious Crime Act 2007 Pt 2 does create two special defences to the three offences.

(i) The defence of acting reasonably

SERIOUS CRIME ACT 2007 S.50:

5–145

“(1) A person is not guilty of an offence under this Part if he proves—

- (a) that he knew certain circumstances existed; and
- (b) that it was reasonable for him to act as he did in those circumstances.

(2) A person is not guilty of an offence under this Part if he proves—

- (a) that he believed certain circumstances to exist;
- (b) that his belief was reasonable; and
- (c) that it was reasonable for him to act as he did in the circumstances as he believed them to be.

(3) Factors to be considered in determining whether it was reasonable for a person to act as he did include—

- (a) the seriousness of the anticipated offence (or, in the case of an offence under section 46, the offences specified in the indictment);
- (b) any purpose for which he claims to have been acting;
- (c) any authority by which he claims to have been acting.”

5–146

Two points must be noted. First, the question of whether the defendant’s belief is reasonable is one to be determined by a jury; it is not enough that the defendant believes his acts to be reasonable. Secondly, the burden of proof rests with the defence to prove reasonableness.

This defence applies to all three of the offences despite the Law Commission’s view that it should not be available to s.44. However, given that s.44 requires intention it is most unlikely that the defence will be available in any event. The Law Commission provided illustrations of when the defence might operate: for example, the defendant, a motorist, who moves into an inside lane to allow P, another motorist to overtake, even though the defendant is aware that P is exceeding the speed limit, could use the defence of acting reasonably in answer to a charge under s.45.²⁷¹

(ii) Defence for the victim assister

SERIOUS CRIME ACT 2007 S.51:

5–147

“(1) In the case of protective offences, a person does not commit an offence under this Part by reference to such an offence if—

- (a) he falls within the protected category; and
- (b) he is the person in respect of whom the protective offence was committed or would have been if it had been committed.

(2) ‘Protective offence’ means an offence that exists (wholly or in part) for the protection of a particular category of persons (‘the protected category’).”

5–148

This section codifies the principle established in the case of Tyrrell.²⁷² The effect of the section is to make it clear that defendants cannot be liable for encouraging or assisting offences which are designed to protect them.²⁷³ For example, if a 12-year-old girl intentionally encourages P, a man of 21, to have sex with her and he declines, s.51 prevents her being liable for the offence of encouraging child rape because the offence of child rape was created to protect children under 13 years old.

6. Impossibility

5–149

Originally, under the common law of incitement it had been held in *McDonough*²⁷⁴ that there could be liability for an incitement to commit the impossible. This was approved obiter by the House of Lords in Nock.²⁷⁵ However, in Fitzmaurice,²⁷⁶ it was held that in many cases there could be no liability for incitement to commit the impossible.²⁷⁷

In proposing the new offences, the Law Commission stated:

“We believe that impossibility should not be a defence to the new offences that we are recommending. D’s state of mind and, therefore, his or her culpability, is unaffected by the unknown impossibility of the principal offence being committed. Further, if D can be liable notwithstanding that, contrary to D’s belief, P never intends to commit the principal offence, it would be illogical if D was able to plead that it would have been impossible to commit the principal offence.”²⁷⁸

The Serious Crime Act 2007 has not addressed this point directly. However, for all three offences the defendant’s acts must be capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence. So, if the defendant encourages or does an act to assist P to kill X, but X is already dead (one of the classic examples of impossibility), the defendant has not done an act capable of encouraging or assisting the murder of X. Because of the impossibility of the crime, there can be no liability.

Such an approach would, however, place the law here at odds with the law on attempting the impossible and statutory conspiracies to commit the impossible. One can, therefore, predict that the courts will follow the approach in these other areas of law and simply require that the acts be capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of the anticipated offence (the murder of X). For oblique support, the courts could draw on s.49(7) which provides that for the purposes of s.45(b) (i) and s.46(1)(b)(i) (believing that the offence will be committed), it is sufficient for the defendant to believe that the offence will be committed if certain conditions are met. One of these conditions could be that X is alive.

It is unfortunate, given the length and complexities of the Serious Crime Act 2007 Pt 2, that nothing explicit has been stated about the issue of impossibility.²⁷⁹

7. Jurisdiction

5–150

As noted in relation to conspiracy, the issue of jurisdiction has become increasingly important and it is not surprising given the framework of the Serious Crime Act within which the new offences sit that the courts are given wide jurisdiction. If a defendant “knows or believes that what he anticipates might take place wholly or partly in England and Wales” he may be liable under ss.44–46 no matter where in the world his relevant conduct occurred.²⁸⁰

If the prosecution cannot prove that a defendant believed that the offence being encouraged or assisted might be committed wholly or partly in England, the defendant can still be convicted if certain conditions are met under s.52(2) or Sch.4. First, para.1 provides jurisdiction if the defendant’s conduct occurred wholly or partly in England; the defendant knew or believed that the offence might occur wholly or partly outside England; and that offence would be triable under the law of England if committed in that place (such as murder by a British citizen anywhere in the world²⁸¹). If the above paragraph is inapplicable then under para.2 a defendant can still be tried in this country if his conduct occurred wholly or partly in this country; he knew or believed that the offence might occur wholly or partly in a place outside England; and the offence would also be an offence under the law in force in that place. Finally, under para.3, a defendant can be tried here if his conduct occurred wholly outside England; he knew or believed that the offence might occur wholly or partly outside England; and the defendant could be tried here (as the perpetrator) if he committed the offence in that place. In other words, liability may arise where both the defendant and P are outside England but the courts in England would have had jurisdiction if the defendant had committed the offence himself.²⁸² In cases where proceedings are sought under Sch.4 the consent of the Attorney-General is needed.²⁸³

8. Punishment

5–151

Section 58 provides the penalties that apply to the three new offences. Where the offence encouraged or assisted is murder, s.58(2) states that the maximum penalty is imprisonment for life. Section 58(3) provides that, other than for murder, the maximum penalty available for an offence under s.44 or s.45 is the same as the maximum available on conviction for the full offence. This rule also applies to s.46 but is restricted to where the defendant is found guilty in relation to one offence only:

“For example D lends P a van, false number plates and a gun. The prosecution argue that he believed that either burglary or murder would be committed. The jury find D guilty in relation to burglary but not guilty in relation to murder. The maximum sentence available for the conviction under section 46 will be the maximum sentence available for the offence of burglary (14 years).”²⁸⁴

The situation where a defendant is convicted of more than one offence under s.46 is provided for under s.58(5) and (7). Where one of the offences is murder, the maximum available penalty is imprisonment for life. Where none of the full offences is murder, but one or more of them is punishable by imprisonment, the maximum sentence is limited to the offence that carries the highest penalty. If none of the offences is punishable by imprisonment the maximum penalty is a fine.²⁸⁵

9. Conclusion

5–152

The offences contained within the Serious Crime Act 2007 Pt 2 were created to remedy defects in the old common law of incitement despite the fact that the case for abolition was far from overwhelming and to remove the gap caused by the lack of a crime of facilitation—and doubts still exist as to whether this was a real lacuna. Even if a lacuna existed, reform could have been much more straightforward. Instead, the legislation is “overdetailed, convoluted and unreadable”²⁸⁶ amply demonstrated by the differing interpretations of s.46 in Sadique. While the Ministry of Justice is relatively sanguine about the operation of Pt 2 of the Act in its post-legislative scrutiny, the Justice Committee is much more concerned by the ‘trenchant’ criticism the provisions have received. It recommends a further full review in 2016,²⁸⁷ but also states:

“If, in the meantime, the number of appeals on Part 2 increases, we expect the Ministry to consider bringing forward legislative proposals for revising, or even replacing, Part 2 to meet the purpose of the legislation in a less tortuous fashion.”²⁸⁸

A better course of action would be to initiate reform now.²⁸⁹

V. Double Inchoate Liability

5–153

Double inchoate liability arises when the defendant is convicted of committing an inchoate offence that relates to another inchoate offence. Under the old common law of incitement, for example, it was an offence to incite someone to incite a crime.²⁹⁰ In view of the issues considered at the beginning of this chapter, any such liability should be viewed with considerable caution. It is far from clear that there is a need for criminal liability in circumstances where the defendant’s actions are so far removed from a substantive offence. However, the trend in recent years has been to expand the reach of the criminal law to cover such cases. As the law stands, the following double inchoate crimes may be prosecuted:

- It is an offence to intentionally encourage or assist an act of encouragement or assistance in relation to an offence.²⁹¹
- It is an offence to intentionally encourage or assist a conspiracy.²⁹²
- It is an offence to intentionally encourage or assist an attempt.²⁹³

In none of the above three situations is it an offence to encourage or assist the commission of an inchoate offence if the defendant merely believes that his acts will encourage or assist the commission of an offence²⁹⁴:

- It is an offence to attempt to encourage or assist the commission of an offence.²⁹⁵
- further, as already seen, it is possible to attempt any indictable offence (other than those excluded by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(4)) even if that offence is one that only punishes acts of preparation.²⁹⁶

The Law Commission had favoured making it an offence to attempt to conspire²⁹⁷ in the interests of consistency in this area of law, but the strength of opposition to the proposal resulted in it being abandoned.²⁹⁸ The argument that the “ultimate harm would be too remote and that [it] would therefore result in an unjustified expansion of the law”²⁹⁹ is persuasive and it is to be hoped that this will act as a brake upon further development of double inchoate liability.

VI. Endangerment Offences

R.A. DUFF, “INTENTIONS LEGAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL” (1989) 9 O.J.L.S. 76, 86:

“What harms should the criminal law aim to prevent? Death, bodily injury and the loss of property may seem to be three obvious ‘primary harms’ (each primary harm will generate a range of ‘secondary harms’, which take their character as harms from their relation to a primary harm; if death is a primary harm, then being subjected to the threat, risk or fear of death is a secondary and derivative harm);

Though these harms are initially identified without reference to human actions as their causes, the criminal law, as a set of sanction-backed prohibitions, can help to prevent them by prohibiting and thus preventing actions which cause them. It can do this in various ways: by directly prohibiting actions which cause such harms (‘killing’, ‘wounding and causing grievous bodily harm’, ‘damaging or destroying property’ or ‘depriving another of his property’); by prohibiting actions which are likely to cause such harms, under descriptions which refer directly to those harms (‘attempting to kill’; ‘reckless driving’, defined in terms of the creation of an ‘obvious and serious risk of causing physical injury’; or ‘causing danger to the lieges by culpable recklessness’); by prohibiting conduct which is likely to cause such harms, but under descriptions which make no direct reference to those harms (‘driving with excess alcohol in the blood,’ or offences under s.19 and s.20 of the Firearms Act 1968).”

5–155

The term “endangerment offences” is used here to describe those offences that are complete in themselves and not dependent upon proof that any further offence was intended.³⁰⁰ Some of these offences have the same rationale as inchoate offences; they are conceived of as being steps to the commission of further offences. For example, people who carry offensive weapons in public places could well use those weapons. As Bazelon J reasoned in Benton v United States,³⁰¹ such possession gives “rise to sinister implications”. More commonly, however, conduct is criminalised simply because of its potential to cause harm. For example, dangerous driving is conduct that is likely to cause harm and is criminalised, again, for reasons similar to the criminalisation of inchoate offences, namely, in the hope of preventing the materialisation of the harm. The seriousness of endangerment offences is loosely linked to the likelihood (and potential gravity) of the harm materialising. For example, dangerous driving is more likely to cause harm than careless driving and accordingly carries a heavier penalty.

English law abounds with a wide variety of such offences and the number of them continues to increase. There are many offences of possessing prohibited articles, such as possessing explosives,³⁰² firearms,³⁰³ or counterfeiting tools.³⁰⁴ The object of the legislation prohibiting such possession is “frequently to prevent the articles being used for criminal purposes”.³⁰⁵ The Road Traffic Act 1988 penalises various forms of bad driving: for example, dangerous driving, careless driving and driving when under the influence of drink or drugs.³⁰⁶ The Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.9, creates the offence of interfering with vehicles; such conduct again has “sinister implications” as being indicative that theft or a similar offence is likely to be committed. Under the Criminal Damage Act 1971 it is an offence to cause criminal damage “intending ... or being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered”.³⁰⁷ The Sexual Offences Act 2003 creates an offence of meeting following grooming to try to deal with the dangers posed by adults using internet chat-rooms to seduce children.³⁰⁸ Finally, by way of example, new terrorism offences have also been created: the Terrorism Act 2000 s.58(1)(b) creates an offence of possessing information likely to be useful to a person committing or preparing an act of terrorism.³⁰⁹

With endangerment offences, particularly the driving offences, research suggests that in practice a prosecution is usually only brought when the danger has materialised: for example, when there has been a car crash and someone is injured.³¹⁰ In cases where a death has resulted, English law has several aggravated endangerment offences such as causing death by dangerous driving.³¹¹ In other cases where the harm has materialised the defendant is simply convicted of the endangerment offence but is given an increased punishment to reflect the causing of the harm. For example, under the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 s.3(1) a person is liable for a basic endangerment offence if his dog is dangerously out of control in a public place; this offence is punishable with a maximum of six months’ imprisonment. If that dog injures any person, an aggravated offence is committed which is punishable by a maximum of two years’ imprisonment on conviction on indictment. This has been the usual way of dealing with cases where a death has resulted at work as a result of a breach of the endangerment offences contained in the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 ss.2–4. Greater punishment is imposed to reflect that death or other serious injury has occurred.³¹²

5–156

In evaluating these endangerment offences, it is important to remember that, unlike the inchoate offences, they are all complete crimes in themselves and each carries its own penalty. Indeed, if they are indictable offences, there may be liability for attempting to commit them,³¹³ or for conspiracy or for encouraging or assisting someone to commit them. Can one ever justify liability for an inchoate offence when the offence-in-chief is itself only an endangerment offence?

With these offences there is a harm, albeit a second-order harm. For example, the harm involved in unauthorised possession of a firearm or other offensive weapons is the violation of society's interests in security and freedom from alarm. Firearms are inherently dangerous and their widespread, unlicensed possession could lead to an increase in their usage. Whether conduct that has the potential for causing harm is criminalised depends on balancing the seriousness of the possible harm and the likelihood of its occurrence against the social value of the conduct. So, possession of firearms is prohibited while possession of other dangerous weapons with greater social value, such as kitchen knives, is not criminalised.³¹⁴

Following this reasoning, it is possible to justify the existence of these offences on the basis of there being a secondary harm.³¹⁵ However, it is disturbing that many of these offences are ones of strict liability. For example, in Hussain,³¹⁶ the defendant was convicted of possessing a firearm which he believed was his son's toy. With attempts, the second-order harm has to be backed up by "first degree blameworthiness" in the form of intention. With endangerment offences, such as possession of a firearm, the second-order harm need be accompanied by no blameworthiness at all. This hardly seems justifiable. In such cases, there ought to be a "due-diligence defence" to enable defendants such as Hussain to escape liability.

In the US, many states have general offences of “reckless endangerment”. The Model Penal Code s.211.2 provides the following definition of such an offence:

“A person commits a misdemeanour if he recklessly engages in conduct which places or may place another person in danger of death or serious bodily injury. Recklessness and danger shall be presumed where a person knowingly points a firearm at or in the direction of another, whether or not the actor believed the firearm to be loaded.”³¹⁷

English law has no such general counterpart, preferring to focus instead on specific areas of risk-creation as instanced above. Is this English ad hoc approach justifiable?

C. M.V . CLARKSON, “GENERAL ENDANGERMENT OFFENCES: THE WAY FORWARD?” (2005) 32(2)
UNIVERSITY OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA
LAW REVIEW 131, 135–137, 141–143:

5–157

“CASE FOR A GENERAL ENDANGERMENT OFFENCE

There is no particular reason why certain dangerous activities have been criminalised but others have not. For example, in English law why is reckless endangerment³¹⁸ a criminal offence (carrying a maximum penalty of life imprisonment) when the defendant is damaging another person’s property but no offence when he or she is engaging in some other activity?

One of the main reasons for having a general endangerment offence is to ensure that there are no gaps, which might exist if there were only specific endangerment offences ... While specific endangerment offences can be tailored to certain dangerous activities such as driving motor vehicles or running factories, there are a host of other everyday activities where we depend on others to perform their actions safely (e.g., electricians and builders working in our houses, or child carers looking after our children, or doctors caring for our health). It is almost impossible to cater in advance, through specific offences, for all such persons who might act in a manner dangerous to our lives or safety. Only a general offence is capable of covering all such cases.

CASE AGAINST A GENERAL ENDANGERMENT OFFENCE

When the general endangerment offence was introduced in Western Australia ... many specific offences [were retained] ... The result is too many overlapping offences. This is undesirable. One of the main functions of the criminal law is to communicate clearly with citizens exactly what conduct is prohibited and the consequences of a violation of that law. If any individual action can give rise to a myriad of offences, that communication will necessarily be obscured. A further and very significant objection to having too many overlapping offences is that this confers too much discretion on the prosecution as to which charge(s) to bring ... [T]he result is that defendants may feel pressured into pleading guilty to lesser offences rather than face the more serious charges ...

[Another] ... objection to the introduction of a general endangerment offence is that it could lead to over-criminalisation and offend the minimalism principle (i.e., the last resort principle) ... A potential problem with a general endangerment offence is that it can be so broad as to sweep conduct within its ambit that would not warrant criminalisation under these strict criteria. Controversial examples that have been cited include the following: the solo yachtsman sailing around the world, or the mountain climber who causes someone to undertake a dangerous rescue, or firemen going on strike. Given the much publicised dangers of passive smoking it could well be argued that smoking in public threatens the life, health and safety of those around the smoker. Such conduct could presumably be swept within the ambit of a general endangerment offence ...

Decisions to make it an offence to be drunk in the street or to smoke in the presence of others or to engage in sexual activity while HIV positive (bearing in mind that in Australia the general endangerment offences are relatively serious offences) require careful debate before being swept within the ambit of a broad new offence. The existence of a general endangerment offence means that full discussion of whether such conduct should be criminalised is avoided. One of the fundamental principles underpinning the criminal law is that of fair warning. People should know in advance what conduct is impermissible. In all these above scenarios this principle is violated.”

- 1 D. J. Baker, Glanville Williams' Textbook of Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2015), para.18-001.
- 2 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (New York: OUP, 1978), p.132.
- 3 Indeed, as shall be seen, this mens rea will often have to be of a greater degree than that required for the completed offence.
- 4 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts: A Consultation Paper (2007), para.15.7.
- 5 A. Ashworth and J. Horder, Principles of Criminal Law, 7th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2013), p.455.
- 6 H. Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (New York: OUP, 1979), p.125.
- 7 An indictable offence is an offence “which, if committed by an adult, is triable on indictment, whether it is exclusively so triable, or triable either way”: Interpretation Act 1978 Sch.1 para.1. An offence is an “indictable offence” even if it is one, such as low value criminal damage, that has to be proceeded with as if it were triable only summarily (R. v Bristol Magistrates' Court Ex p. E [1999] Crim. L.R. 161; Interpretation Act 1978 Sch.1 para.1). In Nelson [2013] EWCA Crim 30 the offence of attempted battery was recognised, despite battery being a summary offence; the unconvincing reason being that it is possible to try battery (and common assault) on indictment where it forms part of a series of offences of the same or similar character as an indictable offence. For further discussion of this case, see: P. Hungerford-Welch, “Case Comment, R. v Nelson (Gary); trial-Indictment” [2013] Crim. L.R. 689.
- 8 R. v R [2008] 2 Cr. App. R. 38 at [11].
- 9 HC Deb., vol.2, ser.6, col.214 (1981).
- 10 See above, paras 1-019–1-029.
- 11 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), paras 16.99–16.100.
- 12 Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), paras 8.159–8.160.
- 13 See further, M. Bohlander, “The Conflict between the Serious Crime Act 2009 and Section 1(4)(b) Criminal Attempts Act 1981—A Missed Repeal” [2010] Crim. L.R. 483 and J. Child, “The Difference between Attempted Complicity and Inchoate Assisting and Encouraging—A Reply to Professor Bohlander” [2010] Crim. L.R. 924.
- 14 R. v Goldman (Terence) [2001] EWCA Crim 1684.
- 15 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.5.28 fn.29.
- 16 P. R. Glazebrook, “Should we have a Law of Attempted Crime?” (1969) 85 L.Q.R. 28.
- 17 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.62.
- 18 For an example of where an ulterior intent crime might have played such a role, see R. v Geddes (Gary William) [1996] Crim. L.R. 894; below, para.5-038.

- 19 J. Horder, "Crimes of Ulterior Intent" in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith, Harm and Culpability (Oxford: OUP, 1996), pp.153–172.
- 20 Research from the US suggests that people generally believe that attempts are punished significantly less than completed crimes (J. M. Darley, C. A. Sanderson and P. S. LaMantia, "Community Standards for Defining Attempt: Inconsistencies with the Model Penal Code" (1996) 39 Amer. Behav. Sci. cited in P. H. Robinson and J. M. Darley, "Does Criminal Law Deter? A Behavioural Science Investigation" (2004) O.J.L.S. 173, 176 fn.3.
- 21 This is the position in the US, but as shall be seen, not under English law.
- 22 See H. Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (New York: OUP, 1979), p.460. For a criticism of Gross's views, see J. B. Brady, "Punishing Attempts" (1980) 63 The Monist 246, 251–255.
- 23 C. M. V. Clarkson, "Aggravated Endangerment Offences" (2007) 60 C.L.P. 278, 282.
- 24 See also, R. A. Duff, "Whose Luck Is It Anyway?" in C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (Aldershot: Ashgate Press, 2008).
- 25 K. Meninger, Man against Himself (New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co, 1938), p.22.
- 26 S. Freud, A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis (London: Hogarth Press, 1958), p.48.
- 27 See also F. Picinali, "A Retributive Justification for not Punishing Bare Intentions or: on the Moral Relevance of the 'Now Belief'" [2012] 32 Law and Philosophy 385.
- 28 Sentencing Advisory Panel, Minimum Terms in Murder Cases: The Panel's Advice to the Court of Appeal (2002). This average excludes those who were given life sentences.
- 29 R. v Ford (Kevin) [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36.
- 30 Sentencing Guidelines Council, Attempted Murder: Definitive Guideline (2009).
- 31 R. v Daniel (Gary Michael) (1988) 10 Cr. App. R. (S.) 341.
- 32 R. v Cooper (Dennis James) (1988) 10 Cr. App. R. (S.) 325.
- 33 Eagleton (1855) Dears C.C. 515, 538.
- 34 R. A. Duff, Criminal Attempts (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.388.
- 35 Davey v Lee [1968] 1 Q.B. 366 at 371.
- 36 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (New York: OUP, 1978), pp.142–144.
- 37 Law Commission Working Paper No.50, Inchoate Offences (1973), para.75.
- 38 Law Commission Paper No.102 (1980), para.2.32. For a plea for the introduction of the test, see G. Williams, "Wrong Turnings in the Law of Attempt" [1991] Crim. L.R. 416.
- 39 History is in the process of being rewritten with cases since the 1981 Act suggesting that it is not clear which test was applied at common law. However, two House of Lords' decisions, Haughton v Smith [1975] A.C. 476 and DPP v Stonehouse [1978] A.C. 55 made it plain that the proximity test was the favoured one.
- 40 Jones v Brooks (1968) 52 Cr. App. R. 614 at 616; Davey v Lee [1968] 1 Q.B. 366 at 371, approved in Haughton v Smith [1975] A.C. 476.
- 41 R. v Robinson (Harry) [1915] 2 K.B. 342 at 349.

- 42 Stonehouse [1978] A.C. 55.
- 43 Again, post-1981 Act cases are rewriting history by suggesting that the proximity test was synonymous with a last act test. It was not. See, e.g. R. v Harris (Paul Andrew) (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 28.
- 44 I. Dennis, “The Criminal Attempts Act 1981” [1982] Crim. L.R. 379.
- 45 Law Commission Paper No.102 (1980), para.2.47.
- 46 Law Commission Paper No.102 (1980), para.2.48.
- 47 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.472.
- 48 R. v Tosti [1997] Crim. L.R. 746.
- 49 See further, G. Williams, “Wrong Turnings in the Law of Attempt” [1991] Crim. L.R. 416.
- 50 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), paras 16.89–16.95.
- 51 Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.8.184.
- 52 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.474, citing Rowlatt J in Osborn (1919) 84 J.P. 63.
- 53 R. v Boyle (George) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 270.
- 54 Tosti [1997] Crim. L.R. 746.
- 55 Toothill [1998] Crim. L.R. 876.
- 56 R. v Litholetovs (Mihails) [2002] EWCA Crim 1154.
- 57 R. v Rowley (Michael) (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 95.
- 58 Citing Ransford (1874) 31 L.T. 488. For a similar decision to Rowley, see Nash [1999] Crim. L.R. 308.
- 59 Stevens v R. [1985] L.R.C. (Crim) 17. See L. Blake (1986) 50 Jo. C.L. 247.
- 60 Theft Act 1968 s.8.
- 61 Patnaik, LTL unreported 1 February 2000.
- 62 R. v Dagnall (Chris) [2003] EWCA Crim 2441; (2003) 147 S.J.L.B. 995 CA (Crim Div).
- 63 R. v Griffin [1993] Crim. L.R. 515.
- 64 Geddes [1996] Crim. L.R. 894. cf. the approach taken by the New Zealand Supreme Court In Johnstone (Justin Ames) v The Queen [2016] NZSC 83, where the relevant New Zealand legislation (Crimes Act 1961 s.72) requires the act or omission to be “Immediately or proximately connected with the Intended offence”.
- 65 As J. C. Smith points out in his commentary (at p.896) there was no endangerment or ulterior intent crime (such as going equipped with intent to kidnap) with which the defendant could be charged.
- 66 Qadir and Khan, Archbold News 17 November 1997.
- 67 It was never a “test” in the sense that the proximity test was. It was one method for establishing whether the proximity test had been satisfied. Had it ever been a “test” gunmen would not have been guilty of attempted murder until they had pulled the trigger.
- 68 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007).

- 69 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para.12.14.
- 70 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) paras 12.17–12.22.
- 71 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para.12.15.
- 72 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) Proposal 15.
- 73 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para.16.17.
- 74 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para.16.11.
- 75 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para.16.41.
- 76 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para.16.19.
- 77 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) paras 16.18–16.22.
- 78 C. M. V. Clarkson, “Attempt: The Conduct Requirement” (2009) 29 O.J.L.S. 25. See also J. Rogers, “The Codification of Attempts and the Case for ‘Preparation’” [2008] Crim. L.R. 937.
- 79 As there is doubt over the existing law, the Commission proposes clarification to ensure that persons can be convicted of attempted murder by omission (assuming they are under a legal duty to act) (Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.8.151).
- 80 Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.8.79.
- 81 Le Barron v State 32 Wis.2d 294; 145 N.W.2d 79 (1966).
- 82 People v Graham 176 App. Div. 38, 162 N.Y.S. 334 (1916).
- 83 If this latter view is adopted, must the abandonment be prompted by a commendable motive? cf. G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (New York: OUP, 1978), pp.193–194.
- 84 cf. H. Wechsler, “The Treatment in Inchoate Crimes in the Model Penal Code” (1961) 61 Col. L.R. 571, 617–618: “It is possible, of course, that the defense of renunciation of criminal purpose may add to the incentives to take the first steps towards crime. Knowledge that criminal endeavours can be undone with impunity may encourage preliminary steps that would not be undertaken if liability inevitably attached to every abortive criminal undertaking that proceeded beyond preparation. But this is not a serious problem ... [A]ny consolation the actor might draw from the abandonment defense would have to be tempered with the knowledge that the defense would be unavailable if the actor’s purposes were frustrated by external forces before he had an opportunity to abandon his efforts”.
- 85 R. v Whybrow (Arthur George) (1951) 35 Cr. App. R. 141. See also R. v Pond [1984] Crim. L.R.164.
- 86 R. v O’Toole (Michael) [1987] Crim. L.R. 759.
- 87 Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2).
- 88 Col. Rev. Stat. art.18–2–101(1).

- 89 This was probably the position at common law: Gardner v Akeroyd [1952] 2 Q.B. 743; cf. R. v Collier [1960] Crim. L.R. 204. It should, however, be borne in mind that most strict liability offences are summary offences which cannot be attempted.
- 90 R. v Mohan (John Patrick) [1976] Q.B. 1.
- 91 R. v Millard and Vernon [1987] Crim. L.R. 393.
- 92 Technically, Woollin only applies to the crime of murder. However, even if this is so, the test in Nedrick would apply as this represents a synthesis of the tests in Moloney and Hancock which were approved in Walker and Hayles. The test in Nedrick is arguably the same as that in Woollin.
- 93 R. v Hales (Ricky) [2005] EWCA Crim 1118.
- 94 Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.8.91.
- 95 R. v Pigg (Stephen) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 352; R. Buxton, “Inchoate Offences: Incitement and Attempt” [1973] Crim. L.R. 656, 661–664.
- 96 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.465. It should be noted that recklessness is no longer part of the mens rea for rape, see below, paras 7-140–7-147.
- 97 Re Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 1992) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 383.
- 98 A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2016), p.352. cf. J. J. Child, “The Structure, Coherence and Limits of Inchoate Liability: The New Ulterior Element” (2014) 34 L.S. 537.
- 99 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), para.14.48.
- 100 Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.8.128.
- 101 An earlier Law Commission Paper (No.102, 1980) stated that an intention as to every element of the offence was required (although in practice knowledge of surrounding circumstances would suffice to establish the necessary intent) (para.2.15).
- 102 R. v Pace (Martin Edward) [2014] EWCA Crim 186; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 2867. Following Pace, the Crown conceded that the convictions had to be quashed in R. v Smith (Joseph) [2014] EWCA Crim 1941 (a case which arose out of the same undercover operation that involved Pace), and in R. v Wheeler (Stephen) [2014] EWCA Crim 2706 (a case which arose out of a similar operation).
- 103 In this instance, the defendants could have been charged with assisting or encouraging crime, believing it would be committed under the Serious Crime Act 2007 s.45 (below paras 5-134–5-136). See further, F. Stark, “The Mens Rea of Criminal Attempt” [2014] Archbold Review 7, 9.
- 104 D. Bruneau and A. Taylor, “In defence of Pace and Rogers” [2015] Archbold Review 6, 7.
- 105 J. J. Child and A. Hunt, “Pace and Rogers and the mens rea of criminal attempt: Khan on the scrapheap?” (2014) J. Crim. L. 220, 225. cf. P. Mirfield, “Intention and criminal attempts” [2015] Crim. L.R. 142. By contrast, Virgo suggests that Pace has “destabilised” the offence of attempt “by holding that the relevant mental element is intention” and that the court should have relied upon s.1(3) of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, holding that “the defendants ... were properly acquitted of the attempt if they only suspected rather than believed that the metal had been stolen”: G. Virgo, “Criminal attempts: the law of unintended circumstances” (2014) 73 C.L.J. 244, 244–246. See also: F. Stark, “The Mens Rea of Criminal Attempt” [2014] Archbold

Review 7, 9.

- 106 J. J. Child and A. Hunt, “Pace and Rogers and the mens rea of criminal attempt: Khan on the scrapheap?” (2014) J. Crim. L. 220, 225.
- 107 P. Mirfield, “Intention and criminal attempts” [2015] Crim. L.R. 142, 147.
- 108 cf. A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2016), pp.350,353, who suggest that the preferable approach is to treat both Khan and Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 1992) as having been overruled by Pace.
- 109 R. v Pace [2014] EWCA Crim 186; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 2867 at [52]. For further discussion see: F. Stark, “The Mens Rea of Criminal Attempt” [2014] Archbold Review 7, 9; D. Bruneau and A. Taylor, “In defence of Pace and Rogers” [2015] Archbold Review 6, 8; J. J. Child and A. Hunt, “Pace and Rogers and the mens rea of criminal attempt: Khan on the scrapheap?” (2014) J. Crim. L. 220, 222–223; P. Mirfield, “Intention and criminal attempts” [2015] Crim. L.R. 142, 145, A. P. Simester, “The law of criminal attempts” (2015) 131 L.Q.R. 169, 170.
- 110 P. Mirfield, “Intention and criminal attempts” [2015] Crim. L.R. 142, 148; A. P. Simester, “The law of criminal attempts” (2015) 131 L.Q.R. 169, 170; D. Bruneau and A. Taylor, “In defence of Pace and Rogers” [2015] Archbold Review 6, 8; J. J. Child and A. Hunt, “Pace and Rogers and the mens rea of criminal attempt: Khan on the scrapheap?” (2014) J. Crim. L. 220, 222–223.
- 111 See <https://www.supremecourt.uk/news/permission-to-appeal.html> [Accessed March 2017].
- 112 P. Mirfield, “Intention and criminal attempts” [2015] Crim. L.R. 142, 148.
- 113 See further, F. Stark, “The Mens Rea of Criminal Attempt” [2014] Archbold Review 7, 9, who argues that the Court of Appeal reached the right decision but for the wrong reasons and, in particular, that the criticism of Khan was misplaced. cf. D. Bruneau and A. Taylor, “In defence of Pace and Rogers” [2015] Archbold Review 6, 9.
- 114 In relation to conditional intention and the law of theft, see below, paras 9-125–9-126.
- 115 R. v Greenhof [1979] Crim. L.R. 108, R. v Bozickovic [1978] Crim. L.R. 686 and R. v Walkington (Terence John) [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1169 were all decisions on burglary.
- 116 Law Commission Paper No.318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.8.106.
- 117 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), para.16.74.
- 118 Haughton v Smith [1975] A.C. 476.
- 119 The goods had been stolen, but when the police commandeered the van in which the goods were travelling, the goods ceased to be “stolen” by virtue of s.24(3) of the Theft Act 1968 as they had been “restored to lawful custody”.
- 120 Haughton v Smith [1975] A.C. 476 at 492.
- 121 Haughton v Smith [1975] A.C. 476 at 499–500.
- 122 Haughton [1975] A.C. 476 at 501.
- 123 Partington v Williams (1975) 62 Cr. App. R. 220.
- 124 DPP v Nock [1978] A.C. 979.
- 125 Haughton [1975] A.C. 476 at 500.
- 126 Farrance (1977) 67 Cr. App. R. 136.

- 127 Zainal Abidin b Ismail [1987] 2 M.L.J. 741. For a discussion of this case, see C. M. V. Clarkson, “Rape: Emasculation of the Penal Code” [1988] 1 M.L.J. cxiii.
- 128 For a discussion of this dominant intention theory, see para.5-083.
- 129 Re Att-Gen’s Reference (Nos.3 and 4 of 2005) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 98.
- 130 R. v Jones (Ian Anthony) [2007] EWCA Crim 1118.
- 131 This is illustrated by Taaffe [1984] 1 A.C. 539, where the defendant, believing that the importation of currency was prohibited, tried to smuggle several packages of what he (wrongly) believed was currency into the country. Although this made his actions “morally reprehensible”, he could not be guilty of an attempt to commit any crime—there is no such crime. He had made a classic mistake of law, which was “irrelevant”. See above, para.2-258.
- 132 R. A. Duff, Criminal Attempts (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), pp.378–379.
- 133 R. A. Duff, Criminal Attempts (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), p.384. For a detailed alternative analysis to the subjectivist/objectivist approaches, see: G. Jaffe, “Criminal Attempts” (2014) 124 Yale L.J. 92.
- 134 Inchoate offences are recorded together with the relevant substantive offence.
- 135 See, e.g. R. v Barot (Dhiren) [2007] Crim. L.R. 741; R. v Hussain (Amar Tasaddiq) [2016] EWCA Crim 2092; R. v Sardar (Anis Abid) [2016] EWCA Crim 1616. Below para.5-092.
- 136 DPP v Bhagwan [1972] A.C. 60 at 79. The development of conspiracy from a narrowly circumscribed crime of agreeing falsely to accuse another to one where agreeing to do any unlawful act fell within its ambit, and its use, in particular, against the early trade union movement has been well documented; see G. Robertson, Whose Conspiracy? (Civil Liberties Trust, 1974); R. Hazell, Conspiracy and Civil Liberties (Bell (for the Social Administration Research Trust), 1974), pp.13–19, F. Sayre; “Criminal Conspiracy” (1922) 35 Harv. L.R. 402; R. Spicer, Conspiracy (London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1981).
- 137 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009).
- 138 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), paras 2.4–2.10. See also Law Commission Paper No.76, Conspiracy and Criminal Law Reform (1976), para.1.5.
- 139 Above, para.5-028.
- 140 Replacing the common-law offence of incitement, paras 5-121–5-143.
- 141 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), para.2.9.
- 142 There is no bar under English law to including both conspiracy and substantive offence charges on an indictment when the offence has been completed (they do not “merge”), but the prosecution has to justify to the judge the inclusion of the conspiracy count and if the judge is not satisfied then the prosecution has to elect to proceed with either the conspiracy or the substantive count: Criminal Practice Direction II (Preliminary Proceedings) 10A, para.3; P. J. Richardson, Archbold Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2017) para.33-59.
- 143 This extends beyond organised or terrorist crimes. In Skidmore [2009] Crim. L.R. 42 a conviction for conspiracy was upheld when the substantive offence of preventing a lawful and decent burial of a child had occurred.
- 144 See, e.g. R. v Dove (Matthew Jonathon) [2005] EWCA Crim 1982 where 12 robberies were committed by the defendants within a short space of time.

- 145 In R. v Barratt (Paul Henry) [1996] Crim. L.R. 495, e.g. the court felt that the evidence fell far short of establishing a single conspiracy extending over 2 years to burgle houses. As Smith comments (at 497) the idea was “utterly far-fetched”.
- 146 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), paras 2.11–2.20.
- 147 The Government’s White Paper, One Step Ahead: A 21st Century Strategy to Defeat Organised Crime (Cmnd.6167, 2004) even contemplated changing the link between conspiracy and certain predicate (underlying) crimes as part of its strategy to respond to organised crime (para.6.1).
- 148 The normal rule of evidence, for example, that prevents the statements of one co-defendant being used against another does not apply in conspiracy trials. See further, Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), paras 2.20–2.21.
- 149 R. v Saik (Abdulrahman) [2007] 1 A.C. 18. Note that the Law Commission’s recommendations are designed to remove the barrier erected by Saik: below paras 5-107–5-108.
- 150 Saik [2007] 1 A.C. 18 at [41].
- 151 This is still true in relation to the imposition of fines by the Crown Court (Criminal Law Act 1977 s.3(1)).
- 152 Criminal Law Act 1977 s.3(3).
- 153 Criminal Justice Act 1987 s.12. For sentencing guidelines in relation to common law conspiracy to defraud, see: Sentencing Council, Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences: Definitive Guidance (2014, revised 2016).
- 154 R. v Barot (Dhiren) [2007] Crim. L.R. 741. The trial judge had imposed a minimum term of 40 years but the Court of Appeal found this to be manifestly excessive, arguing that such sentences were to be reserved for a terrorist convicted “of a serious attempt to commit mass murder by a viable method” (at [743]).
- 155 Mulcahy (1868) L.R. 3 H.L. 306.
- 156 Kamara v DPP [1974] A.C. 104.
- 157 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002).
- 158 Ministry of Justice, Post-Legislative Assessment of the Fraud Act 2006, Memorandum to the Justice Select Committee (2012, Cm.8372), paras 36–38.
- 159 See, e.g. Mba [2006] All E.R. (D) 73. In this case, the defendants were convicted on a single charge of conspiracy to defraud which involved many transactions, using false identities to obtain loans, withdraw cash or transfer money.
- 160 For further details of conspiracy to defraud, see A. T. H. Smith, Property Offences (Oxford: OUP, 1994), Ch.19.
- 161 R. v Ayres (David Edward) [1984] A.C. 447.
- 162 Criminal Justice Act 1987 s.12. For guidelines on when to charge conspiracy to defraud, see http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/h_to_k/inchoate_offences/#Common_law_conspiracies [Accessed March, 2017] and the Attorney-General’s guidelines for prosecutors on the use of the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud (revised 2012), <https://www.gov.uk/guidance/use-of-the-common-law-offence-of-conspiracy-to-defraud-6> [Accessed March 2017]. In R. v Dady (Marc) [2013] EWHC 475 (QB), the court indicated that, following R. v Rimmington (Anthony) [2005] UKHL 63, where an agreement could be charged as a statutory conspiracy or a conspiracy to defraud, it should usually be charged as a statutory conspiracy unless there are good reasons to charge conspiracy to defraud.

- 163 Scott v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [1975] A.C. 819 at 840.
- 164 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002), paras 4.5–4.59.
- 165 For a recent example of the use of conspiracy to defraud to prosecute internet users who produced and distributed unlawful “pirate” copies of recently released films, see: R. v Baker (Reece) [2016] EWCA Crim 1637.
- 166 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002), para.3.6.
- 167 R. v GG Plc [2008] UKHL 17. cf. R v Evans [2014] 1 WLR 2817 and the comment by P. Jarvis, “Conspiracy to defraud: a siren to lure unwary prosecutors” [2014] Crim. L.R. 738. The Queen’s Bench Division subsequently refused the Crown’s application for a voluntary bill of indictment (Serious Fraud Office v Evans [2014] EWHC 3803 (QB)), although Evans was doubted by the Court of Appeal in R. v H [2015] EWCA Crim 46, a case in which it was held that it was appropriate for the Crown to charge conspiracy to defraud in respect of the alleged dishonest manipulation of the LIBOR rate to increase the profits of his employers and his own bonuses. See also Norris v United States [2008] 1 A.C. 920. cf. J. R. Spencer, “The criminal liability of directors whose companies collapse” [2016] Archbold Review 5, 9.
- 168 R. v Allsop (Anthony Adward) (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 29.
- 169 Wai Yu-Tsang v The Queen [1992] 1 A.C. 269 (trial judge’s direction approved on appeal by the Privy Council). See also Adams v The Queen [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 295.
- 170 The rule contained in s.1(1)(a) is meant to be a restatement of the common law.
- 171 R. v Hollinshead (Peter Gordon) [1985] A.C. 975. This decision is rightly criticised by the Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), paras 3.15–3.17. The new inchoate offence of encouraging or assisting crime should obviate the need for conspiracy to defraud to be distorted in this way.
- 172 Wai Yu-Tsang [1992] 1 A.C. 269 at 280.
- 173 As in the case of Wai Yu-Tsang [1992] 1 A.C. 269 where one of the conspirators thought he was acting in the defrauded bank’s best interests by trying to prevent a run on it.
- 174 Wai Yu-Tsang [1992] 1 A.C. 269 at 280; R. v Moses and Ansbro [1991] Crim. L.R. 617; DPP v Withers [1975] A.C. 842; Board of Trade v Owen [1957] A.C. 602; Welham v DPP [1961] A.C. 103.
- 175 Law Commission Paper No.76 (1976), paras 3.21–3.24.
- 176 Shaw v DPP [1962] A.C. 220. Shaw is an important decision for a further reason. Lord Simmonds, in particular, seemed to be of the view that the judiciary had a residual power to create new criminal offences to deal with new situations. This view was firmly rejected in the subsequent decision of Knüller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1973] A.C. 435.
- 177 Although this was the view of the Court of Criminal Appeal, the House of Lords did not decide this point. The case of R. v Gibson (Richard Norman) (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 341 lends some support to the view that there is an offence of corrupting public morals.

- 178 Per Lord Simon in Knuller v DPP [1973] A.C. 435 at 491.
- 179 R. v Scott (Valerie) (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 164. Parties does not include someone who is the intended victim of the offence (s.2(1)).
- 180 R. v Fritzl (Jaqueline) [2011] EWCA Crim 1220; Griffiths (1969) 49 Cr. App. R. 279. Even if there is sufficient evidence to point to an agreement having been made, if there is no credible evidence that it is anything other than a “fantasy”, there can be no conspiracy: in R. v G [2012] EWCA Crim 1756 it stated that an “executory intent” is needed.
- 181 This confirms the common law decision of Mawji v The Queen [1957] A.C. 126. See R. v Chrastny (Charlotte Barbara) (No.1) [1992] 1 All E.R. 189 and R. v Singh (Harbans) [2011] EWCA Crim 2992. This exception extends to the wife in a polygamous marriage which is valid in the place in which it is celebrated, and which is not void under English law: R. v Bala (Yilkyes Finok) [2016] EWCA Crim 560; [2017] Q.B. 430.
- 182 Civil Partnership Act 2004 Sch.27. The Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 s.11 and Sch.3 Pt 1, extends this provision to parties to a same-sex marriage.
- 183 R. v Suski (Dariusz Tomas) [2016] EWCA Crim 24; [2016] 2 Cr. App. R. 3 at [23]: “There are very good grounds why a court trying a charge of conspiracy should not have to inquire closely into the nature of personal relationships of alleged conspirators, infinitely variable as they are likely to be from case to case”.
- 184 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), paras 5.7–5.16.
- 185 Gnango [2011] UKSC 59.
- 186 Gnango [2011] UKSC 59 at [49].
- 187 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), paras 5.7–5.16.d., paras 5.17–5.35. The Law Commission also recommends retention of the exemption for a child conspirator under the age of 10 (paras 5.36–5.45). However, the other adult co-conspirator could be prosecuted for encouraging the formation of a conspiracy under the Serious Crime Act 2007 s.44. cf. J. Herring, “Victims as Defendants: When Victims Participate in Crimes Against Themselves” in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds) Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (London: Routledge, 2013), Ch.5.
- 188 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.51. Below paras 5-147–5-148. cf. C. de Than and J. Elvin, “Towards a Rational Reconstruction of the Law on Secondary Participation and Inchoate Offences: Conspiracy” in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds) Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (London: Routledge, 2013), Ch.9.
- 189 This confirms the common law decision of Duguid (1906) 75 L.J. K.B. 470.
- 190 This was already the position at common law in relation to separate trials (DPP v Shannon [1975] A.C. 717), but reverses the common law position in relation to joint trials (R. v Thompson, Tillotson and Maddock (1851) 16 Q.B. 832; R. v Coughlan (Joseph John) (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 11).
- 191 See, e.g. R. v Testouri (Adel Ben) [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 4 and R. v Austin (Alan Brian) [2011] EWCA Crim 345. See further, R. v Mehta (Subhash) [2012] EWCA Crim 2824 and R. v Shillam (Wayne Lee) [2013] EWCA Crim 160. cf. Serious Fraud Office v Papachristos (Miltiades) [2014] EWCA Crim 1863.
- 192 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.2.13.
- 193 Siracusa (1989) 90 Cr. App. R. 340.
- 194 This was confirmed in R. v Taylor (Robert John) [2002] Crim. L.R. 205.

- 195 Broad [1997] Crim. L.R. 666.
- 196 Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2). On its actual wording s.1(2) appears to be limited to crimes of strict liability but, as Saik [2007] A.C. 18 makes clear, it cannot mean this.
- 197 Drug Trafficking Act 1994 s.49(2).
- 198 Both this provision and the Drug Trafficking Act 1994 s.49(2) have now been repealed and replaced by the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. The issue of suspicion does not arise with the new offences under the Act.
- 199 See Sakavickas [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 584; R. v Singh (Gulbir Rana) [2003] EWCA Crim 3712; R. v Rizvi (Zafar) [2003] EWCA Crim 3575.
- 200 D. Ormerod, “Conspiracy: Conspiracy to Launder Money” [2006] Crim. L.R. 998 at 1001. See more generally, D. Ormerod, “Making Sense of Statutory Conspiracies” (2006) C.L.P. 277.
- 201 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.2.64. One issue is whether knowledge here can include wilful blindness. For a recent application of Saik, see Ahmed [2013] EWCA Crim 1755.
- 202 e.g. whether a property’s status is to be established objectively or whether the particular conspirators need to have identified the property is unclear.
- 203 There was also concern that Saik would lead to a large number of appeals by defendants convicted under the old law. However, in R. v R (Amer) [2006] EWCA Crim 1974 (where the Court of Appeal heard seven appeals together) it was held that, although such convictions were unsafe in the light of Saik, leave to appeal out of time would not be granted as no injustice had been done to any of those convicted. In all cases there was evidence that would have convicted them of the substantive offences. See further, D. Ormerod, “Proceeds of Crime: Conspiracy—Mens Rea” [2007] Crim. L.R. 79 and R. v Suchedina (Hasnain) [2007] Crim. L.R. 301 (and commentary thereto).
- 204 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.2.137. Where the substantive offence has a fault requirement not involving mere negligence (or its equivalent) this fault requirement must also be proved for conspiracy (para.2.146).
- 205 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), para.1.33.
- 206 R. v Pace [2014] EWCA Crim 186; [2014] 1 W.L.R. 2867; A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, F. Stark, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2016), p.331. See above, paras 5-060–5-063.
- 207 Saik [2007] A.C. 18 at [5].
- 208 R. v O’Hadhmaill [1996] Crim. L.R. 509. See also Reed [1982] Crim. L.R. 818.
- 209 See further, Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), paras 2.99–2.128.
- 210 McPhillips (1990) 6 BNIL (Northern Ireland).
- 211 R. v Edwards [1991] Crim. L.R. 45.
- 212 To respond to the problems raised by law enforcement agents working under cover and in furtherance of the justification of conspiracy in assisting intelligence-led policing, the Law Commission has recommended that the defence of acting reasonably under the Serious Crime Act 2007 s.50 be extended to conspiracy: Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.6.56. See below,

- paras 5-145–5-146.
- 213 Saik [2007] A.C. 18 at [4].
- 214 One can aid and abet any offence, common law or statutory, unless expressly excluded by statute (R. v Jefferson (Andrew Steven) [1994] 1 All E.R. 270).
- 215 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), para.4.33.
- 216 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.503.
- 217 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.2.56.
- 218 D. Fitzpatrick, “Variations on Conspiracy” (1993) 143 N.L.J. 1180. See also Siracusa (1989) 90 Cr. App. R. 340, where the Court of Appeal tried (unsuccessfully) to repair the damage.
- 219 R. v King (Joseph) [2012] EWCA Crim 805 at [55].
- 220 R. v Hollinshead (Peter Gordon) [1985] 1 All E.R. 850.
- 221 This was confirmed in Kenning [2009] EWCA Crim 1534. However, defendants who agree to assist others commit crimes may now be charged under the Serious Crime Act 2007 ss.44–46: below, paras 5-129–5-143.
- 222 DPP v Nock [1978] A.C. 979.
- 223 Haughton [1975] A.C. 476.
- 224 “Abandoning Criminal Intent” [1980] Crim. L.R. 785, 788; Barnard (1979) 70 Cr. App. R. 28.
- 225 Above, paras 5-042–5-048.
- 226 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007), paras 2.32–2.44.
- 227 It was formerly the case that some such overt act needed to be proved: DPP v Doot [1973] A.C. 807. However, both the Privy Council in Liangsiriprasert v US Government (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 77 and the Court of Appeal in R. v Sansom (Alec James) [1991] Crim. L.R. 126 have rejected this. See also R. v Naini (Jamshid Hashemi) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. 398.
- 228 Inserted by the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 s.5(1).
- 229 In R. v Patel (Sophia) [2009] Crim. L.R. 466 it was made clear that defendants convicted of such foreign conspiracies are liable to the maximum sentence as that available for the substantive offence under English law.
- 230 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), paras 7.71–7.71. e.g. it would be sufficient for liability if the defendant knew or believed that the substantive offence might be committed in this country. See below, para.x-xxx.
- 231 Statute sometimes prohibits certain specific incitements—for example, incitement to racial hatred contrary to the Public Order Act 1986 s.18(1). These are generally not true inchoate offences in the sense of being steps on the way to the commission of a crime: there is no substantive crime of “racial hatred”. See also incitement to sedition contrary to the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act 1919 s.3. These offences are unaffected by the abolition of common law incitement.
- 232 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.1.5.
- 233 Post-legislative Scrutiny of Part 2 (Encouraging or Assisting Crime) of the Serious

- Crime Act 2007, Sixth Report of the Justice Committee* (HC 639, 2013).
- 234 R. v Sadique (Omar) [2013] EWCA Crim 1150.
- 235 Above, paras 5-009–5-023, 5-088–5-092.
- 236 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.3.9.
- 237 Law Commission Paper No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.17.
- 238 D. Ormerod and R. Fortson, “Serious Crime Act 2007: the Part 2 Offences” [2009] Crim. L.R. 389, 395–396.
- 239 G. Sullivan, “Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime” [2006] Crim. L.R. 1047; J. R. Spencer, “Helping Another Person to Commit a Crime” in P. Smith (ed) Essays in Honour of J. C. Smith (London: Butterworths, 1987) and W. Wilson, “A Rational Scheme of Liability for Participating in Crime” [2008] Crim. L.R. 3.
- 240 Ormerod and Fortson, “Serious Crime Act 2007: the Part 2 Offences” [2009] Crim. L.R. 389, 397.
- 241 J. R. Spencer and G. Virgo, “Encouraging and Assisting Crime: Legislate in Haste, Repent at Leisure” (2008) Archbold News 7.
- 242 Section 59 abolishes the common law of incitement.
- 243 Most decisions to date have related to sentencing: see Garner-Harris [2012] EWCA Crim 2996; Lanphier [2012] EWCA Crim 731; Watling [2012] EWCA Crim 2894; Bell [2014] EWCA Crim 1660; McCaffery [2014] EWCA Crim 2550; Hutchinson [2016] EWCA Crim 2145.
- 244 Ministry of Justice, Post-legislative Scrutiny of the Serious Crime Act 2007, Memorandum to the Home Affairs Committee and Justice Committee (2012, Cm.8502), para.52: in 2009, there were 13 prosecutions under Pt 2 of the Act; in 2011 the number had risen to 121.
- 245 Blackshaw [2011] EWCA Crim 2312: the case involved 10 appeals against sentence. cf. C. Lightowlers and H. Quirk, “The 2011 English ‘riots’: prosecutorial zeal and judicial abandon” (2015) 55 Brit. J. Criminol. 165. The provisions may also be increasingly used to deal with organised crime: see Sadique [2013] EWCA Crim 1150, below at paras 5-140–5-142.
- 246 Care is needed here. Serious Crime Act 2007 Pt 2 uses the term “act” throughout the provisions. But sometimes it refers to the defendant’s act and sometimes to that of P. One notable potential cause for confusion is s.47(8) where it states that reference in s.47 to the “doing of an act” includes a failure to act; the continuation of an act that has already begun; and an attempt to do an act. The phrase “doing of an act” refers to the act of P and not to that of the defendant.
- 247 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.5.37.
- 248 R. v Goldman (Terence) [2001] Crim. L.R. 822.
- 249 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993), para.4.48.
- 250 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.5.5.
- 251 R. Fortson, Blackstone’s Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (London: Blackstone, 2008), p.81. Section 65(3) excludes from this provision a failure to respond to a constable’s request for assistance.

- 252 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.3.34.
- 253 Home Office, Explanatory Notes to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (2007), para.232.
- 254 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.5.29.
- 255 Banks (1873) 12 Cox C.C. 393. Although where communication failed it was possible to prosecute for an attempt to incite: R. v Chelmsford Justices Ex p. Amos (JJ) [1973] Crim. L.R. 437.
- 256 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.67.
- 257 It is not clear whether oblique intention suffices here. The Woollin test requiring foresight of virtual certainty could well be applicable as this involves a far greater degree of foresight than merely being a “foreseeable consequence”.
- 258 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.47(7)(a).
- 259 The Supreme Court in Jogee [2016] UKSC 8; [2016] 2 W.L.R. 651, Lords Hughes and Toulson at [86], appear to have failed to appreciate that, by virtue of s.47(5)(a), recklessness might be sufficient mens rea for the s.44 offence: “... Parliament has provided that foresight is not sufficient mens rea for the offence of intentionally encouraging or assisting another to commit an offence”. See G. Virgo, “The relationship between inchoate and accessorial liability after Jogee” [2016] 9 Archbold Review 6.
- 260 Home Office, Explanatory Notes to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (2007), para.157.
- 261 See further, J. Child, “The Differences Between Attempted Complicity and Inchoate Assisting and Encouraging—A Reply to Professor Bohlander” [2010] Crim. L.R.924 and J. Child, “Exploring the Mens Rea Requirements of the Serious Crime Act 2007 Assisting and Encouraging Offences” [2012] 76 Jo. Cr. L. 220; D. Baker, “Lesser included offences, alternative offences and accessorial liability” (2016) Jo. Crim. L. 446, 451.
- 262 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.49(4), Sch.3.
- 263 Ormerod and Fortson, “Serious Crime Act 2007: the Part 2 Offences” [2009] Crim. L.R. 389, 405.
- 264 J. Horder, Ashworth’s Principles of Criminal Law, 8th edn. (Oxford: OUP, 2016), p.497.
- 265 Ormerod and Fortson, “Serious Crime Act 2007: the Part 2 Offences” [2009] Crim. L.R. 389 referring to DPP v Maxwell [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1350 (below paras 6-026–6-027).
- 266 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.48(3).
- 267 R. v Blackshaw (Jordan Philip) [2011] EWCA Crim 2312.
- 268 See, e.g. R. Fortson, “R. v S and H: Assisting and Encouraging—Trial—Indictment” [2012] Crim. L.R. 449 (supporting the decision) and G. Virgo, “Encouraging or Assisting More than One Offence”, Archbold Review 13 March 2012 and G. Virgo, “Enough is Enough”, Archbold News 12 April 2013 (criticising the decision).
- 269 R. Fortson, “R. v Sadique (Omar): Assisting and Encouraging—Trial—Indictment’ [2014] Crim. L.R. 61, 66. See also: F. Stark, “Encouraging or assisting clarity?” [2013] 72 C.L.J. 497; G. Virgo, “Making sense of section 46 of the Serious Crime Act 2007” (2013) 7 Archbold Review 4.
- 270 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.49(1). By virtue of s.47(2) it is also no defence for the defendant to claim that he did not know that the conduct that he was encouraging or assisting P to commit was a criminal offence. Ignorance of the law is no defence.

- 271 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.A.63.
- 272 R. v Tyrrell [1894] 1 Q.B. 710.
- 273 In Gnango [2011] UKSC 59; [2012] 1 A.C. 827 at [50], Lord Phillips and Lord Judge CJ described this section as providing a “limited exemption” from liability.
- 274 McDonough (1962) 47 Cr. App. R. 37.
- 275 Nock [1978] A.C. 979.
- 276 R. v Fitzmaurice (Robert) [1983] Q.B. 1083.
- 277 See the 6th edn of this book, pp.538–539.
- 278 Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.6.61.
- 279 For one instance where impossibility has been provided for, see Serious Crime Act 2007 s.47(6) (where the defendant is assumed to be able to do the relevant act) and Home Office, Explanatory Notes to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (2007), para.159.
- 280 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.52(1). References to England include Wales hereafter.
- 281 See the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.9.
- 282 See further, Home Office, Explanatory Notes to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (2007), paras 181–193.
- 283 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.53.
- 284 Ministry of Justice, Serious Crime Act 2007: Implementation of Part 2 (2008), para.70.
- 285 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.58(7).
- 286 J. R. Spencer and G. Virgo, “Encouraging and Assisting Crime: Legislate in Haste, Repent at Leisure” (2008) Archbold News 7, 8.
- 287 This review is still pending: <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/post-legislative-scrutiny-of-the-serious-crime-act-2007> [Accessed March 2017].
- 288 House of Commons Justice Committee, Post-legislative Scrutiny of Part 2 (Encouraging or Assisting Crime) of the Serious Crime Act 2007 (HC 639, 2013).
- 289 See, e.g. the comments by F. Stark, “Encouraging or Assisting Clarity” [2013] 72 Cambridge L.J. 497, 501.
- 290 Sirat (1985) 83 Cr. App. R. 41. See Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.3.36.
- 291 Serious Crime Act 2007 s.49(4). This applies to intentional encouragement or assistance only, i.e. the s.44 offence.
- 292 By virtue of the repeal of the Criminal Law Act 1977 s.5(7) (which stated that it is not an offence to incite a conspiracy) by the Serious Crime Act 2007 Sch.14.
- 293 By virtue of the Serious Crime Act 2007 ss.44, 49(4) and Sch.3.
- 294 i.e. Offences under the Serious Crime Act 2007 ss.45 and 46 are excluded by s.49(4) and Sch.3.
- 295 Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(4) (see above para.5-072) excludes certain forms of liability, such as attempted conspiracy and attempts to aid and abet a crime, from its ambit, but does not exclude the possibility of an attempt to encourage or assist a crime. As it was technically possible to conspire to incite under the common law it is possibly unlawful to conspire to encourage or assist. See J. Horder, Ashworth's Principles of Criminal Law, 8th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2016), p.486.

- 296 R. v R [2008] 2 Cr. App. R. 38. See para.5-003.
- 297 By repealing the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s.1(4)(a).
- 298 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), paras 3.1–3.23.
- 299 Law Commission Paper No.318 Conspiracy and Attempts (2009), para.3.16.
- 300 See generally, R. A. Duff, “Criminalizing Endangerment” in R. A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes (Oxford: OUP, 2005).
- 301 Benton v United States 232 F.2d 341 at 344–345 (D.C. Cir. 1956).
- 302 Explosive Substances Act 1883 s.4(1).
- 303 Firearms Act 1968 ss.16–22.
- 304 Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 s.17.
- 305 D. J. Baker, Glanville Williams Textbook of Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2016), p.636.
- 306 Road Traffic Act 1988 ss.1, 3 and 4 respectively.
- 307 Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2).
- 308 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.15. See further B. Gallagher, International and Internet Child Sexual Abuse and Exploitation (Huddersfield: Huddersfield University, 2006).
- 309 For a list of offences under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 involving danger to life or bodily harm, see Criminal Law Revision Committee, 14th Report, Offences Against the Person, Cmnd.7844, (1980) paras 192–214. See generally, K. J. M. Smith, “Liability for Endangerment: English Ad Hoc Pragmatism and American Innovation” [1983] Crim. L.R. 127.
- 310 In an interview, many police officers and Crown prosecutors stated that it was “virtually impossible” to get a charge of dangerous driving where there had not been a collision: L. M. Pearce, Dangerous Driving and the Law, Road Safety Research Report No.26 (2002).
- 311 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.1. See, generally, C. M. V. Clarkson, “Aggravated Endangerment Offences” (2007) 60 C.L.P. 278.
- 312 Above, paras 3-140–3-141.
- 313 e.g. R. v R [2008] EWCA Crim 619.
- 314 See, generally, A. von Hirsch, “Extending the Harm Principle: ‘Remote’ Harm and Fair Imputation” in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996); A. Ashworth, “The Unfairness of Risk-Based Possession Offences”, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2015), Ch.6.
- 315 cf. R. A. Duff and S. E. Marshall, “‘Abstract Endangerment’, Two Harm Principles and Two Routes to Criminalization” (2015) Minnesota Legal Studies Research Paper No.15–19 at https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2635589 [Accessed March 2017].
- 316 Hussain (1981) 47 Cr. App. R. 143. See also R. v Bradish (Liam Christopher) [1990] Crim. L.R. 723; R. v Waller [1991] Crim. L.R. 381; Steele [1993] Crim. L.R. 298.
- 317 In Australia, many states have separate endangerment offences relating to death and to serious injury. See D. Lanham, "Danger Down Under" [1999] Crim. L.R. 960.

318 Recklessly endangering the life of another (Criminal Damage Act 1971 s.1(2)).

Chapter 6

Participation in Crime

I. Introduction

6—001

So far in our analysis of the criminal law, we have assumed that only one defendant is involved, and we have considered that person's liability for acting alone. This may well be the case but it is also likely that at some stage either in the planning or commission of the crime other persons have become involved.¹ They may have supplied tools, information, advice, kept a look-out or even instigated the crime. In many cases, however, the crime may have been unplanned and spontaneous, brought about on the spur of the moment when a suggestion from one member of a group is taken up by others and acted upon. Where crime is a group activity it is arguable that a distinct set of problems arise in relation to using punishment to deter criminal activity.

PAUL H. ROBINSON AND JOHN M. DARLEY, "DOES CRIMINAL LAW DETER? A BEHAVIOURAL SCIENCE INVESTIGATION" (2004) 24 O.J.L.S. 173–205, PP.180–181:

6—002

“[B]oth the ability and the motivation to make the calculations required for deterrence can be influenced by a variety of contextual effects, ... Perhaps the most important of these stems from the fact that crimes are often committed by groups. When offenders commit crimes in street gangs, for instance, several effects can temporarily reduce the possible impact of a threatened future prison term on current law-breaking activities: an 'arousal effect' leads to sprees and reduced sensitivity to risk, and an increase in the immediate rewards can arise from an increase in esteem in which the group holds the member who boldly breaks the law.

Of exacerbating effect is the fact of differential association ... Interviews with criminals consistently show that the individual feels 'led to' the commission of the crime by the confidence that other gang members give them that 'they will not get caught' ... Behavioural scientists will recognize this as an instance of the well-known 'risky shift' phenomenon, in which a group that comes to a collective decision after discussion comes to a decision that is often more risky than the average of the decisions that individuals held prior to the discussion. This means that the group tends to badly underestimate the risk of being caught.

Yet another process likely to lead groups toward crime commission is the phenomenon called 'deindividuation' in which the individual is 'lost in a crowd'; he perceives a loss of accountability for his individual actions when those actions are taken in a crowd or mob and thus engages in many more anti-social acts. The effect is illustrated most dramatically by gangs of teenagers or soccer crowds who sweep through neighbourhoods, breaking windows, assaulting those unlucky enough to be in their paths, but is at work in most groups of potential offenders.

Available data suggests that a significant proportion of offences are committed by offenders in groups. Except in cases of murders and rapes without theft, which are crimes in which offenders usually know their victim, 'the majority of offenders commit their offences with accomplices'. To sum up, ... individual pathologies are likely to be extended and amplified by the fact that the decision to commit a crime is often a group rather than an individual decision, and the group processes shift its members toward taking more risky actions, and deindividuates them, facilitating the commission of destructive behaviours. It is difficult to fit this to the image of a person who is affected by complex rational deterrence considerations."²

In addition to questions of deterrence there is also the issue of desert requiring separate consideration in relation to group criminality. If several group members encouraged the offence, but only one individual actually carried out the actus reus, the need arises to find some way of measuring the blameworthiness of the other group members and the degree to which the end result can be attributed to them. How does the law respond to such group criminality? The approach taken by the English law of complicity is to make those individuals who help in the commission of offences liable for the full crime. Such secondary parties³ are “liable to be tried, indicted and punished”⁴ as if they had committed the crime themselves. This means, for example, that a defendant who assisted another to rape a woman (say, by blocking any entrance to the room) is guilty of rape, even though he never touched the woman. Unlike the inchoate offences, there is no crime of “aiding and abetting rape” or any other offence. References to “aiding and abetting rape” or other offences are simply a short-hand way of describing how the defendant came to be liable for the offence. Another consequence of this approach is that an accessory can plead common law defences such as duress or self-defence. Also, it means accessories are sentenced as if they were principals in cases where fixed or automatic sentences apply.⁵ Whether it is appropriate to regard all of those involved in crimes as equally blameworthy is a question which can only be considered once the law has been examined. But what needs to be explored now is how the law is able to come to a conclusion that such parties are guilty of the same offence as the principal offender.

There are two stumbling-blocks to the imposition of full liability. The first is that it may be difficult to say that the secondary offender’s conduct caused the crime, particularly where she was not even present at the scene. The second is that the secondary party may lack the mens rea of the offence. Thus, whatever links the defendant with the crime, it cannot be the same actus reus and mens rea as that required for the principal offender. The question then becomes one of ascertaining what the different requirements are.

Present English law on participation is committed to the principle of derivative liability. The liability of the secondary party derives from, and is dependent on, the commission of an offence by the principal offender. Unlike the law of attempt where the focus is forward-looking on the defendant's actions and endeavours towards the commission of a crime, accessorial liability is backwards-looking. A crime must have been committed.⁶ The issue is one of determining which persons participated sufficiently in that crime to be held liable for it. How is one to determine whether there has been "sufficient participation"?

K. J. M. SMITH, A MODERN TREATISE ON THE LAW OF COMPLICITY (1991), P.5:

6—004

“[I]t is tempting to view complicity as a shadow variety of principal liability, following as far as possible, both its actus reus and mens rea contours. As a starting-point, paradigmatic principal liability could be taken as involving a voluntary actor, with appropriate fault, engaging in harmful conduct or causing harm. An equivalence or parallel liability theory of complicity would demand a variable level of culpability as dictated by the principal offence's fault requirements. Such a shadowing process would, though, require the accessory's mental state to be an amalgam of purpose, perception, etc. in respect of both his own and the principal's actions. Paralleling the requirements of principal liability becomes even more difficult in respect of the principal's actus reus. While there is some level of plausibility in maintaining that an accessory must have a similar level of mental culpability to the perpetrator, this is not possible in respect of actus reus demands. Whether the principal offence is one based on the actor's conduct or the result of such conduct, the accessory's involvement (depending on the offence) cannot always be that stipulated by the offence's definition.”

6—005

As the secondary party is fully liable for the offence committed, logic dictates that there should be a high degree of mens rea as well as a substantial contribution (actus reus) towards the offence. However, because the accessory's liability is based not only on his own acts, but also on his involvement or participation in the offence committed by another, the actus reus and mens rea required for secondary liability have to be assessed, not in isolation, but also in relation to the actus reus and mens rea of the principal offender.

Hardly surprisingly, this task of specifying the appropriate level of contribution and the required mental element for the accessory has proved highly problematic. Ashworth accuses the common law of:

“running wild—there are too many decisions on complicity, so that courts (and/or counsel) tend to pick and choose among the many precedents; and there is no settled set of principles, which means that judicial development of the law does not always conduce to coherence.”⁷

II. The Law

A. PRINCIPAL OFFENDERS

6—006

Despite the fact that all parties to a crime may, by virtue of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 s.8, be tried, indicted and punished in the same way,⁸ it is common⁹ to distinguish between the principal offender and secondary parties.¹⁰ The principal offender is usually described as the one who played a part in the commission of the actus reus of the offence.¹¹ It is the principal offender who shoots and kills the victim in a crime of murder or who snatches the bag in the crime of theft or robbery.¹² Clearly, there may be more than one principal offender: two or more defendants may fatally stab a victim.

R. v JOGEE [2016] UKSC 8 (SUPREME COURT):

6—007

LORD HUGHES AND LORD TOULSON ...

”[1] In the language of the criminal law a person who assists or encourages another to commit a crime is known as an accessory or secondary party. The actual perpetrator is known as a principal, even if his role may be subordinate to that of others. It is a fundamental principle of the criminal law that the accessory is guilty of the same offence as the principal. The reason is not difficult to see. He shares the physical act because even if it was not his hand which struck the blow, ransacked the house, smuggled the drugs or forged the cheque, he has encouraged or assisted those physical acts. Similarly he shares the culpability precisely because he encouraged or assisted the offence. No one doubts that if the principal and the accessory are together engaged on, for example, an armed robbery of a bank, the accessory who keeps guard outside is as guilty of the robbery as the principal who enters with a shotgun and extracts the money from the staff by threat of violence. Nor does anyone doubt that the same principle can apply where, as sometimes happens, the accessory is nowhere near the scene of the crime. The accessory who funded the bank robbery or provided the gun for the purpose is as guilty as those who are at the scene. Sometimes it may be impossible for the prosecution to prove whether a defendant was a principal or an accessory, but that does not matter so long as it can prove that he participated in the crime either as one or as the other. These basic principles are long established and uncontroversial.”

There is one exception to the rule that the principal offender is the one whose act is the most immediate cause of the actus reus. Where a defendant acts through an intermediary who is an “innocent agent” because, for example, she is below the age of criminal responsibility, it will be the instigator who will be regarded as the principal offender. The same result will apply if the defendant acts through someone who has no mens rea, as in the situation where the agent is instructed to put what is described as a harmless substance into someone’s food, which the defendant knows will kill.¹³

B. SECONDARY PARTIES

1. Distinct modes of participation?

The liability of secondary parties is governed by the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 s.8:

“whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of any indictable offence shall be liable to be tried, indicted and punished as a principal offender.”

Prior to 1975:

“the received view was that the particular words used in s.8 [aid, abet, counsel or procure] ... had no special implications, and certainly were not to be taken in their literal or natural meaning as coercing any particular conclusion as to the type of conduct that amounts in law to complicity.”¹⁴

In that year, however, the Court of Appeal stated that:

“We approach s.8 of the 1861 Act on the basis that the words should be given their ordinary meaning, if possible. We approach the section on the basis also that if four words are employed here ‘aid, abet, counsel or procure’, the probability is that there is a difference between each of those four words and the other three, because, if there were no difference, then Parliament would be wasting time in using four words where two or three would do.”¹⁵

It is, however, extremely difficult to give these archaic words their “ordinary meaning”. At a simplistic level, “aid” means help or assistance. While “abet” is generally regarded as largely synonymous with “aid”, there have been suggestions that while “aid” is a neutral term, “abet” suggests wrongdoing: “‘abet’ clearly imports mens rea, which ‘aid’ may not”.¹⁶ “Counsel” suggests advice or encouragement while “procure” means “produce by endeavour”.¹⁷ This terminology was, perhaps, apt before 1967 when a distinction had been drawn between those present at the crime (aiders and abettors) and those not present (counsellors and procurers).¹⁸ However, this distinction is no longer part of the law¹⁹ and in more recent years it has become clear that, with the possible exception of “procure”, these words are mere synonyms for assisting or helping or encouraging.²⁰

That there is no critical distinction between these terms is emphasised by the fact that it is possible for an indictment to be framed in language which embraces all four terms²¹ or for the defendant to be charged with committing the crime without any reference to the terms in s.8.²² While the House of Lords in *Maxwell*²³ stressed that it was desirable that the true nature of the case against the defendant should be made clear in the indictment, it appears this recommendation has been almost “universally ignored”.²⁴ There is no legal obligation to make such a specification and a failure to spell out the precise role of a person in an enterprise is not a breach of the European Convention on Human Rights art.6.²⁵

To conclude, therefore, it is almost certain that no real conceptual distinctions can be drawn between most of the terms. Between them they embrace conduct which encourages or influences the principal offender or helps her in the commission of the crime. Accordingly, the following analysis of the law will not focus on its antiquated terminology but will concentrate on the different ways in which persons can be said to participate in the commission of a crime. However, as there might still be some justification for regarding procuring as distinct, this form of complicity is discussed later in the chapter.

2. Causation

6—010

English law on participation in crime is theoretically underpinned by the doctrine of derivative liability. As seen, this means accessories are held responsible for the result (the crime) that occurs. Unlike an inchoate model of liability, the focus is not simply on their contribution. If they are being blamed for the end result, it would follow logically that their actions should have had a role in causing that result. This view has support. K. J. M. Smith argues that a “broad causal account of complicity offers the most internal coherence alongside the greatest consistency with general principles of criminal responsibility that touch and concern complicity”²⁶ and that “it has always been implied in the concept of complicity that an accessory's involvement (whether as an 'assister' or 'encourager') did make some difference to the outcome".²⁷ In the 2010 decision of Mendez,²⁸ Toulson LJ was also of this view.

However, causation is difficult to establish here because of the central principle that a causal chain is generally broken by voluntary, willed human action. In participation cases this means that the voluntary, willed actions of the principal offender would normally be regarded as breaking the causal chain. As Kadish says:

"Causation applies where results of a person's actions happen in the physical world. Complicity applies where results take the form of another person's voluntary action. Complicity emerges as a separate ground of liability because causation doctrine cannot satisfactorily deal with results that take the form of another's voluntary action."²⁹

English law has largely accepted this view, rather than that expressed by Toulson J.

R. V CALHAEM [1985] 1 Q.B. 808
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

6—011

The defendant, Mrs Calhaem, was infatuated with her solicitor. She was charged with the murder of a woman who was having an affair with her solicitor. She had instructed one Zajac to commit the murder. He pleaded guilty to the murder but said in evidence that up to the point when he went berserk and killed the woman, he had come to a decision not to go through with the plan. The defendant appealed against her conviction for murder on the basis that counselling required a substantial causal connection between the acts of the counsellor and the commission of the offence and that none existed on the facts.

PARKER LJ:

"We must therefore approach the question raised on the basis that we should give to the word ‘counsel’ its ordinary meaning, which is as the judge said, ‘advise’, ‘solicit’, or something of that sort. There is no implication in the word itself that there should be any causal connection between the counselling and the offence. It is true that, unlike the offence of incitement at common law, the actual offence must have been committed and by the person counselled. To this extent there must clearly be, first, contact between the parties, and secondly, a connection between the counselling and the murder. Equally, the act done must, we think, be done within the scope of the authority or advice, and not, for example, accidentally when the mind of the final murderer did not go with his actions. For example, if the principal offender happened to be involved in a football riot in the course of which he laid about him with a weapon of some sort and killed someone, who, unknown to him, was the person whom he had been counselled to kill, he would not, in our view, have been acting within the scope of his authority; he would have been acting entirely outside it, albeit what he had done was what he had been counselled to do.

We see, however, no need to import anything further into the meaning of the word.”

Appeal dismissed

6—012

Subsequently, the Court of Appeal has followed this decision, in a case involving similar facts. In Luffman,³⁰ the principal offender, who had been paid to kill the deceased and been given a sawn-off shotgun for that purpose by the secondary parties, claimed that he never intended to go through with the plan but met with the victim with the intention of robbing him, and shot him when the robbery went wrong. The secondary parties argued that there was no causal connection between their encouragement and the murder and so they should not be liable. The Court of Appeal, whilst resisting the invitation to provide more guidance as to how strong a connection was needed for aiding, abetting or counselling an offence,³¹ was content that sufficient connection was proved in the present case and that the principal offender had not acted outside the scope of his authority, given that he did exactly what he had been contracted to do. Some further guidance as to what constitutes a “connecting link” is provided by Toulson LJ in *Stringer*³²:

“[E]ncouragement by its nature involves some form of transmission by words or conduct, whether directly or via an intermediary. An unposted letter of encouragement would not be encouragement unless P chanced to discover it and read it. Similarly, it would be unreal to regard P as acting with the ... encouragement of D if the only encouragement took the form of words spoken by D out of P’s earshot.”³³

As long as the encouragement has “the capacity to act on P’s mind”³⁴ it seems clear that liability is not restricted to situations where there is a causal relationship between the accessory’s and principal’s acts. This was underlined in *Giannetto*³⁵ where the court was of the view that liability would follow if a husband merely said “Oh goody” to a plan already in existence to kill his wife.³⁶ In such a case, it cannot be asserted that the accessory’s acts made any causal contribution to the end result.

In so far as assistance, rather than encouragement, is concerned, far from a causal connection being required,³⁷ it is possible that one could aid a crime without the principal even being aware that assistance is being provided.³⁸ However, with regard to “procuring”, it has been held that causation is necessary³⁹ although consensus is not required. This, again, underlines the need for procuring to be dealt with separately.

3. Assistance and encouragement

6—013

Whether conduct amounts to assistance or encouragement is a question of fact.⁴⁰ Although the following are not distinct legal categories, it is useful, for purposes of exposition, to group the types of assistance and encouragement that may be provided as follows:

(i) Unplanned presence at the crime

Generally, being present⁴¹ when a crime is committed does not, of course, implicate one in the crime. But, what if a fight starts in a pub and those present start to “egg on” the participants? The following is the leading decision on this point.

R. V CLARKSON (1971) 55 CR. APP. R.
445 (COURTS-MARTIAL APPEAL COURT):

6—014

The defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting the rape of a woman in an army barracks. He and another defendant, Carroll, appealed.

MEGAW LJ:

“[T]he presence of those two appellants in the room where the offence was taking place was not accidental in any sense and it was not by chance, unconnected with the crime, that they were there. Let it be accepted that they entered the room when the crime was committed because of what they had heard, which indicated that a woman was being raped, and they remained there.

Coney (1882) 8 Q.B.D. 534 decides that non-accidental presence at the scene of the crime is not conclusive of aiding and abetting ...

What has to be proved is stated by Hawkins J in a well-known passage in his judgment in Coney at 557 of the report. What he said was this:

‘... In my opinion, to constitute an aider and abettor some active steps must be taken by word, or action, with the intent to instigate the principal, or principals. Encouragement does not of necessity amount to aiding and abetting, it may be intentional or unintentional, a man may unwittingly encourage another in fact by his presence, by misinterpreted words, or gestures, or by his silence, or non-interference, or he may encourage intentionally by expressions, gestures, or actions intended to signify approval. In the latter case he aids and abets, in the former he does not. It is no criminal offence to stand by, a mere passive spectator of a crime, even of a murder. Non-interference to prevent a crime is not itself a crime. But the fact that a person was voluntarily and purposely present witnessing the commission of a crime, and offered no opposition to it, though he might reasonably be expected to prevent and had the power so to do, or at least to express his dissent, might, under some circumstances, afford cogent evidence upon which a jury would be justified in finding that he wilfully encouraged and so aided and abetted. But it would be purely a question for the jury whether he did so or not.'

It is not enough, then, that the presence of the accused person has, in fact, given encouragement. It must be proved that he intended to give encouragement; that he wilfully encouraged. In a case such as the present, more than in many other cases where aiding and abetting is alleged, it was essential that that element should be stressed; for there was here at least the possibility that a drunken man with his self-discipline loosened by drink, being aware that a woman was being raped, might be attracted to the scene and might stay on the scene in the capacity of what is known as a voyeur; and, while his presence and the presence of others might in fact encourage the rapers or discourage the victim, he himself, enjoying the scene or at least standing by assenting, might not intend that his presence should offer encouragement to rapers and would-be rapers or discouragement to the victim; he might not realise that he was giving encouragement; so that, while encouragement there might be, it would not be a case in which, to use the words of Hawkins J., the accused person 'wilfully encouraged'.

A further point is emphasized in passages in the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Allan [1965] 1 Q.B. 130, at 135 and 138. That was a case concerned with participation in an affray. On 135 the court said this:

'In effect, it amounts to this: that the judge thereby directed the jury that they were in duty bound to convict an accused who was proved to have been present and witnessing an affray, if it was also proved that he nursed an intention to join in if help was needed by the side he favoured and this notwithstanding that he did nothing by words or deeds to evince his intention and outwardly played the role of a purely passive spectator. It was said that, if that direction is right, where A and B behave themselves to all outward appearances in an exactly similar manner, but it be proved that A had the intention to participate if needs be, whereas B had no such intention, then A must be convicted of being a principal in the second degree to the affray, whereas B should be acquitted. To do that, it is objected, would be to convict A on his thoughts, even though they found no reflection in his action' ...

From that it follows that mere intention is not in itself enough. There must be an intention to encourage; and there must also be encouragement in fact in cases such as the present case.”

*Appeal allowed*⁴²

6—015

In Tait,⁴³ the Court of Appeal confirmed that both an intention to encourage and encouragement in fact must be established. Fletcher, however, has questioned the necessity for such a psychological effect on the principal:

“After all, whether the aid is actually rendered is fortuitous; the actor is equally culpable and his dangerousness is equally great if the perpetrator never receives the aid.”⁴⁴

Such an argument provides a justification for the inchoate offences of encouraging or assisting crime under the Serious Crime Act 2007, leaving the law on complicity to punish those who in fact encourage a completed offence. While causal explanations of complicity have been generally rejected by English law (except in relation to procuring), it would seem that in these cases of unplanned presence at the scene of the crime, the law’s insistence upon actual encouragement does manifest vestiges of a causal theory of complicity. This can best be explained by looking at the problem from another perspective. If, in these cases, liability were imposed in the absence of actual encouragement, this would be tantamount to punishing persons for an omission to act in situations where there was no pre-existing duty to act.⁴⁵

(ii) Failure to exercise control

6—016

Exceptionally, presence without intended and actual encouragement may give rise to liability if the defendant has a right to control the actions of the principal offender. If, for instance, the owner of a vehicle sits in the passenger seat and does nothing whilst the principal offender behind the wheel drives dangerously, his omission may inculpate him.⁴⁶ Perhaps because visions of owners grabbing the steering wheel from the dangerous driver (and exacerbating the situation) arose before the judges' eyes, the rule of control being the legal equivalent of actual encouragement is now regarded as evidence only that the owner may have encouraged the commission of the crime.⁴⁷ If a prosecution for dangerous driving is to be based on the car owner's omission to intervene upon the principal offender's commission of the offence, it must be shown that the owner had the opportunity to do so.⁴⁸ In Alford Transport Ltd,⁴⁹ it was held that actual presence at the scene of the crime was not necessary. Where a transport manager or the managing director of a company who had a right to control the actions of its employees deliberately refrained from exercising control, it could be inferred that there was positive encouragement. The mens rea of this species of complicity will be considered later.

(iii) Counselling

6—017

Counselling normally (although not invariably) refers to help given before the commission of the crime. It may take a wide variety of forms but includes advice, encouragement or the supply of information or equipment. The mens rea of counselling is discussed below.

(iv) Joint enterprise

6—018

Where two or more people embark on a joint unlawful enterprise, for example a burglary or an attack on someone, the law has long adopted the view that all the parties should be liable for the direct and agreed consequences of that joint enterprise. Where the co-defendants merely commit the planned offence—the type of joint enterprise that Lord Hoffmann has described as a “plain vanilla” version of joint enterprise⁵⁰—the finding of guilt for each co-defendant involved in the plan is straightforward. However, problems arise in cases other than the “plain vanilla” variety (cases which could perhaps be termed the “tutti frutti” variety), where the principal offender goes beyond what was agreed and commits a second offence, often referred to as the “collateral” offence.⁵¹ Following a line of authorities culminating in the decisions of the Privy Council in *Chan-Wing Siu*⁵² and the House of Lords in Powell; English,⁵³ such cases resulted in liability for the secondary offender under what became known as the doctrine of “parasitic accessory liability”.

R. v JOGEE [2016] UKSC 8 (SUPREME COURT):

6—019

”[2] In the last 20 years a new term has entered the lexicon of criminal lawyers: parasitic accessory liability. The expression was coined by Professor Sir John Smith ...⁵⁴ He used the expression to describe a doctrine which had been laid down by the Privy Council in Chan Wing-Siu v The Queen [1985] A.C. 168 and developed in later cases, including most importantly the decision of the House of Lords in R. v Powell and R v English [1999] 1 A.C. 1. In Chan Wing-Siu it was held that if two people set out to commit an offence (crime A), and in the course of that joint enterprise one of them (D1) commits another offence (crime B), the second person (D2) is guilty as an accessory to crime B if he had foreseen the possibility that D1 might act as he did. D2’s foresight of that possibility plus his continuation in the enterprise to commit crime A were held sufficient in law to bring crime B within the scope of the conduct for which he is criminally liable, whether or not he intended it.”

An example of the parasitic accessory liability rule operating in practice can be found in Slack.⁵⁵ Here, the defendant handed a knife to the principal offender during a burglary so that he could threaten the occupier if she started screaming. While the defendant was out of the room, the principal offender stabbed and killed the occupier. The question of when the accessory will be guilty of the collateral offence of murder in such a case has plagued the English courts for thirty years. This issue was recently addressed by the Supreme Court in the case of Jogee, which is now the leading case on joint enterprise liability. Jogee abolishes any doctrine of parasitic accessory liability applying in cases of joint unlawful enterprise.

R. v JOGEE [2016] UKSC 8 (SUPREME COURT):

6—020

The facts appear below at [para.6-029.]

LORD HUGHES and LORD TOULSON:

”[7] Although the distinction is not always made in the authorities, accessory liability requires proof of a conduct element accompanied by the necessary mental element. Each element can be stated in terms which sound beguilingly simple, but may not always be easy to apply.

[8] The requisite conduct element is that D2 has encouraged or assisted the commission of the offence by D1.

...

[11] With regard to the conduct element, the act of assistance or encouragement may be infinitely varied. Two recurrent situations need mention. Firstly, association between D2 and D1 may or may not involve assistance or encouragement. Secondly, the same is true of the presence of D2 at the scene when D1 perpetrates the crime. Both association and presence are likely to be very relevant evidence on the question whether assistance or encouragement was provided. Numbers often matter. Most people are bolder when supported or fortified by others than they are when alone. And something done by a group is often a good deal more effective than the same thing done by an individual alone. A great many crimes, especially of actual or threatened violence, are, whether planned or spontaneous, in fact encouraged or assisted by supporters present with the principal lending force to what he does. Nevertheless, neither association nor presence is necessarily proof of assistance or encouragement; it depends on the facts: see R. v Coney (1882) 8 Q.B.D. 534 at 540, 558.

[12] Once encouragement or assistance is proved to have been given, the prosecution does not have to go so far as to prove that it had a positive effect on D1’s conduct or on the outcome: R. v Calhaem

[1985] Q.B. 808. In many cases that would be impossible to prove. There might, for example, have been many supporters encouraging D1 so that the encouragement of a single one of them could not be shown to have made a difference. The encouragement might have been given but ignored, yet the counselled offence committed. Conversely, there may be cases where anything said or done by D2 has faded to the point of mere background, or has been spent of all possible force by some overwhelming intervening occurrence by the time the offence was committed. Ultimately it is a question of fact and degree whether D2's conduct was so distanced in time, place or circumstances from the conduct of D1 that it would not be realistic to regard D1's offence as encouraged or assisted by it.

...

[78] ... [S]econdary liability does not require the existence of an agreement between D1 and D2. Where, however, it exists, such agreement is by its nature a form of encouragement and in most cases will also involve acts of assistance. The long established principle that where parties agree to carry out a criminal venture, each is liable for acts to which they have expressly or impliedly given their assent is an example of the intention to assist which is inherent in the making of the agreement. Similarly, where people come together without agreement, often spontaneously, to commit an offence together, the giving of intentional support by words or deeds, including by supportive presence, is sufficient to attract secondary liability on ordinary principles. We repeat that secondary liability includes cases of agreement between principal and secondary party, but it is not limited to them.

...

Restatement of the principles

...

[89] In cases of alleged secondary participation there are likely to be two issues. The first is whether the defendant was in fact a participant, that is, whether he assisted or encouraged the commission of the crime. Such participation may take many forms. It may include providing support by contributing to the force of numbers in a hostile confrontation.

[90] The second issue is likely to be whether the accessory intended to encourage or assist D1 to commit the crime, acting with whatever mental element the offence requires of D1 ...”

6—021

This second issue, relating to mens rea in cases of joint enterprise, is considered below.⁵⁶ It suffices for now to highlight that the actus reus element for this mode of participation is, theoretically at least, no different from others: assistance or encouragement of the offence committed by the principal offender.

4. MENS REA OF ACCESSORIES

6—022

Accessory liability involves a “two-fold structure”,⁵⁷ and mens rea must exist in relation to both of these structural elements:

- (i) mens rea relating to D’s own act of assisting or encouraging the principal offender.
- (ii) mens rea relating to the offence committed by the principal offender.

It is the second of these requirements that has caused more controversy. We will deal with each in turn.

(i) Mens rea relating to D’s own act of assisting or encouraging the principal offender

6—023

The accessory who is assisting or encouraging the crime must have mens rea in relation to his own conduct. For example, in Clarkson it was said there must be an “intention to encourage”. It is implicit in the notion of counselling that one can only encourage or influence another to do something if it is one’s intention to encourage. This was confirmed in Bryce where Potter LJ stated:

“[I]t is necessary to show firstly that the act which constitutes the aiding, abetting [counselling] etc was done intentionally in the sense of deliberately and not accidentally and secondly that the accused knew it to be an act capable of assisting or encouraging the crime.”⁵⁸

Thus, the mens rea requirement is doing much of the work in inculcating the accessory to a crime:

“Since the act and cause requirements of accomplice liability are so minimal, and since an accomplice [can be punished] the same as the perpetrator of the substantive offence, the mens rea requirement becomes more significant. Accomplice liability hinges upon the mens rea element.”⁵⁹

(ii) mens rea relating to the offence committed by the principal offender

6—024

In addition to the secondary party having to form mens rea in relation her own act of assistance or encouragement, she must also have mens rea in relation to the offence committed by the principal offender. However, an accessory need not form the mens rea of the offence itself. What exactly is required has been in doubt relating to cases of joint enterprise, but in relation to other cases a fairly clear test has been applied, with *NCB v Gamble*⁶⁰ being the leading and much cited authority. According to that case, it is simply necessary to prove that the accessory knew that the offence was to be committed. The facts were that a weigh-bridge operator, in the course of his job, issued a ticket to a driver leaving the colliery premises, knowing that the lorry was overloaded. The Coal Board (as the weigh-bridge operator’s employer) was convicted of being an accessory to the offence of using a lorry on the road with a load weighing more than that permitted.⁶¹ It was held that the only mens rea required was knowledge of the circumstances rendering the act criminal. Devlin J concluded that:

“an indifference to the result of crime does not of itself negative abetting. If one man deliberately sells to another a gun to be used for murdering a third, he may be indifferent about whether the third man lives or dies and interested only in the cash profit to be made out of the sale, but he can still be an aider and abettor.”⁶²

This approach has been criticised by Williams:

“It seems a strong thing to hold that a man who is simply pursuing his ordinary and lawful vocation, and takes no special steps to assist illegalities, becomes involved as a party to crime committed by the customer merely because he realises that his customer will be enabled by what he himself does to commit such a crime.”⁶³

6—025

On the other hand, it is possible to defend the approach adopted in Gamble. If the defendant knows that a crime is to be committed, why should he be allowed to shelter behind a shield that he was “just doing his job”? Legitimate business enterprise should not be permitted to extend to the knowing provision of tools for the commission of crime.

In Gamble, the offence which was being aided, abetted or counselled was clear, and depended on the circumstances in which the secondary party acted, rather than a particular harm resulting. The test there does not help to determine what ought to be required in a case of counselling in which the secondary party provides assistance in advance of the commission of the crime, perhaps by providing a weapon, but does not know the details of the principal’s intended offence. To what extent must the counsellor know the details of the principal’s intended offence? Is it enough that he knows that some sort of offence of violence is being planned or does he need to have a fair idea of when or how or where? In Bainbridge,⁶⁴ it was held that as long as the defendant was aware of the type of offence to be committed, that would be enough to incriminate him. The “type of offence” formula was not without difficulties (establishing, for example, whether one offence was of a similar type to another) and so the issue was re-examined by the House of Lords in the following case.

MAXWELL V DPP FOR NORTHERN

IRELAND (1979) 68 CR. APP. R. 128
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

6—026

LORD SCARMAN:

“I think Bainbridge ... was correctly decided. But I agree with counsel for the appellant that in the instant case the Court of Criminal Appeal in Northern Ireland has gone further than the Court of Criminal Appeal for England and Wales found it necessary to go in Bainbridge. It is not possible in the present case to declare that it is proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that the appellant knew a bomb attack upon the Inn was intended by those whom he was assisting. It is not established, therefore, that he knew the particular type of crime intended. The Court, however, refused to limit criminal responsibility by reference to knowledge by the accused of the type or class of crime intended by those whom he assisted. Instead, the Court has formulated a principle which avoids the uncertainties and ambiguities of classification. The guilt of an accessory springs, according to the Court’s formulation, ‘from the fact that he contemplates the commission of one (or more) of a number of crimes by the principal and he intentionally lends his assistance in order that such a crime will be committed’: per Sir Robert Lowry CJ ‘The relevant crime’, the Lord Chief Justice continues:

‘must be within the contemplation of the accomplice and only exceptionally would evidence be found to support the allegation that the accomplice had given the principal a completely blank cheque.’

The principle thus formulated has great merit. It directs attention to the state of mind of the accused—not what he ought to have in contemplation, but what he did have: it avoids definition and classification, while ensuring that a man will not be convicted of aiding and abetting any offence his principal may commit, but only one which is within his contemplation. He may have in contemplation only one offence, or several: and the several which he contemplates he may see as alternatives. An accessory who leaves it to his principal to choose is liable, provided always the choice is made from the range of offences from which the accessory contemplates the choice will be made. Although the court's formulation of the principle goes further than the earlier cases, it is a sound development of the law and in no way inconsistent with them. I accept it as good judge-made law in a field where there is no statute to offer guidance."

6—027

It should be noted, first, that Maxwell is the kind of case which the Law Commission had in mind when drafting the new offences of assisting and encouraging crime. A defendant such as Maxwell would now be liable for one of the inchoate offences under the Serious Crime Act 2007 although, unless and until the Law Commission's recommendations relating to secondary liability are enacted, he could also remain liable for the substantive offences as an accomplice.

Maxwell left one question unresolved. Does the accessory continue to be liable for the crimes of the principal so long as they continue to be on their "shopping list" of crimes? One could imagine the well-worn and well-used jemmy being the source of endless liability for the supplier of it. There is nothing in the law as it presently stands, which prevents the accessory being implicated every time the tool is used for one of the "shopping list" crimes—although it does not appear to have been a problem in practice.

The central question, however, is whether these rules apply in the same way in cases of joint enterprise. With joint enterprise cases, participation in the enterprise is deemed to be intentional assistance. However, because the accessory is liable for the crime committed by the principal (as opposed to being simply liable for his own acts of encouragement, etc), the accessory also needs mens rea in relation to that crime. For some time there was a dispute over whether joint enterprise liability formed a separate doctrine with its own special rules for establishing accessorial liability, or whether taking part in a joint enterprise was just one way in which it could be shown that D had aided, abetted or counselled the principal's offence. As a result of this dispute, it was unclear as to whether the mens rea for accessories in cases of joint enterprise was something distinct from other forms of participation. It was argued in previous editions of this book that the approach of treating all accessories as subject to the same mens rea rules appeared to represent the rule, but recognised that the matter was not completely beyond doubt. Virgo,⁶⁵ Smith⁶⁶ and Buxton⁶⁷ all expressed the opinion that joint enterprise is not distinct from other modes of accessory liability. Simester and Sullivan, on the other hand, thought that “joint enterprise is a special case of secondary participation and not merely a sub-species of assistance and encouragement”.⁶⁸ The Law Commission favoured Simester’s views, arguing that a secondary party to a joint enterprise is different to an aider or abettor because he need not have contributed to the commission of the principal’s offence, but has condoned it by changing his normative position in choosing to take part in the joint enterprise.⁶⁹ Given that joint enterprise is rejected by many as being a separate doctrine of accessory liability, the cases that apply should be interchangeable as between different modes of participation. A practical reason why the same rules should apply is that it is impossible in practice, and pointless in principle, to draw sharp distinctions between counsellors and parties to joint unlawful enterprises. In an area of law renowned for its complexity, there would be much to be gained from the development of a single rule applicable to most cases of complicity. This has been recognised by the Supreme Court in its judgment in Jogee.

6—028

This area of law is, and has been, extremely complex, and the way in which the mens rea requirement applies in cases of joint enterprise murder has been particularly controversial. In essence, until the recent Supreme Court decision in Jogee the position was that a secondary party could be liable for murder where he foresaw that the principal offender might kill with intent to do so or with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, provided that the principal’s lethal act was not “fundamentally different” to that foreseen by the secondary party.⁷⁰ As is explained elsewhere in this book, for a principal offender to be liable for murder he must intend to kill or cause grievous bodily harm; nothing short of foresight of death or GBH as a virtual certainty will suffice. The position of the law towards secondary parties has therefore been extremely harsh. In Jogee, however, the Supreme Court decided that the law took a “wrong turn” 30 years ago in the case of Chan Wing-Siu,⁷¹ and that the law had subsequently been wrongly applied. In that case, the three defendants appealed against their convictions for murder and wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm. They had each been armed with a knife when they went to a flat used by a prostitute, where it was alleged they planned to rob the prostitute’s husband. The husband was stabbed to death and his wife was slashed across the head. The trial judge directed the jury that an accused was guilty on each count if he was proved to have had in his contemplation that a knife might be used by one of his co-adventurers with intent to inflict serious bodily injury. The appeals against conviction were dismissed.

The Supreme Court in Jogee does not object to the fact that these convictions were upheld. Rather, the essence of the wrong turn was that in Chan Wing-Siu Sir Robin Cooke, giving the judgment of the Privy Council, concluded that there was no doubt that there existed a principle whereby a secondary party was criminally liable for acts by the primary offender of a type which the former foresaw but did not necessarily intend.⁷² This principle was further applied and elucidated in subsequent cases, the most important being Powell; English,⁷³ all of which were based on an error of law. It had thus allowed secondary parties to be convicted of murder on the basis of recklessness rather than intention.

The Supreme Court’s judgment in Jogee is extraordinary, not only for the fact that it seeks to correct this wrong turn, but also in the way in which the case came to be decided. Members of the Supreme Court, having become increasingly frustrated by the lack of clarity in the law of joint enterprise, identified the case, along with an appeal from Jamaica which it heard at the same time in its capacity as the Privy Council,⁷⁴ as a vehicle through which to inject some clarity into the law. This included the opportunity for “interveners” to make representations as to the state of the law,⁷⁵ and allowed the court to engage in a detailed examination of the case law on joint enterprise.

R. v JOGEE [2016] UKSC 8 (SUPREME COURT):

H and J spent the evening taking drink and drugs and, as they became more intoxicated, their behaviour became more and more aggressive. They went to Miss Reid's house where, according to Miss Reid, J picked up a knife from a kitchen block and waved it about, saying he was going to "shank" V, with whom Miss Reid was having a relationship. Miss Reid wanted them to leave and told them that V would be back shortly. J and H replied that they were not scared of V and would sort him out. After some coming and going, with V having returned home, J and H came back, and had an angry exchange with V. V went upstairs to put his jeans on while H took the knife from the kitchen. V came down and tried to get H and J to leave. V was in the hallway with H inside the front door, and J was out in the street striking a car with a bottle and shouting encouragement to H to do something to V. At some stage J came to the doorway, with the bottle raised, and leaned forward past H towards V saying he wanted to smash it over V's head, but he was too far away. Miss Reid threatened to call the police and H pointed the knife at her chest and grabbed her by the throat. She backed away but saw H make a stabbing motion towards V's chest and H and J ran off. V died of stab wounds to the chest. Both H and J were convicted of murder. J appealed.

LORD HUGHES AND LORD TOULSON:

"[3] The appellants Jogee and Ruddock were each convicted of murder after directions to the jury in which the trial judges sought to apply the principle deriving from Chan Wing-Siu. In these appeals the court has been asked to review the doctrine of parasitic accessory liability and to hold that the court took a wrong turn in Chan Wing-Siu and the cases which have followed it. It is argued by the appellants that the doctrine is based on a flawed reading of earlier authorities and questionable policy arguments. The respondents dispute those propositions and argue that even if the court were now persuaded that the courts took a wrong turn, it should be a matter for legislatures to decide whether to make any change, since the law as laid down in Chan Wing-Siu has been in place in England and Wales and in other common law jurisdictions including Jamaica for 30 years. The two appeals, Jogee in the Supreme Court and Ruddock in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, were heard together ...

[9] Subject to the question whether a different rule applies to cases of parasitic accessory liability, the mental element in assisting or encouraging is an intention to assist or encourage the commission of the crime and this requires knowledge of any existing facts necessary for it to be criminal: National Coal Board v Gamble [1959] 1 Q.B. 11, applied for example in Attorney-General v Able [1984] Q.B. 795, Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority [1986] A.C. 112 and Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland v Maxwell [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1350 per Lord Lowry at 1374G-1375E, approved in the House of Lords at 1356A; 1358F; 1359E; 1362H and echoed also at 1361D.

[10] If the crime requires a particular intent, D2 must intend to assist or encourage D1 to act with such intent. D2's intention to assist D1 to commit the offence, and to act with whatever mental element is required of D1, will often be co-extensive on the facts with an intention by D2 that that offence be committed. Where that is so, it will be seen that many of the cases discuss D2's mental element simply in terms of intention to commit the offence. But there can be cases where D2 gives intentional assistance or encouragement to D1 to commit an offence and to act with the mental element required of him, but without D2 having a positive intent that the particular offence will be committed. That may be so, for example, where at the time that encouragement is given it remains uncertain what D1 might do; an arms supplier might be such a case ...

[14] With regard to the mental element, the intention to assist or encourage will often be specific to a particular offence. But in other cases it may not be. D2 may intentionally assist or encourage D1 to commit one of a range of offences, such as an act of terrorism which might take various forms. If so, D2 does not have to "know" (or intend) in advance the specific form which the crime will take. It is enough that the offence committed by D1 is within the range of possible offences which D2 intentionally assisted or encouraged him to commit (Maxwell) ...

[17] Secondary liability does not require the existence of an agreement between the principal and the secondary party to commit the offence. If a person sees an offence being committed, or is aware that it is going to be committed, and deliberately assists its commission, he will be guilty as an accessory. But where two or more parties agree on an illegal course of conduct (or where one party encourages another to do something illegal), the question has often arisen as to the secondary party's liability where the principal has allegedly gone beyond the scope of what was agreed or encouraged.

...

[46] In Chan Wing-Siu Sir Robin Cooke touched briefly on public policy saying (at 177):

'What public policy requires was rightly identified in the submissions for the Crown. Where a man lends himself to a criminal enterprise knowing that potentially murderous weapons are to be carried, and in the event they in fact are used by his partner with an intent sufficient for murder, he should not escape the consequences by reliance on a nuance of prior assessment, only too likely to have been optimistic.'

...

6—030

R. v Powell and R. v English [1999] 1 A.C. 1

[52] The House of Lords ... held in answer to a question certified by the Court of Appeal that (subject to a qualification in the case of English) 'it is sufficient to found a conviction for murder for a secondary party to have realised that in the course of the joint enterprise the primary party might kill with intent to do so or with intent to cause grievous bodily harm'. The leading judgment was given by Lord Hutton, with whom the other judges agreed. It was argued by the appellants that this was inconsistent with the mens rea requirement for murder laid down in R. v Moloney [1985] A.C. 905 and R. v Hancock [1986] A.C. 455, but those cases were distinguished on the basis that they applied only to the principal offender.

...

[55] Lord Hutton recognised that as a matter of logic there was force in the argument that it was anomalous that foreseeability of death or really serious harm was not sufficient mens rea for the principal to be guilty of murder, but was sufficient in a secondary party. But he said that there were weighty and important practical considerations related to public policy which prevailed over considerations of strict logic. He saw considerable force in the argument that a party who takes part in a criminal enterprise (for example, a bank robbery), with foresight that a deadly weapon may be used, should not escape liability for murder because he, unlike the principal party, is not suddenly confronted by the security officer so that he has to decide whether to use the gun or knife or have the enterprise thwarted and face arrest.

[56] ... Lord Steyn recognised ..., that foresight and intention are not synonymous, but he held that foresight is a 'necessary and sufficient' ground of the liability of accessories. He ... recognised that there was at first sight substance in the argument that it was anomalous that a lesser form of culpability was required in the case of a secondary party involved in a criminal enterprise, viz foresight of the possible commission of the greater offence, than in the case of the primary offender, who will be guilty of murder only if he intended to kill or cause really serious injury. But he held ..., that the answer to the supposed anomaly was to be found in practical and policy considerations:

'If the law required proof of the specific intention on the part of a secondary party, the utility of the accessory principle would be gravely undermined. It is just that a secondary party who foresees that the primary offender might kill with the intent sufficient for murder, and assists and encourages the primary offender in the criminal enterprise on this basis, should be guilty of murder ... The criminal justice system exists to control crime. A prime function of that system must be to deal justly but effectively with those who join with others in criminal enterprises. Experience has shown that joint criminal enterprises only too readily escalate into the commission of greater offences. In order to deal with this important social problem the accessory principle is needed and cannot be abolished or relaxed.'

[57] Lord Mustill agreed with the decision, but with evident unease. He said that throughout the modern history of the law on secondary liability, in the type of case under consideration, the responsibility of the secondary party, D2, had been founded on participation in a joint enterprise of which the commission of the crime by the principal offender, D1, formed a part. If D2 foresaw D1's act, this would always, as a matter of common sense, be relevant to the jury's decision on whether it formed part of a course of action to which D2 and D1 agreed, albeit often on the basis that the action would be taken if particular circumstances should arise. In cases where D2 could not rationally be treated as party to an express or tacit agreement to commit the greater offence, but continued to participate, he would have favoured some lesser form of culpability; but that could not be fitted in to the existing concept of a joint venture. For his part he would not have favoured the abandonment of a doctrine which had for years worked adequately in practice and its replacement by something which he conceived to be new. But since the other four members of the panel saw the matter differently, and for the sake of clarity in the law, he was willing to concur in their reasoning.

[58] English, who was aged 15, and another young man, W, took part in attacking a police sergeant with wooden posts. In the course of the attack W drew a knife and stabbed him to death. Both youths were convicted of murder. It was a reasonable possibility on the evidence that English did not know that W was carrying a knife. The judge directed the jury that English would nevertheless be guilty of murder if he foresaw a substantial risk that W might cause serious injury to the sergeant with a wooden post. It was submitted on behalf of English, and the House of Lords agreed, that ‘the use of a knife was fundamentally different to the use of a wooden post’. The summing-up was therefore defective and his conviction was quashed. Lord Hutton added at 30:

‘... if the weapon used by the primary party is different to, but as dangerous as, the weapon which the secondary party contemplated he might use, the secondary party should not escape liability for murder because of the difference in the weapon, for example, if he foresaw that the primary party might use a gun to kill and the latter used a knife to kill, or vice versa.’

[59] In later cases which proceeded on the assumption that the law was as stated in Chan Wing-Siu, courts have endeavoured to clarify the test of what is to be regarded as ‘fundamentally different’ for this purpose; such cases include R. v Rahman [2008] UKHL 45; [2009] 1 A.C. 129 and R. v Mendez [2011] Q.B. 876. The need to address a concept of ‘fundamental departure’ assumed great importance because guilt was based, under the Chan Wing-Siu and Powell and English rule, on foresight of what D1 might do.

...

[61] The court has had the benefit of a far deeper and more extensive review of the topic of so-called “joint enterprise” liability than on past occasions.

...

[65] The Privy Council judgment [in Chang Wing-Siu] ... elided foresight with authorisation, when it said that the principle ‘turns on contemplation or, putting the same idea in other words, authorisation, which may be express but is more usually implied’. But as Professor Smith observed, contemplation and authorisation are not the same at all.

[66] Nor can authorisation of crime B automatically be inferred from continued participation in crime A with foresight of crime B. As Lord Brown accurately pointed out in R. v Rahman ..., the rule in Chan Wing-Siu makes guilty those who foresee crime B but never intended it or wanted it to happen. There can be no doubt that if D2 continues to participate in crime A with foresight that D1 may commit crime B, that is evidence, and sometimes powerful evidence, of an intent to assist D1 in crime B. But it is evidence of such intent (or, if one likes, of ‘authorisation’), not conclusive of it ...

[68] In Powell and English Lord Hutton placed considerable reliance on Wesley Smith, which had been cited in Chan Wing-Siu but was not mentioned in the judgment. Lord Hutton said that he considered that in Wesley Smith ‘the Court of Appeal recognised that the secondary party will be guilty of unlawful killing committed by the primary party with a knife if he contemplates that the primary party may use such a weapon’ (19). But the unlawful killing to which the Court of Appeal was referring was manslaughter, not murder, and it is very important to understand its reasoning. The defendant in Wesley Smith was one of a group of four men who became involved in a row in a public house. He and one other went outside and threw bricks at the building. One of the two who remained inside stabbed the barman with a knife which Smith knew he carried. Smith was acquitted of murder but convicted of manslaughter.

[69] The question in Wesley Smith was whether his conviction for manslaughter was unsafe in the light of his acquittal of murder. The starting point was that anyone who takes part in an unlawful and violent attack on another person which results in death is guilty (at least) of manslaughter. There might conceivably have been an intervening act by another person of such a character as to break any connection between the defendant's conduct and the victim's death (as, for example, in Anderson and Morris); but the fact that it must have been within Smith's contemplation that the principal might act in the way that he did was fatal to the argument that he was not guilty even of manslaughter. (See [96] below).

[70] Although Lord Hutton quoted part of the judge's summing-up in Wesley Smith he ended his quotation with the first part of the passage set out ... above. ('Anybody who is party to an attack which results in an unlawful killing ... is a party to the killing'.) He did not go on to refer to the critical passage which followed, including the statement:

'Only he who intended that unlawful and grievous bodily harm should be done is guilty of murder. He who intended only that the victim should be unlawfully hit and hurt will be guilty of manslaughter if death results.'

[71] Moreover, as we have explained [above], the Court of Appeal had explicitly praised the summing-up as a correct statement of the law. Far from supporting the Chan Wing-Siu principle, Wesley Smith was an authority contrary to it ...

[74] It was, of course, within the jurisdiction of the courts in Chan Wing-Siu and Powell and English to change the common law in a way which made it more severe, but to alter general principles which have stood for a long time, especially in a way which has particular impact on a subject as difficult and serious as homicide, requires caution; and all the more so when the change involved widening the scope of secondary liability by the introduction of new doctrine (since termed parasitic accessory liability). In Chan Wing-Siu the Privy Council addressed the policy argument for the principle which it laid down in two sentences ... The statement ... 'Where a man lends himself to a criminal enterprise knowing that potentially murderous weapons are to be carried, and in the event they in fact are used by his partner with an intent sufficient for murder, he should not escape the consequences ...' may be thought to oversimplify the question of what is the enterprise to which he has intentionally lent himself, but it also implies that he would escape all criminal liability but for the Chan Wing-Siu principle. On the facts postulated, if the law remained as set out in Wesley Smith and Reid he would be guilty of homicide in the form of manslaughter, which carries a potential sentence of life imprisonment. The dangers of escalation of violence where people go out in possession of weapons to commit crime are indisputable, but they were specifically referred to by the court in Reid, when explaining why it was right that such conduct should result in conviction for manslaughter if death resulted, albeit that the initial intention may have been nothing more than causing fright. There was no consideration in Chan Wing-Siu, or in Powell and English, of the fundamental policy question whether and why it was necessary and appropriate to reclassify such conduct as murder rather than manslaughter. Such a discussion would have involved, among other things, questions about fair labelling and fair discrimination in sentencing.

6—032

[75] In Powell and English Lord Hutton referred to the need to give effective protection to the public against criminals operating in gangs..., but the same comments apply. There does not appear to have been any objective evidence that the law prior to Chan Wing-Siu failed to provide the public with adequate protection. A further policy reason suggested by Lord Hutton for setting a lower mens rea requirement for the secondary party than for the principal was that the secondary party has time to think before taking part in a criminal enterprise like a bank robbery, whereas the principal may have to decide on the spur of the moment whether to use his weapon. But the principal has had an earlier choice whether to go armed or not. As for the secondary party, he may have leisure to think before going out to rob a bank, but the same is not true in many other cases (for example, of young people who become suddenly embroiled in a fight in a bar and may make a quick decision whether or not to help their friends).

[76] We respectfully differ from the view of the Australian High Court, supported though it is by some distinguished academic opinion, that there is any occasion for a separate form of secondary liability such as was formulated in Chan Wing-Siu. As there formulated, and as argued by the Crown in these cases, the suggested foundation is the contribution made by D2 to crime B by continued participation in crime A with foresight of the possibility of crime B. We prefer the view expressed by the Court of Appeal in Mendez at [17], and by textbook writers including Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (2015), p.260 that there is no reason why ordinary principles of secondary liability should not be of general application.

[77] The rule in Chan Wing-Siu is often described as ‘joint enterprise liability’. However, the expression ‘joint enterprise’ is not a legal term of art. As the Court of Appeal observed in R. v A [2011] Q.B. 841 at [9], it is used in practice in a variety of situations to include both principals and accessories. As applied to the rule in Chan Wing-Siu, it unfortunately occasions some public misunderstanding. It is understood (erroneously) by some to be a form of guilt by association or of guilt by simple presence without more. It is important to emphasise that guilt of crime by mere association has no proper part in the common law.

[78] As we have explained, secondary liability does not require the existence of an agreement between D1 and D2. Where, however, it exists, such agreement is by its nature a form of encouragement and in most cases will also involve acts of assistance. The long established principle that where parties agree to carry out a criminal venture, each is liable for acts to which they have expressly or impliedly given their assent is an example of the intention to assist which is inherent in the making of the agreement. Similarly, where people come together without agreement, often spontaneously, to commit an offence together, the giving of intentional support by words or deeds, including by supportive presence, is sufficient to attract secondary liability on ordinary principles. We repeat that secondary liability includes cases of agreement between principal and secondary party, but it is not limited to them.

[79] It will be apparent from what we have said that we do not consider that the Chan Wing-Siu principle can be supported, except on the basis that it has been decided and followed at the highest level. In plain terms, our analysis leads us to the conclusion that the introduction of the principle was based on an incomplete, and in some respects erroneous, reading of the previous case law, coupled with generalised and questionable policy arguments. We recognise the significance of reversing a statement of principle which has been made and followed by the Privy Council and the House of Lords on a number of occasions. We consider that it is right to do so for several reasons.

[80] Firstly, we have had the benefit of a much fuller analysis than on previous occasions when the topic has been considered ...

[81] Secondly, it cannot be said that the law is now well established and working satisfactorily. It remains highly controversial and a continuing source of difficulty for trial judges. It has also led to large numbers of appeals.

[82] Thirdly, secondary liability is an important part of the common law, and if a wrong turn has been taken, it should be corrected.

[83] Fourthly, in the common law foresight of what might happen is ordinarily no more than evidence from which a jury can infer the presence of a requisite intention. It may be strong evidence, but its adoption as a test for the mental element for murder in the case of a secondary party is a serious and anomalous departure from the basic rule, which results in over-extension of the law of murder and reduction of the law of manslaughter. Murder already has a relatively low mens rea threshold, because it includes an intention to cause serious injury, without intent to kill or to cause risk to life. The Chan Wing-Siu principle extends liability for murder to a secondary party on the basis of a still lesser degree of culpability, namely foresight only of the possibility that the principal may commit murder but without there being any need for intention to assist him to do so. It savours, as Professor Smith suggested, of constructive crime.

[84] Fifthly, the rule brings the striking anomaly of requiring a lower mental threshold for guilt in the case of the accessory than in the case of the principal.

[85] As to the argument that even if the court is satisfied that the law took a wrong turn, any correction should now be left to Parliament, the doctrine of secondary liability is a common law doctrine (put into statutory form in section 8 of the 1861 Act) and, if it has been unduly widened by the courts, it is proper for the courts to correct the error ...

6—033

Restatement of the principles

... see extract above at [para.6-020 for the first issue]

[90] The second issue is likely to be whether the accessory intended to encourage or assist D1 to commit the crime, acting with whatever mental element the offence requires of D1 (as stated in [10] above). If the crime requires a particular intent, D2 must intend (it may be conditionally) to assist D1 to act with such intent. To take a homely example, if D2 encourages D1 to take another's bicycle without permission of the owner and return it after use, but D1 takes it and keeps it, D1 will be guilty of theft but D2 of the lesser offence of unauthorised taking, since he will not have encouraged D1 to act with intent permanently to deprive. In cases of concerted physical attack there may often be no practical distinction to draw between an intention by D2 to assist D1 to act with the intention of causing grievous bodily harm at least and D2 having the intention himself that such harm be caused. In such cases it may be simpler, and will generally be perfectly safe, to direct the jury (as suggested in Wesley Smith and Reid) that the Crown must prove that D2 intended that the victim should suffer grievous bodily harm at least. However, as a matter of law, it is enough that D2 intended to assist D1 to act with the requisite intent. That may well be the situation if the assistance or encouragement is rendered some time before the crime is committed and at a time when it is not clear what D1 may or may not decide to do. Another example might be where D2 supplies a weapon to D1, who has no lawful purpose in having it, intending to help D1 by giving him the means to commit a crime (or one of a range of crimes), but having no further interest in what he does, or indeed whether he uses it at all.

[91] It will therefore in some cases be important when directing juries to remind them of the difference between intention and desire.

[92] In cases of secondary liability arising out of a prior joint criminal venture, it will also often be necessary to draw the jury's attention to the fact that the intention to assist, and indeed the intention that the crime should be committed, may be conditional. The bank robbers who attack the bank when one or more of them is armed no doubt hope that it will not be necessary to use the guns, but it may be a perfectly proper inference that all were intending that if they met resistance the weapons should be used with the intent to do grievous bodily harm at least. The group of young men which faces down a rival group may hope that the rivals will slink quietly away, but it may well be a perfectly proper inference that all were intending that if resistance were to be met, grievous bodily harm at least should be done.

[93] Juries frequently have to decide questions of intent (including conditional intent) by a process of inference from the facts and circumstances proved. The same applies when the question is whether D2, who joined with others in a venture to commit crime A, shared a common purpose or common intent (the two are the same) which included, if things came to it, the commission of crime B, the offence or type of offence with which he is charged, and which was physically committed by D1. A time honoured way of inviting a jury to consider such a question is to ask the jury whether they are sure that D1's act was within the scope of the joint venture, that is, whether D2 expressly or tacitly agreed to a plan which included D1 going as far as he did, and committing crime B, if the occasion arose.

[94] If the jury is satisfied that there was an agreed common purpose to commit crime A, and if it is satisfied also that D2 must have foreseen that, in the course of committing crime A, D1 might well commit crime B, it may in appropriate cases be justified in drawing the conclusion that D2 had the necessary conditional intent that crime B should be committed, if the occasion arose; or in other words that it was within the scope of the plan to which D2 gave his assent and intentional support. But that will be a question of fact for the jury in all the circumstances.

[95] In cases where there is a more or less spontaneous outbreak of multi-handed violence, the evidence may be too nebulous for the jury to find that there was some form of agreement, express or tacit. But, as we have said, liability as an aider or abettor does not necessarily depend on there being some form of agreement between the defendants; it depends on proof of intentional assistance or encouragement, conditional or otherwise. If D2 joins with a group which he realises is out to cause serious injury, the jury may well infer that he intended to encourage or assist the deliberate infliction of serious bodily injury and/ or intended that that should happen if necessary. In that case, if D1 acts with intent to cause serious bodily injury and death results, D1 and D2 will each be guilty of murder.

6—034

[96] If a person is a party to a violent attack on another, without an intent to assist in the causing of death or really serious harm, but the violence escalates and results in death, he will be not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter. So also if he participates by encouragement or assistance in any other unlawful act which all sober and reasonable people would realise carried the risk of some harm (not necessarily serious) to another, and death in fact results: R. v Church [1965] 1 Q.B. 59, approved in Director of Public Prosecutions v Newbury [1977] A.C. 500 and very recently re-affirmed in R. v F (J) & E (N) [2015] EWCA Crim 351; [2015] 2 Cr. App. R. 5. The test is objective. As the Court of Appeal held in Reid, if a person goes out with armed companions to cause harm to another, any reasonable person would recognise that there is not only a risk of harm, but a risk of the violence escalating to the point at which serious harm or death may result. Cases in which D2 intends some harm falling short of grievous bodily harm are a fortiori, but manslaughter is not limited to these.

[97] The qualification to this (recognised in Wesley Smith, Anderson and Morris and Reid) is that it is possible for death to be caused by some overwhelming supervening act by the perpetrator which nobody in the defendant's shoes could have contemplated might happen and is of such a character as to relegate his acts to history; in that case the defendant will bear no criminal responsibility for the death.

[98] This type of case apart, there will normally be no occasion to consider the concept of 'fundamental departure' as derived from English. What matters is whether D2 encouraged or assisted the crime, whether it be murder or some other offence. He need not encourage or assist a particular way of committing it, although he may sometimes do so. In particular, his intention to assist in a crime of violence is not determined only by whether he knows what kind of weapon D1 has in his possession. The tendency which has developed in the application of the rule in Chan Wing-Siu to focus on what D2 knew of what weapon D1 was carrying can and should give way to an examination of whether D2 intended to assist in the crime charged. If that crime is murder, then the question is whether he intended to assist the intentional infliction of grievous bodily harm at least, which question will often, as set out above, be answered by asking simply whether he himself intended grievous bodily harm at least. Very often he may intend to assist in violence using whatever weapon may come to hand. In other cases he may think that D1 has an iron bar whereas he turns out to have a knife, but the difference may not at all affect his intention to assist, if necessary, in the causing of grievous bodily harm at least. Knowledge or ignorance that weapons generally, or a particular weapon, is carried by D1 will be evidence going to what the intention of D2 was, and may be irresistible evidence one way or the other, but it is evidence and no more.

[99] Where the offence charged does not require mens rea, the only mens rea required of the secondary party is that he intended to encourage or assist the perpetrator to do the prohibited act, with knowledge of any facts and circumstances necessary for it to be a prohibited act: National Coal Board v Gamble.

...

Jogee

...

[106] Ms Felicity Gerry QC submitted on behalf of the appellant that he could not properly have been convicted either of murder or of manslaughter.

[107] We regard that submission as hopeless. The jury's verdict means that it was sure, at the very least, that the appellant knew that Hirsi had the knife and appreciated that he might use it to cause really serious harm ... There was a case fit to go to the jury that [the appellant] had the mens rea for murder. At a minimum, he was party to a violent adventure carrying the plain objective risk of some harm to a person and which resulted in death; he was therefore guilty of manslaughter at least. The choice of disposal is whether to quash the appellant's conviction for murder and order a re-trial or whether to quash his conviction for murder and substitute a conviction for manslaughter. We invite the parties' written submissions on that question."

Appeal allowed

6—035

The outcome of the case was that the Supreme Court ordered that Jogee be retried on murder and manslaughter charges. He was acquitted of murder and convicted of manslaughter, being sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment.⁷⁶

Whether the Supreme Court achieved what it set out to achieve in Jogee is yet to be seen, and is hotly debated. The lengthy judgment is valuable in reviewing the existing case law, but there are those who take issue with some of the court's conclusions. The essence of the decision can be found in [90]–[96] in providing the mens rea requirement for a secondary party in a murder case, and clarifying that manslaughter is the appropriate offence where D has encouraged and assisted violence but does not have such mens rea.

One element of the decision which appears to have gone unnoticed that could be open to further question is that having established, generally, that a secondary party is liable if he intended the offence to be committed, that rule is applied to murder in a particular way. If the secondary party were really to intend murder, that would involve intending that the principal kill with intention to kill or cause serious injury. However, the secondary party need not intend that the principal kill; the secondary party needs to intend to encourage or assist the principal to act with the intention of causing grievous bodily harm at least.⁷⁷ There is never any suggestion that the mens rea of the secondary party should follow the contours of attempted murder, for example, and require that he intended that the principal kill.

Nevertheless, the mens rea requirement for accessories in murder cases has been tightened. A secondary party will not be liable if he only foresaw a risk that the principal might kill or cause GBH; he must intend to assist the principal to act with intent to kill or cause serious injury. However, the Supreme Court acknowledged that foresight of such a result would provide strong evidence of intent. Yet this stops short of requiring that the secondary party foresee the result as virtually certain, as required in relation to principal offenders according to Woollin. As noted by Ormerod and Laird:

”[c]rucially, ... there is no explicit statement as to what threshold of foresight the defendant must possess before the jury will be entitled to infer the requisite intent—will the defendant’s foresight of even the slightest possibility of the principal intentionally acting in the proscribed way be sufficient for a jury to be entitled to infer that he possessed the requisite intention?”⁷⁸

They warn that without speedy resolution by the Court of Appeal the debate on intention that ended with the House of Lords’ decision in Woollin could be reopened, throwing the law into a state of confusion.⁷⁹

6—036

At [92] of the judgment, the Supreme Court makes it clear that intention to assist or encourage the principal offender may be conditional. In Anwar,⁸⁰ the Court of Appeal considered the application of the concept of conditional intent in a case of attempted murder. As has been noted by commentators,⁸¹ Jogee was not the most suitable case for the Supreme Court to use as a case for re-examining the law of parasitic accessorial liability, in that it was not a case where the secondary party had encouraged one offence leading to an additional collateral offence being committed. It seems clear that Jogee and Hirsi were both in agreement that the victim should suffer some degree of injury, and that is what occurred, albeit that Hirsi's actions went beyond those intended by Jogee. Anwar, on the other hand, is a far better example of a classic case to illustrate the concept of parasitic accessorial liability resulting from a joint enterprise. All participants were involved in a conspiracy to rob the victim, and it was argued by the prosecution that it was common knowledge that one of the participants was in possession of a loaded gun which would be used to kill V if the need arose. In that case, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal by the Crown against the judge's decision that there was no case to answer on the charge of attempted murder, which had been made due to the difficulty in proving a number of issues, namely: which particular defendants were present in one of two vehicles at the scene; who was in possession of the gun and fired the shots; and who gave the instruction to shoot. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that an inference could be made that all the participants had the relevant intent due to the level of advanced planning evidenced. Sir Brian Leveson P was of the opinion that the evidential requirements justifying that there is a case to answer are likely to be the same now as before Jogee.⁸²

What does amount to a change to the law as previously set out in English is that there is no longer an "all or nothing" element to homicide liability in joint enterprise cases. It is not the case that accessories will necessarily escape all criminal liability for the death caused by the principal if the accessory does not meet the mens rea requirements to be liable for murder. Those who do not intend that the principal act with intent to kill or cause serious injury as part of the joint enterprise, but who do intend that some degree of injury be inflicted, will now be liable for manslaughter.⁸³ That was in fact Jogee's fate after retrial at the Crown Court in Nottingham. Although this result appears to be in accordance with the constructive nature of liability for manslaughter based on an unlawful and dangerous act, its correctness has not been beyond doubt. Baker argues that it is "conceptually impossible" for a secondary party to be liable for a different offence to the principal, since if the principal has not committed manslaughter it cannot be said that the secondary party has aided and abetted manslaughter.⁸⁴ This misunderstands the basis upon which liability is to be established in such a case, however. The better way to conceive of these cases is that the “accessory” is liable as a principal offender for manslaughter in that he has committed an unlawful and dangerous act (assisting or encouraging some act of assault or battery) which has caused death. It might be argued that the principal’s voluntary act of intentionally inflicting death or serious injury breaks the chain of causation between the accessory’s encouragement and the death, and this is recognised by the Supreme Court by qualifying its conclusion by stating that where the death is caused by “some overwhelming supervening act by the perpetrator which nobody in the defendant’s shoes could have contemplated might happen and is of such a character as to relegate his acts to history” then the accessory will escape liability for manslaughter. Given that, as seen above, the normal rules of causation do not apply to cases of accessorial liability this exception does, however, seem superfluous. Its role is to replace the previous “fundamentally different” rule applied in Powell; English, which had the result of exempting a secondary party of all liability, including liability for manslaughter, where the principal had acted in a way which was judged to be “fundamentally different” to the act foreseen by the secondary party. An example of this can be seen in English itself, where the principal’s use of a knife to wound and kill the victim was an act of a fundamentally different nature to the agreed enterprise of attacking the victim with wooden fence posts, leading to the secondary party’s conviction for murder being quashed. The “all or nothing” aspect of this rule has been removed by Jogee, meaning that the harshness of the law on constructive manslaughter now extends to incorporate accomplice liability.

6—037

Despite the honourable intentions of the Supreme Court, and the hopes raised for campaign groups such as JENGBA⁸⁵ that Jogee would prevent prosecutions based on “guilt by association”, Dyson argues that “in practice not a vast amount will change” and that:

”the majority of prosecutions ... will still be put before the courts on the basis that all the parties were ‘in it together’, an allegation which if proven, would show that every party intended each crime within the common purpose to take place.”⁸⁶

Only time will tell whether prosecutorial discretion will be applied differently following Jogee, and how juries will respond to the change in the way they are directed on the mens rea of secondary parties. Certainly the Court of Appeal has prevented the floodgates being opened with regards to appeals in cases decided pre-Jogee. The Supreme Court in Jogee was careful to articulate a test of “substantial injustice” for cases to be granted leave to appeal out of time against convictions pre-dating the changes to the law.⁸⁷ In Johnson,⁸⁸ the Court of Appeal has confirmed that this threshold is very high, meaning that exceptional leave to appeal will only be granted in the rarest of cases. As noted, by Laird:

”for the Supreme Court to state unequivocally that the approach taken in Chan Wing-Siu and Powell was a ‘wrong turn’ that it was imperative to correct, whilst at the same time stating that the error of law the court sought to correct may not have been important as a matter of practise, seems somewhat disingenuous.”⁸⁹

As well as Jogee being lamented by some as a failed opportunity to bring true clarity to the law on joint enterprise, it has also been criticised at a more fundamental level for misapplying pre-existing law. Simester is of the opinion that the court in Chan Wing-Siu did not make a “wrong turn”⁹⁰ and maintains the position he held prior to Jogee that joint criminal enterprises are a “distinct moral phenomenon”.⁹¹ Similarly, after conducting his own in-depth historical review of case law since the 16th century, Stark argues that Chan Wing-Siu was not an anomaly but simply confirmed that a “wider principle” of parasitic accessorial liability existed beyond standard aiding and abetting.⁹² Consequently, “Jogee was thus not mere common law housekeeping. It was substantive and significant law reform”.⁹³ Whether one agrees with Simester and Stark or not, all the signs are there that far from putting this controversial issue to bed, the Supreme Court has perpetuated confusion and complexity in this area of the law.

5. PROCURING

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S REFERENCE (NO.1 OF 1975) [1975] Q.B. 773 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

6—038

The defendant surreptitiously laced a friend's drinks with double measures of spirits when he knew his friend would be driving home. He was charged with aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring the offence of driving with an excess quantity of alcohol in the blood under the Road Traffic Act 1972 s.6(1). The reference concerned the question of whether there had to be a shared intention between the parties or encouragement of the offence.

LORD WIDGERY CJ:

“Of course it is the fact that in the great majority of instances where a secondary party is sought to be convicted of an offence there has been a contact between the principal offender and the secondary party. Aiding and abetting almost inevitably involves a situation in which the secondary party and the main offender are together at some stage discussing the plans which they may be making in respect of the alleged offence, and are in contact so that each knows what is passing through the mind of the other.

In the same way it seems to us that a person, who counsels the commission of a crime by another, almost inevitably comes to a moment when he is in contact with the other, when he is discussing the offence with that other and when, to use the words of the statute, he counsels the other to commit the offence.

The fact that so often the relationship between the secondary party and the principal will be such that there is a meeting of minds between them caused the trial judge in the case from which this reference is derived to think that this was really an essential feature of proving or establishing the guilt of the secondary party and, as we understand his judgment, he took the view that in the absence of some sort of meeting of minds, some sort of mental link between the secondary party and the principal, there could be no aiding, abetting or counselling of the offence within the meaning of the section.

So far as aiding, abetting and counselling is concerned we would go a long way with that conclusion. It may very well be, as I said a moment ago, difficult to think of a case of aiding, abetting or counselling when the parties have not met and have not discussed in some respects the terms of the offence which they have in mind. But we do not see why a similar principle should apply to procuring. We approach section 8 of the Act of 1861 on the basis that the words should be given their ordinary meaning, if possible. We approach the section on the basis also that if four words are employed here, 'aid, abet, counsel or procure', the probability is that there is a difference between each of those four words and the other three, because, if there were no such difference, then Parliament would be wasting time in using four words where two or three would do. Thus, in deciding whether that which is assumed to be done under our reference was a criminal offence we approach the section on the footing that each word must be given its ordinary meaning.

To procure means to produce by endeavour. You procure a thing by setting out to see that it happens and taking the appropriate steps to produce that happening. We think that there are plenty of instances in which a person may be said to procure the commission of a crime by another even though there is no sort of conspiracy between the two, even though there is no attempt at agreement or discussion as to the form which the offence should take. In our judgment the offence described in this reference is such a case.

6—039

If one looks back at the facts of the reference: the accused surreptitiously laced his friend's drink. This is an important element and, although we are not going to decide today anything other than the problem posed to us, it may well be that, in similar cases where the lacing of the drink or the introduction of the extra alcohol is known to the driver, quite different considerations may apply. We say that because, where the driver has no knowledge of what is happening, in most instances he would have no means of preventing the offence from being committed. If the driver is unaware of what has happened, he will not be taking precautions. He will get into his car seat, switch on the ignition and drive home and, consequently, the conception of another procuring the commission of the offence by the driver is very much stronger where the driver is innocent of all knowledge of what is happening, as in the present case where the lacing of the drink was surreptitious.

The second thing which is important in the facts set out in our reference is that, following and in consequence of the introduction of the extra alcohol, the friend drove with an excess quantity of alcohol in his blood. Causation here is important. You cannot procure an offence unless there is a causal link between what you do and the commission of the offence, and here we are told that in consequence of the addition of this alcohol the driver, when he drove home, drove with an excess quantity of alcohol in his body.

Giving the words their ordinary meaning in English, and asking oneself whether in those circumstances the offence has been procured, we are in no doubt that the answer is that it has. It has been procured because, unknown to the driver and without his collaboration, he has been put in a position in which in fact he has committed an offence which he never would have committed otherwise.”

Opinion accordingly

6—040

This case was followed a number of years later by another, more bizarre, case of lacing. In Blakely, Sutton,⁹⁴ the defendants laced the principal's tonic water with vodka. They intended to tell him before he left to drive home so that he would stay the night. In other words, they gave him the alcohol so that he would not drive. Unfortunately, the principal left before they could tell him and was subsequently found to be over the legal limit when breathalysed. The defendants' evidence ensured that the principal was given an absolute discharge to the charge of drink-driving but they were then charged with “aiding, abetting, counselling, procuring and commanding” that offence. In fact, as only procuring was alleged, the case proceeded on this footing. They appealed against their conviction, the question being whether procuring could be committed recklessly.

The Court of Appeal was somewhat tentative in its response, stating that it:

“must, at least, be shown that the accused contemplated that his act would or might bring about or assist the commission of the principal offence: he must have been prepared nevertheless to do his own act, and he must have done that act intentionally.”⁹⁵

But it was further stated that in relation to those “accused only of procuring and perhaps also those accused only of counselling and commanding, it might be that it was necessary to prove that the accused intended to bring about the principal offence”.⁹⁶ The appeal was allowed.

It is submitted that if one accepts that to procure is “to produce by endeavour” then it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that intention is required and that there is some merit in continuing to regard procuring in this way. If this is the case, there is also an argument that “procuring” an offence ought to be treated in law as a more serious form of participation than others such as counselling, which only require foresight of the offence. Take the example of the generous host who makes drink available for her guests but leaves them to decide whether they will drink, walk home or drive. If charged with procuring the principal’s offence of drunken driving, then, following Attorney-General’s Reference (No.1 of 1975), she should be acquitted. But, if the case is argued on the basis of counselling which can be satisfied by mere contemplation, then generous hosts (and publicans) would be convicted.⁹⁷ The offence for which they would be convicted is that of drunken driving, whether or not the case succeeds on the basis of procuring (requiring intention) or counselling (where foresight suffices). Does this satisfactorily identify those who are truly deserving of blame?

6. Reform proposals

6—041

The Law Commission in 1993 proposed a radical rethink of the law relating to complicity.⁹⁸ Under these proposals, the terms “aid, abet, counsel or procure” would be jettisoned as would the derivative principle of liability for the full offence. Instead, two new inchoate offences would be created: assisting crime and encouraging crime. Whilst the Law Commission's analysis of complicity as consisting of either encouraging or assisting was generally welcomed, there was much less support for the radical proposal to abandon derivative liability.⁹⁹

The Law Commission later abandoned the proposal to abolish secondary liability, although its proposals concerning inchoate liability were enacted, with some amendment, under the Serious Crime Act 2007 (see Ch.5). The most recent report on participation in crime recommends further offences of assisting or encouraging crime, which would follow the current law in enabling secondary parties to be convicted of the same offence as the principal offender. The Law Commission produced this report a year after the report on inchoate liability and clearly had in mind that the two reports should make a package of reform:

“Taken together, the recommendations contained in both reports would, if implemented, result in a scheme whereby inchoate and secondary liability will support and supplement each other in a way that is rational and fair.”¹⁰⁰

As the law currently stands, however, there is considerable overlap between the new inchoate offences of assisting or encouraging crime and secondary liability. Arguably, this overlap raises questions of fair labelling, given that where D has assisted in the commission of an offence which has actually been committed by P, there is nothing to stop the Crown charging one of the inchoate offences rather than trying to prove liability under the 1861 Act.

DAVID ORMEROD AND RUDI FORTSON, “SERIOUS CRIME ACT
2007: THE PART 2 OFFENCES” [2009]
CRIM. L.R. 389, 393:

“In principle, the Act might be criticised for creating a degree of incoherence, by overlaying such a scheme of broad inchoate liability (SCA 2007) on the existing common law regime of derivative liability (common law and Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 s.8). The two schemes now overlap much more than common law incitement. This results once again in broad discretion for the prosecutor. In many cases there will be an option of charging D with aiding and abetting a less serious offence, or assisting and encouraging a more serious one. For example, D will be liable under s.44 [SCA 2007] in relation to the criminal act that he intended (say murder) rather than as an accessory to the actual offence committed by P (perhaps only a firearms offence). Practitioners will need to give careful thought to the counts which should be left to the jury (and how the jury ought to be directed) where the facts disclose the commission of secondary liability for a substantive offence applying s.8 of the 1861 Act, and inchoate liability under Pt 2 of the SCA 2007.

This is not simply analogous to the numerous instances in which the prosecution have been provided with a choice between overlapping substantive offences (such as wounding or grievous bodily harm; blackmail or robbery). In this instance the prosecution are left with a choice between distinct schemes of criminal responsibility. Criminal liability imposed for secondary participation reflects a distinctive type of wrong from that of inchoate liability. The focus in an inquiry into secondary liability is on the harm caused by P and on D’s playing a culpable part in that harm by his acts of knowing assistance or encouragement. With inchoate liability, the focus is on the conduct of D and the prospect of harm—albeit remote—that his culpable behaviour might generate. There is a fundamental shift to looking at the harm threatened instead of the harm caused.”

6—043

Ormerod and Forston warn that:

“because of the breadth of inchoate offences ... it is questionable to what extent the inchoate scheme will completely supersede existing or proposed offences of secondary liability”.¹⁰¹

What are the proposed offences of secondary liability?

The Law Commission’s proposals are for two separate statutory provisions to replace the law of aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring. The first of these would create an offence of “intentional encouraging or assisting” crime, whilst the second provides a separate route to liability for participants of joint enterprises (or “joint criminal ventures”). As noted above, there is disagreement over whether the rules relating to joint enterprise liability form a separate doctrine of accessory liability. The Law Commission, in its consultation paper, took the same view as Simester and others that it is a separate doctrine.¹⁰² In the Report, however, the Commission is more hesitant and ambiguous, stating that the different approaches taken by commentators “do not produce sufficiently significant differences in practice for it to be important for us to choose between them”.¹⁰³ However, the Supreme Court in Jogee expressed the view that joint enterprise liability does not constitute a separate doctrine, and decided the case on that basis.¹⁰⁴

(i) Clause 1: assisting or encouraging an offence

LAW COMMISSION NO.305, PARTICIPATING IN CRIME (2007), APPENDIX A: DRAFT PARTICIPATING IN CRIME BILL:

6—044

“1 Assisting or encouraging an offence

- (1) Where a person (P) has committed an offence, another person (D) is also guilty of the offence if—
- (a) D did an act with the intention that one or more of a number of other acts would be done by another person,
 - (b) P’s criminal act was one of those acts,
 - (c) D’s behaviour assisted or encouraged P to do his criminal act, and

- (d) subsection (2) or (3) is satisfied.
- (2) This subsection is satisfied if D believed that a person doing the act would commit the offence.
- (3) This subsection is satisfied if D's state of mind was such that had he done the act he would have committed the offence."

6—045

In drafting this provision the Law Commission wished to preserve the forensic advantages of secondary liability, by which the prosecution is under no duty to prove which of a number of participants was the principal offender, and to reflect the derivative theory of secondary liability. However, in attempting to introduce “parity of culpability” it has sought to narrow the scope of liability for secondary parties. The means by which this is achieved, is the requirement that D intended that the offence charged be committed, either by P, or some other person. This departs from the current law (joint enterprise cases excluded) where mere foresight of the offence being committed suffices. It does not require that D and P are in agreement, however, and this is what distinguishes liability under cl.1 from liability from participating in a joint criminal venture under cl.2.¹⁰⁵

The result is that those who might be guilty of counselling an offence under current law because they provided the principal offender with the weapon ultimately used to commit the offence and foresaw the type of offence committed, would escape liability for the offence itself but would be liable for the inchoate offence of assisting or encouraging crime. The sales assistant who sells a baseball bat to a customer, overhearing that the customer is contemplating using the bat to commit assault, should not be liable for the assault eventually committed by the customer, since the sales assistant does not share parity of culpability with the customer and their culpability is clearly of a lesser degree. Unlike the customer, he did not intend that assault be committed.¹⁰⁶

There is no recommended definition of what amounts to “assisting or encouraging”, but cl.8 states that encouraging includes threatening or otherwise putting pressure on P to commit the offence. It also covers “taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought in respect of the act's being done" and "failing to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty". The latter would support the conviction of a disgruntled security guard who failed to turn on a burglar alarm in order to assist a burglar.¹⁰⁷

Before assessing the desirability of enacting the Law Commission's recommendation, the second offence must be considered.

(ii) Clause 2: participating in a joint criminal venture

LAW COMMISSION NO.305, PARTICIPATING IN CRIME (2007), APPENDIX A: DRAFT PARTICIPATING IN CRIME BILL:

6—046

"2 Participating in a joint criminal venture

- (1) This section applies where two or more persons participate in a joint criminal venture.
- (2) If one of them (P) commits an offence, another participant (D) is also guilty of the offence if P's criminal act falls within the scope of the venture.
- (3) The existence or scope of a joint criminal venture may be inferred from the conduct of the participants (whether or not there is an express agreement).
- (4) D does not escape liability under this section for an offence committed by P at a time when D is a participant in the venture merely because D is at that time—
 - (a) absent,
 - (b) against the venture's being carried out, or
 - (c) indifferent as to whether it is carried out."

This recommendation would provide liability both in cases of the “plain vanilla” variety of joint enterprises (where P commits the agreed offence) and the “tutti frutti” variety (where P commits a collateral offence). It was an attempt to codify the law applicable to joint enterprise liability at the time the proposals were made.¹⁰⁸ Given the changes made in Jogee it is not necessary to delve deeper into such codification here. It is worth noting, however, that cl.2 was received more negatively than cl.1, and it is unclear as to whether there was any need for a separate clause for joint enterprise, even before Jogee was decided. On the one hand a separate provision can be seen as desirable in order to retain the “forensic advantage” in cases of joint enterprise that the principal offender need not be identified. If it were impossible for the prosecution to prove which party committed the actus reus of an offence, the prosecution would find it difficult to prove the liability of each party under cl.1. On the other hand, that problem could, however, be rectified by drafting an appropriate clause to prevent each participant being able to deny being the principal offender and thus avoiding liability.

(iii) Clause 5: causing a no-fault offence

LAW COMMISSION NO.305,
PARTICIPATING IN CRIME (2007),
APPENDIX A: DRAFT PARTICIPATING
IN CRIME BILL:

“5 Offence of causing a no-fault offence

- (1) A person commits an offence if he causes another person to commit a no-fault offence, and
- (a) it is his intention that a person should commit the offence, or
 - (b) he knows or believes that his behaviour will cause a person to commit it.

(2) ‘No-fault offence’ means an offence that does not require proof of fault.”

6—049

As noted above, whilst “aiding”, “abetting” and “counselling” can all be synonyms for “helping”, “procuring” has been interpreted to mean something very specific: to “produce by endeavour”. The Law Commission decided against an additional offence of “procurement”, and thought that most cases of procuring would be covered by “assisting or encouraging”, but thought that a separate offence of some kind was needed, given that it is inappropriate to describe D’s conduct in causing P to commit a no-fault offence as assisting or encouraging P to commit that offence.¹⁰⁹ This offence would cover the kind of situation which arose in Attorney-General’s Reference (No.1 of 1975), and it is arguably a valuable addition to the Law Commission’s recommendations.¹¹⁰

The House of Commons Justice Committee recommended that the Government should consult on moving forward with these recommendations.¹¹¹ That did not happen, arguably contributing to the Supreme Court’s unusual move to attempt in Jogee to rectify some of the problems relating to the existing law.

III. The Limits of Accessorial Liability

A. NO PRINCIPAL OFFENDER

6—050

As we have seen, complicity is a form of derivative liability. It presupposes the existence of a crime. “There is one crime and that it has been committed must be established before there can be any question of criminal guilt or participation in it”.¹¹² This simple proposition requires qualification:

- (a) The principal may be acquitted through lack of evidence or because of some procedural defect that applies to them. Secondary parties may nevertheless be convicted if the evidence shows clearly that there was a crime.

- (b) The principal may be acquitted and the court can apply the doctrine of innocent agency to justify the conviction of the secondary party. In such a case the secondary party is in fact deemed to be the principal offender.
- (c) In situations where the doctrine of innocent agency is inapplicable but where the actus reus has been committed, the accessory may be convicted even though the principal offender is acquitted because of lack of mens rea or the existence of a defence.

The relationship between the last two propositions needs to be examined.

R. V BOURNE (1952) 36 CR. APP. R.
125 (COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL):

6—051

The defendant terrorised his wife into committing buggery with a dog. He was convicted of aiding and abetting his wife to commit buggery with a dog. He appealed.

LORD GODDARD CJ:

“I am willing to assume for the purpose of this case ... that if this woman had been charged herself with committing the offence, she could have set up the plea of duress, not as showing that no offence had been committed, but as showing that she had no mens rea because her will was overborne by threats of imprisonment or violence so that she would be excused from punishment ... [T]he offence of buggery ... depends on the act, and if an act of buggery is committed, the felony is committed ...

The evidence was ... that he caused his wife to have connection with a dog, and ... he is guilty, whether you call him an aider and abettor or an accessory, as a principal in the second degree.”

Appeal dismissed

R. V COGAN AND LEAK [1976] Q.B.
217 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION):

Leak compelled his wife to have sexual intercourse with Cogan, who believed that she consented. As Cogan's conviction was quashed on the strength of his belief, it became necessary to decide whether Leak's conviction as aider and abettor could stand.

LAWTON LJ:

“Leak's appeal against conviction was based on the proposition that he could not be found guilty of aiding and abetting Cogan to rape his wife if Cogan was acquitted of that offence as he was deemed in law to have been when his conviction was quashed ...

[A]s was said by this court in R. v Quick [1973] Q.B. 910 at 923, when considering this kind of problem:

‘The facts of each case ... have to be considered and in particular what is alleged to have been done by way of aiding and abetting.’

The only case which counsel for Leak submitted had a direct bearing on the problem of Leak's guilt was Walters v Lunt [1951] 2 All E.R. 645. In that case the respondents had been charged under the Larceny Act 1916 s.33(1), with receiving from a child aged seven years, certain articles knowing them to have been stolen. In 1951 a child under eight years was deemed in law to be incapable of committing a crime: it followed that at the time of receipt by the respondents the articles had not been stolen and that the charges had not been proved. That case is very different from this because here one fact is clear—the wife had been raped.

Cogan had had sexual intercourse with her without her consent. The fact that Cogan was innocent of rape because he believed that she was consenting does not affect the position that she was raped.

Her ravishment had come about because Leak had wanted it to happen and had taken action to see that it did by persuading Cogan to use his body as the instrument for the necessary physical act. In the language of the law the act of sexual intercourse without the wife's consent was the actus reus; it had been procured by Leak who had the appropriate mens rea, namely his intention that Cogan should have sexual intercourse with her without her consent. In our judgment it is irrelevant that the man whom Leak had procured to do the physical act himself did not intend to have sexual intercourse with the wife without her consent. Leak was using him as a means to procure a criminal purpose ...

Had Leak been indicted as a principal offender, the case against him would have been clear beyond argument. Should he be allowed to go free because he was charged with 'being aider and abettor to the same offence'? If we are right in our opinion that the wife had been raped (and no one outside a court of law would say that she had not been), then the particulars of offence accurately stated what Leak had done, namely he had procured Cogan to commit the offence. This would suffice to uphold the conviction. We would prefer, however, to uphold it on a wider basis. In our judgment convictions should not be upset because of mere technicalities of pleading in an indictment. Leak knew what the case against him was and the facts in support of that case were proved. But for the fact that the jury thought that Cogan in his intoxicated condition might have mistaken the wife's sobs and distress for expressions of her consent, no question of any kind would have arisen about the form of pleading. By his written statement Leak virtually admitted what he had done. As Judge Chapman said in R. v Humphreys [1965] 3 All E.R. 689 at 692:

'It would be anomalous if a person who admitted to a substantial part in the perpetration of a misdemeanour as aider and abettor could not be convicted on his own admission merely because the person alleged to have been aided and abetted was not or could not be convicted.'

In the circumstances of this case it would be more than anomalous: it would be an affront to justice and to the common sense of ordinary folk. It was for these reasons that we dismissed the appeal against conviction."

Appeal dismissed

6—053

Two main arguments were advanced in Cogan and Leak. The first concerned the doctrine of innocent agency. It is quite clear that crimes may be committed through an innocent agent but to employ it in Cogan and Leak would be to stretch the doctrine to implausible lengths. Even if one accepts the abuse of language involved in saying that Leak raped his wife when he committed no such act against her, Williams has demonstrated the fundamental flaw with its use in this context:

“The decision was rendered possible by the fact that the defendant happened to be a man. Rape can only be perpetrated by a man; the statute says so ... if the duress is applied by a woman it would need an even greater degree of hawkishness than that displayed by the court in Cogan to call her a constructive man. Yet it is highly illogical that a man can commit rape through an innocent agent when a woman cannot.”¹¹³

Fletcher adds that cases of innocent agency or “perpetrator-by-means” ought to be restricted to situations where “the party behind the scenes in fact dominates and controls his agent”.¹¹⁴ Finally, if the doctrine was thought to be applicable in Cogan and Leak it is difficult to see why it was not invoked in Bourne.

If the doctrine of innocent agency is, therefore, inappropriate in some circumstances, an alternative basis for liability has to be found. This can be derived from the assertion by Lawton LJ that it was clear that “the wife had been raped” and that Leak had procured the rape (a similar view is implicit in Bourne). However, a finding of rape could only follow if both actus reus and mens rea were established and the argument is, thus, of doubtful validity. However, it has been refined and developed in subsequent cases. In Millward,¹¹⁵ it was held that the defendant could be liable for procuring a driving offence provided there is an actus reus even though the principal offender is acquitted.¹¹⁶ There are doubts about whether there was an actus reus on the facts of *Millward*¹¹⁷ but the principle itself appears to have gained momentum.

DPP V K AND B [1997] 1 CR. APP. R.
36 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

6—054

Two girls, aged 14 and 11, were alleged to have procured the rape of another girl by the principal offender, a boy (never traced) aged between ten and 14. The magistrates acquitted the girls on the basis (inter alia) that the prosecution had failed to rebut the presumption of doli incapax in relation to the boy. The prosecution appealed by way of case stated.

RUSSELL LJ:

“In my judgment, the decision of the magistrate in this appeal cannot be supported. There is no doubt whatever that ‘W’ was the victim of unlawful sexual intercourse without her consent; such was not disputed. The actus reus was proved. The respondents procured the situation which included the sexual intercourse. It would, in my view, be singularly unattractive to find that because of the absence of a mental element on the part of the principal, the procurers could thereby escape conviction when, as the magistrate found, K and B had the requisite mens rea namely, the desire that rape should take place and the procuring of it.

In my judgment, neither authority nor common sense nor justice compels this Court to support the finding of the magistrates.”

Appeal allowed

6—055

Two points must be stressed. First, there must be an actus reus. If there is no actus reus, the secondary party cannot be found liable. So, for example, in Loukes,¹¹⁸ a case involving causing death by dangerous driving,¹¹⁹ the principal was acquitted because there was insufficient evidence that he knew of the dangerous condition of the vehicle or that it was so obvious that he ought to have known (an objective standard of driving). There was, therefore, no evidence of dangerous driving on his part, and thus no actus reus. In such circumstances the defendant, whose business it was to oversee the condition of the vehicles, could not be convicted of procuring the offence.

The underlying rationale of these developments can be accepted in relation to the procuring of offences where, as we have seen, it is causation and not consensus that is material and the principal need not even be aware that a crime is being committed. However, the application of the principle in cases such as Loukes is more questionable. In this case, and in Roberts and George,¹²⁰ the offence of causing death by dangerous driving was described as being a strict liability offence. As there was insufficient evidence of dangerous driving by the principal offender, there was no actus reus. However, this offence could be regarded as one of negligence. Culpability is required in that the driving must be dangerous.¹²¹ Taylor notes that dangerous driving can be interpreted as having two alternative modes of commission, one requiring attitudinally defined conduct and the other requiring factually defined conduct.¹²² By this he means that dangerous driving is committed either due to the manner in which the vehicle was driven by the driver, or alternatively where the driving is dangerous because the condition of the vehicle is dangerous. It is the latter mode which was in issue in cases such as Loukes, where objective mens rea must be established (the defendant either knew that the condition of the vehicle was dangerous, or ought to have known because it would have been obvious to a competent and careful driver). In these cases, the principle derived from Cogan and Leak can be applied. According to this latter analysis, there was an actus reus in these cases and the procurer, assuming his mens rea was established, should have been liable.

The second point to stress is that the principle that the accessory can be liable if there is an actus reus has only been applied in cases of procuring. This does, at first sight, seem anomalous. There appears to be one rule for procuring and another for other forms of complicity. This is compounded when one considers that the prosecution does not even have to specify the form of complicity in the charge. However, the problem may not, in fact, be as significant as it seems. If the accessory does have the appropriate mens rea and the crime is committed by a principal offender who lacks mens rea or who has a defence such as duress, the situation would almost certainly be regarded as one of procuring or innocent agency. Liability could then be imposed under the above principles.

In its Report on Participating in Crime, the Law Commission recommended creating a statutory offence of using an innocent agent:

LAW COMMISSION NO.305,
PARTICIPATING IN CRIME (2007),

APPENDIX A: DRAFT PARTICIPATING IN CRIME BILL:

6—056

“4 Using an innocent agent

- (1) If a person (D) uses an innocent agent (P) to commit an offence, D is guilty of that offence.
- (2) P is an innocent agent in relation to an offence if
 - (a) he does a criminal act, and
 - (b) he does not commit the offence itself for one of the following reasons.
 - (i) he is under the age of 10,
 - (ii) he has a defence of insanity, or
 - (iii) he acts without the fault required for conviction, and there is no other reason why he does not commit it.
- (3) D uses P to commit an offence if—
 - (a) D intends to cause a person (whether or not P) to do a criminal act in relation to the offence,
 - (b) D causes P to do the criminal act, and
 - (c) subsection (4) or (5) is satisfied.
- (4) If a particular state of mind requires to be proved for conviction of the offence that D uses P to commit, D’s state of mind must be such that, were he to do the act that he intends to cause to be done, he would do it with the state of mind required for conviction of the offence.
- (5) If the offence which D uses P to commit is a no-fault offence, D must know or believe that, were a person to do the act that D intends to cause to be done, that person would do it—
 - (a) in the circumstances (if any), and
 - (b) with the consequences (if any), proof of which is required for conviction of the offence.”

Taylor has described the Law Commission’s proposals as taking a “twin-track” approach.¹²³ In cases where P is incapable (due to a defence of infancy or insanity) or non-culpable (where P does not have mens rea, as in Cogan), D is liable due to innocent agency, and D is treated as the principal offender. But where P is not liable due to being excused (due to a defence such as duress or, in murder cases, loss of control) D remains the secondary party rather than acting as a P through an innocent agent, because P is not a truly “innocent” agent in such cases. Taylor questions whether there is any reason for taking this “twin-track” approach, and points out that it could lead to difficult cases where P is both incapable and has an excusatory defence, in which case P would escape liability on both tracks.¹²⁴ Taylor concludes that there was no need to propose this additional offence and that with a little amendment to cl.1, cases falling within the doctrine of innocent agency could have been dealt with more appropriately through derivative liability.¹²⁵

B. ACCESSORY CAN BE GUILTY OF GRAVER OFFENCE THAN THE ONE COMMITTED

Until the following decision in Howe, the law was that if the principal had the mens rea of one offence, such as manslaughter, it was not possible for an accessory not present at the scene of the crime to be guilty of the graver offence of murder.¹²⁶ The reason for this rule was “that one could [not] say that that which was done can be said to be done with the intention of the defendant who was not present at the time”. Without, it must be said, much discussion of the merits or demerits of this approach, the law changed.

R. v HOWE [1987] 1 A.C. 417 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

(The facts and a fuller extract appear, above, para.4-194.)

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN:

“I turn now to the second certified question [whether a secondary party can be convicted of murder despite the conviction of the principal for manslaughter] ... I am of the opinion that the Court of Appeal reached the correct conclusion upon it as a matter of principle.

Giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal Lord Lane CJ said [1986] Q.B. 626 at 641–642:

‘The judge based himself on a decision of this court in R. v Richards. The facts in that case were that Mrs Richards paid two men to inflict injuries on her husband which she intended should “put him in hospital for a month”. The two men wounded the husband but not seriously. They were acquitted of wounding with intent but convicted of unlawful wounding. Mrs Richards herself was convicted of wounding with intent, the jury plainly, and not surprisingly, believing that she had the necessary intent, though the two men had not. She appealed against her conviction on the ground that she could not properly be convicted as accessory before the fact to a crime more serious than that committed by the principals in the first degree. The appeal was allowed and the conviction for unlawful wounding was substituted. The court followed a passage from Hawkins’ Pleas of the Crown, vol.2. c.29 para.15: “I take it to be an uncontroverted rule that [the offence of the accessory can never rise higher than that of the principal]; it seeming incongruous and absurd that he who is punished only as a partaker of the guilt of another, should be adjudged guilty of a higher crime than the other.”’

James LJ delivering the judgment in R. v Richards said:

‘If there is only one offence committed, and that is the offence of unlawful wounding, then the person who has requested that offence to be committed, or advised that that offence be committed, cannot be guilty of a graver offence than that in fact which was committed.’

The decision in R. v Richards has been the subject of some criticism ... Counsel before us posed the situation where A hands a gun to D informing him that it is loaded with blank ammunition only and telling him to go and scare X by discharging it. The ammunition is in fact live, as A knows, and X is killed. D is convicted only of manslaughter, as he might be on those facts. It would seem absurd that A should thereby escape conviction for murder. We take the view that R. v Richards was incorrectly decided, but it seems to us that it cannot properly be distinguished from the instant case.

I consider that the reasoning of Lord Lane C.J. is entirely correct and I would affirm his view that where a person has been killed and that result is the result intended by another participant, the mere fact that the actual killer may be convicted only of the reduced charge of manslaughter for some reason special to himself does not, in my opinion in any way, result in a compulsory reduction for the other participant.”

Appeal dismissed

6—060

It has been pointed out that in neither Howe nor Richards was any real attempt made to understand the theoretical underpinnings of the two positions.¹²⁷ Since it has long been possible to convict those present at the scene of the crime of a more serious offence than the principal, at one level, Howe merely reflects the increasing trend of regarding presence as not determinative of anything. However, it is a departure “from orthodox complicity theory that insists on the parties’ sharing in liability for one offence”.¹²⁸ In other words, this may be a departure from derivative liability similar to that in cases such as Cogan. Further, despite all the criticism of Richards there may have been a sound principle underlying it: that of control. Mrs Richards lacked control over the principal offender and should not have been guilty of a more serious offence despite her greater mens rea. We will return to this issue in the final section of this chapter.

C. WITHDRAWAL OF ACCESSORIES

6—061

A withdrawal from a criminal enterprise may amount to a claim that there is no actus reus or mens rea of complicity. For example, a person may lend a gun to the principal offender to commit murder, but later take the gun back. If the principal offender shoots the victim with a different gun, the original provider of the gun will not be liable as there will be no actus reus of complicity.¹²⁹ However, in other cases the accessory's involvement might clearly satisfy the actus reus and mens rea requirements of complicity but there might be a "withdrawal" before the commission of the offence.¹³⁰ This latter scenario is exemplified by the following leading case.

R. V BECERRA AND COOPER (1975) 62
CR. APP. R. 212 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

6—062

Becerra broke into a house with Cooper and another. They intended to steal but Becerra gave a knife to Cooper which he was to use if anyone interrupted them. Lewis, an upstairs tenant, came to investigate the noise, at which Becerra said, "There's a bloke coming. Let's go," and jumped out of a window. As he ran away Cooper stabbed and killed Lewis with the knife. Becerra was convicted with Cooper of murder, and appealed.

ROSKILL LJ:

"It was argued in the alternative on behalf of Becerra, that even if there were this common design, nonetheless Becerra had open to him a second line of defence, namely that ... —whatever Cooper did immediately before and at the time of the killing of Lewis, Becerra had by then withdrawn from that common design and so should not be convicted of the murder of Lewis, even though the common design had previously been that which I have stated ...

It is necessary, before dealing with that argument in more detail, to say a word or two about the relevant law. [Roskill L.J. then cited a decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia in Whitehouse (alias Savage) (1941) 1 W.W.R. 112 at 115 and 116.]

'Can it be said on the facts of this case that a mere change of mental intention and a quitting of the scene of the crime just immediately prior to the striking of the fatal blow will absolve those who participate in the commission of the crime by overt acts up to that moment from all the consequences of its accomplishment by the one who strikes in ignorance of his companion's change of heart? I think not. After a crime has been committed and before a prior abandonment of the common enterprise may be found by a jury there must be, in my view, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, something more than a mere mental change of intention and physical change of place by those associates who wish to dissociate themselves from the consequences attendant upon their willing assistance up to the moment of the actual commission of that crime. I would not attempt to define too closely what must be done in criminal matters involving participation in a common unlawful purpose to break the chain of causation and responsibility. That must depend upon the circumstances of each case but it seems to me that one essential element ought to be established in a case of this kind. Where practicable and reasonable there must be timely communication of the intention to abandon the common purpose from those who wish to dissociate themselves from the contemplated crime to those who desire to continue in it. What is "timely communication" must be determined by the facts of each case but where practicable and reasonable it ought to be such communication, verbal or otherwise, that will serve unequivocal notice upon the other party to the common unlawful cause that if he proceeds upon it he does so without the further aid and assistance of those who withdraw. The unlawful purpose of him who continues alone is then his own and not one in common with those who are no longer parties to it nor liable to its full and final consequences.' ...

6—063

In the view of each member of this Court, that passage, if we may respectfully say so, could not be improved upon and we venture to adopt it in its entirety as a correct statement of the law which is to be applied in this case ...

We therefore turn back to consider the direction which the learned judge gave in the present case to the jury and what was the suggested evidence that Becerra had withdrawn from the common agreement.

The suggested evidence is the use by Becerra of the words ‘Come on let’s go’, coupled with his act in going out through the window. The evidence, as the judge pointed out, was that Cooper never heard that nor did the third man. But let it be supposed that that was said and the jury took the view that it was said.

On the facts of this case, in the circumstances then prevailing, the knife having already been used and being contemplated for further use when it was handed over by Becerra to Cooper for the purpose of avoiding (if necessary) by violent means the hazards of identification, if Becerra wanted to withdraw at that stage, he would have to ‘countermand,’ to use the word that is used in some of the cases or ‘repent’ to use another word so used, in some manner vastly different and vastly more effective than merely to say ‘Come on, let’s go’ and go out through the window.

It is not necessary, on this application, to decide whether the point of time had arrived at which the only way in which he could effectively withdraw, so as to free himself from joint responsibility for any act Cooper thereafter did in furtherance of the common design, would be physically to intervene so as to stop Cooper attacking Lewis, as the judge suggested, by interposing his own body between them or somehow getting in between them or whether some other action might suffice. That does not arise for decision here. Nor is it necessary to decide whether or not the learned judge was right or wrong, on the facts of this case, ... [to say] ‘and at least take all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the crime which he had agreed the others should commit’. It is enough for the purposes of deciding this application to say that under the law of this country as it stands, and on the facts (taking them at their highest in favour of Becerra), that which was urged as amounting to withdrawal from the common design was not capable of amounting to such withdrawal. Accordingly Becerra remains responsible, in the eyes of the law, for everything that Cooper did and continued to do after Becerra’s disappearance through the window as much as if he had done them himself.”

Appeal dismissed

Accordingly, there must be, at least, a “timely communication” of the decision to withdraw. This was confirmed in *Rook*¹³¹ where the appellant tried to disassociate himself from the planned murder by simply not being around when the others came to collect him on the way to the crime:

“[T]he appellant never told the others that he was not going ahead with the crime. His absence on the day could not possibly amount to ‘unequivocal communication’ of his withdrawal ... he had made it quite clear to himself that he did not want to be there on the day. But he did not make it clear to the others.”

However, in Mitchell,¹³² it was held that the requirement of communication of withdrawal only applies in cases of pre-planned violence and not to cases of spontaneous violence, although in these latter cases it would be more difficult evidentially to establish withdrawal if there had been no communication. This was followed in O’Flaherty,¹³³ where it was held that the question of whether or not the defendant had withdrawn is no more than a consideration of whether the principal had departed from the joint enterprise.¹³⁴ This was another case of spontaneous violence in which, as pointed out by Ashworth,¹³⁵ the principals may have been as unaware of the defendants’ participation in the joint enterprise as they were of their withdrawal. Three appellants, O’F, R and T, joined in an attack on the victim with various weapons. Subsequently, the victim was chased by a group of individuals, including O’F, but R and T did not join the group and instead chose to leave. The victim sustained fatal injuries during a second attack. O’F did not take part in the second attack but was present at the scene, and looked on whilst holding a cricket bat. R and T had not communicated their withdrawal from the attack but it was held that they did not need to do so as the second attack could not be said to be part of the joint enterprise to which they were party, and their appeal against conviction for murder was allowed. O’F’s presence at the scene of the second attack was, however, enough to show that he had aided and abetted the crime of murder. O’Flaherty has been followed in another case of Mitchell,¹³⁶ where D’s argument that there were two distinct joint enterprises and that her presence at the second was only to look for her shoes and not to encourage further violence was rejected by the Court of Appeal. In its judgment (pre-Jogee) the court stated that there was ample evidence that D had not withdrawn from the joint enterprise and that the jury was entitled to conclude that she had become party to an enterprise in which she had foreseen or contemplated that one of the other parties might kill with the intention of inflicting really serious bodily injury.

6—065

In some cases, depending on the circumstances,¹³⁷ it may be that timely communication alone is not enough and that some further action is required. In Rook, for example, the Court of Appeal stated that a suggestion that “a declared intent to withdraw from a conspiracy to dynamite a building is not enough, if the fuse has been set; he must step on the fuse” went too far. “It may be enough that he should have done his best to step on the fuse”. Presumably in such cases:

“some form of correlation [should] exist between the nature or form of the defendant’s—complicitous behaviour and the nature or form of his required exculpatory action. In crude terms: the greater the extent of inculpatory behaviour the more demanding will be the price of exculpation.”¹³⁸

The Law Commission has recommended that in certain circumstances a secondary party ought to have a specific defence where he made efforts to undo some of the work of the principal offender:

LAW COMMISSION NO.305,
PARTICIPATING IN CRIME (2007),
APPENDIX A: DRAFT PARTICIPATING IN CRIME BILL:

6—066

“7 Defence of acting to prevent commission of offence etc.

(1) In proceedings for an offence to which this section applies, a person is not guilty of the offence if he proves on the balance of probabilities that—

- (a) he acted for the purpose of—
 - (i) preventing the commission of that offence or another offence, or
 - (ii) preventing, or limiting, the occurrence of harm, and
- (b) it was reasonable for him to act as he did.”

D. VICTIMS CANNOT BE ACCESSORIES

6—067

The case of *Tyrell*¹³⁹ established a general principle that where a statutory offence exists in order to protect a particular class of victim, such a victim cannot be held liable for participating in the offence as an accessory. This, and subsequent cases,¹⁴⁰ concerned sexual offences such as incest and underage sexual intercourse. If a principal offender has sexual intercourse in a situation where to do so is an offence by virtue of the identity of the other party (because of her age or relationship with the principal), that victim cannot be said to have aided, abetted, counselled or procured the offence.¹⁴¹

While the Tyrell principle has, to date, only been applied to sexual offences, there is no reason why it should not be applied to other offences.¹⁴² However, the principle is uncertain and interpretative difficulty surrounds the notion of “victim”. For example, the notion of “victim” appeared to take on different meanings in Brown.¹⁴³ Prior to the prosecution 26 people were cautioned for aiding and abetting offences against themselves.¹⁴⁴ It thus seems that the passive participants in the sado-masochistic activities in Brown were not “victims” for the purpose of the protection afforded by the rules on accessory liability but, of course, were regarded as “victims” for the purpose of assessing the criminal liability of the principal offender.¹⁴⁵ The following decision drew upon Brown (even though, as Herring points out, the “victims” were not actually prosecuted but only those who inflicted harm¹⁴⁶) in reaching its conclusion that a narrow interpretation should be given to the victim rule.

R. V GNANGO [2011] UKSC 59 (SUPREME COURT):

6—068

The defendant voluntarily exchanged gunfire with an opponent, B, referred to as “Bandana Man”, in a public car park. A shot by B killed an innocent passer-by. A man thought to be B was arrested but there was insufficient evidence to charge him. The defendant was charged with the victim’s murder. At trial, the judge held that it was not relevant that the defendant and B had reciprocally opposing intentions to shoot each other. He rejected the Crown’s argument that the defendant could be liable for aiding and abetting the killing, directing the jury that the defendant would be guilty of murder if they were sure that he and B had been in a joint enterprise (whether planned or spontaneous) to use unlawful violence against each other, and that in the course of that joint enterprise fight, the victim had been murdered by B on the basis of transferred malice. The defendant was convicted and appealed. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, holding that there was no evidence of a shared common purpose. The Crown appealed to the Supreme Court, contending, inter alia, that the defendant’s conviction could be justified on the basis that the defendant had aided and abetted the commission of the murder by actively encouraging B to shoot at him.

LORD PHILLIPS P and LORD JUDGE CJ:

“[1] Permission to appeal was granted in this case in order to enable this court to consider the following point of law, certified by the Court of Appeal as being of general public importance:

’If (1) D1 and D2 voluntarily engage in fighting each other, each intending to kill or cause grievous bodily harm to the other and each foreseeing that the other has the reciprocal intention, and if (2) D1 mistakenly kills V in the course of the fight, in what circumstances, if any, is D2 guilty of the offence of murdering V?’

The facts of this case are unusual, but the importance of the point of law lies in the implications that it may have in respect of the scope of potential liability of those who permit themselves to become involved in public order offences.

[2] No previous decision in this jurisdiction provides a clear indication of how the point of law should be resolved ... In resolving the point of law it will be appropriate to have regard to policy ...

[29] Before this court ... the Crown has sought to revive the case ... that the respondent had been an accessory to Bandana Man's attempt to kill him and thus shared Bandana Man's liability, as a result of the doctrine of transferred malice, for the murder... [relying upon parasitic accessory liability in the alternative].

[44] Why was the Crown so keen to establish liability under the doctrine of parasitic accessory liability? The answer is, we believe, that the Crown believed that this route would enable it to by-pass what was perceived to be a barrier to the direct route to the respondent's liability for murder. The direct route was as follows: (i) Bandana Man attempted to kill the respondent; (ii) by agreeing to the shoot-out, the respondent aided and abetted Bandana Man in this attempted murder; (iii) Bandana Man accidentally killed Ms Pniewska instead of the respondent. Under the doctrine of transferred malice he was guilty of her murder; (iv) the doctrine of transferred malice applied equally to the respondent as aider and abetter of Bandana Man's attempted murder. He also was guilty of Ms Pniewska's murder.

6—069

[45] The Crown believed that there was a barrier to this direct route to the respondent's liability for murder. This was the application of the victim rule ... the respondent could not aid and abet his own attempted murder. If this proposition correctly represents the law, we do not see how the Crown can avoid its effect by invoking the doctrine of parasitic accessory liability. Parasitic accessory liability does not differ in principle from the more common basis for finding someone guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of a crime. In so far as the law precludes conviction for aiding and abetting a crime in respect of which the defendant is the victim, it must surely do so whatever the route by which the defendant would otherwise be held to have been an accomplice.

[46] We turn then to consider the Crown's new case, which is that the conviction of the defendant can be justified on the basis that the defendant aided and abetted the commission of the murder by actively encouraging Bandana Man to shoot at him. In relation to this case it seems to us that the issues for the court are as follows: (i) Does the victim rule preclude the conviction of a defendant for aiding and abetting a crime in respect of which he is the victim, even where the crime is not designed to protect a particular class of which the victim is a member? If yes, (ii) does the victim rule preclude the conviction of a defendant for aiding and abetting a crime in respect of which he was the intended victim, but where the actual victim is a third party? ...

[51] [T]here is no applicable statutory victim rule that precludes conviction of the respondent on the basis that he aided and abetted Bandana Man's attempt to kill him or cause him serious injury. Is there, or should there be, a common law rule that does so?

[52] The fact that Parliament found it necessary to enact s 2(1) of the [Criminal Law Act] 1977¹⁴⁷ Act and s 51 of the [Serious Crime Act] 2007 Act¹⁴⁸ is cogent indication that there is no common law rule that precludes conviction of a defendant of being party to a crime of which he was the actual or intended victim. We are satisfied that there is no such rule. This is evident from the fact that, under common law, attempted suicide was a crime, as was aiding and abetting suicide ...

[53] We can see no reason why this court should consider extending the common law so as to protect from conviction any defendant who is, or is intended to be, harmed by the crime that he commits, or attempts to commit. Such an extension would defeat the intention of Parliament in circumscribing the victim rule in s 51 of the 2007 Act. In R v Brown [1993] 2 All ER 75, [1994] 1 AC 212 sado-masochists were held to have been rightly convicted of causing injury to others who willingly consented to the injuries that they received. There would have been no bar to conviction of the latter of having aided and abetted the infliction of those injuries upon themselves. It is no doubt appropriate for prosecuting authorities to consider carefully whether there is justification for prosecuting anyone as party to a crime where he is the victim, or intended victim of that crime, but that is not to say that the actual or intended victim of a crime should on that ground alone be absolved from criminal responsibility in relation to it ...

[54] In the light of the conclusion that we have just reached, no question arises as to the application of the victim rule where, although the intended victim of the crime to which the defendant is party is the defendant himself, the actual victim proves to be a third party."

Appeal allowed

By a majority of six to one, the Supreme Court restored the defendant's conviction for murder. Beyond this, however, there are fundamental differences of view among the majority which make it difficult to assess the likely impact of this controversial decision. Lords Phillips and Judge (with whom Lord Wilson agrees) and Lord Dyson adopt one approach:

1. that the defendant was guilty of murder;
2. not on the basis of joint enterprise or “parasitical accessorial liability”, because, put simply, there was no collateral crime (NB this was before Jogee); but
3. on the basis that he had aided and abetted the murder by encouraging “Bandana Man” to shoot back at him, foreseeing that he might do so; and
4. applying the doctrine of transferred malice so that the defendant's intention towards “Bandana Man” was transferred to the victim (see below).

They come to this conclusion despite the fact that the trial judge had rejected this mode of analysis, meaning that the jury never considered the prosecution case on this basis, and some profound difficulties with this approach exposed by Lord Kerr in his persuasive dissent. Two of the remaining Supreme Court judges in the majority, Lords Brown and Clarke, on the other hand, find the defendant guilty of murder as a principal, despite the difficulties in establishing causation given the voluntary actions of “Bandana Man” which would ordinarily break the chain of causation between the defendant's actions and the death of the passer-by.¹⁴⁹ The decision is controversial.

JONATHAN HERRING, “VICTIMS AS DEFENDANTS: WHEN VICTIMS PARTICIPATE IN CRIMES AGAINST THEMSELVES” IN ALAN REED AND MICHAEL BOHLANDER (EDS),

PARTICIPATION IN CRIME: DOMESTIC AND COMPARATIVE PERSPECTIVES
(FARNHAM: ASHGATE, 2013), PP.84, 90–91:

6—071

“[T]heir Lordships’ argument is that [statutory provisions in relation to victims such as in s.51 of the Serious Crime Act 2007] would not be necessary if there was a general rule that victims could not be liable as accomplices. However, it is always dangerous to assume a common law principle from a statute. The mere fact that a statute creates a particular offence or defence does not necessarily amend the common law as it applies in similar situations ...

The discussion of this issue in Gnango was obiter and ... there was no precedent to support it. A deeper consideration of the issues might have explained why no prosecutions have been brought ...

The best arguments against [victims’] accessorial liability require us to return to the arguments generally against criminalising self-harm. The first concerns autonomy. If there is respect for the principles ... that people should be entitled to shape their lives ... as they wish, the criminal law should be reluctant to criminalise what is done. Where the actors only harm themselves it is not clear that the harm is sufficient to justify criminal liability, save, maybe, in cases of serious harm. That argument is as powerful in cases where the defendant has harmed him or herself as it is in cases where the defendant has persuaded another to harm him.

... [T]here will be cases which arguably are not protected by the principle of autonomy. There are cases where serious harm is done or the behaviour is seen as showing a particular lack of respect for the dignity of the individual. But ... these are likely to be cases where the individual is in a sorry state and needs support and help, rather than punishment ...

There may be a small band of cases where the individual has encouraged or helped in causing themselves a serious injury, but there is no therapeutic case for intervening. Perhaps the Wright [(1603) 1 Co. Lit. 127a] case, in which the person had their arm removed to assist in begging, is an example. But these will be very rare indeed.”

6—072

In trying to make sense of the decision in Gnango one fact stands out as significant: “Bandana Man” was arrested but not charged and subsequently disappeared. Had he been charged it seems unlikely that the convoluted prosecution of Gnango for murder (as opposed to the appropriate charge of attempted murder of “Bandana Man”) would have been pursued. Policy or the desire that someone should be brought to justice for the death of the innocent passerby¹⁵⁰ are important considerations in this Supreme Court decision, as is evident by Lord Brown’s comment:

“[T]o my mind the all-important consideration here is that both A and B were intentionally engaged in a potentially lethal unlawful gunfight (a ‘shoot-out’ as it has also been described) in the course of which an innocent passer-by was killed. The general public would in my opinion be astonished and appalled if in those circumstances the law attached liability for the death only to the gunman who actually fired the fatal shot (which, indeed, it would not always be possible to determine). Is he alone to be regarded as guilty of the victim’s murder? Is the other gunman really to be regarded as blameless and exonerated from all criminal liability for that killing? Does the decision of the Court of Appeal here, allowing A’s appeal against his conviction for murder, really represent the law of the land? ...

To my mind the answer to these questions is a plain ‘No’.”¹⁵¹

E. ACCOMPLICES AND TRANSFERRED MALICE

DAVID LANHAM, “ACCOMPLICES AND TRANSFERRED MALICE” (1980) 96
L.Q.R. 110, 110–111:

6—073

“An accomplice (A) instigates a principal offender (PO) to commit a specific crime. PO commits a crime of the same description but against a different victim or subject-matter or in a different manner. In what circumstances is A criminally liable for the crime committed by PO? The law in this area has become incoherent for two reasons. First, opinions differ on the nature of the link required between A and the crime actually committed. There are four theories running through the authorities. First, the direct consequences theory. Under this theory it is enough that the crime committed by PO flows directly from PO’s attempt to commit the crime suggested. The second theory is the probable consequence theory. A is liable only if the crime actually committed is a probable consequence of the crime suggested by A. This has been held to mean that A is liable if he ought to have foreseen the likelihood of the crime actually committed by PO. The third theory is that of recklessness. A will be liable only if he actually foresees the possibility that the crime actually committed will occur. Finally, there is the express authority theory. A will be liable only if he has expressly authorised the crime which is actually committed.

These four approaches would be enough in themselves to lead to confusion but the law is complicated still further by the fact that some authorities appear to apply different principles to different aspects of the problem. While the problem is basically one of transferred malice, the situations requiring the transfer can arise in various different ways. First, PO may attempt to harm the right victim (X) but harm another (V) by accident. Secondly, he may believe that V is X and so harm the wrong victim by mistake. Thirdly, he may do more harm than A ordered, e.g. injuring V (an unintended victim) as well as X (the intended victim). Fourthly, he may deliberately depart from A’s orders and injure V even though he knows that V is not X. Fifthly, he may commit the crime ordered by A against the correct victim but at a different time, place or in a different manner from that ordered or advised by A. Finally, he may commit the crime ordered but against the wrong subject-matter.”

Authority on this problem is scarce with most of the controversy revolving around the following case.

R. v SAUNDERS AND ARCHER (1573) 2
PLOWDEN 473; 75 E.R. 706

Saunders wished to kill his wife so that he could marry another woman. He explained his plans to Archer who advised him to kill her by poison. Archer bought the poison and gave it to Saunders to give to his wife. Saunders mixed the poison with two pieces of roasted apple and gave it to his wife. After tasting it the wife handed the rest of the apple to Eleanor, their three-year-old daughter. Saunders, on seeing this, merely said that “apples were not good for such infants” but when his wife persisted he simply watched his daughter eat the apple and did nothing “lest he be suspected”. The daughter died of the poison. Saunders was found guilty of murder but the question remained as to the liability of Archer.

LORD DYER CJ:

“But the most difficult point in this case ... was whether or not Archer should be adjudged accessory to the murder. For the offence which Archer committed was the aid and advice which he gave to Saunders, and that was only to kill his wife, and no other, for there was no parol communication between them concerning the daughter, and although by the consequences which followed from the giving of the poison by Saunders the principal, it so happened that the daughter was killed, yet Archer did not precisely procure her death, nor advise him to kill her, and therefore whether or not he should be accessory to this murder which happened by a thing consequential to the first act, seemed to them to be doubtful. For which reason they thought proper to advise and consider of it until the next gaol delivery, and in the meantime to consult with the justices in the term ... [It was finally agreed] that they ought not to give judgment against the said Alexander Archer, because they took the law to be that he could not be adjudged accessory to the said offence of murder, for that he did not assent that the daughter should be poisoned, but only that the wife should be poisoned, which assent cannot be drawn further than he gave it, for the poisoning of the daughter is a distinct thing from that to which he was privy, and therefore he shall not be adjudged accessory to it; and so they were resolved before this time.”

The judges took two years to decide that Archer was not liable as accessory to the crime of murder.¹⁵² Many times that number of years have been spent interpreting this decision. A broad interpretation is that the accomplice will only be liable if he expressly authorises or foresees the harm which occurs. A narrower interpretation of Saunders and Archer suggests that secondary parties will not be liable if the principal deliberately chooses another victim; effectively this is what Saunders did. He chose to let a different victim die, rather than step in to prevent it. On the other hand, if Saunders had not been present when his daughter ate the apple, he would not have deliberately changed the plan and the doctrine of transferred malice could apply and Archer would have been liable. The first case to arise on similar facts in more recent times is Leahy.¹⁵³ In this case, where a deliberate wounding of a different victim took place, the defendant was held not to have aided and abetted the principal's offence.

In the decision of Gnango, where, very unusually, the mens rea of the principal towards the defendant (with whom he was engaged in a shoot-out) was transferred to the killing of an innocent passer-by, leaving the defendant liable for murder as an accessory, Lords Phillips and Judge stated that:

“The doctrine applies to secondary parties as it does to principal offenders. Thus if D2 attempts to aid, abet, counsel or procure D1 to murder V1 but D1, intending to kill V1, accidentally kills V2 instead, D2 will be guilty of the murder of V2.”¹⁵⁴

The Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 proposes that the accessory be liable where the intended offence takes place on an unintended victim or property, but not liable, as in Leahy, for “an offence intentionally committed by the principal in respect of some other person or thing”.¹⁵⁵ The Law Commission's more recent recommendations take a similar approach when looking at the “scope of the venture” test for joint criminal ventures.¹⁵⁶ The following example is provided to illustrate how a secondary party would escape liability for murder, although she would be liable for the inchoate offence of assisting or encouraging crime:

“D agrees with P, a professional assassin, to provide P with a gun to murder D’s wife. P is then paid a large sum of money by X to murder X’s wife, V. P murders V with D’s gun. P does not shoot D’s wife.”¹⁵⁷

However, the transferred malice doctrine would apply to enable the conviction of the secondary party in this second example:

“D encourages P to hit X and gives P a stick with which to do it. D takes a swing at X but X ducks and the blow strikes and injures V.”¹⁵⁸

IV. Conclusion

6—077

We have seen that underpinning the present law are two assumptions. The first is that complicity is a form of derivative liability—there is only one offence, that of the principal—and the second is that accessories are as blameworthy as principal offenders. They are liable to the same extent and deserve comparable punishment.

Despite commitment to the first assumption, it is necessary to question the second assumption that accessories are as blameworthy as principal offenders and deserve comparable punishment. At a superficial level, of course, the rationale for this is obvious: the accessory’s role may have greatly facilitated the commission of the crime; he “may sometimes be more guilty than the perpetrator. Lady Macbeth was worse than Macbeth”.¹⁵⁹ English law currently allows for maximum flexibility: where the contribution of the secondary party is greater than that of the principal he can receive greater punishment, where the contribution is minor, he can receive less punishment.

It should now be apparent (particularly from the chapter on inchoate offences) that a basic theme of this book is that criminal liability ought generally to be imposed only when a blameworthy actor has caused a specified harm. This is only a general proposition, not a necessary rule. Thus, as we have seen, one might be justified in imposing criminal liability in the absence of blameworthiness (as in crimes of strict liability) or in the absence of obvious harm, or “first order harm” (as with inchoate offences). However, where one of these elements is missing and liability is nevertheless justified, the equation ought only to be balanced by imposing less criminal liability. This model provides the key for the structuring of all criminal offences and ascertaining appropriate levels of punishment. Thus there can be degrees of blameworthiness (for instance, intentionally causing harm being regarded as worse than recklessly causing harm), and, of course, there are degrees of harm (for instance, killing one’s victim is worse than injuring them). The correlation of the degree of blameworthiness with the degree of harm ought to provide a fairly precise level of criminal liability with appropriate level(s) of punishment.

How does accessorial liability fit into such a model of criminal liability and punishment? The answer is clear. If an accessory is less blameworthy or causes less harm than the principal offender, then he deserves less criminal liability. If he is both less blameworthy and causes less harm, then he deserves even less criminal liability and punishment. So the central questions become:

1. are accessories less blameworthy, and/or
2. do they cause less harm than the principal offender?

A. BLAMEWORTHINESS

6—078

The liability of the accessory is derivative; it stems from the offence committed by the principal:

“Since the source of culpability as an accessory is not the offence definition, there is no logical imperative that the mental element for an accessory should be the same as that required for a principal.”¹⁶⁰

As we have seen, the courts appear now to have accepted this proposition, but not its implications. If it were accepted that the concept of mens rea presupposes a capacity to control one’s actions and to choose between alternative courses of conduct, then the implications become clear. An accessory lacks control over the principal offender; she cannot make choices for that principal. (If she could we should classify her as a principal acting through an innocent agent, or as a co-principal.) The principal is:

“always the dominant party in the transaction. In criminal schemes, the principal is the actor-on-stage, who makes the final determination whether to commit the discrete criminal act.”¹⁶¹

The principal can have the mens rea of the actual offence because of his hegemony and control. The accessory, at most, has choice and control over her own actions, namely, her acts of assistance or encouragement. Once it is realised that this mens rea of the accessory is not the mens rea of the offence itself, that it is, in a sense, a step removed from the offence, we can then focus on the real question: is this mens rea of assisting as reprehensible as the mens rea of the principal who actually commits the offence? The answer to this question must be delayed until we have considered the next problem.

B. CAUSING HARM

6—079

Except in cases of procuring, an accessory, by definition, does not cause the ultimate harm. He contributes to the crime by his assistance or encouragement, but he does not actually cause the ultimate harm if it is inflicted by a responsible principal. So, in Lynch v DPP,¹⁶² for example, Lynch drove some IRA gunmen to a place where they killed a policeman. By his driving, Lynch assisted in the commission of the crime, but his actions clearly did not “cause” the death of the policeman. Indeed, the rules of accessory liability only exist because such an accessory does not cause the prohibited harm; if he did, he would be a principal offender (or co-principal) and such rules would be unnecessary.¹⁶³

DAVID LANHAM, “ACCOMPLICES, PRINCIPALS AND CAUSATION” (1980)

12 MELBOURNE UNIVERSITY L. REV.
490, 510–511:

6—080

“Assistance or permission: neither assistance nor permission should be sufficient to amount to cause. If this is all that can be proved against A, it seems plain that the main motivation for the deed has come from B or elsewhere. Assistance or permission may be enough to make A liable as a secondary party where the other conditions for such liability have been met but they should not be sufficient to make A a principal on the basis of causation ...

Advice or counselling: These should arguably be enough where A knows the facts which make B’s conduct criminal and B does not. They should not amount to causation where B knows that his conduct is criminal. In this latter situation it is reasonable to regard B, the immediate actor, as the principal offender and to relegate A’s position to that of secondary party.”

6—081

So causation is not established in such cases. But why is this so? In the case of Richards,¹⁶⁴ Mrs Richards paid two men to inflict injuries on her husband which she intended should “put him in hospital for a month”. The two men wounded the husband but not seriously. Mrs Richards was convicted of wounding with intent, although this was substituted by a conviction for unlawful wounding on appeal. Mrs Richards’ actions, in arranging for her husband to be beaten up badly enough to “put him in hospital for a month”, were clearly a cause of her husband’s ultimate injuries.¹⁶⁵ Why can they not be regarded as the legal cause? Unless one adopts the “policy approach” or the “mens rea approach” to causation the answer would appear to be as follows: an accessory cannot cause that over which he has no control¹⁶⁶ and the causal link cannot be traced through the actions of a responsible actor.¹⁶⁷ Mrs Richards caused the principal to act,¹⁶⁸ but, by being a responsible actor not subject to the control or dominance of Mrs Richards, the principal’s actions broke the chain of causation between Mrs Richards' actions and the injuries sustained by her husband. The principal caused the injuries.¹⁶⁹

In some cases, particularly those of aiding and abetting, it might be difficult even to establish that the accessory's actions were a cause of the ultimate harm. Thus in *State v Tally*¹⁷⁰ it was stated:

“The assistance given, however, need not contribute to the criminal result in the sense that, but for it, the result would not have ensued. It is quite sufficient if it facilitated a result that would have transpired without it. It is quite enough if the aid merely renders it easier for the principal actor to accomplish the end intended by him and the aider and abettor, though in all human probability the end would have been attained without it.”¹⁷¹

Dressler argues that the law should distinguish between those accomplices who can be described as “causal” and those that are “non-causal”. A “causal” accomplice would be a person but for whose assistance the offence would not have occurred, who should be liable for the same offence as the principal offender, whilst “non-causal” accomplices would be liable for a lesser offence and punished accordingly.¹⁷² Wilson has suggested something similar.

WILLIAM WILSON, “A RATIONAL
SCHEME OF LIABILITY FOR PARTICIPATING IN CRIME” [2008]
CRIM. L.R. 3, 5:

6—082

“Of course, agreeing with this latter view [that accomplices should be liable for the same crime as the principal offender] does not commit us to a structure of offenders comprising principals, accessories and inchoate offenders. An attractive alternative ... is to abandon the idea that participation in crime takes the form of physical perpetration on the one hand, or secondary participation on the other. In its place we could extend the scope of principal liability to include all those such as instigators and partners, who ‘cause’ or otherwise control the occurrence of a criminal act, without necessarily physically perpetrating it, relegating other forms of participation. This solution could engender the necessary moral and systemic clarity in relation to the imposition of liability for those who help or encourage criminal activities. And it would solve at a stroke most of the doctrinal tensions arising from the theory of derivative liability, such as those occurring in the fields of joint enterprise liability and innocent agency and related cases.”

6—083

As Dressler concedes, however, the problem would be in defining the causation test. Dressler himself opts for a wide interpretation of the “but-for” test, and is happy to leave it to a jury to decide whether, in a case where an accomplice’s lack of assistance would have delayed but not prevented the commission of the principal’s crime, a delay of minutes, hours or weeks would prevent the finding of causation in relation to the secondary party’s liability.¹⁷³ Whilst Dressler’s and Wilson’s instinct that the law ought to distinguish between those who are critical parties to a crime and those whose involvement is peripheral is an understandable one, it is not clear that this causal thesis is workable. Arguably, English law now makes a similar distinction, having created the inchoate offences of encouraging or assisting crime. These inchoate offences would catch Dressler’s “non-causal” accomplices and punish them less harshly than full accomplices. However, under the current law there is nothing to prevent “non-causal” accomplices from also being convicted of the full offence committed by the principal offender. An example will help to illustrate these points.

WILLIAM WILSON, “A RATIONAL
SCHEME OF LIABILITY FOR PARTICIPATING IN CRIME” [2008]
CRIM. L.R. 3, 6, 7:

6—084

“John and Anne wish to kill Mark. Anne suggests to John that he invites Mark over to swim in his swimming pool and then drown him. They are overheard by two friends, Philip and Jane. Philip says 'Great idea. I never liked Mark'. On hearing John doubt the cogency of the drowning plan, Jane, a busybody but with no other interest in the outcome, remarks that a good way of drowning Mark, who was not a strong swimmer, would be to throw a heavy jute net over the pool so that he could not get out. John and Anne go to Stephen's chandlery to buy a heavy jute net. Stephen overhears John and Anne talking about their intentions while he is in the stock room. He nevertheless sells them the net, unwilling to sacrifice a sale.

Under the present scheme of liability, if John does commit the principal offence, he is guilty of murder as principal, having the intention to kill Mark. Although it would not be doing violence to the nature of her participation to denote her a principal offender, sharing both mens rea and causal influence, Anne, as a participant in a joint venture to kill Mark, is guilty of murder as secondary party. She is guilty by virtue of her own intention to kill. Philip, although not a party to the venture, and although having no causal influence on the outcome, is guilty of murder as secondary party by virtue of his words of encouragement and his belief that John would attack Mark with the necessary intention for murder. Jane is guilty of murder as secondary party by virtue of her assistance and her belief that John would attack Mark with the necessary intention for murder. Stephen is guilty of murder as secondary party by virtue of his assistance, believing that the net was to be used to commit murder.”

6—085

Wilson notes that all of the participants will be liable for the crime of murder under the current rules of secondary liability, but what difference would it make if his suggestion that the law should differentiate between causal and non-causal accomplices were employed? Presumably all but Philip would remain liable for murder. Philip would escape liability for murder, since Wilson states he has no causal influence over the outcome. However, Philip would be liable for the inchoate offence of assisting or encouraging crime under the Serious Crime Act 2007, which does not require any such causal link. But what of Stephen? Would he be seen as a causal accomplice? But for him providing the jute net then John would not have killed Mark as he did, but perhaps John could have purchased a net from elsewhere. Wilson notes that Stephen was in a position to thwart John's endeavour,¹⁷⁴ which would suggest that he would fall into the category of "causal" accomplice. However, Wilson suggests that, while defendants like Stephen may be culpable for their failure to prevent the crime, it is unfair to punish them for murder. Yet, given that Stephen is a "mechanical" assister providing the tools for the offence it is difficult to see how he would not be classified as a "causal" accomplice, thus undermining the suggestion that the distinction between causal and non-causal accomplices can do the work of selecting which are the most blameworthy participants in crime. If that distinction were coupled with a more rigorous mens rea requirement, an improvement on the current law could be achieved. Thus, if the law of secondary liability required the secondary party to be a causal player in the offence and to intend that the crime be committed, defendants such as Stephen would avoid liability for murder and instead be liable for the inchoate offence of assisting or encouraging crime.

Even though accessories do not cause the ultimate harm, it is clear that they do cause a "harm", namely, the harm of assisting or encouraging the principal offender. The harm involved in assisting or encouraging other criminals, like the "harm" in endangerment offences, is quite different from the ultimate harm actually inflicted and does not necessarily deserve the same level of criminal liability and punishment.

C. LESSER LIABILITY AND PUNISHMENT

6—086

A secondary party causes a different harm from the principal (the harm of assisting or encouraging a criminal act); she has a different mens rea from the principal (the mens rea of assisting or encouraging). If this is a lesser (as well as different) degree of blameworthiness and harm, this should result in a lesser level of criminal liability and punishment.

There is one context in which the courts have had to face questions similar to these and that is in relation to whether the defence of duress should be made available to an accessory to murder, but withheld from the principal. In the case of Lynch v DPP,¹⁷⁵ the House of Lords held that duress was a defence to an accessory to murder. In Abbott,¹⁷⁶ the Privy Council held that duress was no defence to a principal offender to murder. Lord Morris in Lynch v DPP felt there was a material difference between the role of the principal and that of the accessory. An accessory:

“may cling to the hope that perhaps X will not be found at the place or that there will be a change of intention before the purpose is carried out or that in some unforeseen way the dire event of a killing will be averted. The final and fatal moment of decision has not arrived. He saves his own life at a time when the loss of another life is not a certainty ... [But the principal offender] must personally there and then take an innocent life. It is for him to pull the trigger or otherwise personally to do the act of killing.”¹⁷⁷

6—087

Lynch has now been overruled by the decision of Howe,¹⁷⁸ partly on the basis of finding the weight of previous authority to have been against extending the defence of duress to any party to murder, but also partly as a disavowal of there necessarily being a distinction between the killer and a secondary party:

“I can, of course see that as a matter of commonsense one participant in a murder may be considered less morally at fault than another. The youth who hero-worships the gangleader and acts as a look-out man whilst the gang enter a jeweller’s shop and kill the owner in order to steal is an obvious example. In the eyes of the law they are all guilty of murder, but justice will be served by requiring those who did the killing to serve a longer period in prison before being released on licence than the youth who acted as look-out. However, it is not difficult to give examples where more moral fault may be thought to attach to a participant in murder who was not the actual killer; I have already mentioned the example of a contract killing, when the murder would never have taken place if a contract had not been placed to take the life of the victim. Another example would be an intelligent man goading a weakminded individual into a killing he would not otherwise commit.”¹⁷⁹

Are these arguments convincing? Or do the views of Lord Morris in Lynch reflect the way most people think?¹⁸⁰ The Law Commission has recommended that duress ought to be a full defence to first degree murder, and should be available to both principal and secondary parties,¹⁸¹ providing the following example of how the current law may prove unfair to accessories:

“For example, many people would be disturbed if they knew that at present D, an otherwise innocent taxi driver, could be convicted of murder on account of his having driven P to the victim’s address, at gunpoint, on the mere basis that D was aware that murder would be committed there.”¹⁸²

6—088

The accessory who provides assistance or encouragement is clearly blameworthy, but not as blameworthy as the principal who actually pulls the trigger, stabs with the knife or takes the property. It is the principal who is the dominant party who has to make the final decision to commit the crime. It is the principal who is in control and has the power to choose whether to commit the crime or not. In moral terms this makes his actions “worse” than those of the accessory. The principal is “tainted”,¹⁸³ contaminated by being the direct instrument of the crime; he is the one with the “blood on his hands”. The accessory is likewise tainted or contaminated—but for what she has done, namely her lesser role of assistance or encouragement. German law, for example, recognises the different levels of culpability between principal and accessory by providing that punishment for the latter is reduced as follows:

“1. Instead of life imprisonment, the punishment is imprisonment for not less than three years.

2. In cases of prescribed terms of imprisonment, the maximum term may be reduced to three-fourths of the prescribed maximum. The same reduction applies to monetary penalties.

3. The minimum term of imprisonment is mitigated as follows:
 - a. From a minimum of ten or five years to a minimum of two years.
 - b. From a minimum of three or two years to a minimum of six months.
 - c. From a minimum of one year to a minimum of three months.
 - d. In other cases the statutory minimum is retained.”¹⁸⁴

However, it does not follow that all secondary parties should be treated the same. One might wish to distinguish between different classes of accessories in terms of their liability and punishment. The actions of the instigator or mastermind behind the crime are generally more reprehensible than those of an accessory simply assisting the principal at the scene of the crime; the causal contribution of such an instigator towards the ultimate crime is certainly greater; he may thus deserve greater punishment.

Even if not all the ideas expressed in this section are fully accepted, it is nevertheless hoped that one fact has clearly emerged. Rules of criminal liability should not be rationalised or reformed in a vacuum. This should only be done by reference to a coherent theory of criminal liability, and such a theory should only be constructed by ultimate reference to the punishment to be meted out to offenders. The Law Commission’s proposals in its second report on secondary liability fail to feature this reference point as a basis for reform, and as such are to be lamented.

¹ Between 1990 and 2000, 22% of murders and 15% of involuntary manslaughter involved multiple parties (Weston, Criminal Complicity: A Comparative Analysis of Homicide Liability, 2002, PhD thesis, University of Wales, Swansea). Although only looking at joint enterprise, a report revealing that between 2005 and 2013 there were 4,590 prosecutions for homicide involving 2 or more defendants also gives an indication of the scale of offending involving more than one party: the Bureau of Investigative Journalism, Joint Enterprise: An Investigation into the Legal Doctrine of Joint Enterprise in Criminal Convictions (London: The Bureau of Investigative Journalism, 2014), p.7.

² See also, B. Livings and E. Smith, “Locating Complicity: Choice, Character,

- Participation, Dangerousness and the Liberal Subjectivist” in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (Farnham: Ashgate, 2013).
- 3 Whilst the terms “secondary offenders”, “accomplices” and “accessories” are often used interchangeably, the Court of Appeal has expressed the view that the term “secondary parties” is preferable because it emphasises that secondary liability is derivative from the liability of the principal offender: R. v Bryce (Craig Brian) [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 35 at [38].
 - 4 Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 s.8. It is also possible to aid and abet a summary offence: the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980 s.44.
 - 5 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.71 of 1998) (Anderson) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 369. The mandatory life sentence for murder applies to secondary parties in the same way as it applies to principal offenders. In R. v Height (John) [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 117 it was held that although no reference was made to secondary parties in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21 paras (4) and (5), those guidelines could be applied to secondary parties in the same way as they applied to principal offenders, and it would be wrong in the present case for the starting point for the secondary party’s minimum term of imprisonment for murder to be lower than that of the principal offender, given that the former had arranged for his wife to be killed.
 - 6 This is the key to distinguishing secondary liability from the offences of encouraging or assisting crime under the Serious Crime Act 2007 ss.44, 45 and 46, which do not require that the offence that is encouraged or assisted actually be committed. See Ch.5 above, paras 5-127–5-143.
 - 7 Ashworth’s commentary on Bryce [2004] Crim. L.R. 936, 937.
 - 8 Until 1967, principals were known as principals in the first degree and secondary parties as principals in the second degree if they were present at the crime and accessories if they were not. The Criminal Law Act 1967 effectively abolished the need for that distinction to be drawn.
 - 9 There is no legal obligation to draw this distinction in an indictment. See fnn.21–25 below.
 - 10 Not least because strict liability does not extend to accessories (Callow v Tillstone (1900) 8 L.T. 411). Even if a principal can be convicted without proof of mens rea, secondary parties must act with the requisite mental element.
 - 11 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.204.
 - 12 Unfortunately, comments by, e.g. Lords Brown and Clark in Gnango [2011] UKSC 59 at [71] and [81] that the defendant was guilty of murder as a principal give insufficient weight to this key point.
 - 13 See R. v Stringer (Neil Bancroft) (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 13 where the defendant, a business manager of a company, signed false invoices with the intention that innocent company employees would pass them for payment. When the company’s bank account was duly debited, the defendant was convicted of theft of the money involved, through innocent agents.
 - 14 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993), para.2.10.
 - 15 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.1 of 1975) [1975] Q.B. 773 at 779.
 - 16 DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 at 698.
 - 17 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.1 of 1975) [1975] Q.B. 773.

- 18 See fn.8 above.
- 19 In Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396 the Court of Appeal reaffirmed this, rejecting an argument that in order to aid and abet the defendant had to be present at the time of the commission of the crime.
- 20 e.g. in Att-Gen v Able [1984] Q.B. 795 all the words were regarded as synonyms for “helping”.
- 21 In Bryce, the Court of Appeal stated that in charging secondary parties “it is frequently advisable (as was done in this case) to use the ‘catch-all’ phrase ‘aid, abet, counsel or procure’ because the shades of difference between them are far from clear”: Bryce [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 35 at [39].
- 22 R. v Forman and Ford [1988] Crim. L.R. 677. This avoids prosecution problems where uncertainty exists as to who is the principal.
- 23 DPP of Northern Ireland v Maxwell (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 128.
- 24 Taylor, Harrison and Taylor [1998] Crim. L.R. 582. The citing in R. v Montague (Damian John) [2013] EWCA Crim 1781 of the passage in Maxwell which stressed the need for clarity is, therefore, welcome.
- 25 R. v Mercer (Mark John) (Retrial) [2001] EWCA Crim 638. Article 6(3)(a) states that everyone charged with a criminal offence has the right to be informed “in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him”.
- 26 K. J. M. Smith, A Modern Treatise on the Law of Complicity (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991), p.7.
- 27 Smith, A Modern Treatise on the Law of Complicity (1991), p.246.
- 28 R. v Mendez (Reece) [2010] EWCA Crim 516.
- 29 S. H. Kadish, “Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine” (1985) 73 Cal. L. Rev. 324, 327. See also, G. Williams, “Complicity, Purpose and the Draft Code—I” [1990] Crim. L.R. 4, 6.
- 30 R. v Luffman [2008] EWCA Crim 1739.
- 31 The court accepted that causation would be important in a case of procuring (see fn.39 below), but treated the present case as one that involved aiding, abetting or counselling, but not procuring.
- 32 Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396.
- 33 Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396 at [49].
- 34 Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396 per Toulson LJ, citing the words of the Law Commission: Law Com. No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para 2.36.
- 35 Giannetto [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 1.
- 36 See further, J. C. Smith, “Criminal Liability of Accessories: Law and Law Reform” (1997) 113 L.Q.R. 453, 458. See also Att-Gen v Able [1984] 1 Q.B. 795 where it was stated that it “does not make any difference” whether the person counselled would have acted anyway.
- 37 In Bryce [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 35 at [75] the court concluded that as long as there is no “overwhelming supervening event” between the defendant’s act of assistance and the commission of the offence then liability will be established. The position is different with regard to procuring.
- 38 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan’s Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford:

- OUP, 2015), p. 216. One may certainly procure an offence without the principal's knowledge.
- 39 Att-Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1975) [1975] Q.B. 773.
 - 40 Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396 at [51].
 - 41 The term "presence" is broadly interpreted so as to include, for example, the look-out person standing outside: Betts and Ridley (1930) 22 Cr. App. R. 148.
 - 42 See also Wilcox R. v Jeffrey [1951] 1 All E.R. 464 and R. v Bland [1988] Crim. L.R. 41.
 - 43 R. v Tait [1993] Crim. L.R. 538. See also the Privy Council decision in Robinson v The Queen [2011] UKPC 3.
 - 44 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (New York: OUP, 1978), p.679.
 - 45 Such persons could be liable for encouraging crime under the Serious Crime Act 2007, provided that they either intended to encourage the commission of an offence or believed that their act would encourage its commission.
 - 46 Du Cros v Lambourne [1907] 1 K.B. 40; cf. R. v Harris [1964] Crim. L.R. 54 where the supervisor of a learner-driver was convicted as an accessory to the learner-driver's traffic offences because he knowingly failed to take steps to stop them.
 - 47 Cassady v Morris (Reg.) (Transport) [1975] R.T.R. 470; Forman and Ford [1988] Crim. L.R. 677.
 - 48 R. v Webster (Peter David) [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 6.
 - 49 R. v JF Alford Transport Ltd [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 326.
 - 50 Brown v The State [2003] UKPC 10 at [13].
 - 51 See, e.g. Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.2.3; R. Buxton, "Joint Enterprise" [2009] Crim. L.R. 233.
 - 52 Chan Wing-Siu v The Queen [1985] A.C. 168.
 - 53 R. v Powell and R. v English [1999] 1 A.C. 1.
 - 54 J. C. Smith, "Criminal Liability of Accessories: Law and Law Reform" [1997] 113 L.Q.R. 453, 455.
 - 55 R. v Slack (Martin Andrew) [1989] Q.B. 775.
 - 56 At paras 6-027–6-037.
 - 57 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993), para.2.49.
 - 58 Bryce [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 35 at [42].
 - 59 G. E. Mueller, "The Mens Rea of Accomplice Liability" (1988) 61 South. Calif. L.R. 2169, 2172.
 - 60 NCB v Gamble [1959] 1 Q.B. 11. See also DPP v Lynch [1975] A.C. 653.
 - 61 Contrary to the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1955 (SI 1955/990) regs 68 and 104.
 - 62 Gamble [1959] 1 Q.B. 11 at 23.
 - 63 D. J. Baker, Glanville Williams' Textbook of Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2015), para.17-031.
 - 64 R. v Bainbridge (Alan) [1960] 1 Q.B. 129.

- 65 G. Virgo, “Clarifying Accessorial Liability” (1998) 57 C.L.J. 13, 15: “It is to be hoped that in future joint enterprise liability can be treated simply as a historical footnote and not as a distinct part of accessorial liability”.
- 66 Commentary to Marks [1998] Crim. L.R. 676: “it is unfortunate that the phrase ‘joint enterprise’ has been given a special status for which there is no proper foundation” (677).
- 67 R. Buxton, “Joint Enterprise” [2009] Crim. L.R. 233, 238.
- 68 A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 5th edn (Oxford: Hart, 2013), p.245. See also A. P. Simester, “The Mental Element in Complicity” (2006) 122 L.Q.R. 578–601 and B. Kreb, “Joint Criminal Enterprise” [2010] 73 M.L.R. 578.
- 69 Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.52.
- 70 R. v Powell; English [1999] 1 A.C. 1.
- 71 Chan Wing-Siu [1985] A.C. 168.
- 72 Chan Wing-Siu [1985] AC 168 at 175.
- 73 See summary of the case in [52]–[58] of the extract from R. v Jogee [2016] UKSC 8 below para.6-030.
- 74 Ruddock v The Queen [2016] UKPC 7.
- 75 Lawyers were instructed by two campaign groups: Just for Kids Law and Joint Enterprise Not Guilty by Association (JENGBA).
- 76 Owen Bowcott, “Ameen Jogee jailed for manslaughter in joint enterprise test case” The Guardian 21 September 2016 at <https://www.theguardian.com/law/2016/sep/12/ameen-jogee-jailed-manslaughter-police-officer-joint-enterprise-test-case> [Accessed March 2017].
- 77 R. v Jogee [2016] UKSC 8 at [90].
- 78 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, “Jogee—Not the End of a Legal Saga but the Start of a New One?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 539, 546.
- 79 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, “Jogee—Not the End of a Legal Saga but the Start of a New One?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 539, 547.
- 80 Anwar [2016] EWCA Crim 551.
- 81 See, e.g. R. Buxton, “Jogee: Upheaval In Secondary Liability for Murder” [2016] Crim. L.R. 324, 227.
- 82 Anwar [2016] EWCA Crim 551 at [22].
- 83 R. v Jogee [2016] UKSC 8 at [96].
- 84 D. Baker, “Letter: Jogee: jury directions and the manslaughter alternative” [2017] Crim. L.R. 51–56, 52.
- 85 Joint Enterprise Not Guilty by Association: <http://www.jointenterprise.co/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 86 M. Dyson, Letter to the Editor, [2016] Crim. L.R. 638–643, 642.
- 87 R. v Jogee [2016] UKSC 8 at [100].
- 88 Johnson [2016] EWCA Crim 1613.
- 89 K. Laird, “Case Comment: R. v Johnson” [2016] Crim. L.R. 216–221, 221.
- 90 A. Simester, “Accessory liability and common unlawful purposes” (2017) 133 L.Q.R.

- 73–90, 81.
- 91 A. Simester, “Accessory liability and common unlawful purposes” (2017) 133 L.Q.R. 73–90, 90.
- 92 F. Stark, “The Demise of “Parasitic Accessorial Liability”: Substantive Judicial Law Reform, Not Common Law Housekeeping” (2016) 75(3) Cambridge Law Journal 550–579, 577.
- 93 F. Stark, “The Demise of “Parasitic Accessorial Liability”: Substantive Judicial Law Reform, Not Common Law Housekeeping” (2016) 75(3) Cambridge Law Journal 550–579, 551.
- 94 Blakely v DPP [1991] Crim. L.R. 763; [1991] R.T.R 405.
- 95 Blakely v DPP [1991] R.T.R 405 at 417.
- 96 Blakely v DPP [1991] R.T.R 405.
- 97 The Law Commission states that a generous host is liable for drunken driving even if she is indifferent to whether the principal commits the offence, and that it is enough that she believes that they will commit the offence as a result of the alcohol she supplies. In a footnote, the Law Commission further admits that, following Blakely, Sutton and Webster it is enough that they foresee that the principal might, or was likely to, commit the offence: Law Commission Paper No.300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006), para.4.17.
- 98 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993). For an argument that complicity ought to be abolished, see G. Sullivan, “Doing without Complicity” [2012] J. of Commonwealth Crim. Law 199.
- 99 J. C. Smith, “Criminal Liability of Accessories: Law and Law Reform” (1997) 113 L.Q.R. 453, 463 and K. J. M. Smith, “The Law Commission Consultation Paper on Complicity: (1) A Blueprint for Rationalisation” [1994] Crim. L.R. 239, 250.
- 100 Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), para.1.4. Before the Law Commission completed its report on secondary liability it had already, however, made recommendations relating to secondary liability in cases of homicide (Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006)). These recommendations were originally adopted in part by the Government in drafting the Coroners and Justice Bill. However, following the consultation process they were dropped from the Bill on the basis that secondary liability needs to be reformed as a whole rather than in parts: Ministry of Justice, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide: Proposals for Reform of the Law: Summary of Responses and Government Position, CP(R) August 19, 2009, paras 105–106.
- 101 D. Ormerod and R. Fortson, “Serious Crime Act 2007: The Part 2 Offences” [2009] Crim. L.R. 389, 394.
- 102 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.131 Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993), para.2.120.
- 103 Law Commission Report No.305 Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.56.
- 104 R. v Jogee [2016] UKSC 8.
- 105 Law Commission Report No.305 Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.7.
- 106 Law Commission Report No.305 Participating in Crime (2007), para.1.9.
- 107 Law Commission Report No.305 Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.34.
- 108 G. R. Sullivan, “Participating in Crime: Law Com No.305—Joint Criminal Ventures” [2008] Crim. L.R. 19.

- 109 Law Commission Report No.305 Participating in Crime (2007), para.4.29.
- 110 The Law Commission propose one further offence, considered below at para.6-056.
- 111 House of Commons Justice Committee, Joint Enterprise (Eleventh Report of Session 2010–2012) (2012) HC Paper No.1507).
- 112 J. W. C. Turner, Russell on Crime, 12th edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 1964), p.128; affirmed in Surujpaul v The Queen [1958] 3 All E.R. 300 at 301.
- 113 D. J. Baker, Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 3rd edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 2012), p.518.
- 114 Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), pp.665–667. cf. Stringer (1992) 94 Cr. App. R. 13.
- 115 R. v Millward (Sidney Booth) [1994] Crim. L.R. 527.
- 116 Wheelhouse [1994] Crim. L.R. 756 followed Millward although it was unnecessary to do so on the facts since the doctrine of innocent agency applied.
- 117 See, e.g. commentary to R. v Loukes (Noel Martyn) [1996] Crim. L.R. 341, 343; and R. Taylor, “Complicity, Legal Scholarship and the Law of Unintended Consequences” (2009) 29 L.S. 1, 7.
- 118 Loukes [1996] 1 Cr. App. R. 444; see also Thornton v Mitchell [1940] 1 All E.R. 339 and R. v Roberts (David Geraint) [1997] Crim. L.R. 209.
- 119 Contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1988 ss.1 and 2A.
- 120 Roberts [1997] Crim. L.R. 209.
- 121 Smith, “Commentary to Roberts” [1997] Crim. L.R. 209, 211.
- 122 Taylor, “Complicity, Legal Scholarship and the Law of Unintended Consequences” (2009) 29 L.S. 1, 9.
- 123 R. Taylor, “Procuring, Causation, Innocent Agency and the Law Commission” [2008] Crim. L.R. 32, 36.
- 124 Taylor, “Procuring, Causation, Innocent Agency and the Law Commission” [2008] Crim. L.R. 32, 40. D would avoid liability under cl.4 because subs.(2) would require that there were no additional reasons why P did not commit the offence, other than his being under the age of 10, having the defence of insanity, or acting without the fault requirement. If he was acting under duress there would be another reason.
- 125 Taylor, “Procuring, Causation, Innocent Agency and the Law Commission” [2008] Crim. L.R. 32, 49.
- 126 R. v Richards (Isabelle Christina) [1974] Q.B. 776.
- 127 K. J. M. Smith, A Modern Treatise on the Law of Complicity (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991), p.130.
- 128 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993), para.2.38. See also Smith, A Modern Treatise on the Law of Complicity (1991), pp.127–133.
- 129 K. J. M. Smith, “Withdrawal in Complicity: A Restatement of Principles” [2001] Crim. L.R. 769.
- 130 Smith (see fn.129) argues that the nature and scope of a withdrawal defence should depend on the rationale for having such a defence: whether it is an incentive for the accessory to desist or whether it is evidence of the accessory’s lack of (or diminished) culpability or future dangerousness.
- 131 Rook (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 327. See also R. v Grundy [1977] Crim. L.R. 543, where

- the party also sought (successfully) to withdraw before the commission of the crime (some 2 weeks hence); see also R. v Croft (William James) (1944) 29 Cr. App. R. 169, R. v Whitefield (Arthur Armour) (1984) 79 Cr. App. R. 36 and R. v Baker [1994] Crim. L.R. 444.
- 132 R. v Mitchell (Frank) [1999] Crim. L.R. 496.
- 133 O’Flaherty [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 20.
- 134 This was also the approach taken in R. v D [2005] EWCA Crim 1981.
- 135 R. v O’Flaherty (Errol Carlton) [2004] Crim. L.R. 751 at 752.
- 136 Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 2552; [2009] Crim L.R. 287.
- 137 In a case of spontaneous violence it is clear that it is not necessary for the accessory to take reasonable steps to prevent crime: O’Flaherty [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 20 at [61].
- 138 K. J. Smith “Withdrawal in Complicity: A Restatement of Principles” [2001] Crim. L.R. 769, 776.
- 139 R. v Tyrell [1894] 1 Q.B. 710.
- 140 e.g. R. v Whitehouse (Arthur) [1977] Q.B. 868.
- 141 Although this principle has not been repealed by legislation, it has been argued that certain provisions under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 manage to circumvent its application, thereby criminalising victims one would expect to see protected by the law (M. Bohlander, “The Sexual Offences Act 2003 and the Tyrell Principle—Criminalising the Victims?” [2005] Crim. L.R. 701). The Law Commission considered the point at some length in its most recent report on secondary liability: Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), paras 5.24–5.38.
- 142 Section 51 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 codifies Tyrell and excludes liability for encouraging or assisting crime for victims in cases of any “protective offence”. See above, Ch.5. A similar draft provision is included in cl.6 of the draft Participating in Crime Bill, appended to Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007).
- 143 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212.
- 144 The Guardian 8 February 1992.
- 145 L. Bibbings and P. Alldridge, “Sexual Expression, Body Alteration, and the Defence of Consent” (1993) 20 J.L. and Soc. 356, 364.
- 146 J. Herring, “Victims as Defendants: When Victims Participate in Crimes Against Themselves” in A. Reed and M. Bohlander (ed), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (Farnham: Ashgate, 2013), p.83.
- 147 See above para.5-101.
- 148 See above para.5-147.
- 149 See above, para.2-097.
- 150 E. Freer, “R. v Gngano: The Curious Case of Bandana Man” (2012) 176 Crim. Law and Justice Weekly 218.
- 151 Gngano [2011] UKSC 59 at [68]-[69]. See further D. Ormerod, “Worth the Wait?” [2012] Crim. L.R. 79, 80.
- 152 Even then, his release was not immediately ordered; he was kept in prison until he could purchase his pardon.
- 153 R. v Leahy [1985] Crim. L.R. 99.

- 154 Gnango [2011] UKSC 59 at [16].
- 155 Law Commission No.177 (1989) cl.27(5).
- 156 The Law Commission is of the opinion that the issue would not arise in cases of complicity other than those involving a joint criminal venture: Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.165.
- 157 Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.163.
- 158 Law Commission Report No.305, Participating in Crime (2007), para.3.164.
- 159 G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 1st edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 1978), p.287; see also J. C. Smith, “A Note on Duress” [1974] Crim. L.R. 349, 351, cited with approval by Lord Edmund-Davies in Lynch v DPP [1975] A.C. 653 at 709. Lord Simon in Lynch and Lords Wilberforce and Edmund-Davies in Abbott v The Queen [1977] A.C. 755, all opined that no distinction could be based on the degree of participation in a crime.
- 160 I. Dennis, “The Mental Element for Accessories” in P. Smith (ed), Essays in Honour of J. C. Smith (London: Butterworths, 1987), p.40.
- 161 Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), p.656.
- 162 Lynch [1975] A.C. 653.
- 163 But see Smith, A Modern Treatise on the Law of Complicity (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991), pp.54–93 where he explores causation’s role in complicity and concludes that “narrowing complicity’s coverage to cases of provable causal contribution would offer a basis of liability which was more intuitively appealing and morally consistent (with that of a principal)” (p.90).
- 164 R. v Richards (Isabelle Christina) [1974] Q.B. 776 (cited in the extract of Howe, above, para.6-059).
- 165 Above, para.6-059.
- 166 Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), p.656; D. Lanham, “Accomplices, Principals and Causation” [1980] 12 Melbourne University Law Review 490, p.506.
- 167 Above, paras 2-080–2-081.
- 168 H. L. A. Hart and T. Honoré would dispute even this. Where the actions of the principal offender are fully voluntary “it will not strictly be correct to say that the instigator has caused the principal to act as he does”. They argue, however, that the actions of the principal “may, in a sense, be described as the consequence of the instigator”—this they describe as a different variety of causal connection (H. L. A. Hart and T. Honoré, Causation in the Law, 2nd edn (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1985), p.381).
- 169 Gardner argues, however, that to say that the secondary party (in our example, Mrs Richards) does indeed “cause” the harm or death does not wipe out the hitman’s part in the story as a responsible agent. In his view, accomplices do make a causal contribution to the end crime but the nature of their causal contribution is different to that of a principal offender: “The essential difference between them is that accomplices make their difference through principals, in other words by making a difference to the difference that principals make”, J. Gardner, “Complicity and Causality” (2007) Crim. Law and Philos. 1, 127–141, 128.
- 170 State v Tally (1894) 102 Ala. 25.
- 171 Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 2nd edn (1985): “When the participant merely assists he neither ‘causes’ the principal to act nor does the latter act ‘in consequence’ of his assistance. Probably the assistance need not even be a sine qua

- non of success” (p.388).
- 172 J. Dressler, “Reassessing the Theoretical Underpinnings of Accomplice Liability: New Solutions to an Old Problem” (1985) 37 Hastings L.J. 91; J. Dressler, “Reforming Complicity Law: Trivial Assistance as a Lesser Offence?” (2008) 5 Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law 427–448.
- 173 Dressler, “Reforming Complicity Law: Trivial Assistance as a Lesser Offence?” (2008) 5 Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law 427–448, 442.
- 174 W. Wilson, “A Rational Scheme of Liability for Participating in Crime” [2008] Crim. L.R. 3, 8.
- 175 Lynch [1975] A.C. 653.
- 176 Abbott [1977] A.C. 755.
- 177 The opposite view was expressed by Lords Wilberforce and Edmund-Davies, dissenting in Abbott.
- 178 Howe [1987] 1 A.C. 417.
- 179 Howe [1987] 1 A.C. 417, 444–445.
- 180 The respondents to a survey on public opinion by R. H. Robinson and J. M. Darley, “Objectivist Versus Subjectivist Views of Criminality: A Study in the Role of Social Sciences in Criminal Law Theory” (1998) 18 O.J.L.S. 409 assigned significantly less liability (and punishment) to accomplices compared to the perpetrators of crime.
- 181 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), para.4.39.
- 182 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), para.5.68.
- 183 Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), pp.345–347.
- 184 StGB art.49(1). See Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), p.650.

Chapter 7

Non-Fatal Offences Against the Person

I. Offences against the Person (Non-Sexual)

A. THE EXTENT AND CONTEXT OF VIOLENCE

7-001

There are many reasons why people commit crimes of violence. Criminological explanations of this type of offending have drawn upon biological and genetic theories, psychological and social psychological theories, and various sociological theories.¹ Discussion of these theories is beyond the scope of this book. However, an understanding of the law is assisted by an appreciation of the context in which violence occurs and the extent to which the law is utilised as a response to violence.

Offences of violence make up almost one quarter of all recorded crime. In 2015/16, such offences accounted for 23% (1 million) of the 4.6 million crimes recorded by the police.² Of these violent offences, less than half resulted in any injury to the person.³ There has been a significant increase in the number of violent offences recorded by the police over the past five years, with official statistics showing the number of crimes increasing by 56% since 2010/11.⁴

However, these official figures do not reveal the true extent of violence, often called the “dark figure” of crime. This is because large numbers of violent incidents are never reported to the police. The Crime Survey for England and Wales (CSEW), which is based on around 50,000 interviews with persons aged 16 or over living in private households,⁵ estimated that there were 1.3 million offences of violence in 2015/16.⁶ Contrary to recorded offences, the estimated number of violent offences has fallen by 32% over the past five years, and by 66% since 1995.⁷

Many of the “violent” incidents counted by the survey amount to common assaults, often involving scuffles at school and in and around pubs and clubs when little or no injury has been caused. In fact, the CSEW found that 53% of all CSEW violent incidents involved no injury to the victim.⁸ However, it would be a mistake to conclude that there was any correlation between seriousness of injury and the reporting of such offences. Both minor assaults and many serious attacks resulting in stab wounds, broken cheekbones, noses and ribs are not reported to the police.⁹

There are various reasons, apart from the triviality of the incident and injury, why offences are not reported. Factors associated with the decision not to report include: an assessment that the police will not be able to do anything about it; the victim’s habituation to violence; an unwillingness to have their own conduct exposed to scrutiny; hostility towards the police; fear of reprisal; and the impact such reporting might have upon continuing relationships with the assailant and others.¹⁰ Survey results from 2010/11 found that a significant reason for not reporting violent crime (in 33% of cases) was that victims considered the issue as a private matter best dealt with by themselves.¹¹ This last reason helps to explain why cases of domestic violence are reported even less frequently than other cases, although the difference in reporting rates between the official statistics and the CSEW is no longer as great as it was.

A further important factor to consider is that, even if the violent incident has been reported to the police, they may not record it because they regard the alleged offence as too trivial or perhaps disbelieve the person reporting the crime, especially if that person comes from a section of society perceived as unreliable as witnesses.¹² It has been estimated that 68% of all offences of violence reported to the police are recorded with only 55% of reported common assaults ending up in the police records.¹³ Further, even if an offence is recorded it may be under a different classification, such as drunk and disorderly conduct or criminal damage.¹⁴ And, of course, the fact that a crime has been recorded does not mean that it will be followed by a prosecution. In many cases the CPS will refuse to prosecute, mainly on the basis of the unreliability of victims/witnesses or their unwillingness to testify.

7-002

In recent years, research has begun to focus on the characteristics of victims of crime. One of the most significant factors affecting the risk of violence is that of ethnic origin. Since separate records were kept, the number of racial assaults has been increasing every year. According to CSEW data there are an estimated 106,000 race “hate crimes” committed each year, with approximately 50% of these incidents involving violence against the person.¹⁵ Concern over such assaults, fuelled by media coverage of a few high-profile cases, led to the enactment of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 increasing the maximum sentence for most of the offences against the person where the offence is “racially aggravated”.¹⁶ Fear after September 11 that there could be an increase in attacks on members of religious groups resulted in the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 s.39, making similar increases in maximum sentence where the offence is “religiously aggravated”. The Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.146 additionally provides that for sentencing purposes the court “must” treat as an aggravating factor the fact that the offender demonstrated, or was (partly) motivated by, hostility to the victim based on the victim’s (actual or presumed) sexual orientation, disability or transgender identity.

Another characteristic of violent crimes is that women are also more likely to be victims of crime than they are to be offenders and are more likely than men to be assaulted by someone they know. As Cretney and Davis say:

“Assaults are overwhelmingly perpetrated by men. Men in public use violence against other males, whom they may not know. In private they assault women, whom they do know.”¹⁷

Data published by the Home Office shows that while men are more likely to be the victims of violence from a stranger, women are more likely to be the victim of domestic violence.¹⁸ For both males and females, those aged between 16 and 24 are most likely to be the victims of violence, though within this age group males were twice as likely to be the victim of violence as females.¹⁹ Much of this violence is associated with the lifestyles of the persons concerned. Younger people are more likely to go to pubs and clubs and other places of entertainment where alcohol is consumed²⁰ and spend some time on the streets at night, these factors being well-documented predictors of victimisation.²¹ Many such cases involve fighting where there might have been victim precipitation of the assault. The reporting and prosecution rate for such violence is particularly low.²² The CSEW reveals a similar profile for offenders committing acts of violence. In 2015, 46% of offenders in violent incidents were believed to be aged 25–39 and 81% were male.²³

It is often stated that society is becoming more violent, a perception that is frequently portrayed through certain media outlets,²⁴ but there is little empirical evidence to show that this is true. As noted above, the CSEW has documented a 66% decrease in violent crime since 1995; the level being lower now than when the crime survey began in 1982.²⁵ This means that statistics on actual violent crimes (as compared to recorded figures) suggest that we are now living in a less violent society than the generation before us. Such statistics do not mean, however, that violence is becoming a thing of the past. It is therefore important that the criminal law remains responsive to the differing forms of violence that continue to pervade our ever-expanding society.

B. THE LAW

1. Introduction

There are many offences involving personal violence, ranging from “mainstream” offences such as causing grievous bodily harm, through kidnapping and administering poison to those such as assaulting a clergyman in the execution of his duties.

The main offences, which are mostly statutory, will be considered as these represent an ideal forum for considering how the law deals with the various configurations of degrees of harm and levels of mens rea. The offences are ranked in some sort of hierarchy of seriousness: the extent to which this ordering is based on principle will emerge as the offences are examined. As we shall see, they range from “the merest touching of another in anger”,²⁶ to injuries which fall only just short of death. As several of the offences contain the basic element of assault, and as it constitutes the lowest rung in the hierarchy of seriousness, this will be examined first.

2. Common assault and battery

7-004

The terms “common assault”, “assault” and “battery” are often used interchangeably by laymen and even lawyers. This terminological confusion which causes “angels [to] prepare to dance on needles and legal pedants [to] sharpen their quill pens”²⁷ is compounded by statute. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.39 refers to “common assault and battery” as two separate offences while s.40(3) refers only to a “common assault”. In Lynsey,²⁸ it was held that this latter phrase includes a battery and in Ireland; Burstow,²⁹ it was held that the term “assault” in the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.47 includes both a common assault and battery.

Clearly then there is a lack of clarity in terminology. Students instead should remember that, strictly speaking, there are two separate crimes³⁰: “common assault” and “battery”, which collectively are commonly referred to as simply “common assault”, but can also be referred to merely as “assault”. To confuse matters further the common law often refers to the statutory labelled offence of common assault as “technical assault” (examined further below). While both common assault and battery are statutory offences,³¹ the statute contains no definition of either and one therefore has to turn to the common law to discover their constituent elements.³² In its most basic form, a common assault (technical assault) can be defined as putting someone in fear of immediate force, whereas a battery is the actual infliction of force on a person. To avoid confusion in this book, the term “assault” is used in its broad generic sense as encompassing either of these specific crimes and the two specific offences will be referred to as “technical assault” and “battery”.

Both these offences are only triable summarily (in the magistrates’ court) and subject to a maximum penalty of six months’ imprisonment.³³ These offences can be used in many cases where injury has resulted and a more serious charge could have been brought. The CPS Charging Standards state that where there is no injury or where injuries are not serious, the offence charged should generally be common assault. Where there is serious injury and the likely sentence is clearly more than six months’ imprisonment a more serious charge should be brought.³⁴ There are significant advantages to trial in the magistrates’ court instead of the Crown Court; the CPS perceives this as being quicker and cheaper, more likely to result in conviction and, particularly in the context of domestic violence, involving a less onerous task for the victim/witness.³⁵

Under the Criminal Law Act 1967 s.6, common assault is an alternative verdict to more serious charges of aggravated assault even if the count has not been included in the indictment.

(i) Technical assault

7–005

This offence is committed when the defendant intentionally or recklessly causes the victim to apprehend imminent force.

(a) Actus reus

7–006

The defendant must do something to make the victim apprehend imminent force. It is often stated that the victim must fear an immediate attack. This latter formulation, while descriptive of most situations of technical assault, is deceptive for two reasons. First, the victim need not be placed in “fear” in the sense of being frightened; he might be confident of his ability to repel the attack. He is nevertheless assaulted as he is made to apprehend the force. Secondly, he need not apprehend an “attack” in the sense of a severe measure of aggressive or destructive force; he need only apprehend any degree of force, which, as we shall see, in some circumstances need amount to little more than an unlawful touching.

Can mere words amount to an assault?

7-007

While it has always been clear that physical gestures such as shaking a fist or pointing a gun at the victim would suffice, there used to be doubt as to whether words could constitute an assault. This issue has been resolved in the following decision.

R. v IRELAND; R. v BURSTOW [1998]
A.C. 147 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

7-008

In the first appeal, the defendant made repeated silent telephone calls, mostly at night, to three women. Sometimes, he resorted to heavy breathing. As a result, the women suffered psychiatric illness. He was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm, contrary to the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.47. One of the issues on appeal was whether such conduct could amount to an assault.

LORD STEYN:

“The proposition that a gesture may amount to an assault, but that words can never suffice, is unrealistic and indefensible. A thing said is also a thing done. There is no reason why something said should be incapable of causing an apprehension of immediate personal violence, e.g. a man accosting a woman in a dark alley saying ‘come with me or I will stab you’. I would, therefore, reject the proposition that an assault can never be committed by words.”

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD:

“[I]t is not true to say that mere words or gestures can never constitute an assault. It all depends on the circumstances ... The words or gestures must be seen in their whole context.

In this case the means which the appellant used to communicate with his victims was the telephone. While he remained silent, there can be no doubt that he was intentionally communicating with them as directly as if he was present with them in the same room. But whereas for him merely to remain silent with them in the same room, where they could see him and assess his demeanour, would have been unlikely to give rise to any feelings of apprehension on their part, his silence when using the telephone in calls made to them repeatedly was an act of an entirely different character. He was using his silence as a means of conveying a message to his victims. This was that he knew who and where they were, and that his purpose in making contact with them was as malicious as it was deliberate. In my opinion silent telephone calls of this nature are just as capable as words or gestures, said or made in the presence of the victim, of causing an apprehension of immediate and unlawful violence.”

Appeals dismissed

7-009

Another rule has long been beyond doubt: words may negate an assault. In Tuberville v Savage,³⁶ the defendant placed his hand on his sword hilt and exclaimed to the victim: “If it were not assize-time, I would not take such language from you”. This was held not to be an assault. The words accompanying the action (of placing the hand on the sword) clearly demonstrated that because the assize judge was in town, the defendant was not going to use his sword. There could thus be no apprehension of immediate force.

Conditional and empty threats

7-010

The situation in Tuberville v Savage must be carefully distinguished from cases involving a conditional threat, such as *Read v Coker*³⁷ where it was held to be an assault to threaten to break the victim’s neck if he did not leave the premises. In such a case, there is a threat to use immediate force; the victim does apprehend immediate force and the onus is on him to do something to avert that force. If the rule were otherwise it would mean there could be no assault where a robber says “Your money or your life”; such a position would be intolerable.

Another point to be considered is the stance that the law takes in relation to empty threats. For example, a victim might be threatened with a toy gun or an unloaded gun. In Bentham, the defendant placed his hand inside his jacket causing a bulge to give the impression he had a gun and threatened to shoot unless the victim handed over money and jewellery.³⁸ Understandably, the law regards this fact as immaterial as long as the victim is made to fear an attack³⁹; after all, the victim cannot be expected to know whether the threat is real or not.

Immediacy of the threat

7-011

The victim must apprehend the imminent use of force. It is a serious gap in the law that it is no offence whatsoever to tell someone that you intend to break both their legs the next day rather than there and then.⁴⁰ The Law Commission's recent report on Offences Against the Person⁴¹ proposes an amendment to the law, referring to the Draft Offences against the Person Bill 1998 cl.10 which extends threatening to kill to include non-immediate threats to cause serious injury.⁴² One of the consequences of this present gap, has been the development by the courts of a broad interpretation of "imminence" or "immediacy". In Smith,⁴³ it was held that a woman had been assaulted when she saw a man looking through her closed bed sitting room window at night. Although he was outside her room and would have had to break or force open her window and climb in before he could have actually inflicted violence upon her, it was held that she had apprehended a sufficiently immediate application of force. In *Siadatan*⁴⁴ it was stated that "immediate" (for purposes of the Public Order Act 1986 s.4) "connotes proximity in time and proximity in causation; that it is likely that violence will result within a reasonably short period of time and without any other intervening occurrence". This problem of imminence or immediacy is of particular importance in cases where the defendant makes silent or verbally threatening telephone calls.

R. V IRELAND; R. V BURSTOW [1998]
A.C. 147 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

LORD STEYN:

“That brings me to the critical question whether a silent caller may be guilty of an assault. The answer to this question seems to me to be ‘Yes, depending on the facts’. It involves questions of fact within the province of the jury. After all, there is no reason why a telephone caller who says to a woman in a menacing way ‘I will be at your door in a minute or two’ may not be guilty of an assault if he causes his victim to apprehend immediate personal violence. Take now the case of the silent caller. He intends by his silence to cause fear and is so understood. The victim is assailed by uncertainty about his intentions. Fear may dominate her emotions, and it may be the fear that the caller’s arrival at her door may be imminent. She may fear the possibility of immediate personal violence. As a matter of law the caller may be guilty of an assault: whether he is or not will depend on the circumstance and in particular on the impact of the caller’s potentially menacing call or calls on the victim. Such a prosecution case under section 47 may be fit to leave to the jury. And a trial judge may, depending on the circumstances, put a common sense consideration before jury, namely what, if not the possibility of imminent personal violence, was the victim terrified about? I conclude that an assault may be committed in the particular factual circumstances which I have envisaged.”

Appeals dismissed

This decision is best understood in the context of events leading up to the appeal. For at least two years prior to the House of Lords’ judgment the media had been conducting a high-profile campaign against stalking.

The development of separate harassment and stalking offences

HOME OFFICE, STALKING—THE SOLUTIONS: A CONSULTATION PAPER (1996):

“1.2 Stalking ... can be broadly described as a series of acts which are intended to, or in fact, cause harassment to another person.

1.4 Stalkers can have a devastating effect on the lives of their victims, who can be subjected to constant harassment at home, in public places, and at work, to the extent that they can feel that they are no longer in control of their lives ...

1.6 The methods employed by stalkers can take many forms ... [such as] making obscene telephone calls, using abusive and threatening language, or committing acts of violence ... However, frequently stalkers do not overtly threaten their victims but use behaviour which is ostensibly routine and harmless and therefore not caught by existing laws. But even apparently innocuous behaviour, such as following someone down the street, or sending them flowers, can be intimidating if it is persistently inflicted on a victim against their will. This is one of the defining characteristics of stalking: irrespective of the nature of its component acts, stalking can be distressing and threatening to a victim because of its sheer, oppressive persistence ...

1.8 ... The National Anti-Stalking and Harassment campaign (NASH) report that over 7,000 victims of stalking telephoned their helpline between January 1994 and November 1995. Stalking affects both women and men, although NASH estimates that about 95 per cent of victims are women.”

Responding to the media clamour for more effective criminal laws against stalking, the Government enacted the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 which introduced two criminal offences of harassment.⁴⁵ Section 2 creates the offence of harassment which is committed where a person pursues a course of conduct (in breach of s.1(1) or 1(A)) on at least two occasions which amounts to harassment of another and which the defendant knows or ought to know amounts to harassment. This offence carries a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment. The emphasis in this crime is upon the defendant's conduct and pursuit of the victim and not upon an impending attack on the victim. The Act does not define harassment specifically. In Tuppen,⁴⁶ Douglas Brown J held that as the Act does not define “harassment” it was legitimate for the court to have recourse to Parliamentary records on the matter. Such records made it clear that the behaviour sought to be controlled was conduct such as stalking, antisocial behaviour by neighbours and racial harassment. In Dowson,⁴⁷ Simon J held, after an extensive review of the relevant authorities, that for conduct to constitute harassment within the Act:

“A line is to be drawn between conduct which is unattractive and unreasonable, and conduct which has been described in various ways: ‘torment’ of the victim, ‘of an order which would sustain criminal liability’ ...”

Such conduct must also be “objectively judged to be oppressive and unacceptable”.⁴⁸ What is deemed to be oppressive and unacceptable may “depend on the social or working context in which the conduct occurs”.⁴⁹

Section 4(1) of the Act also creates the more serious offence of pursuing a course of conduct (on at least two occasions) which causes another to fear, on at least two occasions, that violence will be used against them. The defendant will be liable if he knows or ought to know that his course of conduct will cause the other so to fear on each of those occasions. The maximum penalty is five years’ imprisonment.⁵⁰

7-016

The Act was more recently amended in 2012⁵¹ to include the new offence of stalking, largely the result of a Stalking Law Reform Campaign that was launched in July 2011.⁵² Under s.2A of the Act, a person is now guilty of an offence if the person pursues a course of conduct in breach of s.1(1) and the course of conduct amounts to stalking. This offence carries a maximum sentence of five years’ imprisonment.⁵³ The section does not define “stalking” but does provide a list of examples of acts and omissions which are associated with it, including: following a person; contacting, or attempting to contact, a person by any means; publishing any statement or other material relating or purporting to relate to a person, or purporting to originate from a person; monitoring the use by a person of the internet, email or any other form of electronic communication; loitering in any place (whether public or private); interfering with any property in the possession of a person; watching or spying on a person.⁵⁴ Section 4A also creates the offence of “stalking involving fear of violence or serious alarm or distress”. The defendant’s course of conduct must amount to stalking, and either cause another to fear, on at least two occasions, that violence will be used against another⁵⁵, or causes another serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on his or her usual day-to-day activities. The defendant will only be guilty of such an offence if he knows or ought to know that his course of conduct will cause the victim to fear violence on each of those occasions, or, as the case may be, that his actions will cause alarm or distress.⁵⁶ The defendant ought to know his conduct will cause fear or alarm or distress if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct would cause the victim fear, or alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on the victim’s usual day-to-day activities.⁵⁷

It is likely that offenders such as Ireland would now be pursued either under the harassment or stalking offences. However, the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 was not in force at the time of the Ireland prosecution and, in any event, Lord Steyn described the original harassment offences as “not ideally suited” to deal with the case before him where the victim only feared that violence might be used against her. Under s.4 of the Act there has to be fear that violence will be used.⁵⁸ It was against this background that the appeal in Ireland was heard. Lord Steyn commenced his judgment by outlining the “significant social problem” of harassment of women by repeated silent telephone calls and immediately pronounced that it was “selfevident” that the criminal law had to be capable of dealing with the problem. His stance was clear. If the law of assault had to be stretched beyond all previously recognised limits, then so be it. Ireland’s appeal was doomed from the start. However, as shall be explained, the law has not been radically altered and securing a conviction of similar telephone callers is still no simple matter.

Stalking as technical assault

As seen in the Ireland extract above, Lord Steyn accepted the basic definition of an assault involving the apprehension of imminent personal violence—with “violence” meaning physical violence. The only extension of the law was his ruling that the victim need only fear the possibility of immediate personal violence. She needs only fear that “the caller’s arrival at her door may be imminent”. On the facts of the particular appeal, the House of Lords was able to side-step the problem of immediacy on the basis that Ireland had pleaded guilty at his trial.⁵⁹ In other cases, however, this problem will not be easily overcome. If a victim has received hundreds of phone calls and none of them has been followed by “the caller’s arrival at her door”, it will be extremely difficult to establish that the victim genuinely feared the possibility of immediate personal violence. In Ramos,⁶⁰ it was held that it was “the state of mind of the victims which is crucial rather than the statistical risk of violence actively occurring within a short space of time”. Nevertheless, the more incidents that have not been followed up by violence, the less plausible the claimed apprehension becomes. Further, even in extreme cases where the seriousness of the threats increases, such as *Cox*⁶¹ where after “hundreds of incidents” the caller told the victim that before she went on holiday, she was “going to her death”, it is going to be no less difficult to establish that she feared there and then the possibility of immediate personal violence—as opposed to fearing violence at some time and at some place in the future. These difficulties were conceded by Lord Steyn when he concluded:

“I nevertheless accept that the concept of an assault involving immediate personal violence as an ingredient of the section 47 offence is a considerable complicating factor in bringing prosecutions under it in respect of silent telephone callers and stalkers. That the least serious of the ladder of offences is difficult to apply in such cases is unfortunate.”

A similar unduly broad approach was adopted by the Court of Appeal in *Constanza*⁶² (a case decided a few months before, and not referred to in, Ireland). This case involved a stalker who made repeated silent telephone calls and sent 800 letters culminating in two further letters which the victim interpreted as clear threats. It was held that the assault was committed when the victim read these latter letters as there was a “fear of violence at some time not excluding the immediate future”. This is similar to Lord Steyn’s test that the victim need only fear the possibility of immediate personal violence. This is surely going too far. While the recipient of a telephone call might well fear that the call is from a mobile phone and that the caller will be at her door “in a minute or two”,⁶³ it seems inconceivable that she would apprehend such immediate violence upon receipt of a letter.

This whole approach adopted by the House of Lords is misguided and involves stretching the existing concept of assault too far. The central problem with these cases is that they failed to capture the essence of the wrongdoing involved.⁶⁴ Lord Steyn comes close when he posed the right question: “what ... was the victim terrified of?” However, his answer—“imminent personal violence”—misses the point for most cases. Many recipients of silent or menacing telephone calls will probably not be afraid that the caller will arrive soon at the front door to inflict violence upon them. The fear is more likely to be one of future physical violence, future harassment and similar future calls increasing tension and anxiety. In short, the relentless pressure combined with fear of the unknown causes continuing psychological trauma. The Court of Appeal in *Ireland*⁶⁵ recognised this by reformulating an assault as the apprehension of immediate violence with “violence” including psychological damage. In the Court of Appeal Swinton Thomas LJ stated:

“[W]hen a telephone call is made by the appellant and the victim lifts the telephone and then knows that the man is telephoning them yet again, they will be apprehensive of suffering the very psychological damage from which they did suffer, namely palpitations, difficulty in breathing, cold sweats, anxiety, inability to sleep, dizziness, stress and the like ... [T]he fact that the violence is inflicted indirectly, causing psychological harm, does not render the act to be any less an act of violence.”

Although Lord Hope rejected this view in the House of Lords, it does not mean such phone calls will fall outside the offence of assault. He notes:

“In my opinion silent telephone calls of this nature are ... capable ... of causing an apprehension of immediate and unlawful violence ... Whether this requirement, and in particular that of immediacy, is in fact satisfied will depend on the circumstances. This will need in each case, if it is disputed, to be explored in evidence.”⁶⁶

(b) Mens rea

7-019

The defendant must intentionally or recklessly cause his victim to apprehend the infliction of immediate force.⁶⁷ Thus if he intends to alarm his victim, or is reckless thereto, the mens rea requirement is satisfied, even if he never intended to carry out the threat.

What is meant by recklessness here? In DPP v K,⁶⁸ it was held that the Caldwell meaning applied. However, this was disapproved in *Spratt*⁶⁹ where it was held that the subjective Cunningham test of recklessness applied, i.e. did the defendant foresee putting the victim in apprehension of imminent force and continue regardless of this risk? The House of Lords, in the leading case of Savage; Parmenter,⁷⁰ did not deal with this issue, possibly indicating an acceptance that the Spratt line of cases represents the law and that Cunningham recklessness is required.⁷¹ Although the leading House of Lords' decision in *G*⁷² restricts itself to criminal damage, it is widely accepted that the subjective meaning of recklessness there endorsed will be applicable throughout the criminal law.⁷³

(ii) Battery

7-020

A battery is the intentional or reckless infliction of unlawful personal force by one person upon another. While a technical assault is the threatening of such force, a battery is the actual infliction of the force.

(a) Actus reus

7-021

The defendant must inflict unlawful personal force. It is often assumed that the force inflicted must be injurious for the offence to be completed. The courts have made it clear that this need not necessarily be the case.

The meaning of “force”

WILSON V PRINGLE [1986] 2 ALL E.R.
440 (COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION):

7-022

CROOM-JOHNSON LJ:

“In our view the authorities lead to the conclusion that in a battery there must be an intentional touching or contact in one form or another of the plaintiff by the defendant. That touching must be proved to be a hostile touching. That still leaves unanswered the question, when is a touching to be called hostile? Hostility cannot be equated with ill-will or malevolence. It cannot be governed by the obvious intention shown in acts like punching, stabbing or shooting. It cannot be solely governed by an expressed intention, although that may be strong evidence. But the element of hostility, in the sense in which it is now to be considered, must be a question of fact for the tribunal of fact ...

Although we are all entitled to protection from physical molestation, we live in a crowded world in which people must be considered as taking on themselves some risk of injury (where it occurs) from the acts of others which are not in themselves unlawful.”

7-023

This was approved by the House of Lords in Brown.⁷⁴ Lord Jauncey, however, unhelpfully added that if the defendant’s actions are unlawful they are necessarily hostile. Thus, because it is unlawful to cause injuries in the course of sado-masochistic activities, the element of hostility is satisfied. Such circular reasoning defies explanation. To say that injuries are inflicted with hostility when they have been consented to is to deprive the word “hostility” of any literal meaning. A better approach was adopted by Lord Mustill, dissenting in Brown, who stated that hostility was not a crucial matter in determining guilt or innocence, “although its presence or absence may be relevant when the court has to decide as a matter of policy how to react to a new situation”.⁷⁵

Several further matters need consideration. First, while many of the cases speak of “force” or “violence”, it is clear that any unlawful touching suffices. So, taking a person’s arm firmly to escort them out of a garden is capable of amounting to a battery.⁷⁶ Secondly, in the “crowded world” (Wilson v Pringle) of today where there is much pushing or jostling in queues, etc there is a “general exception embracing all physical contact which is generally acceptable in the ordinary conduct of daily life”.⁷⁷ Thirdly, a battery involves the application of physical force upon the victim. Actual touching is not necessary. For example, in Lynsey,⁷⁸ there was a battery when the defendant spat in the face of a police officer. However, the force must be physical. In Ireland; Burstow it was held that silent telephone calls resulting in psychiatric injury could not constitute a battery.⁷⁹

Fourthly, it used to be thought that a battery could not be committed by omission.⁸⁰ However, in Santana-Bermudez, a defendant was held liable when he failed to warn a police officer searching him that he had hypodermic needles in his pockets and her finger was pierced by a needle. Maurice Kay J was critical of the “undesirable complexity [that] has bedevilled our criminal law as a result of quasi-theological distinctions between acts and omissions” and simply ruled that:

“[W]here someone (by act or word or by a combination of the two) creates a danger and thereby exposes another to a reasonably foreseeable risk of injury which materialises, there is an evidential basis for the actus reus of an assault occasioning actual bodily harm ...”⁸¹

However, it is unclear from this whether liability was based on his omission (with him being under a duty to tell her about the needles because he had created a dangerous situation) or on the fiction of a continuing act (putting the needles in his pocket was an act which continued until the police officer injured herself). The rather limited ratio of the case seems to suggest that there will be no liability for an omission in other situations where there is a duty to act: for example, where a mother (who did not create the dangerous situation) fails to rescue her child who suffers actual bodily harm as a consequence.

Indirect force

7-024

A final issue is whether the force need be applied directly. Is it necessary, for example, that the defendant physically come into contact with the victim with his fist, spittle or some weapon? Older authorities⁸² suggest that this was indeed the case (although “direct” was interpreted with a certain amount of flexibility). However, the case of *Martin*⁸³ can be read as dispensing with the requirement of direct force. In this case, the defendant barred the exit to a theatre with an iron bar, turned off the lights and shouted “fire”. Some people subsequently were injured when they were crushed against the exit in the panic to escape. The defendant was convicted under the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.20 of inflicting grievous bodily harm (an offence then thought to require proof of an assault).

The decision of Wilson,⁸⁴ however, interpreted Martin somewhat differently as supporting the view that “to inflict” grievous bodily harm under s.20 does not necessitate an assault taking place. On the issue of whether an assault itself necessitates direct force, Lord Roskill in Wilson approved a passage from the Australian decision of *Salisbury*⁸⁵ where a distinction was drawn between “directly and violently” inflicting a harm (an assault) and inflicting harm that was “not itself a direct application of force to the body of the victim, [but] does directly result in force being applied violently to the body of the victim” (not an assault). The House of Lords in Savage; Parmenter, albeit obiter, endorsed this approach in holding that there would be no assault in cases like Martin or where a defendant had interfered with the breaking mechanism of a car thereby causing an accident and injuries to the driver. Further, in *Ireland; Burstow*⁸⁶ Lord Hope stated that a battery could not be committed over the telephone because there was no physical contact between the defendant and the victim.

On the other hand, the following case clearly suggests that a battery can be committed even if the force is applied indirectly.⁸⁷

DPP v K (A MINOR) (1990) 91 CR.
APP. R. 23 (QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

7-025

The defendant, a 15-year-old schoolboy, was carrying out an experiment using concentrated sulphuric acid in a chemistry class at school when he splashed some of the acid on his hand. He was given permission to go to the toilet to wash it off and without his teacher's knowledge, took a test-tube of the acid with him to test its reaction on some toilet paper. While he was in the toilet he heard footsteps in the corridor and in a panic poured the acid into a hot air drier to conceal it. He returned to his class intending to return later to remove it and wash out the drier. Before he could do so another pupil used the drier. Acid squirted onto his face causing a permanent scar. The defendant was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm but was acquitted because he had not intended to harm anyone. The prosecution appealed by way of case stated.

PARKER LJ:

“[I]n my judgment there can be no doubt that if a defendant places acid into a machine with the intent that it shall, when the next user switches the machine on, be ejected onto him and do him harm there is an assault when the harm is done. The position was correctly and simply stated by Stephen J in R. v Clarence (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 23 at 45, where he said:

‘If a man laid a trap for another into which he fell after an interval, the man who laid it would during the interval be guilty of an attempt to assault, and of an actual assault as soon as the man fell in.’

This illustration was also referred to by Wills J in the same case in relation to s.20 of the 1861 Act. Wills J there also referred to R. v Martin (1881) 8 Q.B.D. 54, saying:

‘The prisoner in that case did what was certain to make people crush one another, perhaps to death, and the grievous bodily harm was as truly inflicted by him as if he had hurled a stone at somebody’s head.’

In the same way a defendant who pours a dangerous substance into a machine just as truly assaults the next user of the machine as if he had himself switched the machine on.”

Appeal allowed

7-026

In Haystead, the defendant punched a woman who was holding a child. The child fell from her arms and hit his head on the floor. The main argument on appeal was whether there could be a battery when force was indirectly applied. In a highly ambiguous judgment it was indicated that this “may well be” so, but it was unnecessary to decide as, on the facts, there was a direct application of force even though there was no physical contact with the child:

“[dropping] the child was entirely and immediately the result of the appellant’s action in punching her. There is no difference in logic or good sense between the facts of this case and one where the defendant might have used a weapon to fell the child to the floor.”⁸⁸

It is to be hoped that the decision in DPP v K will be followed. The actions of a person who leaves acid in a hot air drier (which will inevitably be used by someone) seem morally indistinguishable from those of a person who throws acid directly at another.

(b) Mens rea

7-027

The defendant must intentionally or recklessly inflict force upon the victim.

R. V VENNA [1976] Q.B. 421 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

7-028

JAMES LJ:

“In our view the element of mens rea in the offence of battery is satisfied by proof that the defendant intentionally or recklessly applied force to the person of another ...

We see no reason in logic or in law why a person who recklessly applies physical force to the person of another should be outside the criminal law of assault. In many cases the dividing line between intention and recklessness is barely distinguishable.”

7-029

The same arguments considered in relation to technical assault apply here with the prevailing consensus being that recklessness bears its “subjective” Cunningham meaning. In *D v DPP*⁸⁹ it was stated that recklessness involves foresight of the risk of unlawful force and the taking of that risk.

(iii) Punishment

7-030

A common assault is punishable upon summary conviction by a fine of up to (currently) £5,000 and/or six months’ imprisonment. The offence is no longer triable upon indictment.⁹⁰ The Magistrates’ Courts Sentencing Guidelines provide that the starting point where there is lesser culpability and lesser harm is a fine (Category 3). This is increased to a medium level community order where there is either greater harm or greater culpability (Category 2) and a high level community order where there is greater harm and greater culpability (Category 1). The maximum sentence for Category 1 is 26 weeks’ custody.⁹¹

3. Aggravated assaults

The more serious offences of violence are commonly termed “aggravated assaults” although, as we shall see, for some of these offences it is not necessary to prove the existence of an assault. Some assaults are aggravated because of the circumstances in which they are committed, for example, assault with intent to resist arrest⁹² or because of the identity of the victim, for example, assault on a police constable in the execution of his duty⁹³ or assault on an Immigration Officer.⁹⁴ The following three sections deal with the core aggravated assaults which can be committed in any circumstances and against any victim; the chapter then examines the law dealing with “racially or religiously aggravated” assaults and finally the causing of serious injury by dangerous driving.

(i) Assault occasioning actual bodily harm

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON ACT 1861 S.47:

“Whosoever shall be convicted on indictment⁹⁵ of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable ... to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding five years.”

(a) Actus reus

Three conditions need to be satisfied here. First, there must be an “assault”. This means there must be either a technical assault or a battery.⁹⁶ Secondly, this assault must “occasion” or cause actual bodily harm. For example, in Roberts,⁹⁷ the defendant tried to pull a girl’s coat off in a moving car. She jumped out of the car and was injured. Here there was a common assault and she had suffered actual bodily harm. The sole issue in this case was whether causation had been established.⁹⁸ Where it is alleged that the actual bodily harm has been caused by a technical assault (as opposed to a battery) it must be established that it was the apprehension of imminent force—as opposed to general fear and upset—that caused the actual bodily harm.⁹⁹

What is actual bodily harm?

7-034

Actual bodily harm includes “any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with health or comfort”.¹⁰⁰ In Chan-Fook it was held that the words “actual bodily harm” were ordinary words generally requiring no elaboration:

“The word ‘harm’ is a synonym for injury. The word ‘actual’ indicates that the injury (although there is no need for it to be permanent) should not be so trivial as to be wholly insignificant.”¹⁰¹

Accordingly, as long as it is not “wholly insignificant”, almost any injury will suffice and indeed may simply be inferred from the facts of the case as in Taylor v Granville.¹⁰² The evidence established that the defendant had struck the victim on the face and it was held that bruising must, at the least, have been thereby caused; such a finding clearly fell within the definition of actual bodily harm. In R. (on the application of T) v DPP,¹⁰³ it was held that a momentary loss of consciousness could amount to actual bodily harm as it involved an injurious impairment to the victim’s sensory functions.

DPP v SMITH [2006] 2 CR. APP. R. 1
(QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

7-035

The defendant cut off a girl’s pony tail without her consent. The justices accepted that this could not amount to actual bodily harm. The prosecution appealed by way of case stated.

SIR IGOR JUDGE P:

“16 ... In ordinary language, ‘harm’ is not limited to ‘injury’, and according to the Concise Oxford English Dictionary extends to ‘hurt’ or ‘damage’. According to the same dictionary, ‘bodily’, whether used as an adjective or an adverb, is ‘concerned with the body’. ‘Actual’, as defined in the authorities, means that the bodily harm should not be so trivial or trifling as to be effectively without significance.

17. Recent authority shows that evidence of external bodily injury, or a break in or bruise to the surface of the skin, is not required ... It follows that physical pain consequent on an assault is not a necessary ingredient of this offence.

18. In my judgment, whether it is alive beneath the surface of the skin or dead tissue above the surface of the skin, the hair is an attribute and part of the human body. It is intrinsic to each individual and to the identity of each individual. Although it is not essential to my decision, I note that an individual’s hair is relevant to his or her autonomy. Some regard it as their crowning glory. Admirers may so regard it in the object of their affections. Even if, medically and scientifically speaking, the hair above the surface of the scalp is no more than dead tissue, it remains part of the body and is attached to it. While it is so attached, in my judgment it falls within the meaning of ‘bodily’ in the phrase ‘actual bodily harm’. It is concerned with the body of the individual victim.

19. In my judgment, the defendant’s actions in cutting of a substantial part of the victim’s hair in the course of an assault on her—like putting paint on it or some unpleasant substance which marked or damaged it without causing injury elsewhere—is capable of amounting to an assault which occasions actual bodily harm.”

Appeal allowed

7-036

While there is much to be said for the court’s reasoning in this case, it is extraordinary that the charge here was for s.47 rather than for common assault. This case demonstrates the ease with which a common assault (punishable by a maximum of six months’ imprisonment) can be transformed into an offence punishable by up to five years’ imprisonment. The CPS Charging Standard states that:

“In determining whether or not the injuries are serious, relevant factors may include, for example, the fact that there has been significant medical intervention and/or permanent effects have resulted. Examples may include cases where there is the need for a number of stitches (but not the superficial application of steri-strips) or a hospital procedure under anaesthetic.”¹⁰⁴

The cutting off of a pony tail, while perhaps very upsetting, cannot possibly be regarded as requiring significant medical intervention. This case also gives rise to a slightly bizarre anomaly. As noted above a victim can only consent to harm (which is more than merely trivial and trifling) that has occurred in the course of an activity that has been accepted by the case law as providing a lawful excuse for the injury or risk of injury. Examples provided in Brown include sport, horseplay, tattooing and surgery. Extensive case searches did not reveal any case law on hairdressing.

Psychiatric harm

7-037

What is the position where the defendant’s conduct causes psychiatric illness? Previously the test of “any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with health or comfort” was thought to include hysterical and nervous conditions and shock. This position has now been qualified.

R. V IRELAND; R. V BURSTOW [1998] A.C. 147 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

7-038

In Ireland, the victims of repeated silent telephone calls suffered psychiatric illness. The defendant was charged with an assault occasioning actual bodily harm under s.47. In Burstow, the victim of an eight-month stalking campaign suffered from a severe depressive illness. The defendant was charged with unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.20. Both were convicted and appealed.

LORD STEYN:

“The appeals under consideration do not involve structural injuries to the brain such as might require the intervention of a neurologist. One is also not considering either psychotic illness or personality disorders ... The case was that they developed mental disturbances of a lesser order, namely neurotic disorders. For present purposes the relevant forms of neurosis are anxiety disorders and depressive disorders. Neuroses must be distinguished from simple states of fear, or problems in coping with everyday life. Where the line is to be drawn must be a matter of psychiatric judgment. But for present purposes it is important to note that modern psychiatry treats neuroses as recognisable psychiatric illnesses ... [N]eurotic illnesses affect the central nervous system of the body, because emotions such as fear and anxiety are brain functions ...

[I]n Chan-Fook the Court of Appeal squarely addressed the question whether psychiatric injury may amount to bodily harm under section 47 of the 1861 Act ... Hobhouse LJ stated:

‘The first question ... is whether the inclusion of the word “bodily” in the phrase “actual bodily harm” limits harm to harm to the skin, flesh and bones of the victim ... The body of the victim includes all parts of the body, including his organs, his nervous system and his brain. Bodily injury therefore may include injury to any of those parts of his body responsible for his mental and other faculties.’

In concluding that ‘actual bodily harm’ is capable of including psychiatric injury Hobhouse LJ emphasised that:

‘it does not include mere emotions such as fear or distress or panic nor does it include, as such, states of mind that are not themselves evidence of some identifiable clinical condition.’

He observed that in the absence of psychiatric evidence a question whether or not an assault occasioned psychiatric injury should not be left to the jury ...

In my view the ruling in [Chan-Fook] was based on principled and cogent reasoning and it marked a sound and essential clarification of the law. I would hold that ‘bodily harm’ in ss.18, 20 and 47 must be interpreted so as to include recognisable psychiatric illness.”

In Morris,¹⁰⁵ the conviction of a stalker, who had allegedly caused his victim to suffer pains, sleeplessness, tension and fear of being alone, was quashed because the trial judge had allowed the issue of whether the assault had occasioned psychiatric injury to be left to the jury without expert evidence. Even with respect to her physical pains, psychiatric evidence should have been adduced to testify that they were the result of the defendant's non-physical attack.

In Dhaliwal,¹⁰⁶ a clear distinction was drawn between psychological injury (for example, palpitations, breathing difficulties, cold sweats, anxiety, inability to sleep and so on) and recognisable psychiatric illness. Only the latter can constitute bodily harm. It was stated that any blurring of this distinction would introduce uncertainty into the law. As Horder and McGowan state:

“[This is] the serious difficulty ... of drawing a distinction in any given case between genuine psychological harm, and the normal human emotions of grief, anxiety, fear, and so forth (even if relatively severe). It seems unlikely that we have yet reached a stage where, in the absence of some further consideration such as a threat to public order, unjustifiably and culpably to cause another to experience severe emotional disturbance should be regarded as a criminal wrong.”¹⁰⁷

(b) Mens rea

7-040

Section 47 makes no express reference to any mens rea requirement, but it is settled that liability is established if the defendant has the mens rea of common assault.

R. V SAVAGE; DPP V PARMENTER
[1992] 1 A.C. 699 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

7-041

In the first appeal, the appellant, Mrs Savage, threw a pint glass full of beer over Miss Beal. The glass slipped out of her hand, broke, and a piece of it cut Miss Beal's wrist. Savage was convicted of unlawful wounding contrary to the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.20. The Court of Appeal partially allowed her appeal substituting a verdict of assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to s.47 of the Act. She appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD ACKNER:

“[Mrs Savage assaulted Miss Beal when she threw beer over her. Her actions also caused actual bodily harm: the cut wrist.] Was the offence thus established or is there a further mental state that has to be established in relation to the bodily harm element of the offence? Clearly the section, by its terms, expressly imposes no such requirement. Does it do so by necessary implication? It uses neither the word ‘intentionally’ or ‘maliciously’. The words ‘occasioning actual bodily harm’ are descriptive of the word ‘assault’, by reference to a particular kind of consequence ...

[His Lordship then discussed Roberts (above, 117) where it was held that] once the assault was established, the only remaining question was whether the victim’s conduct was the natural consequence of that assault. The word ‘occasioning’ raised solely a question of causation, an objective question which does not involve inquiring into the accused’s state of mind. In R. v Spratt [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1073 McCowan LJ said, at 1082:

‘However, the history of the interpretation of the Act of 1861 shows that, whether or not the word “maliciously” appears in the section in question, the courts have consistently held that the mens rea of every type of offence against the person covers both actual intent and recklessness, in the sense of taking the risk of harm ensuing with foresight that it might happen.’

McCowan LJ then quotes a number of authorities for that proposition ... [However] none of the cases cited were concerned with the mental element required in s.47 cases. Nevertheless, the Court of Appeal in R. v Parmenter [1991] 2 W.L.R. 408 [approved] the decision in R. v Spratt [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1073 ...

My Lords, in my respectful view, the Court of Appeal in Parmenter were wrong in approving the decision in Spratt’s case. The decision in Roberts’s case was correct. The verdict of assault occasioning actual bodily harm may be returned upon proof of an assault together with proof of the fact that actual bodily harm was occasioned by the assault. The prosecution are not obliged to prove that the defendant intended to cause some actual bodily harm or was reckless as to whether such harm would be caused.”

Appeal in R. v Savage dismissed

7-042

There is thus no requirement that defendants foresee actual bodily harm. All that is required is that they have the mens rea of the assault, namely, intention or recklessness to cause force or apprehension of force. Recklessness here bears the same meaning as in assault. The result is that the degree of moral culpability required for s.47 and for assault is the same despite the maximum penalties for the two offences being five years' and six months' imprisonment respectively.

The effect is that s.47 is a constructive crime of “half mens rea” where the mens rea requirement does not correspond with the actus reus. Whether constructive liability is justified is a controversial matter.¹⁰⁸ What is unfortunate is that the House of Lords should simply reach this decision with no reasoning at all. Surely, we are entitled to expect their Lordships to tell us why Roberts was correct but Spratt and Parmenter (Court of Appeal) were wrong.

(c) Punishment

7-043

The maximum punishment is five years' imprisonment. The offence is triable either way. If a defendant is tried on indictment in the Crown Court the jury can return an alternative verdict of guilty of assault even if such a charge was not included in the indictment. As seen earlier, many offences that could have been charged under s.47 are in fact charged as common assault, ensuring trial in the magistrates' court. The Magistrates' Courts Sentencing Guidelines and the Sentencing Guidelines for the Crown Court provide that the starting point for assault occasioning actual bodily harm that has been categorised as lesser harm and lower culpability is a medium level community order with a sentencing range of a Band A fine—High level community order.¹⁰⁹ For Crown Courts only, the Sentencing

Guidelines state that if the assault is pre-meditated and causes relatively serious injury (greater harm and higher culpability) the starting point is one year six months' custody with a sentencing range of one–three years' custody.¹¹⁰

(ii) Malicious wounding and Inflicting grievous bodily harm

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON ACT 1861 S.20:

7–044

“Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of [an offence punishable up to a term not exceeding five years' imprisonment].”

(a) Actus reus

7–045

There must be a wounding or infliction of grievous bodily harm.

Wounding

7–046

A wound necessitates a breakage in the continuity of the whole of the outer skin, or the inner skin within the cheek or lip.¹¹¹ It does not include the rupturing of internal blood vessels.¹¹² Given medical advances it is highly questionable whether minor wounds, for example, a slight cut, should be capable of forming the basis for so serious a charge. The CPS Charging Standard states that this offence should only be charged when the wounding is considered to be “really serious”.¹¹³

Grievous bodily harm

7–047

Grievous bodily harm means nothing more technical than “really serious bodily harm”.¹¹⁴ The CPS Charging Standard lists the following as examples of such serious harm:

“injury resulting in permanent disability, loss of sensory function or visible disfigurement; broken or displaced limbs or bones, including fractured skull, compound fractures, broken cheek bone, jaw, ribs, etc; injuries which cause substantial loss of blood, usually necessitating a transfusion or result in lengthy treatment or incapacity; serious psychiatric injury. As with assault occasioning actual bodily harm, appropriate expert evidence is essential to prove the injury.”¹¹⁵

It is clear that internal injuries and infecting a person with a virus such as HIV can also amount to grievous bodily harm.¹¹⁶ Whether an injury amounts to really serious bodily harm can depend on the vulnerability of the victim. In Bollom,¹¹⁷ it was held that bruising and abrasions could amount to grievous bodily harm for an infant, an elderly or unwell person even if they would not be so regarded for a fit adult.¹¹⁸ The court held that when determining whether injuries were really serious “it was necessary to consider them in their real context”.¹¹⁹ When making such a determination the injuries need not be life-threatening, dangerous or permanent,¹²⁰ nor should the victim require medical treatment.¹²¹

Ultimately, whether any particular injury amounts to grievous bodily harm is a question of fact to be determined by the jury which means that one jury could find that, say, a broken thumb was grievous bodily harm while another jury could decide it was not.

Really serious harm must be “inflicted”

7-048

The grievous bodily harm has to be “inflicted”. Until 1983 the word “inflict” was generally interpreted¹²² to mean that it was necessary to prove that there had been an assault (a technical assault or a battery). Section 20 was truly an “aggravated assault”. For example, in Clarence,¹²³ the defendant, knowing he was suffering from venereal disease, had sexual intercourse with his wife and transmitted the disease to her. It was held that because of the wife’s consent there had been no battery and, accordingly, he could not be liable under s.20. However, the House of Lords in Wilson,¹²⁴ held that while most cases of inflicting grievous bodily harm would involve an assault, this was not a prerequisite. There could be an infliction of grievous bodily harm contrary to s.20 without an assault being committed. This same reasoning was applied in Savage; Parmenter to cases of unlawful wounding where, although it would require “quite extraordinary facts”, one can have an unlawful wounding for the purposes of s.20 without the necessity of proving an assault. It was, however, implicit in Wilson that one could only “inflict” grievous bodily harm if there were a direct or indirect application of force to the victim’s body. With regard to psychiatric injuries, this view has now been rejected.

R. V IRELAND; R. V BURSTOW [1998]
A.C. 147 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

7-049

The facts are given above at para.7-038.

LORD STEYN:

“Counsel argued that the difference in wording [between ‘causing’ in s.18 and ‘inflicting’ in s.20] reveals a difference in legislative intent: inflict is a narrower concept than cause. This argument loses sight of the genesis of ss.18 and 20 [as the various sections in the 1861 Act were taken from different Acts passed at different times] ... The difference in language is therefore not a significant factor ...

[C]ounsel ... submitted that it is inherent in the word ‘inflict’ that there must be a direct or indirect application of force to the body ... [I]n Mandair [1995] 1 A.C. 208 at 215 Lord Mackay of Clashfern L.C. observed ...: ‘In my opinion ... the word “cause” is wider or at least not narrower than the word “inflict”.’ ... I regard this observation as making clear that in the context of the 1861 Act there is no radical divergence between the meaning of the two words.

... [With regard to R. v Clarence] it must be accepted that in a case where there was direct physical contact the majority ruled that the requirement of infliction was not satisfied. This decision was never overruled. It assists counsel’s argument. But it seems to me that what detracts from the weight to be given to the dicta in R. v Clarence is that none of the judges in that case had before them the possibility of the inflicting, or causing, of psychiatric injury. The criminal law has moved on in the light of a developing understanding of the link between the body and psychiatric injury. In my judgment R. v Clarence no longer assists.

The problem is one of construction. The question is whether as a matter of current usage the contextual interpretation of 'inflict' can embrace the idea of one person inflicting psychiatric injury on another. One can without straining the language in any way answer that question in the affirmative. I am not saying that the words cause and inflict are exactly synonymous. They are not. What I am saying is that in the context of the 1861 Act one can nowadays quite naturally speak of inflicting psychiatric injury. Moreover, there is internal contextual support in the statute for this view. It would be absurd to differentiate between ss.18 and 20 in the way argued ... The interpretation and approach should so far as possible be adopted which treats the ladder of offences as a coherent body of law."

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD:

"[R. v Wilson, referring with approval to R. v Salisbury, does] not wholly resolve the issue which arises in this case, in the context of grievous bodily harm which consists only of psychiatric injury.

The question is whether there is any difference, in this context, between the word 'cause' and the word 'inflict' ... [F]or all practical purposes there is, in my opinion, no difference between these two words. [He then cited Mandair (above) with approval.] But I would add that there is this difference, that the word 'inflict' implies that the consequence of the act is something which the victim is likely to find unpleasant or harmful. The relationship between cause and effect, when the word 'cause' is used, is neutral. It may embrace pleasure as well as pain. The relationship when the word 'inflict' is used is more precise, because it invariably implies detriment to the victim of some kind.

In the context of a criminal act therefore the words 'cause' and 'inflict' may be taken to be interchangeable. As the Supreme Court of Victoria held in R. v Salisbury, it is not a necessary ingredient of the word 'inflict' that whatever causes the harm must be applied directly to the victim. It may be applied indirectly, so long as the result is that the harm is caused by what has been done. In my opinion it is entirely consistent with the ordinary use of the word ‘inflict’ in the English language to say that the appellant’s actions ‘inflicted’ the psychiatric harm from which the victim has admittedly suffered.”

Appeals dismissed

This reasoning has been extended to the causing of physical injuries.

R. V DICA [2004] 2 CR. APP. R. 28
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

7-050

The defendant, who was HIV positive, had unprotected sexual intercourse with two women as a result of which they contracted HIV. The defendant was convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm on them contrary to s.20.

JUDGE LJ:

“Such differences as may be discerned in the language used by Lord Steyn and Lord Hope respectively do not obscure the fact that this decision confirmed that even when no physical violence has been applied, directly or indirectly to the victim’s body, an offence under s.20 may be committed. Putting it another way, if the remaining ingredients of s.20 are established, the charge is not answered simply because the grievous bodily harm suffered by the victim did not result from direct or indirect physical violence. Whether the consequences suffered by the victim are physical injuries or psychiatric injuries, or a combination of the two, the ingredients of the offence prescribed by s.20 are identical. If psychiatric injury can be inflicted without direct or indirect violence, or an assault, for the purposes of s.20 physical injury may be similarly inflicted.”

7-051

In Brady,¹²⁵ the defendant was perched on a balcony railing and either lost his balance (his version of events) or jumped deliberately and landed on a woman below causing her serious injuries. The Court of Appeal affirmed that, as a result of Ireland; Burstow, “even when no physical force has been applied, directly or indirectly to the victim’s body, an offence under s.20 may be committed” (a somewhat unnecessary ruling given that physical force had been directly applied to the woman). The defence further argued that (on the defendant’s account) the injuries had not been “inflicted” because there had not been “deliberate, non-accidental conduct” by the defendant (i.e. he had accidentally fallen). The court was “reluctant to come to a concluded view” on this but, on the facts, stated that the deliberate and precarious perching on the railing was a deliberate act. This defence argument seems misplaced. Any act suffices for the actus reus of s.20 provided it causes the result and was not the product of automatism, as would have been the case if he had been pushed off the balcony. Of course, in most cases where the act was accidental, no mens rea will be established. However, if mens rea is present, there should be no requirement of “deliberate, non-accidental conduct”.

In Stranney,¹²⁶ the defendant was convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm when, as a result of very bad dangerous driving, two of the passengers in his car sustained grievous bodily harm. There was no assault in this case and the force was, at most, indirectly applied.

The difference between “inflict” and “causes”?

7-052

It is clear from all these cases that both psychiatric injury and physical injury may be inflicted without an assault and without direct or indirect force. What, then, is the difference between “inflict” in s.20 and “cause” in s.18?

Lord Steyn in Ireland; Burstow was careful to state that he was “not saying that the words cause and inflict are exactly synonymous. They are not”. The only hint as to what the difference might be is provided by Lord Hope when he stated that the word “inflict” implies that “the consequence of the act is something which the victim is likely to find unpleasant or harmful”. This is extraordinary. The word “harmful” here must refer to the victim subjectively interpreting the injury as harmful because objectively there must, of course, be grievous bodily harm; the word thus adds nothing to the word “unpleasant”. Taken literally, this seems to suggest that sado-masochistic activities such as those in *Brown*¹²⁷ cannot be prosecuted under s.20 because the victims do not find their injuries unpleasant and do not suffer “detriment”. On the contrary, they find the pain and injury pleasant and to their benefit as an expression of their sexuality. While, for rather different reasons,¹²⁸ such an approach could be welcomed, these dicta can hardly be taken to cast doubt on the well-established principles laid down in Brown. It follows that the difference between the words “cause” in s.18 and “inflict” in s.20 remains something of a mystery.

The broader implications of the decision in Ireland; Burstow are disturbing. The fact that psychiatric injury can constitute grievous bodily harm combined with the fact that no assault, nor any direct or indirect application of force, is required for s.20 raises the potential for liability in situations far removed from those traditionally associated with s.20. For example, if I fail a student’s essay with the result that he suffers a psychiatric illness, I have committed the actus reus of s.20, and if I know of his mental instability and foresee him sustaining some psychiatric injury, I have mens rea and could be liable. This is removing s.20 too far from its paradigm. While one can understand that the seriousness of psychiatric illnesses can be such that it is justifiable to conclude that they are the equivalent of serious bodily harm, liability for s.20 should be limited to cases where there has been an assault or the application of some force. This, however, is not the law since Ireland; Burstow and Dica.

Where a defendant has been charged with a s.20 offence, it has long been possible for a jury, where they were not satisfied that all the elements of s.20 have been proven, to return a verdict of guilty of s.47 as this was a “lesser included offence”,¹²⁹ that is, all the elements of the lesser offence, s.47 (an assault causing actual bodily harm), were included in the greater offence, s.20 (an assault causing grievous bodily harm). However, if the greater offence, s.20, no longer requires proof of an assault, how could the jury convict of s.47 which does require an assault? Lord Roskill in Wilson answered this by stating that while it was not necessarily so, most s.20 cases would involve an assault.

“Inflicting” therefore impliedly includes “inflicting by assault” and therefore s.47 could be a lesser included offence. This was endorsed in Savage; Parmenter. Such an approach is not surprising. Without the power to convict of lesser offences many defendants would escape liability altogether. However, the result is that in some cases a defendant can be convicted of an offence (s.47) when one of the elements of that offence (an assault) has not been proved to exist. Given the broad interpretation of assault in Ireland this is unlikely to be a common occurrence. However, as the appeal in Burstow itself demonstrates, there can be cases, particularly concerning stalking, when grievous bodily harm is inflicted without an assault. Further, serious injury can be inflicted without an assault in cases where a disease (say gonorrhoea or HIV) is transmitted as a result of consensual sexual intercourse; because of consent there would be no battery. Such situations demonstrate that it is not always appropriate to stretch the present offences against the person to cover inappropriate cases. In cases of stalking, utilisation of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 will generally be more appropriate.

(b) Mens rea

7-053

The mens rea element of s.20 is supplied by the inclusion of the word “maliciously” within the section. It has long been accepted that the terms “maliciously” and “recklessly” are synonymous. In Savage; Parmenter (below) the House of Lords endorsed the view of Professor Kenny¹³⁰ that “malice” includes:

“recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not (i.e. the accused has—foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done and yet has gone on to take the risk of it).”¹³¹

It was further ruled in this case that this subjective meaning of maliciously was not affected by Caldwell which had (for a period) introduced an objective test of recklessness. This was because “the word ‘maliciously’ in that statute was a term of legal art which imported into the concept of recklessness a special restricted meaning”. Since the overruling of Caldwell in G, it is irrelevant whether maliciously imports a special meaning to recklessness. Both clearly involve subjective foresight.

What is it that must be foreseen? In the case of Cunningham,¹³² where the charge concerned the malicious administration of a noxious thing under s.23 of the Act, the Court of Criminal Appeal interpreted “maliciously” to mean that the defendant had to foresee the particular kind of harm that might be done and that he nevertheless went on to take the risk of it occurring. It was held that the defendant had to foresee that the victim might inhale gas which the defendant knew was, or might be, noxious. In other words, the crime was one of “full mens rea”, where the mens rea “matched” or corresponded with the actus reus.

Since then, however, this principle has been considerably whittled away. In Mowatt,¹³³ it was held that it was unnecessary for the defendant to foresee a wound or grievous bodily harm. It was enough that some physical harm, albeit of a minor character, was foreseen. This approach has been endorsed by the House of Lords.

R. V SAVAGE; DPP V PARMENTER [1992] 1 A.C. 699 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

7-054

LORD ACKNER:

“4. In order to establish an offence under section 20 is it sufficient to prove that the defendant intended or foresaw the risk of some physical harm or must he intend or foresee either wounding or grievous bodily harm?”

It is convenient to set out once again the relevant part of the judgment of Diplock LJ in R. v Mowatt ...:

‘In the offence under section 20 ... for ... which [no] specific intent is required, the word “maliciously” does import ... an awareness that his act may have the consequence of causing some physical harm to some other person. That is what is meant by “the particular kind of harm” in the citation from Professor Kenny. It is quite unnecessary that the accused should have foreseen that his unlawful act might cause physical harm of the gravity described in the section, i.e. a wound or serious physical injury. It is enough that he should have foreseen that some physical harm to some person, albeit of a minor character, might result.’ (Emphasis in original)

Mr Sedley submits that this statement of the law is wrong. He contends that properly construed, the section requires foresight of a wounding or grievous bodily harm ...

The contention is apparently based on the proposition that as the actus reus of a section 20 offence is the wounding or the infliction of grievous bodily harm, the mens rea must consist of foreseeing such wounding or grievous bodily harm. But there is no such hard and fast principle. To take but two examples, the actus reus of murder is the killing of the victim, but foresight of grievous bodily harm is sufficient and indeed, such bodily harm, need not be such as to be dangerous to life. Again, in the case of manslaughter, death is frequently the unforeseen consequence of the violence used.

The argument that as section 20 and section 47 have both the same penalty, this somehow supports the proposition that the foreseen consequences must coincide with the harm actually done, overlooks the oft repeated statement that this is the irrational result of this piece-meal legislation. The Act ‘is a rag-bag of offences brought together from a wide variety of sources with no attempt, as the draftsman frankly acknowledged, to introduce consistency as to substance or as to form’: Professor Smith in his commentary on R. v Parmenter [1991] Crim.L.R.43.

If section 20 was to be limited to cases where the accused does not desire but does foresee wounding or grievous bodily harm, it would have a very limited scope. The mens rea in a section 20 crime is comprised in the word ‘maliciously’. As was pointed out by Lord Lane C.J., giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal in R. v Sullivan ... ([1981] Crim.L.R.46), the ‘particular kind of harm’ in the citation from Professor Kenny was directed to ‘harm to the person’ as opposed to ‘harm to property’. Thus it was not concerned with the degree of the harm foreseen. It is accordingly in my judgment wrong to look upon the decision in Mowatt as being in any way inconsistent with the decision in Cunningham.

My Lords, I am satisfied that the decision in Mowatt was correct and that it is quite unnecessary that the accused should either have intended or have foreseen that his unlawful act might cause physical harm of the gravity described in section 20, i.e. a wound or serious physical injury. It is enough that he should have foreseen that some physical harm to some person, albeit of a minor character, might result.”

7–055

In Brady,¹³⁴ the Court of Appeal rejected an argument that the defendant needed to foresee an “obvious and significant” risk of some injury. All that is required is awareness of a risk of injury.

Was the House of Lords justified in holding that the defendant need only foresee some harm? If the defendant only foresees some harm resulting, but is then convicted and punished for ensuing serious harm, is this not making liability and punishment dependent on luck? Horder argues that one should distinguish between “pure” luck and making one’s own luck and in the latter situation:

“[B]y doing something intended to harm V, D changes her own normative position, making the bad luck of V’s serious injury her (D’s) own. There is nothing inappropriate in holding D criminally liable for the serious injury actually inflicted, if there was any risk of such injury resulting from D’s intended conduct.”¹³⁵

Issues such as these, however, were not considered by the House of Lords. No serious attempt to justify its position was made. Simply pointing out that anomalies also exist in other areas of law is not a justification, nor is it enough for them metaphorically to shrug their shoulders by stating that the 1861 Act is simply “a rag-bag of offences” with no consistency. Such platitudes reinforce the need for statutory intervention—a matter to be dealt with shortly.

(c) Punishment

7–056

The maximum penalty is five years’ imprisonment, the same penalty as s.47. While this is irrational and seemingly distorts any structure of offences based on seriousness, in practice it is treated as a more serious offence with longer prison sentences (on average) being imposed for s.20 compared with s.47. The Magistrates' Courts Sentencing Guidelines provide that where there is a lower level of harm and culpability (such as where the act was not premeditated) the starting point is Community Order (High).¹³⁶ For Crown Courts the Sentencing Guidelines provides the same starting point of Community Order (High). However, if the offence is categorised as high level harm and high level culpability a starting point of three years is given, with a sentencing range of two years six months to four years' custody.¹³⁷

(iii) Wounding and causing grievous bodily harm with intent

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON ACT 1861 S.18:

7-057

“Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously by any means whatsoever wound or cause any grievous bodily harm to any person, with intent ... to do some grievous bodily harm to any person, or with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person, shall be guilty of [an offence and shall be liable ... to imprisonment for life].”

(a) Actus reus

7-058

The terms “wound” and “grievous bodily harm” bear the same meaning as in s.20. “Cause”, however, has never been held to imply that the injury need be the result of a common assault. Until the decision of *Wilson*¹³⁸ it was, therefore, true to say that “cause” was wider than “inflict” with the paradoxical result that it was easier to prove the actus reus of the more serious offence, s.18, than that of s.20. In Mandair,¹³⁹ the House of Lords held that “causing” was “wider or at least not narrower than the word ‘inflict’”. This statement was approved in Ireland; Burstow where it was added that there was “no radical divergence between the meaning of the two words”. Accordingly, on a s.18 charge the jury can instead convict a defendant of an offence contrary to s.20.¹⁴⁰ Research reveals that only 23% of offenders indicted under s.18 are eventually convicted of that offence, with most of the remainder being convicted of lesser offences, particularly s.20.¹⁴¹

(b) Mens rea

7-059

Two mens rea elements are contained within s.18; the offence must be committed “maliciously” and “with intent”.

1. Maliciously

7-060

In order to appreciate the significance of this term in s.18, it is necessary to dismantle the section to find the possible charges contained within it. If one is charged with maliciously causing grievous bodily harm with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, then *Mowatt*¹⁴² is right in suggesting that the word “maliciously” adds nothing that is not already present in the requirement of intent.

On the other hand, if the defendant is charged with maliciously causing grievous bodily harm with intent to resist or prevent arrest, the inclusion of the term “malicious” may be crucial. If, for example, the defendant intends only to resist arrest and has no state of mind at all in relation to the possibility of harm, he cannot be convicted because he is not malicious. He must, at least, foresee the possibility of some harm.¹⁴³

2. With intent

7-061

The defendant must either intend grievous bodily harm or intend to resist arrest.

It has been held that “intent” here bears the same meaning as in Nedrick.¹⁴⁴ Whether the House of Lords’ decision in Woollin applies to crimes other than murder is a moot point discussed elsewhere.¹⁴⁵ The better view is that Woollin (to the extent that it may have modified Nedrick) should apply to s.18. It would be unfortunate if intention in “intention to cause grievous bodily harm” bore different meanings for s.18 and for murder. It is perhaps because of the difficulty of establishing this requisite intention that so few of those indicted under s.18 are actually convicted of the offence. The cases in which offenders are finally convicted under s.18 tend to be those where there is some objective evidence of premeditation, such as when a weapon has been taken to the scene of the crime.¹⁴⁶

The CPS Charging Standard states that the following factors may indicate a specific intent: a repeated or planned attack; deliberate selection of a weapon or adaptation of an article to cause injury, such as breaking a glass before an attack; making prior threats; and using an offensive weapon against, or kicking the victim’s head.¹⁴⁷

(c) Punishment

7-062

Section 18 carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. The sentences imposed under the guidelines depend on the seriousness of the injury, whether the offence was premeditated and whether a weapon was used. When the injury is life-threatening or particularly grave and was pre-meditated or involved the use of a weapon, the starting point is 12 years’ custody, with a sentencing range of 9–16 years’ custody. Where similar injuries are caused without premeditation (or where there is premeditation or use of a weapon, but not life-threatening or particularly grave injury), the starting point is six years’ custody, with a sentencing range of five to nine years’ custody. Where the victim’s injuries are considered to be less serious in the context of the offence (or where the offence is not premeditated, or there was a greater degree of provocation from the victim), the starting point is four years’ custody with a sentencing range of three to five years’ custody.¹⁴⁸

(iv) Racially and religiously aggravated assaults

Before 1998, there was no specific offence of racially and religiously aggravated assault. During the 1970s and 1980s there was a growing concern over the number of violent offences that were motivated by racial hostilities against black and minority ethnic (BME) communities. In response to this the Government set up the 1980 Joint Committee Against Racism (JCAR) to investigate the problem of racial violence. Directly afterwards, the Government commissioned its first study into racial violence and harassment.¹⁴⁹ The report highlighted the widespread problem of racial attacks (known more commonly as “hate crimes”) in the UK. It finally gave validity to the concern, consistently vocalised by special interest groups, that racially motivated violence was a social problem that was in need of government attention. However, it was not until the brutal murder of the teenager Stephen Lawrence in 1993 by a group of racially motivated offenders and the prolonged media attention that this single case garnered, that the Government would finally give its support to the introduction of new racially aggravated offences.¹⁵⁰ In 1998, the then New Labour Government introduced the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 which set out the new offences of “racially aggravated” assault, assault occasioning actual bodily harm, s.20 grievous bodily harm, and harassment.¹⁵¹ Three years later, the Act was amended to include “religiously aggravated” offences.¹⁵² The purpose of these offences is to significantly increase the penalty for racially or religiously motivated offences in order to recognise the enhanced level of harm that such crimes are likely to cause; not only to individual victims, but to entire minority ethnic communities.¹⁵³

R. V ROGERS [2007] 2 A.C. 62
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

BARONESS HALE:

“The mischiefs attacked by the aggravated versions of these offences are racism and xenophobia. Their essence is the denial of equal respect and dignity to people who are seen as somehow other. This is more deeply hurtful, damaging and disrespectful to the victims than the simple version of these offences. It is also more damaging to the community as a whole, by denying acceptance to members of certain groups not for their own sake but for the sake of something they can do nothing about.”

7-065

The police now report the number of racially and religiously aggravated offences recorded each year. In 2015/16, there were 16,974 racially and/or religiously offences of violence against the person recorded by the police.¹⁵⁴ The CSEW estimated that there were 144,000 racially and religiously motivated hate crimes in 2014/15.¹⁵⁵ The survey reports that 49% of the total of all hate crime relates to assault (with or without injury) and wounding.

(a) Meaning of “racially or religiously aggravated”

CRIME AND DISORDER ACT 1998 S.28:

7-066

“(1) An offence is racially or religiously aggravated for the purposes of sections 29 to 32 below if—

- (a) at the time of committing the offence, or immediately before or after doing so, the offender demonstrates towards the victim of the offence hostility based on the victim’s membership (or presumed membership) of a racial or religious group; or
- (b) the offence is motivated (wholly or partly) by hostility towards members of a racial or religious group based on their membership of that group.”

7-067

For an assault to be aggravated by either racial or religious hostility the defendant must first commit the basic offence of assault, assault occasioning actual bodily harm or s.20 grievous bodily harm. In addition, the prosecution must then prove either that the defendant “demonstrated” hostility (s.28(1)(a)) or that he was (partly) motivated by it (s.28(1)(b)). The difference between (1)(a) and (1)(b) has caused some confusion within the lower courts who have frequently failed to differentiate between the two subsections.¹⁵⁶ Such confusion led Baroness Hale in Rogers to clarify the distinction by stating that s.28(1)(a) is concerned with the “outward manifestation ... of racial hostility” (a largely objective test), while s.28(1)(b) is concerned with the “inner motivation of the offender” (a subjective test). The distinction will often be reduced to whether a defendant has used certain racist or anti-religious slurs during the commission of the assault (an objective demonstration of hostility) or whether there is evidence of premeditation based on his dislike of the victim’s ethnic or religious identity (motivation).¹⁵⁷

The legislation does not define “hostility” and thus whether a defendant demonstrates, or is motivated by it, is a question of fact for the magistrate or jury to determine.¹⁵⁸ Even where a defendant has admitted to using racial expletives during the commission of an assault, uncertainty has arisen as to whether the defendant’s words must be intended by him to demonstrate racial or religious hostility or whether his words objectively express hostility in the eyes of the jury; regardless of whether the defendant actually meant his actions to express racial or religious hostility or not.

DPP v WOODS [2002] EWHC 85 (ADMIN) (QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISION, ADMINISTRATIVE COURT):

7-068

In this case the defendant assaulted a doorman at a nightclub out of frustration when his friend was refused entry. During the assault, D called the doorman a “black bastard”.

MAURICE KAY J:

“The conclusions of the [trial] Justices are set out in these paragraphs from the case stated:

‘... We found the Respondent’s hostility to be borne out of his frustration and annoyance as a result of his companion being denied entry to the premises, and whilst he may have intended to cause offence by the words, this was not “hostility based on the victim’s membership (or presumed membership) of a racial group”. We believed that the Respondent’s frame of mind was such that he would have abused any person standing in [D’s] shoes by reference to an obvious physical characteristic had that individual happened to possess one ...’

The case stated poses the single question: ‘Did we err in law in concluding that, in all the circumstances of this case, the words “you black bastard” uttered a few moments before the assault were not such to prove that the Respondent had demonstrated hostility towards the victim based upon his membership of a racial group?’ ...

Section 28(1)(a) was not intended to apply only to those cases in which the offender is motivated solely, or even mainly, by racial malevolence. It is designed to extend to cases which may have a racially neutral gravamen but in the course of which there is demonstrated towards the victim hostility based on the victim’s membership of a racial group. Any contrary construction would emasculate section 28(1)(a).”

Remitted to the Justices with a direction to convict

7-069

The result of Woods is that even where a defendant demonstrates hostility unthinkingly in the “heat of the moment”, it matters not that the defendant felt no genuine hostility towards the victim’s racial or religious group, only that he has demonstrated hostility (objectively) towards the victim during the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after.¹⁵⁹ Some have questioned whether this is a fair outcome, especially if we consider that the offender will be labelled as a “racist” and be subject to a more severe punishment.¹⁶⁰

(b) The meaning of “racial or religious group”

CRIME AND DISORDER ACT 1998 S.28

7-070

“(4) In this section ‘racial group’ means a group of persons defined by reference to race, colour, nationality (including citizenship) or ethnic or national origins.

(5) In this section ‘religious group’ means a group of persons defined by reference to religious belief or lack of religious belief.”

7-071

The demonstration of hostility must be towards a victim’s (presumed) membership of a racial or religious group. But what if the offender’s demonstration does not refer explicitly to a specific racial, ethnic or national group? In the case of Pal,¹⁶¹ the defendant, a young Asian male, was ejected from a community centre by the caretaker, who was described as of “Asian appearance”. In response, the defendant called the caretaker a “White man’s arse licker” and a “brown Englishman” and later physically attacked him. Pal was charged with racially aggravated common assault under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.29(1)(c). On appeal, the Divisional Court held that the offence was not racially aggravated because his remarks were motivated by his anger at being ejected from the building and referred not to the victim’s racial group but to his relationship with white people. Interestingly, the court was not convinced of the applicability of s.28(2) of the Act which states that “‘membership’, in relation to a racial or religious group, includes association with members of that group”. The court noting instead that “it is quite unreal to suggest on the basis of the facts found that the Respondent is anti-white men”. The facts being that Pal had been with a group including white youths.¹⁶²

In Rogers,¹⁶³ the defendant who was incapacitated by arthritis, was riding his mobility scooter along the pavement on his way home from a pub. Three women were walking back to their home after a birthday party in a local restaurant. An altercation took place as Rogers tried to get past them on the pavement. He then pursued them in an aggressive manner into a local kebab house where they had taken refuge, as they hid from him he shouted at them “bloody foreigners” as well as telling them to “go back to your own country”. The appellant, who had been convicted of a racially aggravated public order offence, appealed on the basis that his comments had not been directed at a specific racial group. The House of Lords held that it did not matter that the phrase used did not refer to a specific race or nationality as it was necessary to take a “flexible, non-technical approach” when interpreting s.28(4).¹⁶⁴ As such, language that refers to the victim being from some other race or nationality should fall within the meaning of “racial group” under the Act.¹⁶⁵ As is the case with determining the presence of “hostility”, decisions about whether words spoken by the defendant fall within the meaning of s.28(4) are questions of fact for the jury to determine.¹⁶⁶

(c) Immediately before or after the commission of the offence

7-072

Most racially and religiously aggravated assaults are committed where the defendant exclaims racist or anti-religious words during the commission of the offence. However, s.28(1)(a) also states the demonstration of hostility can be “immediately” before or after the commission of the offence. This has led to questions on how contemporaneous the hostility has to be with the basic offence. In Parry,¹⁶⁷ the defendant referred to his victims as “Irish cunts” to the police some 20 minutes after the basic offence was committed. The Crown Court held that this amounted to a demonstration of racial hostility immediately after the offence was committed. On appeal the Divisional Court held that the words immediately before or after had to be given:

“[T]heir plain and ordinary meaning and consequently their effect was to make the subsection strike at words uttered or acts done in the immediate context of the substantive offence.”¹⁶⁸

The court found that the offence could not be racially aggravated given that the appellant had left the scene and had been sitting in his own home when he expressed racial hostility.

A very different decision was given in the case of Babbs,¹⁶⁹ where the defendant had been verbally abusive towards the victim and his companion calling them “fucking foreigners” whilst they were queuing in a fast food restaurant. This resulted in a scuffle and an argument which was quelled by the staff manager. Between 5–15 minutes passed when the defendant gestured to the victim that they should leave the restaurant in order to fight, the victim then responded by calling the defendant “white trash”, immediately after which the defendant headbutted the victim. Lord Latham held that the judge had been entitled to leave the matter of whether the hostility was demonstrated immediately before the assault to the jury. This was because the words used by the defendant at the initial confrontation “were capable of colouring the behaviour of the defendant throughout the subsequent events”.

7–073

It appears thus that where hostility is demonstrated some 15 minutes before an assault it may be considered as part of a continuum of violence depending on the context of the altercation. Whereas if the hostility is demonstrated 20 minutes after the offence and it falls outside the original context of the altercation the hostility will become detached from the assault. As with almost all aspects of racially and religiously aggravated offences, context is everything.

(d) Punishment

7–074

If a common assault is “racially or religiously aggravated”, the maximum sentence is two years’ imprisonment—four times higher than the maximum for a non-aggravated assault. If an assault occasioning actual bodily harm is “racially or religiously aggravated” the maximum penalty is increased from five years’ to seven years’ imprisonment.¹⁷⁰ “Racially or religiously aggravated” s.20 grievous bodily harm is also increased to seven years’ imprisonment.¹⁷¹ Note that s.18 grievous bodily harm is not covered by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. With the maximum penalty for this offence already set at life imprisonment there is no reason to aggravate the offence in law. In practice, the vast majority of sentences fall well below this maximum.

(v) Causing serious injury by dangerous driving

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 s.1A:

7-075

“(1) A person who causes serious injury to another person by driving a mechanically propelled vehicle dangerously on a road or other public place is guilty of an offence.”¹⁷²

7-076

This offence creates a constructive crime, much in the same way as the offence of causing death by dangerous driving does.¹⁷³ The defendant must have been driving dangerously and as a result of this serious injury is caused. Section 1A states that “‘serious injury’ means ... physical harm which amounts to grievous bodily harm for the purposes of the Offences against the Person Act 1861”. This means that when determining what amounts to a serious injury the same case law will apply to the Act that applies to the Offences against the Person Act ss.18 and 20 (explored earlier in this chapter). It should be noted, however, that dangerous driving which causes serious psychological harm will not fall within the ambit of this offence. Cunningham has remarked that reference to grievous bodily harm in the Act is a missed opportunity and leaves us with an offence which suffers from the same lack of precision in meaning as the 1861 Act.¹⁷⁴

Section 1A(3) applies the existing definition of dangerous driving in the Road Traffic Act to the new offence (below p.775). Section 2A states that:

“a person is to be regarded as driving dangerously if:

- (a) the way he drives falls far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver, and
- (b) it would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving in that way would be dangerous.”

The offence was created after campaigners sought to reduce the disparity between the law on causing death by dangerous driving and those cases where serious injury was caused.

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR JUSTICE
(MR CRISPIN BLUNT), HANSARD, HC
PUBLIC BILL COMMITTEE, 18TH SITTING, COL.816 (13 OCTOBER 2011):

7-077

“The Government believe that it is vital to ensure that the criminal law is fully effective in addressing dangerous driving and its all too often appalling consequences. New clause 15 fills a long recognised gap by introducing a new offence of causing serious injury by dangerous driving. Causing death by dangerous driving is rightly considered a very serious crime, and that is reflected in the maximum penalty of 14 years imprisonment. Our law has always regarded cases where death results from criminality to be uniquely serious. That is why death by dangerous driving carries such a high maximum penalty ...

For the vast majority of other dangerous driving cases, the maximum penalty of two years imprisonment provides the court with sufficient and proportionate powers to punish offenders. The Government do not agree with those who consider that the maximum penalty for dangerous driving should be raised at large. However, we are aware of the strong feelings about sentencing for dangerous driving cases that cause very severe injuries ...

The issue is emotive. Campaigners have long suggested that the gap between the current maximum penalty of two years for dangerous driving and 14 years for death by dangerous driving is too wide. They believe that the current two-year maximum for dangerous driving does not adequately reflect or address the serious injuries that can result from such driving. A victim can receive very serious life-changing injuries, but the maximum penalty remains at two years. We have therefore decided to target directly the offences where there is a clear and obvious gap in the law. We believe the new offence will enable the courts to deal appropriately with people convicted in these more serious cases. It will enable them to sentence more severely at the most serious and damaging end of the spectrum of dangerous driving incidents ...

Some people maintain that the courts should focus on the standard of the driving rather than the consequences. They say that whether death or serious injuries result from a piece of bad driving is a matter of chance, however serious the result. I appreciate that argument, but only to a degree. While it is certainly true that the standard of driving must be the most important factor in judging culpability, the Government believe it important to ensure that we strike a balance between the level of criminal fault on the part of dangerous drivers and the consequences of that criminal fault for the victim. We believe that the maximum sentence of five years for the new offence will give the courts the ability better to address that balance.”

(a) Punishment

7-078

It is clear from the above excerpt that the purpose of s.1A is not to extend the reach of the criminal law but to simply increase the penalties available to the courts when dealing with such cases. Previous to the enactment of s.1A, s.20 or s.35¹⁷⁵ of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 usually applied. Cunningham notes that:

“Anyone who drives dangerously prior to the coming into force of this offence is liable for dangerous driving. The key perceived benefit of the offence ... is to allow courts access to greater sentencing powers to reflect the more serious consequences of a driver’s actions, where those consequences are serious but fall short of death.”¹⁷⁶

Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 Sch.2 makes provision for the offence to be triable either way and sets out the maximum penalties available on summary conviction, this is six months’ imprisonment or a fine of £5,000, or both and on indictment five years’ imprisonment or a fine or both. In both cases a mandatory two-year minimum period of disqualification applies (unless special reasons are found not to disqualify) and endorsement. Even with these extended sentencing powers, recent case law has suggested that the maximum of five years is still not adequate as it “may not ... provide adequate headroom for courts” to reflect the myriad aggravating factors often involved in dangerous driving cases; further parliamentary reflection has therefore been deemed necessary.¹⁷⁷

C. EVALUATION

7–079

The present structure of non-fatal offences against the person, both in terms of substance and penalty structure, is little short of chaotic. There are many problems with the law (most of which are discussed above), we summarise some of the key issues again here:

- The language contained in the Offences against the Person Act is archaic with words such as “maliciously” and “grievous” sitting ill at ease with contemporary vernacular.
- It remains unclear whether assault and battery are common law or statutory offences, given that they are proscribed by statute but the constituent parts of each offence are defined by common law.
- It is not always clear what the terms assault and common assault specifically refer to (especially in relation to statute) as sometimes they are described as stand-alone offences while in other cases they are seemingly combined with battery.
- Given the large difference in penalty, it is highly anomalous that the same mens rea suffices for both common assault/battery and s.47, often meaning that the mens rea does not correspond with the harm occasioned.
- The difference in harm caused in cases of common assault/battery and assault occasioning actual bodily need only be slight.¹⁷⁸
- Section 20 is supposed to be a far more serious offence than s.47,¹⁷⁹ yet both carry the same maximum penalty (although, in practice, heavier sentences are imposed for s.20).
- Both s.18 and s.20 cover the same harm—grievous bodily harm; can the difference in their maximum penalties (life imprisonment and five years’ imprisonment respectively) be justified exclusively in terms of their differing mens rea requirements?

7-080

It is clear that both the substance of these offences and their scale of punishments should be restructured so as to represent a true hierarchy of seriousness. Failure to do this “might either confuse moral judgments or bring the law into disrepute, or both”.¹⁸⁰ Further, “principles of justice or fairness between different offenders require morally distinguishable offences to be treated differently and morally similar offences to be treated alike”.¹⁸¹

How should this relative seriousness of the offences be determined? The present unhappy distinction between offences rests mostly on a confused conjunction of mens rea and harm done. Since 1980 there have been seven attempts at law reform in this area. These efforts have been mainly aimed at achieving a more rational combination of these two elements. The most recent attempt by the Law Commission draws on the previous 1998 Home Office Draft Bill, combined with some new amendments.¹⁸²

HOME OFFICE, VIOLENCE: REFORMING THE OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON ACT 1861, DRAFT OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL 1998:

7-081

“1(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he intentionally causes serious injury to another. (Max: life imprisonment)

2(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he recklessly causes serious injury to another. (Max: seven years’ imprisonment)

3(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he intentionally or recklessly causes injury to another. (Max: five years’ imprisonment) ...

4(1) A person is guilty of an offence if—

(a) he intentionally or recklessly applies force to or causes an impact on the body of another, or

(b) he intentionally or recklessly causes the other to believe that any such force or impact is imminent.

(2) No such offence is committed if the force or impact, not being intended or likely to cause injury, is in the circumstances such as is generally acceptable in the ordinary conduct of daily life and the defendant does not know or believe that it is in fact unacceptable to the other person. (Max: six months' imprisonment) ...

10(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he makes to another a threat to cause the death of, or serious injury to, that other or a third person, intending that other to believe that it will be carried out. (Max: ten years' imprisonment) ...

15(1) In this Act 'injury' means—

(a) physical injury, or

(b) mental injury.

(2) Physical injury does not include anything caused by disease but (subject to that) it includes pain, unconsciousness and any other impairment of a person's physical condition.

(3) Mental injury does not include anything caused by disease but (subject to that) it includes any impairment of a person's mental health.

(4) In its application to section 1 this section applies without the exceptions relating to things caused by disease.

[The Bill contains a definition of both intention (cl.14(1)) and recklessness (cl.14(2)), the latter being defined in terms of subjective awareness (Cunningham recklessness).]

7-082

The Law Commission report makes several minor modifications to the original Bill¹⁸³:

- Physical Assault—where a person intentionally or recklessly applies force to or causes an impact on the body of another, without the consent of that other.¹⁸⁴
- Threatened Assault—where a person intentionally or recklessly causes another to think that any such force or impact is or may be imminent, and that other does not consent to the conduct in question.

Sitting between cl. 3 and the assaults is a new offence that would be triable in the magistrates' court only:

- “Aggravated assault”—any physical or threatened assault that has the effect of causing injury (12 months).¹⁸⁵

The retention of the words “serious injury” and “injury” in the Bill is particularly noteworthy. No distinction is made between wounding and bodily harm. It is assumed that a wounding (i.e. breakage of the skin) will now only fall under either of cl.1 or cl.2 where the injury is deemed to be serious. Hence a minor cut would not amount to a wounding. The Commission also states that physical injury would include sexually transmitted diseases,¹⁸⁶ while mental injuries would include only recognised psychiatric conditions; both replicating the current common law position.

7-083

The Bill's restructuring of the law into a clearer hierarchy of offences represents an improvement on the law. Underpinning much (but not all) of the proposed changes is the correspondence principle, which asserts that “the fault element of an offence should relate to the same facts or results as those specified in the external elements of that offence”.¹⁸⁷ This approach is aligned with the notion of cognitive mens rea, which dictates that a defendant must have intended or foreseen a particular result before he is held responsible for the consequences of his actions. The corresponding of mens rea and consequence limits the normative standards currently imposed by the criminal law that often imputes an element of (bad) luck when imposing criminal liability for offences against the person.

The reform proposals do, however, raise several important questions.¹⁸⁸ First, the distinction between intention and recklessness is thought to be so significant as to justify a maximum of life imprisonment for intentionally causing serious injury as opposed to seven years' imprisonment for recklessly causing serious injury. This is because there is “a definite moral and psychological difference between the two offences which it is appropriate for the criminal law to reflect”.¹⁸⁹ However, when it comes to causing lesser injuries, these concerns have evaporated into thin air and no distinction is drawn between intention and recklessness. It seems odd that the difference in moral blame between intention and recklessness should be regarded as sufficiently significant to warrant such a huge difference in sentencing maxima for serious injury and yet simply be dismissed as inconsequential for lesser injuries.

Secondly, there is the problem of defining injury. “Injury” is divided into serious and non-serious harms, yet there is little to no guidance as to the distinction between these two. This leaves juries to determine when an injury is considered serious without any statutory guidance. There is likely to be significant disparities between juries and across postcodes as to when an offence will fall within cl.1 or cl.2 or not. Some further guidance as to the word serious may therefore be helpful in ensuring greater levels of consistency and certainty within this area of law. In the US, the Model Penal Code has defined “serious injury” as “bodily injury which creates a substantial risk of death or which causes serious, permanent disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of any bodily member or organ”.¹⁹⁰ The difference between serious injury which is of a temporary nature (such as a broken limb) and injuries which are permanently disfiguring or leave the victim in a permanent vegetative state¹⁹¹ can be so fundamental that it should be reflected at the substantive, rather than at the sentencing stage. As such, there is a cogent argument in favour of creating a more structured division of injury; for example, minor injury (trivial and transient harms), serious injury (harms that have a substantial impact on the physicality and mental health of the victim) and really serious injury (permanent or life threatening injuries).

7-084

Thirdly, although the creation of “aggravated assault” may bring about a useful distinction between batteries where no injury is inflicted and those where some harm (albeit of a minor nature) is caused,¹⁹² there are two main issues with adding this new offence to the ladder. The first relates to the fact that unlike all of the other new offences, aggravated assault would allow for constructive liability where minor injury is caused but not foreseen. This clearly subverts the Commission's own commitment to the correspondence principle, as supported by the majority of consultees to the reform proposals. The Commission defends this by noting that the assault would remain as the central feature of the offence, with the injury simply serving as an aggravating factor.¹⁹³ However there is no escaping the fact that a different offence with a harsher penalty can be applied to a consequence not foreseen by the defendant. A second issue with the new offence is that it is not clear what level of injury or harm will suffice for the offence to be elevated from aggravated assault to the cl.3 causing injury offence. This again leaves the hierarchy of offences somewhat uncertain.

A final question needs to be asked: must the restructuring of these offences be based entirely on new combinations of mens rea and harm? Could not other factors also be utilised in informing our moral assessments (to be translated into legal judgments) of the relative seriousness of offences? For instance, Gardner¹⁹⁴ rejects the Law Commission's view that the structure of these offences should be restricted to variations in the configuration of mens rea and resulting harm as this "does not capture all that is interesting, or rationally significant, about the wrong".¹⁹⁵ What matters is the wrong involved and not just the harm caused and "the wrong is that of bringing the harm about in that way. In morality, as in law, it matters how one brings things about."¹⁹⁶ Gardner argues that ss.20 and 47 are neither more serious nor less serious than each other, but rather each belongs to its "own family of offences"¹⁹⁷: s.20 is a crime of violence; s.47 is a crime of assault which is "not a crime of violence. Its essential quality lies in the invasion by one person of another's body space."¹⁹⁸ Drawing an analogy with the Theft Acts where theft, obtaining by deception (now replaced by fraud), false accounting, making off without payment, etc. are differentiated, not by the harm done (the same property might have been lost), but by the different mode of wrongdoing, he points to lesser known provisions of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 where distinctions are drawn between different modes of violence. For example:

“Section 21 deals with choking, suffocating, or strangling; section 22 deals with the use of stupeficients and overpowering substances, sections 23 and 24 with poisoning, section 26 with starving and exposing to the elements; sections 28 to 30 deal with burning, maiming, disfiguring and disabling by use of explosives ...”

7-085

Such offences, he claims “are notable for the moral clarity with which they are differentiated”.¹⁹⁹ In much the same vein, Horder argues that in terms of fair labelling the Law Commission’s recommendations amount to “a slide into the vice of moral vacuity”.²⁰⁰ There are “important qualitative moral distinctions” between deliberately punching someone hard and breaking his nose and castrating a person; these distinctions should be marked in the offence committed.²⁰¹

It would be possible to structure offences not only by the degree and type of harm involved, but also by how the harm is caused or the context in which it is caused. Such an approach, however, can only be accepted if there is something morally significant (as opposed to just different) about the method by which the harm is caused or the context in which it is caused. As has been stated:

“One may question, however, whether the awful details of the worst forms of violence need to feature in the definition of offences ... The moral resonance of an offence need not require details of the modus operandi.”²⁰²

When would the context or method of committing the crime be sufficiently morally significant to justify the creation of a specific offence? The following are possible examples. Use of a firearm could justify special offence status because of the great fear such use generates and because firearms are so dangerous rendering victims especially vulnerable. There is an offence of torture under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.134 but only if committed by a public official or person acting in an official capacity. There is an argument that the use of torture involves a sufficiently significant wrong to justify broadening this offence to covers all instances of torture. The willingness of the torturer to inflict such pain (along with whatever injury is caused) demonstrates greater culpability. The actual pain caused (along with the actual injury) constitutes a morally significant harm. More recently, a new special offence of controlling or coercive behaviour in an intimate or family relationship (a form of domestic violence) was introduced, partly on the basis that the distinctive wrong in this context is the systematic nature of such violence (usually), the breach of trust involved and that it might shape public attitudes and police policies towards such violence.²⁰³

7-086

One could go even further and argue that other factors such as the identity of the victim or defendant or the motive underlying the crime could significantly mark out the wrong involved. Examples of such an approach under the current law include assault on a police constable contrary to the Police Act 1996 s.89²⁰⁴ and racially or religiously aggravated assault under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Taking racial assault as an example, the distinctive wrong here is that the assault is not simply against an individual but also expresses hatred or contempt of an entire racial group. The victim is also particularly vulnerable. The normal assault-prevention mechanisms commonly employed (looking away; doing nothing to precipitate the assault) are worthless if one is attacked simply because of one's race. This distinctive wrong needs to be marked out by a separate offence with a different sentencing maximum. It is difficult to explain, however, why only racial and religious aggravated offences are specifically proscribed under the criminal law, while offences aggravated by sexual orientation, disability and transgender identity hostility remain within sentencing provisions only.²⁰⁵ Indeed the Law Commission 2013 consultation paper on hate crime law reform explores whether these three latter characteristics should be included under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.²⁰⁶ The consultation paper explains:

“In the present context, the ‘racially/religiously aggravated’ label carries a strong stigma which reflects the fact that hate crimes are considered to be more serious, and different in kind, to basic offences

... By contrast, under the present law, a defendant who demonstrates hostility on the basis of disability while carrying out an assault will simply be convicted of assault. While the hostility can be taken into account at sentencing—and discussed in open court during the sentencing hearing—the label attaching to the offending behaviour will be silent as to the element of aggravation.”²⁰⁷

A major problem with this whole approach is that it can lead to over-specificity. One could be left with a bewildering array of offences—the vice of “particularism”²⁰⁸—each marking a separate wrong but with a failure to distinguish the offences in terms of seriousness.²⁰⁹ Fair labelling should involve not only capturing the essential wrong involved but also communicating the relative seriousness of that wrongdoing.²¹⁰ One response to this is that all these various factors should be dealt with at the sentencing stage rather than through the creation of specific offences. The present Sentencing Guidelines list a wide range of general aggravating factors, including the use of a weapon, a significant degree of premeditation, and whether the defendant demonstrated hostility against the victim’s identity characteristic.

7–087

If and when a decision is made by Parliament to restructure the various offences of violence, the issues raised in this section may require further consideration. In implementing such reforms, it is important to remember that individual criminal offences should communicate the essence of the wrongdoing involved. It is also important that the relative seriousness of such offences be communicated and that the criminal law as a whole conveys a morally-informative set of messages.

II. Sexual Offences

A. INTRODUCTION

7–088

There is a large and increasing number of offences that proscribe certain forms of sexual behaviour. They vary widely in the type of harm encompassed, from the very serious (such as rape) to the less significant (such as exposure). Prior to 2003, the law was condemned as “archaic, incoherent and discriminatory”.²¹¹ The Sexual Offences Act 2003 resulted from a process of consultation that lasted over three years and had as its objectives the need to modernise the law to reflect “changes in society and social attitudes”²¹²; to clarify the law, in particular in relation to core concepts such as consent; to improve protection for vulnerable groups, such as children; to ensure that the penalties available were commensurate with the gravity of the offence; and to improve the conviction rate for the offence of rape. It constituted a fundamental reform of the law relating to sexual offences. Many of the changes made were very welcome but concern has remained that the criminalisation of some behaviour is unwarranted and that there is a good deal of complexity in and overlap between the 52 offences contained within the Act. Moreover, as will be seen, conviction rates have largely been unaffected by the changes. This section will focus upon the crime of rape but it will also consider assault by penetration, sexual assault, causing someone to engage in sexual activity and offences against children to illustrate both the strengths and weaknesses of the law.

1. The level of offending

7-089

It is extremely difficult to assess the extent of offending in this area. What is clear is that, whether one is talking about consensual but unlawful under-age sexual intercourse, familial sex offences, sexual assault or rape, the official statistics reveal only a tiny proportion of offending. According to such statistics, 108,762 sexual offences were recorded in the year ending March 2015 (an increase of 14% compared with the previous year).²¹³ Out of this total, 36,438 rapes were recorded by the police (an increase of 16%).²¹⁴ The current levels of reported sexual offences now stand in stark contrast to the number of offences reported 60–70 years ago, for example in 1947 just 240 rapes were recorded by the police.²¹⁵ Whilst some of this may be explicable in terms of increasing levels of violence, much more is due to an increased willingness amongst victims to report rape and for the police to record it as such. Despite the fact that reporting and recording rates for rape have gone up, at the same time the level of convictions has fallen.²¹⁶

(i) The dark figure of offending

7–090

Over the last two decades, research has done much to shed some light, generally, on the dark figures of crime. Although no national random sample study of either the incidence or prevalence of rape has taken place, wider surveys of victimisation have provided some insight.²¹⁷ Analysis of CSEW data in 2013 found that 2.5% of females and 0.4% of males had reported experiencing some form of sexual offence in the previous 12 months.²¹⁸ Based on these prevalence rates, it has been estimated that there are between 430,000 and 517,000 adult victims of sexual offences each year.²¹⁹ In the vast majority of serious sexual offences, the offender is known to the victim. Data gathered between 2007 and 2012 found that 56% of these offences were committed by the victim's partner or former partner, 33% of offenders were known²²⁰ to the victim, leaving only 10% of serious sexual offences that were committed by a stranger.²²¹ It is also estimated that only about 15% of all rapes are reported to the police; further, 28% of those who had been raped had told no-one about it.²²² While it is clear that females are at the greatest risk of sexual offences, it is probable that male rape is even more under-reported than that upon females.²²³

Victim surveys, as well as providing an insight into the amount of crime, also enable a picture to be built up about the way crime, and, in particular, the fear of crime, affects people's lives. All the evidence supports the view that women's lives and freedom of movement are curtailed by the fear of violence and, in particular, the fear of rape. Carole Sheffield describes this as a form of "sexual terrorism" arguing that "all females, irrespective of race, class, physical or mental abilities, and sexual orientation, are potential victims—at any age, at any time, or in any place".²²⁴ The impacts of sexual violence can also be severe, for example over half (56%) of victims surveyed by the CSEW experienced mental or emotional problems.²²⁵ A further 25% of victims reported having problems trusting people or having difficulty in other relationships, and of particular concern was that 4% of victims attempted suicide.

7-091

There is one last insight provided by victim studies that needs to be considered: why are rape and other sexual assaults so under-reported? The most frequently cited reason why victims do not report incidents include: feeling that it would be “embarrassing”, that they “didn’t think the police could do much to help”, that the incident was “too trivial/not worth reporting”, or that they saw it as a “private/family matter and not police business”.²²⁶ Research has also indicated that complainants fear they may receive unsympathetic and even hostile, humiliating treatment, at the hands of the police—at a time when they are at their most vulnerable—and then by the courts.²²⁷ Victims may well be put off reporting where they know that defence barristers or the defendant may take them, stage by detailed stage, through the offence.²²⁸ Both male and female victims have likened this to being raped again,²²⁹ although there is now some evidence to suggest that the experience of giving evidence has improved.²³⁰ Women believe that the courts accept myths about male behaviour; that, once aroused by women, men get “carried away”²³¹ and, in addition, younger women may fear that they might be blamed, especially if alcohol or drugs were involved.²³² In short, many victims of rape feel that they will be the ones on trial.²³³ Further, victims of familial and marital rape are often put under severe emotional, as well as physical, pressure not to report and may feel divided loyalties. In the case of rape by partners or husbands, many will not even define what has happened to them as rape “until the assaults reache[s] a level of brutality associated with stranger rape”.²³⁴ Thus, it would be dangerously wrong to conclude that the crime is not reported because there had, in fact, been consent or that the rape had had no serious or lasting impact upon the victim.

(ii) From reporting to conviction

7-092

Even if a rape is reported, the chances of securing a conviction are very low. Very large numbers of cases continue to “drop out” of the criminal process or are lost from the system before trial. Hohl and Stanko reflect that “with a conviction rate as low as 7 percent ... one of the lowest in Europe ... one might argue that in England and Wales rape is effectively ‘decriminalized’.”²³⁵ There are multiple and intersecting reasons for this striking “justice gap”.

L. KELLY, J. LOVETT AND L. REGAN, A GAP OR A CHASM? ATTRITION RATES IN REPORTED RAPE CASES (HOME OFFICE RESEARCH STUDY
NO.293) (2005), PP.30–31:

7–093

“Research to date in adversarial legal systems has identified four key points at which attrition occurs. The first point is the decision to report itself; estimates of the reporting rate range from 5 to 25 per cent. Even using the highest reporting rate estimate, three quarters of cases never reach the first hurdle within the CJS.²³⁶ The second involves the police investigation stage—the initial response, forensic examination, statement taking, evidence gathering and arrest and/or interviewing of suspects—between half and three-quarters of reported cases are lost here. The third point relates to the minority of cases that are referred through to prosecution, where a proportion are discontinued. The final point is the even smaller number of cases that reach court, where between one-third and over one-half of those involving adults result in acquittals. At each of the points the possibility of withdrawal by the victim exists, although the largest number of these occur during the reporting and investigative stages ...

This is only part of the story, however, since attrition varies according to the characteristics of the case. The most recent studies in England, Wales and Scotland concur that cases involving children are more likely to be prosecuted and to result in convictions. Adult rape cases have higher attrition rates, especially if they depart from the ‘real rape’ template.”²³⁷

It is clear that the nature of cases being reported to the police has changed (not least, as we shall see, because the definition of rape has been widened) and that many instances involve people who knew each other (either as acquaintances or intimates) prior to the incident giving rise to the complaint. However, some caution should be exercised in relying upon this as the explanation of low conviction rates. The old category of “acquaintance” rape had included those who have met within the previous 24 hours and even included a complainant who was stopped by her assailant to give directions.²³⁸ Such cases are hardly any different from stranger rape cases and mean that there can be no straightforward explanation for low conviction rates based on prior relationship. The presence or absence of violence may well be as significant as any prior relationship.²³⁹ Also important, for example, are the time between offence and report, the quality of medical examination, the police force area and whether the offence is linked to other investigations of sexual assault against another victim.²⁴⁰

Given the differences that exist between sexual offences that can be recorded and those which can be prosecuted under the Sexual Offences Act, and the effect of various other factors mentioned above, the Office for National Statistics has recently stated that calculating convictions rates as the number of people convicted of rape as a proportion of all rape crimes recorded is “incorrect and misleading in terms of presenting evidence on convictions for rape”.²⁴¹ Perhaps more reliable then, is to examine the conviction rates for cases that come before the Crown Court. The conviction rate in 2011 for completed trials for sexual offences in the Crown Court was 61.6%.²⁴² In cases involving rape of a female the conviction rate is lower at 51.1% in 2011; though this represents an increase of 9.9 percentage points since 2005.²⁴³

While the increased conviction rate is to be welcomed, there is still much to be done by way of encouraging victims to report sexual offences, improving upon the way the police process cases, and increasing conviction rates.²⁴⁴ Baroness Stern in her review into how rape complaints are handled by public authorities concluded that the policies and laws enacted since 2003 are the “rights ones”, however the real failure remains with their implementation.²⁴⁵ In 2006 the Government consulted on measures that could further strengthen the legal framework and improve the care that victims receive.²⁴⁶ One significant change that was considered, which would permit expert evidence to be given on the general impact sexual assaults may have upon victims (explaining why, for example, victims may not resist, why they may delay in reporting the incident or why they may present a calm demeanour in court²⁴⁷), met with a mixed response and has led the Government to conclude merely that it will continue to look for ways in which it might be done.²⁴⁸ It seems that reform is unlikely in the short term. In the meantime, a trial judge has been criticised by the Court of Appeal for going too far in trying to explain why a victim might delay reporting the offence without also providing an explanation that some women fabricate allegations.²⁴⁹ Permitting the defence to admit general expert evidence might help to offset concerns about possible lack of balance in judges’ summing up and would be a welcome reform, but by itself it would not be enough to change deep-rooted popular understandings of rape.²⁵⁰ As the myths surrounding rape have been persuasively argued to be at the heart of the attrition rate and low conviction rates, affecting the attitudes not just of the public but of police, legal professionals and jurors, it is to this subject we now turn.²⁵¹

2. Rape in context

7–095

Whether the crime involves so-called date rape, rape by a stranger or by a partner or friend, the rhetoric of the law and its reality can only be truly understood against the backdrop of societal attitudes to women and rape generally.

ALLISON MORRIS, WOMEN, CRIME AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE (1987),
PP.165–181:

7–096

“Most of us believe we know what rape is, but our knowledge is derived from social not legal definitions. ‘True’ rape in popular imagination involves the use of weapons, the infliction of serious injury and occurs in a lonely place late at night. The ‘true’ rapist is oversexed, sexually frustrated or mentally ill, and is a stranger. The ‘true’ rape victim is a virgin (or has had no extra-marital affairs), was not voluntarily in the place where the act took place, fought to the end and has bruises to show for it ... [T]he reason [other] kinds of situations are not seen as rape is the strength of the assumptions we hold about rape ... I will now examine some of these assumptions ...

‘Rape is impossible’

... [Some] criminologists have argued that to force a woman into intercourse is an impossible task in most cases if the woman is conscious and extreme pain is not inflicted. These beliefs have become part of rape folklore (... ‘a woman with her skirt up can run faster than a man with his trousers down’ and the like) and embedded in the practice of criminal justice professionals ...

‘Women want to be raped’

This assumption has its roots in Freudian beliefs about the masochistic nature of female sexuality ... rape is believed to dominate women’s sexual fantasies ...

“‘No’ means ‘Yes’”

Nineteenth-century women—or, at least ladies—were seen as asexual and presumed not to enjoy sex. Whereas they were passive and submitted (rather than consented) to the sex act, men were viewed as the aggressors and the initiators, and as having sexual needs. These beliefs have resonances today ... Men are expected to make advances (otherwise the woman thinks she is unattractive) and women are expected to be sexually attractive and, at the same time, both coy and flirtatious. They are expected to play hard to get, to need to be seduced ... A judge in a recent rape trial in Cambridge told the jury that women sometimes say ‘no’ when they mean ‘yes’ and to remember the expression ‘Stop it. I like it’²⁵² ...

“‘Yes’ to one, then ‘yes’ to all.’²⁵³

In essence, this assumption implies that the victim should not have dressed like that (e.g. with no bra), behaved like that (e.g. hitch-hiked), gone to places like that (e.g. singles' bars) ... Amir, in his study of rape, developed the notion of victim precipitation. His definition is both extremely broad and stresses the offender's interpretation of the victim's behaviour, not the victim's. 'The victim actually—or so it was interpreted by the offender—agreed to sexual relations but retracted ... or did not resist strongly enough when the suggestion was made by the offender.' The term applies also to cases in which the victim enters vulnerable situations charged sexually (Patterns in Forcible Rape (1971), p.266). Earlier, he seems to define any form of female behaviour as rape-precipitating ... Despite this, only 19 per cent of the rapes in Amir's sample could be so 'explained' ...

'Rape is a cry for vengeance'

... Standard legal texts on evidence and procedure ... warn of the danger of women contriving false charges of sexual offences.²⁵⁴ And as recently as 1984, the Criminal Law Revision Committee prefaced its report on sex offences with the words that 'by no means every accusation of rape is true' (15th Report, Sexual Offences, Cmnd.9213, p.5) ...²⁵⁵

'Rape is a sexual act'

... The popular conception now is that rape is sexually motivated: this is most apparent in accounts offered to excuse rape. Smart and Smart (Women, Sexuality and Social Control (1978), pp.98–99) provide examples of this from media coverage of rape:

'The pregnancy of B's wife may have been one of the reasons for his committing the offence.'

'R attacked her five days before his wife gave birth to their first child.' »²⁵⁶

7–098

Sexual gratification, however, may not be the major reason for rape. As Brownmiller says, "the penis is deployed as a weapon",²⁵⁷ and research conducted amongst convicted rapists suggests that the desire to dominate and humiliate the rape victim (often coupled with revenge motives) features most commonly.²⁵⁸ In furtherance of this motive the attractiveness of the victim is not a vital ingredient, although it is a paradox in a society demanding its females to make themselves attractive that if the rape victim has done so, she may well be condemned for it. Whilst most rape victims are young,²⁵⁹ what matters more than physical appearance is vulnerability. As one rape victim said:

“[W]hat I exuded that night was not sexuality ... but vulnerability ... I, by virtue of my size and gender ... was recognisable to the rapist as easy game and an exemplary target for his generalised misogyny.”²⁶⁰

It has been asserted in the past that rapists are pathological offenders; they are “victims of a disease from which many of them suffer more than their victims”;²⁶¹ they are “sexual psychopaths”. Whilst there are undoubtedly rapists who are psychologically disturbed, research has shown how rare this is.²⁶² The better view, it is submitted, is that rape is about inequalities of power, whether the victim is female or male. The stereotypical rape is depicted as an act committed by a stranger, probably outside the home, at night and where violence is employed. In reality, most victims know their assailants and the home may well be the location for rape.²⁶³

Much attention has been focused on two different types of rape, both of which have been contrasted with the supposed paradigm of stranger rape. The first is that of relationship rape. It has been suggested that this is a less serious form of sexual assault than stranger rape.²⁶⁴ In contrast, however, rapes committed by partners may have the greatest of psychological impacts on the victim. One can point to accounts of rape given by those who have been or are in relationships with their assailant to illustrate this point:

“Linda, 41, has to walk with crutches after being violently raped and battered by her husband ... Her husband began attacking her when she was pregnant ... The rapes began after her son was born ... ‘He used to tell me that I was supposed to enjoy it—he actually thought women liked being raped. He said it was what all his mates talked about at work. In the end I just hated him. Sex could never be normal—how can you like someone who’s beating you up and telling you you should be liking it?’”²⁶⁵

The second type is that of “date-rape”, perhaps better described as acquaintance rape.²⁶⁶ Suggesting that such rapes are less serious brings into sharp focus many of the assumptions which may be implicit in relationships between men and women. Does a man who buys a woman a meal have a right to have intercourse with her? Does a woman who gets drunk at a party ask for it? If the disturbing findings of an ICM poll in 2005 are anything to go by, many people, it seems, would answer that she does: 34% of those questioned thought that a woman who behaved flirtatiously was partially or totally responsible if she was raped and 26% thought the same would be true if she wore sexy or revealing clothing.²⁶⁷ On this basis:

“it is not difficult to see why changes in law produce such limited results ... The problem of rape is so deeply embedded in social and cultural constructions of (hetero)sexuality, so closely allied with core dimensions of what we understand as masculinity and femininity, that any steps which do not confront this fundamental aspect of the rape problem are likely to be, at best, modest.”²⁶⁸

3. What is rape?

Many of the issues highlighted above have had very significant consequences for the shape the law has taken (for example, in relation to the concept of consent) as well as how it has operated in practice. However, before turning to that discussion, it is important to try to identify the “essence” of rape and other sexual offences such as assault by penetration or sexual assault. Such offences are sometimes associated with gross violence. For some, such crimes are always and essentially crimes of violence. One effect of this could be that the offence of rape should be defined so that it only occurs where the victim has shown physical resistance.²⁶⁹ However, it is not true that all “rapes” are accompanied by physical violence.²⁷⁰ Does this mean that there has been no rape? One answer increasingly given is that rape and other sexual assaults are crimes against sexual autonomy and that what matters is whether there was consent.²⁷¹ There are difficulties with both approaches.

VICTOR TADROS, “RAPE WITHOUT CONSENT” [2006] 26 O.J.L.S. 515, 515–516:

7–101

“In some jurisdictions, for example, Canada, Michigan and New South Wales, the focus is primarily on force. The will of the complainant plays a subsidiary role or no role at all. Reforms of this kind were motivated by three feminist concerns. First, rape is to be considered a crime of violence. That ought to be reflected in the definition of the offence. Second, defining rape around the will of the victim tends to encourage criminal trials to focus problematically on the conduct and sexual history of the complainant rather than the conduct of the accused. Third, sexual offences ought to be defined with precision to prevent them being manipulated by defence counsel or subject to problematic interpretation in the light of the prejudices of participants in the criminal process, and in particular judges and juries ...

In other jurisdictions, the focus is primarily on the will, or rather consent, of the victim, relegating force to a subsidiary role. This is true of England and Wales ... Such [laws] reflect a fourth feminist concern: undermining the sexual autonomy of the victim need not involve violence or the threat of violence ...

Meeting the fourth concern ... appears to involve failing properly to reflect the first three.”

7–102

Perceiving rape as a crime of violence makes for a relatively straightforward offence but ignores the dynamics of sexual relationships and enables husbands, partners and “date-rapists” to deny that what they do is rape. However, making consent the pivotal concept “does not mark out the offence as a crime of violence even where there has been violence”²⁷² and has proved to be deeply problematic. Nevertheless, if one conceives of a hypothetical scenario as Gardner and Shute do, in which the victim is unconscious, unharmed and never learns that sexual intercourse (with a condom) has taken place, it is still right to state that the victim has been raped. Indeed, this “pure” case of rape enables one to identify what they describe as “the wrongness of rape”:

“Rape, in the pure case, is the sheer use of a person ... Rape is humiliating even when unaccompanied by further affronts because the sheer use of a person, and in that sense the objectification of a person, is a denial of their personhood. It is literally dehumanizing.”²⁷³

If one views rape as the sheer use of a person as an object²⁷⁴ there is no case for its being subdivided into more or less serious offences depending upon whether a relationship or acquaintance existed between the victim and the offender. As well as denying the autonomy of the victim it has been further argued that the rape of a woman amounts to a moral harm, not only against the victim, but also against women as a group.

JOAN MCGREGOR, IS IT RAPE?
(2005), PP.230–232:

7–103

“Rapes express very clearly the inferiority of women. The rapist, whether the violent rapist or the subtler ‘date rapist’, sends the message that this woman is for his enjoyment, an object to be used for his pleasure. His actions express her inferiority to him since he does not feel the need to bother to investigate whether she was really consenting even in the face of evidence that she was not or may not be. Her physical and verbal rejections are not worth investigating as to whether they were ‘real’ since her interests do not really matter. For him, her wishes and desires are irrelevant. He is superior to her, his desires matter and hers do not, making her an object rather than an equal person. Sending this message is the expressive moral injury of rape. The message of inferiority is received by all women, not merely the woman who experiences the rape. Not wanting to diminish the real physical and psychological harms to rape victims, I am not claiming that all women experience those harms, which are very real and serious. But there is something peculiar to rape and the response that women have to other women being raped ...

The meaning of rape involves the victim's worth and the wrongdoer's worth and we can 'read off' the expression of the offender's superiority. In the case of rape, the diminishment in the victim's worth is tied to group membership. Women are the target of rape in society and women get the message that the rapist sends. In this sense, the moral injury of rape is shared by women as a group."

7-104

One further consequence of seeing sexual offences in terms of sexual autonomy will be considered later in relation to child offences. Respecting a person's right to choose to engage in sexual intercourse has another dimension: the extent to which the law does or should respect a (young) person's right to engage in sexual exploration.

B. THE LAW

1. Consent

7-105

The issue of consent is fundamental to many of the sexual offences contained within the Sexual Offences Act 2003. It has also proved to be a highly problematic concept to define and one of the key objectives of the reform was to clarify this concept. Indeed, as the majority of victims know their assailant, the issue of consent is, in many trials, the pivotal issue.

But how does one know whether they have the consent to perform or receive a sexual act? Does one require a verbal communication of agreement, or can consent be given using just context and social cues?²⁷⁵ Some commentators have even argued that consent may be valid even where there is no communication or miscommunication between individuals.²⁷⁶ Before exploring this contested concept, one matter can be settled: what is required in law is a lack of consent and not positive dissent.²⁷⁷ English law does not define rape as sexual intercourse by force. It absolves the victim from having to make a show of resistance. Thus, in theory, responsibility rests with the instigator to secure consent. That said, it is clear that in the absence of marks or injuries the victim's claim not to have consented may not be believed.²⁷⁸ Evidentially, there is real pressure on rape victims to struggle and further endanger themselves. Moreover, although changes to legislation mean judges are no longer obliged to warn the jury of the dangers of accepting the victim's uncorroborated story, they have discretion still to do so.²⁷⁹ One further related question is relevant at this point. The defence in seeking to show that the victim did, in fact, consent to sexual intercourse may wish to adduce evidence, for example, of prior relationships with the defendant or with other men. Should evidence of this type be introduced at the trial?

7-106

ZSUZSANNA ADLER, "RAPE—THE INTENTION OF PARLIAMENT AND THE PRACTICE OF THE COURTS" (1982) 45 M.L.R. 664, 666-667:

"Before 1976, the defence in a rape trial were free to cross-examine about any prior sexual behaviour, whether with the defendant or anyone else. Her experience with a third party was thought to be relevant to her credibility: the law of evidence seemed to reflect an assumption that women involved in rape cases were likely to be untruthful as a direct result of their sexual 'immorality' ... [It] gave the defence a virtually unconstrained licence to sling sexual mud ...

The Advisory Group on the Law of Rape ... expressed particular anxiety about the humiliation and distress suffered by complainants during cross-examination and argued that the procedure was in need of urgent reform. 'We have reached the conclusion that the previous sexual history of the alleged victim with third parties is of no significance so far as credibility is concerned, and is only rarely likely to be relevant to the issues directly before the jury.' (Report of the Advisory Council on the Law of Rape, 1975, para.131.)"

7-107

As a result of such reasoning, the law was changed to give the trial judge complete discretion as to whether general or specific past history and reputation of the victim might be introduced.²⁸⁰

However, studies subsequently concluded that courts were far too ready to allow evidence to be admitted²⁸¹ and the report Speaking up for Justice concluded that there was “overwhelming evidence that the ... practice in the courts [was] unsatisfactory and that the existing law [was] not achieving its purpose”.²⁸² As a consequence, a much tighter scheme governing sexual history evidence was introduced by the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999.²⁸³ Under s.41 of the Act no such evidence can be adduced unless certain statutory criteria are satisfied: for example, that the issue is one of consent and the sexual behaviour of the complainant to which the evidence relates is alleged to have taken place at about the same time as the event which is the subject matter of the charge.

7–108

R. v A (COMPLAINANT’S SEXUAL HISTORY) [2002] 1 A.C. 45 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

LORD STEYN:

“... sometimes logically relevant sexual experiences between a complainant and an accused may be admitted under section 41(3)(c) ... It is of supreme importance that the effect of the speeches today should be clear to trial judges who have to deal with problems of the admissibility of questioning and evidence on alleged prior sexual experience between an accused and a complainant. The effect of the decision today is that under section 41(3)(c) of the 1999 Act, construed where necessary by applying the interpretive obligation under section 3 of the Human Rights Act 1998, and due regard always being paid to the importance of seeking to protect the complainant from indignity and from humiliating questions, the test of admissibility is whether the evidence (and questioning in relation to it) is nevertheless so relevant to the issue of consent that to exclude it would endanger the fairness of the trial under article 6 of the Convention. If this test is satisfied the evidence should not be excluded.”

Appeal dismissed

Case law has since reiterated that there must be relevant similarity between the alleged conduct and previous conduct which necessitates an exploration of the circumstances in order to avoid unfairness to the defendant.²⁸⁴ In addition, there has to be a sufficient chronological nexus between the events to render the previous behaviour probative.²⁸⁵ The court must also believe that a failure to admit the evidence would render the conviction unsafe.²⁸⁶ Finally, it should be noted that courts should not allow cross examination of sexual history which is tantamount to asserting that the complainant is a person who engages in casual sex, thereby inferring that she is likely to have engaged in casual sex with the defendant.²⁸⁷

One basis for admitting evidence or permitting cross-examination about sexual history might be where the complainant is biased against the defendant or has a motive for fabricating the evidence.²⁸⁸ In such a case, an application to introduce evidence should be made in advance of the trial.²⁸⁹ New sexual history evidence has also been admitted on appeal. In the very high profile case of Evans,²⁹⁰ sexual history evidence was allowed to be admitted on appeal in order to show that the complainant had used similar words during sex with previous partners which could not be explained by mere coincidence, and was therefore evidence that could have supported the appellant's defence of consent. The appeal was successful and a retrial ordered. The fact that sexual history evidence is still being used to support the defence of consent in such cases has attracted much scholarly criticism, with many agreeing with Lord Woolf in *Mokrecovas*²⁹¹ who foresaw that s.41(3)(a) would be used to "ride a coach and horses" through the desirable policy reflected in s.41(4).²⁹² As such, some commentators have argued that only a complete ban on such history will solve the problem.²⁹³

Against this background, we can now consider what it means to say that someone has consented to sex. There have been numerous attempts to answer these questions, both philosophically and legally.²⁹⁴ For the first time, however, the Sexual Offences Act 2003 provides a statutory definition which, as we shall see, is supplemented by presumptions as to the absence of consent.

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 SS.74, 75 AND 76:

7-110

“74. ‘Consent’

For the purposes of this Part, a person consents if he agrees by choice, and has the freedom and capacity to make that choice.

75. Evidential Presumptions about consent

(1) If in proceedings for an offence to which this section applies it is proved—

- (a) that the defendant did the relevant act,
- (b) that any of the circumstances specified in subsection 2 existed, and
- (c) that the defendant knew that those circumstances existed—the complainant is to be taken not to have consented to the relevant act unless sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue as to whether he consented and the defendant is to be taken not to have reasonably believed that the complainant consented unless sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue as to whether he reasonably believed it.

(2) The circumstances are that—

- (a) any person was, at the time of the relevant act or immediately before it began, using violence against the complainant or causing the complainant to fear that immediate violence would be used against him;
- (b) any person was, at the time of the relevant act or immediately before it began, causing the victim to fear that violence was being used, or that immediate violence would be used, against another person;

- (c) the complainant was, and the defendant was not, unlawfully detained at the time of the relevant act;
- (d) the complainant was asleep or otherwise unconscious at the time of the relevant act;
- (e) because of the complainant's physical disability, the complainant would not have been able at the time of the relevant act to communicate to the defendant whether the complainant consented.
- (f) any person had administered to or caused to be taken by the complainant, without the complainant's consent, a substance which, having regard to when it was administered or taken was capable of causing or enabling the complainant to be stupefied or overpowered at the time of the relevant act.

76. Conclusive Presumptions about consent

- (1) If in proceedings for an offence to which this section applies it is proved that the defendant did the relevant act, that any of the circumstances specified in subsection (2) existed, it is to be conclusively presumed—that the complainant did not consent to the relevant act, and that the defendant did not believe that the complainant consented to the relevant act.
- (2) The circumstances are that—
 - (a) the defendant intentionally deceived the complainant as to the nature or purpose of the relevant act;
 - (b) the defendant intentionally induced the complainant to consent to the relevant act by impersonating a person known personally to the complainant.”

(i) The general definition

7-111

There are two fundamental constituent parts to the definition of consent under s.74:

- (1) freedom to choose to agree; and
- (2) the capacity to choose to agree.

We explore each of these concepts in turn.

(a) Freedom

7–112

Basing consent upon freedom might, at first sight, appear to be an obvious good. Sexual intercourse ought to occur when, borne of their own free will, both parties make their choice to consent. That is to say, both (or all) participants have it as their purpose to engage in sexual activity. Freedom to choose will often align with conduct that is welcomed and where either party might have initiated the encounter.²⁹⁵ Yet the notion of “freedom” is far from uncontroversial. Some feminists, such as MacKinnon, have argued that any attempt to distinguish rape from sexual intercourse on the basis of free choice and thus consent is naïve. That is because women must make their “free” choices to consent in a society where they are socialised to passive receptivity and where sex is something men do to them. In such a gendered milieu, it is not always (if ever) clear when a woman has consented independently of external pressures, and when she has consented subject to the social constraints of male dominion.²⁹⁶

S. SCHULHOFER, UNWANTED SEX: THE CULTURE OF INTIMIDATION AND
THE FAILURE OF THE LAW (1998),
PP.56–57:

7–113

“MacKinnon’s far-reaching claims about cultural pressure have opened many eyes to the multiple constraints on women’s freedom to make independent sexual choices. At the same time, by collapsing the distinctions between kinds of sexual pressure, feminism of this sort doesn’t advance the effort to draw workable legal lines. Sometimes this strand of feminism even seems to impede the legal reform effort, because it tends to obliterate differences between the kinds of pressure that society will inevitably tolerate and the kinds that it might plausibly forbid ... The refusal of some leading theorists to draw moral distinctions among the many forms of pressure women face maintains a certain purism for these feminist projects, but it vastly oversimplifies the give-and-take of social power in a complex, imperfect, but not uniformly oppressive society.”

7-114

Even if one eschews the more far-reaching critique of the use of the concept of freedom within the context of consent, it is obvious that not all sexual choices are completely freely made and yet a form of consent may well have been given. An individual's choice may be constrained for all sorts of reasons: it may be a desire to avoid the row that will follow if sex is not forthcoming; a need for cash; a need to keep one's job; a fear of being beaten or even killed. If a person says “yes” in any of these scenarios—or if she permits intercourse after persuading the assailant to wear a condom²⁹⁷—is this consent real? The difficult task for the law has been to determine which such constraints operate to nullify consent and which do not. As long as rape is viewed predominantly as a crime of violence the answer is relatively unproblematic. Traditionally, therefore, only threats of death or serious harm vitiate an apparent consent. However, the more rape is perceived as an offence against sexual autonomy, the more the wrong is perceived to be the objectification of a person, and the more open-ended become the types of constraints which may nullify consent.²⁹⁸

In Olugboja,²⁹⁹ a case decided under the old law, the victim had intercourse with the defendant after his companion had raped her and her friend. The defendant claimed that these circumstances did not nullify her consent since only a threat of death or serious harm would suffice. The Court of Appeal held that, using the “ordinary meaning” of the word, the victim could not be said to have consented to sexual intercourse. The court held that there was a difference between the state of mind of real consent and that of mere submission. The difference between the two was a matter of degree and it was for the jury to decide which side of the line a particular sequence of events falls. For example, a jury would almost inevitably decide that a wife who “reluctantly acquiesced” to intercourse to avoid a sulking husband had, nevertheless, consented.

However, there were difficulties with Olugboja. Although the flexibility of its approach had its merits, the distinction between mere submission and real consent was not able to bear close scrutiny.³⁰⁰ It was rejected as the way forward for reform because it had “led to confusion and [risked] very different conclusions being drawn on similar facts in different cases”.³⁰¹ Instead, in an attempt to be clear and unambiguous,³⁰² a statutory definition of consent was preferred. However, the issues discussed above have not been swept away by the definition. It is necessarily vague—but this means that a jury’s preconceptions about sexual behaviour and consent may well still affect their interpretation of whether a “free choice” has been made.

(b) Capacity

7–115

The statutory definition also refers to the capacity of the victim to choose. Capacity is undefined in the Act but must relate to awareness, knowledge and understanding. A person may be incapable of giving consent, because, say, she has been knocked unconscious or because she is suffering from a mental disorder that precludes understanding.³⁰³ However, it is in the context of intoxication that the issue of capacity to consent has become a matter of concern and it is here that societal attitudes towards rape and drinking have the very real potential to influence the outcome of proceedings. Research has shown the existence of a double standard whereby “intoxicated defendants tend to be held less responsible than their sober counterparts while intoxicated complainants tend to be held more responsible”.³⁰⁴ Indeed, given the publicity surrounding the increase in “binge” drinking among young women, this attitude could harden further.³⁰⁵ In the much publicised survey conducted for Amnesty International, 30% of respondents thought that a woman was either partly or wholly responsible for being raped if she was drunk.³⁰⁶ As research reveals that alcohol has been ingested by a significant proportion of victims and defendants in rape cases, this is deeply worrying.³⁰⁷

In 2005, a case involving an alleged rape upon a female student who was drunk but conscious at the time of the offence collapsed.³⁰⁸ Had she been unconscious at the time of the intercourse, the evidential presumption in s.75(2)(d) would have been invoked.³⁰⁹ The judge directed the jury to return a verdict of “not guilty” when the prosecution revealed that they were unable to proceed further because they could not prove that the complainant had not given consent because of her level of intoxication. It has been argued that the judge could have put the matter to the jury to consider in terms of the complainant’s capacity to consent.³¹⁰ This issue arose for reconsideration in the following decision.

R. v BREE [2007] 3 W.L.R. 600
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

7–116

The defendant and M spent the evening together, drinking heavily before returning to the defendant’s flat where they had sexual intercourse. Initially the prosecution alleged that M was unconscious throughout most of the activity and thus lacked capacity to consent. Following evidence by M at the trial, the prosecution changed its stance and alleged that M’s ability to resist had been hampered by the effects of alcohol but that she had had the capacity to consent. M accepted that her memory of the evening was very patchy; however, she maintained that she had made it clear, in so far as she could, that she did not consent. The defendant claimed that M had been conscious throughout and that he reasonably believed she was consenting. The defendant was convicted of rape and appealed.

SIR IGOR JUDGE P:

“[26] In cases which are said to arise after voluntary consumption of alcohol the question is not whether the alcohol made either or both less inhibited than they would have been if sober, nor whether either or both might afterwards have regretted what had happened, and indeed wished that it had not. If the Complainant consents, her consent cannot be revoked. Moreover it is not a question whether either or both may have had very poor recollection of precisely what had happened. That may be relevant to the reliability of their evidence. Finally, and certainly, it is not a question whether either or both was behaving irresponsibly. As they were both autonomous adults, the essential question for decision is, as it always is, whether the evidence proved that the Appellant had sexual intercourse with the Complainant without her consent ...

[30] We are not aware of any reported decisions which deal with this aspect of [capacity in] the new legislation. We should however refer to the much publicised case of R v Dougal, heard in Swansea Crown Court, in November 2005 ...

[33] Some of the hugely critical discussion arising after Dougal missed the essential point. Neither counsel for the Crown, nor for that matter the judge, was saying or coming anywhere near saying, either that a Complainant who through drink is incapable of consenting to intercourse must nevertheless be deemed to have consented to it, or that a man is at liberty to have sexual intercourse with a woman who happens to be drunk, on the basis that her drunkenness deprives her of her right to choose whether to have intercourse or not. Such ideas are wrong in law, and indeed, offensive. All that was being said in Dougal was that when someone who has had a lot to drink is in fact consenting to intercourse, then that is what she is doing, consenting: equally, if after taking drink, she is not consenting, then by definition intercourse is taking place without her consent. This is unexceptionable.

[34] In our judgment, the proper construction of s 74 of the 2003 Act, as applied to the problem now under discussion, leads to clear conclusions. If, through drink (or for any other reason) the Complainant has temporarily lost her capacity to choose whether to have intercourse on the relevant occasion, she is not consenting, and subject to questions about the Defendant's state of mind, if intercourse takes place, this would be rape. However, where the Complainant has voluntarily consumed even substantial quantities of alcohol, but nevertheless remains capable of choosing whether or not to have intercourse, and in drink agrees to do so, this would not be rape. We should perhaps underline that, as a matter of practical reality, capacity to consent may evaporate well before a Complainant becomes unconscious. Whether this is so or not, however, is fact specific, or more accurately, depends on the actual state of mind of the individuals involved on the particular occasion.

7-117

[35] Considerations like these underline the fact that it would be unrealistic to endeavour to create some kind of grid system which would enable the answer to these questions to be related to some prescribed level of alcohol consumption. Experience shows that different individuals have a greater or lesser capacity to cope with alcohol than others, and indeed the ability of a single individual to do so may vary from day to day. The practical reality is that there are some areas of human behaviour which are inapt for detailed legislative structures. In this context, provisions intended to protect women from sexual assaults might very well be conflated into a system which would provide patronising interference with the right of autonomous adults to make personal decisions for themselves.

[36] For these reasons, notwithstanding criticisms of the statutory provisions, in our view the 2003 Act provides a clear definition of “consent” for the purposes of the law of rape, and by defining it with reference to “capacity to make that choice”, sufficiently addresses the issue of consent in the context of voluntary consumption of alcohol by the Complainant. The problems do not arise from the legal principles. They lie with infinite circumstances of human behaviour, usually taking place in private without independent evidence, and the consequent difficulties of proving this very serious offence ...

[39] In this case the jury should have been given some assistance with the meaning of “capacity” in circumstances where the Complainant was affected by her own voluntarily induced intoxication, and also whether, and to what extent they could take that into account in deciding whether she had consented.³¹¹ ...

[43] ... In a trial in which the issues of consent and voluntary intoxication were fundamental to the outcome, the jury were given no or no sufficient directions to enable the verdict which they reached to be regarded as safe.³¹² Accordingly the conviction is quashed.”

Appeal allowed

The Government (which had been consulting on ways to remove the barriers to successful prosecutions) subsequently commented that this decision provided vital guidance and that there was, therefore, no need for capacity to be defined for the purposes of the Sexual Offences Act.³¹³ Both the decision in Bree and the Government's response has divided opinion. While it is true that attempting to determine capacity using a grid system based on blood-alcohol levels would be unhelpful for the reasons given by the Court of Appeal, the idea that there need be no further attempts to clarify capacity in the context of intoxication is open to challenge:

“what appears to be part of a liberal non-interventionist approach to regulating private sexual behaviour, in reality can also be seen as a means by which some men's disregard for the sexual autonomy of women is maintained.”³¹⁴

Such arguments have led some to call for the inclusion of “extreme drunkenness” as a rebuttal presumption of non-consent.³¹⁵ This, it has been argued, would cover situations where it is considered that the complainant was too intoxicated to be able to give free consent.

(ii) The presumptions

The new law distinguishes between two types of presumptions of non-consent: those that are conclusive and those that raise an evidential presumption that consent was absent.³¹⁶ Both types of presumptions apply not only to the issue of consent as an element of the actus reus but also apply to the question of whether the defendant had mens rea.³¹⁷

(a) The conclusive presumptions

In the case of the two conclusive presumptions, once it is proved that the defendant did the relevant act and that either of the circumstances existed, then both consent and lack of belief in consent are conclusively established.³¹⁸ Both build upon the previous law. In Clarence,³¹⁹ Stephen J identified two such kinds of fundamental mistake, the first as to the identity of the actor and the second as to the nature of the act, either of which negated the apparent consent of the victim if induced by the deceit of the defendant.

Impersonation

7–121

The old law only protected victims where the person impersonated was the victim's husband although the Court of Appeal in *Elbekkay*³²⁰ extended this to cover boyfriends as well. The new conclusive presumption applies to the impersonation of anyone known personally to the victim. While this is broader than the old law, it would not, of course, come into operation if the defendant claimed to be, say, Zac Efron who was only known to the complainant through his films. The other point worth noting is that the impersonation must have induced the complainant to consent.³²¹

Deception as to nature or purpose of the act

7–122

The second type of fundamental mistake induced by fraud goes to the very nature of the act. In Flattery,³²² the defendant induced a woman to submit to intercourse by maintaining the deception that he was performing a surgical operation. He was convicted of rape. This was followed in the not dissimilar case of *Williams*³²³ where the defendant, who was a singingmaster, had intercourse with one of his pupils aged 16. She made no resistance as she believed his claim that he was merely improving her breathing. He too was convicted. The principle upon which both cases were decided was that there had been no consent to sexual intercourse; what had been consented to was a medical or surgical operation.

Prior to the 2003 Act, the courts had generally declined to extend the ambit of the law of rape to cases other than those involving these two types of fundamental mistake. In Linekar, for example, the defendant deceived a prostitute into having intercourse with him by claiming (falsely) that he would pay her. Although she would not have had intercourse with him had she known the truth this was, rightly, held not to be a deception as to the nature or the act.³²⁴ However, the narrowness of this approach was put in doubt by the decision of Tabassum.³²⁵ In this case, concerning the former offence of indecent assault but raising the issue of consent, the court took the view that the victims, who had consented to breast examinations for what they thought was medical research, would never have done so had they known that the defendant was not medically qualified. It was held that they had consented to the nature of the act but not to its quality—and that accordingly there was no real consent. This is a controversial distinction yet it is one that is replicated by the language of the conclusive presumption in s.76(2)(a) which refers to both the nature and the purpose of the act.

”Active” deceptions

R. v JHEETA [2007] 2 CR. APP. R. 34
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

7–123

By a series of bizarre and unpleasant lies, including texts from the defendant which purported to come from the police telling her that if she did not sleep with him she would be liable to a fine, the defendant induced the victim to continue to have sexual intercourse with him. When the truth came to light, the victim claimed that she had only had intercourse with the defendant because of the texts and that she had not truly consented. The defendant pleaded guilty to rape having been advised that his behaviour fell within s.76(2) (a). He then appealed.

JUDGE P:

“[23] [S]ection 76 raises presumptions conclusive of the issue of consent, and thus where intercourse is proved, conclusive of guilt. They therefore require the most stringent scrutiny.

[24] In our judgment the ambit of section 76 is limited to the ‘act’ to which it is said to apply. In rape cases the ‘act’ is vaginal, anal or oral intercourse. Provided this consideration is constantly borne in mind, it will be seen that section 76 (2)(a) is relevant only to the comparatively rare cases where the defendant deliberately deceives the complainant about the nature or purpose of one or other form of intercourse. No conclusive presumptions arise merely because the complainant was deceived in some way or other by disingenuous blandishments of or common or garden lies by the defendant. These may well be deceptive and persuasive, but they will rarely go to the nature or purpose of intercourse. Beyond this limited type of case, and assuming that, as here, section 75 has no application, the issue of consent must be addressed in the context of section 74 ...

[28] With these considerations in mind, we must return to the present case. On the written basis of plea the appellant undoubtedly deceived the complainant. He created a bizarre and fictitious fantasy which, because it was real enough to her, pressurised her to have intercourse with him more frequently than she otherwise would have done. She was not deceived as to the nature or purpose of intercourse, but deceived as to the situation in which she found herself. In our judgment the conclusive presumption in section 76 (2) (a) had no application, and counsel for the appellant below were wrong to advise on the basis that it did. However that is not an end of the matter ... [The appellant] persuaded the complainant to have intercourse with him more frequently than otherwise, and the persuasion took the form of the pressures imposed on her by the complicated and unpleasant scheme which he had fabricated. This was not a free choice, or consent for the purposes of the Act. In these circumstances we entertain no reservations that on some occasions at least the complainant was not consenting to intercourse for the purposes of section 74, and that the appellant was perfectly well aware of it. His guilty plea reflected these undisputed facts.”

Appeal dismissed

7-124

This was the first case to examine the meaning of s.76(2)(a) and it is thus of some importance. The approach taken before the Act and highlighted by Tabassum has been confirmed. Mere “disingenuous blandishments” or “common or garden lies” will “rarely go to the nature or purpose of the act”. However, this does not mean that it will be straightforward to determine whether there has been a material deception as to “purpose” in future cases. Purpose is capable of being interpreted in a limited way, as in Jheeta, or more broadly.³²⁶ Some support (albeit limited) for the latter approach comes from the bizarre case of Devonald. The male defendant posed as a woman over the internet to entice the victim (who had broken off a relationship with the defendant's teenage daughter) to masturbate in front of a webcam with a view to publishing the pictures so as to embarrass the boy and teach him a lesson. The Court of Appeal held that the defendant had deceived the victim as to the purpose of the act.³²⁷ Oddly, this is an instance of the deception in reverse: the victim thought that the act was for sexual purposes. While the victim clearly would not have acted as he did had he known the truth the same would also have been true of the victim on Linekar and, given that the judgment is both unreserved and brief, it would probably be unwise to place too much reliance on Devonald.³²⁸

Is it appropriate to take a narrow approach as in Jheeta or should a broader approach be adopted? Answering this question requires one to weigh two competing considerations. First, it may absolutely be the case that the victim would not have consented had the truth been told. In other words, the deception has operated to remove the possibility of real consent. On the other hand, does a defendant in such cases deserve to be labelled a rapist? When a victim has knowingly consented to the defendant's penetration will she suffer the same degree of emotional and psychological trauma as in other rape cases? Many commentators would argue that such admittedly limited, conditional, and, possibly, naïve consent is still valid and that sexual intercourse in such circumstances is not, therefore, rape.³²⁹ However, it can be argued that consent should be understood in a "richer" sense: as full and truthful understanding of what is involved that is free from all pressures.³³⁰

R. V MCNALLY [2014] 2 W.L.R. 200
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

7-125

In this case, the defendant, "who was female", contacted the victim (Y) over a social networking website and had claimed to be a young male.

³³¹ Over a period of three-and-a-half years M and Y developed a romantic relationship. Y considered the defendant, who dressed as a boy, to be her boyfriend. M visited Y on four occasions when M was aged 17 and Y 16. During those visits, there were numerous occasions of oral and digital penetration of Y. Y discovered that M was not in fact biologically male. M was subsequently convicted of assault by penetration. The case for the prosecution was that Y's consent was obtained by fraudulent deception that the defendant was a male and that had she known this she would not have consented to acts of vaginal penetration.

LEVESON LJ:

"[25] In reality, some deceptions (such as, for example, in relation to wealth) will obviously not be sufficient to vitiate consent. In our judgment, Lord Judge CJ's observation that 'the evidence relating to "choice" and the "freedom" to make any particular choice must be approached in a broad commonsense way' identifies the route through the dilemma.

[26] Thus while, in a physical sense, the acts of assault by penetration of the vagina are the same whether perpetrated by a male or a female, the sexual nature of the acts is, on any common sense view, different where the complainant is deliberately deceived by a defendant into believing that the latter is a male. Assuming the facts to be proved as alleged, M chose to have sexual encounters with a boy and her preference (her freedom to choose whether or not to have a sexual encounter with a girl) was removed by the defendant's deception.

[27] It follows from the foregoing analysis that we conclude that, depending on the circumstances, deception as to gender can vitiate consent ..."

Appeal against conviction dismissed

7-126

The Court of Appeal in McNally did not interpret whether the appellant's deceit fell within the ambit of s.76(2)(a), as it was never suggested that the conclusive presumptions applied, therefore, the relevance of the deception was restricted to the impact it had on the construction of s.74. It was clear that the court was persuaded by previous authority that included situations of “active deception”, as against cases involving defendants who fail to correct an assumption.³³² This approach is similar to that taken in Jheeta in that the courts appear to be willing to utilise the breadth of s.74 in cases involving active deceptions where a narrow interpretation of s.76 is applied, or as in this case where s.76 is not raised at all. However, we are to some extent left unsure whether deceit as to gender will ever fall under s.76(2)(a), or alternatively whether this is a question of fact that must be left to the jury to determine with reference only to the meaning of freedom of choice under s.74.

Whether such a deceit should conclusively vitiate consent is highly questionable, especially if we consider the fact that the nature and purpose of the act, i.e. to penetrate the vagina for sexual pleasure, remains the same regardless of the gender of the defendant.³³³ Lord Leveson’s statement that common sense tells us that the nature of the sexual act changes where there is a deception as to gender may not be as commonsensical as he suggests. Can the nature of an act change retrospectively when both parties previously understood that act to be sexual penetration of one person by another? Lord Leveson’s reasoning seems to assume that the nature is changed, not simply because the appellant was of a different gender to that portrayed to the complainant, but also because the assumed sexual orientation of the complainant was heterosexual, inferring the sexual contact must have been unwanted. It is less than clear whether the crucial element in the court’s decision in McNally was that the deception was “active” or whether the change in nature of the act was simply contingent on the sexual orientation of the complainant. There may well be implications for each of these questions to the notions of “free choice” and “agreement”, such that the victim was denied a free choice to make an informed agreement about the sexual act, but it is considered to be disingenuous to conclude that deception as to gender retrospectively modifies the sexual quality of the act in such a situation. Sexual acts do not become non-sexual just because they are carried out between people of the same gender. The problem with the reasoning provided in McNally is that it may lead to a situation where transgender individuals must reveal their biological sex to prospective sexual partners or risk being prosecuted and labelled as rapists/sexual offenders.³³⁴ This will surely give rise to potential breaches of art.8 of the European Convention on Human Rights which guarantees the right to respect for a private life.³³⁵ By analogy, and if taken literally, Lord Leveson's assertion could also mean that a heterosexual person will have potentially been raped by a homosexual person, where the homosexual person actively makes the representation that he is in fact straight. If after a sexual act the former finds out that the homosexual person was not in fact heterosexual but was instead "experimenting", the question arises: does the sexual nature of the act change rendering the homosexual partner a rapist? Such an outcome would certainly not be commonsensical.

Deceptions involving preconditions

7-127

There have been a number of other situations where deceptions involve an expressed precondition. Such was the case in *Assange*³³⁶ where the Divisional Court was concerned with the question of whether sexual intercourse without a condom, where it had been made clear that consent was conditional on the use of a condom, would vitiate consent. Taking a narrow approach to interpreting s.76(2)(a), Sir John Thomas P held that the conclusive presumption did not apply in such a situation but that s.74 could and should be used to determine whether the deliberate removal of the condom restricted the complainant's capacity to make a free choice.³³⁷

A similar precondition arose in *R. (F)*³³⁸ involving a complainant who agreed to sexual intercourse on the basis that the defendant would not ejaculate into her vagina. The defendant agreed to this knowing that he would in fact ejaculate. The court held that:

"if before penetration began the intervener had made up his mind that he would penetrate and ejaculate within the claimant's vagina, or ... he decided that he would not withdraw at all, just because he deemed the claimant subservient to his control, she was deprived of choice relating to the crucial feature on which her original consent to sexual intercourse was based. Accordingly her consent was negated. Contrary to her wishes, and knowing that she would not have consented, and did not consent to penetration or the continuation of penetration if she had any inkling of his intention, he deliberately ejaculated within her vagina. In law, this combination of circumstances falls within the statutory definition of rape.”³³⁹

Failure to disclose information

7–128

Beyond active deceptions and situations involving preconditions are those cases where someone fails to reveal a fact that will affect someone’s freedom of choice to consent. Such a situation may arise where the defendant fails to inform his sexual partner that he is HIV positive. The courts have taken a more restrictive approach in these cases, holding that consent to sexual intercourse is valid.³⁴⁰ Instead, the failure to inform the complainant will negate consent for the purposes of, for example, the Offences against the Person Act 1861 ss.18 or 20 if that person were to become infected with HIV.³⁴¹ However, it should be noted that Lord Leveson in McNally suggested that the court in B did not decide that deception as to HIV status could never vitiate consent. Rather, the court had left it open as to whether consent would be negated, if for example the defendant was asked about his HIV status and actively deceived the complainant. This again leaves upon the possibility that deception as to one’s sexual health may in some circumstances lead to the vitiation of consent.³⁴²

(b) The evidential presumptions

7–129

As well as the conclusive presumptions, s.75 creates six evidential presumptions. This is an exhaustive list; thus, additions may only be made to it by Parliament.³⁴³ The content of s.75 changed significantly during the reform process. Threats of harm (other than immediate violence) or other serious detriment to the victim or others and cases where the consent of the victim had only been indicated by a third party were dropped from the list and s.75(2)(f) was added.³⁴⁴ If the prosecution can prove that the defendant did the relevant act in any of the six circumstances and that he knew of the circumstance, it will be presumed that there was no consent and that he lacked a reasonable belief in consent. The defence will then be under an evidential burden to introduce sufficient evidence to raise the issue of consent or reasonable belief in consent.³⁴⁵ It might be, for example, that the defendant claims that the couple were engaging in consensual sado-masochistic sexual intercourse. If sufficient evidence is raised, the prosecution will have to prove lack of consent or reasonable belief beyond reasonable doubt.³⁴⁶ As the Judicial Studies Board has noted, the Act does not specify whether it is for the judge or the jury to decide whether the evidential burden is discharged, but the Board's direction assumes that it is a matter for the judge and that "although each case will turn on its facts, it is thought that in many cases a section 75 direction will not be appropriate".³⁴⁷ In circumstances when it is necessary to give a direction, the Court of Appeal has urged trial judges to take care so as to avoid the risk of elevating the presumptions to the level of the conclusive presumptions.³⁴⁸

(iii) The relationship between the presumptions and the general definition

JENNIFER TEMKIN AND ANDREW
ASHWORTH, "THE SEXUAL OFFENCES
ACT 2003: (1) RAPE, SEXUAL
ASSAULTS AND THE PROBLEMS OF CONSENT" [2004] CRIM. L.R. 328, 336–337:

7–130

"By introducing a three-track approach to matters of consent and belief in consent—irrebuttable presumptions, rebuttable presumptions, and a general definition of consent—the Act raised a number of questions. Are the three categories intended to reflect some kind of moral hierarchy, so that the most serious cases on non-consent give rise to irrebuttable presumptions and the next serious cases of non-consent to rebuttable presumptions with the remainder falling within the general definition? Or is the organising principle one of clarity and certainty, so that it is the clearest cases (not necessarily the worst) that give rise to irrebuttable presumptions and the next clearest to rebuttable presumptions, with the remainder falling within the general definition? Or is it a mixture of the two, with an added element of common law history? One would have thought that consideration ought to be given to marking out the worst cases of non-consent by means of irrebuttable presumptions, but that appears not to have happened.”

7–131

It is by no means certain that all the right circumstances have been included in the list of evidential presumptions and it is certainly questionable whether the conclusive presumptions are necessarily the “worst”.³⁴⁹ There is a compelling argument, for example, that the fact that the victim was unconscious at the time of the act should have been included as a conclusive presumption rather than an evidential presumption. Had the presumptions only applied to rape and assault by penetration then this might well have been easier to achieve. As it is, it is appropriate that a conclusive presumption should not be applied to a defendant who sexually touches his sleeping partner, as is their habit, during the course of a night.³⁵⁰

What does seem clear is that juries are directed to the presumptions first, but only, of course, if applicable to the facts of the case. In practice, it seems that cases falling under s.75 are rare and so it is uncommon for the presumptions to be introduced. The general definition applies in the many cases where the presumptions do not, such as, for example, where there are threats of non-immediate violence or threats of other kinds. It is in such situations that juries will continue to experience difficulties in coming to a conclusion from all the evidence as to the presence or absence of consent. The fact that we now have a definition of consent may focus the jury’s attention on the right questions.³⁵¹ However, given a definition of consent that “positively sprouts uncertainties”³⁵² it will not make the answers any easier. Indeed, it seems that judges, in trying to guide juries, are tempted to continue to employ the distinction drawn in Olugboja between mere submission and real consent even though, as we have seen, the Government rejected it.³⁵³

2. Rape

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 s.1

7–132

“(1) A person (A) commits an offence if—

- (a) he intentionally penetrates the vagina, anus or mouth of another person (B) with his penis,
- (b) B does not consent to the penetration, and
- (c) A does not reasonably believe that B consents.

(2) Whether a belief is reasonable is to be determined having regard to all the circumstances, including any steps A has taken to ascertain whether B consents.”

Rape is punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment.³⁵⁴

(i) Introduction

7–133

Two very significant issues had been resolved prior to the passing of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. The bar on bringing prosecutions of rape against husbands had been removed and rape had been redefined so as to include male rape.

(a) Marital rape

7–134

Historically, the offence of rape contained the phrase “unlawful”. This was taken to refer to intercourse outside marriage. The origin of this understanding or rule (whether one regards it as one or the other was a part of the debate, as we shall see) lay not in a statute or a case but in the writings of Sir Matthew Hale:

“But the husband cannot be guilty of a rape committed by himself upon his lawful wife, for by their mutual matrimonial consent and contract the wife hath given herself in this kind unto her husband, which she cannot retract.”³⁵⁵

For the following 200 years, Hale’s analysis was predominantly accepted. Husbands who used force could be charged with an offence of violence³⁵⁶ but there was a bar to charges of rape. This marital immunity began to erode, however, from 1949 onwards³⁵⁷ and was completely rejected by the House of Lords in R.³⁵⁸ Lord Keith of Kinkel held that whatever status Hale’s proposition might have had, the common law had to evolve in the light of changing social, economic and cultural developments. He stated that the notion that:

“by marriage a wife gives her irrevocable consent to her husband under all circumstances and irrespective of her health and how she happens to be feeling at the time ... [is] in modern times ... quite unacceptable.”³⁵⁹

7–135

He believed that:

“it is clearly unlawful to have sexual intercourse with any woman without her consent, and that the use of the word [unlawful] adds nothing ... [T]here are no rational grounds for putting the suggested gloss on the word, and it should be treated as mere surplusage in this enactment.”³⁶⁰

Although most commentators warmly welcomed this result³⁶¹ there were doubts as to whether the House of Lords was entitled to act in the way it did. It was described as “blatant” judicial law-making³⁶² amidst allegations of retrospectivity. The matter is now beyond doubt. First, the European Court of Human Rights decided that the decision had not contravened the European Convention on Human Rights art.7.³⁶³ Secondly, legislative reform in 1994 placed the ruling in R upon a solid statutory footing.³⁶⁴

(b) Male rape

7–136

Although it has become increasingly common to talk about the phenomenon of male rape, the law traditionally dealt with non-consensual anal intercourse as buggery.³⁶⁵ However, since 1994 rape has included anal or vaginal intercourse and the victim may be male or female.³⁶⁶ The law has thus moved towards gender-neutrality (although the move is not complete since legally only males are capable of committing the offence). This reform was controversial. It has been argued that it ignores the gendered reality of rape: “It is still men who are raping and women who are being raped”.³⁶⁷ It has also been claimed that gender-specific laws “raise unique and important issues of male and female power. It invokes the differences in male and female ways of understanding force and consent and each other”.³⁶⁸ However, other commentators have supported the extension of the law of rape.

PHILIP RUMNEY AND MARTIN MORGAN-TAYLOR, “RECOGNIZING THE MALE VICTIM: GENDER
NEUTRALITY AND THE LAW OF RAPE”
(1997) 26 ANGLO-AMERICAN L. REV.
198, 219–234:

7–137

“[T]he acts of vaginal and anal penetration are too similar to warrant separate legal classification ... The motives of the assailant ... would appear to be similar for the penetrative acts in question, irrespective of the sex of the victim ... Indeed, it is argued ... that male rape is an act of violence, committed to assert power, rather than being primarily sexually motivated ... [T]he trauma and consequences of rape are similar for both men and women. In addition to any physical injury, victims may suffer serious psychological trauma as a consequence of rape. Both male and female victims appear to suffer similar psychological reactions after rape ...

It is therefore argued that the consequences of either vaginal or anal rape are not sufficiently dispersive to justify an exclusionary gender specific approach to rape, and that, on the evidence, the new law is wholly justifiable.”

7–138

The changes made to sexual offences by the Act of 2003 continue the trend towards gender-neutral offences but draw back from completing the process in that rape continues to be defined so as to be committed by males only.³⁶⁹

(ii) Actus reus

7–139

The Sexual Offences Act 2003 further extended the definition of rape. As well as penile penetration of the vagina or anus, penetration of the mouth by the penis is now part of the actus reus, it having been recognised that this is “horrible, as demeaning and as traumatising as other forms of penile penetration”.³⁷⁰ It is clear that full sexual intercourse need not take place for rape to occur; the slightest degree of penetration of the vagina, anus or the mouth with the penis suffices.³⁷¹ Further, penetration is a continuing act from entry to withdrawal.³⁷² Thus, if a sexual partner revokes consent during penetration and the other, aware of this, does not withdraw within a reasonable time, this will be rape.³⁷³ Penetration of the vagina, anus or mouth with other parts of the body or inanimate objects is not rape but instead falls within the new offence under s.2 of assault by penetration.³⁷⁴ To this extent, rape continues to be a gender-specific offence whilst assault by penetration is not.

As well as establishing penetration, it must be proved, as discussed above, that the victim did not consent to penetration.

(iii) Mens rea

7–140

Section 1 provides that the defendant will be liable for rape if:

- (1) the penetration is intentional, and
- (2) he does not reasonably believe that the victim consents.

It is, by the very nature of the acts involved, unlikely that difficulties will occur in establishing that the penetration was intentional.

However, the issue of the defendant's state of mind in relation to the victim's consent is highly problematic. Under the old law, as well as intending to have sexual intercourse the defendant also had to know that the person was not consenting, or be reckless as to whether she was consenting.³⁷⁵ In the House of Lords' decision in Morgan it was held that where a defendant honestly believed the woman was consenting he could not be said to have the required mens rea for rape.³⁷⁶ It is important to remember that Morgan was decided, and the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 enacted,³⁷⁷ at a time when recklessness bore only its "subjective" meaning: the defendant had actually to be aware that there was a risk the woman was not consenting. This meant that where a defendant asserted that he was genuinely unaware that there was a risk the woman was not consenting, the prosecution would then have to prove beyond reasonable doubt that he was in fact aware of such a risk. This was without doubt a difficult burden to surpass.

Subsequently, the House of Lords in Caldwell and Lawrence redefined the concept of recklessness so as to encompass a failure to consider an obvious risk and initially it seemed as if this interpretation would be applied to the mens rea of rape.³⁷⁸ However, shortly afterwards, mirroring developments elsewhere in the criminal law, the Caldwell/Lawrence definition of recklessness was rejected in *R. v S.*³⁷⁹ As a result, for almost 20 years the mens rea requirement was expressed as whether the defendant was reckless in the sense that he "couldn't care less" whether the victim had consented or not in situations where the claim was not that a genuine mistake had been made. That is to say, if the jury concluded that the defendant could not care less whether the victim wanted to have sexual intercourse or not, but continued regardless, then he would have been reckless and guilty of rape.

The controversy surrounding the decision in Morgan did not, however, subside during this time. While some agreed that its conclusions were a matter of "inexorable logic"³⁸⁰ others believed that, as far as an offence such as rape was concerned, it still left women unacceptably vulnerable.

T. PICKARD, “CULPABLE MISTAKES AND RAPE: RELATING MENS REA TO
THE CRIME” (1980) 30 UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO L.J. 75, 77, 83:

7–141

“There can be no doubt that it is a major harm for a woman to be subjected to non-consensual intercourse notwithstanding that the man may believe he has her consent. There can be little doubt that the cost of taking reasonable care is insignificant compared with the harm which can be avoided through its exercise: indeed, the only cost I can identify is the general one of creating some pressure towards greater explicitness in sexual contexts. To accept an honest but unreasonable belief in consent as a sufficient answer in these circumstances is to countenance the doing of a major harm that could have been avoided at no appreciable cost. Therefore, in terms of simple balancing of interest, it is sound policy to require reasonable care, given the capabilities of the actor. It is true, of course, that not all sound policies can be appropriately pursued through the use of criminal law. But considering the disparate weights of the interests involved, a failure to inquire carefully into consent constitutes, in my view, such a lack of minimal concern for the bodily integrity of others that it is good criminal policy to ground liability on it ... I accept that in many instances, particularly where inadvertence is involved, mistaken wrongdoing may not be bad enough to deserve criminal sanction. But a major part of my effort is to show that there are different kinds of mistakes. In rape, we are dealing not with the kind of mistake that results from the complexity of our endeavours and inevitable human frailty, but with an easily avoided and self-serving mistake produced by the actor’s indifference to the separate existence of another. When the harm caused is so great, it seems clear to me that making such a mistake is sufficiently culpable to warrant criminal sanction.”

Reasonable belief in consent

7–142

The approach taken by the Sexual Offences Act 2003 represents the success of arguments such as those advanced by Pickard at the expense of the subjectivist principle. This is absolutely the right approach. Thus, the question is now whether the defendant “reasonably” believed that the victim consented³⁸¹ and there is no place for the concept of recklessness within this enquiry. If the factual circumstances of the case fall within either ss.75 or 76 then the presumptions will operate.³⁸²

However, when considering whether the defendant reasonably believed in consent, s.1(2) comes into play. It is here that the success described above has the potential to become rather hollow. Section 1(2) states:

“Whether a belief is reasonable is to be determined having regard to all the circumstances, including any steps A has taken to ascertain whether B consents.”

JENNIFER TEMKIN AND ANDREW
ASHWORTH, “THE SEXUAL OFFENCES
ACT 2003: (1) RAPE, SEXUAL
ASSAULTS AND THE PROBLEMS OF
CONSENT” [2004] CRIM. L.R. 328,
341–242:

7–143

“This wording discards the ‘reasonable person’ in favour of a general test of what is reasonable in the circumstances. The Home Affairs Committee applauded the change as avoiding the ‘potential injustice’ of a test that would operate regardless of individual characteristics: ‘by focusing on the individual defendant’s belief, the new test will allow the jury to look at characteristics such as learning disability or mental disorder—and take them into account.’ ...

Has Parliament replaced the ‘couldn’t care less’ test with one that is more demanding on the prosecution and more favourable to the defence? Much depends on how the phrase ‘all the circumstances’ comes to be interpreted. The Government’s view was that ‘it is for the jury to decide whether any of the attributes of the defendant are relevant to their deliberations, subject to directions from the judge where necessary'. Beverly Hughes [Government Minister] expressed the matter slightly differently, stating that it would be for the judge 'to decide whether it was necessary to introduce consideration of the defendant's characteristics and which characteristics ... The judge and jury can take into account all or any characteristics and circumstances that they wish to, and it is best that we leave that decision to the judge and jury for each case.' By what standards is it to be decided which characteristics are 'relevant'? Much will depend upon the Specimen Directions³⁸³ and the Court of Appeal ...

In Protecting the Public the Government expressed its concern that the Morgan test 'leads many victims who feel that the system will not give them justice, not to report incidents or press for them to be brought to trial'. Accordingly, it decided to alter the test 'to include one of reasonableness under the law'. But the present formulation is unlikely to provide the incentive to report or pursue the case that the Government is seeking. The broad reference to 'all the circumstances' is an invitation to the jury to scrutinise the complainant's behaviour to determine whether there was anything about it which could have induced a reasonable belief in consent. In this respect the Act contains no challenge to society's norms and stereotypes about either the relationship between men and women or other sexual situations, and leaves open the possibility that these stereotypes will determine assessments of reasonableness."

7-144

So what "circumstances" are the courts likely to decide are relevant? It might well be that the youth, sexual inexperience or the learning difficulties of defendants would be deemed to be relevant in determining whether their belief in consent was reasonable. In TS,³⁸⁴ for example, when fresh evidence was introduced concerning the diagnosis of the defendant with Asperger's syndrome, the Court of Appeal quashed his conviction and ordered a retrial as his condition could have affected his ability to understand the victim's intentions. Given many judges' strong adherence to subjectivism in the past, taking into account the characteristics of the individual defendant might well be seen to be a "means of ameliorating what they might perceive to be the harshness involved in the objective test".³⁸⁵ However, it is submitted that the courts must exercise the utmost caution. For instance, what if the defendant has been brought up with the complete conviction that a woman's consent is worthless? Are these attributes that the jury can consider when determining whether the defendant's belief is a reasonable one? Such an issue was raised in the case of R. v MA where at sentencing it was asserted by defence counsel that the defendant (who originated from outside the UK) should have been treated "slightly differently from a man who had been brought up in the United Kingdom ... to reflect that his offending was based on his belief that he had a right to rape his wife".³⁸⁶ This submission received short shrift from Mr Griffith Williams J who held that:

"We reject that submission out of hand. No man, whatever his background, whatever his race, whatever his creed, has the right to rape his wife."³⁸⁷

Taking such characteristics and circumstances into account would largely subvert the objective test enshrined in the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Although the decision in R. v MA relates to sentencing matters, it suggests that the courts will be reluctant to entertain evidence pertaining to a defendant's cultural background which gives rise to a belief that would otherwise be seen "objectively" as unreasonable. However, what if the defendant's belief is based, not on his cultural understandings about consent, but on a delusion caused by a psychiatric condition? Should such a circumstance be considered when determining whether the defendant's belief is reasonable?

R. v B [2013] 1 CR. APP. R. 36
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

7-145

The defendant was convicted, inter alia, of the rape of his partner. A medical expert submitted that at the time of the offences the defendant had likely to have been suffering from paranoid schizophrenia which had resulted in a number of delusional beliefs. The expert submitted that the acts of sexual intercourse might have been motivated by the defendant's delusional beliefs that he had sexual healing powers. However, any such delusions had not affected his ability to understand whether the complainant was consenting.

HUGHES LJ:

“[24] The [trial] judge was invited to direct the jury that if and when it came to considering the reasonableness of any belief by the defendant that the complainant was consenting, it was entitled to take into account his mental condition at the time. After argument and careful consideration, he declined to do so. He gave the jury an admirably clear and untechnical direction that the mental condition was not to be taken into account. He said:

‘If you are satisfied so that you are sure that she was not consenting on the occasion you are considering, you then go on to consider this issue of reasonable belief. This is where you are focusing on what is in the defendant's mind. You have considered her position as to whether she was consenting. Now let us look at him and what he was or might have been believing ...

As a matter of public policy the law does not permit defendants suffering from mental illness to avoid the consequences of their crimes by relying upon the explanation: “I only did it because I was mentally ill”. That may sound harsh but you can see the sense behind it, because if mental illness did operate as an excuse for criminal conduct it would be carte blanche. The law is not a total ass, because mental illness may well have a role to play in influencing sentence ...

If ... you find that he did have a belief or might have had a belief that she was consenting to the particular act of intercourse, then you have to go on and consider the reasonableness of that belief.

Given the facts in this case it is important to understand that a delusional belief in consent or a belief in consent which is the result of his mental illness cannot be a reasonable belief ...

Ask yourselves what society would reasonably expect of a person not suffering from mental illness, not suffering from mental illness, who found themselves in the circumstances that pertained on each of the occasions ...

To try to explain it in simple terms, if you put the mental illness out of the question, were all the signs and signals such that someone who had been in a relationship with her all those years would have picked up on the signals and realised that she was not consenting, or were the signals such that someone would have, or might have, thought “Yes, she is consenting” and have carried on?’ ...

7-146

[25] Mr Spence QC submits that this was wrong. The judge ought, he says, to have directed the jury in very general terms that the question of whether the belief was reasonable was whether it was reasonable in the particular circumstances of the defendant, which included his mental illness. The judge should, says Mr Spence, have given no other or more specific guidance, leaving the matter to the jury at large.

[26] Mr Cray for the Crown submits that the judge was right. A delusional belief may, he says, be a genuine one, but it is by definition an irrational and thus an unreasonable one ...

[28] We were taken de bene esse to the report of the Home Affairs Committee of the House of Commons at the time that the Bill which became the Sexual Offences Act 2003 was passing through Parliament. At the time there was debate (inter alia) as to the form the consent provisions in the Bill should take. One proposal was that it should require a two-stage determination. The first would be whether a reasonable person would have doubted consent. If yes, then the second stage would be whether the defendant acted in a way that a reasonable person would consider sufficient to resolve the doubt. That was not adopted (and would undoubtedly have been complex to apply). Nor was a further alternative formulation adopted, namely that the test should be what a reasonable person would have thought, if he shared the characteristics of the defendant. The government’s view ... was reported as being strongly in favour of an objective element in the test for belief in consent, on the grounds that it was not unreasonable to require a person to take care to establish that a sexual event as consensual; the cost to him was very slight whilst the cost to a victim of forced sexual activity was very high indeed ...

[35] ... we take the clear view that such delusional beliefs cannot in law render reasonable a belief that his partner was consenting when in fact she was not. The Act does not ask whether it was reasonable (in the sense of being understandable or not his fault) for the defendant to suffer from the mental condition which he did. Normally no doubt, absent at least fault such as self-induced intoxication by drink or drugs, the answer to that in the case of acute illness such as this defendant seems to have suffered will be that it is reasonable. What the answer would be if the condition were an antisocial, borderline or psychopathic personality disorder may be more problematic. But the Act asks a different question: whether the belief in consent was a reasonable one. A delusional belief in consent, if entertained, would be, by definition, irrational and thus unreasonable, not reasonable. If such delusional beliefs were capable of being described as reasonable, then the more irrational the belief of the defendant the better would be its prospects of being held reasonable ...

[40] We conclude that unless and until the state of mind amounts to insanity in law, then under the rule enacted in the Sexual Offences Act 2003 beliefs in consent arising from conditions such as delusional psychotic illness or personality disorders must be judged by objective standards of reasonableness and not by taking into account a mental disorder which induced a belief which could not reasonably arise without it ...

[41] It does not follow that there will not be cases in which the personality or abilities of the defendant may be relevant to whether his positive belief in consent was reasonable. It may be that cases could arise in which the reasonableness of such belief depends on the reading by the defendant of subtle social signals, and in which his impaired ability to do so is relevant to the reasonableness of his belief. We do not attempt exhaustively to foresee the circumstances which might arise in which a belief might be held which is not in any sense irrational, even though most people would not have held it. Whether (for example) a particular defendant of less than ordinary intelligence or with demonstrated inability to recognise behavioural cues might be such a case, or whether his belief ought properly to be characterised as unreasonable, must await a decision on specific facts. It is possible, we think, that beliefs generated by such factors may not properly be described as irrational and might be judged by a jury not to be unreasonable on their particular facts. But once a belief could be judged reasonable only by a process which labelled a plainly irrational belief as reasonable, it is clear that it cannot be open to the jury so to determine without stepping outside the Act.”

Appeal dismissed

7-147

Following this decision, it seems clear that psychological disorders which give rise to a delusional belief in consent cannot be considered as part of “all the circumstances” when determining whether the defendant’s belief was reasonable. The reasoning for this is twofold. First, is that a delusion is considered to be irrational and as such by its very definition cannot be considered to be reasonable; thereby falling outside the ambit of the section. Secondly, it is a matter of public policy that defendants who are mentally ill are not to be provided with a carte blanche excuse for raping others. The decision is also interesting in that it leaves open the possibility for those who miss certain social cues, or who are of low intelligence, to raise such factors when a determination is made about the reasonableness of their belief in consent.³⁸⁸ What this could mean in practice is that those with learning disabilities may raise their disability during such considerations, while those whose belief is “irrational” based on a psychological disorder will be excluded from doing so. Whether it is fair to treat someone with a psychological disorder as culpable for their acts while potentially exonerating those who miss social cues, is far from incontestable. It remains to be seen what other circumstances of the defendant will be considered.

3. Other non-consensual sexual offences

(i) Assault by penetration

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 s.2:

7-148

“(1) A person (A) commits an offence if—

- (a) he intentionally penetrates the vagina or anus of another person (B) with a part of his body or anything else,
- (b) the penetration is sexual,
- (c) B does not consent to the penetration, and
- (d) A does not reasonably believe that B consents.”

7–149

Assault by penetration is punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment.³⁸⁹ This offence, together with sexual assault under s.3, broadly replaces the old law of indecent assault which carried a maximum of ten years’ imprisonment.³⁹⁰ The offence of assault by penetration is an overdue recognition that penetration by objects other than the penis may be every bit as traumatising and harmful as rape.³⁹¹ Thus, non-consensual, sexual penetration of the vagina or anus by, for example, a finger or a bottle or other object carries the same maximum as the offence of rape. This is a broad offence. It might be feared that routine internal medical examinations might fall foul of its provisions. However, two factors preclude this. First, in such cases the doctor or nurse obtains the consent of the patient to conduct the examination.

Secondly, the penetration is not “sexual”. This term is present in a number of offences in the Act and is considered below in relation to sexual assault where it may be more problematic than in relation to assault by penetration.

The mens rea for assault by penetration is that the defendant intends to penetrate and does not reasonably believe that the victim consents.³⁹²

(ii) Sexual assault

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 s.3:

7–150

- “(1) A person (A) commits an offence if—
 - (a) he intentionally touches another person (B),

- (b) the touching is sexual,
- (c) B does not consent to the touching, and
- (d) A does not reasonably believe that B consents.”

7–151

Sexual assault is punishable by a maximum of ten years' imprisonment.³⁹³

This offence replaces the repealed offence of indecent assault.³⁹⁴ In Protecting the Public, the view taken was that “some non-penetrative sexual assaults amount to extremely serious offending and can cause high levels of fear, degradation and trauma”.³⁹⁵ Thus, this offence carries a high maximum penalty but it is also recognised that this is a very broad offence and that less serious instances will receive lower sentences.³⁹⁶ In addition to establishing that the victim does not consent, there are two key elements to be considered in the actus reus. First, there must be touching (a term used in other offences in the Act as well). Section 78(9) states that this “includes touching (a) with any part of the body, (b) with anything else, (c) through anything and in particular includes touching amounting to penetration”. In H,³⁹⁷ the defendant approached a woman who was walking her dog and asked her: “Do you fancy a shag?” He then grabbed her tracksuit bottom and pulled her towards him. She was able to break free and run to safety. His conviction under s.3 was upheld by the Court of Appeal: “Where a person is wearing clothing we consider that touching of the clothing constitutes touching for the purpose of section 3”.³⁹⁸

The meaning of sexual

7–152

The other matter that has to be established under s.3 is that the touching is “sexual”, a term used in many offences of the Act. In many instances, it will be very clear that the touching is sexual. If there is doubt, however, guidance can be given to the jury in accordance with the following provision.

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 s.78:

“[P]enetration, touching or any other activity is sexual if a reasonable person would consider that—

- (a) whatever its circumstances or any person’s purpose in relation to it, it is because of its nature sexual, or
- (b) because of its nature it may be sexual and because of its circumstances or the purpose of any person in relation to it (or both) it is sexual.”³⁹⁹

Under para.(a) the focus is upon the nature of the act itself, rather than surrounding circumstances: would a reasonable person consider that the act is inherently sexual? Paragraph (b), however, is much broader. If a reasonable person would conclude that the behaviour might be sexual, whether it is sexual is then decided by looking at the defendant’s motive and the surrounding circumstances. In H (above), the Court of Appeal had doubts as to whether the removal of shoes by a fetishist⁴⁰⁰ satisfied the first part of (b) (that the touching “may be sexual”). If this view was taken by a jury, in theory it would not go on to consider the defendant’s purpose or the surrounding circumstances at all. This seems a little unrealistic. First, a jury might well decide that the removal of shoes was by itself capable of being sexual. Secondly, even though (b) requires a jury to separate the two questions, it seems more likely that it would look at the facts holistically in deciding whether what happened was “sexual”. There are dangers in leaving such an important concept as “sexual” to be decided by the jury and as the court comments in H, it is perhaps over-optimistic to hope that recourse to s.78(b) will be limited to unusual circumstances.⁴⁰¹

The mens rea of sexual assault is that the defendant touches intentionally and does not reasonably believe that the victim consents.⁴⁰²

(iii) Intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 s.4:

7-155

“(1) A person (A) commits an offence if—

- (a) he intentionally causes another person (B) to engage in an activity,
- (b) the activity is sexual,
- (c) B does not consent to engaging in the activity, and
- (d) A does not reasonably believe that B consents.

(2) Whether a belief is reasonable is to be determined having regard to all the circumstances, including any steps A has taken to ascertain whether B consents.”

7-156

Where the offence involves penetration of the vagina or anus or mouth (in the latter case by the defendant's penis), the maximum sentence is that of life imprisonment.⁴⁰³ In other situations the maximum sentence is ten years' imprisonment.⁴⁰⁴ The indictment must specify whether the basic or aggravated offence is being charged.

This is a very broad offence that, like s.3, encompasses behaviour that previously would have been prosecuted as indecent assault. The offence consists of causing another person to engage in sexual activity without consent. Thus, for example, women who force men to penetrate them can be prosecuted under this provision. Further, as Devonald demonstrates, a defendant who forces the victim to masturbate falls within this offence irrespective of whether he is present at the time.⁴⁰⁵

4. Child sexual offences

7-157

It is beyond the scope of this book to explore in detail the very large number of offences which have been created to protect children. In addition to the non-consensual offences discussed above, there are three further types of offences involving children: unlawful sexual activity with a child under 13 or under 16; familial offences; and abuse of position of trust offences. The Act has made significant improvements to the old law. It has, for example, removed the discriminatory provisions that distinguished indecent assault upon a girl from that upon a boy⁴⁰⁶ in a move towards gender-neutral laws. It has also created new offences, such as meeting following grooming,⁴⁰⁷ while other legislation has introduced the new offence of sexual communication with a child⁴⁰⁸ to protect children from new dangers. However, in determining the question of whether the law “strikes an appropriate balance between sexual abuse and exploitation, on the one hand, and permitting the sexual expression of young persons as they proceed through to adulthood, on the other”,⁴⁰⁹ a number of commentators have expressed grave reservations.

J. R. SPENCER, “THE SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003: (2) CHILD AND FAMILY OFFENCES” [2004] CRIM.
L.R. 347, 347–352:

7–158

“The new offences are too many, and there is needless overlap between them; they are badly drafted in a style that combines an excess of detail on minor matters with a failure to deal with certain major ones; and, most seriously, the new law is exceptionally heavyhanded. It ratchets culpability requirements down, building grave stigmatic offences on negligence or even strict liability. And more fundamentally, it renders theoretically punishable with severe penalties (2, 5, 10 and 14 years, and even life) a range of behaviour for which it is inconceivable that anyone will in practice be prosecuted—and for which it would be scandalous if they were ...

The age of consent, as under the existing law, remains 16. But the effect of this is watered down by a range of provisions that punish consensual sexual acts where the willing participant is older. Thus, the Act contains a group of ‘familial child sex offences’ that criminalise all sexual acts where one of the participants was under 18 and the other was of a wide range of relatives or carers ...

The new child sex offences are open to two obvious criticisms: complexity and obscurity, and ‘legislative overkill’.”⁴¹⁰

7–159

The following is a list of the main offences designed to protect children:

- Rape of a child under 13.⁴¹¹
- Assault of a child under 13 by penetration.⁴¹²
- Sexual assault of a child under 13.⁴¹³
- Causing or inciting a child under 13 to engage in a sexual activity.⁴¹⁴
- Sexual activity with a child.⁴¹⁵
- Causing or inciting a child to engage in sexual activity.⁴¹⁶
- Engaging in sexual activity in the presence of a child.⁴¹⁷
- Causing a child to watch a sexual activity.⁴¹⁸
- Child sex offences committed by children or young persons.⁴¹⁹
- Arranging or facilitating commission of a child sex offence.⁴²⁰
- Meeting a child following sexual grooming.⁴²¹
- Sexual communication with a child.⁴²²

The first four offences mirror the core sexual offences (the first three of which were discussed above) but are designed to protect children under the age of 13. In pursuit of this aim, the purported consent of a child under the age of 13 is irrelevant. Further, there is no need to prove mens rea on the part of the defendant in relation to the child’s age. These offences are thus ones of strict liability. While these provisions were intended to and do catch the adult predator, they also catch much younger persons who engage in sexual activity with the (irrelevant) consent of the child under 13. It is entirely possible from the wording of the offences that a boy of 13 could find himself convicted of causing a child to engage in sexual activity under s.8 for kissing and fondling a girl of 12 with her consent—even if he believed she was aged 13 or over. Research reveals that the average age of first sexual experience is 14 for girls and 13 for boys.⁴²³ We may wish this were not true and we may point to the harmful effects early sexual experience may have, but it can hardly be a proportionate response to hold a 13-year-old liable for an offence that carries a maximum of 14 years' imprisonment for such behaviour. Also, if the young couple engage in consensual sexual intercourse, it is absurd—and manifest false labelling—to hold the boy to be a rapist.

The Government's response to such concerns is that prosecutorial discretion will prevent such cases occurring.⁴²⁴ However, as the following case demonstrates there is a danger of disproportionate responses.

R. V G [2009] 1 A.C. 92 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

7-160

The defendant, a boy of 15, pleaded guilty to rape of a child under 13 (she was 12). The girl initially alleged that she had not consented to sexual intercourse and it was on this basis that the most serious charge was proceeded with. The boy argued that the girl had consented and told him she was 15, but pleaded guilty when told that neither her consent nor his reasonable belief as to her age was relevant. He was sentenced to a 12-month detention and training order and to the sexual offender notification requirements under the 2003 Act. The Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal against conviction but allowed his appeal against sentence (imposing instead a conditional discharge).

LORD HOFFMANN:

“[2] [The Court of Appeal certified two questions as being of general public importance: ‘(1) May a criminal offence of strict liability violate article 6(1) and/or 6(2) ...? (2) Is it compatible with a child's rights under article 8 ... to convict him of rape contrary to section 5 ... in circumstances where the agreed basis of plea establishes that his offence fell properly within the ambit of s 13 ...?’

[3] The mental element of the offence under s 5, as the language and structure of the section makes clear, is that penetration must be intentional but there is no requirement that the accused must have known that the other person was under 13. The policy of the legislation is to protect children. If you have sex with someone who is on any view a child or young person, you take your chance on exactly how old they are. To that extent the offence is one of strict liability and it is no defence that the accused believed the other person to be 13 or over ...

[7] The other ground of appeal is that the conviction violated the Appellant's right of privacy under art 8.

[8] [Counsel] for the Appellant ... says that, as he was only 15 at the time of the offence, the Crown acted unduly harshly by prosecuting him under s 5 rather than under s 13, which deals with sexual offences committed by persons under 18 and carries a maximum penalty of imprisonment for five years.

[9] Assuming this to be right, the case has in my opinion nothing to do with art 8 or human rights ...

[10] Prosecutorial policy and sentencing do not fall under art 8. If the offence in question is a justifiable interference with private life, that is an end of the matter. If the prosecution has been unduly heavy handed, that may be unfair and unjust, but not an infringement of human rights. It is a matter for the ordinary system of criminal justice ...

[12] In my opinion, therefore, the answers to the certified questions are no and yes respectively. That leaves only the question of whether in the particular circumstances of this case, it was an abuse of process for the Crown to prosecute under s 5. That is not a question which has been certified. For what it is worth, I agree with the Court of Appeal that the Crown was not obliged to withdraw the charge under s 5 when they found themselves having to accept the Appellant's version of events. 'Rape of a child under 13' still accurately described what the Appellant had done. Parliament decided to use this description because children under 13 cannot validly or even meaningfully consent to sexual intercourse. So far as the basis of plea provided mitigation, they were entitled to leave the judge to take it into account. I would dismiss the appeal."

7-161

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD (DISSENTING):

"[13] Section 5 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, which makes sexual intercourse with a child under 13 a crime of strict liability irrespective of the age of the Defendant and calls it rape, has given rise to some important and difficult questions ... Section 13 of the same Act, read with s 9(1)(c)(ii), makes it an offence for a person under 18 to have sexual intercourse with a child under 13. Unlike s 5, it does not attach the label of rape to this offence. What behaviour then should the criminal law prohibit, and what should it not? To what extent is it reasonable to leave it to the police and other authorities to decide when to prosecute and, where there is a choice, for which offence? These questions have been brought out into the real world by this case.

[14] There is no doubt that when s 5 of the 2003 Act was enacted the protection of children was one of the primary concerns of the legislature. Furthermore ... its purpose is to protect children under 13 from themselves as well as from others who are minded to prey upon them. But the creation of an unqualified offence of this kind carries with it the risk of stigmatising as rapists children who engage in a single act of mutual sexual activity. A heavy responsibility has been placed on the prosecuting authorities, where both parties are of a similar young age, to discriminate between cases where the proscribed activity was truly mutual on the one hand and those where the Complainant was subjected to an element of exploitation or undue pressure on the other. In the former case more harm than good may be done by prosecuting. In the latter case the threshold will have been crossed and prosecution is likely to be inevitable. But if in the former case it is decided to prosecute, a decision still has to be made about the section under which the perpetrator is to be prosecuted ...

[34] Article 8(1) guarantees to everyone the right to respect for his private life, and a teenager has as much to respect for his private life as any other individual. It is unlawful for a prosecutor to act in a way which is inconsistent with a Convention right. So I cannot accept Lord Hoffmann's proposition that the Convention rights have nothing to do with prosecutorial policy ... The questions then are whether the Appellant's continued prosecution for rape under s 5 was necessary in a democratic society for the protection of any of the interests referred to in art 8(2), and whether it was proportionate. Account must be taken in this assessment of the alternative courses that were open to the prosecutor, including proceeding under s 13 instead of s 5, as well as the sentencing options that are available to the court in the event of a conviction under either alternative and the labels which each of them would attract ...

[38] ... There are grounds for thinking that the sanctions that can be imposed under s 13 for mutual sexual activity by a person under 18 with a child under 13 provide all that is needed by way of punishment that is proportionate to the offence. The message that this is an offence can be conveyed to children as well as adults very effectively by the use of these sanctions ...

[39] Section 5, the rape of a child under 13, on the other hand is designed for a different and much more serious situation ... The description of the offence as rape, and all the consequences that go with that description, are entirely appropriate where the act has been committed upon a child under 13 by a person over the age of 18. It may also be appropriate where the person who committed it was under that age. But the lower the age, the less appropriate it will be. The question in such a case, given the choice that is available, must be whether in all the circumstances to proceed under s 5 would be proportionate ...

[40] I would hold that it was unlawful for the prosecutor to continue to prosecute the Appellant under s 5 in view of his acceptance of the basis of the Appellant's plea which was that the Complainant consented to intercourse. This was incompatible with his art 8 Convention right, as the offence fell properly within the ambit of s 13 and not s 5 ... I would allow the appeal and quash the conviction."

Appeal dismissed

7-162

In her speech, Baroness Hale (in the majority) drew attention to the positive obligation of the state under art.8 which might "require the criminal law to provide effective protection for those who cannot protect themselves from the sexual attentions of others". This protection is needed:

"whether they like it or not ... [A]nyone who has practiced in the family courts is only too well aware of the long term and serious harm both physical and psychological, which premature sexual activity can do. And the harm which may be done by premature sexual penetration is not necessarily lessened by the age of the person penetrating.”⁴²⁵

This stance was recently reiterated in Gribby where the court held that:

”’consent’ by the underage victim, even if it of itself is of some relevance, does not cause the offence to be considered as in some way exceptional. The underlying statutory rationale ... is that children under the age of 13 require protection for their own benefit. They need, as it were, to be protected from themselves. Their emotional immaturity precludes, as has frequently decided and as Parliament has confirmed, the notion of any informed consent.”⁴²⁶

As Ashworth has commented, this is:

“a strong argument, but it is questionable whether it is strong enough to justify convicting of this serious offence a young person of 15 on facts such as those that formed the basis of plea in this case. Important as it is to assert the art.8 rights of the girl of 12, the question in the case also concerns the art.8 rights of the 15-year-old. In very few European countries would this case go to a criminal court at all.”⁴²⁷

7–163

As he rightly comments:

“[T]he question for the courts was whether conviction of this very serious offence, carrying a maximum of life imprisonment, was a disproportionate interference with G’s right to respect for his private life. The ... gross disparity between conviction of a life-carrying offence and the ultimate sentence is a fair indication of the disproportionality involved.”⁴²⁸

It is submitted that Lord Hope’s reasoning is much to be preferred to that of the majority.

This case illustrates the very real difficulties that the offences create. Moreover, the problems are not confined to the offences concerning victims under 13. The other offences are very broad and overlap. For example, s.9 creates two offences of sexual activity with a child; one of sexual touching and an aggravated offence of sexual activity by penetration. Both carry the same maximum sentence. The offence distinguishes between victims over and under 13: if the victim is over 13 but under 16 it is open to the defendant to show that he had a reasonable belief that the victim was over 16. That possibility is not open to the defendant if the child is under 13.⁴²⁹ Yet, if the child is less than 13 years old, ss.5–8 (that specifically relate to children younger than 13) could also be charged. This duplication makes the selection of an appropriate charge problematic. More controversial, however, is the fact that all consensual sexual touching between young people under 16 is unlawful. Lord Millett has argued that:

“the age of consent has long ceased to reflect ordinary life, and in this respect Parliament has signally failed to discharge its responsibility for keeping the criminal law in touch with the needs of society.”⁴³⁰

7–164

While setting the age of consent at 16 has much to commend it, as Spencer has commented, the offences “are so far out of line with the sexual behaviour of the young ... they will eventually make indictable offenders of the whole population”.⁴³¹ If the offences are not prosecuted, as one would hope would be the case with consensual sexual exploration, children may come to perceive them as empty threats. If offences are prosecuted, not only may individual injustices result, but also other children may be deterred from seeking medical advice or treatment. In the light of G, the CPS has issued detailed guidelines for prosecutors and it is to be hoped that this will help to ensure that prosecutions are brought in appropriate circumstances and for the appropriate offence.⁴³²

C. SENTENCING

7–165

Rape is punishable by a maximum sentence of life imprisonment as is the offence of assault by penetration. It is now almost axiomatic that if defendants are convicted, they will serve a period of immediate imprisonment. Twenty years ago, the first sentencing guideline case of Billam,⁴³³ made it clear that custodial sentences of five years would be the normal sentence for rape without aggravating features and that only in the most exceptional circumstances would a non-custodial sentence be imposed.⁴³⁴ This general approach was confirmed by the decision in Millberry which also stated that the three dimensions to be considered in sentencing rape offenders were the degree of harm to the victim, the level of culpability of the offender and the degree of risk posed by the offender to society.⁴³⁵ The Court of Appeal subsequently extended this approach to sentencing to other categories of sexual offences.⁴³⁶ However, these cases predated changes made to the law (both before and) by the Sexual Offences Act 2003, which has not only changed the definition of offences but also increased the maximum penalty available for certain key offences. Because of this the Sentencing Guideline Council produced guidelines for sexual offences in 2007.⁴³⁷ More recently, the Sentencing Council has produced guidelines which focus not just on physical harm but also on the psychological traumas caused by rape. The guidelines state that five years' imprisonment should continue to be the starting point for adult rape where there are no aggravating features (category 3), either in terms of severity of harm or level of culpability.⁴³⁸ However, for most cases the term of imprisonment is likely to be much higher. For instance, the Court of Appeal has stated that aggravating features, such as a "campaign of rape" or a "terrible breach of trust" will mean that a sentence of 20 years' imprisonment is not regarded as excessive.⁴³⁹ In Attorney-General's Reference (No.86 of 2006), the Court of Appeal confirmed that the fact that rape occurred within a domestic context did not justify a reduction in sentence.⁴⁴⁰ In considering the extended definition of rape, the Court of Appeal has also stated:

"[I]n approaching the question of sentencing no distinction should be made because of the category of rape. One form could be more offensive than another to the victim. It was very much a subjective matter."⁴⁴¹ life imprisonment. The sentencing guideline states that in the case of an adult victim (category 3) the starting point should be two years' imprisonment. Where the offence falls into category 1 (for example, where there is severe psychological or physical harm and previous violence has been used against the victim)⁴⁴² the starting point is 15 years' imprisonment.⁴⁴³

The new offence of sexual assault under s.3 is punishable by a maximum of ten years or 14 years if the victim is under the age of 13 (s.7). As we have seen, this is an offence that ranges from the very serious to the more minor and the sentencing guideline reflects this.⁴⁴⁴ For example, the guideline states that where the touching is not of the naked genitalia or breasts and there is no significant planning, abuse of trust, or previous violence against the victim then the starting point should be 26 weeks' imprisonment if the victim was under 13 and a high level Community Order if the victim was older than 13.⁴⁴⁵

D. EVALUATION

7-167

The law of sexual offences evokes controversy. There is still much cause for concern in the response of the criminal justice system. Indeed, a study in 2008 concluded:

“As large-scale surveys show, the risk of being sexually assaulted is a tangible threat in women’s lives. At the same time, victims of sexual assault can expect little in the way of redress or assistance. A large number of rapes go unreported, and of those that do come to the attention of the police, only a tiny fraction end in conviction. The message from the criminal justice system could not be clearer. Women must put strict limits on their behaviour, must trust no one and take no risks. And, since even this is not a guarantee of safety, they must learn to live with rape.”⁴⁴⁶

The low conviction rate for sexual offences is alarming, with the overall conviction rate remaining the same since the early 2000s. Even if cases proceed to trial, complainants may be exposed to the most humiliating of cross-examinations by defence barristers and if not, now, by defendants themselves. The statutory provisions to prevent previous sexual history is in need of further reform if we are to protect complainants from harrowing experiences of re-victimisation during the criminal process. At least in relation to sentencing, the stereotypical image of what is rape, which has in the past led to lenient sentencing, appears to be retreating.

In so far as the substantive law is concerned, there have been very considerable improvements as a result of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Reform to child sex offences, which had been the subject of piecemeal development over many years, was long overdue. However, it remains to be seen whether prosecutorial discretion will protect children from unwarranted prosecutions. So far, the indications are not good. In relation to the offence of rape, it is absolutely right that no truck has been given to the idea that there should be different levels of rape depending upon whether there was or had been a relationship between the complainant and the defendant. Any such view, based upon the paradigm of the stranger/violent rape, is built upon a false premise. Not only are most victims likely to know their assailant, but also strangers do not have exclusive dominion over the use of violence. With or without violence, relationship or acquaintance rape may destroy the possibility of future relationships. If the wrong in rape is the objectification of a person then those who are made to have sexual intercourse without consent by people they know are raped.

The arguments that the actus reus of rape should be broadened to include penile penetration of the mouth were convincing and were accepted in the revised offence. In addition, there is overdue recognition of the gravity of other forms of penetrative sexual assault by the offence of assault by penetration, punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment. There can be no doubt, hearing evidence from victims, that the trauma and harm involved in these assaults can be as bad as that involved in rape. Whether such penetrative assaults should be included within a broadened definition of rape, as has been done in some other jurisdictions, is a controversial matter. On the one hand, there is the view that if the wrong is the objectification of a person, one should not distinguish between penetration by the penis and penetration by an inanimate object. On the other hand, there is the argument that, for fair labelling reasons, rape should be limited to penetration by the penis.⁴⁴⁷

7–168

With regard to the mens rea of rape the rule that the defendant need only make an honest mistake about the victim's consent has been rightly consigned to history. As Gardner and Shute argue, those who wish to have sexual intercourse ought to be “astute” to the consent of the other person.⁴⁴⁸ Whether the revised law, which requires a reasonable belief in the victim's consent, has directly helped to increase conviction ratios⁴⁴⁹ in rape trials is difficult to assess empirically. The available data shows that the combined rape conviction rate for completed trials at the Crown Court increased from 41.9% in 2005 to 51.8% in 2011. More recent data from the CPS (using a very slightly different calculation) showed that the proportion of prosecuted defendants who were convicted remained relatively stable at 57.9% for the year 2015–16.⁴⁵⁰ Although this is encouraging, the overall ratio is still much lower than other offences against the person.

It may be that further consideration needs to be given to difficult questions about the burden of proof in relation to the rebuttable and conclusive presumptions. Some commentators have argued for the abolition of the presumptions, replacing them with a “mandatory judicial direction to assist juries with the application of the broad terms of s.74 and pass on Parliament's views about situations where consent is unlikely”.⁴⁵¹ Although there are problems with the consistent use of such directions, and evidence of their effects on juries, Sjolin argues that they remain the most direct way of communicating important information to a jury. Whether this approach would improve the way in which jurors understand both consent and the applicability of elements of the law in any given case is far from certain.

It may be that alternative justice mechanisms operating outside, and in tandem with the law, should be more fully utilised, such as restorative justice practices, which a growing body of practitioners and academics have argued provide for a more effective means of addressing the harms caused by sexual violence.⁴⁵² The main limitation with such an approach is that victims will need to voluntarily agree to participate, while perpetrators will need also to have admitted guilt prior to any dialogical process. Other approaches could be to encourage victims to pursue civil claims against rapists (where the status is one of complainant rather than victim)—although this should be as well as, rather than instead of, resorting to the criminal law.⁴⁵³

7–169

Other commentators have argued that we need to completely rethink the legal framework for sexual offences starting from contemporary liberal and feminist first principles regarding women’s equal interests in and rights to sexual autonomy and physical security.⁴⁵⁴ This has led some academics to argue that the law of rape ought to jettison the troublesome concept of consent from the definition (and use force instead) since in an unequal society no woman is in a position to consent freely. This position asserts that “consent is no more than a notion men conveniently employ to characterise women’s submission as the product of free choice”.⁴⁵⁵ Indeed, if views such as “No can mean yes if I persist long enough” linger in the minds of defendants and even some judges, a woman’s consent (or lack of it) is meaningless anyway.

As noted earlier, views such as these have been profoundly important in changing attitudes, but it is submitted that any redefinition of rape in terms of force rather than lack of consent would bring its own, arguably much greater, dangers.⁴⁵⁶ Continuing to refine the concept of consent is the way forward, not least because it does encapsulate the “wrongness” of rape. Whether this new definition has improved the conviction rate for sexual offences is difficult to determine. As noted above, encouragingly, conviction ratios have improved since 2005. In terms of the conviction rate for sexual offences (excluding rape) this is now 78% (2015–16).⁴⁵⁷ This is not to underestimate the difficulty with either the proper definition of consent or the question of how consent is communicated. Defining consent as “free agreement” is still subject to changing attitudes of what makes a free choice and how agreements are made during sexual encounters. Cultural attitudes have proved to be resistant to change; human communication is fraught with the potential for ambiguity and violence is likely to remain an important factor in securing a conviction. However, ultimately, the offence of rape should serve to protect sexual integrity and autonomy.

- 1 For a good overview of these explanations, see S. Jones, Understanding Violent Crime (Buckingham: Open University Press, 2000) and F. Brookman and A. Robinson, “Violent Crime” in M. Maguire, R. Morgan and R. Reiner, The Oxford Handbook of Criminology, 5th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2012).
- 2 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016), Table F3.
- 3 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016), Table F3.
- 4 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016), Table F3.
- 5 From 2009, the survey has included a separate survey to record the experiences of young people aged 10–15.
- 6 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016), Table F3.
- 7 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016), Table F2. Much of this increase can be accounted for by changes to recording practices as well as the recent inclusion of harassment offences under the “violence without injury” category.
- 8 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016), Table F2.
- 9 C. M. V. Clarkson, “Assaults: the Relationship between Seriousness, Criminalisation and Punishment” [1994] Crim. L.R. 4.
- 10 Clarkson, “Assaults: the Relationship between Seriousness, Criminalisation and Punishment” [1994] Crim. L.R. 4.
- 11 These are the most recent reported reasons. Home Office, Crime in England and Wales 2010/11 (2011).
- 12 S. Jones, Understanding Violent Crime (Buckingham: Open University Press, 2000), p.16.
- 13 A. Walker, C. Kershaw and S. Nicholas, Crime in England and Wales 2005/06 (Home Office Statistical Bulletin, 2006), pp.52, 57.
- 14 T. Jones, B. Maclean and J. Young, The Islington Crime Survey (Aldershot: Gower, 1986), p.61.
- 15 H. Corcoran, D. Lader, and K. Smith. Hate crime, England and Wales, 2014/15 (Home Office, 2015).
- 16 Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.29. This applies to common assault and the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 ss.47 and 20. See further discussion below.
- 17 A. Cretney and G. Davis, Punishing Violence (London: Routledge, 1995), p.18.
- 18 Ministry of Justice, Statistics on Women and the Criminal Justice System 2015 (2016). The disproportionate level of violence targeted against women in the home has led to the new offence of Controlling or Coercive Behaviour in an Intimate or Family Relationship, introduced under the Serious Crime Act 2015 s.76. The offence is committed where: A repeatedly or continuously engages in behaviour towards another person, B, that is controlling or coercive; and at time of the behaviour, A and B are personally connected; and the behaviour has a serious effect on B; and where A

- knows or ought to know that the behaviour will have a serious effect on B.
- 19 Ministry of Justice, Statistics on Women and the Criminal Justice System 2015 (2016), p.22.
 - 20 According to 2015 CSEW data, victims believed the offender(s) to be under the influence of alcohol in around half (47%) of all violent incidents, Office for National Statistics, Focus on Violent Crime and Sexual Offences: Year ending March 2015 (2016).
 - 21 Cretney and Davis, Punishing Violence (London: Routledge, 1995), pp.23–32.
 - 22 Cretney and Davis, Punishing Violence (London: Routledge, 1995), p.39.
 - 23 Office for National Statistics, Focus on Violent Crime and Sexual Offences: Year ending March 2015 (2016), p.21.
 - 24 Y. Jewkes, Media and Crime, 3rd edn (London: Sage, 2015).
 - 25 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016).
 - 26 Cole v Turner (1705) 6 Mod. 149; 87 E.R. 907.
 - 27 R. v Lynsey (Jonathan Simon) [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 667 at 671.
 - 28 Lynsey [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 667 at 671.
 - 29 R. v Ireland; R. v Burstow [1998] A.C. 147 at 161. See also DPP v Taylor (Keith Richard) (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 28.
 - 30 Taylor (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 28.
 - 31 Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.39; Taylor (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 28.
 - 32 In Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [2000] Cr. App. R. 339 it was stated that while charges refer to s.39 “in truth, common assault ... remains a common law offence” (at 340).
 - 33 Under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 if the offence is “racially or religiously aggravated” it can be tried on indictment and carries a maximum term of two years’ imprisonment (s.29(3)).
 - 34 CPS, Offences Against the Person, Incorporating the Charging Standard at http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/l_to_o/offences_against_the_person/index.html#a24 [Accessed March 2017].
 - 35 A. Cretney and G. Davis, “Prosecuting Domestic Assault: Victims Failing Courts, or Courts Failing Victims” (1997) 36 Howard Journal of Criminal Justice 146.
 - 36 Tuberville v Savage (1669) 1 Mod. Rep. 3; 86 E.R. 684.
 - 37 Read v Coker (1853) 13 C.B. 850. See also Ansell v Thomas [1974] Crim. L.R. 31.
 - 38 R. v Bentham (Peter) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 11. In this case, the charge was robbery and possession of an imitation firearm contrary to the Firearms Act 1968 s.17(2). The House of Lords held there could be no liability for the latter offence as one could not possess one’s hand or fingers. On these facts, there would clearly have been an assault.
 - 39 Logdon v DPP [1976] Crim. L.R. 121; R. v St George (1840) 9 C. & P. 483; 173 E.R. 921.
 - 40 See, generally, P. Alldridge, “Threats Offences—A Case for Reform” [1994] Crim. L.R. 176.
 - 41 Law Commission Paper No.361, Reform of Offences against the Person (2015).

- 42 Clause 10 (Home Office, Violence: Reforming the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 (1998)).
- 43 Smith v Chief Superintendent, Woking Police Station (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 234.
- 44 R. v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court Ex p. Siadatan (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 257.
- 45 There were also already several laws, both civil and criminal, in existence capable of being utilised against many stalkers. e.g. the Telecommunications Act 1984 s.43(1) makes it an offence to make an indecent, obscene or menacing telephone call or persistently to use a telephone to cause annoyance, inconvenience or needless anxiety. The Malicious Communications Act 1988 s.1(1) prohibits the sending of an indecent, offensive or threatening letter with the intention of causing distress or anxiety to the recipient. The Public Order Act 1986 ss.4, 4A and 5 can also be utilised against persons who stalk their victims in public. For example, under s.4A an offence is committed if a person intentionally causes harassment, alarm or distress by using threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour. The maximum penalty for this offence is 6 months' imprisonment.
- 46 Tuppen v Microsoft Corp Ltd The Times 15 November 2000 QBD.
- 47 Dowson v Northumbria Police [2010] EWHC 2612 (QB).
- 48 Reiterated in O'Neill [2016] EWCA Crim 92 where the court held that conduct causing alarm and distress may not necessarily amount to harassment, the conduct must also be "oppressive".
- 49 Dowson [2010] EWHC 2612 (QB) at [142].
- 50 Discussion of these provisions is beyond the scope of this book. See, generally, D. Ormerod, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 13th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2011), pp.695–705.
- 51 Added by the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 s.111(1).
- 52 See Home Office, Consultation on Stalking (2011). For an overview of the new offences, see J. Gowland, "Protection from Harassment Act 1997: The 'New' Stalking Offences" (2013) 77 J. Crim. L. 387.
- 53 Note there are plans to increase this to ten years' imprisonment under the Policing and Crime Bill 2016. Ministry of Justice, "Press Release: Maximum sentence for stalking to double" 6 January 2017 at <https://www.gov.uk/government/news/maximum-sentence-for-stalking-to-double> [Accessed March 2017].
- 54 Harassment Act 1997 s.2A(3).
- 55 In R. v Qosja [2017] 1 W.L.R. 311, the court had to consider what degree of immediacy and/or specificity was required in relation to the fear of violence for the purpose of s.4A. The court found that, based on a plain and natural reading of the wording of the section, fear of violence included incidents in the future as well as those arising directly out of the incident in question. The court went on to hold that there was no "requirement for the fear to be of violence on a particular date or time in the future, or at a particular place or in a particular manner, or for there to be a specific threat of violence", 318–319.
- 56 Harassment Act 1997 s.4A(1).
- 57 Harassment Act 1997 s.4A(2) and (3).
- 58 As noted above, this is not the case under the newer s.4A where an offence will be committed where the defendant has pursued a course of conduct that has caused the victim "serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on the - victim's usual day-to-day activities".

- 59 Ireland [1997] Q.B. 114. See Lord Steyn at 163 and Lord Hope at 167.
 - 60 DPP v Ramos [2000] Crim. L.R. 768.
 - 61 Cox [1998] Crim. L.R. 810.
 - 62 R. v Constanza (Gaetano) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 492.
 - 63 Ireland [1998] A.C. 147 at 162.
 - 64 J. Horder ("Reconsidering Psychic Assault" [1998] Crim. L.R. 392) argues that the essential wrong in assault is causing fear: "a psychic assault is the sensory and contemporaneous experience that induces a fear of physical interference—whether or not to be inflicted immediately—being done by the threatener" (at 401).
 - 65 Ireland [1997] Q.B. 114 at 122.
 - 66 Ireland [1998] A.C. 147 at 166–167.
 - 67 R. v Venna (Henson George) [1976] Q.B. 421.
 - 68 DPP v K (1990) 91 Cr. App. R. 23. The Court of Appeal in R. v Savage (Susan) [1991] 2 W.L.R. 418 adopted a similar view.
 - 69 R. v Spratt (Robert Michael) [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1073. This same view was adopted in R. v Nash (Lee) [1991] Crim. L.R. 768 and by the Court of Appeal in Parmenter [1991] 2 All E.R. 225.
 - 70 Savage; Parmenter [1992] 1 A.C. 699.
 - 71 This point was conceded on appeal in Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 339.
 - 72 R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034.
 - 73 R. v Brady (Philip) [2006] EWCA Crim 2413: "many of their Lordships observations [in G] have a much wider application" than merely to criminal damage.
 - 74 R. v Brown (Anthony Joseph) [1994] 1 A.C. 212. See also Faulkner v Talbot [1981] 1 W.L.R. 1528. On the issue of the amount of everyday contact to which we are deemed to consent, see R. v Sutton (Terence) [1977] 3 All E.R. 476.
 - 75 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212 at 261.
 - 76 McMillan v CPS [2008] EWHC 1457 (Admin).
 - 77 Collins v Willcock [1984] 1 W.L.R. 1172.
 - 78 Lynsey [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 667. See also Pursell v Horn (1838) 112 E.R. 966 where the defendant threw boiling water scalding the victim. The majority of the court accepted that a battery was not limited to body-to-body contact.
 - 79 Ireland; Burstow [1998] A.C. 147 at 161.
 - 80 M. Hirst, "Assault, Battery and Indirect Violence" [1999] Crim. L.R. 577.
 - 81 DPP v Santa-Bermudez [2003] EWHC 2908 at [10].
 - 82 See D. Baker, Glanville Williams' Textbook of Criminal Law, 3rd edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2012), pp.247ff where he cites authorities such as Scott v Sheppard (1773) 96 E.R. 525.
 - 83 R. v Martin (1881) 8 Q.B.D. 54.
 - 84 R. v Wilson (Clarence George) [1984] A.C. 242.
 - 85 Salisbury [1976] V.R. 452 at 461.

- 86 Ireland; Burstow [1998] A.C. 147 at 165.
- 87 For a view that this case was decided per incuriam and that a battery does require a direct physical attack, see M. Hirst, “Assault, Battery and Indirect Violence” [1999] Crim. L.R. 557.
- 88 Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 339 at 346.
- 89 D v DPP [2005] EWHC 967.
- 90 Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.39. Exceptionally, common assault can still be tried on indictment if it is founded on the same facts as an indictable offence which is charged, or if it forms part of a series of offences of a similar character to an indictable offence charged (Criminal Justice Act 1988 s.40).
- 91 Sentencing Council Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines at <http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/the-magistrates-court-sentencing-guidelines/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 92 Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s.38.
- 93 Police Act 1996 s.89.
- 94 UK Borders Act 2007 s.22.
- 95 The offence is also triable summarily by virtue of the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1952 s.19, Sch.1 and punishable by a maximum of 6 months’ imprisonment or £5,000 fine, or both.
- 96 Ireland; Burstow [1998] A.C. 147 at 161.
- 97 R. v Roberts (Kenneth Joseph) (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 95.
- 98 See paras para.2-103.
- 99 J. C. Smith, Commentary to Cox [1998] Crim. L.R. 810.
- 100 R. v Miller (Peter) [1954] 2 Q.B. 282.
- 101 R. v Chan-Fook (Mike) [1994] 1 W.L.R. 689 at 694.
- 102 Taylor v Granville [1978] Crim. L.R. 482. cf. Reigate Justices Ex p. Counsell (1984) 148 J.P. 193.
- 103 R. (on the application of T) v DPP [2003] EWHC 266.
- 104 CPS, Offences Against the Person, Incorporating the Charging Standard, see fn.34 above.
- 105 R. v Morris (Clarence Barrington) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 386.
- 106 R. v D [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 24.
- 107 “Manslaughter by Causing Another’s Suicide” [2006] Crim. L.R. 1035, 1038.
- 108 This issue is discussed further below. The arguments are also considered at paras 8-083–8-094 in relation to constructive manslaughter.
- 109 Sentencing Council Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines at <http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/the-magistrates-court-sentencing-guidelines/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 110 Sentencing Council, Assault: Definitive Guideline (2011), p.12.
- 111 Both the dermis and the epidermis must be broken (Moriarty v Brooks (1834) 6 C. & P. 684). Thus, a scratch or break to the outer skin is not sufficient if the inner skin remains intact (M’Loughlin (1838) 8 C. & P. 635).
- 112 JJC (A Minor) v Eisenhower (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 48.

- 113 CPS, Offences against the Person, Incorporating the Charging Standard, see fn.34 above.
- 114 DPP v Smith [1961] A.C. 290. It has been held that it is not necessary to include the word “really” in the summing up to the jury (R. v Saunders (Ian) [1985] Crim. L.R. 230; R. v Janjua (Nadeem Ahmed) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 91).
- 115 CPS, Offences against the Person, Incorporating the Charging Standard, see fn.34 above.
- 116 R. v Dica (Mohammed) [2004] 3 All E.R. 593.
- 117 R. v Bollom (Stephen Clayton) [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 6.
- 118 Note that the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.5(1) was recently amended so as to create the offence of causing or allowing a child or vulnerable adult to die or suffer serious physical harm. A person (“D”) is guilty of an offence if—(a) a child or vulnerable adult (“V”) dies or suffers serious physical harm as a result of the unlawful act of a person who—(i) was a member of the same household as V, and (ii) had frequent contact with him, (c) at that time there was a significant risk of serious physical harm being caused to V by the unlawful act of such a person.
- 119 R. v Bollom (Stephen Clayton) [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 6 at [52].
- 120 R. v Ashman (1858) 1 F. & F. 88.
- 121 R. v Bollom (Stephen Clayton) [2004] 2 Cr. App. R. 6 at [53].
- 122 R. v Clarence (Charles James) (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 23; Halliday (1889) 61 L.T. 701; R. v Lewis [1970] Crim. L.R. 647 and Cartledge v Allen [1973] Crim. L.R. 530.
- 123 R. v Clarence (Charles James) (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 23.
- 124 R. v Wilson (Clarence George) [1984] A.C. 242.
- 125 R. v Brady (Philip) [2006] EWCA Crim 2413.
- 126 R. v Stranney (Andrew Paul) [2008] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 104.
- 127 Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212.
- 128 Above, paras 1-046–1-048; 4-056–4-059.
- 129 Criminal Law Act 1967 s.6(3). Of course, s.47 is not actually a lesser offence as it carries the same maximum penalty as s.20. It is nevertheless treated as a lesser offence in sentencing practice.
- 130 C. S. Kenny and J. W. C. Turner, Outlines of Criminal Law, 1st edn (Cambridge: CUP, 1902).
- 131 R. v Savage (Susan) [1992] 1 A.C. 699 at 705.
- 132 R. v Cunningham (Roy) [1957] 2 Q.B. 396.
- 133 R. v Mowatt [1967] 1 Q.B. 421.
- 134 Brady [2006] EWCA Crim 2413.
- 135 J. Horder, “A Critique of the Correspondence Principle” [1995] Crim. L.R. 759, 765. See also J. Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502, 508–509. This approach is criticised in A. Ashworth, “A Change of Normative Position: Determining the Contours of Culpability in Criminal Law” (2008) 11 New Criminal L. Rev. 232.
- 136 Sentencing Council Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines at <http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/the-magistrates-court-sentencing-guidelines/> [Accessed March 2017].

- 137 Factors indicating greater harm include: Injury which is serious in the context of the offence; Victim is particularly vulnerable because of personal circumstances; Sustained or repeated assault on the same victim. Factors indicating higher culpability include (amongst others): Use of weapon; Deliberate targeting of vulnerable victim; Leading role in group or gang. Sentencing Council, Assault: Definitive Guideline (2011), p.8.
- 138 R. v Wilson (Clarence George) [1984] A.C. 242.
- 139 R. v Mandair (Singh Mandair) [1995] 1 A.C. 208.
- 140 Criminal Law Act 1967 s.6(3). This is so even if s.20 has not been charged as an alternative: R. v Lahaye (Dean John) [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. 11.
- 141 E. Genders, “Reform of the Offences against the Person Act: Lessons from the Law in Action” [1999] Crim. L.R. 689.
- 142 Mowatt [1967] 1 Q.B. 421.
- 143 Morrison (1989) 89 Cr. App. R. 17.
- 144 Purcell (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 45.
- 145 See para.2-166.
- 146 Genders, “Reform of the Offences against the Person Act: Lessons from the Law in Action” [1999] Crim. L.R. 689.
- 147 CPS, Offences against the Person, Incorporating the Charging Standard, see fn.34 above.
- 148 Sentencing Council, Assault: Definitive Guideline (2011), pp.4–5.
- 149 Home Office, Racial Attacks (1981).
- 150 M. Malik, “‘Racist Crime’: Racially Aggravated Offences in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 Part II” (1999) 62 M.L.R. 409.
- 151 Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.29. Assaults aggravated by hostilities demonstrated towards the victim’s sexual orientation, disability and/or transgender identity are dealt with at sentencing, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.146. As to whether these characteristics should be included within the Crime and Disorder Act, see Law Commission Paper No.213, Hate Crime: The Case for Extending the Existing Offences (2013).
- 152 Amended by the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 s.39.
- 153 As evidenced by a number of empirical studies see, Home Office, Office for National Statistics and Ministry of Justice, An Overview of Hate Crime in England and Wales (2013). Note that the courts have in some circumstances enhanced a sentence where the crime was racially aggravated, applying the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.145, even though the defendant was not, but could have been, prosecuted with a racially aggravated offence under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 ss.29–32, see A. Owusu-Bempah, and M. Walters, “Racially Aggravated Offences: When Does Section 145 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Apply?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 116.
- 154 H. Corcoran and K. Smith, Hate Crime, England and Wales, 2015/16 (London: Home Office, 2016).
- 155 H. Corcoran, D. Lader, and K. Smith, Hate crime, England and Wales, 2014/15 (Home Office, 2015).
- 156 See M. A. Walters, “Conceptualizing ‘Hostility’ for Hate Crime Law: Minding ‘the Minutiae’ when Interpreting Section 28(1)(a) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998” (2014) 34 Oxford J. Legal Studies 47.

- 157 E. Burney and G. Rose, Racist Offences: How is the Law Working? (2002). Note the offender need not be solely motivated by racial hostility, see s.28(3); DPP v Green [2004] EWHC QB 1225.
- 158 Though the CPS does provide some guidance on this issue stating: “In the absence of a precise legal definition of hostility, consideration should be given to ordinary dictionary definitions, which include ill-will, ill-feeling, spite, contempt, prejudice, unfriendliness, antagonism, resentment, and dislike” Crown Prosecution Service, Guidance on Prosecuting Cases of Disability Hate Crime (2010) at http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/d_to_g/disability_hate_crime/ [Accessed March 2017].
- 159 In DPP v Green [2004] EWHC QB 1225, Rafferty J similarly held that “Section 28(1)(a), as distinct from (b), creates a racially aggravated offence without the requirement to prove racist motive. Disposition at the time is irrelevant” at [16].
- 160 P. Iganski, S. Lagou, “Hate crimes hurt some more than others: implications for the just sentencing of offenders” (2015) 30(1) J. Interpers Violence 1696.
- 161 DPP v Pal [2000] Crim. L.R. 756.
- 162 DPP v Pal [2000] Crim. L.R. 756 has since been said to be heavily dependent upon its facts and it is likely that such demonstrations of hostility would fall within s.28(1) of the Act, DPP v McFarlane [2002] EWHC 485 (Admin); Rogers [2007] 2 A.C. 62.
- 163 R. v Rogers (Philip) [2007] 2 A.C. 62.
- 164 Rogers [2007] 2 A.C. 62 at [12].
- 165 Other ambiguous phrases which have fallen within the meaning of “racial group” have included “immigrant doctor”, central to the case of Att-Gen’s ref (No.4 of 2004) [2005] Crim L.R. 799 (CA) and “a monkey” R. v SH [2010] EWCA Crim 1931.
- 166 Note that an offender can commit a racially aggravated offence against someone of the (presumed) same racial group, R. v White (Anthony Delroy) [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1352. Defendants from minority ethnic backgrounds can also commit racially aggravated offences against victims from the majority white population, see Johnson v DPP [2008] EWHC 509 (Admin).
- 167 Parry v DPP [2005] A.C.D. 64.
- 168 Parry v DPP [2005] A.C.D. 64 at [13].
- 169 R. v Babbs (Richard John) [2007] EWCA Crim 2737.
- 170 Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.29, as amended by the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 s.39.
- 171 Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s.29.
- 172 Added by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 s.143(2). A newer offence of causing serious injury by disqualified driving under s.3ZD was also added by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 s.29(1). Note that under this new offence the driver need not be driving dangerously, as defined under the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.2A, but must merely be driving whilst disqualified. Punishable on indictment by up to 4 years imprisonment, fine or both.
- 173 See para.8-174.
- 174 S. Cunningham, “Taking ‘Causing Serious Injury by Dangerous Driving’ Seriously” [2012] Crim. L.R. 261.
- 175 The offence of “injuring persons by furious driving”.
- 176 Cunningham, “Taking ‘Causing Serious Injury by Dangerous Driving’ Seriously” [2012] Crim. LR. 261, 265.

- 177 R. v Jenkins [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 70 at [18] per Treacy LJ.
- 178 This situation has been exacerbated by the decision in Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212 where it was held that consent could be a defence to common assault but not to assault occasioning actual bodily harm.
- 179 M. Cavadino and P. Wiles, “Seriousness of Offences: The Perceptions of Practitioners” [1994] Crim. L.R. 489.
- 180 H. L. A. Hart, Law, Liberty and Morality (Palo Alto: Stanford University Press, 1963), p.36.
- 181 Hart, Law, Liberty and Morality (1963), p.37.
- 182 Law Commission Paper No.361, Reform of Offences against the Person (2015).
- 183 Law Commission Paper No.361, Reform of Offences against the Person (2015).
- 184 Note: should not be used for cases of low-level injury, as these may be charged as aggravated assault.
- 185 Note: includes every physical or threatened assault which in fact causes injury, whether or not D intended or was reckless about injury.
- 186 Though the Commission also recommends further formal consultation on this issue is required.
- 187 Law Commission Paper No.361, Reform of Offences against the Person (2015), p.208. See also, S. Demetriou, “Not giving up the fight: a review of the Law Commission’s scoping report on non-fatal offences against the person” (2016) J Crim L 188, 193–196.
- 188 See M. Gibson, “Getting their ‘act’ together? Implementing statutory reform of offences against the person” [2016] Crim. L.R. 597; S. Demetriou, “Not giving up the fight: a review of the Law Commission’s scoping report on non-fatal offences against the person” (2016) J. Crim. L. 188.
- 189 Law Commission Paper No.218, Offences against the Person (1980), para.152.
- 190 Proposed Official Draft s.210.0(3).
- 191 As in R. v Cross (Adam Stuart) [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 34 where it was stated of the victim that “in practical terms ... his life was really ended”.
- 192 M. Gibson, “Getting their ‘act’ together? Implementing statutory reform of offences against the person” [2016] Crim. L.R. 597.
- 193 Law Commission, Reform of Offences against the Person (2015), [5.52]. It would also ensure that assaults which cause some harm albeit of a minor nature remain in the Magistrates’ Court, thereby reducing the number of defendants electing for the more costly trials in the Crown Court.
- 194 Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502.
- 195 Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502, 511.
- 196 Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502, 505.
- 197 Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502, 507.
- 198 Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502, 507–508.

- 199 Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” [1994] C.L.J. 502, 515.
- 200 J. Horder, “Rethinking Non-Fatal Offences against the Person” (1994) 14 O.J.L.S. 335, 340.
- 201 Horder, “Rethinking Non-Fatal Offences against the Person” (1994) 14 O.J.L.S. 335, 342.
- 202 A. P. Simester, J. R. Spencer, G. R. Sullivan and G. J. Virgo, Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 5th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2013), p.461.
- 203 Serious Crime Act 2015 s.76. V. Tadros, “The Distinctiveness of Domestic Abuse: A Freedom Based Account” in R. A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes: Essays on the Special Part of the Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2005). For a critique of Tadros’ view, see M. Burton, Legal Responses to Domestic Violence (Abingdon: Routledge, 2008), pp.67–68. Burton finds the practical arguments for a separate offence “unconvincing” and doubts that having a separate offence “can effectively communicate a message that domestic violence is a serious form of misconduct” (p.68). See also, V. Bettinson, “Criminalising coercive control in domestic violence cases” [2016] Crim. L.R. 165.
- 204 See also: assaulting a clergyman in the discharge of his duties (Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.36); assaulting a magistrate in the exercise of his duty concerning the preservation of a vessel in distress or a wreck (s.37). These offences would be abolished under the Draft Criminal Code, in line with the thinking of the Criminal Law Revision Committee that the victim’s identity should generally be relevant to sentencing only and not to the definition of the offence (14th Report, para.162).
- 205 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.146.
- 206 Law Commission Paper No.213, Hate Crime: The Case for Extending the Existing Offences (2013).
- 207 Law Commission Paper No.213, Hate Crime: The Case for Extending the Existing Offences (2013), pp.79–80.
- 208 Horder, “Rethinking Non-Fatal Offences against the Person” (1994) 14 O.J.L.S. 335, 340, 338.
- 209 Such is the case with an array of new offences which specify particular types of physical harm, for e.g. the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.5(1) sets out the offence of causing or allowing a child or vulnerable adult to die or suffer serious physical harm (see fn.X). More recently there have been suggestions of a new offence of causing serious injury by careless driving offence, see Ministry of Justice, Driving offences and penalties relating to causing death or serious injury consultation at: <https://www.gov.uk/government/consultations/driving-offences-and-penalties-relating-to-causing-death-or-serious-injury> [Accessed March 2017].
- 210 Gardner does not accept that fair labelling is concerned with marking relative seriousness between offences. See, further, C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), p.191.
- 211 Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002), para.8.
- 212 Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002), para.4.
- 213 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016 (2016).
- 214 Office of National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending June 2016

- (2016).
- 215 Cambridge Department of Science Report, Sexual Offences, (1957), p.12.
- 216 K. Hohl, and E. A. Stanko “Complaints of rape and the criminal justice system: Fresh evidence on the attrition problem in England and Wales” (2015) 12(3) E.J.C 324 The authors comment that “whereas 24 percent of complaints resulted in a conviction in 1985, only 12 percent did so in 1995, and conviction rates have remained at around a low 7 percent since 2000”, p.326.
- 217 L. Kelly, J. Lovatt and L. Regan, A Gap or a Chasm? Attrition in Reported Rape Cases (2005) (HORS No.293), p.14. As the authors state, findings from these wider surveys have been subject to criticism and may understate the extent of sexual offending.
- 218 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013) p.11.
- 219 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013) p.11.
- 220 The “known” category includes: a date, friend, neighbour, an acquaintance (outside work or school/college/university), colleague/peer from work or school/college/university, or a person in a position of trust or authority.
- 221 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.16.
- 222 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.17.
- 223 See A.W. Coxall, “Lifetime Prevalence, Characteristics, and Associated Problems of Non-Consensual Sex in Men: Cross Sectional Survey” (1999) 318 British Medical Journal 846.
- 224 C. J. Sheffield, “Hate Violence” in P. S. Rothenberg (ed), Race, Class, and Gender in the United States: An Integrated Study (New York: St Martins, 1995), p.393.
- 225 Office for National Statistics, Focus on: Violent Crime and Sexual Offences, 2011/12 (2013), p.75.
- 226 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.17.
- 227 J. Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2002), pp.3–4, 17–19. Research suggests that improvements have been made to police practice and are continuing to be made by the provision of guidance and training for police and rape prosecutors. However, good practice is not universal: see further, Her Majesty’s Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate and Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary, Without Consent: A Report on the Joint Review of the Investigation and Prosecution of Rape Offences (2007).
- 228 See further, J. Temkin, “Prosecuting and Defending Rape: Perspectives from the Bar” (2000) 27 J. Law and Society 219.
- 229 A statement made by, e.g. Julia Mason who in 1996 was cross-examined for 6 days by the defendant, Ralston Edwards (who wore the same clothes that he had worn on the night of the attack). He was later given 2 life sentences. Partly as a consequence of the outcry surrounding this trial, the automatic right of defendants to conduct their own defence was ended: the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 s.34. See further, Temkin, “Prosecuting and Defending Rape: Perspectives from the Bar” (2000) 27 J. Law and Society 219, 320–324; M. W. Stewart, S. A. Dobbin and S. I. Gatowski, “‘Real Rapes’ and ‘Real Victims’: The Shared Reliance on Common - Cultural Definitions of Rape” [1996] IV Feminist Legal Studies 159 and P. Rumney “Male Rape in the Courtroom: Issues and Concerns” [2001] Crim. L.R. 205.

- 230 M. R. Kebbell, C. M. F. O’Kelly and E. Gilchrist, “Rape Victims’ Experiences of Giving Evidence in English Courts” (2007) 14 Psychiatry, Psychology and the Law 111.
- 231 Judicial Studies Board, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2004), para.6.1.7.
- 232 Kelly, Lovatt and Regan, A Gap or a Chasm? Attrition in Reported Rape Cases (2005) (HORS No.293), p.32.
- 233 See further, Fawcett Society, Interim Report on Women and Offending, The Commission on Women and the Criminal Justice System (2003).
- 234 Kelly, Lovatt and Regan, A Gap or a Chasm? Attrition in Reported Rape Cases (2005) (HORS No.293), p.34.
- 235 K. Hohll, and E. A. Stanko “Complaints of rape and the criminal justice system: Fresh evidence on the attrition problem in England and Wales” (2015) 12(3) E.J.C 324, 325.
- 236 Research identifies, as a cause for the concern, the inflated rate of “no criming” at this stage by the police as a result, in part, of prejudices concerning false allegations: Her Majesty’s Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate and Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary, Without Consent: A Report on the Joint Review of the Investigation and Prosecution of Rape Offences (2007), pp.9–10. See also J. M. Brown, C. Hamilton and D. O’Neill, “Characteristics Associated With Rape Attrition and the Role Played by Scepticism or Legal Rationality by Investigators and Prosecutors” (2007) 13 Psychology, Crime and Law 355.
- 237 See further, L. Kelly and J. Lovett, Different Systems, Similar Outcomes? Tracking Attrition in Reported Rape Cases in Eleven Countries: European Briefing (2009).
- 238 In one study of the 194 cases concerning acquaintances, 102 had met within this period: J. Harris and S. Grace, A Question of Evidence? Investigating and Prosecuting Rape in the 1990s (London: Routledge, 1999); see also J. Gregory and S. Lees, Policing Sexual Assault (London: Home Office, 1999).
- 239 Harris and Grace, A Question of Evidence? Investigating and Prosecuting Rape in the 1990s (1999), and see further, Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2002), pp.25–30.
- 240 HMCPSI and HMI, above fn.X, p.iv. See also Fawcett Society, Regional Rape Conviction Rates 2007 (2009). The report highlights alarming differences between the conviction rates of different police forces. See further, M. Coy, C. Kelly and J. Foord, Maps of Gaps 2: the Postcode Lottery of Violence Against Women Services in Britain (London: End Violence Against Women Coalition, 2009).
- 241 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.4.
- 242 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.34.
- 243 Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.34.
- 244 Home Office, The Sexual Offences Act 2003: A Stocktake of the Effectiveness of the Act since its Implementation (2006), p.3. The report by HMCPSI and HMI concludes that in so far as investigation and prosecution is concerned the key challenge is to ensure that practice is uniformly of a high standard rather than making fundamental changes to procedures; above fn.227.

- 245 Baroness A. Stern, A report by Baroness Vivien Stern CBE of an independent review into how rape complaints are handled by public authorities in England and Wales (London: Home Office, 2010); see also K. Hohl, and E. A. Stanko, “Complaints of rape and the criminal justice system: Fresh evidence on the attrition problem in England and Wales” (2015) 12(3) E.J.C 324.
- 246 Office for Criminal Justice Reform, Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims—Justice for Victims of Rape (2006), p.4.
- 247 In one study of reported rapes less than half were reported on the same day as the offence, A. Feist, Investigating and Detecting Recorded Offences of Rape (2007) (Home Office Online Report 18/07), p.24. See further, L. Ellison and V. E. Munro, “Reacting to Rape: Exploring Mock Jurors’ Assessments of Complainant Credibility” (2009) 49 Brit. J. Criminol. 202 and L. Ellison and V. E. Munro, “Turning Mirrors in Windows? Assessing the Impact of (Mock) Juror Education in Rape Trials” (2009) 49 Brit. J. Criminol. 363.
- 248 Office for Criminal Justice Reform, Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims—Justice for Victims of Rape: Response to Consultation (2007), p.21. See further, J. Temkin and B. Krahe, Sexual Assault and the Justice Gap: A Question of Attrition (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2008), pp.57–62, 161–167 and L. Ellison, “Promoting Effective Case-building in Rape Cases: A Comparative Perspective” (2007) Crim. L.R. 691.
- 249 R. v D [2008] EWCA Crim 2557. The Court of Appeal also found it unnecessary for the judge to explain that rape within a relationship could be as traumatic as stranger rape because of the breach of trust involved. See N. Kibble, “R v D: Rape Within a Relationship—Delayed Allegations—Summing Up” (2009) Crim. L.R. 591; see also R v Miller [2011] Crim. L.R. 79 CA.
- 250 Centre for Law, Gender and Sexuality, Response to the Office for Criminal Justice Reform’s Consultation Paper: Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims of Rape—Justice for Victims of Rape (2006).
- 251 Temkin and Krahe, Sexual Assault and the Justice Gap: A Question of Attrition (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2008).
- 252 See further, S. Lees, Ruling Passions: Sexual Violence, Reputation and the Law (Buckingham: Open University Press, 1997), pp.75–78 and S. Schulhofer, Unwanted Sex: The Culture of Intimidation and the Failure of the Law (Cambridge: Harvard College, 1998), pp.47–68.
- 253 For discussion of the extent to which evidence of past sexual experience can be introduced, see paras 7-105–7-109.
- 254 The Court of Appeal has recently commented that every false allegation increases the plight of women who have been victims of rape by making the offence harder to prove and affecting the confidence of a jury to return a verdict of guilty: R. v McKenning (Zara Louise) [2008] EWCA Crim 2301. Where prosecutions for perverting the course of justice are made as a consequence of false allegations of rape, a custodial sentence is almost inevitable: R. v Beeton (Elizabeth) [2008] EWCA Crim 1421.
- 255 This distrust of complainants resulted in the development of rules of corroboration. It was not until 1994 that it ceased to be mandatory to give a warning as to the danger of uncorroborated evidence: below para.7-105.
- 256 These rape myths still apply in today’s society, as evidenced by a recent meta-analysis on the effects that rape myths have on jury decision making processes, S. Dinos, N. Burrowes, K. Hammond, and C. Cunliffe, “A Systematic Review of Juries’

- Assessment of Rape Victims: Do Rape Myths Impact on Juror Decision-Making?" (2015) 3 INT'L J.L., CRIME & JUST. 36.
- 257 S. Brownmiller, Against Our Will (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1975), p.11. In Att-Gen's Reference (No.66 of 2008) [2009] EWCA Crim 87, the Court of Appeal increased a sentence from 6 to 10 years' imprisonment upon a defendant who had "used sex as a weapon" against his former wife to dominate and humiliate her.
- 258 Queen's Bench Foundation, Rape—Prevention and Resistance (1976), p.80; contra M. Amir, Patterns in Forcible Rape (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971), p.131 who concluded, without much supportive evidence, that strong sexual emotion was the dominant motive.
- 259 The ages most at risk are between 16 and 19, Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013), p.14. Other studies report ranges between 1 and 82 years (Brownmiller, Against Our Will (1975), p.272).
- 260 Anonymous letter to The Observer 10 January 1982.
- 261 B. Karpman, The Sexual Offender and his Offenses (New York: Julian Press, 1954), p.482.
- 262 e.g. S. D. Smithyman in W. H. Parsonage (ed), Perspectives on Victimology (London: Sage, 1979), pp.99–120. See also Howard League Working Party, Unlawful Sex (1985), pp.47ff.
- 263 In J. Harris and S. Grace, A Question of Evidence? Investigating and Prosecuting Rape in the 1990s (London: Routledge, 1999), 88% of victims were, at least, acquainted with the suspect and that the offence took place in either their joint home or the victim's home in 35% of cases. See further, D. W. Selfe and V. Burke, Perspectives on Sex Crime and Society (London: Cavendish, 2001).
- 264 G. Williams, "Rape is Rape" (1992) 142 N.L.J. 11.
- 265 The Independent 23 February 1990.
- 266 The phrase date-rape is thought to have been coined by US psychologist, Mary Koss, in 1985 but it can be argued that the very description belittles the seriousness of the offence.
- 267 Amnesty International, Sexual Assaults Research (2005). See also A. Clarke, J. Moran-Ellis and J. Sleney, Attitudes to Date-rape and Relationship Rape: A Qualitative Study (Sentencing Advisory Panel Research Report No.2) (2002).
- 268 Centre for Law, Gender and Sexuality, Response to the Office for Criminal Justice Reform's Consultation Paper: Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims of Rape—Justice for Victims of Rape (2006), p.4. See further, C. Mackinnon, Toward a Feminist Theory of the State (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989), p.174 who argues that it is difficult for women to distinguish between rape and intercourse under current conditions of male dominance. See also M.A. Walters and J. Tumath, "Gender 'Hostility', Rape, and the Hate Crime Paradigm" (2014) 77 M.L.R. 563, who argue that the inclusion of "gender" hostility in hate crime policy and legislation may help to reorientate social understandings about what motivates sexual offenders.
- 269 In the US, many states used to require a woman to show utmost resistance; even now rape may be defined as non-consensual and forced sexual intercourse. See R. West, "A Comment on Consent, Sex and Rape" (1996) 2 Legal Theory 232.
- 270 See Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, 2nd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2002), pp.167–168.
- 271 For an argument that sexual penetration is itself a prima facie wrong, see M.M.

- Dempsey and J. Herring, “Why Sexual Penetration Requires Justification” (2007) 27 O.J.L.S. 467 and J. Wall, “Sexual Offences and General Reasons Not to Have Sex” (2015) 35 O.J.L.S. 777.
- 272 V. Tadros, “Rape Without Consent” [2006] 26 O.J.L.S. 515 at 517.
- 273 “The Wrongness of Rape” in J. Horder (ed), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (Oxford: OUP, 2000), p.205. Contra, A. P. Simester and G. R. Sullivan, Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 3rd edn (Oxford: OUP, 2007), p.467 who argue that psychological trauma, together with physical injury, risk of unwanted pregnancy and infection are very much part of our conception of rape and mean that rape is appropriately characterised as a form of violence as well as a wrong of disregard of the victim’s autonomy.
- 274 See also, J. Herring, “Mistaken Sex” [2005] Crim. L. R. 511, 515–617.
- 275 See T. Dougherty, “Yes means yes: consent as communication” (2015) 43(3) Phil.& Pub.Aff. 225.
- 276 L. Alexander, H. Hurd and P. Westen, “Consent does not require communication: a reply to Dougherty” (2016) 35(6) Law & Phil. 655.
- 277 Lang (1975) 62 Cr. App. R. 50; Olugboja (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 344; Malone [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 454.
- 278 There are higher conviction rates where violence is established: Harris and Grace, A Question of Evidence? Investigating and Prosecuting Rape in the 1990s (1999).
- 279 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 s.32.
- 280 Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 s.2. In Adler’s study, the defence applied for leave in 40% of cases and were successful (in part or wholly) in some 75% of applications. Adler believes that any scheme based on judicial discretion controlling sexual history evidence is doomed to fail, because judges will have to fall back on their own beliefs and attitudes (Z. Adler, Rape on Trial (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1987), p.154).
- 281 J. Temkin, “Sexual History Evidence—the Ravishment of Section 2” [1993] Crim. L.R. 3. See also, A. McColgan, “Common Law and the Relevance of Sexual History Evidence” [1996] 15 O.J.L.S. 275 and G. Durston, “Cross-examination of Rape Complainants: Ongoing Tensions between Conflicting Priorities of the Criminal Justice System” (1998) 62 Jo.C.L. 91.
- 282 Home Office, Speaking Up for Justice: Report of the Interdepartmental Working Group on the Treatment of Vulnerable and Intimidated Witnesses in the Criminal Justice System (1998), para.9.64.
- 283 Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 ss.41–43. In addition, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.100 requires the defendant to obtain leave from the judge when he wishes to introduce evidence that amounts to an attack upon the victim’s character. See further, C. Withey, “Female Rape—an Ongoing Concern: Strategies for Improving Reporting and Conviction Levels” [2007] 74 Jo. C.L. 54.
- 284 Relevant similarity does not necessarily mean there must be a striking similarity, R. v M (M) [2011] EWCA Crim 129 at [48].
- 285 R. v Guthrie [2016] 4 W.L.R. 185.
- 286 For illustrations of where leave was denied see, e.g. Beedall [2007] EWCA Crim 23 (defence wished to ask the victim if he was homosexual) and Winter [2008] EWCA Crim 3 (defence wished to ask the victim—who was in a long-term relationship with one man—about her relationship with another man).

- 287 R. v Harris [2009] EWCA Crim 434 at [17].
- 288 R. v A (Complainant's Sexual History) [2002] 1 A.C. 45 at [79] per Lord Hope.
- 289 However, research has shown that this safeguard is not observed in the vast majority of cases. L. Kelly, J. Temkin and S. Griffiths, Section 41: An Evaluation of New Legislation Regarding Sexual History Evidence in Rape Trials (2006) (Home Office Online Report 20/06).
- 290 R. v Evans [2016] 4 W.L.R. 169.
- 291 R. v. Mokrecovas [2001] EWCA Crim 1644.
- 292 See, e.g. J. McEwan, "The Rape Shield Askew? R v A" [2001] 5 International J. of Evidence and Proof 267. Indeed, trial judges who have failed to consider admissions of sexual history evidence that is later deemed to be potentially relevant and similar on appeal have been sufficient grounds to render a conviction unsafe, see e.g. R. v Andrade [2015] EWCA Crim 1722; [2016] Crim. L.R. 424 CA.
- 293 The Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill 2016–17 was introduced to Parliament on Wednesday 8 February 2017. Section 1(2) of the Bill states that "the cross examination of a complainant shall not involve any matter appertaining to their appearance, behaviour or their sexual history with any unrelated third parties regardless of the nature of the complainant's alleged behaviour either before or subsequent to the current proceedings nor should such matters be admissible as evidence if the purpose is to undermine the credibility of the complainant unless it would be manifestly unjust to treat them as inadmissible". For further discussion on the over-use of sexual history evidence see, J. McEwan, "The Rape Shield Askew? R v A" [2001] 5 International J. of Evidence and Proof 267. Others have, conversely, commented that the provisions are so tightly drawn as to prevent the court hearing evidence which is relevant. See further, D. J. Birch, "A Fairer Deal for Vulnerable Witnesses" [2000] Crim. L.R. 223; N. Kibble, "The Sexual History Provisions: Charting a Course Between Inflexible Legislative Rules and Wholly Untrammelled Judicial Discretion?" [2000] Crim. L.R. 274.
- 294 See, e.g. L. Alexander, "The Moral Magic of Consent" (1996) 2 Legal Theory 165; S. Estrich, Real Rape (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1987); D. A. Dripps, "Beyond Rape: An Essay on the Difference Between the Presence of Force and the Absence of Consent" (1992) 92 Colum. L.R. 1780; A. Wertheimer, Consent to Sexual Relations (Cambridge: CUP, 2003).
- 295 M. Chamallas, "Consent, Equality and the Legal Control of Sexual Conduct" (1988) 61 Southern Calif. L. Rev. 777.
- 296 C. McKinnon, Towards a Feminist Theory of the State (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989).
- 297 In 1992, in Texas, a grand jury refused to indict a man who had broken into a house at night, held a knife to a woman's throat and then had intercourse with her on the ground that, because she had begged him to put on a condom, she had consented: The Washington Post 31 October 1992.
- 298 J. Gardner, "Appreciating Olugboja" [1996] 16 Legal Studies 275, 277–282.
- 299 R. v Olugboja (Stephen) [1982] Q.B. 320.
- 300 In McAllister [1997] Crim. L.R. 233 the jury, e.g. asked for an explanation of the difference between the 2 phrases.
- 301 Home Office, Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (2000), para.2.2.3. See also R. v (1) PK (2) TK [2008] EWCA Crim 434, below paras 7-130–7-131.

- 302 Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002), para.30.
- 303 The Sexual Offences Act 2003 creates a number of offences specifically to protect people suffering from mental disorder: ss.30–41. In R. v C [2009] UKHL 42, the House of Lords considered the issue of capacity in relation to the offence of sexual activity with a person with a mental disorder under s.30. Baroness Hale concluded that in order to have capacity a person must be able to understand the information relevant to making a decision and must also be able to weigh that information to arrive at a choice. A mentally disordered person might be able to appreciate that the act was sexual but not be able to weigh it in order to arrive at a choice [24]. Whilst, strictly, this decision relates to s.30 only, there will be situations involving mentally disordered victims when charges under ss.1–4 could be brought and, it is submitted, this explanation of capacity should be adopted. For a discussion on how the notion of consent to sexual activity for persons with mental disabilities is interpreted by health professionals and lawyers, see S. Doyle, “The Notion of Consent to Sexual Activity for Persons With Mental Disabilities” (2010) 31 Liverpool L.R. 111.
- 304 E. Finch and V. Munro, “The Demon Drink and the Demonised Woman: Socio-sexual Stereotypes and Responsibility Attribution in Rape Trials involving Intoxicants” (2007) 16 Social and Legal Studies 591, 591.
- 305 M. A. H. Horvath and J. Brown, “Alcohol as Drug of Choice; Is Drug-Assisted Rape a Misnomer?” (2007) 13 Psychology, Crime and Law 417, 420.
- 306 Above fn.267.
- 307 See further, Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs, Drug Facilitated Sexual Assault (2007). The concept of DAR (drug assisted rape) includes both alcohol and drugs such as Rohypnol. The evidence suggests that alcohol is the most common weapon in DAR while the incidence of drug facilitated sexual assault is unclear (paras 5.2–5.3). For a critique of the concept of DAR, see Horvath and Brown, “Alcohol as Drug of Choice; Is Drug-Assisted Rape a Misnomer?” (2007) 13 Psychology, Crime and Law 417.
- 308 R. v Douga, unreported November 2005, Swansea Crown Court.
- 309 The original proposals in the Home Office’s consultation paper, Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (2000), specifically included a presumption about consent that covered cases where “a person is asleep, unconscious or too affected by alcohol or drugs to give consent”. This recommendation was dropped in Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002). See further, E. Finch and V. Munro, “The Sexual Offences Act 2003: Intoxicated Consent and Drug Assisted Rape Revisited” [2004] Crim. L.R. 789, 793.
- 310 Centre for Law, Gender and Sexuality, Response to the Office for Criminal Justice Reform’s Consultation Paper: Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims of Rape—Justice for Victims of Rape (2006), p.13. Centre for Law, Gender and Sexuality, Response to the Office for Criminal Justice Reform’s Consultation Paper: Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims of Rape—Justice for Victims of Rape (2006), suggests that the prosecution decision not to proceed might have been in breach of the CPS guidance on capacity and consent (p.6).
- 311 See R. v Wright (Nathan) [2007] EWCA Crim 3473 where it was held that it was unnecessary to give a studied direction on capacity to consent as, if the jury accepted the victim’s version of events, she was “as good as unconscious”. See also R. v H [2007] where it was held that it was for the jury and not the judge to decide, based on the evidence, whether the victim had the capacity to consent and/or in fact consented to intercourse or not.

- 312 In R. v Kamki [2013] EWCA Crim 2335 the defendant had been convicted of raping the victim who at the time had been heavily intoxicated. The defendant appealed arguing that the important point that a sexual encounter that was drunken and regretted did not make it non-consensual was not addressed by the trial judge. The Court of Appeal held that where the elements of capacity to consent had been fully dealt with, it was not necessary for the judge to state in every case the simple words that a drunken consent remained a consent.
- 313 Centre for Law, Gender and Sexuality, Response to the Office for Criminal Justice Reform's Consultation Paper: Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims of Rape—Justice for Victims of Rape (2006), pp.10–11. The Government did state that it would keep the issue under review and invite the Judicial Studies Board to consider whether a specimen direction on capacity and consent would assist judges. No such direction has been issued. In Hysa [2007] EWCA Crim 2056, the Court of Appeal stressed that the issue of capacity to consent should normally be left to the jury to determine.
- 314 P. N. S. Rumney and R. A. Fenton, “Intoxicated Consent in Rape: Bree and Juror Decision-making” (2008) 71 M.L.R. 279, 289. See also, A. Ashworth, “Rape: Consent—Intoxication” [2007] Crim. L.R. 901 and J. Elvin, “The Concept of Consent under the Sexual Offences Act 2003” (2008) 72 J. Crim. L. 519.
- 315 P. N. S. Rumney and R. A. Fenton, “Intoxicated Consent in Rape: Bree and Juror Decision-making” (2008) 71 M.L.R. 279; B. Simpson, “Why has the Concept of Consent Proven So Difficult to Clarify?” (2016) 80(2) J. Crim. L. 97.
- 316 The presumptions apply to offences under ss.1 (rape), 2 (assault by penetration), 3 (sexual assault), and 4 (causing a person to engage in sexual activity without consent).
- 317 Judicial Studies Board, Specimen Directions: 16a (2007) states that the presumptions do not apply to charges of incitement (now abolished), conspiracy or attempt to commit the sexual offences in ss.1–4. Presumably the same rule will apply to the new offences of encouraging and assisting crime under the Serious Crime Act 2007. See also, D. A. H. Rodwell, “Problems with the Sexual Offences Act 2003” [2005] Crim. L.R. 290.
- 318 This has led McEwan to conclude that they are not presumptions at all but introduce a substantive rule of law. She also notes that in the US conclusive presumptions have been declared unconstitutional as derogating from the presumption of innocence: “Proving Consent in Sexual Cases: Legislative Change and Cultural Evolution” [2005] International J. of Evidence and Proof 1.
- 319 R. v Clarence (Charles James) (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 23.
- 320 Elbekkay [1995] Crim. L.R. 163.
- 321 J. Temkin and A. Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328 at 334–335.
- 322 R. v Flattery (John) (1877) 2 Q.B.D. 410.
- 323 R. v Williams (Owen Richard) [1923] 1 K.B. 340.
- 324 R. v Linekar (Gareth) [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 49.
- 325 R. v Tabassum (Naveed) [2000] Crim. L.R. 686. See also, R. v Green (Peter Donovan) [2002] EWCA Crim 1501.
- 326 See R. v Piper (Geoffrey Kenneth) [2007] EWCA Crim 2151 where a defendant’s conviction for sexual assault was upheld on the basis that he had deceived the victims into thinking that they were being measured for bikinis to determine their potential to - model when it was for his sexual gratification. See also D. Selfe, “The Meaning of Consent Within the Sexual Offences Act 2003” (2008) Criminal Lawyer 174.

- 327 R. v Devonald (Stephen) [2008] EWCA Crim 527. The prosecution had sought to rely on s.76(2)(b) as well but the Court of Appeal restricted its judgment to s.76(2)(a).
- 328 Indeed, in R v Bingham [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. 29, a case involving an elaborate online deception to pressure the victim to perform sexual acts over the internet, the court held that there had to be a deception as to the nature or purpose of the sexual acts for s.76 to apply. Doubting R. v Devonald (Stephen) [2008] EWCA Crim 527 and following R. v Jheeta [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. 34 the court found that the complainant was not deceived as to the purpose of her acts online and thus s. 76 was not applicable, instead the prosecution need look no further than s.74.
- 329 H. Gross, “Rape, Moralism and Human Rights” [2007] Crim. L.R. 220 and McEwan, “The Rape Shield Askew? R v A” [2001] 5 International J. of Evidence and Proof 267.
- 330 See further, Herring, “Mistaken Sex” [2005] Crim. L. R. 511, 515–617 and J. W. Herring, “Human Rights and Rape: A Reply to Hyman Gross” [2007] Crim. L.R. 228.
- 331 R. v McNally (Justine) [2014] 2 W.L.R. 200.
- 332 e.g. where the D fails to disclose a material fact, such as his HIV status, see R. v B [2006] EWCA Crim 2945.
- 333 Unlike the example of the doctor who purports that he needs to provide a medical examination of V’s vagina, but instead penetrates the victim for his own sexual gratification. In such a situation, the nature and purpose of the act is clearly different between the two parties; for one it is medical, for the other it is sexual.
- 334 For a critique of this case and its implications for trans people, see A. Sharpe, “Criminalising Sexual Intimacy: Transgender Defendants and the Legal Construction of Non-consent” [2014] Crim. L.R. 207. Sharpe argues that non-disclosure of one’s gender identity is neither deceptive nor particularly harmful. The belief that non-disclosure is deceptive and harmful is the result of transphobic and homophobic attitudes which must not be accepted as the norm.
- 335 One might also wish to consider whether the courts were therefore justified in R. v McNally (Justine) [2014] 2 W.L.R. 200 in sentencing a young trans man struggling to come to terms with his transgender identity to three years’ custody and to lifetime registration on the Sex Offenders’ Register.
- 336 Assange v Swedish Prosecution Authority (2011) 108(44) L.S.G. 17.
- 337 For a discussion on deception and consent see K. Laird, “Rapist or rogue? Deception, consent and the Sexual Offences Act 2003” [2014] Crim. L.R. 492; C. Sjolín, “Ten years on: consent under the Sexual Offences Act 2003” (2015) J. Crim. L. 20.
- 338 R. (F) v Director of Public Prosecutions [2014] 2 W.L.R. 190.
- 339 R. (F) v Director of Public Prosecutions [2014] 2 W.L.R. 190 at [26].
- 340 R. v B [2006] EWCA Crim 2945. Note that in R. v McNally (Justine) [2014] 2 W.L.R. 200, Lord Leveson distinguished R v B stating that this was not a case of deception but a failure to disclosure [19].
- 341 Dica [2004] Q.B. 1257; Konzani [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 98.
- 342 One way to address the issue of deception in cases such as Assange, R. (F) and R. v McNally (Justine) [2014] 2 W.L.R. 200 is to consider a separate offence of procuring sexual activity by deception, see J. R. Spencer, “Sex by Deception” [2013] 9 Arch.

Rev. 6.

- 343 Temkin and Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328, 338. Home Office, Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (2000) had conceived of the list as a starting point, with further circumstances being added as the case law developed (para.2.10.7).
- 344 See further, Temkin and Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328, 338–340.
- 345 In R. v Ciccarelli [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. 15 it was held that before the question of the defendant’s reasonable belief in the complainant’s consent could be left to the jury, some evidence beyond the fanciful or speculative had to be adduced to support the reasonableness of a belief. The defendant’s mere assertion of his belief in her consent was insufficient.
- 346 On issues of proof, see Temkin and Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328, 342–344.
- 347 Judicial Studies Board, Specimen Directions: 16a (2007).
- 348 R. v Zhang (Shanjil) [2007] EWCA Crim 2018.
- 349 See also C. Sjölin, “Ten years on: consent under the Sexual Offences Act 2003” (2015) J. Crim. L. 20.
- 350 Temkin and Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328, 338–339.
- 351 Although this is contested: see Tadros, “Rape Without Consent” [2006] 26 O.J.L.S. 515, 518–532.
- 352 Temkin and Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328 at 338. See also, C.S. Elliot and C. de Than, “The Case for a Rational Reconstruction of Consent in Criminal Law” (2007) 70 M.L.R. 225, 236–249.
- 353 See W [2015] EWCA Crim 559 where the court held that “[i]t is possible for a person to submit to a demand which he or she feels unable to resist, but without lacking capacity or freedom to make a choice. This is an example of reluctant consent.” [34]. However, see also Ali [2015] 2 Cr. App. R. 33 where the court held that in cases of grooming the groomer’s actions may subvert the victim’s capacity to make free decisions, resulting in the victim being confused as to the “distinction between acquiescence and genuine agreement ...” [58].
- 354 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.1(4).
- 355 History of the Pleas of the Crown (1736), Vol.1 p.629.
- 356 He could also be guilty of rape as an aider and abetter: see, e.g. Cogan and Leek [1976] Q.B. 217.
- 357 R. v Clarke (James) (1949) 33 Cr. App. R. 216; Miller [1954] 38 Cr. App. R. 1; R. v O’Brien (Edward Vincent) [1974] 3 All E.R. 663; Steele (1977) 66 Cr. App. R.; Roberts [1986] Crim. L.R. 188. In these cases, the court held that the immunity no longer protected the husband if the parties had, for example, formally separated.
- 358 R [1992] 1 A.C. 599.
- 359 R [1992] 1 A.C. 599 at 616.
- 360 R [1992] 1 A.C. 599 at 622–623.
- 361 The most notable exception being G. Williams in “Rape is Rape” (1992) 140 N.L.J.

- 11 where he identified what he described as 4 “powerful” reasons why rape by husbands (and cohabitantes) should be distinguished from that by strangers.
- 362 M. Giles, “Judicial Law-Making in the Criminal Court” [1992] Crim. L.R. 40, 408.
- 363 It ruled that art.7 which prohibits retrospectivity did not prevent judicial clarification and development of case law provided that the development could reasonably have been foreseen: C.R. v United Kingdom; SW v United Kingdom [1996] 1 F.L.R. 434.
- 364 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 s.142.
- 365 This was an offence punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment: the Sexual Offences Act 1956 s.12.
- 366 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 s.142.
- 367 N. Nafine, “Possession: Erotic Love in the Law of Rape” [1994] 57 M.L.R. 10, 24. On this, see further, S. J. Schulhofer, Unwanted Sex: The Culture of Intimidation and the Failure of the Law (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1998), pp.47–68.
- 368 S. Estrich, “Rape” [1986] 95 Yale L.J. 1086, 1149.
- 369 For a critique of this, see P. Rumney, “The Review of Sex Offences and Rape Law Reform: Another False Dawn?” [2001] 64 M.L.R. 890, 894–898.
- 370 Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (2000), para.2.8.4; Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002), para.40. As these are all ways in which the actus reus of rape may be committed, where the charge concerns one act of penetration and there is doubt as to which orifice was penetrated, the indictment can read “penetration, either vaginally or anally”: R. v K (Robert) [2008] EWCA Crim 1923. Further, no distinction is drawn between the forms of penetration for sentencing purposes: R. v Ismail (Abokar Ahmed) [2005] Crim. L.R. 491.
- 371 Hughes (1841) 9 C. & P. 752. Vaginal penetration occurs as soon as the vulva has been entered: Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.79(9).
- 372 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.79(2).
- 373 See the pre-Act case of Kaitamaki v The Queen [1985] A.C. 147 (Privy Council). The issue of what amounts to a reasonable amount of time is left to the jury.
- 374 See below, para.7-148.
- 375 Sexual Offences Act 1956 s.1(2)(b) as amended by Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 s.6A. In deciding whether the defendant believed the victim was consenting, the jury should have regard to the presence or absence of reasonable grounds for such a belief (s.1(2)).
- 376 Morgan [1976] A.C. 182.
- 377 Which statutorily endorsed the decision in Morgan.
- 378 R. v Pigg (Stephen) [1982] 1 W.L.R. 762.
- 379 R. v S (Satnam) (1984) 78 Cr. App. R. 149.
- 380 Per Lord Hailsham in Morgan [1976] A.C. 182 at 214 and echoed by Smith [1975] Crim. L.R. 717, 719.
- 381 In Taran [2006] All E.R. (D) 173 the court concluded that a direction as to reasonable belief was only required in cases where the jury might conclude that there had been some misunderstanding. It was not necessary to give the jury “an abstract lesson on the law” by giving the complicated direction in cases where it was unnecessary.

- 382 Above, paras 7-120–7-129.
- 383 Specimen Direction 16a states that “the Act does not say whether ‘circumstances’ include any, and if so what, personal characteristics of D, and the answer to this question will have to await judicial development”, Judicial Studies Board, Specimen Directions (2007).
- 384 R. v TS [2008] EWCA Crim 6.
- 385 C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), p.201.
- 386 R. v MA [2012] EWCA Crim 1646 at [20].
- 387 R. v MA [2012] EWCA Crim 1646 at [21].
- 388 Such factors not being considered to be irrational.
- 389 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.2(4).
- 390 Sexual Offences Act 1956 ss.14, 15. Some actions, such as oral penetration of the mouth by the penis, formerly charged as indecent assault would now be charged as rape.
- 391 See Home Office, Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (2000), paras 2.3.1, 2.91; Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002), para.44.
- 392 The same provisions apply as to rape, discussed immediately above.
- 393 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.3(4). The offence is triable either way.
- 394 In one sense the new offence is narrower than the old law: the new offence requires a touching to occur; the old offence also occurred when the victim was made to apprehend an (indecent) assault. See further, D. Ormerod, “Sexual Assault: Whether Touching of Complainant’s Clothing Without Bringing Pressure Against Complainant’s Body ‘Touching’ for Purposes of Sexual Assault” [2005] Crim. L.R. 734, 736.
- 395 Protecting the Public, Strengthening Protection against Sexual Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (Cmnd.5668, 2002), para.45.
- 396 Below para.7-165.
- 397 R. v H (Karl Anthony) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 9.
- 398 Per Woolf CJ at [24]. The appellant had argued it could not amount to touching because he had not touched the victim’s body through the clothing.
- 399 As noted by Temkin and Ashworth, Temkin and Ashworth, “The Sexual Offences Act: (1) Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent” [2004] Crim. L.R. 328, and approved by the court in R. v H (Karl Anthony) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 9, this “cannot be said to provide a definition of the term, rather it sets out an approach for determining whether the activity in question is sexual where this may be in doubt” (p.331).
- 400 R. v H (Karl Anthony) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 9 at [11], referring to the pre-2003 Act decision in R. v George [1956] Crim. L.R. 52.
- 401 R. v H (Karl Anthony) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 9 at [4].
- 402 As with the offences under ss.1 and 2, the question of whether the defendant reasonably believed the victim consented is determined by reference to all the circumstances, including any steps taken by the defendant to ascertain whether the - victim consented (s.3(2)). See further, I. Bantekas, "Can Touching Always be Sexual When There is No Sexual Intent?" (2008) 73 Jo. C.L. 251.

- 403 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.4(4).
- 404 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.4(5). This form of the offence can be tried summarily, in which case the maximum penalty is 6 months' imprisonment.
- 405 Above para.7-124.
- 406 Sexual Offences Act 1956 ss.5, 6, 14, 15.
- 407 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.15. See further, S. Ost, "Getting to Grips with Sexual Grooming? The New Offence under the Sexual Offences Act 2003" (2004) 26 J. of Social Welfare and Family Law 147; A. A. Gillespie, "Indecent Images, Grooming and the Law" [2006] Crim. L.R. 412.
- 408 Added by the Serious Crime Act 2015 s.67 (date to be appointed).
- 409 A. Khan, "Comment: Sexual Offences Act 2003" [2004] 68 Jo. C.L. 220, 220.
- 410 See also H. Keating, "'When the Kissing Has to Stop': Children, Sexual Behaviour and the Criminal Law", in M. Freeman (ed.), Law and Childhood Studies (Oxford: OUP, 2012).
- 411 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.5 (maximum life imprisonment).
- 412 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.6 (maximum life imprisonment).
- 413 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.7 (maximum 14 years' imprisonment).
- 414 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.8 (maximum 14 years' imprisonment).
- 415 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.9 (maximum 14 years' imprisonment).
- 416 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.10 (maximum 14 years' imprisonment).
- 417 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.11 (maximum 10 years' imprisonment).
- 418 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.12 (maximum 10 years' imprisonment).
- 419 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.13, makes punishable by a maximum of 5 years anything done by a person under 18 which would have been an offence under ss.9–12 had that person been over 18. This provision, creating a lower maximum penalty, is a very limited recognition of the reality of children and young people's sexual behaviour.
- 420 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.14.
- 421 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.15, punishable by a maximum of 10 years' imprisonment.
- 422 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.15A, punishable by a maximum of 2 years' imprisonment. This list does not include ss.16–19 dealing with abuse of trust provisions, nor ss.25–26 dealing with familial offences.
- 423 K. Wellings, J. Field, A. Johnson and J. Wadsworth, Sexual Behaviour in Britain: the National Survey of Attitudes and Lifestyles (London: Penguin Publishing, 1994), p.40; K. Wellings, "Sexual Behaviour in Britain: Early Heterosexual Experience" (2001) 358 The Lancet 1843.
- 424 See, e.g. Hansard 646, paras 1176/77, April 1, 2003. See further, J. Spencer, "The Sexual Offences Act 2003: (2) Child and Family Offences" [2004] Crim. L.R. 347, 354–355.
- 425 R. v G [2009] 1 A.C. 92 at [41] and [49]. Baroness Hale further stated that it could not be wrong to apply the label of rape given that the law disabled a child under 13 giving consent (at [55]).

- 426 R v Gribby [2016] EWCA Crim 1847, at [26]. This is the position of the law regardless of whether a child under the age of 13 is seemingly an enthusiastic participant (Att-Gen's Reference No.142 of 2015 (R. v Brown) [2016] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 68), nor does the fact that the defendant is under the age of 18 matter (Att-Gen's Reference No.105 of 2014 (Harrak) [2015] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 45).
- 427 A. Ashworth, "Sexual Offences: Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.5—Rape of a Child Under 13—Defendant under 18" [2008] Crim. L.R. 818, 820. See also A. Ashworth, "Rape: Rape of a Child Under 13—Mental Element—Consent" [2006] Crim. L.R. 930 (commentary to the Court of Appeal decision). Lord Hope was influenced by the approach taken in Scotland whereby consensual sexual activity between children can be dealt with under the (more welfare-orientated) Children's Hearing System. See further, B. Malkani, "Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and the Decision to Prosecute" [2011] Crim. L.R. 943.
- 428 A. Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law, 6th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2009), p.345.
- 429 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.9 is, thus, also an offence of strict liability if the victim is under 13.
- 430 R. v K [2002] 1 A.C. 462 at [44].
- 431 J. Spencer, "The Sexual Offences Act 2003: (2) Child and Family Offences" [2004] Crim. L.R. 347, 354 and Keating, "'When the Kissing Has to Stop': Children, Sexual Behaviour and the Criminal Law" in M. Freeman (ed), Law and Childhood Studies (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012).
- 432 CPS, Rape and Sexual Offences: Chapter 11: Youths at http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/p_to_r/rape_and_sexual_offences/youths/ [Accessed March 2017].
- 433 R. v Billam (Keith) (1986) 8 Cr. App. R. (S.) 48.
- 434 As, e.g. in the case of R. v Taylor (Ross Gordon) (1983) 5 Cr. App. R. (S.) 241, where the defendant was found to have mental disabilities.
- 435 R. v Milberry (William Christopher) [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 31. In the joint appeal of R. v Corran (Ben) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 73 the Court of Appeal followed Milberry in holding that where young offenders are convicted of rape or assault by penetration the sentence should generally be significantly shorter than for an adult. However, where there are aggravating features, long sentences will be imposed on young offenders: Att-Gen's Reference (Nos 7, 8 and 9 of 2009) [2009] EWCA Crim 1490.
- 436 Att-Gen's Reference (Nos 91, 119, 120 of 2002) [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 338. The Court of Appeal added the need to deter others from acting in a similar fashion to the factors to be considered.
- 437 The Sentencing Guideline Council, Sexual Offences Act 2003, Definitive Guideline (2007). The sentencing guideline extended the Milberry starting points to all non-consensual offences involving penetration of the anus or vagina or penile penetration of the mouth, p.23.
- 438 The Sentencing Council, Sexual Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014). For the full list of factors which bring an offence into either category 1 or 2, see p.10. Where there are aggravating factors both in terms of severity of harm and level of culpability, the starting point is 15 years. In the case of a rape of a child under 13 where there are no aggravating factors, the starting point is eight years.
- 439 R. v O [2008] EWCA Crim 738. See also, R. v AF [2009] EWCA Crim 1428.
- 440 Att-Gen's Reference (No.86 of 2006) [2006] EWCA 3077.

- 441 R. v Ismail (Abokar Ahmed) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 88.
- 442 See the full list of factors, The Sentencing Council, Sexual Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014), p.14.
- 443 The Sentencing Council, Sexual Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014).
- 444 The Sentencing Council, Sexual Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014), p.32.
- 445 The Sentencing Council, Sexual Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014), p.33. If there has been contact between the naked genitalia of the offender and the naked face, mouth or genitalia of the victim the starting point is 5 years if the victim is under 13 years old and three years if the victim is over 13 years old (p.33).
- 446 Temkin and Krahé, Sexual Assault and the Justice Gap: A Question of Attrition (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008), p.209.
- 447 For further argument on this point, see C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), p.206 and D. Warbuton, “The Rape of a Label—Why it Would be Wrong to Follow Canada in Having a Single Offence of Unlawful Sexual Assault” [2004] 68 Jo. C.L. 533.
- 448 The Wrongness of Rape” in J. Horder (ed), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (Oxford: OUP, 2000), pp.206, 213.
- 449 Calculated as the number of convictions as a proportion of the number of completed proceedings in the Crown Court.
- 450 Data combined from Ministry of Justice, Home Office and the Office for National Statistics, An Overview of Sexual Offending in England and Wales (2013) p.35 and CPS, Violence Against Women and Girls Crime Report 2015/16 (2016). Note that some defendants will still be convicted of other sexual offences.
- 451 C. Sjolín, “Ten years on: consent under the Sexual Offences Act 2003” (2015) J. Crim. L. 20, 29.
- 452 See e.g. C. McGlynn, N. Westmarland, and N. Godden, “‘I just wanted him to hear me’: sexual violence and the possibilities of restorative justice” (2012) 39(2) J. L. Soc’y 213.
- 453 J. Conaghan, “Extending the Reach of Human Rights to Encompass Victims of Rape” (2005) 13 Feminist Legal Studies 145.
- 454 D.A. Dripps, “Beyond Rape” (1992) 92 Colum. L. Rev. 1780; R. West, “Legitimizing the Illegitimate: A Comment on Beyond Rape” (1993) 93 Colum. L. Rev. 1442; D.A. Dripps, “More on Distinguishing Sex, Sexual Assault: A Reply to Professor West” (1993) 93 Colum. L. Rev. 1460.
- 455 E. Sherwin, “Infelicitous Sex” (1996) 2 Legal Theory 209, 214.
- 456 For a proposal that rejects consent in favour of a differentiated offence of rape (one offence that could be committed in different ways: by force, fraud, intoxication etc), see Tadros, “Rape Without Consent” [2006] 26 O.J.L.S. 515, 536–543.
- 457 CPS, Violence Against Women and Girls Crime Report 2015/16 (2016).

Chapter 8

Homicide

I. Introduction

A. THE LEVEL OF OFFENDING

8–001

The most recent statistics show that in England and Wales there are ten homicides (murder, manslaughter—including corporate manslaughter—and infanticide) per 1,000,000 population.¹ In the 12-month period up until September 2016, 695 homicides were recorded, but this includes 96 cases of manslaughter arising out of the Hillsborough disaster in 1989. The rate of homicide has fallen by just under a third (30%) between the year ending March 2006 and the year ending March 2016.² This can be compared with other causes of death: based on 2013 mortality rates, the chances of dying as a result of homicide is one in 1,201, compared to one in 422 from injuries resulting from a transport accident, one in 51 for other “accidental injury”, or one in 140 as a result of suicide or self-inflicted injury.³ Whereas official statistics only reveal part of the picture of offending for many offences, for homicide, by virtue of the very nature of the offence, the data is likely to be fairly accurate.

B. HOMICIDE IN CONTEXT

8–002

Males are most likely to be both the victims and offenders in homicide. Of the 285 suspects against whom proceedings had concluded in relation to homicides recorded in the year ending March 2015,⁴ 90% were male and just 9% were female,⁵ whilst 64% of homicide victims were male and 36% were female.⁶ At first glance, this seems to portray a picture similar to that encountered with non-fatal offences against the person of young males inflicting violence on each other. However, closer analysis of the official statistics reveals a different picture: that homicide is predominantly “domestic” in nature. The victim is likely to have known the killer. In the year to March 2015, for example, 68% of female victims were killed by persons they knew, and 44% of females were killed by current or former partners. In the same year, men were killed by people they knew in 52% of cases; of these killings, 6% were by current or former partners. In short, fewer women (13% of female victims) were killed by strangers than men (34% of male victims) and women were killed by a far higher proportion of partners than men.⁷

Of all killings by suspects known to the victim, 59% took place during a quarrel, loss of temper, or were motivated by revenge; of killings by strangers, 33% took place in these circumstances. Of all homicides, only 4% occurred during furtherance of theft or gain and 7% were attributed to “irrational acts”.⁸

All this data is of importance and relevance to the way the law responds, particularly in relation to the development of the partial defences of loss of control (previously termed provocation) and diminished responsibility and the general defence of self-defence. Over the past 30 years, much has been learned about the extent of domestic violence in some women’s lives that eventually leads them to kill. What has emerged is that much law, for example, relating to self-defence and provocation, has been based upon a male typology of anger and violence and that women who kill are more likely to be dealt with “as mad rather than bad”.⁹ Increased understanding of such issues was the driving force behind the changes to the law in relation to the partial defence of provocation which was replaced with the defence of “loss of control” in 2009.

The official statistics also reveal another important fact. Children under one year of age have consistently been shown to be most at risk of homicide. For example, in the year to March 2015 there were 36 children under one-year of age killed per million population in that age group, compared with 13 persons per million for the 16–29 age group (the next highest band).¹⁰ While this figure appears to be falling and is much lower than it previously was when women had little access to birth control or abortion and faced harsh penalties for giving birth to illegitimate children, the figure is nevertheless significant enough to be, at least, a factor in the debate as to whether infanticide should be retained as a separate offence or whether many of such killings should be brought within the ambit of the defence of diminished responsibility.

8-003

What is it that makes a person resort to such extremes of violence? Some writers have explored the interaction between victim and offender:

“Murder and assault are not one-sided, mechanical activities, with offenders simply acting out aggressive dispositions and victims serving as mere instigators or passive foils. Rather, they are products of a dynamic interchange. The opponents establish and escalate conflict, reject peaceful or mildly aggressive means for resolving it, and turn to massive force as an effective, perhaps mutually agreed-upon method.”¹¹

The official statistics lend considerable support to this interpretation. A significant factor is the influence that alcohol and drugs may have on fatal violence. Miles found that data taken from the Home Office Homicide Index between 1995 and 2005 revealed only that 18% of homicides in England and Wales were recorded as “intoxicated-related”. Her analysis of police files and interviews with offenders, on the other hand, led to her recording 67% of cases as intoxicated-related. The most recent official statistics present a picture closer to that suggested by Miles, with 39% of suspects reported as being under the influence of alcohol or drugs by police.¹² This is still some way off the estimate by Miles, who sees the influence of alcohol and drugs as hugely significant. Not only were many of the homicides in her sample fuelled by the consumption of alcohol and/or drugs immediately before the killing took place, but:

“the data provide substantial evidence that offenders and victims of intoxication-related homicide have often experienced long-term difficulties and that problematic lifestyles enhance the likelihood of involvement in violent conflict.”¹³

There are, of course, many other broader explanations: biological, psychological and sociological. While an exploration of these theories is beyond the scope of this book, that is not to deny their importance in the construction of the law of homicide—for example, in informing the debate on the offence of infanticide and the limits of the defences of self-defence and loss of control.

Homicide is regarded as the most serious offence category. Our revulsion against it is embedded deep within us and our reactions to certain killings may be extreme. The following extract attempts to explain the underlying significance of homicide.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.235–236, 341:

8–004

“What makes homicide unique is, among other things, the uniqueness of causing death. While all personal injuries and destruction of property are irreversible harms, causing death is a harm of a different order. Killing another human being is not only a worldly deprivation; in the Western conception of homicide, killing is an assault on the sacred, natural order. In the Biblical view, the person who slays another was thought to acquire control over the blood—the life force—of the victim ...

Though we are inclined today to think of homicide as merely the deprivation of a secular interest, the historical background of desecration is essential to an adequate understanding ... of the current survival of many historic assumptions. For example, consent is not a defense to homicide, as it is in cases of battery and destruction of property. The reason is that the religious conception of human life still prevails against the modern view that life is an interest that the bearer can dispose of at will ...

There are three prominent starting places for thinking about criminal liability. In the pattern of manifest criminality, the point of departure is an act that threatens the peace and order of community life. In the theory of subjective criminality, the starting place is the actor's intent to violate a protected legal interest. In the law of homicide, the focal point is neither the act nor the intent, but the fact of death. This overpowering fact is the point at which the law begins to draw the radius of liability. From this central point, the perspective is: who can be held accountable, and in what way, for the desecration of the human and divine realms? The question is never where to place the point of the legal compass, but how far the arc should sweep in bringing in persons to stand responsible for the death that has already occurred.”

8-005

The task of this chapter is to determine who should be swept within the arc of liability for homicide and to assess the bases upon which we grade the liability of such persons. This necessarily raises the question of why we grade homicide offences, whether we should continue to do so and, if so, how.

In England, there are three categories of homicide: murder, manslaughter (of which there are several species, including corporate manslaughter) and infanticide. Although not classified as homicide by the official statistics, there are further similar offences of “vehicular homicide” and causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult, which will also be explored in this chapter. We shall examine each in turn before asking whether such categorisation serves any useful purpose.

II. Actus Reus of Murder and Manslaughter

8-006

Both these forms of homicide share a common actus reus. Historically, this was “unlawfully killing a reasonable person who is in being and under the King’s Peace, the death following within a year and a day”.¹⁴

However, the year and a day rule, developed at a time when medical science was primitive, had increasingly been the subject of criticism and in 1994 the Law Commission recommended its abolition. Amongst the reasons listed in advocating the abolition were that advances in modern medical science make it possible for victims to be kept alive (for example on life support machines) for long periods of time whilst still being able to point to a specific cause of eventual death that may have occurred some years earlier. In such cases, the normal principles of causation can be applied to ensure that only those that committed a wrongful act will be subject to a homicide conviction.¹⁵ The recommendation was implemented by the Law Reform (Year and a Day Rule) Act 1996 s.1, which abolished the rule for all purposes. However, because of concerns about prosecutions being brought many years after the infliction of injury, s.2 requires the consent of the Attorney-General to proceedings against a person for a fatal offence¹⁶ if the injury alleged to have caused the death was sustained more than three years before the death occurred. Where there has been a delay between the original attack and death, and the attacker has already been convicted of a non-fatal offence such as wounding with intent prior to the death of the deceased, it has been held that a subsequent prosecution for murder following the death of the victim from her injuries is possible and does not breach the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) Protocol 7 art.4 (double-jeopardy rule).¹⁷

8-007

The remaining elements of the actus reus are unaffected by the reform:

1. “unlawfully”: some killings, such as those in self-defence, may be justified and therefore lawful;
2. “killing”: the act (or omission) of the defendant must have killed the victim; it must have been the legal cause of the death of the victim. Causation must be established;
3. “a reasonable person who is in being”: the victim must be a human being who was alive at the time of the defendant’s actions. This raises problems outside the scope of this book as to the precise moment when life begins and ends. In view of developments with heart transplant operations and life-support machines, the problem of determining the exact moment of death has assumed some importance in recent times.

According to English law a foetus is not a human being for the purposes of the law of homicide. However, it is possible for a charge of manslaughter to be brought against a defendant who causes injury to a mother carrying a child in utero if that child is born alive and then subsequently dies from the injuries.¹⁸ If a miscarriage is intentionally procured, and is not a lawful abortion within the terms of the Abortion Act 1967 s.1, the procurer will be guilty of the offence of criminal abortion.¹⁹ There is also a separate offence of child destruction covering cases of destroying a foetus that is capable of being born alive.²⁰ A pregnancy that has lasted 24 weeks provides prima facie proof that the foetus is capable of being born alive.²¹ Both these offences—criminal abortion and child destruction—carry the same maximum penalty as manslaughter, namely, life imprisonment; and

4. “under the King’s Peace”: all human beings are under the “Queen’s” peace except an alien enemy “in the heat of war, and in the actual exercise thereof”.²²

III. Murder

8–008

Murder is committed when a defendant commits the actus reus of homicide with malice aforethought. Murder is the most serious form of homicide carrying the severest penalty in English law—mandatory life imprisonment. The law reserves this category of homicide for those who kill with the most blameworthy state of mind, known technically as “malice aforethought”.²³ Defining the parameters of murder is thus primarily²⁴ a task of defining malice aforethought, the mens rea of murder.

A. HISTORY

8–009

The term “malice aforethought” originally²⁵ bore its literal meaning and it would only be murder if the defendant had thought out, planned or premeditated the killing. In the 15th and 16th centuries an intentional homicide “on the sudden” was not murder but manslaughter. However, it became clear that this was too narrow a definition for murder. Other types of homicide were just as reprehensible and deserving of the ultimate penalty. Accordingly, the judges started expanding the concept “malice aforethought” and dispensing with the requirement of a premeditated intent, until by the mid-seventeenth century it was clear that malice aforethought could be established in any of the following ways.

1. Intent to kill

8-010

The development that an intent to kill, without premeditation, sufficed for murder was initially achieved by resorting to the fiction that where there was a sudden killing without provocation, the defendant must have planned the killing and thus the requisite “aforethought” was inferred. Before long, however, judges had abandoned this fictitious reasoning and were clearly stating that malice aforethought was present whenever there was an intent to kill.²⁶ This is sometimes known as “express malice”.

2. Intent to cause grievous bodily harm

8-011

This has long been established as a form of malice aforethought.²⁷ In Vickers,²⁸ the Court of Appeal confirmed that this was an independent species of malice aforethought and not merely a particular example of the felony-murder rule (intentionally causing grievous bodily harm was a felony and thus if death resulted would have been murder under the felony-murder rule). In Smith,²⁹ the House of Lords held that the words “grievous bodily harm” must bear their ordinary natural meaning: “Bodily harm needs no explanation, and ‘grievous’ means no more and no less than ‘really serious.’” This species of malice aforethought is often called “implied malice”.

3. Constructive malice

8-012

This covered two situations:

- (i) Killing a police officer while resisting arrest.
- (ii) Killing in the course of committing a felony: the felony-murder rule.

Until 1967, crimes were classified as either felonies or misdemeanours,³⁰ the former being the more serious offences. The felony-murder rule still flourishes today in the US where one of its main rationales is that it is a deterrent to the commission of felonies that create a risk of death. However, both forms of constructive malice under English law were abolished by the Homicide Act 1957 s.1.

B. PRESENT LAW

8-013

The mens rea of murder can now be simply stated. The defendant must either:

1. intend to cause death; or
2. intend to cause grievous bodily harm.

This, of course, does not solve the central problem of determining the meaning of intention. The leading decisions on intention are Moloney, Hancock, Nedrick and Woollin, which are extracted and discussed in Ch.2 and to which reference should be made. Whether these cases lay down an appropriate test is discussed later.

The validity of the grievous bodily harm rule would appear to be beyond doubt as a result of the House of Lord's decision of Cunningham. Prior to that it had been argued that the grievous bodily harm rule was simply a sub-species of the felony-murder rule and was thus also abolished by the Homicide Act 1957. This view, endorsed by a minority in Hyam, was rejected in Cunningham. It had further been argued in Hyam that the reason for the grievous bodily harm rule was that in the last century, because of the poor state of medical knowledge and experience, persons sustaining such injuries were likely to die; such a rationale was unacceptable in modern times with the advances in medical knowledge. If transplanting the grievous bodily harm rule into modern times it would need qualifying so that only grievous bodily harm which endangered life should come within the mens rea of murder. This argument was similarly rejected.

R. v CUNNINGHAM [1982] A.C. 566 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

8-014

LORD HAILSHAM:

“I ... genuflect before the miracles of modern surgery and medicine, though I express some doubt whether these may not have been offset to some extent by the increased lethal characteristics of modern weaponry (particularly in the fields of automatic weaponry, explosives and poisons), and the assistance to criminality afforded by the automobile, the motorway and international air transport. I also take leave to doubt whether in the case of injuries to the skull in particular or indeed really serious bodily harm in general these advances have made the difference between inflicting serious bodily harm and endangering life sufficiently striking as to justify judicial legislation on the scale proposed. But, more important than all this, I confess that I view with a certain degree of scepticism the opinion expressed in R. v Hyam ... that the age of our ancestors was so much more violent than our own that we can afford to take a different view of ‘concepts of what is right and what is wrong that command general acceptance in contemporary society’ ...”

LORD EDMUND-DAVIES:

“[T]he view I presently favour is ... that there should be no conviction for murder unless an intent to kill is established, the wide range of punishment for manslaughter being fully adequate to deal with all less heinous forms of homicide. I find it passing strange that a person can be convicted of murder if death results from, say, his intentional breaking of another’s arm, an action which, while undoubtedly involving the infliction of ‘really serious harm’ and, as such, calling for severe punishment, would in most cases be unlikely to kill. And yet, for the lesser offence of attempted murder, nothing less than intent to kill will suffice. But I recognise the force of the contrary view that the outcome of intentionally inflicting serious harm can be so unpredictable that anyone prepared to act so wickedly has little ground for complaint if, where death results, he is convicted and punished as severely as one who intended to kill.

So there are forceful arguments both ways ... Resolution of that conflict cannot, in my judgment, be a matter for your Lordships' House alone. It is a task for none other than Parliament."

8-015

An example of how medical treatment can prolong life when serious harm is caused can be found in the case of Clift.³¹ Here the defendant attacked the victim in 2000, plunging a screwdriver into the victim's brain and causing a catastrophic brain injury. The victim survived the attack for a number of years, reliant on carers and being fed through a tube. In 2002, the defendant was convicted of causing GBH with intent, and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, and was released in 2007. In 2009, the victim died after complications developed following a medical procedure to reinsert the feeding tube. The defendant was convicted of murder; the post mortem having concluded that the original attack and the death were connected. The defendant's case was joined with a second case with similar facts, the Court of Appeal confirming that the defendant's conviction for the offence under the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.18 could be adduced as evidence that the defendant intended to cause GBH, providing him with the necessary mens rea for murder.

Whether this grievous bodily harm rule should be retained is discussed later.

C. PENALTY FOR MURDER

8-016

The Murder (Abolition of the Death Penalty) Act 1965 abolished capital punishment for murder and substituted a sentence of mandatory life imprisonment. The judge has no discretion as to sentence. A convicted murderer must be sentenced to imprisonment for life.³²

However, convicted murderers seldom remain in prison for the duration of their lives. They can be released from prison on “licence”. This means that the offender does not regain absolute liberty. The licence is subject to conditions: for example, requiring supervision by a probation officer. All such persons released on licence are liable to be recalled to prison at any time during the rest of their lives should there be a breach of the conditions of licence or should their conduct indicate that there is a risk of a serious offence being committed.

The minimum term that a murderer must spend in prison before being released on licence is set by the judge, in accordance with the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.269. This requires the sentencing judge to take into account the seriousness of the offence when setting the term. In doing so, the judge should have regard to the general principles set out in Sch.21, which provide starting points according to criteria related to seriousness. These starting points may be increased or decreased after taking into account aggravating and mitigating factors. The starting points fall into one of three categories of seriousness: “exceptionally high”, “particularly high” and all others.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT 2003 SCH.21: DETERMINATION OF MINIMUM TERM
IN RELATION TO MANDATORY LIFE SENTENCE:

8-017

“Starting points

4 (1) If—

- (a) the court considers that the seriousness of the offence (or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it) is exceptionally high, and
- (b) the offender was aged 21 or over when he committed the offence, the appropriate starting point is a whole life order.

(2) Cases that would normally fall within sub-paragraph (1)(a) include

—

- (a) the murder of two or more persons, where each murder involves any of the following—
 - (i) a substantial degree of premeditation or planning,
 - (ii) the abduction of the victim, or
 - (iii) sexual or sadistic conduct,
- (b) the murder of a child if involving the abduction of the child or sexual or sadistic motivation,
- (ba) the murder of a police officer or prison officer in the course of his duty,
- (c) a murder done for the purpose of advancing a political, religious, racial or ideological cause, or
- (d) a murder by an offender previously convicted of murder.

5 (1) If—

- (a) the case does not fall within paragraph 4(1) but the court considers that the seriousness of the offence (or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it) is particularly high, and
- (b) the offender was aged 18 or over when he committed the offence, the appropriate starting point, in determining the minimum term, is 30 years.

- (2) Cases that (if not falling within paragraph 4(1)) would normally fall within sub-paragraph (1)(a) include—[repealed by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, s.27(3)],
- (b) a murder involving the use of a firearm or explosive,
- (c) a murder done for gain (such as a murder done in the course or furtherance of robbery or burglary, done for payment or done in the expectation of gain as a result of the death),
- (d) a murder intended to obstruct or interfere with the course of justice,

- (e) a murder involving sexual or sadistic conduct,
- (f) the murder of two or more persons,
- (g) a murder that is racially or religiously aggravated or aggravated by sexual orientation, disability or transgender identity, or
- (h) a murder falling within paragraph 4(2) committed by an offender who was aged under 21 when he committed the offence.

5A.(1) If—

- (a) the case does not fall within paragraph 4(1) or 5(1),
- (b) the offence falls within sub-paragraph (2), and
- (c) the offender was aged 18 or over when the offender committed the offence, the offence is normally to be regarded as sufficiently serious for the appropriate starting point, in determining the minimum term, to be 25 years.

(2) The offence falls within this sub-paragraph if the offender took a knife or other weapon to the scene intending to—

- (a) commit any offence, or
- (b) have it available to use as a weapon, and used that knife or other weapon in committing the murder.

6 If the offender was aged 18 or over when he committed the offence and the case does not fall within paragraph 4(1), 5(1) or 5A(1), the appropriate starting point, in determining the minimum term, is 15 years.

7 If the offender was aged under 18 when he committed the offence, the appropriate starting point, in determining the minimum term, is 12 years.

8-018

Aggravating and mitigating factors

8 Having chosen a starting point, the court should take into account any aggravating or mitigating factors, to the extent that it has not allowed for them in its choice of starting point.

9 Detailed consideration of aggravating or mitigating factors may result in a minimum term of any length (whatever the starting point), or in the making of a whole life order.

10 Aggravating factors (additional to those mentioned in paragraph 4(2), 5(2) and 5A(2)) that may be relevant to the offence of murder include—

- (a) a significant degree of planning or premeditation,
- (b) the fact that the victim was particularly vulnerable because of age or disability,
- (c) mental or physical suffering inflicted on the victim before death,
- (d) the abuse of a position of trust,
- (e) the use of duress or threats against another person to facilitate the commission of the offence,
- (f) the fact that the victim was providing a public service or performing a public duty, and
- (g) concealment, destruction or dismemberment of the body.

11 Mitigating factors that may be relevant to the offence of murder include—

- (a) an intention to cause serious bodily harm rather than to kill,
- (b) lack of premeditation,
- (c) the fact that the offender suffered from any mental disorder or mental disability which (although not falling within s. 2(1) of the Homicide Act 1957 (c. 11)), lowered his degree of culpability,
- (d) the fact that the offender was provoked (for example, by prolonged stress),
- (e) the fact that the offender acted to any extent in self-defence or in fear of violence,
- (f) a belief by the offender that the murder was an act of mercy, and

These are guidelines rather than prescriptive rules. The lists in paras 10 and 11 provide mere examples of aggravating and mitigating circumstances, and are not exhaustive,³³ and it has been held that the cases set out in paras 4(2) and 5(2) are also only examples of cases falling within the “particularly high” category of murders and do not provide a definitive list.³⁴ The category under para.5A inserted by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 to supposedly deal with knife crime, is similarly to be interpreted flexibly and it has been held that it was not the legislative intention that every murder involving the use of a knife or weapon to inflict a fatal injury should normally fall within the 25-year starting point.³⁵ Further, the Court of Appeal has noted that Sch.21 applies equally whether the defendant is a principal offender or a secondary party,³⁶ and there is no reason why the starting point should not be the same for both.³⁷ A Practice Direction³⁸ notes that the guidance need not be applied if a judge considers there are reasons not to follow it. For example, it might be departed from in order to do justice in a particular case, but in such cases the judge must give reasons for doing so. The Practice Direction gives effect to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Sullivan,³⁹ the first case it heard on this issue following enactment of the statute, in which it was confirmed that the judge retains discretion in sentencing. The Court of Appeal in Sullivan also suggested that the majority of cases will fall within the general category of cases in which the starting point is a minimum term of 15 years, and that cases falling in the higher categories will be rare. A whole life order should only be made when the facts of a case leave the judge in no doubt that the offender must be kept in prison for the rest of their life,⁴⁰ with the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR recently deciding that such orders do not breach ECHR art.3 and do not amount to inhumane or degrading treatment.⁴¹ Whatever the decision, the court is under a duty to state the minimum term it has determined, which of the starting points it has chosen and why, and any mitigating or aggravating factors taken into account in departing from the starting point.⁴²

Schedule 21 has not been a complete success,⁴³ as demonstrated by the number of cases involving appeals against sentence in murder cases, illustrating that it should be interpreted as a framework for judicial discretion and nothing more.⁴⁴ It was described by the Ministry of Justice as being:

“based on ill-thought out and overly prescriptive policy. It seeks to analyse in extraordinary detail each and every type of murder. The result is guidance that is incoherent and unnecessarily complex, and is badly in need of reform so that justice can be done properly in each case.”⁴⁵

Proposals were made to simplify the sentencing framework, but these did not come to fruition in the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Bill. This may be seen as unfortunate, but the cases demonstrate that the courts are able to manoeuvre around the provisions to do justice in a particular case. In Inglis,⁴⁶ for example, the defendant killed her son by injecting him with heroin in what was described as the first “mercy killing” to reach the Court of Appeal since the Criminal Justice Act 2003 was passed. This was a carefully planned murder, the defendant having failed on the first attempt, motivated by the defendant’s wish to put her son, who had suffered severe brain injuries and was reliant on medical care, out of his misery. The Court of Appeal held that the factors listed under para.10(a), (b) and (d) should not operate as aggravating factors in a case such as this, and reduced the minimum term from nine to five years.

The setting of minimum terms means that the sentencing of murderers is not dissimilar to the sentencing of other offenders, and the statutory, more transparent scheme may lead to murderers being encouraged to plead guilty in the hope of securing a discount on the minimum term⁴⁷ where, previously, they would have felt there was nothing to lose by pleading not guilty.⁴⁸ However, there are important differences in sentencing murderers. First, the length of the minimum term is set in “real-time” to be served. Whilst an offender sentenced to a determinate sentence for some other offence may be released on licence having served half the term, a murderer will not be released before he has served the actual number of years of the minimum term. Secondly, there is never a right to release on parole. Once the murderer has served their minimum term the Parole Board must judge whether it is safe to release her. Thirdly, the released murderer is always on licence and liable to recall to prison. These differences raise the fundamental question whether the mandatory sentence of life imprisonment for murder should be retained.⁴⁹

REPORT OF THE ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE PENAL SYSTEM, SENTENCES OF IMPRISONMENT (A REVIEW OF MAXIMUM PENALTIES) (1978), PARAS
235–244:

8–020

“237. One of the arguments of those who believe that murder merits a unique penalty is that the mandatory life sentence reflects the retributive view that anyone who murders another must place his life at the disposal of the State to the extent that both his release and his liberty to remain at large will always be subject to executive decision. This view is usually associated with the argument that to sentence murderers in the same way as other offenders would be to devalue murder as an offence and to reduce the deterrent effect of the existing penalty.

238. Another argument in favour of the mandatory element is that acts of murder can arouse a good deal of public passion and indignation which would attract more than usual interest to apparent discrepancies in sentencing decisions and tend to bring the administration of justice into undesirable public controversy. This, it is argued, would be likely to cause particular difficulty in what are considered the less culpable types of homicide, where a judge might think it appropriate to pass a shorter sentence than in a bad case of, for instance, robbery, but would immediately become susceptible to the accusation that the courts care more for property than for lives.

239. It is also argued that the absence of the mandatory element in the penalty for murder might actually lead (as the result of public attitudes to the crime of murder) to a situation in which the least dangerous of murderers might remain in custody longer as a result of relative determinate sentencing than they would have done if sentenced to life imprisonment. A related objection to the abolition of the mandatory sentence is that it would lead to over-long sentences in very serious cases ...

243 ... [W]e see a number of positive arguments to justify the abolition of the mandatory element in the penalty for murder. The Criminal Law Revision Committee rightly recognised that the main advantage to be derived from the mandatory life sentence is its flexibility in providing the releasing authorities with the freedom to gauge the public interest and the needs of the offender throughout the period of his imprisonment and after release. The prison service and the Parole Board can take account of continuing observation of the prisoner's development in prison and the Board can monitor his behaviour while on licence and, if necessary, recall him without recourse to the courts. These are powerful considerations in favour of the indeterminacy implicit in the life sentence. We do not, however, consider that they necessarily imply that the life sentence must be imposed indiscriminately on every person convicted of murder. Where the nature of the offence connotes dangerousness and there is evidence of a likely continued threat that it will be repeated, the life sentence may be the appropriate, indeed the only wise, sentence to pass. But for some murderers we think that there are strong reasons for giving courts the power to pass fixed terms of imprisonment.

244. Although murder has been traditionally and distinctively considered the most serious crime, it is not a homogeneous offence but a crime of considerable variety. It ranges from deliberate cold-blooded killing in pursuit of purely selfish ends to what is commonly referred to as 'mercy killing'. Instead of automatically applying a single sentence to such an offence ... sentences for murder should reflect this variety with correspondingly variable terms of imprisonment or, in the exceptional case, even with a non-custodial penalty ... [We] cannot believe that the problems of predicting future behaviour at the time of conviction are inherently more difficult in a murder case than in any other case where there is a measure of instability, or that judges are any less able to make predictions or to assess degrees of culpability in murder cases than in any others ... [Further] efforts to alleviate the harshness of the mandatory penalty, [provocation and diminished responsibility] have led to complications in legal proceedings for which we believe there can be no proper justification.”

8-021

However, despite the very substantial body of opinion endorsing the view that the mandatory life sentence for murder should be abolished,⁵⁰ two Home Affairs Committee Reports⁵¹ have concluded that, although the issue was “exceptionally finely balanced”, the mandatory life sentence ought to be retained:

“This reflects a concern for public safety, and doubts about whether there is a satisfactory solution to the problem of how to protect the public from clearly dangerous prisoners who would have to be released at the end of a determinate sentence.”⁵²

With the changes made to the law governing the setting of minimum terms contained within the Criminal Justice Act 2003, it seems more unlikely than ever that the abolition of the mandatory life sentence will be placed on the political agenda any time in the near future.⁵³ However, now that a more rigid sentencing regime has been imposed it is arguably more important than ever that the mandatory life sentence be reserved for the most heinous of killings and that the definition of murder be clear and include only the most culpable of killings:

“[t]here are ... some serious drawbacks to the way the guidelines of the 2003 Act relate starting points to mitigating factors. Without reform of the law of murder, it will be almost impossible to rid the law of these drawbacks.”⁵⁴

D. EVALUATION

8-022

Apart from criticism of the mandatory penalty of life imprisonment for murder, there are two further criticisms of the present law.

- (1) Criticism of the grievous bodily harm rule.
- (2) Criticism of the Woollin test of intention.

1. The grievous bodily harm rule

8-023

There are arguments in favour of the retention of the grievous bodily harm rule as a species of malice aforethought. If a defendant intends really serious bodily harm to another there is always a probability that death may result from such injuries. Most defendants would know this. Thus, people who intend to cause grievous bodily harm have chosen to run a risk of endangering life. They are as dangerous and as blameworthy as those who actually intend to kill. Their excessive risk-taking as to the death should render them liable for murder.

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, WORKING PAPER ON
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON,
1976, PARA.29:

8-024

“It is argued that a person who inflicts serious injury on another intentionally must know that by so doing there is a real chance that his victim will die and if death results it is right that he should be convicted of murder. There is force also in the argument that a person who is minded to use violence in achieving an unlawful purpose may take more care to refrain from inflicting serious injury if he knows that he may be convicted of murder if his victim dies. A few of our members are in favour of an intent to cause serious injury, simpliciter, remaining a sufficient intent in murder.”

THE LAW COMMISSION, IMPUTED CRIMINAL INTENT (DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS V SMITH),
1965, PARA.13:

8-025

“13. The main arguments in favour of retaining the intent to inflict grievous bodily harm as an alternative to the intent to kill in murder are as follows:

- (a) It is in accord with the general sense of justice of the community that a man who causes death by the intentional infliction of grievous bodily harm, although not actually intending to kill, should not only be punished as severely as a murderer, but should be treated in law as a murderer.
- (b) Grievous bodily harm is a relatively simple concept which can be readily explained to a jury. Any attempt to define ‘grievous bodily harm’ as, for example, ‘harm likely to endanger life,’ or further to require that the accused should know that the harm inflicted is likely to endanger life, would make the judge’s direction more difficult for the jury to follow.
- (c) It is true that, with the suspension of the death sentence, a person who kills while intending to inflict grievous bodily harm could, if such an offence were only manslaughter, receive as a maximum the same sentence, namely life imprisonment, as that which would remain obligatory for murder. But the judge might face practical difficulties in such a case of manslaughter in ascertaining the intent to inflict grievous bodily harm, which he would require to know in order to fix the appropriate sentence. These difficulties would be most acute if the prosecution had accepted pleas of not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter, when the judge would have to rely on depositions; but they would also exist to some extent where the accused had been tried on a count of murder but had been found guilty of manslaughter, in which event the judge would have heard the evidence in the case, but would have no verdict of the jury on the question whether the killing followed an act intended to inflict grievous bodily harm.”

Despite the approval of the grievous bodily harm rule in Hyam and Cunningham, it has been the subject of severe judicial criticism.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S REFERENCE
(NO.3 OF 1994) [1998] A.C. 245
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

8-026

LORD MUSTILL:

“Murder is widely thought to be the gravest of crimes. One could expect a developed system to embody a law of murder clear enough to yield an unequivocal result on a given set of facts, a result which conforms with apparent justice and has a sound intellectual base. This is not so in England, where the law of homicide is permeated by anomaly, fiction, misnomer and obsolete reasoning. One conspicuous anomaly is the rule which identifies the ‘malice aforethought’ (a doubly misleading expression) required for the crime of murder not only with a conscious intention to kill but also with an intention to cause grievous bodily harm ... Many would doubt the justice of this rule, which is not the popular conception of murder and ... no longer rests on any intellectual foundation ... [I]t is, I think, right to recognise that the grievous bodily harm rule is an outcropping of old law from which the surrounding strata of rationalisations have weathered away.”

8-027

Despite this attack, Lord Mustill recognised that there was no ground upon which the House of Lords could abolish so established a rule. However, law reform bodies have also rejected the grievous bodily harm rule in its present form.

THE LAW COMMISSION, IMPUTED
CRIMINAL INTENT (DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS V SMITH),
1965, PARAS 15, 18:

8-028

“15. The main arguments for changing the present law, which prescribes intent to inflict grievous bodily harm as an alternative to the intent to kill in murder, are as follows:

- (a) Murder is commonly understood to mean the intentional killing of another human being; and, unless there are strong reasons which justify a contrary course, it is generally desirable that legal terms should correspond with their popular meaning.
- (b) To limit intent in murder to the intent to kill is not to disregard the very serious nature of causing death by the infliction of grievous bodily harm, but, since the suspension of the death sentence, if such an offence were to be treated as manslaughter only, it could nevertheless be punished by a maximum penalty as severe as the penalty prescribed for murder, namely, imprisonment for life ...
- (d) Furthermore, a man should not be regarded as a murderer if he does not know that the bodily harm which he intends to inflict is likely to kill ... If there is any special deterrent effect in the label ‘murder’ as distinguished from manslaughter, it should be attached to an act done with intent to inflict bodily harm which the accused knows is likely to kill ...

18 ...

- (a) So long as a distinction between murder and manslaughter is to be maintained, there must be a defensible criterion for distinguishing between them. In our view the essential element in murder should be willingness to kill, thereby evincing a total lack of respect for human life.”

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, WORKING PAPER ON
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON,
1976, PARA.29:

“29 ... The majority of us ... think that if an intent to cause serious injury is to remain part of the mens rea of murder, it should be limited in some way so that it is related more closely to the fact of death. Some of us take the view that the law should distinguish between a person who, although intending to cause serious injury, inflicts it in such a way that death is not likely to result and the person who intentionally causes serious injury in such a way that death is likely to be caused. These members hope that such a distinction might deter a person from causing serious injury with the likelihood of death resulting. Other members think that the distinction should depend on whether or not the offender realised at the time that he might well cause death.”

8-030

The Draft Criminal Code followed this last proposal and recommended modification of the grievous bodily harm rule so that it would only be murder in such cases when the defendant acts “intending to cause serious personal harm and being aware that he may cause death”.⁵⁵ The Law Commission has more recently proposed dividing murder into two degrees and has adopted a similar test for its proposed offence of first degree murder, which would be committed where the defendant killed either intending to kill or intending “to do serious injury where the killer was aware that his or her conduct involved a serious risk of causing death”.⁵⁶ Beyond this, it was recommended that the meaning of “serious” should remain undefined.⁵⁷ Where the defendant intended to cause serious injury without the awareness that it might cause death this would, under the Law Commission’s recommendations, amount to second degree murder.⁵⁸ Included in the recommendations was the suggestion that the word “harm” be replaced by “injury” in order to clarify that it ought not to be stretched to include severe or persisting emotional states that do not amount to a recognised psychiatric illness or injury.⁵⁹

In the US, the Model Penal Code recommended that no express significance be accorded to an intent to cause grievous bodily harm, but that such cases should be subsumed under the standards of extreme recklessness (murder)⁶⁰ or recklessness (manslaughter).⁶¹ Thus, the fact that the defendant intended to cause serious injury would simply become a relevant consideration in determining whether they acted with “extreme indifference to the value of human life” (murder) or “recklessly” with respect to the death of another (manslaughter). While many states have given effect to this recommendation,⁶² others continue to specify “intent to cause serious injury” as sufficing for murder (generally murder in the second degree).

Whilst current English law continues to classify someone who kills intending to cause grievous bodily harm as a murderer, such a state of mind is at least recognised as a possible mitigating factor for courts in setting the minimum term as part of the mandatory life sentence.⁶³ Should the law go further? Is a defendant who takes such a clear risk as to death so much less culpable or blameworthy as to deserve liability for manslaughter only? Perhaps this question cannot be fully answered until the Woollin test of intention has been considered.

2. Woollin test of intention

8–031

As we have seen, the House of Lords in Moloney and Hancock ruled that there must be an intention to kill or cause grievous bodily harm. These decisions overruled Hyam in which it had been held that the mens rea of murder could be satisfied by proof that the defendant foresaw death or grievous bodily harm as a likely consequence.

It ought perhaps to be emphasised that in overruling Hyam the House was overruling what had in reality been the law for at least 100 years. It is true that there had long been a tendency before Hyam to assert that, because murder was the most serious crime, it could only be committed intentionally. This, however, was:

“really a sort of hypocrisy stemming from the days of capital punishment: a desire to pretend to the public that the law only hanged people for intentional killing, while at the same time hanging people who were felt to deserve hanging whether they killed intentionally or not.”⁶⁴

Some of their Lordships in Hyam were prepared to admit openly that murder was not a crime of intention alone and that alternative states of mind could suffice. However, the others, desirous of clinging to the false notion that murder was a crime of intention, were forced to place expansive interpretations on the concept of intention so as to encompass the alternative state of mind approved by the others.

Following Woollin, there is some uncertainty as to the meaning of intention.⁶⁵ One interpretation of this decision is that foresight of a virtual certainty is an alternative species of intention. The other interpretation is that intention remains undefined but the jury is entitled to find intention only where there is such foresight of a virtual certainty. But, while they are “entitled” to find such intention, equally they are entitled to find that the defendant did not intend death or grievous bodily harm.

Under this latter interpretation, where intention is not defined and the jury is allowed “moral elbow-room” to decide whether the defendant deserves to be labelled a murderer, the hypocrisy of the past century is continued. Murder is a “crime of intention”, but maximum flexibility is retained by not defining the concept.

ALAN NORRIE, “AFTER WOOLLIN”
[1999] CRIM. L.R. 532, 542–543:

8–032

“[T]he five recent murder/intent on cases ... can be divided into two groups of two, with one case, Hancock, left by itself. In the first group come Moloney and Woollin. Both involved domestic killings in which there was evidence of a lack of moral animus between the killer and his victim. Moloney felt affect on for his stepfather. Woollin had seemingly never harmed his baby before. In both cases the use of the symbolic label ‘murder’, not to mention the mandatory life sentence, probably seemed inappropriate ... [I]t is not unreasonable to assume the judges felt some moral sympathy for the accused in these cases ...

Judges are in a sense like Everyman in that they too participate in a moral community ... What Everyman might achieve by considering first the nature of Woollin’s relationship with his child or Moloney’s with his father as the irreducible moral context of judgment, the judges must achieve, ventriloqually, as it were, through the law of indirect intention ...

Then take Hyam and Nedrick, both cases involving the introduction of inflammable materials through letterboxes ... [This] represents ... a pattern of manifest wrongdoing which may not yet be reflected in the intentions of the accused. Mrs Hyam may genuinely have only intended to frighten, but the action carries with it its own intrinsic dangers. There is also no redeeming aspect in the moral relationship between the parties, indeed the fact that it was the other woman's young daughters that died exacerbates the moral view of Hyam's actions ... Hancock ... occupies a third moral position in which the accused were probably regarded as lacking in the kind of malice evinced in Hyam, but still not regarded with the same sympathy as the accused in Moloney or Woollin.

(Norrie goes on to point out that while Nedrick in fact escaped liability for murder he was nevertheless convicted of manslaughter and a 15 year prison sentence was imposed—in effect, what he would have served on a murder conviction.)”

8-033

Such an approach is, however, a recipe for unpredictability and opens the door to irrelevant factors being taken into consideration. Fair labelling requires an open acknowledgment of what forms of killing are murder. In order to determine this, two questions present themselves for consideration. Was the House of Lords in Moloney and Hancock justified in overruling Hyam and so narrowing the mens rea of murder? Secondly, if so, did they go far enough? Should not the crime of murder have been restricted to those who directly intend to kill (or cause grievous bodily harm)?

The argument for limiting the mens rea of murder to a direct intention is a two-fold one. Murder is the most serious crime under English law and carries the most severe penalty. It should be reserved for the worst cases which are directly intended killings. In such cases, the defendant has acted with a degree of control and deliberation that enhances his responsibility for the outcome of his actions and affects our judgement of him as a moral agent. He is not simply showing indifference to the value of human life; he is actually taking positive and purposeful steps towards the ending of the life of another. This evil aim marks him out as more blameworthy. Also, a person who is trying to achieve a result is usually more likely to succeed than someone who merely foresees that result as a by-product of her actions, and can thus perhaps be regarded as more blameworthy than one who engages in conduct with a lesser chance of harm.

Secondly, such an approach avoids all problems of having to draw fine lines on the continuum of risk taking—for example, distinguishing between foresight of the virtually certain (murder) and foresight of the extremely probable (manslaughter).

The argument against such a strict limitation is that it would unduly restrict the crime of murder and that many persons, such as the bomber on the aeroplane wanting the insurance money,⁶⁶ deserve to be brought within the category of murder. This raises the question as to whether there is a moral distinction between one who wants death to result and one who foresees death as virtually certain—or one who merely foresees death as likely. In short, should murder be expanded beyond intent (as currently understood) to kill (or cause grievous bodily harm)? Should cases of gross recklessness be included within the crime of murder?

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, 14TH REPORT,
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON,
CMND.7844 (1980), PARAS 23–31:

8–034

“Should all reckless killings be murder?”

23. We considered whether to propose a definition of murder in terms of intentional or reckless killing, but it seems to us such a wide offence that it could not be called murder. It would include many killings that are now manslaughter and would not be generally thought to be murder. A builder who uses a method of construction which he knows might, in some circumstances, be dangerous to life, might be guilty of an unlawful homicide if a fatal accident results; but it would be wrong to hold him guilty of the same offence as the deliberate killer and for him to be subject to a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment ...

Should killing with a high degree of recklessness be murder?

24. If reckless conduct causing death is not enough to make a man guilty of murder, why should there not be a conviction for that offence if the defendant knows that there is a high probability or even a mere probability or a serious risk that death will be caused? ... What is a high probability? Or a mere probability? Or a serious risk? Some may think that there is a probability if death is more likely than not to result—the 3 to 2 odds on chance—and that there is a high probability if the odds are shorter (but how much shorter?). Others may think that there is a probability when the odds are much longer. Should a man who kills another while playing an adaptation of ‘Russian roulette’ be guilty of murder if he knows there is a bullet in one of the six chambers of the revolver? Or in two, three, four or five chambers? It has been suggested that, since the outcome of death is so serious, knowledge of a statistically small risk of causing death could be held to be knowledge of probability and even high probability. We do not accept that suggestion, but the fact that it can be made confirms our opinion as to the unsatisfactory nature of the formula.

25. We appreciate that it is difficult to draw the line between what we recommend should be the meaning of intention and the high probability test mentioned in Hyam. To confine intention to wanting a particular result to happen would be too rigid ...

Should killing ever be murder when death is not intended?

28. We think that murder should be extended beyond intentional killing in one respect. There is one category of reckless killing where we believe there would be general agreement that the stigma of murder is well merited. That is where the killer intended unlawfully to cause serious bodily injury and knew that there was a risk of causing death. The intention to cause serious bodily injury puts this killing into a different class from that of a person who is merely reckless, even gravely reckless. The offender has shot, stabbed or otherwise seriously injured the victim, and the circumstances are so grave that the jury can find that he must have realised that there was a risk of causing death ... To classify this particular type of risk-taking as murder does not involve the danger of escalation to cases of recklessness in general, since it is tied specifically to circumstances in which the defendant intended to inflict serious injury.

Recommendations

31. We therefore conclude that it should be murder:

- (a) if a person, with intent to kill, causes death and
- (b) if a person causes death by an unlawful act intended to cause serious injury and known to him to involve a risk of causing death.

In addition, if Parliament favours ... [a further] provision ... we recommend that it should be on the following lines: that it should be murder if a person causes death by an unlawful act intended to cause fear (of death or serious injury) and known to the defendant to involve a risk of causing death.”

DRAFT CRIMINAL CODE BILL 1989 (LAW COM. NO.177) CL.54(1):

8-035

“A person is guilty of murder if he causes the death of another—

- (a) intending to cause death; or
- (b) intending to cause serious personal harm and being aware that he may cause death.”

8-036

It should be recalled that this Bill defined intention as including oblique intention: a person acts intentionally with respect to a result when “he acts either in order to bring it about or being aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events”.⁶⁷

There are serious problems with any approach based on foresight of a probability of a consequence occurring. The Draft Criminal Code Bill, in that it endorses a concept of “oblique intention” and links the grievous bodily harm rule to an awareness that death “may” result, is to be treated with caution. This is preserving one species of risk-taking. It is difficult, however, to see why the other forms of risk-taking are not regarded as equally reprehensible. Surely, being grossly reckless as to death is at least on a par morally with intending serious injury and being aware that one “may” cause death—especially if “may” covers knowledge that there is a chance, albeit a minute one, of death resulting.⁶⁸

More recently, this point has been recognised by the Law Commission who, in the context of proposing the creation of two degrees of murder, has recommended that second degree murder should require a test of “killings intended to cause injury or fear or risk of injury where the killer was aware that his or her conduct involved a serious risk of causing death”.⁶⁹ This was recommended as an alternative mens rea requirement for second degree murder, in addition to killings intended to cause serious injury.

Arguably the Law Commission has had to resort to recommending the creation of a second degree of murder in order to circumvent the problems of drawing a rigid line between murder, conviction for which must lead to a mandatory life sentence, and manslaughter, providing discretion in sentencing. As will be seen towards the end of this chapter, creating a middle offence carrying a label of murder, but avoiding the mandatory life sentence, would allow the law to temper criticisms of the grievous bodily harm rule whilst equating that level of blameworthiness with a high degree of recklessness.⁷⁰ In this way there would no longer be a need to have one clear line distinguishing the “worst” types of killing (murder) from all others (manslaughter).

Other jurisdictions already draw a line between murder and manslaughter using a test of recklessness, although such tests tend not to be defined in the way initially suggested by the Law Commission. The American Model Penal Code defines murder, without dividing it into different degrees, as follows:

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, MODEL
PENAL CODE, PROPOSED OFFICIAL DRAFT, 1962:

“Sect on 210.3 Murder

(1) ... [C]riminal homicide constitutes murder when:

(a) it is committed purposely or knowingly; or

(b) it is committed recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. Such recklessness and indifference are presumed if the actor is engaged or is an accomplice in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit robbery, rape or deviate sexual intercourse by force or threat of force, arson, burglary, kidnapping or felonious escape.

[Under s.210.3 it is manslaughter when a criminal homicide is ‘committed recklessly’.]”

8–038

Thus under the Model Penal Code formulation the distinction between murder and manslaughter is a distinction between extreme recklessness and recklessness. Critics of this formulation ask: When does “reckless” become “extremely reckless”? “It is like drawing the weight line between a ‘big bear’ and an ‘extremely big bear’.”⁷¹ The commentary to the Model Penal Code, on the other hand, argues that some reckless homicides are as reprehensible as deliberate homicides and thus need to be classed as murder:

“Since risk, however, is a matter of degree and the motives for risk creation may be infinite in variation, some formula is needed to identify the case where recklessness should be assimilated to purpose or knowledge. The conception that the draft employs is that of extreme indifference to the value of human life. The significance of purpose or knowledge is that, cases of provocation apart, it demonstrates precisely such indifference. Whether recklessness is so extreme that it demonstrates similar indifference is not a question that, in our view, can be further clarified; it must be left directly to the trier of the facts. If recklessness exists but is not so extreme, the homicide is manslaughter.”⁷²

Recklessness seems successfully to be utilised as a sufficient mens rea requirement for murder in some jurisdictions, even without any real clarification of its meaning. A test commonly employed in the US is that it is murder “when the circumstances attending the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart”,⁷³ whereas in Scotland the test is one of “wicked intention to kill” or “wicked recklessness”.⁷⁴

ROBERT GOFF, “THE MENTAL ELEMENT IN THE CRIME OF MURDER” (1988) 104 L.Q.R. 30, 54– 58:

8–039

“It is on the element commonly known as ‘wicked recklessness’ that I now wish to concentrate. Sheriff Gordon comments:

‘Recklessness is ... not so much a question of gross negligence as of wickedness. Wicked recklessness is recklessness so gross that it indicates a state of mind which is as wicked and depraved as the state of mind of a deliberate killer.’ (The Criminal Law of Scotland, 2nd edn (1978) at pp.735–736) ...

Now we may not be too happy about the use of the word ‘wicked’, which is perhaps rather emotive; but the concept is clear enough—it is the fact that the accused did not care whether the victim lived or died—which can be epitomised as indifference to death.

I think it important to observe that the principle so stated does not necessarily involve a conscious appreciation of the risk of death at the relevant time. This is of importance, because we can think of many cases in which it can be said that the accused acted regardless of the consequences, not caring whether the victim lived or died, and yet did not consciously appreciate the risk of death in his mind at the time—for example, when a man acts in the heat of the moment, as when he lashes out with a knife in the heat of a fight; or when a man acts in panic, or in blind rage. These circumstances may explain why the man has gone to the extent of acting as he did, not caring whether the victim lived or died; but I cannot see that the fact that, in consequence, he did not have the risk of death in his mind at the time should prevent him from being held guilty of murder, and this indeed appears to be the position in Scots law ...

Cases of intention to cause grievous bodily harm. As I see it, adoption of the concept of ‘wicked recklessness’ provides a far more just solution than does this form of intent, and indeed renders it surplus to requirements ...

So it looks as though the concept of ‘wicked recklessness’ works well in practice. Moreover, having regard to the reactions of judges and juries in some of the decided cases, it appears to produce results which conform to their feelings. It has another advantage, because, with this as an alternative, intention to kill can be confined to its ordinary meaning—did the defendant mean to kill the victim? We do not have to try to expand intent on by artificial concepts such as oblique intent on. Furthermore, in directing juries on intent on to kill, judges should not have to embark on complicated dissertations about foresight of consequences and such like. With the alternative of ‘wicked recklessness’ open to them, the jury in Hancock (the case of the striking miners) should not have been puzzled if they had been told to ask themselves the simple questions—did the defendants mean to kill? Or did they act totally regardless of the consequences, indifferent whether anybody in the convoy died or not?”

8-040

The advantage of such a proposal is that it attempts to capture the moral difference between murder and manslaughter, rather than concentrating on the form of the distinction.

The distinction between murder and manslaughter should be based on a policy of discrimination between “ethically extremely blameworthy attitudes on the part of the offender toward the life he took on the one hand and attitudes which are considerably less blameworthy on the other”.⁷⁵ The distinction need not necessarily be drawn in cognitive terms (what the defendant intended or foresaw) such as the Law Commission’s recommendation for a test of intention to cause injury coupled with an awareness of serious risk of death. Rather, as Lord Goff suggests above, it could depend on a moral judgment of the defendant’s actions. Such judgment must reflect community values which can be represented by the jury.⁷⁶

Wilson, in a similar vein, has suggested an expansion of the law of murder so that it would cover:

“what it is about the ‘murderer’ which we find so appalling. Murderers, in the focal sense, show themselves to be a peculiar kind of person, uncomprehended by civilized society. Shooting into a train carries a small risk but it is a type of risk-taking which causes us to question the shooter’s humanity.”

However, to avoid the vagueness associated with the Scottish “wicked recklessness” and American “depraved-heart” approaches, he suggests that there is a distinct wrong involved in cases where death results from an attack. The nature of the “attack” necessary for murder can be defined with some precision.

WILLIAM WILSON, “MURDER AND THE STRUCTURE OF HOMICIDE” IN A. ASHWORTH AND B. MITCHELL (EDS), RETHINKING ENGLISH HOMICIDE LAW (2000), PP.38–45:

8–041

“I shall argue for an extended fault element to take into account two forms of risk-taking ... each involv[ing], as does GBH-murder, a purposive attack upon a victim’s corporal interests ...

1. Intending to Expose Someone to Mortal Danger

... What distinguishes Messrs Hyam and other risk-takers as murderers ... is that the point of their action is victim-centred or, for want of a better expression, ‘aimed at’ a victim. Looked at another way, which indicates how distinct in terms of moral responsibility the two attitudes are, the (merely) reckless killer acts despite the risk of death. Mrs Hyam ... act[ed] because of it. If there was no risk to life attending their conduct they would not have acted in the way they did; they would have changed their behaviour. Taking the risk thus structures their conduct ... [T]he proposed refined mental element ... [is] an intention to expose someone to mortal danger. As such it would neatly accommodate cases provided for by the American depraved-heart doctrine without succumbing to its emotionalism and conceptual vagueness ...

2. Risk-Taking in the Course of Violent Crime.

... A proposal for elevating recklessness above the ordinary is to treat risk-taking constitutive of murder into particularly heinous contexts such as the commission of dangerous felonies. In a number of jurisdictions a criminal context aggravates an intentional killing. There is no obvious reason why such a context should not also aggravate a reckless killing such that it is 'pushed' through a higher 'threshold' of blame ... [Wilson then considers some hypothetical examples, such as a rape victim being thrown into a river to destroy evidence of the rapist's involvement.] Each of these cases involves the defendant in an activity which already involves an attack upon the physical interests of another. It is submitted that it should not be necessary to show further either an intention to cause serious injury or a specific intention to expose the victim to the risk of death. His willingness 'to go the extra distance' should suffice for murder.

The main problem here is in circumscribing the 'unholy' context ... The simplest way of doing so, and one which would dovetail satisfactorily with GBH-murder, is to require the unlawful object to be the commission of a crime ordinarily involving an attack on or threat to the autonomy or bodily integrity of another or to involve hostile activity in evading capture or lawful arrest ... A tentative proposal follows:

Criminal homicide also constitutes murder when—

- 1(a) death results from the reckless exposure of another to a serious risk of death; and
- (b) D. acted either
 - (i) for the purpose of resisting arrest; or
 - (ii) in the execution of and for the purpose of executing any specified offence, or for the purpose of evading capture or detection following the commission or attempted commission of such offence.
- (c) The specified offences are robbery, serious sexual assault, torture, whether or not serious injury was thereby effected or intended, abduction."

The problem with this approach is that, as we shall see, persons who kill while committing dangerous, unlawful acts are guilty of manslaughter. Therefore, all that would distinguish murder (under Wilson's proposal) from manslaughter in these cases is that for murder the death must result from "the reckless exposure of another to the serious risk of death".

3. Conclusion

As long as murder is retained as a separate crime, it must be reserved for the "worst", "most reprehensible" killings. Emotive tests such as those involving criteria of depravity or wantonness must be rejected; judgments must relate to people's actions, not to their characters. The better view is that the test of "worst" or "most reprehensible" can only be determined by reference to current community values as to which killings are morally the most blameworthy. In assessing this, the mental element of the defendant will usually be of primary importance—but not of exclusive importance. Arguably there can be room for a consideration of other important factors, such as the circumstances or methods of the killing and the social utility, if any, of the actions causing death. The Law Commission's test of intention to cause injury along with an awareness of a serious risk of death appears to be a purely cognitive test which does not allow for a consideration of such factors. Defining an appropriate test of gross recklessness is highly problematic. Of the formulations considered in this chapter, perhaps the Model Penal Code's definition of murder (which is not dissimilar to Wilson's proposals) comes closest to allowing room for a wide-ranging assessment of the morality of the deed.

IV. Manslaughter

The crime of manslaughter is committed when a defendant commits the actus reus of homicide but the killing is not sufficiently blameworthy to warrant liability for murder. This will be so in two situations:

1. where the defendant does not have the necessary mens rea for murder, but can nevertheless be regarded as blameworthy to some extent (involuntary manslaughter); or
2. where the defendant does possess the necessary mens rea for murder, but has killed under certain specific circumstances which the law regards as mitigating the seriousness of the offence (voluntary manslaughter).

The lesser blameworthiness is reflected by an avoidance of both the label and stigma of murder and the mandatory penalty of life imprisonment imposed for murder. The maximum penalty for the crime of manslaughter is life imprisonment, enabling the judge to impose any sentence up to that maximum to reflect the appropriate degree of culpability of the defendant.⁷⁷

A. INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER

8-045

“[O]f all crimes manslaughter appears to afford most difficulties of definition, for it concerns homicide in so many and so varying conditions”.⁷⁸

This is because manslaughters range from killings just short of murder to killings only just above the accidental.⁷⁹ This can be represented diagrammatically⁸⁰:

	A	B
MURDER	MANSLAUGHTER	ACCIDENTAL KILLINGS

In assessing the parameters of the crime of manslaughter, attention must be focused on two questions:

- (a) How is manslaughter distinguished from murder (A)?
Despite the minimal discussion of manslaughter in Woollin and the other leading cases, the House of Lords, in defining the parameters of the crime of murder was, in essence, focusing on the distinction between murder and manslaughter. The point at which this line was drawn was considered above.

- (b) How is manslaughter distinguished from accidental or non-culpable killings (B)? What factors make a killing sufficiently blameworthy to justify liability for manslaughter as opposed to liability for some lesser offence or no liability at all?

It is this question that requires close consideration in this section. It might be useful to note at the outset, however, that many cases of manslaughter start out as cases of murder, only to be reduced to manslaughter either due to acceptance of a guilty plea to that offence, or following trial. In a survey of cases resulting in convictions for involuntary manslaughter, Mitchell and Mackay found that only 13 of the 152 defendants had been indicted for manslaughter (six of those 13 having originally been charged with murder); the majority had been indicted for murder.⁸¹ It seems that in most cases of homicide arising out of violence the prosecution will chance its arm on a murder charge, and it is not clear what factors influence the decision to charge only manslaughter from the outset.

8-046

During the last 30 years or so, the law of involuntary manslaughter has been the subject of very considerable change. It is now common to assert that it takes three forms:

- (1) (Subjective) reckless manslaughter.
- (2) Constructive or unlawful act manslaughter.
- (3) Gross negligence manslaughter.

It should be stressed at the outset that these are not three separate crimes. Indeed, there is no discreet crime of “involuntary manslaughter” in the sense that one is charged with or convicted of the offence. The term “involuntary manslaughter” is simply a convenient label to describe those residual unlawful killings not otherwise specifically catered for by the law and the culpability necessary for the offence can be established in one of the above three ways.

1. (Subjective) Reckless manslaughter

8-047

Where the defendant subjectively foresees a risk of death or serious injury (but the degree of foresight fails to come within the Woollin test of intention required for murder), there will be liability for manslaughter.⁸² As the law of murder has been progressively narrowed with tighter tests of intention, so this category of manslaughter has been correspondingly broadened to occupy the “area vacated by murder”.⁸³ There is little specific authority on this species of manslaughter because in practice such cases are usually dealt with as constructive manslaughter.⁸⁴ This category also covers cases where the defendant is charged with murder but the jury convict of manslaughter,⁸⁵ or the appellate courts substitute a verdict of manslaughter,⁸⁶ or where the defendant pleads guilty to manslaughter having a plea of not guilty to murder accepted.⁸⁷

2. Constructive or unlawful act manslaughter

8-048

As a corollary of the felony-murder rule, the law developed a misdemeanour-manslaughter rule whereby it was manslaughter to kill in the course of committing a misdemeanour. The obvious rigours of such a rule were soon mitigated, and this species of manslaughter survived the abolition of the felony-murder rule and abolition of the distinction between felonies and misdemeanours. The present law may be stated in the following terms:

- (i) the defendant must commit an unlawful act; and
- (ii) the unlawful act must be dangerous, namely, it must expose the victim to the risk of some bodily harm resulting therefrom.

(i) The unlawful act

8-049

Not all unlawful acts will suffice for constructive manslaughter. Three limitations upon the earlier rule have been developed:

- (a) The unlawful act must constitute a crime. A tort or other civil wrong will not suffice. In Franklin,⁸⁸ Field J ruled that:

“the mere fact of a civil wrong committed by one person against another ought not to be used as an incident which is a necessary step in a criminal case. I have a great abhorrence of constructive crime.”

Further, if the defendant would have a defence (say, self-defence) to the unlawful act, then there is no “crime” for the purposes of constructive manslaughter.⁸⁹

- (b) The act must be criminal for some other reason than that it has been negligently performed. For example, driving a car is a lawful act; driving that car negligently is a criminal offence. Such a crime will not suffice for constructive manslaughter. In Andrews v DPP Lord Atkin held:

“There is an obvious difference in the law of manslaughter between doing an unlawful act and doing a lawful act with a degree of carelessness which the legislature makes criminal. If it were otherwise a man who killed another while driving without due care and attention would ex necessitate commit manslaughter.”⁹⁰

- (c) It is doubtful whether an omission will suffice for constructive manslaughter. In Lowe it was held that the mere fact that a parent was guilty of the statutory offence of wilful neglect of a child, did not make that parent liable for manslaughter if the child died in consequence of the neglect.

R. v LOWE [1973] Q.B. 702 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

8-050

PHILLIMORE LJ:

“Now in the present case the jury negated recklessness. How then can mere neglect amount to manslaughter? The court feels that there is something inherently unattractive in a theory of constructive manslaughter. It seems strange that an omission which is wilful solely in the sense that it is not inadvertent and the consequences of which are not in fact foreseen by the person who is neglectful should, if death results, automatically give rise to an indeterminate sentence instead of the maximum of two years which would otherwise be the limit imposed.

We think that there is a clear distinction between an act of omission and an act of commission likely to cause harm. Whatever may be the position with regard to the latter it does not follow that the same is true of the former. In other words, if I strike a child in a manner likely to cause harm it is right that, if the child dies, I may be charged with manslaughter. If, however, I omit to do something with the result that it suffers injury to health which results in its death, we think that a charge of manslaughter should not be the inevitable consequence, even if the omission is deliberate.”⁹¹

8-051

Apart from these three limitations it would appear that any unlawful act will suffice. It is irrelevant whether that act previously constituted a felony or a misdemeanour. In practice, however, the majority of constructive manslaughter cases are based on some form of assault as the unlawful act. In a survey of 110 cases of unlawful act manslaughter, all but one was found to involve some sort of assault against the deceased (although assault was not the main unlawful act in nine of the cases; where a burglary, robbery or arson occurred, assault was committed as part of that unlawful act).⁹²

R. v LAMB [1967] 2 Q.B. 981 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

8-052

Lamb, in jest, with no intention of doing any harm, pointed a revolver at his best friend who was similarly treating the incident as a joke. He knew there were two bullets in the chambers but as neither bullet was in the chamber opposite the barrel he did not foresee any danger. He pulled the trigger; this rotated the cylinder and placed a bullet opposite the barrel so that it was struck by the striking pin. The bullet was fired and the friend killed. Three experts agreed that Lamb's mistake was natural for somebody unfamiliar with the way the revolver mechanism worked. Lamb was convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

SACHS J:

“The trial judge took the view that the pointing of the revolver and pulling of the trigger was something which could of itself be unlawful even if there was no attempt to alarm or intent to injure.

It was no doubt on that basis that he had before commencing his summing-up stated that he was not going to ‘involve the jury in any consideration of the niceties of the question whether or not the’ action of the ‘accused did constitute or did not constitute an assault’: and thus he did not refer to the defence of accident or the need for the prosecution to disprove accident before coming to a conclusion that the act was unlawful.

Mr Mathew, [counsel for the Crown] however, had at all times put forward the correct view that for the act to be unlawful it must constitute at least what he then termed ‘a technical assault.’ In this court moreover he rightly conceded that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any assault of any kind. Nor did he feel able to submit that the acts of the defendant were on any other ground unlawful in the criminal sense of that word. Indeed no such submission could in law be made: if, for instance, the pulling of the trigger had had no effect because the striking mechanism or the ammunition had been defective no offence would have been committed by the defendant.

Another way of putting it is that mens rea, being now an essential ingredient in manslaughter (compare Andrews v Director of Public Prosecutions and R. v Church) that could not in the present case be established in relation to the first ground except by proving that element of intent without which there can be no assault.”

[Sachs J went on to rule that, while an appropriately directed jury could have convicted Lamb of manslaughter by gross negligence, the jury had not been so directed and so the verdict could not stand.]

Appeal allowed

This case can be contrasted with that of *Larkin*⁹³ where the defendant brandished a razor at a man in order to terrify him. His mistress fell against the razor, cut her throat and died. Larkin's conviction for manslaughter was upheld. In this case, unlike Lamb, there was clearly an unlawful act, namely, an assault by intentionally terrifying the man.⁹⁴

Where an unlawful act has been committed which can easily be proved, the prosecution will usually rely on this species of manslaughter rather than attempting to prove either reckless manslaughter or gross negligence manslaughter. One exception to this was the case of *Willoughby*⁹⁵ in which the defendant was convicted of manslaughter and arson⁹⁶ after the person whom he had recruited to help him set fire to his pub in order to collect on the insurance was killed in the resulting explosion. What is surprising about this case is that the prosecution based their case on gross negligence, arguing that the defendant owed the deceased a duty of care and breached that duty in failing to ensure that he was safe during the enterprise of destroying the pub, thereby causing his death. Whilst the issue for the Court of Appeal was whether or not a duty of care was owed to the deceased by the defendant,⁹⁷ the court expressed some dismay in relation to the prosecution's tactics: "[i]t would have been preferable and much simpler if this case had been left to the jury on the basis of death caused by an unlawful and dangerous act".⁹⁸ The converse of this prosecutorial mistake can be seen in the case of Meeking,⁹⁹ where the defendant was prosecuted for constructive manslaughter where gross negligence manslaughter would have been more appropriate. Here, the defendant was a passenger in her husband's car, and the pair had been arguing. Without warning, she pulled on the handbrake whilst the car was travelling at 60mph, causing the car to spin out of control and collide with an oncoming vehicle. The defendant's husband was killed in the collision, and she was prosecuted for manslaughter on the basis of committing the unlawful act of interfering with a motor vehicle so as to endanger road users, contrary to the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.22A(1)(b). The Court of Appeal upheld her conviction,¹⁰⁰ but noted that:

"[i]t was perhaps an unnecessary complication for the prosecution to have relied on unlawful act manslaughter in this case, rather than taking what might have seemed the more natural approach of presenting the case as one of gross negligence manslaughter, but on the facts of this case we find it impossible to conclude that the jury could have come to any other verdict than guilty if the case had been prosecuted as one of gross negligence manslaughter.”¹⁰¹

8-054

It was held in *Jennings*¹⁰² that it is necessary to identify the unlawful act upon which a prosecution for constructive manslaughter is based. In this case, the Crown had relied on the offence of carrying an offensive weapon, contrary to the Prevention of Crimes Act 1953 s.1, but, as it had not been proved that the knife was an offensive weapon, there was no unlawful act for the purposes of constructive manslaughter.

In the earlier case of Cato,¹⁰³ the defendant injected his friend, at the friend's request, with a mixture of heroin and water. The friend died. The unlawful act here was administering a noxious thing contrary to the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.23. More recently there have been a string of similar cases where the courts have struggled to establish that an unlawful act upon which liability for manslaughter can be constructed has been committed. Whilst it is clear that the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.23 can be relied upon where the defendant is the one to actually inject the syringe into the victim,¹⁰⁴ as discussed in Ch.2, principles of causation will usually prevent the supplier of a drug who does not himself inject the deceased from being held liable for the death of the drug-taker. This was confirmed by the House of Lords in Kennedy (No.2),¹⁰⁵ clarifying the law and holding that facilitating or contributing to the administration was not sufficient to amount to “administering” the drug. In this case, the appellant had prepared a syringe of heroin and handed it to the deceased, who injected himself and returned the syringe to the appellant, who then left the room. As seen in Ch.2 where this case is extracted, the House of Lords reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal, which had managed to uphold the conviction on the basis that both the appellant and the deceased had acted together in administering the drugs, and quashed the conviction. Lord Bingham conceded that:

“It is possible to imagine factual scenarios in which two people could properly be regarded as acting together to administer an injection. But nothing of the kind was the case here.”

As noted by Ormerod, it is difficult to imagine a scenario that Lord Bingham had in mind, aside from where the defendant injects the deceased.¹⁰⁶ Whilst *Burgess; Byram*¹⁰⁷ provides the potential for such factual scenario (where the defendant had not only prepared the syringe of heroin but also helped the deceased locate a vein), the Court of Appeal did not have the opportunity to provide any authority on that issue, and merely quashed the appellant’s conviction for the reason that his guilty plea was offered on the basis of a point of law decided erroneously (before the House of Lords’ judgment in Kennedy (No.2)).¹⁰⁸ What Kennedy (No.2) does make clear, however, is that the answer to the question of whether a defendant who supplies drugs to the deceased to self-inject can ever be guilty of manslaughter is “never”, so long as the deceased is a fully informed adult making a voluntary decision to self-inject.¹⁰⁹

Given that Kennedy (No.2) confirms that in situations where the defendant has assisted in some way in the taking of drugs, but has not injected the deceased herself, there is in reality no suitable unlawful act to form the basis of a manslaughter prosecution without intractable problems of causation being presented, perhaps a more radical approach is necessary.

TIMOTHY H. JONES, “CAUSATION, HOMICIDE AND THE SUPPLY OF DRUGS” (2006) 26 L.S. 139, 153–154:

8–055

“The Scottish courts appear to have concluded that there is a moral case for saying that those who supply illegal drugs should be called to account for deaths resulting from their activities. Similarly, in the USA, there are many examples of relatively harsh statutory schemes imposing constructive liability—for manslaughter or even murder—on drug dealers. Since these are facilitated by the continuing attachment to the felony murder rule, it would be dangerous to draw too much upon this experience. That said, the possibility of a statutory offence in the UK might be worthy of consideration ... [T]he law forbids the conduct in question (supply of a controlled drug). That is, there is a legal duty not to supply a controlled drug. If this is breached and a death ensues, it would not be unprecedented for the criminal law to impose liability for homicide.

... The key question is whether homicide should encompass straightforward supply cases ... A statutory offence could be created, without the necessity to impinge upon either the prevailing common-law principles of causation or the law of manslaughter more generally. This could be achieved by inserting a provision into the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, creating an offence of causing death by the (production or) supply of a controlled drug.”¹¹⁰

8-056

Some states in the US already have a separate homicide offence to avoid these problems, sometimes labelled “drug-induced homicide”.¹¹¹ However, there are also arguments against the creation of such offences.

WILLIAM WILSON, “DEALING WITH DRUG-INDUCED HOMICIDE” IN C. M.
V. CLARKSON AND S. CUNNINGHAM
(EDS), CRIMINAL LIABILITY FOR
NON-AGGRESSIVE DEATH (2008),
PP.194-195:

8-057

“The vagaries of context/culpability and accountability might make a specific crime more attractive, particularly when we look more closely at the issue of context. Responsibility for both drug supply and demand is arguably spread too broadly to justify atomizing questions of responsibility in the fashion illustrated in Kennedy. In a typical case of death caused by heroin overdose this context may muddy the waters of accountability in a more telling fashion than is usual. We can start with a farmer in Afghanistan who returns to farming opium poppies, following State sponsored invasion to remove the Taliban under whose governance it was banned. Following its removal he restores links with a local distributor, who in turn restores his links with an international distributor. We can continue down the supply line to the organizations who prepare the pure heroin, cut it for onward transmission to wholesalers and retailers, including those small retailers who form part of the alienated community of people to whom the drug has such attraction. Where does responsibility lie here? And who is accountable? Given that taking class A drugs of the nature of heroin is a dangerous pastime, and that all those implicated in supplying people with such drugs bear some responsibility for the consequences if those turn out to be fatal, is there any reason to limit accountability to the person most directly associated with the end user? It is certainly arguable that the special transactional context requires us to abandon the premise that causation should be an all or nothing element in liability and embrace the idea that causal responsibility can be apportioned. This would arguably enable the construction of offence labels with appropriately proportioned punishments to reflect the realities of the defendant's causal contribution. [The following definition of a special homicide offence suggested by] Elliot and de Than ... only partly reflects this analysis:

- 1 (a) A person is liable for an offence if he or she knowingly and unlawfully supplies to the victim a Category A controlled drug, or is an accessory to the supply of the controlled drug or is part of a conspiracy to supply the controlled drug, and the person's conduct causes the death of the victim.
- (b) A person will be held to have caused the death of the victim when:
 - (i) he or she does an act which makes a more than merely negligible contribution to its occurrence or
 - (ii) he or she omits to do an act which might have prevented its occurrence.
- (c) A person does not cause a result where, after he or she does such an act or makes such an omission, an act or event occurs

- (i) which is the immediate and sufficient cause of the result;
- (ii) which he or she did not foresee, and
- (iii) which could not in the circumstances reasonably have been foreseen.
- (d) A defence to this offence will apply where the defendant has attempted to seek medical assistance for the victim within a reasonable time. [Elliott and de Than, “Prosecuting the Drug Dealer When a Drug User Dies” (2006) 69 M.L.R. 986–995.]

The voluntariness of the deceased’s conduct in self administering the drug is air-brushed out of this account, so also the broader context within which individual acts of supply take place. It makes accountability simply a function of the contribution made to the events leading up to the death of the victim by being associated with an act of supply. Although it would spread the net of accountability wider than at present its weakness lies precisely in its failure to acknowledge that responsibility for the harms engendered by the supply of dangerous drugs stretches too far to justify singling out individual suppliers and their associates for liability where death occurs.”

(ii) The unlawful act must be dangerous

8–058

It is clear that constructive manslaughter requires more than simply an unlawful act which causes death. The unlawful act must be a dangerous one, in the sense that it must expose the victim to the risk of some bodily harm resulting therefrom. The fact that an act is unlawful does not necessarily mean that it is dangerous. The requirement of dangerousness is a separate matter requiring proof.¹¹²

R. v CHURCH [1966] 1 Q.B. 59 (COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL):

8–059

The appellant knocked a woman unconscious. On failing to revive her he threw her into a river where she drowned. He appealed against his conviction for manslaughter on the ground of a misdirection by the trial judge.

EDMUND-DAVIES LJ:

“In the judgment of this court [the trial judge’s direction on unlawful act manslaughter] ... was a misdirection. It amounted to telling the jury that, whenever any unlawful act is committed in relation to a human being which resulted in death there must be, at least, a conviction for manslaughter. This might at one time have been regarded as good law: ... But it appears to this court that the passage of years has achieved a transformation in this branch of the law and, even in relation to manslaughter, a degree of mens rea has become recognised as essential ... [T]he conclusion of this court is that an unlawful act causing the death of another cannot, simply because it is an unlawful act, render a manslaughter verdict inevitable. For such a verdict inexorably to follow, the unlawful act must be such as all sober and reasonable people would inevitably recognise must subject the other person to, at least, the risk of some harm resulting therefrom, albeit not serious harm ...

[However the trial judge’s direction was not sufficiently defective to warrant quashing the conviction; further, the defendant might have been convicted on grounds of criminal negligence.]”

Appeal dismissed

DPP V NEWBURY [1977] A.C. 500 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

8-060

The appellants, two boys aged 15, pushed part of a paving stone off the parapet of a railway bridge. The stone struck an oncoming train, went through the glass window of the driver’s cab and killed a guard who was sitting next to the driver. The boys were convicted of manslaughter. The Court of Appeal dismissed their appeal but certified the following point of law: “Can a defendant be properly convicted of manslaughter, when his mind is not affected by drink or drugs, if he did not foresee that his act might cause harm to another?”

LORD SALMON:

“In R. v Larkin, Humphreys J said:

‘Where the act which a person is engaged in performing is unlawful, then if at the same time it is a dangerous act, that is, an act which is likely to injure another person, and quite inadvertently the doer of the act causes the death of that other person by that act, then he is guilty of manslaughter.’

I agree entirely ... that that is an admirably clear statement of the law which has been applied many times. It makes it plain (a) that an accused is guilty of manslaughter if it is proved that he intentionally did an act which was unlawful and dangerous and that that act inadvertently caused death and (b) that it is unnecessary to prove that the accused knew that the act was unlawful or dangerous. This is one of the reasons why cases of manslaughter vary so infinitely in their gravity. They may amount to little more than pure inadvertence and sometimes to little less than murder ...

The test is still the objective test. In judging whether the act was dangerous the test is not did the accused recognise that it was dangerous but would all sober and reasonable people recognise its danger.”

Appeal dismissed

8-061

It is not entirely clear what the unlawful act was that formed the basis of the manslaughter charge and conviction in Newbury. Was it criminal damage, common assault or the offence of “endangering the safety of any person conveyed upon a railway” contrary to the Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.34? Since Jennings,¹¹³ it is necessary for the prosecution to identify the wrongful act. As one is dealing here with what is often termed “unlawful act manslaughter”, the requirement that the unlawful act be specified is to be welcomed.

In Watson,¹¹⁴ it was held that the “sober and reasonable” bystander was to be endowed with whatever knowledge the defendant possessed. In this case, the defendant and another burgled an elderly man’s house and verbally abused him. The victim was suffering from a serious heart condition and died an hour-and-a-half later. It was held that the unlawful act, the burglary, lasted throughout the time the appellant was on the premises and during that time the defendant must have become aware of the victim's frailty and age. The question then was whether a sober and reasonable bystander, armed with this knowledge, would have recognised that the burglary was likely to expose that elderly man to the risk of some harm. In Ball,¹¹⁵ however, it was emphasised that the sober and reasonable bystander could not be endowed with any mistaken belief held by the defendant. In this case, the defendant fired at his victim thinking his gun contained blanks (he kept live and blank cartridges together and had grabbed a handful when picking up his gun). Such an act was unquestionably dangerous from the required objective point of view. In Dawson,¹¹⁶ it was held that the unlawful act must expose the victim to the risk of some physical harm. Shock or pure emotional disturbance produced by terror would not suffice. However, there could be liability for manslaughter if it was likely that the shock would cause a physical injury, for example, cause a heart attack.¹¹⁷ Further, in *R. v M*¹¹⁸ it was made clear that the sober and reasonable bystander does not have to foresee the specific sort of physical harm caused. In that case, a seemingly fit doorman died after suffering from an aneurysm following his dealings with an affray committed by the defendants. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the judge was wrong to rule that a jury could not reasonably conclude that any sober and reasonable person, having knowledge that the defendants had during the incident, would realise there was a risk of the victim suffering an aneurysm rather than some other injury from a fall or blow. The test, as set out in Church, was only whether "some harm" was foreseeable.¹¹⁹

8-062

It is important to note that the question is not whether the offence on which the manslaughter charge is based is dangerous generally, but whether it was dangerous in the particular circumstances of the case. In Bristow,¹²⁰ the defendants burgled a vehicle-repair business located down a private track on a farm, the plan being to steal a number of vehicles. The owner of the business disturbed the defendants and was killed as the defendants escaped in their own vehicle and a stolen vehicle, running him over. In the Court of Appeal, Treacy LJ noted that:

“This is not a case like Dawson or Watson where the circumstances demonstrating the risk of harm to the occupier of property did not arise until a point during the burglary or at all. Whilst burglary of itself is not a dangerous crime, a particular burglary may be dangerous because of the circumstances surrounding its commission.”¹²¹

The relevant circumstances of the case were that the only means of escape from the scene of the crime involved a single track road, passing the victim’s home and another property. It was clear that the burglary involved a risk of being interrupted and, if that happened, the means of escape (driving at speed down a single track road) created the risk of harm to any person intervening.

(iii) The unlawful act must cause the death of the victim

8–063

This last point can again be illustrated by contrasting the decision in two cases involving the unlawful act of affray: R. v M, above, and Carey. In Carey,¹²² it was stressed that the dangerousness of the act must correspond with its unlawfulness. In this case, one group of young people attacked another at a local beauty spot. The deceased was punched in the face and suffered only minor bruises, but in running away from the scene she suffered a heart attack from which she died. It was found that she suffered from a severely diseased heart and the doctors were of the view that the precipitating factor which led to her death was her running away from the incident. At trial, the defendants were convicted of affray and manslaughter. The unlawful act upon which manslaughter was based was that of affray. On appeal, although the convictions for affray were upheld, the convictions for manslaughter were quashed. The court took the view that the only unlawful and dangerous act upon which the appellants could have been convicted was that of assault. However, in this case, although it could be said that the act of assault was dangerous, it was not the cause of death. The conviction for manslaughter could not be based on the unlawful act of affray, which was not dangerous “in the relevant sense” on the facts of the case. However, the affray in R. v M was seen to be dangerous in the relevant sense. In his commentary on Carey,¹²³ Ormerod argues that it seems entirely possible that a conviction for manslaughter could have been founded upon an unlawful and dangerous act of assault (rather than affray) on the basis that the defendant caused the victim to die by triggering a previously undiagnosed medical condition, since the defendant must take their victim as they find them.¹²⁴

However, the approach taken in Carey was replicated by the Court of Appeal in the case of R. v DJ.¹²⁵ In this case, a group of young boys shouted abuse and spat at an elderly man who was playing cricket with his son. They also threw stones, one of which hit the man. The man, who had suffered from coronary heart disease, had a heart attack and died. The unlawful and dangerous act relied on was the throwing of stones (a battery) rather than the abuse, given that, as noted by Gage LJ: “insults and spittle can hardly be described as dangerous acts”.¹²⁶ The difficulty for the prosecution at this point, however, was that it was not clear what the factual cause of the heart attack was. From the expert evidence, although it was possible that it was the incident as a whole, including the battery, which caused the heart attack, “it was impossible ... for the jury to exclude the insults and spitting as the sole cause of ... death”.¹²⁷ Since it was impossible to establish that the battery, as the unlawful and dangerous act, was a cause of death, the appellant’s conviction for manslaughter was quashed.

Other rules of causation may also be relevant here. As seen elsewhere, V’s own voluntary act, for example of self-injection of drugs, may break the causal chain between D’s unlawful and dangerous act (e.g. of supplying drugs) and V’s death.¹²⁸

(iv) The unlawful act need not be directed at the victim

8–064

It used to be thought that because the unlawful act must expose the victim to the risk of some bodily harm, it had to be aimed at that victim. This was seen in the case of Dalby,¹²⁹ where the defendant's conviction for manslaughter arising out of the supply of prescription drugs to his friend, the deceased, was quashed on the basis that the unlawful act of supplying the drug must be "directed at the victim". However, that approach was subsequently disapproved. In Mitchell,¹³⁰ it was held that the only issue in such cases was one of causation and that in Dalby there had been "no sufficient link between Dalby's wrongful act (supplying the drug) and his friend's death".¹³¹

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S REFERENCE
(NO.3 OF 1994) [1998] A.C. 245
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

8-065

For facts see above, [para.2-251.]

LORD HOPE:

"[It is not] necessary, in order to constitute manslaughter, that the death resulted from an unlawful and dangerous act which was done with the intention to cause the victim to sustain harm. This is because it is clear from the authorities that, although the defendant must be proved to have intended to do what he did, it is not necessary to prove that he knew that his act was unlawful or dangerous. So it must follow that it is unnecessary to prove that he knew his act was likely to injure the person who died as a result of it. All that need be proved is that he intentionally did what he did, that the death was caused by it and that, applying an objective test, all sober and reasonable people would recognise the risk that some harm would result ... [Certain cases] suggest that the defendant cannot be found guilty of this crime unless his unlawful and dangerous act was directed at the person who was the ultimate victim of it. I am not persuaded that ... [this] proposition is borne out by the authorities. In R. v Mitchell ... [it] was rejected ...

In this case the act which had to be shown to be an unlawful and dangerous act was the stabbing of the child's mother. There can be no doubt that all sober and reasonable people would regard that act ... as dangerous. It is plain that it was unlawful as it was done with the intention of causing her injury. As the defendant intended to commit that act, all the ingredients necessary for mens rea in regard to the crime of manslaughter were established, irrespective of who was the ultimate victim of it ... The question, once all the other elements are satisfied, is simply one of causation.”

Reference answered accordingly

8–066

Following this decision, it seems clear that generally there is no requirement that the act be aimed at the victim and the issue is one of causation. Subsequent, and more recent, cases make no reference to any such requirement. Nevertheless, some commentators support the requirement that the act should be aimed at the victim on the grounds that the approach in Dalby “at least introduces a subjective element ... An act can only be ‘directed at the victim’ if there is an intention so to direct it” and because the “second qualification stated, that the act must be likely to cause immediate injury also seems to be new, significant and appropriate”.¹³²

3. Gross negligence manslaughter

8–067

Most manslaughter cases involve the commission of an unlawful act, usually an assault,¹³³ and so constructive manslaughter is easier to establish. Accordingly, gross negligence manslaughter is usually utilised where the defendant is engaged in a prima facie lawful activity, such as treating a patient or taking care of an aged aunt, from which death results.¹³⁴ Mere negligence does not suffice for manslaughter: gross negligence must be established. The classic statement on gross negligence is that of Lord Hewitt CJ in Bateman that:

“in order to establish criminal liability the facts must be such that, in the opinion of the jury, the negligence of the accused went beyond a mere matter of compensation between the subjects and showed such disregard for the life and safety of others as to amount to a crime against the state and conduct deserving of punishment.”¹³⁵

For a period, it was thought that this basis of manslaughter had been subsumed into Lawrence recklessness manslaughter.¹³⁶ However, in the following case, the House of Lords jettisoned Lawrence in the context of manslaughter and reverted to the test of gross negligence.

R. v ADOMAKO [1995] 1 A.C. 171
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

8-068

The defendant was an anaesthetist in an eye operation which involved paralysing the patient. During the operation a tube became disconnected from the ventilator. The defendant became aware that something was wrong four-and-a-half minutes after the disconnection when an alarm sounded. However, the checks he carried out failed to reveal the disconnection. The patient suffered a cardiac arrest and died. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter and appealed.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN LC:

“For the prosecution it was alleged that the appellant was guilty of gross negligence in failing to notice or respond appropriately to obvious signs that a disconnection had occurred and that the patient had ceased to breathe. In particular the prosecution alleged that the appellant had failed to notice at various stages during the period after disconnection and before the arrest either occurred or became inevitable that the patient’s chest was not moving, the dials on the mechanical ventilating machine were not operating, the disconnection in the endotracheal tube, that the alarm on the ventilator was not switched on and that the patient was becoming progressively blue. Further the prosecution alleged that the appellant had noticed but failed to understand the significance of the fact that during this period the patient’s pulse had dropped and the patient’s blood pressure had dropped.

Two expert witnesses gave evidence for the prosecution. Professor Payne described the standard of care as ‘abysmal’ while Professor Adams stated that in his view a competent anaesthetist should have recognised the signs of disconnection within 15 seconds and that the appellant’s conduct amounted to ‘a gross dereliction of care’.

On behalf of the appellant it was conceded at his trial that he had been negligent. The issue was therefore whether his conduct was criminal ...

The jury convicted the appellant of manslaughter ... The Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) dismissed the appellant's appeal against conviction but certified that a point of law of general public importance was involved in the decision to dismiss the appeal, namely: 'in cases of manslaughter by criminal negligence not involving driving but involving a breach of duty is it a sufficient direction to the jury to adopt the gross negligence test ... [as in Bateman] without reference to the test of recklessness as defined in R. v Lawrence (Stephen)?' ...

[Counsel for the appellant] criticised the concept of gross negligence which was the basis of the judgment of the Court of Appeal submitting that its formulation involved circularity, the jury being told in effect to convict of a crime if they thought a crime had been committed and that accordingly using gross negligence as the conceptual basis for the crime of involuntary manslaughter was unsatisfactory ...

I begin with Rex v Bateman, and the opinion of Lord Hewart CJ, where he said:

'In expounding the law to juries on the trial of indictments for manslaughter by negligence, judges have often referred to the distinction between civil and criminal liability for death by negligence. The law of criminal liability for negligence is conveniently explained in that way. If A has caused the death of B by alleged negligence, then, in order to establish civil liability, the plaintiff must prove (in addition to pecuniary loss caused by the death) that A owed a duty to B to take care, that that duty was not discharged, and that the default caused the death of B. To convict A of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove the three things above mentioned and must satisfy the jury, in addition, that A's negligence amounted to a crime. In the civil action, if it is proved that A fell short of the standard of reasonable care required by law, it matters not how far he fell short of that standard. The extent of his liability depends not on the degree of negligence, but on the amount of damage done. In criminal court, on the contrary, the amount and degree of negligence are the determining question. There must be mens rea.’

8-069

Later he said:

‘In explaining to juries the test which they should apply to determine whether the negligence, in the particular case, amounted or did not amount to a crime, judges have used many epithets, such as “culpable”, “criminal”, “gross”, “wicked”, “clear”, “complete”. But, whatever epithet be used and whether an epithet be used or not, in order to establish criminal liability the facts must be such that, in the opinion of the jury, the negligence of the accused went beyond a mere matter of compensation between subjects and showed such disregard for the life and safety of others as to amount to a crime against the state and conduct deserving punishment.’ ...

Next I turn to Andrews v Director of Public Prosecutions [1937] A.C. 576 which was a case of manslaughter through the dangerous driving of a motor car ... Lord Atkin said:

‘... Simple lack of care such as will constitute civil liability is not enough: for purposes of the criminal law there are degrees of negligence: and a very high degree of negligence is required to be proved before the felony is established. Probably of all the epithets that can be applied “reckless” most nearly covers the case. It is difficult to visualise a case of death caused by reckless driving in the connotation of that term in ordinary speech which would not justify a conviction for manslaughter: but it is probably not all-embracing, for “reckless” suggests an indifference to risk whereas the accused may have appreciated the risk and intended to avoid it and yet shown such a high degree of negligence in the means adopted to avoid the risk as would justify a conviction. If the principle of Bateman’s case is observed it will appear that the law of manslaughter has not changed by the introduction of motor vehicles on the road. Death caused by their negligent driving, though unhappily much more frequent, is to be treated in law as death caused by any other form of negligence: and juries should be directed accordingly.’

In my opinion the law as stated in these two authorities is satisfactory as providing a proper basis for describing the crime of involuntary manslaughter. Since the decision in Andrews was a decision of your Lordships' House, it remains the most authoritative statement of the present law which I have been able to find ... On this basis in my opinion the ordinary principles of the law of negligence apply to ascertain whether or not the defendant has been in breach of a duty of care towards the victim who has died. If such breach of duty is established the next question is whether that breach of duty caused the death of the victim. If so, the jury must go on to consider whether that breach of duty should be characterised as gross negligence and therefore as a crime. This will depend on the seriousness of the breach of duty committed by the defendant in all the circumstances in which the defendant was placed when it occurred. The jury will have to consider whether the extent to which the defendant's conduct departed from the proper standard of care incumbent upon him, involving as it must have done a risk of death to the patient, was such that it should be judged criminal.

8-070

It is true that to a certain extent this involves an element of circularity, but in this branch of the law I do not believe that is fatal to its being correct as a test of how far conduct must depart from accepted standards to be characterised as criminal. This is necessarily a question of degree and an attempt to specify that degree more closely is I think likely to achieve only a spurious precision. The essence of the matter which is supremely a jury question is whether having regard to the risk of death involved, the conduct of the defendant was so bad in all the circumstances as to amount in their judgment to a criminal act or omission ...

I consider it perfectly appropriate that the word 'reckless' should be used in cases of involuntary manslaughter, but as Lord Atkin put it 'in the ordinary connotation of that word'. Examples in which this was done, to my mind, with complete accuracy are R. v Stone [and Dobinson] [1977] Q.B. 354 and R. v West London Coroner Ex p. Gray [1988] Q.B. 467.

In my opinion it is quite unnecessary in the context of gross negligence to give the detailed directions with regard to the meaning of the word ‘reckless’ associated with R. v Lawrence ...

For these reasons I am of the opinion that this appeal should be dismissed and that the certified question should be answered by saying:

‘In cases of manslaughter by criminal negligence involving a breach of duty, it is a sufficient direction to the jury to adopt the gross negligence test set out by the Court of Appeal in the present case following Rex v Bateman and Andrews v Director of Public Prosecutions and that it is not necessary to refer to the definition of recklessness in R. v Lawrence, although it is perfectly open to the trial judge to use the word “reckless” in its ordinary meaning as part of his exposition of the law if he deems it appropriate in the circumstances of the particular case.’”

Appeal dismissed

8-071

Following this, there are three conditions to be satisfied for this type of manslaughter:

1. the defendant must owe a duty of care to the victim;
2. the defendant must breach that duty; and
3. the breach must amount to gross negligence.

(i) Duty of Care

8-072

The first requirement that there be a “duty of care” has the potential to cause confusion. It is simply not helpful to import civil concepts into this area of the criminal law without discrimination. The following decision states that concepts such as “duty of care” and “breach” do not bear the same meaning in the criminal law as under the law of tort.

R. v WACKER [2003] 1 CR. APP. R. 22
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL
DIVISION):

The appellant attempted to smuggle illegal Chinese immigrants into the country in a lorry. On arrival at Dover one of the containers was found to contain the dead bodies of most of the immigrants. The appellant was convicted of 58 offences of manslaughter and appealed.

KAY LJ:

“[Counsel for the appellant] submitted that the first question to be decided was whether applying ‘the ordinary principles of the law of negligence’, the appellant owed to those in the container a duty of care. He submitted that one of the general principles of the law of negligence, known by the Latin maxim of ex turpi causa non oritur actio, was that the law of negligence did not recognise the relationship between those involved in a criminal enterprise as giving rise to a duty of care owed by one participant to another ...

We venture to suggest that all right minded people would be astonished if the propositions being advanced on behalf of the appellant correctly represented the law of the land. The concept that one person could be responsible for the death of another in circumstances such as these without the criminal law being able to hold him to account for that death even if he had shown not the slightest regard for the welfare and life of the other is one that would be unacceptable in civilised society ...

[I]t is clear that the criminal law adopts a different approach to the civil law in this regard [because] ... the very same public policy that causes the civil courts to refuse the claim points in a quite different direction in considering a criminal offence. The criminal law has as its function the protection of citizens and gives effect to the state’s duty to try those who have deprived citizens of their rights of life, limb or property. It may very well step in at the precise moment when civil courts withdraw because of this very different function. The withdrawal of a civil remedy has nothing to do with whether as a matter of public policy the criminal law applies. The criminal law should not be disapplied just because the civil law is disapplied. It has its own public policy aim which may require a different approach to the involvement of the law.

Further, the criminal law will not hesitate to act to prevent serious injury or death even when the persons subjected to such injury or death may have consented to or willingly accepted the risk of actual injury or death. By way of illustration, the criminal law makes the assisting another to commit suicide a criminal offence and denies a defence of consent where significant injury is deliberately caused to another in a sexual context (Brown [1994] 1 A.C. 212). The state in such circumstances has an overriding duty to act to prevent such consequences ...

[W]e can see no justification for concluding that the criminal law should decline to hold a person as criminally responsible for the death of another simply because the two were engaged in some joint unlawful activity at the time or, indeed, because there may have been an element of acceptance of a degree of risk by the victim in order to further the joint unlawful enterprise. Public policy, in our judgment, manifestly points in totally the opposite direction.”

Appeal dismissed

8-074

Although this case rejects the criminal law’s use of the civil law defence of ex turpi causa, Herring and Palser argue that, in other regards, whether a duty of care existed was decided on the same basis as a tort case would have been.¹³⁷ However, they recognise that there are disadvantages in the criminal law determining whether a duty of care exists on the same basis as the civil law. They note that in the law of tort, if a victim is partly to blame for the resulting harm, this can be recognised in one of three ways: damages can be reduced due to contributory negligence; the principle of volenti non fit injuria is applied; or the defendant is given the defence of ex turpi causa. In the criminal law, on the other hand, the victim’s role is irrelevant:

“Criminal proceedings are not about balancing the responsibility between the defendant and the victim, but in determining whether the activity engaged in by the defendant is sufficiently harmful and blameworthy in the eyes of the state to justify a criminal conviction.”¹³⁸

Despite this recognition, however, they conclude that:

“Though there may be calls for the criminal law to develop its own understanding of the duty of care, distinct from that in tort, we would suggest that use is made of the development of the concept of a duty of care in the law of tort as the normal meaning of ‘duty of care’ in gross negligence manslaughter but recognising that there may be rare cases where the judge can direct that the tortious duty will not be relied upon. These will be in cases where the blameworthiness of the victim leads to there being no duty of care in tort when it may still be appropriate to impose a criminal liability (e.g. the ex turpi causa doctrine) and cases involving omissions, where the court will need to find not only a duty of care, but also a duty to act.”¹³⁹

8–075

There is something to be said for this suggestion. If the civil law is not to be employed here, it is difficult to see what the Adomako requirement of “duty of care” actually means. Possibly the requirement has most significance for the law relating to manslaughter by omission. Herring and Palser list circumstances in which a duty of care arises in tort cases for omissions, showing that generally there is overlap between the criminal law and civil law.¹⁴⁰ As in the criminal law, a duty of care arises in tort where there is a voluntary assumption of responsibility; a special relationship of vulnerability or control between parties; and where the defendant creates a source of danger. An additional source of duty of care in tort is where the defendant’s position as occupier gives rise to a duty in respect of the safety of lawful visitors. There is clearly no such duty to act under the criminal law.¹⁴¹ This raises the question of whether there is a difference between a duty to act (omissions) and a duty of care (manslaughter). In Evans,¹⁴² these two terms were used interchangeably but, as the example of the occupier demonstrates, there can be cases where there is a duty of care in civil law but no duty to act in criminal law. Further, the application of these principles may differ in tort law. The Law Commission argues that Adomako may have changed the law by restricting the scope of duties to act in criminal cases by equating it with that of tort where, generally, liability does not flow if a defendant abandons an effort to care for someone (unless, they cause harm through their own incompetence).¹⁴³ For example, the defendants in Stone and Dobinson might not have been liable in tort. It would, however, be extremely surprising if Lord Mackay's comments were interpreted as (inadvertently) altering the relatively established body of criminal law rules relating to omissions.

A separate question is that of who it is that decides in a particular case whether a duty of care arose. In Willoughby, the Court of Appeal has stressed that "whether a duty of care exists is a matter for the jury once the judge has decided that there is evidence capable of establishing a duty".¹⁴⁴ However, the more recent case of *Evans*¹⁴⁵ has now clarified the law on this point. As noted in Ch.2, this case confirmed that a duty of care arises in omissions leading to death where the defendant has created a dangerous situation. It also clearly stated that whether the defendant owes a duty of care is a question of law. The jury should be directed on what the law is, for example whether a duty exists if they find certain facts to be established, and it is for them to decide the facts.

(ii) Breach of duty

8-076

Whether the defendant breached the duty of care owed to the victim is a question of fact for the jury. The jury must also find that the breach caused the death of the deceased, applying the rules on causation discussed in Ch.2.

(iii) The breach must amount to gross negligence

8-077

Whether civil law concepts are applied or not, it is clear that the critical requirement for this type of manslaughter is that there has been gross negligence. The argument that an actual awareness of a risk of death is required for manslaughter in order to bring the law in line with the subjective test applied in *G*¹⁴⁶ was rejected in the case of Mark,¹⁴⁷ in which the Court of Appeal made it clear that the case of G had no bearing on the test for manslaughter. The test is simply one of determining how far the standard of behaviour of the defendant departs from accepted standards and this is "supremely a jury question".¹⁴⁸ The jury must assess whether, having regard to the risk of death, the conduct was so bad in all the circumstances as to be criminal.

This unanimous decision of the House of Lords in Adomako (which applies irrespective of the method of killing¹⁴⁹) has received a mixed response.¹⁵⁰ There are substantial problems with the decision.

The main criticism is that the test to be employed by juries is circular. They should find the defendant's actions criminal (manslaughter) if they think the conduct falls so far below proper standards of care that it should be judged criminal. This arguably amounts to leaving questions of law to the jury as it is for them to decide whether the conduct amounts to a crime. Further, no guidance is given as to how far below accepted standards of behaviour the defendant's conduct must fall other than that the conduct must be "so bad" in all the circumstances as to warrant criminalisation as manslaughter. This absence of any legally defined criteria renders the law highly uncertain and increases the chances of inconsistency of verdicts.

However, the Court of Appeal has endeavoured to rebuff such criticisms.

R. V MISRA AND SRIVASTAVA [2005] 1
CR. APP. R. 21 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

8-078

Two Senior House Officers failed to diagnose and treat a case of toxic shock syndrome in a patient following an operation on his knee. The patient died. On appeal against conviction for manslaughter the appellants argued that the circular test of gross negligence in Adomako breached arts 6 (right to a fair trial) and 7 (no punishment without law) of the ECHR because it leads to lack of certainty.¹⁵¹

JUDGE LJ:

"[62] On proper analysis [of the test in Adomako] ... the jury is not deciding whether the particular defendant ought to be convicted on some unprincipled basis. The question for the jury is not whether the defendant's negligence was gross, and whether additionally, it was a crime, but whether his behaviour was grossly negligent and consequently criminal. This is not a question of law, but one of fact, for decision in the individual case.

[63] On examination, this represents one example, amongst many, of problems which juries are expected to address on a daily basis ...

[64] In our judgment the law is clear. The ingredients of the offence have been clearly defined, and the principles decided in the House of Lords in Adomako. They involve no uncertainty.”

Appeal dismissed

8-079

In Misra, the Court of Appeal also attempted to clear up the second problem with the test in Adomako. Following the House of Lords' decision in that case, it was perhaps unclear what type of risk was required to be considered. While Lord Mackay referred to the “risk of death”, his approval of other authorities such as Bateman (“disregard for life and safety”), Stone (“disregard of danger to the health and welfare of the infirm person”) and R. v West London Coroner Ex p. Gray (“obvious and serious risk to the health and welfare”) suggested that a risk of something less than death would suffice. However, Lord Mackay twice emphasised that the risk must be one of death and this view was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Misra.¹⁵² In this respect, the decision in Adomako is to be welcomed. Under Lawrence and its progeny¹⁵³ all that was required was that the defendant create an obvious and serious risk of injury. For a crime as serious as manslaughter, this was casting the net of liability too wide.¹⁵⁴

Finally, the decision in Adomako is problematic in that Lord Mackay endorses the use of the phrase “recklessness” in involuntary manslaughter cases, if appropriate in the circumstances of the particular case, as long as it is given its “ordinary meaning”. This is meant to exclude Caldwell and Lawrence recklessness but little further guidance is given. Its use in the decision of Stone and Dobinson,¹⁵⁵ for example, is described as completely accurate. Subsequent cases have suggested that whilst evidence of a defendant's state of mind is not required for gross negligence manslaughter, if such evidence exists it might mean that the jury is more likely to find that there has been gross negligence.¹⁵⁶ In Misra, the Court of Appeal attempted some clarification of the issue by stating that “a defendant may properly be convicted of gross negligence manslaughter in the absence of evidence as to his state of mind. However, when it is available, such evidence is not irrelevant to the issue of gross negligence”.¹⁵⁷ It becomes relevant as one of the circumstances to which the jury must have regard when deciding whether the negligence was gross. Judge LJ then went on to confirm that gross negligence is a form of mens rea, despite it not requiring any inquiry into the defendant’s state of mind.¹⁵⁸

8–080

Despite these attempts in Misra to clarify the law, it is clear that the risk of inconsistent verdicts has increased and that this area of law is in need of reform.¹⁵⁹ The danger is not only that juries are left to decide for themselves with little guidance on whether or not an individual is liable, but also that there will be variations in prosecuting practices. Quick has found that there is a greater propensity to prosecute cases of medical negligence (where death has resulted) in the northwest of England, which he partially attributes to “increased prosecutorial discretion in certain regions which have ‘got home’ on Adomako”.¹⁶⁰ He argues that prosecutions of such cases are an exercise in “buck-passing”, with the buck stopping with experts drafted in by the CPS.¹⁶¹ Whether an individual medical practitioner is convicted of manslaughter will depend on the views of such experts, who “effectively decide on the vague legal question of whether the conduct is grossly negligent”.¹⁶² Surely the decision as to guilt is one that ought to be capable of being made in an informed way by juries, guided by clear legal principles, rather than depending on a postcode lottery or the assessment of a few “expert” witnesses. Quick advocates doing away with gross negligence manslaughter and relying instead on reckless manslaughter in all cases, including cases of medical error leading to death.¹⁶³ Griffiths and Sanders have found that the CPS only decides to bring a prosecution in 5% of cases of medical manslaughter referred to it by the police.¹⁶⁴ In 95% of cases, then, a prosecution is not brought. In 27% of cases this is because no breach of duty of care was found in relation to the individuals prosecuted. In 44% of cases the CPS concluded that they could not prove causation.¹⁶⁵ In 17% of cases the CPS were of the opinion that the negligence displayed failed to reach the “gross” threshold, although on Griffiths and Sanders’ assessment there was clear evidence of gross negligence in around half of the cases.¹⁶⁶ They conclude that adopting Quick’s suggestion of a test of recklessness rather than gross negligence would have little or no impact on decisions made in the cases to which they had access.¹⁶⁷

4. Sentencing involuntary manslaughter

8–081

As noted above, involuntary manslaughter of any species carries a maximum life sentence, leaving the sentencing judge with a wide ranging discretion to do justice in a particular case, unfettered by any sentencing guidelines set down by the Sentencing Council. Because of the gap between the blameworthiness of the defendant and the outcome of his act, discussed in the next section, cases of constructive manslaughter lead to difficult sentencing decisions for judges. Lord Judge considered the issue in Attorney-General’s Reference (Nos 60, 62 and 63 of 2009) (Appleby),¹⁶⁸ involving a number of cases relating to sentences for homicides resulting from street fights where fists and feet were the weapons used, and concluded that the result of death is important in such cases. He was of the opinion that the earlier sentencing case of Coleman,¹⁶⁹ where the death resulting from an assault was described as “accidental”, should no longer be referred to because the public impact of violence on the streets was more of a concern since that case was decided, and was a significant aggravating feature. Coleman had focused on the actions of the defendant and his intentions at the time of the crime rather than its consequences. Lord Judge concluded that that approach to sentencing was no longer appropriate and that, following the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.143(1),¹⁷⁰ specific attention should be paid to the consequences of the crime. The description “one-punch manslaughter” should be confined to cases where death resulted from a single blow with a bare hand or fist such as the case of Furby,¹⁷¹ where the starting point for sentence following a guilty plea was 12 months' imprisonment. Since Appleby there seems to have been a fairly consistent approach to such manslaughters, with sentences being passed in the order of six to eight years' imprisonment.¹⁷²

Following Appleby, the question became whether the approach taken in that case to sentencing unlawful act manslaughters, with a focus on the harm caused, should apply equally to other forms of involuntary manslaughter. In Holtom,¹⁷³ the Court of Appeal considered Appleby in determining the appropriate sentence for a case of gross negligence manslaughter arising out of a workplace incident, where a 15-year-old assisting a builder had been working unsupervised and was crushed by a wall. A sentence of three years' imprisonment was upheld (the defendant pleaded guilty). Following this, Appleby was interpreted in *Barrass*¹⁷⁴ as creating:

“a step change in the tariff of sentencing in cases of unlawful act manslaughter and gross negligence manslaughter, each of which ultimately rested on its own facts and by reference to a proper consideration of the fatal consequences of the offence.”

8-082

The defendant's sentence of two years and eight months' imprisonment, following a guilty plea to manslaughter after he left his vulnerable sister for two-and-a-half weeks on her bedroom floor following a fall, was upheld. In Garg,¹⁷⁵ the Court of Appeal took Holtom and Barrass as demonstrating that sentencing principles enunciated in Appleby applied equally to gross negligence manslaughter, and went on to apply them in a case of manslaughter arising out of gross medical negligence, upholding a sentence of two years' imprisonment following a guilty plea. Quirk has questioned the wisdom of this approach to sentencing medical manslaughter:

“[i]f the men and women in white coats are going to be put away, given the costs to them, the criminal justice system and the National Health Service against the questionable benefits of imprisonment, there needs to be calibrated guidelines and a coherent rationale, not a one-size fits all increase in sentences for all manslaughter cases.”¹⁷⁶

The result of this line of cases is, though, that sentences for all types of involuntary manslaughter have increased. It is about time that the Sentencing Council addressed the issue by providing a definitive guideline for involuntary manslaughter. One imagines, however, that the idea of the task might appear insurmountable, given the wide ranging culpability which involuntary manslaughter covers. The question then arises as to whether the substantive law ought to be reformed to assist the task of importing consistency at the sentencing stage?

5. Rationale and reform

8–083

In cases where a charge of manslaughter is brought, the law here raises, yet again, the fundamental question of what importance should be attached to the actual harm done. If a defendant has acted with gross negligence, or has committed an unlawful act, why should he not simply be punished for that gross negligence or for that unlawful act? Why should he be punished for the more serious crime of manslaughter merely because his actions cause death—if that death was not within his range of contemplation? Take Larkin for example. He committed an unlawful act, an assault. Why was he not simply punished for that unlawful act? Why should he be guilty of the much more serious offence of manslaughter merely because his drunk mistress happened to fall against his razor? Was not his blameworthiness the same, whether she fell against the razor or whether she fell to the ground, missing his razor and not injuring herself?

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, 14TH REPORT,
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON,
1980, CMND.7844, PARAS 120–121,
124:

“120 ... Suppose that A strikes B and gives him a bleeding nose; B, unknown to A, is a haemophiliac and bleeds to death. Or, A strikes B who falls and unluckily hits his head against a sharp projection and dies. Or A chases B with the object of chastising him; B runs away, trips and falls into a river in which he drowns. In each of these cases, although A is at fault and is guilty of an assault or of causing injury, his fault does not extend to the causing of death or to the causing of serious injury which he did not foresee and in some cases could not reasonably have foreseen. In our opinion, they should not be treated as manslaughter because the offender’s fault falls too far short of the unlucky result. So serious an offence as manslaughter should not be a lottery ... [T]here seems to be no reason for calling it manslaughter. Indeed, the name is positively objectionable for several reasons, among which are the fact that it gives a false idea of the gravity of the defendant’s moral offence and that there is always the possibility that it may receive a punishment going beyond that appropriate to the assault.

121 The second instance is causing death by an act of gross negligence. Evidence of this will often be sufficient to enable the jury to draw an inference of recklessness as to the causing of death or serious injury, in which case the act will amount to manslaughter under our recommendation ... But sometimes the jury may not be able to find more than that the defendant was extremely foolish; and although the foolishness may amount to gross negligence we do not think that it should be sufficient for manslaughter in the absence of advertence to the risk of death or serious injury. It seems that in fact prosecutions falling exclusively under this heading of manslaughter are very rare.”¹⁷⁷

There is, however, another view that weight should be attached to the resulting harm in assessing the extent of criminal liability. The fact that death has been caused is, under this view, crucial in justifying increased liability and punishment.

C. M. V. CLARKSON AND H. M.
KEATING, “CODIFICATION:
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON

UNDER THE DRAFT CRIMINAL CODE”
(1986) 50 Jo. C.L. 405, 422–423:

8–086

“Criminal liability cannot and should not be based exclusively on mental elements. The significance of the harm caused, in this case, death, is critical in the construction of criminal liability. We do not judge people solely on the basis of the quality of their actions and their exertions, but also by the results of those actions. The fact that a person’s negligent or unlawful actions have resulted in the death of a human being totally alters our moral judgment; it arouses resentment in society (quite apart from the bitterness and pain caused to the relatives and friends of the deceased). Imagine a workman high on a building who negligently tosses a brick to the street below where it strikes and kills a passer-by. The response of the CLRC ... is that this death is ‘pure chance.’ It is simply ‘bad luck.’ The workman’s actions must be judged totally on the basis of his subjective mens rea.

It is strongly submitted that this view is unacceptable. Those observing the above incidents would respond with horror. The workman has killed the passer-by. His actions were not just dangerous, that is, likely to cause danger. The danger has materialised and someone lies dead. This resultant harm makes its mark and leaves a lasting impression. If the workman tried to run away, we would chase him and attempt his detention.”

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), P.482:

8–087

A totally different approach begins with the observation that persons who inadvertently cause harm feel greater remorse than those who have ‘close calls.’ If a reckless driver goes into a skid and collides with another car, he is likely to feel different from another driver, equally reckless, whose car merely slides into an embankment. If an assassin aims, shoots and hits her intended victim, she is likely to feel different about her act than she would if the bullet has gone astray. Feelings of guilt, and remorse are appropriate when harm is done, but if all is the same after as before the act, there would be nothing to be remorseful about, and the actor's feelings of guilt would make us wonder why he wanted to suffer inappropriate anguish. Feelings of remorse and guilt are closely connected with causing harm, for these feelings are part of a broader pattern of human interaction. The notions of causing harm, injuring others, feeling guilt and making amends are all part of the patterns by which human relationships are disturbed and then restored. The notion of guilt cannot be lifted out of context and fitted to cases where there is merely a risk of harm, but no concrete impact on the lives of others."

C. M. V. CLARKSON, "CONTEXT AND CULPABILITY IN INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER: PRINCIPLE OR INSTINCT" IN A. ASHWORTH AND B. MITCHELL, RETHINKING ENGLISH HOMICIDE LAW (2000), PP.154–155, 158–160:

8–088

"Grossly careless killings

... The Law Commission has long been committed to subjectivism in the criminal law on the basis that criminal liability and punishment should be linked to moral guilt which involves blaming only those who have chosen to cause harm in the sense of intending or knowing that harm could occur. However, while such cognition clearly does involve moral guilt, it is not obvious that moral guilt must be linked to cognition. We can blame people for making choices even when the possibility of harm is not in the forefront of their minds. As Duff has argued: a failure to consider obvious risks to others demonstrates an attitude of indifference. Assuming the person is capable of foresight, failing to recognise obvious risks when choosing to act demonstrates that s/he regards them as unimportant or 'couldn't care less'. Students almost never forget a final exam; some students forget tutorials. Exams are of critical importance and care is taken not to oversleep etc.; attendance at tutorials, to some students, is not important and careful precautions (setting the alarm clock etc.) are not taken.

Such uncaring indifference could be condemned even more strongly than the choices of the classically subjective risk-taker who recognises a small chance of a risk occurring, hopes it will not materialise, but nevertheless goes ahead and acts. This indifference is a state of mind, albeit an affective one rather than a cognitive one.

In many situations Duff's account is 'easy'. For example, the boorish man who assumes that all women would consent to intercourse with him clearly demonstrates indifference when having intercourse without consent. But some cases are 'harder'. Horder, ('Gross Negligence and Criminal Culpability' (1997) 47 University of Toronto Law Journal 495) has argued that there are two forms of gross negligence: indifference and a great departure from expected standards. However, assuming a capacity to choose otherwise had all the relevant facts been brought to the actor's attention, the latter is better regarded as evidence of the former. For example, doctors because of their training and rules of conduct regarding their profession are expected to act in the best interests of their patients and achieve a basic level of competence. If, through inattentiveness or tiredness, they make a slight error (not a great departure from expected standards) we would probably not conclude that their actions demonstrated uncaring indifference sufficient for criminal liability. But where there is a gross or substantial departure from expected standards (bearing in mind that what is expected could vary depending on working conditions) indifference (given the doctor's situation) can more easily be inferred. The fact that s/he is overworked by a stretched NHS will not serve to exculpate. Unless so tired as to be an effective automation the doctor chose to act knowing of the fatigue. While the primary motivation in acting might be concern for the care of the patient, ultimately other secondary concerns (career prospects, willingness to obey superior's orders etc.) prevailed thereby demonstrating an attitude of indifference to the patient's interests. For instance, the conduct and attitude of the anaesthetist in Adomako was described by an expert witness as 'a gross dereliction of care'. Such a choice can be condemned (although we might also wish to blame others for putting the doctor in such a situation) ...

... It is my argument that in appropriate cases the requisite culpability can be found in the circumstances/context in which the defendant acted without any necessary correspondence to the death. The notion that culpability can be established without the fault element corresponding to the prohibited harm is hardly a novel one in English law. For example, cases on intoxication clearly establish that the requisite culpability lies in the excessive consumption of drink or drugs ...

However, once one has severed the connection between fault and result, the problem is one of identifying what sort of fault should suffice for manslaughter. It is submitted that when death has been caused departure from the paradigm is permissible as long as the actions are within the same family of offence, namely violence. The essential point about constructive manslaughter is that the defendant has chosen to engage in criminal, dangerous activity: usually violence. Such a person is deliberately engaging in a morally different course of action compared to those who act lawfully and inadvertently cause death. As Horder puts it:

‘The fact that I deliberately wrong V arguably changes my normative position vis à vis the risk of adverse consequences of that wrongdoing to V, whether or not foreseen or reasonably foreseeable ... if ... my unlawful act is meant to wrong V ... its deliberateness changes my relationship with the risk of adverse consequences stemming therefrom.’ (“A Critique of the Correspondence Principle in Criminal Law” [1995] Crim. L.R. 759.)

This change in normative position is, of course, morally interesting. But is it enough for the fault element for manslaughter? The answer is yes—provided the change in normative position is one involving an attack upon the victim. The moral quality of a deliberate attack upon a person brings the assailant within the family of violence. A defendant who attacks another and risks injury cannot complain when criminal liability is imposed in relation to injuries—even death—resulting from the attack. Horder distinguishes between ‘pure luck’ (where a fortuitous result unconnected to one’s endeavours occurs) and ‘making one’s own luck’ (where the consequence is directly connected to one’s endeavours). Where a death results from an unlawful attack on a victim, the defendant ‘by directing [his/her] efforts towards harming V’ is responsible for the bad luck that s/he has created.

Take, for example, the case of Williams ([1996] 2 Cr. App. R. (S) 72) which is a classic example of the sort of constructive manslaughter objected to by the Law Commission and many commentators. The defendant gave a young woman two pushes and one slap. As a result she fell back, caught her head on a wall-mounted heater, damaged her neck and died. Sacks J, in substituting a sentence of two-and-a-half years' imprisonment, agreed with the trial sentencing judge that this death was 'in a sense, accidental' but stressed that 'we do bear well in mind that this was an assault on a woman' and that he 'set about her ... with terrible consequences'. Such, admittedly rather generalised, statements are an acceptance of the above proposition that when the defendant, instead of merely quarrelling with the woman as he had been, chose to attack her, he deliberately changed his normative stance to become a violent actor who should bear responsibility for the consequences of his violence. His actions were simply not of the same moral order as those of a person who swears at a woman who in distress turns away and hits her head on a wall-heater and dies.

This line of reasoning, however, suggests that it is only those who attack their victims in the sense of assaulting them intending or foreseeing some injury who alter their normative position relevantly to bring themselves within the family of violence. From this it follows that not every unlawful act should suffice for constructive manslaughter as it does under the present law (as long as it is dangerous). Accordingly, there should be no liability for manslaughter in some of the well-known cases such as Newbury and the drug-injection or drug-supply cases such as Cato. Such offenders have of course engaged in actions of a certain moral quality and there might indeed be risks of adverse consequences flowing from their wrongdoing. They could possibly be liable for killing by gross carelessness. But, by not attacking their victims, they have not chosen to embark on a violent course of action. They have departed too far from the family of violence: the connection between their fault and the death is too tenuous.

From this it follows that some sort of constructive manslaughter should be retained but only unlawful acts of personal violence involving at least a common assault with intention or foresight of some injury should suffice."

position” towards his victim has come under question by Ashworth in the following extract. The concept of a change in normative position can be attributed not just to Horder, who is cited in the above extract, but originally to Gardner.¹⁷⁸ Ashworth points out that it is assumed that a change in normative position should make a defendant who engaged in a violent attack liable for a more serious offence than he foresaw, but we are not told why this is. One of the issues to be addressed is to know what the relevant normative position is. Ashworth suggests that it might be that “there is a duty not knowingly to wrong another by injuring their protected interests, either by way of an attack (which is essentially harmful) or by way of endangerment (which is potentially harmful)”. However, it is not enough, on Clarkson’s view, that the defendant has intentionally committed any offence; to be liable for manslaughter he must have committed an offence within the family of violence. Ashworth warns, however, that there is a danger of relying on a principle such as “family of offences” in that “it is open to manipulation on other grounds: there can be nuclear and extended families”.

In the above extract, Clarkson uses the case of Williams as an example of a defendant changing his normative position towards his victim and having to face the consequences of a conviction for manslaughter. Ashworth explores the application of the principle of change of normative position in the context of this case in more detail.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, “CHANGE OF NORMATIVE POSITION:
DETERMINING THE CONTOURS OF CULPABILITY IN CRIMINAL LAW”
(2008) 11 NEW CRIMINAL L. REV.
232–256, 250–252:

8–091

“There is, in principle, a whole range of possible fault elements in such a case. To take four, D could have been (i) walking past V when he tripped over, pushing her against the heater; (ii) leaving the house after burgling it when he encountered V and in his surprise tripped over, pushing her against the heater; (iii) assaulting V by pushing and slapping her once, as in Williams itself; or (iv) attacking her with punches and kicking her in the abdomen, causing her to fall against the heater. In which of these scenarios does D change his normative position, or cross a moral threshold, sufficiently for liability for manslaughter? Of course there is a labelling issue here, and we should assume that the crime of manslaughter is understood to be a lower grade of homicide than murder, requiring a lesser degree of fault. Case (i) can be eliminated swiftly, on the ground that D did not intend to assault V or indeed to commit any wrong against V. Perhaps, in order to retain our focus, we can also deal swiftly with case (iv): kicking V in the abdomen suggests an intention to cause at least moderate injury, if not serious injury, and might therefore be regarded as a sufficient fault element for a crime of manslaughter. But what about cases (ii) and (iii)? Is it satisfactory to say that case (iii) ought to be sufficient for manslaughter because D has intentionally assaulted V, thereby changing his normative position in relation to harms that might result to V (including death)? ... [W]hen Gardner considered the distinction between the offenses of common assault and assault occasioning bodily harm, he argued that committing an assault was a sufficient change of normative position to justify holding D liable for any actual bodily harm that might result, and that the law puts people on notice about that. Can that argument be extended to manslaughter, even if, to adopt Gardner's imagery, one asks the question by travelling 'downhill' from D's responsibility for causing V's death?

In relation to case (ii), can one say that D has sufficiently changed his normative position by intentionally committing a crime against V (burglary), so that it is fair to hold him criminally liable for any resulting harms? One obvious difference between cases (ii) and (iii) is that the crimes of burglary and assault form part of different families of offences. That is a restrictive consideration that points away from the unlawful act approach, which allows the intentional commission of any crime to constitute a sufficient change of normative position or crossing of a moral threshold, and we [can see] that Horder's formulation of the malice principle restricts it to conduct wrongfully directed at a particular type of interest. So, if we return to case (iii), the key question is how the moral connection between a death caused by D and D's intentional assault on V is to be established. If D intended nothing more than a common assault, and if the possibility of causing death was statistically very low (as it must be if a simple assault is intended), is it merely a question of putting D on notice of the risk of a manslaughter conviction if death should by mischance ensue? If notice alone were sufficient, that would raise the question whether due notice could convert case (ii) into a morally satisfactory foundation for a manslaughter conviction.”

8–092

Mitchell similarly challenges the use of Williams as providing an effective defence of the change of normative position principle:

“But what is crucial about the distinction between swearing at the woman and attacking her is not that they reflect different families of wrongdoing: rather it is that one carries an intrinsic risk (albeit a very remote risk) of causing serious, possibly fatal, harm, whereas the other does not.”¹⁷⁹

Clearly, there are at least two factions on either side of the argument but, as will be seen, the Law Commission has sided with Gardner, Horder and Clarkson in its proposals for changing the law on manslaughter.¹⁸⁰

The Law Commission, in a Consultation Paper in 1994,¹⁸¹ was critical of the (then) law on gross negligence manslaughter and was of the view that constructive manslaughter should be completely abolished. However, in its Final Report in 1996,¹⁸² the Commission conceded that the arguments in favour of gross negligence were formidable—where the harm risked was very serious, namely, death or serious injury: “We may plead that we trod on the snail inadvertently: but not on the baby—you ought to look where you are putting your great feet”.¹⁸³ Secondly, in response to strong comments favouring retention, in some form, of constructive manslaughter, the Law Commission included a modified form of unlawful act manslaughter in its proposals. In 2000, the Home Office largely accepted these recommendations and, in place of the present broad offence of manslaughter, proposed the creation of new separate offences of reckless killing and killing by gross carelessness in a Draft Involuntary Homicide Bill.¹⁸⁴ Following criticisms of the draft bill, the Law Commission revisited the issue and its proposals are now slightly different. Rather than creating two offences of reckless killing and killing by gross carelessness to replace manslaughter it has recommended that the label of manslaughter should remain and that the offence could be committed in one of two ways.

LAW COMMISSION, NO.304, MURDER,
MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE
(2006), PARA.2.163:

8-093

“We recommend that manslaughter should encompass:

- (1) killing another person through gross negligence (‘gross negligence manslaughter’); or
- (2) killing another person
 - (a) through the commission of a criminal act intended by the defendant to cause injury, or
 - (b) through the commission of a criminal act that the defendant was aware involved a serious risk of causing some injury (‘criminal act manslaughter’).”

8-094

These recommendations arguably constitute an improvement on the previous proposals and allow the two forms of killing (gross negligence manslaughter and criminal act manslaughter) to remain separate to some degree. It is right that this should be the case, since killers within the first category are normally engaged in lawful activities, often simply performing their job. Causing injury is not part of their reason for acting. The moral culpability of those who choose to engage in a violent attack, and thus fall within the second category, is aggravated by their crossing a moral threshold and engaging in violence. Fair labelling suggests that this difference in the context and culpability associated with the killing should be marked by a separate offence. That both forms of killing would carry the same offence label

(manslaughter) may be a residual objection to the proposals.¹⁸⁵

B. VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER

8-095

A defendant who possesses malice aforethought may, when charged with murder, be convicted of the lesser crime of manslaughter if she satisfies one of three mitigating criteria. At common law, there was only one such mitigating criterion: killing under provocation. Two further partial defences were added by statute: diminished responsibility¹⁸⁶ and killing in pursuance of a suicide pact.¹⁸⁷ The main reason for the existence of these partial defences is the mandatory life sentence for murder and the need to provide the judge with discretion in sentencing in cases where the killer's blameworthiness is reduced due to some factor personal to her or the surrounding circumstances of the killing. The term voluntary manslaughter is nothing more than a convenient label for these forms of killing. Most recently, the defence of "provocation" has been abolished and replaced with a new statutory partial defence of "loss of control".¹⁸⁸

1. Loss of control

(i) Introduction

8-096

In Duffy,¹⁸⁹ a young woman killed her husband after having been savagely beaten by him; in Camplin,¹⁹⁰ a 15-year-old boy who had been bugged¹⁹¹ killed his assailant; in Bedder,¹⁹² a man, who knew himself to be impotent, stabbed to death a prostitute who had jeered at him and kicked him in the groin after he had unsuccessfully tried to have intercourse with her. All claimed that they had been provoked into losing their self-control and killing their "victims".

To what extent should we blame such persons for their actions and hold them criminally responsible? If we can envisage situations in which violence of this sort would be a natural response to their suffering, how is our understanding of their plight to be reflected in the law? By no punishment? By less punishment?

The law has traditionally accepted claims of provocation affecting liability in one area only. Provocation, now replaced by loss of control, has allowed murder to be reduced to manslaughter¹⁹³ because it has been felt unjust to subject the defendant to the full rigour of a conviction for murder; in other words, the courts have wished to avoid the mandatory life sentence. A conviction for manslaughter, on the other hand, gives the courts the necessary flexibility to impose whatever sentence is deemed appropriate. Loss of control, or its predecessor provocation, is not a defence to any other crime as no other serious offence in England carries a fixed penalty. For other crimes, provocation can be taken into account as a mitigating factor, lessening the severity of the sentence.

Under the common law of provocation, a defendant to a charge of murder was provided with a partial defence if the killing could be attributed to the defendant's angry response to some act of provocation from the deceased or from a third party. The test for the jury in such cases was elaborated on in statute.

HOMICIDE ACT 1957 s.3:

8-097

“Where on a charge of murder there is evidence on which the jury can find that the person charged was provoked (whether by things done or by things said or by both together) to lose his self-control, the question whether the provocation was enough to make a reasonable man do as he did shall be left to be determined by the jury; and in determining that question the jury shall take into account everything both done and said according to the effect which, in their opinion, it would have on a reasonable man.”

8-098

The defence was traditionally divided into two tests: (i) a subjective test that the defendant must have lost their self-control; and (ii) an objective test that the defendant must have responded in a way that the reasonable man would have responded. The law proved troublesome and controversial in respect to both of these tests, and led to a great deal of instability in the case law. Some called for complete abolition of the defence, whilst others argued for reform. The Law Commission sought to widen the ambit of the provocation defence by allowing emotions other than anger, namely fear, to form the basis of the defence, whilst at the same time attempting to narrow the defence in other ways.¹⁹⁴ The view it took was that so long as the Government resists calls for the abolition of the mandatory life sentence for murder, it is pointless to consider the arguments for and against complete abolition of the partial defence.¹⁹⁵

(ii) Rationale of the law

8-099

In reviewing the law of provocation and making recommendations for its reform, the Law Commission naturally attempted to identify the rationale of the law's response, so that it could identify the aims of the law, all the better to develop improvements. However, the Law Commission described the rationale underlying the defence as "elusive".¹⁹⁶ One possible rationale of the law's response historically is that in weighing the competing interests of the eventual victim against those of the defendant it decides that the victim, by participating in the chain of events, is to some extent responsible for his own demise. The victim, therefore, loses some of his claim to be protected by the law. Viewed in this light one could regard provocation as a partial justification for the defendant's actions and an historical analysis of the defence affords considerable support for this. The common-law defence of provocation was of ancient origin but:

"it emerged in recognisably modern form in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. It comes from a world of Restoration gallantry in which gentlemen ... acted in accordance with a code of honour which required insult to be personally avenged by instant angry retaliation ... To show anger 'in hot blood' for a proper reason by an appropriate response was not only permissible but the badge of a man of honour. The human frailty to which the defence of provocation made allowance was the possibility that the man of honour might overreact and kill when a lesser retaliation would have been appropriate. Provided that he did not grossly overreact in the extent or manner of his retaliation, the offence would be manslaughter.”¹⁹⁷

Thus, an important feature of the law at this time was that of proportionality.¹⁹⁸

However, while it may well be that for at least some of its history the defence of provocation was a partial justification,¹⁹⁹ the law, by the 19th century had already begun to shift in emphasis. Rather than focusing upon the rightfulness of anger, judges “preferred to look upon provocation as something which temporarily deprived the accused of his reason”²⁰⁰ and were concerned with whether there had been a loss of control. However, this loss of control had to manifest itself in a particular way: extreme anger. This trend continued and the law, especially since the Homicide Act 1957 s.3, seems to have regarded the defence as a “partial excuse”. The law ceased to be solely concerned with the victim-offender relationship. Provocation could be pleaded even if the victim was not the provoking agent²⁰¹ (in other words, was entirely innocent in the affair). The victim need not have committed an “unlawful act”²⁰²; indeed, the victim may have been far too young to appreciate the quality of her actions at all.²⁰³ In short, the thrust of the inquiry shifted from the victim (and her provocative acts) to the defendant (and his loss of self-control)²⁰⁴ and the rationale of the defence became “compassion for human infirmity”.²⁰⁵ As in cases of diminished responsibility and duress, the law recognised that people are not in perfect control of their emotions and actions, particularly when subject to great pressure.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.246–247:

8–100

“The primary source of difficulty in the analysis of provocation derives from the failure of the courts and commentators to face the underlying normative issue whether the accused may be fairly expected to control an impulse to kill under the circumstances. Obviously there are some impulses such as anger and even mercy ... that we do expect people to control. If they fail to control these impulses and they kill another intentionally, they are liable for unmitigated homicide or murder. The basic moral question in the law of homicide is distinguishing between those impulses to kill as to which we as a society demand self-control, and those as to which we relax our inhibitions.”

8–101

It may be that the underlying rationale of the new defence of loss of control still contains elements of both excuse and justification. The new law requires that the defendant lost control and this can be categorised as an excusatory element. Further, it also insists that she did so in circumstances in which a person with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint might well have done the same. This latter requirement mirrors the objective test developed under the common law, in relation to which it has been suggested that it retains an element of justification in the defence.²⁰⁶ Further, it has been suggested that a loss of control should be perceived as justified because it is not only natural, but right to become angry in some circumstances. The new law, however, also recognises that it is sometimes natural to react to a threat of serious violence through the use of excessive, pre-emptive violence, brought on by a state of fear.

(iii) The law

CORONERS AND JUSTICE ACT 2009

s.54: PARTIAL DEFENCE TO MURDER:

LOSS OF CONTROL:

8–102

“(1) Where a person (‘D’) kills or is a party to the killing of another (‘V’), D is not to be convicted of murder if—

- (a) D’s acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing resulted from D’s loss of self-control,
- (b) the loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger, and
- (c) a person of D’s sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D.

- (2) For the purposes of subsection (1)(a), it does not matter whether or not the loss of control was sudden.
- (3) In subsection (1)(c) the reference to “the circumstances of D” is a reference to all of D’s circumstances other than those whose only relevance to D’s conduct is that they bear on D’s general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint.
- (4) Subsection (1) does not apply if, in doing or being a party to the killing, D acted in a considered desire for revenge.
- (5) On a charge of murder, if sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue with respect to the defence under subsection (1), the jury must assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not.
- (6) For the purposes of subsection (5), sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue with respect to the defence if evidence is adduced on which, in the opinion of the trial judge, a jury, properly directed, could reasonably conclude that the defence might apply.
- (7) A person who, but for this section, would be liable to be convicted of murder is liable instead to be convicted of manslaughter.
- (8) The fact that one party to a killing is by virtue of this section not liable to be convicted of murder does not affect the question whether the killing amounted to murder in the case of any other party to it.”

The common law defence of provocation was abolished by s.56 of the 2009 Act. Whilst the Law Commission’s recommendations for change had retained the label for the partial defence as “provocation”, this was dropped by the Government on the basis that conversations with stakeholders had revealed that the term carries “negative connotations”.²⁰⁷ As under the common law, the burden of proof is on the prosecution to prove that the defence is not satisfied (s.54(5)) once the judge is satisfied that there is sufficient evidence that would enable a jury to decide that the defence might apply (s.54(6)).²⁰⁸

In comparison to the Homicide Act 1957 s.3, the new provision provides far more detail, and the elements of the defence are further clarified in s.55, as discussed below. The defence can no longer be separated into a neat “subjective” test and an “objective” test. However, when looking at the section more closely it can be seen that it is very much based on the common law defence of provocation and retains many of its characteristics, whilst at the same time attempting to ensure that it is made available in cases of murder that merit reduction to manslaughter.

(a) Loss of self-control

8–104

This first requirement mirrors that under the common law defence of provocation, which was meant to exclude from the ambit of the defence planned or revenge killings. No matter how severe the provocation, if the defendant was in control at the time of the killing, there was no evidence upon which the defence could be based.²⁰⁹ Although the new law now explicitly excludes pure revenge killings through s.54(4), the loss of control requirement is retained, since it is the law’s desire to make concessions to “human frailty” which provides a great deal of rationale for the defence. This is despite the Law Commission having recommended that a reformed version of provocation jettison the need for a loss of control.²¹⁰ The question that remains, however, is what is meant by “loss of self-control”? It is clearly a subjective test: the issue is whether the defendant lost his self-control, causing him to kill.

Under the common law, in the majority of cases where a sudden killing followed on from a highly provocative incident, it was more or less assumed that the defendant had lost control. However, in some cases it was more problematic and the case-law was disappointing in explaining what “loss of self-control” meant. Cases referred to the defendant not being “master of his own understanding”,²¹¹ although beyond using phrases such as “snapping”, or “exploding into anger”, little further attention was generally paid to this element.²¹² It does not mean that it is necessary for the defendant to have “gone berserk”²¹³: such an extreme (and rare) condition might even be inconsistent with a finding that the defendant acted with an intention to kill.²¹⁴ In Richens,²¹⁵ it was stressed that there did not need to be a complete loss of control so that the defendant did not know what he was doing; what was required was that the defendant be so angry as to be unable to restrain himself. It is unclear the extent to which this will be relied upon to interpret the new statutory defence, but three years after the new defence came into force, Ashworth commented that:

“what amounts to the loss of self-control required by s.54(1)(a) of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 remains clouded ... One can say that a mere loss of temper is not enough, but that does not greatly advance the explanation.”²¹⁶

8–105

In exploring the concept of loss of self-control Holton and Shute have argued that this subjective limb of the test for provocation (and consequently, one assumes, the test under the new law) might do a far more important job than it has been credited with. Their main point is that before judging whether the defendant lost her self-control, it is important first to establish that she once possessed it: “To borrow Muddy Water’s words, ‘you can’t lose what you ain’t never had’; nor, we might add, can you lose what you have already lost”.²¹⁷ Of three main accounts of lack of control that they identify from the philosophical and psychological literatures, they prefer the following, adapted for their purposes:

“Self-control consists of the ability to bring one’s actions into line with one’s considered judgments about what it would be best to do, where these judgments depart from one’s desires.”²¹⁸

Or, put another way, what one loses is one’s control over which of one’s mental elements drive one’s actions.²¹⁹ The importance of this point is that it assumes that we all have certain resolutions by which we choose to live, and we try to stick to those in the face of temptation to do otherwise (when we lose our tempers, for example). Anger may undermine an individual's ability to retain self-control, leading him to lose that ability. Holton and Shute argue that it is right in such cases that the defendant ought always to benefit from a partial defence of provocation, but that in cases where the defendant's self-control was insufficiently strong to restrain him, he should have no defence as he has not "lost" his self-control.²²⁰ Thus, they argue that the defence of provocation (or loss of control) ought to start with a test establishing whether the defendant had self-control prior to the provocation, before requiring that it was lost and that such a loss led to the defendant killing the deceased. This is a novel approach that has much to commend it, particularly in relation to the significance it has for the objective test, to be considered below.

A fundamental change in the law has been introduced by s.54(2) which states that "it does not matter whether or not the loss of control was sudden". Under the common law, in the case of Duffy,²²¹ it was established that the loss of self-control suffered by the defendant had to be of a "sudden and temporary" nature. Thus, loss of self-control was equated with anger and not with fear or despair or other strong emotions. The person who killed through terror of what might happen to her was traditionally excluded from the ambit of the provocation defence if this terror did not express itself in anger.

This concept of anger requires further consideration. Horder has suggested that loss of self-control is one of the forms that anger may take.²²² For example, a lecturer may be so enraged by a late-comer to her lecture that her response is to take out a gun and shoot the unfortunate student. Taking this sequence of events apart, the late arrival of the student leads to a judgement being made by the lecturer that wrong has been done to her. This generates anger in the form of loss of control so that the lecturer responds "impetuously", without stopping to determine the appropriate response to the provocative event. She is so carried away that she does not pause to reflect that a verbal rebuke might have suited the occasion rather better.²²³

If, as Horder suggests, the modern law of provocation was based upon such a conception of anger, one can see why the law insisted that the loss of self-control be “sudden and temporary”. However, there remained the question of what precisely the phrase “sudden and temporary” meant? The courts often stated that the more time “to cool down”, the less likely it was that the defendant could be regarded as acting in anger, and the more likely it was that it would be seen as “planned” or “revenge”.²²⁴ However, in re-examining the requirement that there be a sudden and temporary loss of control in cases of cumulative provocation, the courts relaxed the requirement somewhat. In Ahluwalia,²²⁵ the Court of Appeal was faced with deciding what the requirement was in the context of a defendant who had endured ten years of violence and humiliation from her husband and threw petrol in his bedroom and set it alight. He sustained severe burns and died six days later and she was convicted of murder. On appeal, it was argued that the direction that there be a sudden and temporary loss of control was wrong, with counsel for the appellant suggesting that women who have been subjected frequently over a period to violent treatment may react to the final act or words by a “slow-burn” reaction rather than by immediate loss of self-control. Without accepting this argument in full, the Court of Appeal conceded that a delayed reaction would not necessarily rule out that there was a “sudden and temporary” loss of self-control.²²⁶

The appellant in Ahluwalia failed in her defence of provocation but was afforded the partial defence of diminished responsibility, based on depression caused by her being a battered woman. Thus, whilst the stringency of the requirement of “sudden and temporary” loss of self-control was lessened somewhat by the courts, it still remained an obstacle to certain classes of defendant successfully pleading provocation. The Government saw the abandonment of the sudden and temporary requirement under the Coroners and Justice Act as “a fresh approach which builds on the common law” and “allows for situations where the defendant’s reaction has been delayed or builds gradually.”²²⁷

The omission of the “sudden and temporary” requirement means that defendants suffering from domestic violence such as Ahluwalia might now be more likely to plead “loss of control” successfully. This is a matter to which we return below.

(b) Qualifying trigger

8–107

Under the common law defence of provocation, the defendant was required to have lost her self-control due to things said or done. Although, as has been discussed, the defence developed historically on the basis that the victim, having provoked the defendant, lost some of his claim to be protected by the law, the modern law of provocation did not require that the victim was to blame for the defendant’s loss of control, nor that he was even the cause of it. The extent to which the law rejected this rationale of the defence can be seen in the case of *Doughty*²²⁸ where the defendant killed his 17-day-old son in circumstances where the defendant had had to look after both his wife (after a caesarean operation) and the baby since their return from the hospital. The baby was extremely restless and cried persistently, leading to the defendant finally trying to stop the crying by placing a cushion over the baby’s head and then kneeling on it. The trial judge ruled that the perfectly natural episodes of crying or restlessness by a young baby could not constitute evidence of provocation. The defendant appealed against the conviction and the Court of Appeal held that the judge was wrong not to have left the defence of provocation to the jury on the basis that the defendant had lost control because of things said or done. The issue for the jury would then have been, in applying the objective test, whether it was reasonable for the defendant to have done so.

The new law, however, attempts to avoid such controversies by setting out in more detail what it is that must have caused the defendant to lose her self-control.

CORONERS AND JUSTICE ACT 2009

s.55: MEANING OF “QUALIFYING TRIGGER”:

8–108

- “(1) This section applies for the purposes of section 54.
- (2) A loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger if subsection (3), (4) or (5) applies.
- (3) This subsection applies if D’s loss of self-control was attributable to D’s fear of serious violence from V against D or another identified person.
- (4) This subsection applies if D’s loss of self-control was attributable to a thing or things done or said (or both) which—
- (a) constituted circumstances of an extremely grave character, and
 - (b) caused D to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.
- (5) This subsection applies if D’s loss of self-control was attributable to a combination of the matters mentioned in subsections (3) and (4).
- (6) In determining whether a loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger—
- (a) D’s fear of serious violence is to be disregarded to the extent that it was caused by a thing which D incited to be done or said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence;
 - (b) a sense of being seriously wronged by a thing done or said is not justifiable if D incited the thing to be done or said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence;
 - (c) the fact that a thing done or said constituted sexual infidelity is to be disregarded.
- (7) In this section references to ‘D’ and ‘V’ are to be construed in accordance with section 54.”

Essentially the loss of self-control must be attributable to one of two specified “qualifying triggers”:

1. fear of serious violence, or
2. something done or said in the circumstances specified in s.55(4)(a) and (b).

Section 55(6) provides for exclusions in particular cases, which will be discussed below.

1. Fear of serious violence

8–109

This is an entirely new basis of a partial defence to murder. It allows for defendants who are likely to fail in a plea of self-defence because they have reacted disproportionately to a threat from the deceased to avoid a murder conviction and be convicted of the lesser offence of manslaughter. The Law Commission, in recommending this addition, was of the view that: “D should not be prejudiced because he or she over-reacted in fear or panic, instead of overreacting due to an angry loss of self-control”.²²⁹

The Government envisaged that the new defence of loss of control as a response to fear of serious violence will cover two scenarios: (i) where a victim of sustained abuse kills their abuser in order to thwart an attack which is anticipated but not immediately imminent; and (ii) where someone overreacts to what they perceive as an imminent threat.²³⁰ This approach can be supported. It is right that emotions other than anger should allow for mitigation in homicide cases where warranted as a concession to human frailty. Just because one can trace the law back to much earlier notions of outraged honour does not mean that anger should continue to be a privileged emotion. Put simply, why should someone who kills out of (uncontrolled) anger be regarded today as morally more excusable than someone who kills through fear or despair of what has happened or may happen to them? The House of Lords’ decision in Smith appeared to recognise this with Lord Hoffmann stating:

“There are people (such as battered wives) who would reject any suggestion that they were ‘different from ordinary human beings’ but have undergone experiences which, without any fault or defect of character on their part, have affected their powers of self-control. In such cases the law now recognises that the emotions which may cause loss of self-control are not confined to anger but may include fear and despair.”²³¹

Lord Hoffmann's view is one that has been shared by many for some time. Battered women have for a long time fallen between a number of stools, unable to plead provocation due to the requirement of a "sudden" loss of self-control and also unable to plead self-defence because that defence requires that the defendant respond to an imminent threat of violence. Accordingly, all they were left with was the unpalatable option of admitting an "abnormality of mind" and pleading diminished responsibility. Not only does this hamper the law in doing justice in a particular case, but it is also one of the sources of "the sexual asymmetry in the matter of who kills whom and who pleads passion/provocation".²³² The very case which established the modern test for provocation, with its requirement for a "sudden and temporary" loss of selfcontrol,²³³ was in fact a case of a battered woman who killed her sleeping (or resting) husband after a long history of domestic violence. She failed in her defence of provocation, but was "more desperate and fearful than angry".²³⁴ Howe notes that "in the far more common wife-killing case ... the victim is always blamed, always judged for her failings as a wife, her nagging and shagging".²³⁵ The jury in Duffy's trial, on the other hand, were told by Judge Devlin that they were not concerned with the blame attaching to the dead man. Allowing for fear as well as anger to trigger the loss of control defence might go some way to rebalancing the law against such "sexual asymmetry", although Edwards remains unconvinced of this, arguing that "the law continues by lending legitimacy to some conduct to sustain a gendered normative universe".²³⁶

8-110

There is, then, a problem with this s.55(3) provision. The mere fear of serious violence is not sufficient to trigger the new defence. The fear of serious violence must cause a loss of self-control. While it is plausible that some battered women, such as Ahluwalia, might be continuously in such fear that they do lose self-control, this is implausible in many cases of excessive self-defence where the defendant overreacts.²³⁷ As seen in Ch.4 there have been calls for the introduction of a partial defence of excessive self-defence to cover defendants such as those in Martin and Clegg.²³⁸ The new defence of loss of control will not cover either of the defendants in those cases, both of whom, calmly and rationally, used more force than was necessary. The new defence is only available to those who are so fearful of serious violence that they panic and lose self-control. Horder argues that the loss of self-control requirement may in some cases wrongly sideline the underlying normative argument that, in some situations (when people are performing certain roles, such as that of the defendant in Clegg), self-control should never be lost.²³⁹

The fear must be one of “serious” violence. This is not defined. Although responses to the Government’s consultation paper provided suggestions for greater clarity of the distinction between serious and non-serious violence, the Government did not feel it was desirable to be more specific in the statute, since this might depend on the circumstances of the victim and the perpetrator, and concluded that it is a question for the jury to decide based on the individual facts of a case.²⁴⁰ This is the kind of question that juries are often given the task of determining, and it is right that the Act avoids the thorny issue of defining further what exactly is required.

2. Circumstances of an extremely grave character causing the defendant to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged

8–111

Homicide Act 1957 s.3 made reference to provocation “whether by things done or by things said or by both together” and the Law Commission’s recommendations retained this, to a certain extent, by suggesting that a partial defence be available to someone who reacted to “gross provocation (meaning words or conduct or a combination of words and conduct) which caused the defendant to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged”.²⁴¹ Whilst doing away with the term “gross provocation”, primarily because the term “provocation” was being jettisoned in its entirety, the Government initially also planned to retain the element of the defendant responding to “a thing or things done or said (or both) which: (a) amounted to an exceptional happening; and (b) caused D to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged”.²⁴² The addition of “an exceptional happening” was intended to convey the idea that the trigger leading to the loss of control might not be a single event, but could amount to a series of words or conduct. Following consultation, as a result of which the obvious difficulties in employing such a woolly term were pointed out, the Government replaced the term with “circumstances of an extremely grave character”.

Accordingly, it must be established that the loss of control was attributable to a thing/things done or said (or both) which:

- (a) constituted circumstances of an extremely grave character, and
- (b) caused D to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.

(a) Circumstances of an extremely grave character

8–112

This term is an improvement on the original proposals but is still bound to generate interpretative problems. The Government has perhaps been a little optimistic in stating that:

“this formulation should ensure that the defence is only available in a very narrow set of circumstances in which a killing in response to things said or done should rightly be classified as manslaughter rather than murder.”²⁴³

After all, if this were right, there would be no need for the statutory exclusions, discussed below. It is not clear how the jury is to assess whether there are “circumstances of an extremely grave—character”. Is this an objective test or is it a question of whether the defendant regards the circumstances as being of an extremely grave character? Lord Judge CJ in Dawes suggested that the trigger is:

“much more limited than the equivalent provisions in the former provocation defence. The result is that some of the more absurd trivia which nevertheless required the judge to leave the provocation defence to the jury will no longer fall within the ambit of the qualifying triggers defined in the new defence.”²⁴⁴

(b) Caused a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged

8-113

These circumstances of an extremely grave character must cause the defendant to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. This term was adopted from the Law Commission's proposals, and was believed by the Government to be so obviously objective in nature that the statute need not confirm this.²⁴⁵ Clearly, whether the defendant has a sense of being seriously wronged is a subjective matter. Presumably the word "justifiable" imports an objective quality to the test, implying that if called upon to justify their sense of being seriously wronged to a group of his peers, the defendant would be capable of doing so. If it were otherwise, an extremely sensitive person who was insulted and who regarded the insult as extremely grave (even though reasonable people would not) might be able to rely on the defence. This was the approach taken by Lord Judge CJ in Dawes, where he stated that "the presence, or otherwise, of a qualifying trigger is not defined or decided by the defendant", and emphasised the word justifiable.²⁴⁶ It is not for the defendant to be able to say "the circumstances were extremely grave to me and caused me to have what I believed to be a justifiable sense that I had been seriously wronged". In Hatter, a case heard alongside Dawes, the Court of Appeal was of the opinion that the fact of the break-up of a relationship, of itself, will not normally constitute such circumstances.²⁴⁷ In Bowyer, in the same case, the defendant was a burglar who attacked the occupier on his return home. The Court of Appeal said it was absurd to suggest that:

"the entirely understandable response of the deceased to finding a burglar in his home provided the appellant with the remotest beginnings of a basis for suggesting that he had any justifiable sense of being wronged, let alone seriously wronged."²⁴⁸

These are examples of what do not constitute the trigger, so what would amount to circumstances of an extremely grave nature giving a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged? In recommending the test, the Law Commission gave the following example as one which ought to fall within such a defence:

“An Asian woman returned home to find two white men attempting to rape her 15-year-old daughter. She got a knife from the kitchen. The men shouted racist abuse at her and started to run away. She chased after them and stabbed one of them several times in the back, killing him.”²⁴⁹

Such a scenario is one that would no doubt attract much sympathy for the killer, and perhaps provides the prime example of conduct warranting an escape from the label of murder and mandatory life sentence. But beyond this, what might amount to a “justifiable sense of being seriously wronged”? Perhaps an examination of the previous writing of Horder (one of the Law Commissioners) on the subject of battered women who kill can help us understand the reasons why this particular terminology was adopted.

JEREMY HORDER, PROVOCATION AND RESPONSIBILITY (1992), P.190:

8–114

“Ironically, until the hardening of attitudes towards loss of self-control from the time of Duffy onwards, no real extension or relaxation of the law would have been required to incorporate such ‘slow-burn’ cases within the scope of the defence. The root of the trouble and misunderstanding has been the recent failure to recognise that the law’s conception of anger has never always been loss of self-control alone, but has historically included outrage. Someone who acts in outrage acts on a principle of retributive justice, and may not be responding to a proximate triggering event in quite the way a tennis player responds to an opponent’s shot with a ‘reflex’ volley. The person who boils up when her long-term violent abuser is asleep in his chair may well be acting out of provoked outrage, despite the absence of immediate provocation. Such a person’s anger would historically have fallen within the scope of the defence. What is required is a restatement of this legal position, through substitution of references to provoked angry retaliation in place of references to provoked loss of self-control in the

Thus, the “justifiable sense of feeling seriously wronged” clause can be seen as yet another in the package designed to provide abused women with more scope for employing the partial defence to murder in future. Herring has argued that domestic abuse is typically a serious wrong to the woman and that such serious wrong includes, in addition to physical abuse, four elements: “the coercive effect of domestic abuse; the breach of trust involved; the impact of children; and its contribution to patriarchy”.²⁵¹ However, it can be seen that the trigger of being seriously wronged is equally designed to bring within its ambit other cases where the defendant reacts in outrage to something said or done, whilst excluding unmeritorious cases such as parents killing their young babies to shut them up (as in Doughty).

3. Qualifying trigger: exclusions

Section 55(6) provides three exceptions to cases which would otherwise amount to a qualifying trigger. The first and second of these find their origins in the Law Commission’s recommendations, which sought to provide a bar to the defence where “the provocation was itself incited by the defendant for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence”. The Law Commission was of the view that this provision was unproblematic, on the basis that “self-induced” provocation was not sufficient to found a provocation plea under common law.²⁵²

The Court of Appeal has had the opportunity to consider the contours of this exclusion in the case of Dawes. Lord Judge CJ noted that:

“as a matter of statutory construction, the mere fact that in some general way the defendant was behaving badly and looking for and provoking trouble does not of itself, lead to the disapplication of the qualifying triggers based on s.55(3), (4) and (5) unless his actions were intended to provide him with the excuse or opportunity to use

violence.”²⁵³

The last exclusion, that where the thing causing a loss of control constituted sexual infidelity it is to be disregarded, did not appear in the Law Commission’s recommendations but was added by the Government, surviving a challenge to it by the House of Lords during the parliamentary process.²⁵⁴ Although historically sexual infidelity has been a typical example providing a defendant with something “said or done” giving rise to provocation, the Government was clear that times have changed:

“It is quite unacceptable for a defendant who has killed an unfaithful partner to seek to blame the victim for what occurred. We want to make it absolutely clear that sexual infidelity on the part of the victim can never justify reducing a murder charge to manslaughter. This should be the case even if sexual infidelity is present in combination with a range of other trivial and commonplace factors.”²⁵⁵

8–117

The exclusion has been controversial, however.²⁵⁶ In interviews with policy stakeholders, barristers and judges, Fitz-Gibbon reported that:

“rather than welcoming the exclusion of such cases from the new partial defence, respondents across all samples interviewed were overwhelmingly critical of this provision in the formulation of the new defence. Legal counsel respondents described the exclusion as ‘incredibly convoluted’ (UKCounselE) and ‘barmy’ (UKCounselQ), while one judicial respondent posed that it was ‘ill-advised’ and ‘bad law’ (UKJudgeB). Similarly, policy respondents described the sexual infidelity provision as ‘very problematic’ (UKPolicyA), ‘dire’ (UKPolicyB), and ‘really unnecessary’ (UKPolicyC). These criticisms were often based upon respondents’ belief that the exclusion of a particular situation was not conducive to good law-making and that it would lead to significant questions surrounding the situations in which the new partial defence would and would not apply.”²⁵⁷

Reed and Wake also predicted that the exclusion would create interpretational difficulties, and would be “up for debate in terms of disentanglement of ‘infidelity’ from other circumstances of taunts regarding inadequacy and disaffection”.²⁵⁸ It was not long until the Court of Appeal were given the opportunity to consider these matters.

R. V CLINTON [2013] Q.B. 1:

8–118

The defendant killed his wife by beating her about the head with a wooden baton, strangling her with a belt, and then tightening a piece of rope around her neck with the aid of the baton. She had admitted to him that she had been having an affair and the defendant claimed that, just prior to the killing, his wife had taunted him about a range of matters including her sexual infidelity to him, that he did not have the courage to kill himself and that she did not care about their children. The trial judge withdrew the defence of loss of self-control from the jury for three reasons: the taunts as to fidelity were excluded as a trigger because they fell into the category of things said or done which “constituted sexual infidelity” within the meaning of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.55(4); the other matters could not constitute circumstances of an extremely grave character; and they could not have caused the defendant to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. The defendant appealed against his conviction for murder.

LORD JUDGE CJ

“16 We immediately acknowledge that the exclusion of sexual infidelity as a potential qualifying trigger is consistent with the concept of the autonomy of each individual. Of course, whatever the position may have been in times past, it is now clearly understood, and in the present context the law underlines, that no one (male or female) owns or possesses his or her spouse or partner. Nevertheless daily experience in both criminal and family courts demonstrates that the breakdown of relationships, whenever they occur, and for whatever reason, is always fraught with tension and difficulty, with the possibility of misunderstanding and the potential for apparently irrational fury. Meanwhile experience over many generations has shown that, however it may become apparent, when it does, sexual infidelity has the potential to create a highly emotional situation or to exacerbate a fraught situation, and to produce a completely unpredictable, and sometimes violent response. This may have nothing to do with any notional ‘rights’ that the one may believe that he or she has over the other, and often stems from a sense of betrayal and heartbreak, and crushed dreams.

17 [Counsel for the defendant] drew attention to and adopted much of the illuminating and critical commentary by Professor Ormerod in Smith & Hogan’s Criminal Law, 13th edn, pp.520–522. To begin with, there is no definition of ‘sexual infidelity’. Who and what is embraced in this concept? Is sexual infidelity to be construed narrowly so as to refer only to conduct which is related directly and exclusively to sexual activity? Only the words and acts constituting sexual activity are to be disregarded: on one construction, therefore, the effects are not. What acts relating to infidelity, but distinguishable from it on the basis that they are not ‘sexual’, may be taken into account? Is the provision directly concerned with sexual infidelity, or with envy and jealousy and possessiveness, the sort of obsession that leads to violence against the victim on the basis expressed in the sadly familiar language, ‘if I cannot have him/her, then no one else will/can’? The notion of infidelity appears to involve a relationship between the two people to which one party may be unfaithful. Is a one-night-stand sufficient for this purpose?

18 Take a case like Stingel v The Queen (1990) 171 C.L.R. 312, an Australian case where a jealous stalker, who stabbed his quarry when he found her, on his account, having sexual intercourse. He does not face any difficulty with this element of the offence, just because, so far as the stalker was concerned, there was no sexual infidelity by his victim at all. Is the jealous spouse to be excluded when the stalker is not? In Lewis v State of Trinidad and Tobago [2011] UKPC 15 an 18-year-old Jehovah’s Witness killed his lover, a 63-year-old co-religionist, because, on one view, he was ashamed of the consequences if she carried out her threat to reveal their affair to the community. She was not sexually unfaithful to him, but he killed her because he feared that she would betray him, not sexually, but by revealing their secret. [W]hy should the law exclude one kind of betrayal by a lover but not another?

...

20 [Counsel] could readily have identified a large number of situations arising in the real world which, as a result of the statutory provision, would be productive of surprising anomalies. We cannot resolve them in advance. Whatever the anomalies to which it may give rise, the statutory provision is unequivocal: loss of control triggered by sexual infidelity cannot, on its own, qualify as a trigger for the purposes of the second component of this defence. This is the clear effect of the legislation.

...

26 We are required to make sense of this provision. It would be illogical for a defendant to be able to rely on an untrue statement about the victim's sexual infidelity as a qualifying trigger in support of the defence, but not on a truthful one. Equally, it would be quite unrealistic to limit its ambit to words spoken to his or her lover by the unfaithful spouse or partner during sexual activity. In our judgment things 'said' include admissions of sexual infidelity (even if untrue) as well as reports (by others) of sexual infidelity. Such admissions or reports will rarely if ever be uttered without a context, and almost certainly a painful one. In short, the words will almost invariably be spoken as part of a highly charged discussion in which many disturbing comments will be uttered, often on both sides.

...

34 We must now address the full extent of the prohibition against 'sexual infidelity' as a qualifying trigger for the purposes of the loss of control defence. The question is whether or not sexual infidelity is wholly excluded from consideration in the context of features of the individual case which constitute a permissible qualifying trigger or triggers within section 55(3)(4).

35 We have examined the legislative structure as a whole. The legislation was designed to prohibit the misuse of sexual infidelity as a potential trigger for loss of control in circumstances in which it was thought to have been misused in the former defence of provocation. Where there is no other potential trigger, the prohibition must, notwithstanding the difficulties identified earlier in the judgment, be applied.

36 The starting point is that it has been recognised for centuries that sexual infidelity may produce a loss of control in men, and, more recently, in women as well as men, who are confronted with sexual infidelity. The exclusion created by section 55(6) cannot and does not eradicate the fact that on occasions sexual infidelity and loss of control are linked, often with the one followed immediately by the other. Indeed on one view if it did not recognise the existence of this link, the policy decision expressly to exclude sexual infidelity as a qualifying trigger would be unnecessary.

37 In section 54(1)(c)(3) the legislation further acknowledges the impact of sexual infidelity as a potential ingredient of the third component of the defence, when all the defendant's circumstances fall for consideration, and when, although express provision is made for the exclusion of some features of the defendant's situation, the fact that he/she has been sexually betrayed is not. In short, sexual infidelity is not subject to a blanket exclusion when the loss of control defence is under consideration. Evidence of these matters may be deployed by the defendant and therefore the legislation proceeds on the basis that sexual infidelity is a permissible feature of the loss of control defence.

38 The ambit of section 55(3)(4)—the second component, the qualifying triggers—is clearly defined. Any qualifying trigger is subject to clear statutory criteria. Dealing with it broadly, to qualify as a trigger for the defendant's loss of control, the circumstances must be extremely grave and the defendant must be subject to a justifiable sense of having been seriously wronged. These are fact specific questions requiring careful assessment, not least to ensure that the loss of control defence does not have the effect of minimising the seriousness of the infliction of fatal injury. Objective evaluation is required and a judgment must be made about the gravity of the circumstances and the extent to which the defendant was seriously wronged, and whether he had a justifiable sense that he had been seriously wronged.

39 Our approach has ... been influenced by the simple reality that in relation to the day to day working of the criminal justice system events cannot be isolated from their context. We have provided a number of examples in the judgment. Perhaps expressed most simply, the man who admits, 'I killed him accidentally', is never to be treated as if he had said 'I killed him'. That would be absurd. It may not be unduly burdensome to compartmentalise sexual infidelity where it is the only element relied on in support of a qualifying trigger, and, having compartmentalised it in this way, to disregard it. Whether this is so or not, the legislation imposes that exclusionary obligation on the court. However, to seek to compartmentalise sexual infidelity and exclude it when it is integral to the facts as a whole is not only much more difficult, but is unrealistic and carries with it the potential for injustice. In the examples we have given ..., we do not see how any sensible evaluation of the gravity of the circumstances or their impact on the defendant could be made if the jury, having, in accordance with the legislation, heard the evidence, were then to be directed to excise from their evaluation of the qualifying trigger the matters said to constitute sexual infidelity, and to put them into distinct compartments to be disregarded. In our judgment, where sexual infidelity is integral to and forms an essential part of the context in which to make a just evaluation whether a qualifying trigger properly falls within the ambit of subsections 55(3) and 55(4), the prohibition in section 55(6)(c) does not operate to exclude it.”

Appeal allowed

8–120

The result of this case is that sexual infidelity may be taken into account as part of the background of a case (i.e. when assessing other triggers), but cannot itself constitute a trigger.²⁵⁹ The irony of the case is, though, that having had his conviction for murder quashed and won a retrial at which loss of control should, according to the Court of Appeal, be put to the jury, the defendant went on to plead guilty to murder and discarded his opportunity to be found guilty of manslaughter instead.²⁶⁰

Why might that be? Could it be an appreciation that even if a jury were to be directed to take into account sexual infidelity in considering the defence of loss of control they were still likely to have convicted of murder in any case (which does raise the question of why launch an appeal in the first place)? If social mores have changed to the extent that sexual infidelity is no longer accepted as an excuse for loss of self-control, one assumes that the jury would not accept that the defendant had experienced a justifiable sense of feeling seriously wronged. Further, and again assuming this change in social mores, it would be unlikely that the “objective test”, discussed below, would be satisfied in such cases.

There are those who do not accept that such a change in social mores has occurred to the extent, that juries, when given the option, will deny operation of the defence of loss of control:

“In [Clinton], the Court of Appeal has likely ensured that the sexual infidelity provision within the loss of control partial defence will be largely ineffective in minimizing the use of the defence by men who kill a female intimate partner in the context of sexual infidelity. As described by one media commentator, the decision ‘restores the defence in so-called crime of passion cases’, and as such raises the fear that in practice this new partial defence will do little to overcome the problems associated with the now abolished—‘jealous man’s’—provocation defence. Importantly, if the new partial defence is to operate in essentially the same manner as the former provocation defence, it is essential that ongoing monitoring and analysis be undertaken to ensure that the law’s operation does not continue to reproduce problematic narratives of victim blame and denigration in the law’s response to male-perpetrated intimate homicide.”²⁶¹

8–121

Should the law be used to enforce a particular response to male-perpetrated intimate homicide? It was suggested at the time that the law was reformed that there might be other triggers which ought to be similarly excluded. If the statute were to go so far as to list one trigger that under no circumstances would provide a partial defence to murder, why not add others,²⁶² such as honour killings? The response was that:

“The Government fully agrees that anyone involved in a so-called ‘honour killing’ should not be able to reduce a charge of murder to manslaughter on the basis of the victim’s behaviour. The Government believes that the high threshold for the words and conduct limb of the partial defence will have the effect of excluding situations which might be characterised as ‘honour killings’ because such cases will not satisfy the requirements that the circumstances were of an extremely grave character and caused a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. In addition we intend to introduce an exemption for cases where there is a ‘considered desire for revenge’ which will also have a role to play in ensuring that so-called honour killings do not benefit from a partial defence.”²⁶³

It is unclear why the Government did not have the same faith in its test’s ability to exclude unmeritorious cases of sexual infidelity without the need to specify the exclusion of such cases from the defence’s remit.

(c) The objective test

8–122

It is not sufficient to show that the defendant lost control. There is also, by virtue of s.54(1)(c), the question of whether “a person of D’s sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D”. This test has been designed to accord with the Privy Council’s most recent interpretation of the “reasonable man” test under s the Homicide Act 1957 s.3.²⁶⁴

Whether this amounts to a partial justification is, as already discussed, open to question. One issue is what is meant by “reacted in the same or in a similar way”? Does this mean that, a person with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint would have reacted by doing exactly as the defendant did in killing the deceased (with the same use of a weapon, degree of force, etc), or does it simply mean that the provocation would have been such to make such a person lose their self-control? Under the common law, cases such as *van Dongen*²⁶⁵ appeared to suggest that the former interpretation applied, whilst Ashworth argues that the latter proposition is correct since the former is too “particularistic”.²⁶⁶ It is a pity that neither the Law Commission nor the Ministry of Justice saw fit to clarify this in considering reform of the law.

STATE V HOYT, 128 N.W. 2D 645, 21
WIS. 2D 284 (1964) (SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN):

8–123

WILKIE J:

“The ‘reasonable man’ concept in the law generally has two distinct meanings. There is the statistical concept under which the reasonable man does what most people do in fact under the circumstances. Yet if this is the meaning of the test, it is clear that as a matter of fact a great majority of people will never commit murder no matter how violently provoked by another. A consistent application of this test, viewing the reasonable man as the statistical factual norm would, in effect read ... [the defence] ... out of existence.

However, in other contexts there is the ethical concept under which the reasonable man functions as the person the law expects everyone to be, regardless of whether a majority, in fact, fall short of the moral normal in actual conduct. To take this view of the reasonable man for the purposes of the provocation test would propel courts and juries into the strange task of deciding when a person, taken as the ethical ideal, would commit murder. This may well result in reading ... [the partial defence] out of existence. The person we expect people to be like would not solve his problems by murder. If we conclude that an ethical ideal—that person whom all others aspire to emulate—would be driven to kill under the circumstances of a given case, logically the verdict should be not guilty, not morally blameworthy to any degree ...

The basic question is whether [the defendant] ... is as culpable as a person who kills solely for -self-aggrandizement or out of sheer malevolence. To answer this question, we must place ourselves emphatically in the actual situation in which the defendant was placed, a situation which may be relatively unique. Therefore, an inquiry into what most people would do in such circumstances cannot be completely -determinative of the issue. The test cannot be wholly objective or wholly subjective ... The victim’s conduct must be such that we conclude that the feeling and conduct of the defendant can be understood sympathetically, albeit not condoned. The trier-of-fact must be able to say: although I would have acted differently, and I believe most people would have acted differently, I can understand why this person gave way to the impulse to kill.”

Prior to the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, the courts had managed to evade the real question (a moral question) of whether the defendant could be expected to control the impulse to kill, by constructing the reasonable man test, which has been used in provocation cases since the 19th century.²⁶⁷ Prior to the Homicide Act 1957, judges were able to control the test in two ways. First, they could withdraw the issue from the jury on the basis that there was no evidence on which the jury could find that a reasonable man would have been provoked, and secondly, they were able to keep the test objective. In other words, the courts excluded from the reasonable man any of the characteristics of the defendant which might have had an impact on why, and the extent to which, they were provoked.

Thus, in Bedder,²⁶⁸ the House of Lords held that the fact that the defendant was impotent should be ignored in assessing whether his killing of the prostitute who had taunted him (as well as hitting and kicking him) was something a reasonable man might have done. The courts were loath to include any unusual physical characteristic for fear of “not knowing where to draw the line”.²⁶⁹ However, it became clear following the enactment of s.3 that the approach taken in Bedder was too strict. One of the major tasks for the Law Commission in recommending reform of the law on provocation was, however, to bring to an end the ambiguity and inconsistency in relation to the interpretation of the reasonable man test. Following a long line of judgments from the House of Lords and Privy Council starting with DPP v Camplin,²⁷⁰ and including Morhall,²⁷¹ Luc Thiet Thuan,²⁷² and Smith,²⁷³ the case of *Attorney-General for Jersey v Holley*²⁷⁴ supplied the final instalment, providing an interpretation of the reasonable man test from which the Law Commission took inspiration in drafting the test adopted by the Government in passing the new law. It is worth exploring the controversies surrounding this issue in order to understand the weakness that the reform is designed to strengthen.

The question with which the courts grappled was what, if any, characteristics of the accused ought to be attributed to the reasonable person in applying the objective test? Although Holley was the most recent authority on the question prior to the enactment of the Coroners and Justice Act, Camplin remained the source of the law's interpretation of the test within the Homicide Act s.3.

DPP V CAMPLIN [1978] A.C. 705
(HOUSE OF LORDS):

8-125

[The facts appear from the judgment of Lord Diplock]

LORD DIPLOCK:

“The respondent, Camplin, who was 15 years of age, killed a middle-aged Pakistani, Mohammed Lal Khan, by splitting his skull with a chapati pan, a heavy kitchen utensil like a rimless frying pan. At the time the two of them were alone together in Khan's flat. At Camplin's trial for murder before Boreham J his only defence was that of provocation so as to reduce the offence to manslaughter. According to the story that he told in the witness box but which differed materially from that which he had told to the police, Khan had buggered him in spite of his resistance and had then laughed at him. Whereupon Camplin had lost his self-control and attacked Khan fatally with the chapati pan ...

The point of law of general public importance involved in the case has been certified as being:

‘Whether, on the prosecution for murder of a boy of 15, where the issue of provocation arises, the jury should be directed to consider the question, under s. 3 of the Homicide Act 1957 whether the provocation was enough to make a reasonable man do as he did by reference to a “reasonable adult” or by reference to a “reasonable boy of 15.” ’ ...

[F]or the purposes of the law of provocation the ‘reasonable man’ has never been confined to the adult male. It means an ordinary person of either sex, not exceptionally excitable or pugnacious, but possessed of such powers of self-control as everyone is entitled to expect that his fellow citizens will exercise in society as it is today. A crucial factor in the defence of provocation from earliest times has been the relationship between the gravity of provocation and the way in which the accused retaliated, both being judged by the social standards of the day. When Hale was writing in the seventeenth century, pulling a man's nose was thought to justify retaliation with a sword; when Mancini v DPP ... was decided by this House, a blow with a fist would not justify retaliation with a deadly weapon. But so long as words unaccompanied by violence could not in common law amount to provocation the relevant proportionality between provocation and retaliation was primarily one of degrees of violence. Words spoken to the accused before the violence started were not normally to be included in the proportion sum. But now that the law has been changed so as to permit of words being treated as provocation, even though unaccompanied by any other acts, the gravity of verbal provocation may well depend on the particular characteristics or circumstances of the person to whom a taunt or insult is addressed. To taunt a person because of his race, his physical infirmities or some shameful incident in his past may well be considered by the jury to be more offensive to the person addressed, however equable his temperament, if the facts on which the taunt is founded are true than it would be if they were not. It would stultify much of the mitigation of the previous harshness of the common law in ruling out verbal provocation as capable of reducing murder to manslaughter if the jury could not take into consideration all those factors which in their opinion would affect the gravity of taunts and insults when applied to the person to whom they are addressed. So to this extent at any rate the unqualified proposition accepted by this House in Bedder v DPP ... that for the purposes of the 'reasonable man' test any unusual physical characteristics of the accused must be ignored requires revision as a result of the passing of the Act of 1957 ...

In my opinion a proper direction to a jury on the question left to their exclusive determination by s. 3 of the Act of 1957 would be on the following lines. The judge should state what the question is using the very terms of the section. He should then explain to them that the reasonable man referred to in the question is a person having the power of self-control to be expected of an ordinary person of the sex and age of the accused, but in other respects sharing such of the accused's characteristics as they think would affect the gravity of the provocation to him; and that the question is not merely whether such a person would in like circumstances be provoked to lose his self-control but also whether he would react to the provocation as the accused did."

What Lord Diplock made clear in Camplin was that, first, not all characteristics of the defendant had to be taken into account by the court and, secondly, in determining which characteristics to include, a distinction needed to be drawn. Lord Diplock broadly adopted Ashworth’s argument that:

“the proper distinction ... is that individual peculiarities which bear on the gravity of the provocation should be taken into account, whereas individual peculiarities bearing on the accused’s level of self-control should not.”²⁷⁵

Thus, the fact that a defendant is impotent may be highly relevant if the defendant is claiming to have been taunted about his impotence, but is irrelevant in determining the level of self-control he should possess. However, Lord Diplock made an exception to this in the model direction which has survived the recent reform of the law. Two characteristics are deemed to be relevant to the standard of self-control which may be expected of a defendant: age and sex. Age is included because “to require old heads on young shoulders is inconsistent with law’s compassion of human infirmity”. The reason why this concession was also extended to sex has never been made clear. In fact, the Law Commission’s recommendation for the objective test contained reference to the defendant’s age alone, and omitted any reference to gender.²⁷⁶ “Sex” was added to the draft provision by the Government without comment and, although responses to the public consultation raised the question of whether it should be omitted, on the grounds that it might reinforce sexism,²⁷⁷ the Government was not persuaded by these.²⁷⁸ Whilst some commentators have welcomed the retention of sex as a relevant factor, as a way of addressing gender bias,²⁷⁹ others have argued that the law would more effectively tackle gender stereotypes by leaving sex as something that should be taken account of as part of the wider circumstances of D.²⁸⁰

Beyond the need to include sex and age in applying the reasonable man test, Lord Diplock’s speech was not free from ambiguity. While endorsing a distinction between characteristics which affect the gravity of the provocation and characteristics which affect the power of self-control, Lord Diplock, nevertheless, added that this was of “too great nicety” for the jury whose task it is to determine whether the defendant was provoked. Acceptance or rejection of the distinction lies at the core of subsequent decisions of the House of Lords and Privy Council. These cases alternated in their view taken of the distinction Lord Diplock made between the two categories of characteristics in provocation cases, which can be labelled as characteristics of “provocativeness” (those relevant to the gravity of the provocation) and “provocability” (those which affect the level of self-control exercised by the defendant).²⁸¹

In Smith, the House of Lords decided by a majority of 3/2 that aspects of the defendant which affected her ability to exercise control should be considered. The two dissenting judges were of the view that those in the majority were removing the objective element and in doing so were subverting the moral basis of the defence, and that mental abnormalities such as clinical depression are catered for by the alternative partial defence of diminished responsibility. Smith was, however, disapproved in the case of Holley.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR JERSEY V HOLLEY [2005] 2 A.C. 580 (PRIVY COUNCIL):

8-127

The defendant, who was a chronic alcoholic, was charged with the murder of his girlfriend whom he had killed in a quarrel while under the influence of drink. At trial he raised the defence of provocation under the Homicide (Jersey) Law 1986 art.4 (enacted in terms identical to the Homicide Act 1957 s.3). He adduced expert medical evidence to the effect that his alcoholism was a disease, and in consequence a characteristic, of which the jury should take account when assessing his loss of self-control. The deputy bailiff referred the jury to the medical evidence and invited them to consider whether any particular characteristic reduced the defendant's power of self-control so as to excuse his action. He qualified this by adding that drunkenness at the time of the killing which rendered a defendant more susceptible to being provoked could not be taken into account in his favour. The defendant was convicted of murder. The Court of Appeal of Jersey concluded that the disease of chronic alcoholism, unlike drunkenness which afforded no defence, was the type of characteristic which the jury could have taken into account when determining whether his loss of self-control was excusable. The appeal was allowed on the ground that the deputy bailiff's qualification amounted to a misdirection. The Attorney-General appealed to the Privy Council.

8-128

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD:

[1] In July 2000 the House of Lords considered the ingredients of [the defence of provocation] in the Morgan Smith case (R. v Smith (Morgan)). The decision of the House in that case is in direct conflict with the decision of their Lordships' board in Luc Thiet Thuan v The Queen. And the reasoning of the majority in the Morgan Smith case is not easy to reconcile with the reasoning of the House of Lords in R. v Camplin or R v Morhall. This appeal, being heard by an enlarged board of nine members, is concerned to resolve this conflict and clarify definitively the present state of English law, and hence Jersey law, on this important subject ...

[12] [Lord Nicholls explained the case of Morhall and the effect of the House of Lords' decision in that case.] Of course, assessing the conduct of a glue-sniffing defendant against the standard of a glue-sniffing man having ordinary powers of self-control may mean the defendant is assessed against a standard of self-control he cannot attain. He may be exceptionally excitable or pugnacious. But this is so with every defendant who seeks to rely upon provocation as a defence. The objective standard of self-control is the standard set by the common law and, since 1957, by the statutory reference to a 'reasonable man'. It is of general application. Inherent in the use of this prescribed standard as a uniform standard applicable to all defendants is the possibility that an individual defendant may be temperamentally unable to achieve this standard.

[13] Taking into account the age and sex of a defendant, as mentioned in Camplin, is not an exception to this uniform approach. The powers of self-control possessed by ordinary people vary according to their age and, more doubtfully, their sex. These features are to be contrasted with abnormalities, that is, features not found in a person having ordinary powers of self-control. The former are relevant when identifying and applying the objective standard of self-control, the latter are not ...

[22] Th[e] majority view [in Smith], if their Lordships may respectfully say so, is one model which could be adopted in framing a law relating to provocation. But their Lordships consider there is one compelling, overriding reason why this view cannot be regarded as an accurate statement of English law. It is this. The law of homicide is a highly sensitive and highly controversial area of the criminal law. In 1957 Parliament altered the common law relating to provocation and declared what the law on this subject should thenceforth be. In these circumstances it is not open to judges now to change ('develop') the common law and thereby depart from the law as declared by Parliament. However much the contrary is asserted, the majority view does represent a departure from the law as declared in section 3 of the Homicide Act 1957. It involves a significant relaxation of the uniform, objective standard adopted by Parliament. Under the statute the sufficiency of the provocation ('whether the provocation was enough to make a reasonable man do as [the defendant] did') is to be judged by one standard, not a standard which varies from defendant to defendant. Whether the provocative act or words and the defendant's response met the 'ordinary person' standard prescribed by the statute is the question the jury must consider, not the altogether looser question of whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the jury consider the loss of self-control was sufficiently excusable. The statute does not leave each jury free to set whatever standard they consider appropriate in the circumstances by which to judge whether the defendant's conduct is 'excusable'.

[23] On this short ground their Lordships, respectfully but firmly, consider the majority view expressed in the Morgan Smith case is erroneous ...

[24] If the defendant was taunted on account of his intoxication, that may be a relevant matter for the jury to take into account when assessing the gravity of the taunt to the defendant. But the defendant's intoxicated state is not a matter to be taken into account by the jury when considering whether the defendant exercised ordinary self-control.”

*Appeal allowed*²⁸²

8–129

The intention of the Privy Council was to provide a judgment that would take precedence over the House of Lords’ decision in Smith, and this intention is made clear at the beginning of Lord Nicholl’s speech where he states that they wished to resolve the conflict between previous cases and state definitively the position of English law.²⁸³ At long last this area of law seemed to have been provided with the foundation for some degree of stability. The Coroners and Justice Act 2009 has now stepped in as an attempt to ensure that the objective test as confirmed in Holley remains objective in relation to the new defence of loss of control. The Law Commission, in deciding on the wording of the new provision, identified the mischief that it sought to avoid.

LAW COMMISSION NO.304, MURDER, MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE (2006):

8–130

“5.35 Disagreement in the courts has focused on the extent to which D’s own characteristics, or other factors, can, or must, be taken into account in judging how the reasonable person might have responded to the provocation.

5.36 One key question in making that judgement is ‘how gravely provocative really was the provocation’? It is obvious that D’s own characteristics must be relevant to this question. To give a simple example, D’s own height would be relevant in assessing the gravity of the provocation constituted by an accusation that he or she was ‘a midget’. The courts have not encountered significant difficulties in recent years in deciding how such characteristics or factors affecting the gravity of provocation should be dealt with in law. The jury is obliged to take such characteristics into account.

5.37 More controversial has been the question whether the jury should be required, or permitted, to take into account individual characteristics of D (or other factors) liable to affect the level of self-control that he or she can be expected to show in the face of any provocation. It may be, for example, that a drunken D, an immature D or a mentally deficient D, is unable to exercise the same level of self-control, in the face of provocation generally, as a sober adult with normal mental capacities. The courts have disagreed over whether the jury should be required or permitted to take such factors into account.

5.38 ... In our view, the function of the reasonable person requirement is to test D's own reaction against the standards of someone of his or her age possessed of an ordinary temperament: someone who is neither intolerant nor lacking in a reasonable measure of self-restraint when facing provocation. Unless the jury concludes that D's reaction might have been that of such a person, the defence ought to fail, even if D only killed as a result of a provoked and momentary loss of temper.

5.39 We are reluctant to speculate on how the courts would interpret the provisions [proposed] above. Still less would we wish to insist that they interpret them in a given way. None the less, the following examples may provide some guidance on the kinds of distinctions we think that it would be helpful to draw.

5.40 Our provisions impose a duty on the judge to instruct the jury to ignore factors that affect D's general capacity to exercise self-control. Alcoholism, for example, or another mental deficiency or disorder that is liable to affect temper and tolerance are obvious examples. A person who has killed because his or her capacity for self-control was reduced by such a characteristic must look to the defence of diminished responsibility for a partial defence, because such characteristics constitute an abnormality of mental functioning, unlike, for example, D's age.

5.41 Abnormal states of mind, such as intoxication or irritability, should also be left out, as should other factors that affect a general capacity to exercise adequate self-control, like a claim that D is 'more jealous or obsessive than most'. This approach to the general capacity to exercise adequate self-control will produce some hard cases. Examples might be ones in which, at the time of the provoked killing, D's general capacity for self-control was temporarily impaired by the effect of taking prescribed medicine, by having suffered a stroke, by involuntary intoxication, by an allergic reaction of some kind or by a bang on the head.

...

5.43 By way of contrast, a low IQ could be taken into account as part of the circumstances of D ... if it meant, for example, that D misinterpreted a provocation, thinking it to be more grave than a person of higher intelligence might have done. To give a different example, the fact that D was dumb and thus unable to respond verbally, is a factor that might legitimately be taken into account when considering D's reaction to a particular provocation given on a particular occasion. In each example, the characteristic is not being used as evidence that the D lacked a general capacity to exercise adequate self-control.

5.44 By way of contrast, some of the evidence given by a psychiatrist in Roberts [1990] Crim LR 122 would not be relevant to the provocation plea, under our recommendations. This was evidence that 'irrational violence was to be expected from some immature prelingually deaf persons when emotionally disturbed'. This is evidence relevant to a plea of diminished responsibility, rather than to a plea of provocation, because it is evidence of an impaired general capacity for self-control.

5.45 In many instances, the circumstances liable quite properly to influence the jury in D's favour will bear on how 'gross' the provocation was, or on how justifiable it was for D to feel seriously wronged ... An example is the cumulative effect of repeated provocations given, quite possibly over many years, in circumstances where it may also have been impossible for D to escape the provocation's effects. There is usually no theoretical difficulty about taking such background factors into account because they do not necessarily suggest that D is someone with a reduced general capacity to exercise self-control. A classic example would be the intimidated spouse who has been subject to abuse, the cumulative effect of which has become intolerable over the years.

5.46 This area of law will always remain difficult. As we indicated in the [consultation paper], however, a trial judge is under a duty to explain to the jury the full context in which a provoked killing has taken place, and the form of his or her direction ought to be discussed in advance with prosecution and defence advocates. These safeguards should go some way towards minimising the chance of misdirections, and hence appeals."

There are still those, however, who argue that the test in Smith which allowed the jury to take account of characteristics affecting the defendant's ability to control herself is preferable, in that it is unfair to measure an individual against a standard she is incapable of attaining.²⁸⁴ Holton and Shute have argued that the difficulties with which the Law Commission has grappled in finding an acceptable objective test for the loss of control defence are better dealt with by reassessing the meaning of the subjective element of "loss of self-control".²⁸⁵ As noted above, they argue that the loss of control test ought to involve an examination of whether the defendant possessed such self-control to begin with. One of the benefits of such an approach, they argue, is that defendants who possess certain undesirable characteristics such as irascibility or alcoholism will fail in their defence, not because they fail in satisfying the objective test, but because those characteristics remove the power of self-control to begin with.

Section 54(1)(c) specifies that the issue is whether a person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D. Section 54 (3) explains what "the circumstances of D means".

"[T]he reference to 'the circumstances of D' is a reference to all of D's circumstances other than those whose only relevance to D's conduct is that they bear on D's general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint."

This would seem to confirm the pre-existing law under Camplin and Holley in that characteristics affecting the provocativeness are part of "all the circumstances". For example, if one is taunted about being a glue-sniffer (as in Morhall), this can be taken into account because it has a relevance beyond D's general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint. However, being intoxicated will not, of itself, be a relevant characteristic, as specified in para.5.41 of the Law Commission's Report above. This has been confirmed in the case of Asmelash.²⁸⁶ Here the defendant had been drunk at the time that he stabbed the victim, and said that he had lost self-control and did not really know what had happened, but (somewhat inexplicably) was not so drunk that he did not know what he was doing. The judge directed the jury that they should consider whether a person unaffected by drink would have reacted in a similar way. On appeal against conviction for murder, arguing that this had been a misdirection, defence counsel attempted to rely on the Crown Court Bench Book, which had suggested that “in the circumstances” will “include the consumption of alcohol. The jury will no longer be directed that the reasonable man is a sober man”.²⁸⁷ The Court of Appeal, however, held that the judge was right to direct the jury as he had done.

8–132

It is only right that a defendant’s intoxication should be ignored when applying s.54(1)(c) and s.54(3) of the 2009 Act, unless, perhaps, it caused the defendant to act out of a mistaken belief.²⁸⁸ However, it would seem that this provision has (perhaps unintentionally) opened the door to a wide variety of characteristics being taken into account—as long as their only relevance is not that they bear on the defendant’s general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint. So, while s.54(1)(c) only specifies the characteristics of sex and age, under s.54(3) there is no reason why the defendant’s impotence, pregnancy, physical disability, sensitivity or even mental disability cannot be taken into account—unless the only relevance of these characteristics is that they affect the defendant’s capacity for tolerance or self-restraint. As can be seen from the case of Clinton, above, sexual infidelity on the part of the deceased may be seen as a relevant factor in assessing the defendant’s reaction to a qualifying trigger.

RICHARD TAYLOR, “THE MODEL OF TOLERANCE AND SELF-RESTRAINT”, IN REED AND BOHLANDER (EDS), LOSS OF CONTROL AND DIMINISHED RESPONSIBILITY (2011), P.57:

8–133

“The new test is not primarily about powers of self-control but about normal temperament which includes the concept of self-restraint, which may be similar to self-control, but the new test is wider in including also the notion of tolerance. It is the inclusion of tolerance which enables it, in effect, to exclude unpalatable characteristics such as jealousy and racial, religious, sexual and other forms of intolerance, prejudice and bigotry and other unacceptable attitudes such as those underpinning so-called ‘honour killings’. The definition of ‘the circumstances of D’ was developed as a response to the unduly wide and imprecise standard which the decision in Smith (Morgan) had approved and was intended in general terms to return the law to the Camplin approach which the Privy Council in any event subsequently reintroduced for the law of provocation in Holley. However, the new test is subtly different from the Camplin/Holley test, not only in the new (and potentially very significant) reference to tolerance as well as to self-restraint, but also in that all the circumstances of the accused are in principle brought in provided that they do not bear only on the capacity for tolerance or self-restraint but can be shown to have some other relevance to D’s conduct, even if not necessarily to the gravity of the triggering conduct. There may not be many circumstances which neither bear on the gravity of the triggering conduct nor bear only on the capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, but defendants will no doubt seek to present their circumstances or highlight them in a manner which shows some relevance to D’s conduct, other than to his/her capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, even if the circumstances do not directly affect the gravity of the triggering conduct.”

2. Diminished responsibility

8–134

Where a defendant is suffering from “diminished responsibility” he will have a partial defence to murder and will instead be convicted of manslaughter—again giving the court the necessary flexibility as to sentence. The defence is important not only to allow such a defendant to avoid the mandatory penalty for murder, but it has also been recognised by some that it is necessary and desirable for labelling purposes, in avoiding the label of “murderer”,²⁸⁹ particularly given the narrowness of the M’Naghten rules in pleading insanity.

(i) Introduction

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, CMND.8932 (1949– 1953), PARA.411:

8–135

“It must be accepted that there is no sharp dividing line between sanity and insanity, but that the two extremes of ‘sanity’ and ‘insanity’ shade into one another by imperceptible gradations. The degree of individual responsibility varies equally widely; no clear boundary can be drawn between responsibility and irresponsibility. The existence of degrees of responsibility has been recognised in ... [other] legal systems ... The acceptance of the doctrine of diminished responsibility would undoubtedly bring the law into closer harmony with the facts.”

8–136

The doubts that have led many to argue for the abolition of the insanity defence²⁹⁰ have here been used to justify a half-way house for those who kill while suffering from mental disorder; some device, it was felt, was needed to reflect the view that where there was less responsibility there ought to be less punishment. Such acceptance of partial responsibility would enable the courts to do what they really desired: to avoid the fixed penalty for murder by convicting the killer of manslaughter instead. For all other crimes which do not carry a fixed penalty, a partial defence was unnecessary. The lesser degree of responsibility could be reflected at the sentencing stage by “less punishment”.

(ii) The law

HOMICIDE ACT 1957 s.2 (As AMENDED BY THE CORONERS AND JUSTICE ACT 2009 s.52):

8–137

“(1) A person (‘D’) who kills or is a party to the killing of another is not to be convicted of murder if D was suffering from an abnormality of mental functioning which—

- (a) arose from a recognised medical condition,
- (b) substantially impaired D’s ability to do one or more of the things mentioned in subsection (1A), and
- (c) provides an explanation for D’s acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing.

(1A) Those things are—

- (a) to understand the nature of D’s conduct;
- (b) to form a rational judgment;
- (c) to exercise self-control.

(1B) For the purposes of subsection (1)(c), an abnormality of mental functioning provides an explanation for D’s conduct if it causes, or is a significant contributory factor in causing, D to carry out that conduct.

(3) ... A person who but for this section would be liable, whether as principal or accessory, to be convicted of murder shall be liable instead to be convicted of manslaughter.”²⁹¹

8–138

The plea is raised by the defence on whom, as with insanity, the burden rests. Attempts to argue that this contravened the ECHR art.6(2) which guarantees the presumption of innocence were rejected outright by the Court of Appeal in Lambert.²⁹² This was confirmed in Foye,²⁹³ where it was stated that the fundamental reason why a reverse burden of proof applies is that because the defence depends on the inner workings of the defendant’s mind, it would be a practical impossibility for the Crown to disprove an assertion that the defendant suffered from diminished responsibility, since the defendant might refuse to submit to or cooperate with a medical examination.

Before the amendments to s.2 were made by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, the provision required that the defendant suffered an “abnormality of mind” arising from one of a number of “bracketed causes” (arrested or retarded development of mind or any inherent causes or induced by disease or injury). “Abnormality of mind” was extremely vague; the concept was only slightly clarified by the case of Byrne.²⁹⁴ The appellant strangled and then mutilated a girl. It was alleged that he suffered from violent perverted sexual desires which he found difficult or impossible to control. He was, in fact, described as a sexual psychopath. In the course of his judgment (allowing the appeal) Lord Parker CJ defined “abnormality of mind” thus:

“[it is] a state of mind so different from that of ordinary human beings that the reasonable man ... would term it abnormal. It appears to us wide enough to cover the mind’s activities in all its aspects, not only the perception of physical acts and matters, and the ability to, form a rational judgment as to whether the act was right or wrong, but also the ability, to exercise will-power to control physical acts in accordance with that rational judgment.”

As the evidence to the Butler Committee suggested, this interpretation still left the meaning of “abnormality of mind” somewhat imprecise. It was a quasi-legal, quasi-medical formula that could satisfy no-one.

8–139

In recommending reform of the law, the Law Commission saw the need to bear in mind the needs and practices of medical practitioners, and drew inspiration from a definition of the defence adopted in New South Wales in 1997, to replace the requirement of an “abnormality of mind” with an abnormality of mental functioning arising either from a medically recognised condition or, in defendants under the age of 18, developmental immaturity.²⁹⁵

The developmental immaturity limb was always a controversial aspect of the Law Commission’s proposal,²⁹⁶ and was abandoned by the Government in drafting the new provision. It was dropped on the basis that it was not felt that the lack of such provision had caused any practical problems up until then, and because there was concern that every juvenile defendant accused of murder would attempt to rely on it to reduce their liability to manslaughter.²⁹⁷ There was some opposition to this change to the proposals, one reason being that it is unfair to allow a 40-year-old defendant with the mental age of ten to be able to rely on diminished responsibility due to them being recognised as suffering from a recognised mental condition, whilst excluding the defence in the case of a ten-year-old child because their development has not been arrested. This would suggest the law expects more of children than adults.²⁹⁸ Such concerns were, however, rejected by the Government.

One might assume that the “abnormality of mental functioning” requirement will more or less fall by the wayside, and that a defence of diminished responsibility will succeed providing that the defendant was suffering from a recognised medical condition and that there is expert evidence that this substantially impaired their ability to do one of the things specified in s.2(1A). If “abnormality of mental functioning” is to mean anything, it may be that reference to the test in Byrne is made to help juries determine the meaning of “abnormality”.²⁹⁹ The Law Commission’s most recent report says no more on this point than that “mental functioning” was a term preferred by psychiatrists to that of “mind” under the old law. However, the Commission’s earlier report of 2004 suggests that the impairment of the defendant’s ability to do one of the things that now appear in s.2(1A) actually amounts to a definition of “abnormality of mental functioning”.³⁰⁰ What is clear is that the new law is intended to be a lot more user-friendly for psychiatrists who are asked to provide evidence for the prosecution and defence in such cases. The abnormality of mental functioning must have arisen from a “recognised medical condition”, meaning that the law can now keep pace with developments in diagnostic practice. For a medical condition to be recognised, it would seem that it would have to be listed in one of the accepted classificatory systems such as The World Health Organisation’s International Classification of Diseases or the American Psychiatric Association’s Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders.³⁰¹

The abnormality of mental functioning must substantially impair the defendant’s ability to either understand the nature of his conduct; to form a rational judgment; or to exercise self-control. Under the original drafting of the Homicide Act s.2, the final question of whether the defendant's responsibility was substantially impaired was a moral question for the jury on which expert psychiatrists should not have given their own views.³⁰² It was found, however, that whilst a minority of psychiatrists tended to restrict themselves to the first part of the test in s.2 in giving evidence at trials, almost 70% of them expressed an opinion in relation to whether the defendant's responsibility was substantially impaired.³⁰³ Despite this statistic, it seems that psychiatrists were not comfortable with expressing an opinion on this matter, and the Royal College of Psychiatrists suggested that psychiatrists should resist requests from lawyers to do so.³⁰⁴ The difficulty faced by psychiatrists is illustrative of the central problem with s.2 prior to the amendment to the law: the compromise it achieved between medical and legal issues left neither side on safe ground. Neither medical experts nor the jury could satisfactorily answer the questions demanded of them. Indeed, the process had been described by psychiatrists as "an expensive farce" and a "blot on psychiatric practice".³⁰⁵ What happened was the familiar story of medical experts being made to determine the issue of responsibility.

Under the amended law, the question of "substantial" impairment remains one for the jury.³⁰⁶ Mackay predicted that it is likely that experts will continue to give their opinions on this issue as before.³⁰⁷ However, under the new law the jury no longer have to address the impossible issue of whether "responsibility" was substantially impaired and psychiatrists will no longer go through the charade of testifying about such a non-medical concept. Instead, juries have to assess whether the defendant's recognised psychiatric condition substantially impaired her ability to do one of the specified things. In doing this, they are undoubtedly be guided by psychiatric evidence³⁰⁸ but, now, psychiatrists will be testifying about matters within their medical expertise (for example, whether a defendant could form a rational judgement) rather than matters beyond their competence (issues of responsibility). Mackay and Mitchell, in examining reports submitted by experts in more recent diminished responsibility cases, found that such experts expressed a positive view that the defendant's ability to do one of the three things under s.2(1A) was substantially impaired in 72.7% of reports, with experts declining to comment on this in 8.2% of reports.³⁰⁹

However, the cases in Mackay and Mitchell's sample were determined before the Court of Appeal and Supreme Court decisions in the case of Golds. The Supreme Court was tasked with clarifying which of two interpretations of "substantial impairment" was correct.

R. V GOLDS [2016] UKSC 61 (SUPREME COURT):

8-141

The appellant had attacked his partner with a knife at their home in front of her young children after a running argument which had taken place on and off throughout much of the day. He had inflicted 22 knife wounds together with blunt impact internal injuries. Two consultant forensic psychiatrists gave evidence that there was an abnormality of mental functioning arising from a recognised medical condition, although they disagreed what that condition was. There was no contradictory psychiatric evidence. On the issue of substantial impairment, the judge told the jury that "substantial" was an everyday word not requiring further elucidation. The appellant was convicted of murder and appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending (a) that the judge had been wrong not to direct the jury as to what "substantially impaired" meant and (b) that the jury might in the absence of such direction have applied a more stringent test than it ought to have done. It was contended on his behalf that so long as the impairment was more than merely trivial, the test of "substantially impaired" was met. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appellant's appeal³¹⁰ but certified in relation to this ground that the following two questions of law of general public importance were involved:

1. Where a defendant, being tried for murder, seeks to establish that he is not guilty of murder by reason of diminished responsibility, is the court required to direct the jury as to the definition of the word "substantial" as in the phrase "substantially impaired" found in the Homicide Act 1957 s.2(1)(b) as amended by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.52?

2. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, or if for some other reason the judge chooses to direct the jury on the meaning of the word “substantial”, is it to be defined as “something more than merely trivial”, or alternatively in a way that connotes more than this, such as “something whilst short of total impairment that is nevertheless significant and appreciable”?

8–142

LORD HUGHES:

[Lord Hughes sets out the law before and after the amendment by the 2009 Act.]

”[7] It follows that the expression ‘substantially impaired’ has been carried forward from the old Act into its new form. But whereas previously it governed a single question of ‘mental responsibility’, now it governs the ability to do one or more of three specific things, to understand the nature of one’s acts, to form a rational judgment and to exercise self-control. Those abilities were frequently the focus of trials before the reformulation of the law. But previously, the question for the jury as to ‘mental responsibility’ was a global one, partly a matter of capacity and partly a matter of moral culpability, both including, additionally, consideration of the extent of any causal link between the condition and the killing. Now, although there is a single verdict, the process is more explicitly structured. The jury needs to address successive specific questions about (1) impairment of particular abilities and (2) cause of behaviour in killing. Both are of course relevant to moral culpability, but the jury is not left the same general ‘mental responsibility’ question that previously it was. The word used to describe the level of impairment is, however, the same.

...

[13] [In] R. v Simcox The Times 25 February 1964; [1964] Crim. L.R. 402 ... [t]he judge left the question [of substantial Impairment] to the jury in the terms of the section, adding only that they should ask:

’do we think, looking at it broadly as commonsense people, there was a substantial impairment of his mental responsibility in what he did? If the answer to that is “yes” then you find him not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter. If the answer to that is “no, there may be some impairment but we do not think it was substantial. We do not think it was something which really made any great difference although it may have made it harder to control himself to refrain from crime”, then you would find him guilty as charged.’

The Court of Appeal, whilst observing that the final sentence needed the previous focus on the word ‘substantial’ in order that it should not be thought that the absence of self-control had to be total, approved this direction ...

[14] Three years later the Court of Criminal Appeal considered the case of R. v Lloyd [1967] 1 Q.B. 175, which would appear to be the indirect origin of the submission made in the present case that ‘substantially impaired’ means any impairment greater than the merely trivial. ... At trial, Ashworth J had directed the jury in the terms of the statute, but he had then added:

’Fourthly, this word “substantial”, members of the jury. I am not going to try to find a parallel for the word “substantial”. You are the judges, but your own common sense will tell you what it means. ... Substantial does not mean total, that is to say, the mental responsibility need not be totally impaired, so to speak destroyed altogether. At the other end of the scale substantial does not mean trivial or minimal. It is something in between and Parliament has left it to you and other juries to say on the evidence, was the mental responsibility impaired, and, if so, was it substantially impaired?’ (178)

[15] Counsel for the defendant, on appeal, contended that the judge had erred in not directing the jury that ‘substantially’ meant ‘really present’ or ‘not trivial’. That was a submission that it meant no more than that there was some operating impairment, and thus that any such sufficed, so long as it was not trivial, and was exactly the same submission which is now made in the present case. Since the doctors had agreed that the depression was not trivial in its effect, the defendant was, it was submitted, entitled to be acquitted of murder. That contention was firmly rejected by the court. ...

... [Lord Hughes continues to discuss subsequent cases, including Ramchurn, followed by the case law in Scotland and the Law

Commission's recommendations for reform.]

[35] It follows that there is nothing in the change of the formulation of the test for diminished responsibility to cause a different view to be taken now of the sense in which the word 'substantially' is used in conjunction with 'impairment'.

[36] This use of the expression accords with principle. Diminished responsibility effects a radical alteration in the offence of which a defendant is convicted. The context is a homicide. By definition, before any question of diminished responsibility can arise, the homicide must have been done with murderous intent, ... Whilst it is true that at one end of the scale of responsibility the sentence in a case of diminished responsibility may be severe, or indeed an indefinite life sentence owing to the risk which the defendant presents to the public, the difference between a conviction for murder and a conviction for manslaughter is of considerable importance both for the public and for those connected with the deceased. It is just that where a substantial impairment is demonstrated, the defendant is convicted of the lesser offence and not of murder. But it is appropriate, as it always has been, for the reduction to the lesser offence to be occasioned where there is a weighty reason for it and not merely a reason which just passes the trivial.

...

8-143

[38] Where, ... as here, there are two identifiable and different senses in which the expression in question may be used, the potential for inconsistent usage may need to be reduced. The existence of the two senses of the word 'substantially' identified above means that the law should, in relation to diminished responsibility, be clear which sense is being employed. If it is not, there is, first, a risk of trials being distracted into semantic arguments between the two. Secondly, there is a risk that different juries may apply different senses. Thirdly, medical evidence (nearly always forensic psychiatric evidence) has always been a practical necessity where the issue is diminished responsibility. ... Although it is for the jury, and not for the doctors, to determine whether the partial defence is made out, and this important difference of function is well recognised by responsible forensic psychiatrists, it is inevitable that they may express an opinion as to whether the impairment was or was not substantial, and if they do not do so in their reports, as commonly many do, they may be asked about it in oral evidence. It is therefore important that if they use the expression, they do so in the sense in which it is used by the courts. If there is doubt about the sense in which they have used it, their reports may be misunderstood and decisions made upon them falsified, and much time at trials is likely to be taken up unnecessarily by cross examination on the semantic question...

[39] The sense in which 'substantially impaired' is used in relation to diminished responsibility is, for the reasons set out above, the second of the two senses. It is not synonymous with 'anything more than merely trivial impairment'.

...

[43] It follows that the questions certified by the Court of Appeal should be answered as follows:

(1) Ordinarily in a murder trial where diminished responsibility is in issue the judge need not direct the jury beyond the terms of the statute and should not attempt to define the meaning of 'substantially'. Experience has shown that the issue of its correct interpretation is unlikely to arise in many cases. The jury should normally be given to understand that the expression is an ordinary English word, that it imports a question of degree, and that whether in the case before it the impairment can properly be described as substantial is for it to resolve.

(2) If, however, the jury has been introduced to the question of whether any impairment beyond the merely trivial will suffice, or if it has been introduced to the concept of a spectrum between the greater than trivial and the total, the judge should explain that whilst the impairment must indeed pass the merely trivial before it need be considered, it is not the law that any impairment beyond the trivial will suffice. The judge should likewise make this clear if a risk arises that the jury might misunderstand the import of the expression; whether this risk arises or not is a judgment to be arrived at by the trial judge who is charged with overseeing the dynamics of the trial. Diminished responsibility involves an impairment of one or more of the abilities listed in the statute to an extent which the jury judges to be substantial, and which it is satisfied significantly contributed to his committing the offence. Illustrative expressions of the sense of the word may be employed so long as the jury is given clearly to understand that no single synonym is to be substituted for the statutory word ...”

Appeal dismissed

8-144

The result of the Supreme Court’s decision to confirm the approach taken in the Court of Appeal is that the degree of impairment to be present is greater than psychiatrists had perhaps previously interpreted the requirement to be.³¹¹ The consequence of this may be that the number of successful pleas of diminished responsibility will continue to fall (see below).

The final (and new) requirement of s.2 is that the recognised medical condition must have caused the defendant’s involvement in the killing. The Law Commission noted that it was never clear under the pre-existing law whether the abnormality of mind had to in some sense “cause” the defendant to kill.³¹² The new s.2(1)(c) requires that the abnormality of mental functioning provides an explanation for D’s acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing, and s.2(1B) further provides that this means that D’s conduct must cause or be a, significant contributory factor in causing D to carry out that conduct. The inclusion of a, strict causal requirement has been criticised by Mackay, who notes that there is no real support for such a requirement and other jurisdictions, such as New South Wales, have not seen the need to include one.³¹³ The law now makes it clear that there must be a connection between the abnormality of mental functioning and the killing. This means that where the jury think that the abnormality of mental functioning made no difference to the defendant’s behaviour, he will not succeed in his plea of diminished responsibility.³¹⁴ But the test is more than one of “but for” causation. How is it envisaged that it will operate in practice?

R. MACKAY, “THE NEW DIMINISHED

RESPONSIBILITY PLEA” IN REED AND BOHLANDER, LOSS OF CONTROL AND DIMINISHED RESPONSIBILITY: DOMESTIC, COMPARATIVE AND INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVES (ALDERSHOT: ASHGATE, 2011), PP.18–19.

8–145

“Let us consider a hypothetical case where the psychiatric evidence is as follows. D suffers from schizophrenia and killed V while experiencing delusions to the effect that God ordered him to kill. Schizophrenia is a recognised medical condition which led to D’s experiencing delusions to the effect that God ordered him to kill. Schizophrenia is a recognised medical condition which led to D’s experiencing an abnormality of mental functioning. This in turn is likely to have impaired D’s ability to form a rational judgement and so clearly provides an explanation for the killing. The prosecution psychiatrist concurs with all this but unlike the psychiatrist for the defence expresses doubts as to whether the abnormality of mental functioning was the cause or a significant contributory factor in causing D to carry out the killing. One can only hope that this sort of dispute will be rare. But there is nothing to prevent it. A sensible way forward might be for the courts to interpret this provision so that ... proof of all the other elements of the new plea would mean that in giving his opinion the psychiatrist is entitled, without more, to reach a conclusion that the causal requirement is satisfied.”³¹⁵

8–146

Mackay’s hope that disputes between expert witnesses in cases of diminished responsibility will rarely disagree is not borne out by his more recent findings. As confirmed in Bunch,³¹⁶ expert evidence is necessary for the defence to be successfully raised. The amended s.2 leaves much to be determined by psychiatrists in supporting or otherwise a plea of diminished responsibility. In cases where such experts are in agreement, and evidence of diminished responsibility is unchallenged, the Court of Appeal has held in *Brennan*³¹⁷ that the judge should withdraw the murder charge from the jury.³¹⁸ Since the 2009 Act came into force there has, however, been an increase in the number of contested cases of diminished responsibility in which the experts are not in agreement. Mackay and Mitchell found that 43.3% of the cases in their post-2009 Act sample were decided by a jury trial, compared to 22.9% in Mackay's earlier sample for the Law Commission.³¹⁹ In addition to this, the number of pleas of diminished responsibility failing at trial had increased, with the number of murder convictions rising from 61.1% in the pre-2009 Act sample to 79.5% in the post-2009 Act sample.

This reduction in the number of defendants being able successfully to rely on diminished responsibility to reduce liability from murder to manslaughter may partially be explained by, and give weight to, concerns over the types of cases that the new law is likely to cover. Under the pre-existing s.2, the woolliness of the language enabled psychiatrists, as expert witnesses (with the collusion of judges and juries) to simply stretch the interpretation of the provision to cover cases where a conviction of murder was thought to be inappropriate. Persons suffering from reactive depressions and alcoholism, as well as mercy-killers, have been brought within the ambit of the defence. Indeed, the Law Commission has noted that long-term carers of terminally ill spouses who kill with their spouse's consent "are already quite commonly dealt with under s.2 of the Act as persons suffering from diminished responsibility. It is the prosecution that normally accepts the plea".³²⁰ Following the Supreme Court's decision in Golds Mackay is concerned that the lack of flexibility in the court's interpretation of "substantially impaired" will lead to deserving cases, including mercy killers, falling outside the defence of diminished responsibility.³²¹ Mackay's research for the Law Commission prior to the reform of s.2 found that the most common condition used in connection with the defence was depression (28.7%) followed by schizophrenia (23.6%), and personality disorder and psychosis (both at 12.7%).³²² The question is whether the new drafting of the provision has narrowed the ambit of the defence. Mackay and Mitchell have compared Mackay's previous findings with cases dealt with under the amended s.2 and found that the primary diagnoses in more recent cases were the same:

schizophrenia (37.8%), depression (14.4%), personality disorder (16.7%) and psychosis (16.7%).³²³ As mentioned above, though, the increase in the success rate of the Crown contesting cases of diminished responsibility would seem to suggest that the bar has been raised for pleading the defence successfully.

8-147

One of the most difficult types of cases the courts have had to deal with in respect of diminished responsibility is perhaps the case of the alcoholic.³²⁴ It was held in Tandy that alcoholism may amount to an “injury”,³²⁵ one of the bracketed causes required of an abnormality of mind under the previous incarnation of the defence, if the first drink of the day was “involuntary”. It has been confirmed under the new version of the law that expert evidence will be required to prove that the defendant was suffering from alcohol dependency syndrome.³²⁶ However, for policy reasons the courts have consistently upheld the distinction between alcoholism and mere intoxication. In Dietschmann,³²⁷ the House of Lords held that where a defendant pleads diminished responsibility resulting from the combination of mental abnormality and intoxication the jury should be satisfied that, despite the drink, the defendant’s mental abnormality substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his fatal acts. Shortly before the Coroners and Justice Act was passed, however, the case of *Wood*³²⁸ dealt with this matter in relation to a defendant whose abnormality of mind arose from alcoholism (alcohol dependency syndrome), where he was also drunk at the time of the killing. In this case, the Court of Appeal reassessed the way in which Tandy applied in cases of alcohol dependency syndrome and noted that the jury would have to focus its minds on two issues in a case of an alcoholic charged with murder who was attempting to rely on s.2. The first was whether the defendant’s dependency amounted to an abnormality of mind. This question was more easily answered in cases where observable brain damage had occurred, but nevertheless, had to be addressed in all cases even if there had been no brain damage. Secondly, in cases where the jury decided that the alcohol dependency syndrome did amount to an abnormality of mind, they then had to address the question of whether the defendant’s actions at the time of the killing were substantially impaired as a result of the syndrome. This approach was confirmed again by the Court of Appeal in Stewart.³²⁹

In Dowds,³³⁰ decided in relation to the reformed version of s.2, a far more simple matter was dealt with than that in Wood. The defendant was drunk at the time that he stabbed his partner 60 times, killing her, but there was no suggestion that he was suffering from alcohol dependency syndrome. Instead he tried to argue diminished responsibility on the basis that “acute intoxication” is listed in the WHO ICD-10 and should therefore amount to a recognised medical condition for the purposes of pleading diminished responsibility. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument on the basis that the Law Commission explicitly did not include writing the terms of ICD-10 and/or DSM-IV³³¹ into the legislation, for which purpose those terms are “demonstrably unsuited”. Pleading diminished responsibility successfully is not as simple as relying on the presence of a particular condition on any such diagnostic list. Being on the list is a necessary but not sufficient condition for diminished responsibility to apply.

8–148

Do battered women who kill their abusive partners fall within the ambit of the new defence? The Law Commission assumes that in the worst cases of domestic violence, the victim of that violence will be able to rely on diminished responsibility as a partial defence.³³² In the past, however, a battered woman’s ability to do so, whilst recognised in law, has not necessarily been seen to be desirable. Such women have had to fall back on diminished responsibility when both self-defence and provocation have been unlikely to succeed. For example in Ahluwalia,³³³ the defendant was beaten and threatened with death for over ten years before she poured petrol over her husband whilst he was asleep and then set light to him. At her trial, she pleaded provocation (or alternatively lack of mens rea) but was found guilty of murder. The Court of Appeal, however, very exceptionally, permitted medical evidence that was not brought before the court at the trial to be admitted at the appeal stage. On the basis of the evidence of her depressive condition her conviction was quashed; at the re-trial a plea of manslaughter on the basis of diminished responsibility was accepted and she was sentenced to 40 months' imprisonment (exactly the amount she had already served).³³⁴ Forcing such defendants to resort to diminished responsibility has been severely criticised, however, on the basis that it labels them as "abnormal" or "crazy".³³⁵

What is the outcome of a successful plea of diminished responsibility if widely divergent cases are going to be brought within its protection? Simply because the conviction is for manslaughter rather than murder does not ensure lenient treatment. A finding of mental imbalance does not automatically entail a hospital order under the Mental Health Act 1983 s.37 although this is imposed in approximately 50% of diminished responsibility cases.³³⁶ The use of imprisonment has increased to over one-third of cases although life sentences are fairly rare.³³⁷ In Brown,³³⁸ the Court of Appeal confirmed that the approach to sentencing in cases of manslaughter by reason of diminished responsibility has not been significantly changed by the introduction of the revised definition of diminished responsibility. In a case where a life sentence is appropriate the judge can have regard to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21 to determine what minimum term would be appropriate had the defendant been convicted of murder, and apply an appropriate discount to reflect that the defendant's responsibility was diminished.³³⁹ In Welsh,³⁴⁰ the schizophrenic defendant's life sentence with a minimum term of 12 years was upheld on the basis that the defendant's propensity for violence, even before he suffered from schizophrenia, and the gravity of the offence, meant that public confidence would not be met by making a hospital order coupled with a restriction order, and there was a substantial risk that the defendant would remain a source of danger even if his condition substantially improved once he received treatment and medication.

8-149

Determinate sentences of imprisonment can be imposed where there is no proper basis for a hospital order, but where the defendant's degree of responsibility is not minimal.³⁴¹ Most recently, in Blackman,³⁴² the Court of Appeal set out relevant factors to be taken into account in determining the sentence for manslaughter by reason of diminished responsibility in the absence of a Sentencing Council guideline. Here the approach of the Sentencing Council in basing its guidelines on a combination of harm and culpability, further influenced by aggravating and mitigating factors, was adopted. It was again confirmed that the approach taken in Sch.21 could act as a reference point, but it was highlighted that an important difference was that a minimum term for murder represented the time served in prison in actual years, whereas time served on a determinate basis was generally half the number of years specified by the court. This case involved a marine in Afghanistan suffering from adjustment disorder, who had calmly shot an insurgent who was already injured and no longer posed a threat. The harm was established as being of the highest order, despite the fact that the victim was already injured and might not have survived much longer. The marine's culpability was classed in the medium bracket, in that although his culpability was diminished, he still retained a substantial responsibility for what was a deliberate killing. After taking into account four aggravating and four mitigating factors, the Court of Appeal held that the appropriate determinate sentence was seven years' imprisonment, with release from custody at the half way point, and dismissal from the armed forces.

Cases "which have been felt to merit sympathetic consideration have resulted in more lenient disposal".³⁴³ An example of a case that can be classified as a "mercy killing" is that of Webb,³⁴⁴ where the defendant, having been requested on many occasions by his wife to help end her life, smothered her after the overdose she had taken seemed not to have been effective and she had told him not to let her wake up. His sentence of two years' imprisonment was reduced to a suspended 12-month sentence of imprisonment.

This last case raises the question of whether those that kill out of compassion should have to rely on the defence of diminished responsibility to avoid the label of murder and a mandatory life sentence. It has been seen that where a killing is motivated by the emotion of fear or anger, the killer may be able to rely on the partial defence of loss of control to reduce a murder conviction to one of manslaughter. Keating and Bridgeman have noted that compassion, like fear and anger, is an emotion, but unlike those emotions it is an altruistic emotion and reflects well on the person who experiences it and acts upon it. Should we not, then, afford a defence of compassionate killing to those such as the defendant in Webb who act to end another's suffering?

HEATHER KEATING AND JO BRIDGEMAN, "COMPASSIONATE KILLINGS: THE CASE FOR A PARTIAL DEFENCE" (2012) 75 M.L.R. 697–721, 720:

8–150

“In cases such as these, where there is objective evidence of extreme and unbearable suffering experienced by the deceased prior to death, together with requests for help to die, the argument for a partial defence of compassionate killing may be one which would garner support. However, our case studies prompt us to go further to argue that the partial defence should not be confined to those cases in which the deceased was, at the time of death, able to articulate her suffering. [In this respect differing from assisted suicide where there must of course be a request; see below.] The knowledge and understanding of a loved one which is gained from the intensive experiences of care which are characteristic of these cases means that the suffering of another can be understood even when it is not articulated. As our case studies reveal, the intimate relationship of love and care can bring an understanding of another not achievable by one more distant. This is both because their caring relationship ensures a focus upon the experiences and needs of the loved one who is suffering and also because it brings understanding of their values important to an assessment of suffering. We recognise that a proposal to extend the partial defence beyond instances where there is a competent, autonomous decision on the part of the sufferer is controversial. In order to address the risks involved and, heeding the warnings given by Penney Lewis ... about the dangers of a compassion-based approach, we stress that there would need to be evidence that the deceased was experiencing extreme and unbearable suffering prior to death. It would not be enough for the accused to have an honest belief about the level of the suffering being experienced; it would need to be one based on reasonable grounds and thus a reasoned and caring response to the suffering of their loved one. In sum, the partial defence of compassionate killing we propose would be available to a relative or family member who had been fulfilling intensive caring responsibilities for the deceased and who, in response to an honest and reasonable belief that he or she had been experiencing extreme and unbearable suffering, ended the deceased's life in order to end his or her suffering."

3. Killing in pursuance of a suicide pact

HOMICIDE ACT 1957 s.4:

8-151

"(1) It shall be manslaughter, and shall not be murder, for a person acting in pursuance of a suicide pact between him and another to kill the other or be a party to the other being killed by a third person ...

(3) For the purposes of this section 'suicide pact' means a common agreement between two or more persons having for its object the death of all of them, whether or not each is to take his own life, but nothing done by a person who enters into a suicide pact shall be treated as done by him in pursuance of the pact unless it is done while he has the settled intention of dying in pursuance of the pact."

8-152

The law acts with some clemency towards a defendant who survives a suicide pact when they had intended to die themselves. Such clemency does not, however, extend to other situations. If the agreement to "kill and then die" is merely a front for murder where the defendant has no intention of killing himself, then he will be convicted of murder. This will be the case even if the deceased consented to die and even if, furthermore, it can be described as a mercy-killing. It is, therefore, thought to be more blameworthy to kill in such situations than where a suicide pact exists. The basis of this distinction in blameworthiness must lie in the "settled intention" of the defendant to die himself. Perhaps it is felt that the person killed would not have consented had she not been aware of the intention of the other; more probably, however, the consent of the “victim” is still irrelevant and the partial defence represents “a concession to human frailty”. It recognises with compassion the state of despair of one who would kill and then die themselves.³⁴⁵ Or could it be that this is a remnant of the Biblical historical origins of the law of homicide—that one who kills intending to die themselves immediately thereafter does not “acquire the [same] control over the blood—the life force—of the victim”³⁴⁶—and therefore deserves less punishment?

Killing in pursuance of a suicide pact is distinguished from the separate crime of encouraging or assisting suicide.

V. Encouraging or Assisting Suicide

SUICIDE ACT 1961 S.2 (AS AMENDED BY THE CORONERS AND JUSTICE ACT 2009 S.59):

8–153

“(1) A person (‘D’) commits an offence if—

- (a) D does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the suicide or attempted suicide of another person, and
- (b) D’s act was intended to encourage or assist suicide or an attempt at suicide.

(1A) The person referred to in subsection (1)(a) need not be a specific person (or class of persons) known to, or identified by, D.

(1B) D may commit an offence under this section whether or not a suicide, or an attempt at suicide, occurs.

(1C) An offence under this section is triable on indictment and a person convicted of such an offence is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years.”

8–154

The amendments made by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 were intended solely to modernise the language used and bring it in line with the law under the Serious Crime Act 2007.³⁴⁷

Previously, the provision was couched in the same terms as those used in the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861, requiring that the defendant aid, abet, counsel or procure the suicide or attempted suicide of another. The change is not intended to extend the law or alter the kinds of cases in which a prosecution will be brought.³⁴⁸ Hirst notes, however, that the key change is the substitution of a conduct crime for a result crime.³⁴⁹ Now that it is a purely inchoate offence the chances are that it could bring within its ambit more cases than it did previously, given that it can be charged in cases where the would-be “victim” has not got as far as attempting to commit suicide, as required under the old law.

It has been pointed out that:

“[t]he distinction between ... [complicity in suicide and manslaughter by suicide pact] ... may be very fine. If D and V agree to gas themselves with car exhaust fumes and D alone survives, it appears that he will be liable under the Homicide Act if he turned on the engine and possibly under the Suicide Act if V did.”³⁵⁰

The distinction is of importance in terms of punishment. Killing in pursuance of a suicide pact is punishable as manslaughter by a maximum of life imprisonment, while encouraging or assisting suicide is punishable by a maximum of 14 years’ imprisonment. The Draft Criminal Code recognised the strength of this point and proposed to make both offences subject to a seven-year maximum sentence.³⁵¹ The Law Commission proposed repealing the Homicide Act s.4 on the basis that its proposed reformulation of the definition of the partial defence of diminished responsibility would cater adequately for the deserving cases.³⁵² However, following consultation the Law Commission retracted this proposal and recommended that the Homicide Act s.4 be retained pending the outcome of a further consultation on the question of whether a separate partial defence of mercy killing ought to be created.³⁵³

8–155

The consent of the DPP is required before a prosecution may be brought under the Suicide Act 1961.³⁵⁴ In Pretty,³⁵⁵ the first case on assisted suicide to reach the House of Lords, it was held that the DPP is unable to give an undertaking to people that they will not be prosecuted if they assist their spouse to commit suicide—even if that spouse, by virtue of their incurable condition, is unable to carry out her wishes herself.³⁵⁶ The House of Lords in *Purdy*³⁵⁷ again had occasion to consider the issue of how prosecutorial discretion should be controlled in such cases. The facts were similar to those of Pretty, with the claimant arguing that, if the DPP could not give an undertaking not to prosecute, he should at least be obliged to provide clear guidance as to what factors would be taken into account when deciding whether to prosecute. The House of Lords allowed the appeal, finding that the right to respect for private life under the ECHR art.8 was engaged and that if the law was to interfere with that right, there should be accessible and precise guidance to enable an individual to foresee the consequences of his actions so that he could regulate his conduct without breaking the law. The Code for Crown Prosecutors did not provide sufficient or specific guidance on this issue and so the DPP would be required to issue offence-specific policy, similar to charging standards already in existence in relation to offences such as driving offences or non-fatal offences against the person.

In response, following a consultation process, the DPP issued a policy in February 2010 providing a list of factors for and against prosecution in the public interest in cases of assisted suicide.³⁵⁸ Such guidance should assure those suffering from a terminal illness, a severe and incurable physical disability or severe degenerative condition, such as the claimants in Pretty and Purdy, that if they seek to take their own lives, assisted by their loved ones, that said loved ones will not be prosecuted if they can be said to be truly motivated by compassion. However, where the suspect was acting in his or her capacity as a medical doctor, nurse, other healthcare professional, a professional carer, or as a person in authority, such as a prison officer, and the victim was in his or her care, this will act as a factor in favour of prosecution. The Supreme Court in Nicklinson,³⁵⁹ in addition to finding that s.2 does not impose what would be regarded under the ECHR as a “blanket ban” on assisted suicide, meaning that the UK is acting within the margin of appreciation and not in breach of the Convention, also declined to order the DPP to amend the prosecution policy in response to arguments that it was insufficiently clear. This raises general questions not only about the degree of discretion that should be afforded to the CPS in prosecuting cases, and how that discretion ought to be controlled but, more fundamentally, about whether the criminal law ought to criminalise conduct it does not seek to punish, and whether the law on assisted suicide, mercy killings and euthanasia needs amending. The Law Commission recommended that the Government ought to undertake a consultation process on the question of whether the law should allow for a partial defence to murder of mercy killing or create a new offence of mercy killing.³⁶⁰ It would appear that the CPS's consultation on its prosecution policy overlapped considerably with the kinds of issues such a public consultation would seek to explore. Arguably "mercy killing" could involve cases where the victim was unable herself to choose to end her own life and to communicate that to the defendant, whereas the DPP's guidance makes it clear that a defendant would ordinarily only avoid prosecution for assisted suicide if the victim had been the one to instigate the suicide and had been able to communicate her wishes clearly to the defendant. Leaving such issues to the discretion of Crown prosecutors is, however, less desirable than legislating clearly on what is or is not a criminal offence.

The maximum penalty is 14 years' imprisonment. Prosecutions are rare, making the sentencing task for the judge quite difficult. In Howe,³⁶¹ the first case prosecuted since Purdy was decided and the guidance was issued by the DPP, a 12-year custodial sentence was reduced to one of ten years. The defendant, who was 19, walked to a petrol station to fill a petrol can with petrol and buy a lighter which he returned to his 30-year-old friend. The friend, who was of a vulnerable character, had mental health problems and had on a number of occasions threatened to kill himself, poured petrol over himself and lit himself on fire. Miraculously he survived, albeit suffering 95% burns. The Court of Appeal, in reducing the sentence, considered that it was wrong of the trial judge to make reference to the sentencing guidelines in relation to Offences against the Person Act s.18 and provided guidance as to relevant factors for a court to consider in dealing with the offence.

VI. Infanticide

A THE CURRENT POSITION

INFANTICIDE ACT 1938 s.1:

8–156

“(1) Where a woman by any wilful act or omission causes the death of her child being a child under the age of twelve months, but at the time of the act or omission the balance of her mind was disturbed by reason of her not having fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to the child or by reason of the effect of lactation consequent upon the birth of the child, then, if³⁶² the circumstances were such that but for this Act the offence would have amounted to murder or manslaughter,³⁶³ she shall be guilty of ... infanticide, and may for such offence be dealt with and punished as if she had been guilty of the offence of manslaughter of the child.

(2) Where upon the trial of a woman for the murder of her child, being a child under the age of twelve months, the jury are of opinion that she by any wilful act or omission caused its death, but that at the time of the act or omission the balance of her mind was disturbed by reason of her not having fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to the child or by reason of the effect of lactation consequent upon the birth of the child, then the jury may, if the circumstances were such that but for the provisions of this Act they might have returned a verdict of murder or manslaughter, return in lieu thereof a verdict of infanticide.”

8–157

Infanticide is similar to voluntary manslaughter in that in one respect it is effectively a partial defence to murder.³⁶⁴ It has especially close links with the partial defence of diminished responsibility and, indeed, there is some question as to whether infanticide is redundant given the existence of this wider defence. The changes made by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 may seem minor, but they will provide welcome clarification of the law for many. Prior to the changes there had been some question over whether the prosecution could only charge infanticide in cases where they could prove the necessary mens rea for murder, and whether infanticide was available as a defence to women charged with manslaughter as well as those charged with murder.³⁶⁵ Although the Court of Appeal in *Gore*³⁶⁶ had suggested that it should be clear that the prosecution need not be able to prove intention to kill or cause grievous bodily harm, given that the only mens rea term appearing in the statute was “wilful”, that part of the court’s decision was only obiter. The Government was, however, happy to accept the Court of Appeal’s interpretation of the law and the amendment made by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 to add the words “or manslaughter” to both s.1(1) and s.1(2) is a welcome clarification to the law. This amendment has the added benefit of making it clear that infanticide cannot be charged in cases that would not otherwise amount to unlawful homicide. The Government was concerned that one of the consequences of the reading of s.1 in Gore was that a woman who committed a “wilful act or omission” might be accused of infanticide even though her culpability in relation to an omission to act would fall below the standard of gross negligence required for manslaughter.³⁶⁷

When introduced in its modern form,³⁶⁸ infanticide was seen by many as a welcome solution to juries’ reluctance to convict distressed women of the murder of their babies—with the consequence that they would be sentenced to death. One of the reasons for the welcome that the introduction of the crime of infanticide received was that it avoided the hypocrisy of passing a death sentence that all in authority (at least) knew would not be carried out; the sentence of death would invariably be commuted to one of life imprisonment by the Royal Prerogative of Mercy. Since 1849, no mother had been executed for the murder of her own child under the age of one year.³⁶⁹

While the existence of the offence is useful in giving effect to both a judicial and societal desire to express understanding for and sympathy with the defendant’s plight, the medical basis upon which infanticide has rested since the 20th century³⁷⁰ has never been beyond doubt. It is estimated that about half of new mothers experience “baby blues” in the first few days after giving birth and that in about 10% of cases more severe depressions result. The most severe forms of psychiatric illnesses of postpartum psychosis and psychotic depression are thought to be much less common but do exist. Medically, therefore, it can be argued that there is a case for a special defence (although no one is suggesting that all these women are likely to kill their children).³⁷¹ However, the most serious cases would probably fall within the defence of diminished responsibility. Moreover, there are clear problems with both the terminology employed in the Infanticide Act and its use in practice.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MENTALLY ABNORMAL OFFENDERS
(BUTLER COMMITTEE), EVIDENCE OF
THE GOVERNOR AND STAFF OF HOLLOWAY PRISON, CMND.6244
(1975), PARA.19.24:

8-158

“The disturbance of the ‘balance of mind’ that the Act requires can rarely be said to arise directly from incomplete recovery from the effects of childbirth and even less so from the effects of lactation.³⁷²

Infanticide due to puerperal psychotic illness is rare. The type of killing where the child is killed immediately after birth and which is usually associated with illegitimate concealed pregnancies is also very uncommon. Most cases of child murder dealt with by the courts as infanticide are examples of the battered child syndrome in which the assault has had fatal consequences and the child is aged under 12 months. A combination of environmental stress and personality disorder with low frustration tolerance are the usual aetiological factors in such cases and the relationship to ‘incomplete recovery from the effects of childbirth or lactation’ specified in the Infanticide Act is often somewhat remote. The Act is nevertheless nearly always invoked in cases of maternal filicide when the victim is aged under 12 months, in order to reduce the charge from murder to manslaughter. The illogical -operation of the Act is illustrated by the fact that an exactly similar type of case where the victim happened to be over the age of 12 months can no longer be dealt with as infanticide.”

This illogicality is reinforced by the lack of any mitigating provision to protect the woman who does not succeed in killing her child. She may be charged with attempted murder or wounding with intent. The Criminal Law Revision Committee has stated that the particular drafting of the Infanticide Act 1938 s.1 makes the charging of attempted infanticide impossible.³⁷³ Despite this, in the case of Smith,³⁷⁴ the trial judge accepted a plea of guilty to attempted infanticide.

Whilst the means by which this was done are suspect, the result is admirable. Such a woman in these circumstances is trying to commit infanticide and the law should recognise this. Further, if found guilty of attempted murder she may be sentenced to imprisonment.³⁷⁵ The Draft Criminal Code recognised the present anomaly: attempted infanticide would become the appropriate charge where a woman in such circumstances fails to kill her child.³⁷⁶

The woman who is convicted of infanticide³⁷⁷ (which, like attempted murder and wounding with intent, carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment) is almost never sent to prison—and presumably this would also be true of attempted infanticide. The sentence is almost always one of probation.³⁷⁸ In more serious cases of imbalance, the woman may be made subject to a hospital order and committed to her local hospital.

If the current use of the defence rests much more on the effects of child-rearing than on childbirth, then is it not illogical that the defence is open to mothers only? Clearly, fathers may be subject to similar pressures. As the law stands such defendants will have to plead diminished responsibility.³⁷⁹ Mackay's research leads him to conclude that "as far as females were concerned, these were viewed as tragic cases which the prosecution was prepared to deal with leniently, while the males, although avoiding murder convictions, were considered much more culpable".³⁸⁰ Such defendants are very likely to be sentenced to prison.³⁸¹ However, Mackay's more recent research indicates that where women are successful in pleading infanticide, the basis of the conviction is one which is linked to her recent experience of childbirth rather than the effects of child-rearing. Of 49 women convicted of infanticide between 1990 and 2003, 15 killed their child within 24 hours of childbirth and 11 killed between one day and one month following childbirth.³⁸² In 14 of the cases, the primary diagnosis was one of postnatal depression.³⁸³ This information provides some support for retention of the defence as one available only to biological mothers of young babies.

B. IS INFANTICIDE REDUNDANT?

8-160

In the following case, the defendant's conviction for murder of her three-month-old baby was upheld. The appellant had not sought to rely upon the defence of infanticide, as her defence had been that the baby had died of natural causes, but the Court of Appeal took the opportunity to express dissatisfaction with the current law.

R. V KAI-WHITEWIND [2005] 2 CR. APP. R. 31:

8-161

JUDGE LJ

"133 ... The appellant was a woman of good character with two children. She had apparently given them natural maternal love and affection before she gave birth to Bidziil. He was conceived in the course of an alleged rape. She resisted suggestions that her pregnancy should be terminated. Immediately after the birth she underwent some unspecified level of depression, but was anxious about the possible implications of taking anti-depressants on the baby's feeding. Within a very short period, for understandable reasons arising from an injury to Bidziil for which the appellant herself was not responsible, after a period in hospital, he was cared for by her mother, and not by her. All this inevitably weakened the natural bonding process. When the baby returned home, the appellant was unable to breast feed the baby successfully, something to which she attached great importance. She seems to have believed that as a result of the difficulties, they were not bonding properly. It was in those circumstances that the baby was killed, less than three months after the appellant had given birth to him. Following conviction, the inevitable mandatory sentence of life imprisonment was imposed on her ...

139 The issues raised in these cases are delicate and sensitive. In October 2004 the Home Office announced a comprehensive review of the law of murder ... We shall highlight two particular areas of concern. The first is whether, as a matter of substantive law, infanticide should extend to circumstances subsequent to the birth, but connected with it, such as the stresses imposed on a mother by the absence of natural bonding with her baby: in short, whether the current definition of infanticide reflects modern thinking. The second problem arises when the mother who has in fact killed her infant is unable to admit it. This may be because she is too unwell to do so, or too emotionally disturbed by what she has in fact done, or too deeply troubled by the consequences of an admission of guilt on her ability to care for any surviving children. When this happens, it is sometimes difficult to produce psychiatric evidence relating to the balance of the mother's mind. Yet, of itself, it does not automatically follow from denial that the balance of her mind was not disturbed: in some cases it may indeed help to confirm that it was.

140 The law relating to infanticide is unsatisfactory and outdated. The appeal in this sad case demonstrates the need for a thorough re-examination.”

8-162

Law reform bodies have long been concerned about the ambit of infanticide. Given the disputed medical basis of the statute and the illogical limitations it imposes, the Butler Committee on Mentally Abnormal Offenders³⁸⁴ decided that infanticide could be subsumed in the partial defence of diminished responsibility. Not only would the limitations to 12 months and to the mother be abolished, but it concluded that there would be little difficulty in establishing the necessary medical evidence for a finding of diminished responsibility. However, the Criminal Law Revision Committee was opposed to any such reform, on the basis that: (i) it was not satisfied that diminished responsibility could cover all cases of infanticide;³⁸⁵ and (ii) infanticide should remain a separate offence with a maximum penalty of no more than five years' imprisonment.³⁸⁶

The first of these reasons is supported by Mackay's survey of infanticide cases. Whilst there were a few cases where either the Infanticide Act s.1 or the Homicide Act s.2 could have been employed, there were many where the psychiatric evidence could not support a finding of diminished responsibility. Mackay continues:

“the overall impression gained from an examination of the psychiatric reports which were used in support of infanticide leaves little room to doubt that the criteria within the 1938 Act were being used primarily as a legal device for avoiding the mandatory penalty and thus ensure that leniency could be shown in appropriate cases.”³⁸⁷

It can be argued, of course, that if the 1938 Act provisions were not there, experts would stretch the evidence to fit the test of diminished responsibility. This would still be a gamble, however, and might result in some cases which are currently dealt with as infanticide being dealt with as murder.³⁸⁸

8–163

In its Consultation Paper on homicide the Law Commission put forward three options for reform: minimal, moderate and radical. The minimal option involved discarding reference to “the effect of lactation” and extending the age limit of the victim to two years, a proposal supported by evidence heard by the Victorian Law Reform Commission that most infanticide cases occur within two years of birth.³⁸⁹ The moderate option went further by also including disturbance of the mind arising from circumstances consequent upon birth, as well as the effects of birth, and by requiring a causal link between the disturbance of the mother's mind and the killing.³⁹⁰ The radical option for reform involved abandoning the age limit of the child victim and extending the offence/defence to persons in a caring relationship with the child at the time of the killing other than the biological mother.³⁹¹ This last option begs the question: why could such killers not be dealt with satisfactorily using the defence of diminished responsibility?

The Law Commission's provisional proposal was the adoption of the minimal option for reform. However, following a full consultation exercise it came to the decision, informed by responses and research from specialists in the field, that infanticide should be retained without amendment, and would apply as a defence to both first and second degree murder.³⁹² This recommendation was based on medical evidence that the incidence of certain psychiatric disorders is higher following childbirth.³⁹³ In addition, some evidence, albeit inconclusive, was submitted that there is a connection between lactation and psychosis.³⁹⁴ It is notable, however, that not all experts were in favour of maintaining the separate offence/defence, and some, including the Royal College of Psychiatrists, thought that it ought to be merged with diminished responsibility.³⁹⁵

This recommendation that the substantive law remain unchanged was adopted by the Government, who agreed that the law works satisfactorily in practice.³⁹⁶ What of the problems raised in the case of Kai-Whitewind? The Law Commission recommended, in attempting to address the Court of Appeal's concern in that case, that a new procedure should be introduced in potential infanticide cases. This would allow the trial judge in the case of a woman convicted of murder of her child of the relevant age to order a thorough medical examination of the defendant in order that an appeal might be granted if evidence supporting a charge of infanticide is found.³⁹⁷ Wells concludes that rather than substantive or procedural reform being capable of meeting such concerns, "[o]ne ... comes back to the notion of improving the quality and understanding of forensic evidence as the core, unfulfilled task for the legal system".³⁹⁸ These calls have gone unheeded. Loughnan suggests the following explanation:

"In the current era, in the absence of an expertmedical consensus, the 'strange' doctrine of infanticide is sustained by a lay or non-expert knowledge about the interrelation of gender, childbirth and 'madness', which underpins legal evaluation of infanticidal women and their acts."³⁹⁹

VII. Causing or Allowing the Death of a Child or Vulnerable Adult

In considering the options for reform available in relation to the law on infanticide, the Law Commission noted that “a comprehensive review of infanticide cannot be considered without looking at recent legislative changes on domestic violence”.⁴⁰⁰ It was referring to the offence created by the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE, CRIME AND VICTIMS ACT 2004 s.5:

8–165

- “(1) A person (‘D’) is guilty of an offence if—
- (a) a child or vulnerable adult (‘V’) dies as a result of the unlawful act of a person who—
 - (i) was a member of the same household as V, and
 - (ii) had frequent contact with him,
 - (b) D was such a person at the time of that act,
 - (c) at that time there was a significant risk of serious physical harm being caused to V by the unlawful act of such a person, and
 - (d) either D was the person whose act caused V’s death or —
 - (i) D was, or ought to have been, aware of the risk mentioned in paragraph (c),
 - (ii) D failed to take such steps as he could reasonably have been expected to take to protect V from the risk, and
 - (iii) the act occurred in circumstances of the kind that D foresaw or ought to have foreseen ...
- (7) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years or to a fine, or to both.”

Why was such an offence deemed to be necessary and why would a charge of manslaughter not accommodate such behaviour?

LAW COMMISSION NO.282,
CHILDREN: THEIR NON-ACCIDENTAL
DEATH OR SERIOUS INJURY
(CRIMINAL TRIALS) (2003), PARAS
1.1–1.2:

8–166

“1.1 ... The recommendations in this Report are intended to address a problem which has been recognised for many years ... It can be exemplified at its most intractable in the following situation: A child is cared for by two people (both parents, or a parent and another person). The child dies and medical evidence suggests that the death occurred as a result of ill-treatment. It is not clear which of the two carers is directly responsible for the ill-treatment which caused death. It is clear that at least one of the carers is guilty of a very serious criminal offence but it is possible that the ill-treatment occurred while one carer was asleep, or out of the room.

1.2 As the law stands, as a result of the Court of Appeal’s ruling in Lane and Lane it is likely that a trial in such a case would not proceed beyond a defence submission of ‘no case to answer’. As a result, neither parent can be convicted, and one or other parent, or both, might well have literally ‘got away with murder’. It should be remembered that even though one parent may not have struck the fatal blow or blows, he or she may be culpable, as an accessory, either through having participated in the killing actively or by failing to protect the child. In many cases of this type it is difficult, or impossible, to prove even this beyond reasonable doubt and therefore neither parent can be convicted.”

8–167

The offence provides that any parent or carer has a duty not only to refrain from abusing the child, but to prevent anyone else within the household from doing so. However, this duty is not new; the offence of child neglect or cruelty under the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 s.1 would apply in such a case, with a maximum penalty of ten years’ imprisonment. The question is, should someone who has failed to prevent the abuse of their child which has ended in that child's death be liable for a more serious offence because of their failure to prevent that death?

It should be remembered that, in Lowe,⁴⁰¹ it was held that an offence of child neglect, as an omission, cannot amount to the unlawful act on which a conviction for constructive manslaughter can be based. It might be possible, however, that a parent or carer could be liable under the species of gross negligence manslaughter. Whilst there have been reported cases of neglect of vulnerable family members resulting in manslaughter convictions,⁴⁰² such cases are rare. It is not entirely clear, however, why such cases are not prosecuted in this way, and why the statutory offence will succeed where gross negligence manslaughter would fail. Parents will satisfy the requirement of owing a duty of care to their child, in accordance with Adomako.⁴⁰³ The question is whether they breached that duty either by abusing the child themselves or by allowing someone else to do so. If this is established, the issue then becomes whether the breach caused the death of the child. This is where the difficulty arises in relation to manslaughter. If one parent omitted to prevent another parent harming their child, can that first parent be said to have caused the child's death? The statutory offence makes provision for an alternative of allowing the child's death to avoid this problem. As an alternative to the defendant causing death themselves, he may be liable under subs.(1)(d) on the basis that he knew of, or should have known of, the significant risk of serious physical harm and failed to take reasonable steps to protect the victim.⁴⁰⁴

Are parents who fail to prevent abuse directed at their children sufficiently culpable to warrant punishment for an offence of homicide (particularly given that they will probably be suffering tremendously from the loss of that child)? The mens rea requirement can be said to amount to mere negligence.⁴⁰⁵ The Court of Appeal has, however, been unhelpful in its interpretation of the mens rea requirement. In Khan, it stated that in relation to the requirement that D either was, or ought to have been, aware of the risk of serious physical harm:

“The objective therefore is to bring within the ambit of the offence, not only those who are actually aware of the risk and foresaw the unlawful act, but those who chose to close their eyes to a risk of which they ought to have been aware, and which they ought to have foreseen.”⁴⁰⁶

As noted by Ormerod, however, this confuses wilful blindness, where D has some awareness of the risk, with negligence, where D need not have any awareness provided that the reasonable person would.⁴⁰⁷ This is misleading, given that s.5(1)(d)(i) does not require any awareness of the risk.

8–168

Much of the terminology used in s.5 is rather woolly. Herring identifies as many as 11 ambiguities within the definition of the offence.⁴⁰⁸ The question of what amounts to a “significant risk” of serious physical harm was addressed by the Court of Appeal in Stephens; Mujuru.⁴⁰⁹ Whilst it was clear to the court that the trial judge had set the bar too low by interpreting “significant risk” to mean “more than minimal”, the court went no further in giving its own interpretation other than stating that it should be given its ordinary meaning by the jury. In Khan, the Court of Appeal addressed a number of other issues of definition within s.5 in the context of the death of a vulnerable adult, rather than a child. First, in relation to the requirement that D was a member of the same household as V, it noted that this was a question of fact and that any adult living in the household was a member of it, but that visitors to the house, including carers, were not members of the household for the purposes of the provision. The judgment appears to have narrowed the offence somewhat in stating that even if D lived in the same house as V, s.5 would not apply unless D came into frequent contact with V.⁴¹⁰ Only if the jury was sure that a particular D had frequent contact with V should they go on to consider the question of mens rea in s.5(1)(d). Secondly, in relation to the requirement that the deceased’s death occur in circumstances of the kind that D foresaw or ought to have foreseen, it was noted that this does not mean that the circumstances of which D ought to have been aware need be identical to those that occurred, only that they are of the same kind.⁴¹¹

In some cases of child abuse, the parent is arguably just as blameworthy in standing by and watching her partner abuse the child as if she had abused the child herself. But what of the abused woman who is too afraid to intervene when her husband is chastising their child for fear that he could turn on her and do worse? Some may argue that a mother should sacrifice herself for her child, but it is difficult to see that if she fails to do so she should be charged with having caused or allowed the child's death. In the first case resulting in conviction for the new offence, the facts were such that the case seems to fall outside the offence's concern. A young mother was convicted of the offence after she left her baby with her partner, who had previously injured the baby.⁴¹² He was convicted of murder. This was not, then, a case in which it was impossible to prove which partner was the killer. The mother was convicted of allowing her baby's death, in addition to the offence of child cruelty. It is uncertain that she warranted the former conviction, particularly given the judge's description of her as "a decent young woman who was in a vulnerable position". She received a two-year community punishment order.

8-169

Whilst the new offence will catch within its remit some who are victims of abuse themselves it may well overcome the practical problems and evidential obstacles involved in prosecuting those who systematically abuse their children and refuse to give evidence against each other at trial. The main driving force behind the reform seems to have been the shocking statistics that three children under the age of ten suffer death or serious injury every week in England and Wales, and that only a small proportion of these result in a conviction for murder, manslaughter or one of the more serious non-fatal offences.⁴¹³ The kind of case for which the offence was designed is the now infamous case of Baby P, or Peter as his name was later revealed to be, in which a toddler died after ten months of abuse and was the victim of broken ribs and a broken spinal cord.⁴¹⁴ Three adults were convicted of causing or allowing his death under s.5: his mother, her boyfriend and her boyfriend's brother, Jason Owen. In Jason Owen's appeal against sentence Hughes LJ noted that after the nine-week trial:

“It was impossible at the end for the jury to resolve the question of who had inflicted those injuries which had been maliciously done, as some of them clearly must have been. No defendant as a result was convicted of either murder or manslaughter.”⁴¹⁵

Jason Owen had had his charge of murder withdrawn from the jury by the judge when the evidence showed that it was either Peter’s mother or her boyfriend who had inflicted the violence upon him.

Although there will no doubt continue to be cases where a mother is either complicit in violence towards her child, or even where she is herself guilty of inflicting violence on him, such cases are likely to be rare. Herring argues that the problem with s.5 is that it deflects attention away from the main problems faced by society in such cases and makes criminals out of mothers who are themselves victims of domestic violence.

JONATHON HERRING, “MUM’S NOT THE WORD: AN ANALYSIS OF SECTION 5” IN C. M. V. CLARKSON AND S. CUNNINGHAM (EDS), CRIMINAL LIABILITY FOR NON-AGGRESSIVE DEATH (2008), PP.152–153:

8–170

“The motivation behind this offence is undoubtedly good. It is designed to protect children’s rights. However, the offence must be viewed in the context within which it operates. Evidence from other jurisdictions indicates that it is primarily used against women who fail to protect their children from their violent male partners. [I have] argued that its use in such cases is highly problematic. It tends to lead to prosecution of women who are themselves the victims of domestic violence. It assumes escape routes from the violence which are either not there or are not reasonable to expect the woman to take. Further, the offences are often based on a glamorised view of motherhood which regards the mother in an idealistic way as an all-knowing all-sacrificing protector. The prosecution of women who fail to live up to this image can lead to the focus of legal and public attention not being on the abuser but on the mother who 'left her children to die'. The offence also disguises the state's responsibility for abused and endangered children. The offence was promoted as the way of protecting children from abuse and violence. The way to do that is not section 5, but an effective and thorough raft of measures to protect women and children from violence. For the state to prosecute a mother who has been seeking to protect her children and herself from a violent man when the state has done so little to protect them cannot be justified. The time and effort in prosecuting abused women who fail to protect their children would be better spent on ensuring there was effective and adequate protection of women and children from violence."

8-171

Few cases were initially prosecuted when the offence first came into force, with a sudden upsurge occurring in 2013/14. The most recent figures show there were 35 prosecutions in the year October 2015–September 2016.⁴¹⁶ It should be noted that the offence also applies to the death of vulnerable adults, as well as children. The death of a vulnerable adult may involve an equal or even higher level of blameworthiness than in cases where a child has been killed, as indicated by the severe sentence passed in the first reported case of allowing the death of a vulnerable adult. In Liu; Tan,⁴¹⁷ T was convicted of allowing his wife's death, whilst his mistress, L, was convicted of manslaughter and inflicting grievous bodily harm with intent. T's wife had the mental age of a 12-year-old and had been kept as a slave by T and L. She had frequently been beaten by L and died from hypothermia after being left outside in the back yard overnight. T's sentence of six years' imprisonment was upheld by the Court of Appeal, as was L's sentence of nine years' imprisonment for manslaughter. In the case of Khan,⁴¹⁸ the question of what constitutes vulnerability in an adult for the purposes of s.5 was addressed. In that case, the victim had no disability or illness, but was isolated in the family home, speaking no English and not having any local friends. The Court of Appeal applied a broad interpretation of “vulnerability”, suggesting that it might include temporary vulnerability and stating that it could arise from the deceased’s dependence on others. Ormerod notes that this raises problems relating to the mens rea of the offence, since D might be under a duty to protect V even though D does not know that V is in fact a vulnerable adult.⁴¹⁹ Arguably the offence, whilst being based on laudable aims, is just too broad.

Cases involving vulnerable adults might also risk criminalising those who are the victim of domestic violence in the same way that Herring fears cases involving children may do. Women such as the defendants in Khan who live within the same household as the deceased might themselves be victims of domestic violence and find themselves under threat if they try to intervene to protect the deceased. The Court of Appeal in Khan sought to allay such fears by noting that whether the defendant has taken reasonable steps to protect the deceased under s.5(1)(d)(ii) will depend on the defendant’s own personal position. It was suggested that if one of the defendants themselves had been experiencing violence at the hands of her brother (the husband of the deceased), she would not be expected to protect the deceased.⁴²⁰ It is not clear, however, whether this addresses Herring’s concerns in relation to mothers who fail to intervene to protect their own children, and are faced with a criminal conviction in addition to the loss of their child. Ashworth is of the opinion that there was a good reason for creating some such offence as that under s.5, but that the offence as drafted is much wider than necessary to cover such cases, and raises questions about how many people at which it might be aimed are unaware of its existence.⁴²¹ The offence, however, does have its supporters, such as Morrison, who argues that “[t]he current framework is the fairest and most appropriate way of determining the liability of defendants who have been victims of domestic violence”,⁴²² since she interprets Khan as applying a test of “qualified objective” reasonableness, meaning that D’s abuse can be taken into account when judging whether she did what could have been reasonably expected of her.

VIII. Vehicular Homicide

There are five statutory offences of vehicular homicide in English law: causing death by dangerous driving; causing death by careless driving; causing death by careless driving while under the influence of drink or drugs; causing death by unlicensed or uninsured driving; and causing death by disqualified driving.⁴²³ In Government of US v Jennings,⁴²⁴ it was held that that “motor manslaughter” had not been impliedly repealed by the Road Traffic Act 1956 and that causing death by reckless driving (the predecessor of causing death by dangerous driving) coexisted alongside the common law offence. In cases where persons are killed by motor vehicles the prosecution has a choice. It can either charge the defendant with one of these statutory offences, it can charge with manslaughter, or it can, in theory at least, charge both.⁴²⁵ Following Adomako, although, strictly speaking, Lord Mackay’s discussion of vehicular homicide was obiter, it is now clear that whatever the method of killing, the test of gross negligence is to be applied if a manslaughter charge is brought. The jury, having regard to the risk of death involved, should consider whether the conduct of the defendant was so bad in all the circumstances as to amount to a criminal act or omission. Lord Mackay acknowledged that, as a consequence of this, cases of involuntary motor manslaughter will become rare. It is, of course, also possible for a driver to be convicted of manslaughter on the basis of an unlawful and dangerous act if she uses her car as a weapon of assault (by driving directly at the victim in order to cause fear) and in doing so kills.⁴²⁶ Guidance issued by the CPS makes it clear that manslaughter will be the appropriate charge in cases where a motor vehicle has been used as an instrument of attack, but also recognises that there may be some cases in which manslaughter ought to be charged based on gross negligence.

CROWN PROSECUTION SERVICE, ROAD TRAFFIC OFFENCES:
GUIDANCE ON CHARGING OFFENCES ARISING FROM DRIVING INCIDENTS:

”There is a general duty of care on all persons not to do acts imperilling the lives of others. This may mean that a ‘hit and run’ driver might be guilty of manslaughter in certain circumstances. For instance, where a driver fails to stop or to report a collision where he or she knows or ought reasonably to have known that there is a risk of death if no medical assistance is provided to the person who has been hit, it could be argued that the deliberate failure to stop at the scene or report the incident may amount to manslaughter by omission. Consideration should be given to this in appropriate cases where there is clear evidence to satisfy all the ... elements [required in Adomako].
...

Gross negligence manslaughter should not be charged unless there is something to set the case apart from those cases where a statutory offence such as causing death by dangerous driving or causing death by careless driving could be proved. This will normally be evidence to show a very high risk of death, making the case one of the utmost gravity. This is in contrast to the statutory offences where all that is required is evidence that the driving was dangerous and that the manner of driving caused the death of another person.”⁴²⁷

A. CAUSING DEATH BY DANGEROUS DRIVING

1. Introduction

8–174

The Road Traffic Act 1988 s.1, as amended by the Road Traffic Act 1991, provides as follows:

“A person who causes the death of another person by driving a mechanically propelled vehicle dangerously on a road or other public place is guilty of an offence.”

The offence is triable only on indictment and is punishable by a maximum penalty of 14 years’ imprisonment.⁴²⁸

Before 1977, the offence covered causing death by reckless or dangerous driving. In 1977, it was narrowed to causing death by reckless driving.⁴²⁹ The Lawrence test of recklessness, as qualified in Reid, applied. In 1991, this was abolished and replaced by the new offence of causing death by dangerous driving.

2. Rationale of law

8-175

Why is it necessary to have a special offence? Why are such persons not simply charged with manslaughter? Is it less blameworthy to kill another with a motor vehicle than with some other instrument?

SIR BRIAN MACKENNA, “CAUSING DEATH BY RECKLESS OR DANGEROUS DRIVING: A SUGGESTION” [1970] CRIM. L.R. 67:

8-176

“By 1955–56 it was clear to all that prosecutions for motor manslaughter were a failure: juries just would not convict. Different reasons were assigned for their perversity ... ‘The very word “manslaughter” is ugly and is associated in the minds of most people with brawls and sordid offences of various kinds. A jury is therefore reluctant to convict of this offence a person who is obviously very decent, and about whom the jury may think “there but for the grace of God, go I”’ (Mr. Molson, Hansard, HC Vol.534 cols 782–783). For those who favoured this diagnosis the remedy seemed obvious: a new offence of causing death by reckless driving ... punishable by a maximum of five years’ imprisonment.”

SALLY LLOYD-BOSTOCK, “THE ORDINARY MAN, AND THE PSYCHOLOGY OF ATTRIBUTING CAUSES AND RESPONSIBILITY ” (1979) 42 M.L.R. 143, 156–157:

8-177

“[It has been pointed out] that the more relevant a particular type of accident becomes to the perceiver, the more he is forced to find ways of avoiding acknowledging that he could be blamed for, as distinct from just injured in, such an accident. He may therefore be expected to attribute less blame in accidents which are situationally relevant to himself. For example, a motorist may be more lenient in his judgment about someone involved in a road accident. As well as situational relevance, a misfortune may be personally relevant, i.e. the actor or victim may be similar to the perceiver. Similarity to oneself has often been found to relate to empathy and liking and to a tendency to judge another’s actions more leniently ... [Another possibility is that where] the judger can identify with an actor and his act, he is more likely to perceive the situation as if he were himself the actor and hence assign less personal responsibility.”

8–178

This attitude to drivers who kill appears to be changing. Road safety charities and victims’ groups such as Brake and RoadPeace have been calling for drivers to be charged with manslaughter and have the support of some national newspapers. In December 2016, the Government consulted on the question of whether the maximum penalty for causing death by dangerous driving should be raised to life imprisonment, in line with manslaughter.⁴³⁰ The argument is that whilst the number of road deaths has been declining in recent years,⁴³¹ it still remains unacceptable, and cases need to be treated more seriously, with penalties reflecting the fact that death has been caused. In 2004 there were 3,221 persons killed on the roads⁴³² yet in that year only 405 people were charged with causing death by dangerous driving.⁴³³ This led some to argue that prosecutors were not proceeding with charges of causing death by dangerous driving in as many cases as they should, because they were undercharging or accepting a plea to careless driving in place of a charge of causing death by dangerous driving that should have been proceeded with.⁴³⁴ Despite such claims, there is little evidence supporting the view that cases which should be charged as causing death by dangerous driving slip through the net.⁴³⁵ Others have, in the past at least, argued that the special offence is in fact not needed: prosecutions should simply be brought under the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.2 for dangerous driving, punishable by a maximum of two years' imprisonment. Manslaughter could be charged in the very worst cases.

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, 14TH REPORT,
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON,
CMND.7844 (1980), PARA.142:

8-179

“We consider that the fact that death occurs in motoring cases should not enable a graver charge than reckless driving to be preferred unless the facts are that the full mental element appropriate to manslaughter can be proved. The real mischief where that mental element cannot be proved is the very bad driving, and the fact that it causes death should be treated as no more than an aggravating factor of that road traffic offence for sentencing purposes in appropriate cases.”

8-180

This is the simple view that it is the bad driving that is reprehensible and the defendant should be blamed for that. The fact that death has been caused is “chance” and should be irrelevant in terms of substantive criminal liability.⁴³⁶ This approach was not adopted by the North Report nor accepted by the Government.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT AND HOME OFFICE, ROAD TRAFFIC LAW
REVIEW REPORT (THE NORTH
REPORT) (1988), PARAS 6.5-6.9, 6.23-6.27:

8-181

“6.5 ... The detailed arguments for abolishing the offence [causing death by reckless driving] (excluding the argument that all such cases should be charged as manslaughter) included the following:

there is a danger that the existence of the offence would be seen as downgrading cases where there is no death or injury;
it is improper to create greater liability based on consequences which may to a degree be fortuitous, resulting for example from the non-availability at the time of medical help or the presence of a pedestrian who happens to be struck;
although the offence is not unique in the fact that its seriousness depends on the results of unintended conduct (the whole of involuntary manslaughter being so based), it is desirable to limit the number of such instances;
why should the road user continue to be singled out as the only kind of person whose act causing death constitutes a separate offence?
it is wrong, in England and Wales, to have a complete overlap with the offence of manslaughter;
the law takes no account of injury short of death as a constituent element of an offence; the maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment for reckless driving is adequate in the vast majority of reckless driving cases involving death; and if the case is very bad, then manslaughter or culpable homicide should be charged.

6.6 The arguments in favour of retaining a causing death offence concentrated more on practicality and on public expectations of the law. They included the following:

it is generally accepted in the law that consequences can affect the nature of an offence, as may be illustrated by the different offences of murder and attempted murder, and murder where there is no intent to kill but where there is intent to cause grievous bodily harm which has resulted in death;
the public sense of justice requires that the very bad driver who has killed should be guilty of a more serious offence;
the seriousness of the offence (and penalty) is desirable in order to have a deterrent effect;
juries are reluctant to convict of manslaughter in most causing death cases. Death should be singled out for special treatment because it is the most serious consequence of a criminal act, and so doing would exemplify the concern of the law for the sanctity of life;
though logic might suggest that consequences should be irrelevant, public opinion is strongly in favour of the retention of such an offence;

the case for the retention of an offence of causing death by bad driving is strong if there is no longer a complete overlap with the offence of manslaughter or culpable homicide;
outside the motoring sphere, reckless acts may amount either to no offence at all or, if death happens to result, to manslaughter or culpable homicide; so consequences should be no less relevant in the road traffic context;
if someone drives so badly as to be reckless, the consequences are not 'fortuitous', for the driver has created a real risk of death or injury;
if there continues to be some overlap between causing death by reckless driving and manslaughter, it would be strange to be able to take consequences into account in the latter but not in the former ...

8-182

6.9 Taking all these arguments into consideration, we have concluded that, on balance, an offence of causing death by very bad driving, however defined, should be retained. Two main factors have influenced our thinking. To abolish the offence in the absence of compelling reasons for doing so would mean that some cases of very bad driving were not dealt with with appropriate seriousness. Repeal of s.1 would be seen as a down-grading of bad driving as a criminal activity. This is not a message which we wish to convey. Secondly, though logic might pull us towards arguments in favour of abolition, neither English nor Scots law in fact relies entirely on intent as the basis for offences. There seems to be a strong public acceptance that, if the consequence of a culpable act is death, then this consequence should lead to a more serious charge being brought than if death had not been the result. We concur with this view. We recommend that a separate causing death offence be retained, but that it be reformulated in terms consistent with our recommended very bad driving offence.

6.27 We have considered carefully the merits of recommending the introduction of injury related offences, taking account of the disquiet expressed over conduct which maims but does not kill. We recognise that some very serious injuries are caused by bad drivers, and that these can in many respects be considered to be as bad as causing a death. We have, however, concluded that the arguments in favour of the injury offences ... are not sufficiently compelling to outweigh the disadvantages of extending consequence linked offences to injuries as well as to death. The special emphasis which society places on the wrong created by causing a death justifies the retention of an offence from which death results, but we do not recommend the introduction of new offences based on the causing of injury.”

8–183

As seen in Ch.7 above, a new offence of causing serious injury by dangerous driving was created by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, carrying a maximum penalty of five years’ imprisonment. It appears that society no longer places such a special emphasis on death, raising questions as to what further offences might be created to penalise the causing of injury through negligence.⁴³⁷

3. The law

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 (As AMENDED BY THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1991) s.2A:

8–184

“2A. Meaning of dangerous driving.

(1) For the purposes of sections 1 and 2 above a person is to be regarded as driving dangerously if (and, subject to subsection (2) below, only if)—

(a) the way he drives falls far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver, and

(b) it would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving in that way would be dangerous.

(2) A person is also to be regarded as driving dangerously for the purposes of sections 1 and

2 above if it would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving the vehicle in its current state would be dangerous.

(3) In subsections (1) and (2) above ‘dangerous’ refers to danger either of injury to any person or of serious damage to property; and in determining for the purposes of those subsections what would be expected of, or obvious to, a competent and careful driver in a particular case, regard shall be had not only to the circumstances of which he could be expected to be aware but also to any circumstances shown to have been within the knowledge of the accused.

(4) In determining for the purposes of subsection (2) above the state of a vehicle, regard may be had to anything attached to or carried on or in it and to the manner in which it is attached or carried.”

THE ROAD USER AND THE LAW (THE GOVERNMENT’S PROPOSALS FOR REFORM OF ROAD TRAFFIC LAW)
CMND.576 (1989), PARAS 2.6–2.9:

8–185

“2.6 There are already helpful precedents in Scottish case law which it is intended to follow in formulating the new section 2 offence. It will have two ingredients:

- (a) a standard of driving which falls far below that expected of a competent and careful driver; and
- (b) the driving must carry a potential or actual danger of physical injury or serious damage to property.

2.7 The standard of driving will be judged in absolute terms, taking no account of factors such as inexperience, age or disability (though such factors are relevant in sentencing). It is not intended that the driver who merely makes a careless mistake of a kind which any driver might make from time to time should be regarded as falling far below the standard expected of a competent and careful driver.

2.8 The danger must be one which a competent and careful driver would have appreciated or observed. It means any danger of injury (however minor) to a person, or of serious damage to property. It will not be necessary to establish that any person or property was actually endangered. It will be sufficient for the prosecution to establish that a competent and careful driver would have appreciated that some person or property might be endangered by the accused's manner of driving.

2.9 The requirements will be met if the state of the vehicle driven is such that a competent and careful driver would not drive at all. They will not be met simply by the physical condition of the driver, which will be dealt with by the proposed amendment to the offence of driving while unfit. However, if an unfit driver drives dangerously as defined above he will be guilty of the reformulated reckless driving offence, and his unfitness will not be an excuse.”

8–186

The emphasis is thus on the objective nature of the driving rather than on the defendant's state of mind.⁴³⁸ However, one element of subjectivity is imported. Under s.2A(3) if the defendant knows of circumstances rendering the driving dangerous (for example, a defect in the car)—even though the driving was not obviously dangerous—such knowledge can be imputed to the competent and careful driver.

What is the difference between this test of dangerous driving and that required for gross negligence manslaughter as laid down in Adomako (apart from the fact that causing death by dangerous driving can only be committed on a road or other public place whereas manslaughter can be committed anywhere)? The most important distinction is that for manslaughter the driving must have involved a risk of death: it must be “not only dangerous but inherently lifethreatening”.⁴³⁹ However, given the potential danger of all motor vehicles, “measuring the risk to determine whether it was one of death or one of mere physical injury is surely a near impossible task, given that death did in fact occur”.⁴⁴⁰

4. Sentencing

8–187

Following the enactment of the Road Safety Act 2006, the Sentencing Guidelines Council issued a new definitive guideline to replace the previous judicial guideline in the case of Cooksley.⁴⁴¹ The maximum penalty for causing death by dangerous driving is 14 years' imprisonment. The guidelines set out three levels of seriousness, each with their own starting point and sentencing range. Level 1 covers the most serious offences:

“encompassing driving that involved a deliberate decision to ignore (or a flagrant disregard for) the rules of the road and an apparent disregard for the great danger being caused to others” and has a starting point of eight years with a range of seven to 14 years. Level 2 covers driving that created a “substantial” risk of danger, with a starting point of five years and a range of four to seven years. Level 3 covers driving that created a “significant” risk of danger, with a starting point of three years and a range of two to five years.⁴⁴²

Such sentencing levels raise critical questions relating to “motor manslaughter”. When is such a charge appropriate? When cases of killing with cars result in convictions for manslaughter, the sentence is unlikely to exceed the maximum available on conviction for causing death by dangerous driving.⁴⁴³ In “Attorney-General’s Reference (No.111 of 2006)”,⁴⁴⁴ the Court of Appeal concluded that an analysis of authorities at first instance of cases of vehicular manslaughter suggested a range of between four and seven years’ imprisonment. This corresponds with level 2 of the SGC’s range for causing death by dangerous driving. That in itself suggests that there is a mismatch between charging practice and sentencing practice. If the most serious cases of driving causing death are prosecuted as gross negligence manslaughter, as the CPS policy suggests, such cases should not end up being sentenced to a lesser term of imprisonment than if they had been charged as causing death by dangerous driving.⁴⁴⁵ A 2013 case of constructive manslaughter where a car was used as “a weapon of revenge” sought to apply the sentencing guidelines for causing death by dangerous driving, meaning that a ceiling of 14 years’ imprisonment was imposed in sentencing for manslaughter. The sentence of eight-and-a-half years’ imprisonment was upheld.⁴⁴⁶ Whilst this suggests that there is little to be gained in terms of sentencing in the CPS charging manslaughter rather than the statutory offence, it can be argued that manslaughter ought to be charged in such cases in order that the defendant be labelled according to his wrongdoing.

B. CAUSING DEATH BY CARELESS DRIVING

8-188

The arguments against the offence of causing death by dangerous driving are even more forceful when applied to this offence, created by the Road Safety Act 2006.

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 s.2B (As AMENDED BY THE ROAD SAFETY ACT 2006):

8-189

“2B Causing death by careless, or inconsiderate, driving

A person who causes the death of another person by driving a mechanically propelled vehicle on a road or other public place without due care and attention, or without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road or place, is guilty of an offence.”

8-190

This is a constructive crime that can be committed in one of two ways. Either the defendant must have driven carelessly (without due care and attention) or inconsiderately (without reasonable consideration for other persons) and in doing so caused death. The Road Safety Act 2006 introduces a statutory definition of careless and inconsiderate driving, which had previously been governed by case law.⁴⁴⁷

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 s.3ZA (As AMENDED BY THE ROAD SAFETY ACT 2006):

8-191

“3AZ Meaning of careless, or inconsiderate, driving

(1) This section has effect for the purposes of sections 2B⁴⁴⁸ and 3⁴⁴⁹ above and section 3A⁴⁵⁰ below.

(2) A person is to be regarded as driving without due care and attention if (and only if) the way he drives falls below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver.

(3) In determining for the purposes of subsection (2) above what would be expected of a careful and competent driver in a particular case, regard shall be had not only to the circumstances of which he could be expected to be aware but also to any circumstances shown to have been within the knowledge of the accused.

(4) person is to be regarded as driving without reasonable consideration for other persons only if those persons are inconvenienced by his driving.”

8–192

It is unlikely that many, if any, cases will be prosecuted as causing death by inconsiderate, rather than careless driving.⁴⁵¹

The offence of causing death by careless driving is triable either way, with a maximum penalty of five years' imprisonment following conviction at the Crown Court. The reason why this offence was created is that it was perceived that a gap existed in the legislation for careless drivers who kill. Before this offence was created, such drivers could only be punished for careless driving which was punishable by a fine and penalty points on the defendant's licence. Where a driver was prosecuted for causing death by dangerous driving, but that prosecution failed because the jury did not find the defendant had fallen far below the standard of the competent driver, or because the Crown accepted a plea of guilty to careless driving, the defendant would escape a custodial sentence. Victims' groups put pressure on the Government to change the law following cases in which it was thought that drivers had received a conviction for careless driving when they should have been convicted of causing death by dangerous driving and deserved a prison sentence.

The North Report of 1988 espoused the view that careless driving is not serious enough for it to be fair to give much weight to its consequences but in trying to head-off such claims when it proposed the new offence, the Government stated that “in principle, consequences are as relevant to the culpability of careless drivers as they are to drivers guilty of dangerous driving”.⁴⁵² Little consideration was given to the question of why it is justified to punish careless drivers who kill whilst other methods of killing usually require gross negligence on the part of the defendant before liability for homicide is incurred.⁴⁵³

This offence extends the law too far. Careless driving is an offence of negligence, but the degree of negligence required is below that required for dangerous driving. In advance of the offence coming into force the Court of Appeal stated:

“absent the consumption of alcohol, careless driving on its own almost always involves culpability at the lowest possible scale. In one sense, every driver is careless when he makes a mistake. Every driver, even the best, and most experienced, and normally careful, does so from time to time.”⁴⁵⁴

8–193

Most acts of “momentary inattention” behind the wheel will luckily have no adverse effects and will likely not even be noticed by those involved. But where circumstances are such that the result of momentary inattention is catastrophic, a prosecution for causing death by careless driving is likely to ensue.⁴⁵⁵ In cases of fatal collisions involving carelessness there may be a number of factors contributing to the collision and death, including the carelessness of the driver who dies.⁴⁵⁶ Is it fair that any death be attributed to the driver who was lucky to survive? Arguably, in allowing this, luck plays too great a role in determining liability.

The Sentencing Guidelines Council’s guidance on sentencing in cases of causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving dictate that those cases arising from momentary inattention where there are no aggravating factors should be sentenced to a community order. At the top end where a case falls just short of dangerous driving, the starting point is 15 months’ custody, with a range of 36 weeks to three years’ custody. All other cases would fall within the middle range with a starting point of 36 weeks' custody and a range of a community order at the low end up to two years' custody at the high end.⁴⁵⁷ Although one of the motives behind the creation of the new offence was to allow careless drivers who kill to be sent to prison to satisfy victims' needs for justice to be done, it may be that victims remain disappointed under the new law.⁴⁵⁸

C. CAUSING DEATH BY CARELESS DRIVING WHEN UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF DRINK OR DRUGS

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 s.3A:

8-194

“3A. Causing death by careless driving when under influence of drink or drugs.

(1) If a person causes the death of another person by driving a mechanically propelled vehicle on a road or other public place without due care and attention, or without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road or place, and—

- (a) he is, at the time when he is driving, unfit to drive through drink or drugs, or
- (b) he has consumed so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath, blood or urine at that time exceeds the prescribed limit, or
- (ba) he has in his body a specified controlled drug and the proportion of it in his blood or urine at that time exceeds the specified limit for that drug, or
- (c) he is, within 18 hours after that time, required to provide a specimen in pursuance of section 7 of this Act, but without reasonable excuse fails to provide it,
- (d) he is required by a constable to give his permission for a laboratory test of a specimen of blood taken from him under section 7A of this Act, but without reasonable excuse fails to do so, he is guilty of an offence.

- (2) For the purposes of this section a person shall be taken to be unfit to drive at any time when his ability to drive properly is impaired.
- (3) Subsection (1)(b), (ba), (c) and (d) above shall not apply in relation to a person driving a mechanically propelled vehicle other than a motor vehicle.”

This offence is punishable by a maximum of 14 years’ imprisonment.⁴⁵⁹ Why was it introduced?

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT AND HOME OFFICE, ROAD TRAFFIC LAW
REVIEW REPORT (THE NORTH REPORT) (1988), PARAS 6.18–6.23:

8–195

“Our consultation identified a strongly held view ... that bad drivers who have been drinking and who cause death are frequently dealt with too leniently. Under present legislation a driver who is over the prescribed alcohol limit ... and whose driving causes an accident in which someone is killed may often be charged with only an alcohol or drugs offence, or with this offence coupled with one of careless driving ... [P]rosecuting authorities will, we are told, often settle for a drink driving charge as being easier to prove ... [There is a] growing concern among the public over drinking and driving and in particular over drinking drivers who kill. There is understandable revulsion that innocent lives can be lost in such a fashion. We share these anxieties ... [T]he availability of such a specific offence would be of real value in further marking out the dangers to the community of drinking and driving ...

[One] alternative might be to have an absolute offence of killing someone while driving with more than the legal limit of alcohol in the body or while unfit to drive through drink or drugs ... Under such an offence it would be enough to prove involvement by a drinking driver in an accident where a person was killed ... [T]here are problems with this type of approach. There is no doubt that drivers should not take so much alcohol as to put them over the legal limit; but it is easy to visualise circumstances where an accident leading to a death may have occurred and yet the drinking driver was not in any way to blame. Where, for example, a drunken pedestrian dashes out in front of a car in circumstances such that no driver could have avoided him, it would seem unduly harsh to charge the driver not only with the drink offence but also with a new causing death offence.

The final possibility which we have considered is that of an offence in which two elements would have to be proved. The first would be that the driver was over the legal alcohol limit or unfit to drive through drink or drugs; the second that there had been a level of bad driving amounting at least to driving without due care. By including a requirement to prove that some legally bad driving had occurred, such a formulation would protect from prosecution for this new offence drivers who had indeed been over the alcohol limit or who were otherwise unfit but the standard of whose driving had had no part in causing the death.”

8-196

Like causing death by dangerous driving, this offence eschews the view that the focus ought to be solely on the quality of the driving. As in so many areas of criminal law, the degree of resulting harm is critical in determining the extent of liability and punishment. The aggravating factor, in comparison with the new offence of causing death by careless driving, is that the defendant was under the influence of drink or drugs and, having chosen to drive in such a condition, can be said to be more blameworthy.

The Sentencing Guidelines Council’s guidelines for sentencing the offence are rather complex, setting out nine levels of seriousness, dependent on a combination of the amount of alcohol in the defendant’s breath and the level of carelessness displayed.⁴⁶⁰ The current legal limit is 35 micrograms of alcohol in 100ml of breath or 80mg in 100ml of blood. Other European countries have a limit of 50mg in 100ml of blood or lower but, despite a report recommending that England and Wales follow suit and lower the limit,⁴⁶¹ the Government has decided to leave it unchanged. The one change that has come about more recently is that a new offence of driving or being in charge of a motor vehicle with concentration of specified controlled drug above specified limit⁴⁶² has created along the same lines of drink-driving, giving rise to the insertion of (1)(ba) into s.3A Road Traffic Act 1988 (see above). This enables a simple urine or blood test to establish whether D has been driving under the influence of drugs, in the same way as tests are conducted to detect alcohol, and for D to be prosecuted for the causing death offence when this is coupled with evidence that D drove carelessly and caused death.

D. CAUSING DEATH BY UNLICENSED, DISQUALIFIED OR UNINSURED DRIVING

8–197

Under the Road Safety Act 2006 a new offence of causing death by unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured driving was created. Within a few years, it was clear that the version of the offence based on disqualified driving was deemed to be far more serious, and it was separated from the other forms of the offence to create a more serious offence.

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 s.3ZB:

8–198

“3ZB Causing death by driving: unlicensed or uninsured drivers

A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he causes the death of another person by driving a motor vehicle on a road and, at the time when he is driving, the circumstances are such that he is committing an offence under—

(a) section 87(1) of this Act (driving otherwise than in accordance with a licence), ...

(c) section 143 of this Act (using motor vehicle while uninsured or unsecured against third party risks).”

This offence is triable either way and punishable by a maximum of two years’ imprisonment following conviction at the Crown

ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1988 s.3ZC:

8-199

”3ZC Causing death by driving: disqualified drivers

A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he or she—

- (a) causes the death of another person by driving a motor vehicle on a road, and
- (b) at that time, is committing an offence under section 103(1)(b) of this Act (driving while disqualified).”

8-200

This offence was inserted by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015. It is triable on indictment and punishable by a maximum of ten years’ imprisonment.

Both offences are entirely constructive; the only requirement on the face of the provision is that the defendant’s driving caused death and at the time he was driving whilst either disqualified, uninsured, or without a licence. This offence construction was rejected by the North Report in relation to drink driving in the extract above, where the example of a blameless drunk driver colliding with a pedestrian who ran into the road was provided. However, the Government attempted to justify the allocation of blame in such cases on the basis that the “mere fact of taking a vehicle on a road when disqualified is, in the Government’s view, as negligent of the safety of others as is any example of driving below the standard expected of a competent driver, even if the disqualified driver, at a particular time, is driving at an acceptable standard”.⁴⁶⁴ These arguments can be countered, however.

R. A. DUFF, “WHOSE LUCK IS IT ANYWAY?” IN C. M. V. CLARKSON AND S. CUNNINGHAM (EDS), CRIMINAL LIABILITY FOR NON-

“What justifies increasing the endangerer’s punishment if she causes death is that the causation of death actualises the risk that made her conduct wrongfully dangerous: what we say to her is ‘Look what you have done by your carelessness’. Now it is true that if the unlicensed (or disqualified or uninsured) driver had not been driving, he would not have caused death (at least in that way); and given that he was unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured, it follows that if he had not been driving whilst unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured he would not have caused death. But it is still not true that he caused death by driving whilst unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured, unless it was his being unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured that made his driving especially dangerous. Now there is of course some connection between being unlicensed, or disqualified, and driving dangerously: under an appropriate system, being licensed gives both drivers and others some assurance that drivers are competent to drive safely, and being disqualified is often the result of driving dangerously or being incompetent to drive safely. However, there is no such connection between being uninsured and driving dangerously, because insurance has to do with paying for harm caused rather than with avoiding causing it; and even in the cases of driving when unlicensed or disqualified it is far from clear that the connection is close enough to treat the causation of death as the actualisation of a risk that made the driving wrongful in the first place.”

The Government’s position, as set out in its consultation paper, has been tempered somewhat by the statutory interpretation applied by the Supreme Court in the case of Hughes.⁴⁶⁵ As discussed in Ch.2 above, the previous case of *Williams*⁴⁶⁶ had applied a very broad interpretation of causation to the offence under s.3ZB, which was in line with the Government’s aspirations for the offence. The facts of Hughes involved a defendant whose driving could not be faulted, who was involved with a collision when the deceased, who was fatigued and under the influence of drugs, swerved across the carriageway. The Supreme Court held that while D’s acts were a “but for” cause of death (in that if he had not been driving, the deceased would not have collided with his car and died), his actions could not be the legal cause of death. The offence required that there must be “something which he did or omitted to do by way of driving [the car] which contributed in a more than minimal way to the death⁴⁶⁷” and that there needs to be “something properly to be criticised in the driving of the defendant”.⁴⁶⁸

Quite what is needed in terms of the quality of driving to prove the offence is yet to be seen. The court noted that the driving does not need to be as severe as careless or inconsiderate driving, but there has to be an action or omission that amounts to more than mere presence at the scene. If the driving were to be as bad as careless driving then arguably the defendant ought to be charged under the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.2B. However, in relation to causing death by disqualified driving, which has been removed from s.3ZB and inserted as a separate offence under s.3ZC attracting double the maximum penalty compared to causing death by careless driving, charging practice is likely to be different. The perverse outcome is that a driver whose driving does not fall below the standard of a competent and careful driver may receive a higher sentence than one whose driving is clearly careless. As a result, it is unlikely that the CPS would charge a disqualified driver with causing death by careless driving even if they can prove it, given that change. Research conducted to examine how the new offence under s.3ZB was being utilised soon after it was introduced has found that the offence is often only used as a back-stop to other more serious charges; in eight of 14 cases where the s.3ZB offence was charged it was charged alongside offences under either the RTA 1988 s.1, s.2B or s.3A or the Theft Act s.12A, and the defendant pleaded guilty to those more serious offences.⁴⁶⁹ However, now that s.3ZC is a more serious offence than the one under s.2B it seems likely that there will be an increase in prosecutions for causing death by disqualified driving.

IX. Corporate Manslaughter introduced a new separate homicide offence: corporate manslaughter. This offence is considered in Ch.3 where the criminal liability of corporations for all offences is discussed.

X. The Structure of Homicide Offences

8–204

In England and Wales, there are several categories of homicide. The main distinction is between murder and involuntary manslaughter, a distinction resting on the presence or absence of a mental element, malice aforethought. However, murder is also distinguished from voluntary manslaughter, this distinction being based either on the mental condition of the defendant (diminished responsibility), or on the circumstances of the killing (the “loss of control” defence and suicide pacts). As we have seen, there are four further species of homicide:⁴⁷⁰ infanticide, which refers specifically to the death of a particular type of victim (child under one year of age); the offence under the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.5, which is also defined with reference to the victim (children or vulnerable adults); corporate manslaughter (which can only be committed by organisations); and the various offences of vehicular homicide, which refer to death being caused in a particular manner.

In this section, we shall be concerned with four questions:

1. Why do we distinguish between different categories of homicide?
2. Do we distinguish between these categories with sufficient particularity?
3. On what basis ought such distinctions to be made?
4. Should we abolish these categories and replace them with a single offence of unlawful homicide?

A. RATIONALE OF DISTINCTION BETWEEN DIFFERENT CATEGORIES OF HOMICIDE

Homicides range from cold-blooded, malicious killings to killings not far removed from accidents or killings where there are severe mitigating circumstances, such as fear of serious violence triggering a loss of control. It is necessary to differentiate between these homicides in terms of their perceived seriousness. This differentiation is useful for two purposes:

- (a) Different penalties can be attached for the different categories of homicide. Thus, the fact that murder is perceived as being far more serious than manslaughter is clearly reflected in the sentence: capital punishment before 1965 and mandatory life imprisonment since then, as opposed to a maximum of life imprisonment for manslaughter. Similarly, the fact that the crime of causing death by dangerous driving is perceived as being less serious than manslaughter can be reflected by its sentence of a maximum of 14 years' imprisonment. That said, this grading of offences determined by sentence with murder at its pinnacle has been eroded in recent years, as noted by Norrie: “the 2003 Act⁴⁷¹ has in symbolic terms chipped away at the notion of one, uniquely serious, crime possessing one, uniquely serious, penalty”.⁴⁷²
- (b) Differentiating between homicide offences emphasises the different stigma attached to each and enables us to differentiate between different kinds of moral wrong. For example, the label “murder” emphasises the special stigma attached to that crime. One of the main purposes of the criminal law and punishment is its symbolic value in communicating messages to the public as to what is permissible or not. Different labels are used for different crimes to communicate the degree of rejection of the specific crime. The label “murder” is used to emphasise the “dreadfulness”⁴⁷³ and the “uniquely horrible [nature of the] crime”.⁴⁷⁴ Also, it may have a significant deterrent value.⁴⁷⁵ Abolishing the label “may appear to have the effect of lessening the seriousness of taking life”.⁴⁷⁶ Similar arguments may be put forward to explain why we retain the label “manslaughter” and treat separately the offences of infanticide and vehicular homicide.

T. MORRIS AND L. BLOM-COOPER, A CALENDAR OF MURDER (CRIMINAL HOMICIDE IN ENGLAND SINCE 1957)
(1964), PP.271–272:

8–206

“[W]anton murder is dramatically defined as the most dreadful of crimes, a view which has been upheld by the laws and customs of civilised societies down the ages. The act of murder occupies a unique place in the feelings of men in that it falls into a class of actions the results of which are irreversible ... Around the notion of death a whole series of institutional beliefs and practices have arisen creating a sense of social balance in which the realisation of mortality is incorporated into the fabric of human experience; only thus is death made tolerable.

...

Murder produces a sense of profound social shock—heightened in our own society by dissemination of the details through modern mass media. It can normally be relieved only by some highly dramatic act on the part of the community towards the offender. In days gone by this act was the public imposition of capital punishment; latterly ... the criminal trial and the dramatisation of its preliminaries may be gradually taking its place ... Clearly, it is the special character of murder, the attendant sensationalism of the re-enactment of the killing with its actual risk of imitation, which wide advertisement brings in its trial, that gives murder its quintessential quality—a crime apart.”

8–207

Horder identifies the labelling function of different homicide offences as one of a number of elements distinguishing two competing models of homicide offences. He compares the common law model (encompassing murder and manslaughter) with the regulatory model (including offences such as causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult and the causing death by driving offences).

JEREMY HORDER, HOMICIDE AND

THE POLITICS OF LAW REFORM
(2012), PP.75; 86–87:

8–208

“Common law/traditional-codificatory model

1. General applicability (not context specific).
2. Application to all citizens equally.
3. Fault element required.
4. Classical view of responsibility and causation.
5. Comprised of mala in se.
6. Legitimacy not tied to consequentialist evaluation.
7. Labels descriptively evaluative.

Regulatory or bureaucratic—administrative model

1. Context-specific application.
2. Targeted at particular groups.
3. Fault elements dispensable or watered down.
4. Responsibility and causation elements malleable.
5. Blurring of mala in se/mala prohibita distinction.
6. The outcomes that law produces are crucial to legitimacy.
7. Labels descriptively factual.

...

The conclusion I seek to draw ... is that a wholesale shift from a common law to a regulatory approach in the law of homicide may have few clearly proven advantages, and many real disadvantages, most especially in relation to fault or to punishment, and hence in relation to legitimacy ... [I]n these respects a regulatory approach may sometimes be too harsh on accused persons (causing death on the roads; causing the death of a child or vulnerable person), but sometimes also too general to them (Assisted Dying for the Terminally Ill Bill). The direction of my argument is towards a system of criminal law in which common law and regulatory approaches are regarded as mutually reinforcing, rather than as rival claimants to exclusive occupancy of the relevant legal space. How can such a system be developed?

The offence of corporate manslaughter provides one model ... to give effect to a regulatory objective ensuring that a company can in appropriate circumstances be found liable for homicide, brought about at least in part by glaring deficiencies in the senior managers' management or organization of the company's activities. The common law and regulatory approaches are mutually reinforcing in this sense. The powers available to the court upon conviction are classically regulatory in form ...

However, most importantly, these regulation-oriented powers available upon conviction—probably far less punitive than many groups advocating corporate liability would have liked—are themselves in part reinforced and supported by the way in which the offence takes a common law approach to labelling and fault. Liability is for 'manslaughter', and the fault element—'a gross breach of a relevant duty of care'—mirrors the common law requirement in manslaughter for gross negligence. In taking this approach, the new offence recognizes that the labelling element of conviction for common law homicide offences (murder; manslaughter) can itself be regarded as part of the punishment, so long its currency has not been debased by substantial diminution of fault requirements."

B. GREATER SPECIFICITY

8-209

Given the above views, another question presents itself. Does English law distinguish with sufficient precision between different homicides? Many would assert that it does not. Murder and manslaughter, in particular, are far too broad, each encompassing too many different types of conduct, circumstances and offenders—in short, too many different degrees of "heinousness". Murders, for example, vary widely: they cover planned, cold-blooded killings, deliberate killings with torture all the way down to killings only marginally qualifying as intentional under Woollin. They cover people who coldly kill for no reason, down through all the different motivations and explanations to mercy killings, where an anguished defendant kills a loved one to end their suffering. Manslaughters, too, cover a vast field: they range from conduct just short of murder to just above the non-criminal category of justifiable or accidental death. Is not each crime, each label, covering too vast a field?

When the English common law was introduced into the US, these points were taken. The English categories of murder and manslaughter were each seen to be too broad to serve any useful purpose. In particular, it was felt to be wrong for the death penalty to apply to all murders. The crime of murder should be divided into categories with the death penalty only applying to the “worst”. In 1794, the pioneering Pennsylvania Code divided murder into two degrees, with the death penalty only applying to first degree murder. Similarly, manslaughters were divided into different degrees, each degree carrying a separate penalty. This approach has been widely adopted with the result that both murder and manslaughter are now divided into degrees or categories in most states. In addition, the majority of states have yet further homicide offences, apart from murder and manslaughter, such as reckless homicide, negligent homicide and vehicular homicide.

ARIZONA REVISED STATUTES TITLE 13—CRIMINAL CODE:

8–210

“13–1102. Negligent homicide; classification

- A. A person commits negligent homicide if with criminal negligence the person causes the death of another person, including an unborn child.
- B. An offense under this section applies to an unborn child in the womb at any stage of its development ...
- C. Negligent homicide is a class 4 felony [presumptive penalty for first offence is 2.5 years⁴⁷⁷].

13–1103. Manslaughter; classification

- A. A person commits manslaughter by:

1. Recklessly causing the death of another person; or
2. Committing second degree murder as defined in section 13–1104, subsection A upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion resulting from adequate provocation by the victim; or
3. intentionally aiding another to commit suicide; or
4. Committing second degree murder as defined in section 13–1104, subsection A, paragraph 3, while being coerced to do so by the use or threatened immediate use of unlawful deadly physical force upon such person or a third person which a reasonable person in his situation would have been unable to resist; or
5. Knowingly or recklessly causing the death of an unborn child by any physical injury to the mother.

B An offense under subsection A, paragraph 5 of this section applies to an unborn child in the womb at any stage of its development ...

C. Manslaughter is a class 2 felony [presumptive penalty for first offence is 5 years].

13–1104. Second degree murder; classification

A. A person commits second degree murder if without premeditation:

1. The person intentionally causes the death of another person, including an unborn child or, as a result of intentionally causing the death of another person, causes the death of an unborn child; or
2. Knowing that the person's conduct will cause death or serious physical injury, the person causes the death of another person, including an unborn child or, as a result of knowingly causing the death of another person, causes the death of an unborn child; or
3. Under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life, the person recklessly engages in conduct that creates a grave risk of death and thereby causes the death of another person, including an unborn child or, as a result of recklessly causing the death of another person, causes the death of an unborn child.

B. An offense under this section applies to an unborn child in the womb at any stage of its development ...

C. Second degree murder is a class 1 felony ...⁴⁷⁸

13–1105. First degree murder; classification

A. A person commits first degree murder if:

1. Intending or knowing that the person's conduct will cause death, the person causes the death of another person, including an unborn child, with premeditation or, as a result of causing the death of another person with premeditation, causes the death of an unborn child.

2. Acting either alone or with one or more other persons the person commits or attempts to commit sexual conduct with a minor ..., sexual assault ..., molestation of a child ..., terrorism ..., marijuana offenses ..., dangerous drug offenses ..., narcotics offenses ..., drive-by shooting ..., kidnapping ..., burglary ..., arson ..., robbery ..., escape ..., child abuse ..., or unlawful flight from a pursuing law enforcement vehicle ... and in the course of and in furtherance of the offense or immediate flight from the offense, the person or another person causes the death of any person.⁴⁷⁹

3. Intending or knowing that the person's conduct will cause death to a law enforcement officer, the person causes the death of a law enforcement officer who is in the line of duty.

B. Homicide, as prescribed in subsection A, paragraph 2 of this section, requires no specific mental state other than what is required for the commission of any of the enumerated felonies.

C. An offense under subsection A, paragraph 1 of this section applies to an unborn child in the womb at any stage of its development ...

D. First degree murder is a class 1 felony ...⁴⁸⁰

Vehicular homicide is a separate offence in about half of the states. In some states, for example Colorado, criminally negligent homicide and vehicular homicide co-exist as separate offences (in addition to manslaughter and two degrees of murder).⁴⁸¹

There is a major problem with such precise gradations of homicide offences. It assumes that one can isolate those factors or criteria that always make a homicide more or less reprehensible. Let us take the deliberation/premeditation formula as an example. In most states in the US the “worst” murders, first degree murders, are reserved for deliberate and premeditated killings.⁴⁸² One can perhaps understand the rationale behind such provisions, namely that it:

“reflect[s] a belief that one who meditates an intent to kill and then deliberately executes it is more dangerous, more culpable or less capable of reformation than one who kills on sudden impulse; or that the prospect of the death penalty is more likely to deter men from deliberate than from impulsive murder.”⁴⁸³

There are, however, severe problems with such an approach:

(a) It is almost impossible to distinguish between a “premeditated” and a “merely intentional” killing. In the US, most statutes have defined “intention” in terms of “conscious objective”. If something is your objective, that, of necessity, means you have made a decision to bring about that objective. The making of that decision must, by definition, involve premeditation and deliberation. As Cardozo J. put it:

“an intent to kill is always deliberate and premeditated ... There can be no intent unless there is a choice, yet by the hypothesis, the choice without more is enough to justify the inference that the intent was deliberate and premeditated ... [Such statutes are] framed along the lines of a defective and unreal psychology.”⁴⁸⁴

(b) A “purely impulsive” murder may be just as, if not more, reprehensible than the cold-blooded, premeditated killing. As Stephen put it:

“As much cruelty, as much indifference to the life of others, a disposition at least as dangerous to society, probably even more dangerous, is shown by sudden as by premeditated murders. The following cases appear to me to set this in a clear light. A, passing along the road, sees a boy sitting on a bridge over a deep river and, out of mere wanton barbarity, pushes him into it and so drowns him. A man makes advances to a girl who repels him. He deliberately but instantly cuts her throat. A man civilly asked to pay a just debt pretends to get the money, loads a rifle and blows out his creditor’s brains. In none of these cases is there premeditation unless the word is used in a sense as unnatural as ‘aforethought’, in ‘malice aforethought’; but each represents even more diabolical cruelty and ferocity than that which is involved in murders premeditated in the natural sense of the word.”⁴⁸⁵

(c) Many premeditated killings are clearly not the most reprehensible. Mercy killings, for example, are invariably premeditated killings, yet they are generally regarded as far less blameworthy than most other types of killings. A good example of this is to be found in the United States case of Repouille v United States.⁴⁸⁶ In this case, the defendant’s son was aged 13, had been bedridden since infancy and was described as an “incurable imbecile” who could not walk or talk; he had been blind for five years. The defendant had spent all his savings on an operation for the child but his condition had not improved. The defendant began to talk of putting the boy out of his misery and one day soaked a rag with chloroform and applied it to the boy’s face, while he lay in his bed, until he died. This was a clear case of a planned, premeditated killing which would be first degree murder. Yet the jury convicted the defendant of second degree manslaughter and requested sentencing leniency. The judge suspended execution of a five-year sentence and placed the defendant on probation. Commenting on this, Learned Hand J stated:

“... the jury ... did not feel any moral repulsion at his crime. Although it was inescapably murder in the first degree, not only did they bring in a verdict that was flatly in the face of the facts and utterly absurd—for manslaughter in the second degree presupposes that the killing was not deliberate—but they coupled even that with a recommendation which showed that in substance they wished to exculpate the offender. Moreover, it is also plain, from the sentence which he imposed, that the judge could not have seriously disagreed with their recommendation.”

8–214

A case such as this highlights the total inadequacy of the premeditation/deliberation formula in that it has not succeeded in isolating the worst killings. Categories of homicide become meaningless if they do not reflect common views of reprehensibility.

At the other end of the spectrum from murder, we have seen that more specificity is being added to the law of homicide. Whilst manslaughter exists as a common law “dustbin” crime, new homicide offences with a determinate sentence have been created in recent years in the form of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult and various offences of causing death by driving (offences under Horder’s regulatory model). In addition, corporate manslaughter has been created to punish deaths caused by corporate gross negligence. What all of these new offences have in common is that they cater for killings that take place outside the context of a violent attack where the defendant has chosen to engage in violence against another person.⁴⁸⁷ Further specific offences could be added to this category, however. Medical negligence leading to death might warrant a separate offence.⁴⁸⁸ As noted above, drug supply causing death is an offence in some jurisdictions, and could form the basis of a new offence here.⁴⁸⁹ However, Wilson’s arguments against such a move are forceful.⁴⁹⁰ A further suggestion for a separate homicide offence was made by the Association of Chief Police Officers, which called for a new offence of “liability for suicide”.⁴⁹¹ This would be targeted at those who are guilty of domestic abuse, and whose partners, such as the deceased in the case of Dhaliwal,⁴⁹² are driven to suicide. Such offenders are not caught by the scope of the law on encouraging suicide, since they would not have the necessary mens rea for that offence. They might be guilty of constructive manslaughter, if it could be proved that they committed an unlawful and dangerous act which caused death. In Dhaliwal, it was suggested that such a charge would be possible in cases where the victim was suffering from a recognised psychiatric illness which was caused by the abuse suffered at the hands of her partner, and which in turn caused her to commit suicide. However, in many cases it will be difficult to show that this was the case, and yet arguably the deceased's partner can be blamed for her death.⁴⁹³ If we were to entertain the idea of creating such a specific offence, however, where would such specificity end?

ANDREW ASHWORTH, “‘MANSLAUGHTER’: GENERIC OR NOMINATE OFFENCES?” IN C. M. V.
CLARKSON AND S. CUNNINGHAM
(EDS), CRIMINAL LIABILITY FOR
NON-AGGRESSIVE DEATH (2008),
PP.243; 246–247:

8–215

“[W]e must now confront the question whether the law should be structured around generic homicide offences or nominate offences. Three arguments in favour of nominalism stand out—that it is much more communicative, thereby emphasising the special duties of citizens in certain roles or positions; that the circumstances of some types of case are so unlike others that a separate category is a more accurate label; and that, if there were not a nominate offence for certain conduct, the law might be misapplied by juries. One argument against nominate offences is that their creation may convey the impression, however wrongly, that they are regarded as less serious than manslaughter because they are labelled separately and differently. Another counterargument raises questions about the deliberate mislabelling of certain homicides in order to avoid controversy ...

One general argument against nominate offences is that they may amount to a down-grading of the offence. Classifying the offences as manslaughter or culpable homicide would be an appropriate signification of the degree of wrongdoing, but a nominate offence (perhaps using the less censuring term, ‘causing death by ...’) may not be a proper valuation. In order to grapple with this we need to separate the label from the essence.

Applying a separate label to an offence (causing death by dangerous driving, infanticide) may lead people to believe—and this would be an empirical question—that certain forms of wrongdoing are being taken less seriously. But then there is the further and arguably more important question of whether that amounts to a real under-valuation, i.e. whether the ‘valuation’ consists not merely of the label attached but also of the level of sentence imposed. That, too, would be an empirical question. As intimated above, this question is rendered complex by the increasing levels of sentencing for causing death by dangerous driving in recent years, sentences that are often higher than those for manslaughter by gross negligence and unlawful act manslaughter, and sometimes higher than for manslaughter upon provocation (where the considerations are, of course, very different).

A further argument against nominalism, though limited in its scope, draws our attention back to the political context in which proposals for homicide law have to be assessed. Any proposal explicitly to reduce the censuring of homicides resulting from assisted suicide, suicide pacts and mercy killing tends to stir up formidable political opposition. Fears about the effects of such opposition led the Law Commission to leave these cases out of its final report in 2006. Some will decry this as cowardice, but the pragmatic truth is that recommendations that were viewed as relaxations of the law in those areas might well undermine all the other proposals in a package of reforms, so strong is the feeling among some religious groups and others. The tendency is therefore to leave these difficult cases aside, consigning them to a twilight world in which other doctrines (notably diminished responsibility) are stretched to accommodate such cases but only if sympathetic medical witnesses can be found. This is an unusual face of nominalism: there seems to be less controversy and greater public acceptance to be gained through mislabelling these cases, often as manslaughter by reason of diminished responsibility, than through using a clear and representative label that draws attention to the circumstances.”

C. BASIS OF DISTINCTIONS

8–216

Whether we have generic offences or specific offences of homicide, the question remains as to how we should distinguish between such offences. In the previous chapter on non-fatal offences against the person it was argued that appropriate levels of criminal liability and punishment ought to be fixed by reference to a combination of blame and harm, and that “blame” could involve a consideration of other factors in addition to cognitive mens rea. Thus, as we saw, we might blame someone more because of the method or circumstances of the crime—e.g. torturing the victim. In homicide the harm is, of course, constant: the victim is dead. There is, however, no particular reason why the blame element giving rise to different offence categories, must be limited to a consideration of the mental element of the defendant.

Indeed, a glance at other jurisdictions reveals that classifications of homicide offences could be made to depend on a variety of other factors. The identity of the victim, for instance, could be regarded as the key factor distinguishing two homicides with identical mental states.⁴⁹⁴ In Louisiana it is first degree murder to kill intentionally a fireman or a peace officer engaged in the performance of their duties.⁴⁹⁵ Or, it could be the identity of the killer that is regarded as decisive as in New York where it is first degree murder if the murderer was confined in prison.⁴⁹⁶

Alternatively, the categorisation could be made to depend on the method and circumstances of the killing. In Louisiana, it is first degree murder to kill after being offered anything of value for the killing,⁴⁹⁷ and in Idaho it is first degree murder to kill by poisoning or torturing a victim to death.⁴⁹⁸

Such an approach would not be totally alien to English law where the identity of the victim and the killer are highly relevant for the crimes of infanticide and causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult, and the method and circumstances of the killing are equally relevant for the crime of causing death by dangerous driving and the other vehicular homicide offences. An objection to such an approach might be that it would be impossible to achieve agreement as to what factors rendered a killing more or less reprehensible. The Law Commission has specifically rejected the suggestion that killing a police officer on duty be first degree murder if the killer did not have the requisite fault element, on the basis that such a rule would create the potential for too much arbitrariness and legalism.⁴⁹⁹ However, the murder of a police officer or prison officer in the course of his or her duty now attracts the starting point, for sentencing purposes, of a whole life order.⁵⁰⁰ Further, the starting points for sentencing in murder cases already list the following factors as those justifying a particularly high minimum term: a murder involving firearms or explosives; a murder done for gain; a murder involving sexual or sadistic conduct; and a murder that is racially or religiously aggravated.⁵⁰¹ Would the law not be more transparent if, rather than requiring that these factors not be considered until the sentencing stage, they were utilised to provide distinctions within the substantive law and define different degrees of murder? As noted above, however, these factors appearing within the statute do not provide an exhaustive list of factors which a sentencing judge can take into account, and judges retain discretion in sentencing. It is one thing to list factors which can be a helpful tool in sentencing and quite another to use them in order rigidly to define specific offences.

Elliott and de Than have argued that there is no need to have such rigidity in defining specific offences, but that an aggravated form of murder ought to be introduced to signify that an extra level of “harm” may be caused in cases of homicide which causes particular anxiety amongst the community.

CATHERINE ELLIOTT AND CLAIRE DE THAN, “RESTRUCTURING THE HOMICIDE OFFENCES TO TACKLE VIOLENCE, DISCRIMINATION AND DRUGS IN A MODERN SOCIETY”
(2009) 20 K.L.J. 69–88, 73, 75, 76:

“The proposed aggravated murder offence would recognise that certain forms of murder target members of a particular community within our society, such as a racist or homophobic murder, or target our society as a whole, such as a terrorist bombing. Such offences can create considerable public distress and insecurity. The impact of these crimes goes beyond the immediate victim, family and friends, and affects the community as a whole. The significance of this wider impact has been recognised in international criminal law, through offences such as crimes against humanity. It is this heightened impact on society that would justify a more serious response from the criminal law ...

The proposed new offence of aggravated murder would ... apply in two situations. The first is where the victim was chosen by the defendant because of a general characteristic, such as their race, gender, homosexuality or age; the defendant’s conduct created an obvious risk of death; the defendant either intended the death or was subjectively reckless as to causing death; and the conduct was premeditated. In the case of a terrorist attack the victims could have been selected purely on the basis that they were members of British society, and this would amount to a relevant characteristic for these purposes, as the broader the characteristic the greater the potential impact on society, and therefore it would be illogical to restrict this offence to situations where there is reliance upon a very precise characteristic. A terrorist attack might target employees of a particular organisation, such as a scientific laboratory carrying out tests on animals or a foreign embassy. This offence would not deny that all human life is equally valuable, but it would recognise that the loss of certain human lives in certain circumstances will have a greater impact on society than others, and would end the undervaluing of multiple deaths—which is the case with the current homicide offences. Note that the definition of this offence would not seek to lay down a prescribed list of victim characteristics which would be relevant to its commission, because prejudices are irrational and cannot be ranked. Instead, what is important is that the victim has been identified because of that general characteristic, as it is this method of victim selection that generates the broader fear in those members of the public sharing that characteristic ...

The second way in which the offence of aggravated murder would be committed would be where the offender was a mass or multiple murderer who killed with an intention to kill. As an indication of gravity, conviction of aggravated murder could give rise to a mandatory life sentence and a minimum period in custody of 30 years.”

8–218

Elliott and de Than do not provide a draft provision to demonstrate how these ideas would be put into practice. Although their suggestion avoids the need to provide a definitive list of which characteristics will be sufficient to fall within it thus avoiding the complex issues of valuing human life, such a provision would be likely to be too loosely defined to provide clear guidance. There are, in addition, conceptual problems with this. An example relates to the treatment of child-murderers. Elliott and de Than recognise that children are most at risk from members of their own family, but argue that aggravated murder should only apply when the defendant targets a child to whom they are not related, on the basis that it is the latter type of childmurder which causes the most amount of disquiet. However, rather than provide a tool in educating the public as to the real dangers posed to their children as Elliott and de Than suggest,⁵⁰² surely the distinction would instead lend itself to perpetuating the moral panics often resulting from stranger murders whilst undermining the seriousness of child abuse that turns fatal.

Can homicide offences be graded exclusively in terms of differential elements? The Law Commission in England and Wales has proposed a new hierarchy of homicide offences incorporating two distinct degrees of murder.

LAW COMMISSION NO.304, MURDER,
MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE
(2006):

8–219

“1.64 In structuring the general homicide offences we have been guided by a key principle: the ‘ladder’ principle. Individual offences of homicide should exist within a graduated system or hierarchy of offences. This system or hierarchy should reflect the offence’s degree of seriousness, without too much overlap between individual offences

...

1.65 The 'ladder' principle also applies to sentencing. The mandatory life sentence should be confined to the most serious kinds of killing. A discretionary life sentence should be available for less serious (but still highly blameworthy) killings.

1.66 Partial defences currently only affect the verdict of murder. This is because a verdict of murder carries a mandatory sentence. That sentence is not appropriate where there are exceptional mitigating circumstances of the kind involved in the partial defences. These mitigating circumstances necessitate a greater degree of judicial discretion in sentencing. The law creates this discretion by means of the partial defences which reduce what would otherwise be a verdict of murder, which carries a mandatory sentence, to manslaughter, which does not. Therefore, our recommended scheme does not extend the application of the partial defences to second degree murder or manslaughter. These offences would permit the trial judge discretion in sentencing and they therefore lack the primary justification for having partial defences.

The structure of offences

1.67 We believe that the following structure would make the law of homicide more coherent and comprehensible, whilst respecting the principles just set out above:

(1) First degree murder (mandatory life penalty)

- (a) Killing intentionally.
- (b) Killing where there was an intention to do serious injury, coupled with an awareness of a serious risk of causing death.

(2) Second degree murder (discretionary life maximum penalty)

- (a) Killing where the offender intended to do serious injury.
- (b) Killing where the offender intended to cause some injury or a fear or risk of injury, and was aware of a serious risk of causing death.
- (c) Killing in which there is a partial defence to what would otherwise be first degree murder.

(3) Manslaughter (discretionary life maximum penalty)

- (a) Killing through gross negligence as to a risk of causing death.
- (b) Killing through a criminal act:
 - (i) intended to cause injury; or
 - (ii) where there was an awareness that the act involved a serious risk of causing injury.

[(c) omitted].”

8-220

There is much to recommend these proposals.⁵⁰³ The “ladder” principle attempts to facilitate a logical approach being taken to the question of distinguishing between different offences and appears to succeed. The proposals shed the areas of homicide law which are often seen as most objectionable at present, namely the GBH rule for murder and the offence of constructive manslaughter. Yet they do so without sacrificing the underlying principles which some might say justify the current position. Those who intend to cause GBH and kill are blameworthy, since whether their victim will die or not is beyond their control. The proposals place this level of blameworthiness on the same rung of the ladder as foresight of a risk of death whilst intending to cause injury. Similarly, those who would fall under the current law of constructive manslaughter through assault resulting in death remain liable for manslaughter, but only where they foresee that injury could result. One issue with the final recommendations from the Law Commission is, however, that unlike its original proposals, it recommends that manslaughter would attract a discretionary life maximum penalty as it does under the current law. Rogers suggests that this “would seem to undermine the integrity of the whole new structure of homicide offences”, given that there would be nothing in the sentence to differentiate manslaughter from second degree murder.⁵⁰⁴

We have already seen that deciding where to draw the line between murder and manslaughter through the use of mens rea is a much debated topic. The Law Commission has sought to blur the line between the offences by inserting between them the offence of second degree murder to incorporate what would, under the current law, fall within the lower ranks of murder and the upper reaches of manslaughter. Questions remain, however, over where on the ladder certain levels of blameworthiness should be placed. In its provisional proposals, the Law Commission singled out killing with intention to kill as the most serious form of homicide and proposed that this be the only way of committing first degree murder.⁵⁰⁵ Following consultation, the Law Commission was persuaded that intention to kill is not always more blameworthy than other forms of mens rea. In the Report, an alternative form of mens rea for first degree murder was added: killing with intention to cause serious injury whilst aware of a serious risk of death. Norrie, in commenting on the Law Commission's Consultation Paper which suggested that "reckless indifference" would provide one form of mens rea for second degree murder,⁵⁰⁶ provides some arguments in favour of the view that an extreme form of recklessness might actually be sufficient for first degree murder, and that it would equate in terms of blameworthiness with an intention to kill. His view is that there is something, in addition to intentionality, that determines how serious a killing is.⁵⁰⁷ This can be referred to as the defendant's "attitudinal state". Norrie's view is that if we take account of the attitude of killers who display "reckless indifference" we might find that they are just as blameworthy as those who intend to kill:

"[d]oing harm so serious as to endanger life can be regarded substantively as of the same order of culpability [as intention to kill]. It exhibits a practical indifference that is as bad as intending to kill."⁵⁰⁸

8-221

The Law Commission's provisional proposals received criticism in relation to the definition of the term "reckless indifference". It was thought that the term was "unacceptably vague and liable to create a very blurred line between second degree murder and manslaughter".⁵⁰⁹ The Law Commission has therefore provided a clear formula for exactly what is needed in terms of recklessness for both first and second degree murder. The defendant must have adverted to a risk of death. But in addition to this, for first degree murder he must have intended to cause serious injury, and for second degree murder he must have intended to cause injury. This last requirement is designed to distinguish those liable for second degree murder from those who are guilty of gross negligence manslaughter,⁵¹⁰ where a risk of death may have been foreseen but it was not the defendant's purpose in acting to harm the victim (e.g. a surgeon operating on a patient). The distinction between first and second degree murder may now lie in the seriousness of harm intended whilst being aware of a risk of death. Given that the Law Commission has abandoned its plan to define "serious" injury,⁵¹¹ this leaves a great deal of discretion to the jury with little guidance on how to distinguish between the offences. Further, it is arguable that an intention to kill should be singled out as the most serious form of blameworthiness and would be effective in singling out the worst forms of killings. Some, such as Norrie and Wilson,⁵¹² may disagree, but it should be noted that the ladder structure within the original proposals provided at least the possibility for those who are aware of death to be labelled as murderers, albeit in the second degree.

The other area of concern surrounding the ladder of offences is how the partial defences would operate. A preliminary point is that mercy killing, except in cases in which the defendant can show diminished responsibility, would amount to first degree murder with no partial defence to accommodate the lesser blameworthiness that many would argue such killers demonstrate. The main reason for this, the Law Commission states, is that euthanasia was outside the terms of its reference.⁵¹³

The defences are, however, extended beyond the current law by the proposal to allow duress to act as a full defence to first degree murder, second degree murder and attempted murder.⁵¹⁴ This is in addition to the two partial defences of provocation (now replaced by loss of control) and diminished responsibility which would operate only in relation to first degree murder, reducing the offence to second degree murder rather than to manslaughter. The reasoning behind this is that the existing partial defences were created in order to avoid the mandatory life penalty for murder; with the mandatory sentence being confined to first degree murder and judges enjoying discretion in sentencing for second degree murder there would be no need to reduce the liability of such killers to that of manslaughter. Or would there?

OLIVER QUICK AND CELIA WELLS, “GETTING TOUGH WITH DEFENCES”
[2006] CRIM. L.R. 514, PP.515–516:

8–222

“(a) What’s in a label?

A person entitled to a partial defence will nonetheless be convicted of second degree murder, whereas now they would be convicted of manslaughter. The unlawful homicide with which they currently share that label—involuntary manslaughters—will in the main still remain as manslaughters. Partial defence killings would therefore be elevated in seriousness to a tier above and carry the murder label. Since second degree murder could also under the proposals include some killings that would currently amount to murder (those where there is intention to cause serious harm), this is more than just a rebranding. The Commission seems relatively untroubled by this promotion of cases from manslaughter to second degree murder. This is ‘not seen as a problem’ yet the accompanying counterargument addresses a rather different point ...

(b) Like with unlike?

Partial defence murders would be bedfellows with those who are recklessly indifferent to causing death. Some of the hidden premises can be deduced in the arguments about reckless indifference to death. First, the [Consultation Paper] argues that this should not be included in first degree murder. The following paragraph then states that a person should only be guilty of second degree murder if the reckless indifference was to death (and not merely to serious harm) because ‘as the most serious homicide after first degree murder [it] should require a very high level of culpability.’ The combined effect of restricting the partial defences to first degree murder and of then placing them in the same category as killings accompanied by either intention to cause serious harm or reckless indifference to causing death, is that they would in future represent a quite different level of culpability than they do now. Antony Duff has noted, and we agree, that grouping someone who deliberately killed but had a partial defence with someone who killed through reckless indifference is ‘quite misleading’ as a matter of fair or accurate labelling. In their response to [Partial Defences to Murder], Justice for Women pointed out that shaking off the shackles of a murder label is often as important a focus of the post-conviction struggle of abused women who kill, as is their quest for freedom.”

8–223

Thus, Quick and Wells are of the view that the Law Commission “over-emphasises relativesculpability at the expense of the significance of labelling”.⁵¹⁵ The ladder of offences is neat and logical, but there remains the argument of whether those that suffer from diminished responsibility ought to be labelled as murderers, albeit in the second degree, rather than manslaughterers. Part of the reasoning behind the Law Commission’s recommendations relates to the need for the partial defences to operate in the same manner. The law would become too complex if loss of control reduced liability from first degree murder to second degree murder but it was felt that for labelling purposes it was better that diminished responsibility were able to reduce liability to manslaughter. Given that defendants often plead these defences together, the jury’s task would be overcomplicated if they were told that the effect of each of the partial defences was different and this would lead to the potential for “split juries” who agree that the case for first degree murder is not made out but cannot decide whether the verdict should be one of second degree murder or manslaughter.⁵¹⁶ Whilst many support the view that an offender suffering from diminished responsibility deserves a label of “manslaughterer” rather than “murderer”, the same is not true of those who lose their self-control.

D. UNLAWFUL HOMICIDE—A SINGLE OFFENCE

8–224

Should English law abandon any such thoughts of further categorisation, indeed abandon its existing categories of homicide offences, and replace them with a single offence of unlawful homicide?

In Hyam v DPP Lord Kilbrandon said:

“There does not appear to be any good reason why the crimes of murder and manslaughter should not both be abolished, and the single crime of unlawful homicide substituted; one case will differ from another in gravity, and that can be taken care of by variation of sentences downwards from life imprisonment.”⁵¹⁷

The main argument that can be adduced in favour of the introduction of a single offence of unlawful homicide is that murder varies so widely both in character and in culpability that the judge ought to have discretion as to sentence. Writing before the abolition of the death penalty, Morris and Blom-Cooper espoused the view that murder is a unique crime set apart from other homicide offences.⁵¹⁸ Experience, it seems, has persuaded them that they were wrong.

L. BLOM-COOPER AND T. MORRIS, WITH MALICE AFORETHOUGHT
(2004), PP.56–57:

8–225

“[T]he distinction between murder and other unlawful homicides is essentially artificial. ‘Murder’ is a term used in common parlance, often without much discrimination, to describe incidents of violent and unnatural death to which social opprobrium is attached, notwithstanding that a court may conclude at trial (if any) that the proper verdict under the law is one of manslaughter. Murder is essentially a term of art; a construct having its origins in the intellectual patchwork of the common law that, responsive to the currents of opinion but without any over-arching logic—still less -philosophy—that has evolved over the centuries. In no way can it be regarded as a phenomenon sui generis, since the boundary between murder and manslaughter shifts as readily as the precise limits of a sand bar under the influence of wind and tide.

The defences which may be employed to identify the crime as manslaughter, rather than murder, are as chimerical in character as the attempts to create categories of murder to which may be attached a range of differential penalties. The question must, therefore, be posed whether it is profitable to expend further intellectual energy and resources in pursuit of the ignis fatuus of their perfection.

Were the mandatory penalty of life imprisonment for murder to be abolished, the incentive for defendants to persuade the courts that, if they plead guilty it is to manslaughter and not to murder, would cease to exist, and with it the problems of interpretation of motives and states of mind that presently demand so much legal attention. That incentive removed, the existence of a common sentencing tariff to reflect the proportionality of penalty to the specific nature of the criminal event, would make plain the underlying imperative; the establishment of a single offence of criminal homicide.”

8-226

Thus, other benefits of such reform are pragmatic. In many cases where a murder conviction could probably have been obtained, prosecutors are content to charge with manslaughter, or accept pleas of guilty to manslaughter. This saves much time and expense and indicates that prosecutors, at least, are often willing to rely on judges exercising their sentencing discretion reasonably.⁵¹⁹ For example, in the Iranian Embassy siege case⁵²⁰ the prosecution accepted a plea of guilty to manslaughter in a fairly clear-cut case of murder; the defendant was promptly sentenced to life imprisonment, the same sentence he would have received after a long, expensive trial resulting in a murder conviction. Similar considerations, coupled with a desire to shield the relatives of victims from hitherto unrevealed details, prompted the prosecution in Sutcliffe (the so-called Yorkshire Ripper case)⁵²¹ to agree to a plea to manslaughter (the judge declined to accept such a plea). If there were a single offence of unlawful homicide, one would avoid the present anomalous situation of some prosecutors accepting lesser pleas, while other prosecutors insist on pursuing a murder charge.

Further, juries appear unwilling to convict of murder except in clear cases as this is tying the judge's hands as to sentence. By returning verdicts of manslaughter in many cases, they are allowing the judge to take all the circumstances into account before imposing an appropriate sentence.⁵²² Lord Denning has said that “in many cases which are in law plainly murder, juries return verdicts of manslaughter, because they do not think the death sentence is appropriate”.⁵²³ Such a practice seems to have survived the abolition of the death penalty. In Repouille v United States,⁵²⁴ a case described as “inescapably first degree murder”, the jury, quite perversely, returned a verdict of second degree murder enabling the judge to impose a suspended sentence. If the law is in a strait-jacket, judges, prosecutors and juries will start ignoring the law. If this starts happening too extensively, should not the law be changed?

A single offence of unlawful homicide would mean that life imprisonment would be restricted to the worst cases. Such persons would actually remain in prison for a substantial period of time. This would increase public confidence in the life sentence. At the moment, the judge has discretion in setting the minimum term to be served in prison, although that discretion should be exercised in accordance with the guidance provided by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21. In some ways, this guidance makes the exercise very similar to setting a determinate sentence in cases of manslaughter, although it ought to be borne in mind that the time actually spent in prison will depend upon the perceived dangerousness of the murderer and the whole of the term must be served, unlike determinate sentences. The different sentencing bands for minimum terms in murder cases demonstrate the variation in culpability that murderers display under the current system. It might be less opaque, however, to admit defeat in trying to single out the worst types of killing for the mandatory sentence and simply allow judges to impose sentences of life imprisonment when they come across those cases that deserve it.

The creation of a single offence would also mean that the somewhat artificial rules on loss of control, diminished responsibility, infanticide and suicide pacts could be abandoned.⁵²⁵ These matters could then simply be treated as mitigating factors relevant to sentencing.

What are the arguments against the introduction of a single offence of unlawful homicide?

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, WORKING PAPER ON
OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON, 1976:

8-227

“5. To have a single offence of homicide, combining murder with a lesser offence of manslaughter, would mean that the jury’s verdict would leave the judge with no guidance as to the gravity of the offence. In the absence of any new provision introducing a system of special verdicts, the judge would have to assess, in deciding what penalty to impose, whether intent to kill or a less serious degree of criminality amounting to what is now manslaughter had been proved. If the accused pleaded not guilty, the facts of the case would come out in the evidence, but the verdict of the jury would be confined to the issue of guilt or innocence of the offence of homicide. The judge would be left to decide, for example, whether the provocation alleged in mitigation (with the merger of murder and manslaughter, provocation would be a matter of mitigation only) existed in fact. If the accused pleaded guilty to homicide, the judge would have even less material on which to decide such questions since he would not have had the benefit of hearing detailed evidence. Thus the offence of homicide would apply to a very wide range of circumstances, varying in their degree of gravity, and the judge would be left to determine the true nature of the offence without the assistance of the jury. The majority of us think that the argument discussed in this paragraph is a very strong one; a minority of members, however, consider that it is overstated.

6. To have a single offence of homicide covering such a wide range of acts would make a conviction of the offence relatively uninformative in that it would be used to describe the most heinous case of murder and the least serious case of manslaughter. Although the Committee’s proposals about the existing offence of manslaughter would reduce the scope of the single offence of homicide (combining murder and manslaughter), it would still be a wide-ranging offence classifying under the same head both a person who killed under provocation or while suffering from diminished responsibility and a person who killed deliberately without any provocation and not suffering from any mental disorder.

7. To abolish the offence of murder as such, although retaining it as part of a wider offence of homicide, may appear to have the effect of lessening the seriousness of taking life. We think that, in the public's mind, there is a stigma attaching to a conviction of murder and that this rightly emphasises the seriousness of the offence and may have a significant deterrent value ...

8 ... [T]he majority of us see advantages in the mandatory sentence and think that there is a need for a special penalty for the most serious cases of homicide in order to reassure the public and also for the purposes of prevention and deterrence.”⁵²⁶

8-228

There are two further objections to a suggested new offence of unlawful homicide. First, such a proposal would result in a substantial increase of judicial discretion in sentencing. In Ch.1, the dangers of such discretion were considered. Over the past three decades there has been a strong movement away from judicial discretion in sentencing which ought to lead to a more precise classification of offences. It can only be a retrograde step to propose reforms to the substantive law that would involve an increase in judicial discretion in sentencing.

Secondly, the Law Commission makes the following point:

“If, for Blom-Cooper and Morris, fault is merely a factor to reflect in sentence, then that could logically be said to be true of the outcome (the victim's death) as well. Why single out unlawful killing for separate treatment, when it may purely have been chance that the victim died, and the result could have been more or less serious bodily harm done?”⁵²⁷

If we were to abolish the distinction between murder and manslaughter would it not follow that we should abolish the distinction between such offences as malicious wounding and inflicting grievous bodily harm and wounding and causing grievous bodily harm with intent?

¹ Office for National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales: year ending September 2016 (2017), p.28 at

- <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/bulletins/crimeinengland/violent-crime-figures-continue-to-present-a-complex-picture> [Accessed March 2017].
- 2 Office for National Statistics, Crime in England and Wales: year ending September 2016 (2017).
 - 3 Office for National Statistics, Dataset: Avoidable Mortality in England and Wales: Reference Table 1 at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/healthandsocialcare/causesofdeath/datasets/avoidable-mortality-in-england-and-wales-reference-table-1> [Accessed March 2017].
 - 4 Court proceedings were pending for another 244 suspects. Office for National Statistics, Compendium: Homicide (2016), p.17, at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/compendium/focusonhomicide> [Accessed March 2017].
 - 5 Office for National Statistics, Compendium: Homicide (2016). 1% of homicides were corporate manslaughter.
 - 6 Office for National Statistics, Compendium: Homicide (2016), p.6.
 - 7 Office for National Statistics, Compendium: Homicide (2016), p.10.
 - 8 Office for National Statistics, Compendium: Homicide (2016), p.12.
 - 9 There is also a continuing debate as to whether women defendants are treated more or less leniently than men. One argument is that because they “betray” their stereotypical role they are likely to be dealt with more harshly. See S. Bandelli, “Provocation from the Home Office” [1992] Crim. L.R. 716 for an illustration of how difficult it is to unravel the arguments and statistics.
 - 10 Office for National Statistics, Focus on: Violent Crime and Sexual Offences (2016), Appendix table 2.03 at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/compendium/focusonviolent-crime-and-sexual-offences> [Accessed March 2017].
 - 11 D. F. Luckenbill, “Murder and Assault” in R. F. Meier, Major Forms of Crime (Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, 1984), p.32.
 - 12 Office for National Statistics, Compendium: Homicide (2016), p.17, p.16.
 - 13 C. Miles, “Intoxication and Homicide: A Context-Specific Approach” (2012) 52 Brit. J. Criminol. 870–888, 885.
 - 14 Coke, 3 Inst. 47.
 - 15 Law Commission, Consultation Paper No.136, The Year and a Day Rule in Homicide (1994).
 - 16 This term is defined in s.2(3) as murder, manslaughter, infanticide or any other offence of which one of the elements is causing a person’s death, or the offence of encouraging or assisting a person’s suicide, or the offence under the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 s.5 of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult.
 - 17 R. v Young (Kerry Rena) [2005] EWCA Crim 2963.
 - 18 In Att-Gen’s Reference (No.3 of 1994) [1998] A.C. 245 the House of Lords held it was not possible for the defendant to be guilty of murder where the injury was caused to the mother whilst the child was in utero. Their Lordships did not accept the idea that a foetus could be treated as part of the mother’s body in the same way as, e.g. an arm. As far as unlawful act manslaughter was concerned, however, liability is not negated by the fact that the death of the child is caused as a consequence of injury to the mother rather than as a consequence of direct injury to the foetus. See above

- para.2-251.
- 19 Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.58.
 - 20 Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 s.1.
 - 21 Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 s.37(1)(a).
 - 22 Hale, 1 P.C. 433. Hirst, however, argues that the relevance of “under the Queen’s peace” is not to do with whether the killing was in time of war, but rather that the offence of murder must have been committed either in England and Wales or abroad in circumstances where by statute the English law of murder now has extraterritorial application. This, he argues, is fundamental, as it determines to whom the English law of murder applies: M. Hirst, “Murder Under the Queen’s Peace” [2008] Crim. L.R. 541.
 - 23 This phrase was described in R. v Moloney (Alistair Baden) [1985] A.C. 905 at 920 as “anachronistic and now wholly inappropriate”.
 - 24 In certain cases, such as where there is loss of control, a killing can be committed with malice aforethought but, because of the circumstances of the killing, the crime is reduced to voluntary manslaughter. See para.8-095
 - 25 For a full discussion of the earliest development of the term “malice aforethought,” and of the separation of murder from manslaughter in the late 15th century, see E. B. Sayre, “Mens Rea” (1932) 45 Harv. L. Rev. 974; R. Moreland, The Law of Homicide (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1952), pp.1–16 (and references cited therein) and J. Horder, “Two Histories and Four Hidden Principles of Mens Rea” (1997) 113 L.Q.R. 95, 100–109.
 - 26 Moreland, The Law of Homicide (1952), Ch.1; R. . Perkins, “A Re-examination of Malice Aforethought” (1934) 43 Yale L.J. 537.
 - 27 For a full historical discussion, see Hyam [1975] A.C. 55 and Cunningham [1982] A.C. 566.
 - 28 R. v Vickers (John Willson) [1957] 2 Q.B. 664.
 - 29 DPP v Smith [1961] A.C. 290 at 334.
 - 30 Or as treason. The Criminal Law Act 1967 s.1 abolished this distinction and substituted the classification of crimes as being either arrestable offences or non-arrestable offences (s.2). This classification has, in turn, been abolished by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 s.110.
 - 31 R. v Clift (Leigh George) [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 15.
 - 32 Such a sentence is not incompatible with either art.3 or art.5 of the ECHR (R. v Lichniak (Daniella Helen) [2003] 1 A.C. 903).
 - 33 R. v Last (Emma) [2005] Crim. L.R. 407; R. v Peters (Benjamin) [2005] Crim. L.R. 492.
 - 34 R. v Height (John) [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 117.
 - 35 R. v Kelly (Marlon) [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 56.
 - 36 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.24 of 2008) [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 241.
 - 37 Height [2009] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 117.
 - 38 Practice Direction (Sup Ct: Crime: Mandatory Life Sentences) (No.2) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 8.
 - 39 R. v Sullivan (Melvin Terrence) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 3.
 - 40 Re Jones (Setting of Minimum Term) [2006] Crim. L.R. 262.

- 41 Hutchinson v UK (57592/08) [2017] ECHR 65.
- 42 Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.270.
- 43 For criticism of the sentencing regime for murder, see B. Mitchell, “Identifying and punishing the more serious murderers” [2016] Crim. L.R. 467–477.
- 44 See, e.g. D. Thomas’s commentaries on R. v Khaleel (Mohamed) [2013] Crim. L.R. 72, R. v Griffiths (Lee) [2013] Crim. L.R. 436 and Att-Gen’s Reference (No.73 of 2012) [2013] Crim. L.R. 440.
- 45 Ministry of Justice, Breaking the Cycle: Effective Punishment, Rehabilitation and Sentencing of Offenders, Cm.7972 (2010), para.170.
- 46 R. v Inglis (Frances) [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 13.
- 47 According to guidelines issued by the Sentencing Guidelines Council, a guilty plea in a murder case should lead to a discount of up to one-sixth of the minimum term or 5 years, whichever is the lesser. Where the court determines that there should be a whole life term, a reduction will not be given for a guilty plea. Guilty pleas can generally lead to a discount of up to one-third in cases other than murder, but the Council is of the view that the differences in the sentencing scheme for murder, but the Council is of the view that the differences in the sentencing scheme for murder, and the unique seriousness of the offence, warrant a special approach: Sentencing Council, Reduction in sentence for a guilty plea: Definitive Guideline (2017), p.8.”
- 48 D. Thomas, “Sentencing Murderers” [2004] 3 Archbold News 7.
- 49 See also Criminal Law Revision Committee, 14th Report, Offences against the Person, Cmnd.7844, paras 42–74; Criminal Law Revision Committee, 12th Report, Penalty for Murder, Cmnd.5184; Report of the Committee on the Penalties for Homicide (Scottish Home and Health Department), Cmnd.5137; Prison Reform Trust, Report of the Committee on the Penalty for Homicide (1993: Chairman, Lord Lane).
- 50 Including the House of Lords Select Committee on Murder and Life Imprisonment (Session 1988–89, HL Paper 78).
- 51 Home Affairs Committee, Murder: the Mandatory Life Sentence (First Report) (Session 1995–96, Paper 111) (1995); Murder: the Mandatory Life Sentence (Second Report) (Session 1995–96, Paper 412) (1996).
- 52 First Report, p.xxxv.
- 53 This is confirmed by the terms of reference given to the Law Commission for the purposes of its most recent review of homicide offences. It was made clear that the review should “take account of the continuing existence of the mandatory life sentence for murder”: Law Commission, Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), para.1.1. An amendment to the Coroners and Justice Bill 2008 was moved by Lord Lloyd Berwick on 26 October 2009 at the request of Professor John Spencer QC to allow for a jury to add a rider to a conviction for murder stating that there were extenuating circumstances. This rider would then have given the judge discretion to choose not to pass a life sentence. The House of Lords rejected the amendment by 155 votes to 113: Hansard, House of Lords, 26 October 2009 col.1027. Such an amendment would seem to have public support. In a public opinion survey, Roberts and Mitchell found no evidence of overwhelming or widespread support for automatically sentencing all convicted murderers to life imprisonment. See J. Roberts and B. Mitchell, Public Opinion and Sentencing for Murder: An Empirical Investigation of Public Knowledge and Attitudes in England and Wales, Report for the Nuffield Foundation (2010) at <http://www.jointenterprise.co/Docs%20&%20PDFS/PublicOpinionSentencingMurder.pdf>

[Accessed March 2017].

- 54 Law Commission, Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), para.1.112.
- 55 Law Commission Paper No.177, Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 cl.54(1). This proposal was endorsed by the House of Lords Select Committee on Murder and Life Imprisonment (Session 1988–89, HL Paper 78) (1989), para.71.
- 56 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), para.2.50.
- 57 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), paras 2.88–2.94.
- 58 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), para.2.70. It would also be second degree murder if there was an intention to cause injury or fear or risk of injury while aware of a serious risk of causing death.
- 59 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), para.2.84. Under current law “bodily harm” for the purposes of non-fatal offences has been interpreted to include recognised psychiatric conditions (R. v Chan-Fook (Mike) [1994] 1 W.L.R. 689), but not to include a severely depressed state that does not amount to a recognised psychiatric illness (Dhaliwal [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 236).
- 60 Model Penal Code s.210.2(1)(b).
- 61 Model Penal Code s.210.3(1)(a).
- 62 e.g. North Dakota (N.D. Cent. Code ss.12.1–16–01(1)(b)).
- 63 In R. v Wilby (Christopher Keith) [2008] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 98 the Court of Appeal held, correspondingly, that intent to kill was not an aggravating factor in sentencing for murder.
- 64 G. H. Gordon, “The Mental Element in Crime” (1971) 16 J.L.S.S. 282, 285.
- 65 See Ch.2.
- 66 See above, Ch.2 para.2-117 where this example is used to illustrate further argument on this point.
- 67 Draft Criminal Code Bill 1989 c1.18(b)(ii).
- 68 C. M. V. Clarkson and H. M. Keating, “Codification: Offences against the Person under the Draft Criminal Code” (1986) 50 Jo. C.L. 405.
- 69 Law Commission No.304 (2006), para.2.70.
- 70 It has been argued that there is no need for the grievous bodily harm rule to be maintained in addition to a test of recklessness, since it is likely that all those who intend to cause serious harm would also be caught by an appropriately defined test for reckless: V. Tadros, “The Homicide Ladder” (2006) 69 M.L.R. 601.
- 71 R. Moreland, “A Re-examination of the Law of Homicide in 1971: The Model Penal Code” (1971) 59 Ky. L.J. 788–828, 798.
- 72 Commentary to 9th Tent. Draft, p.29.
- 73 Cal. Penal Code s.188.
- 74 Drury v HM Advocate 2001 S.L.T. 1013.
- 75 G. D. W. Mueller, “Where Murder Begins” (1960) 2 N.H.B.J. 214, 217. Contra, G. Williams, “The Mens Rea for Murder” (1989) 105 L.Q.R. 387.
- 76 Crofts argues that modern accounts of criminal law reduce wrongdoing into components such as act, intention and consequence without explicit normative language, and that we should instead critically evaluate models of wickedness which do not rely on the subjective model of criminality. In particular, we should look to the historical use of malice as a “resource in the form of a legal template of classic conceptions of wickedness as an absence of goodness, transcending the subjective/objective divide and reminding us of the importance of factors beyond act/intention and consequence in attributions of blameworthiness. This model is a reminder of the intersection of the individual and the social in constructions of wickedness”. P. Crofts, Wickedness and Crime: Laws of Homicide and Malice (Routledge 2013), p.261.

- 77 Offences against the Person Act 1861 s.5.
- 78 Andrews v DPP [1937] A.C. 576 per Lord Atkin.
- 79 For a flavour of the variations in culpability exhibited by those convicted of involuntary manslaughter, see B. Mitchell and R. Mackay, “Investigating Involuntary Manslaughter: An Empirical Study of 127 Cases” (2011) 31 O.J.L.S. 165–191.
- 80 Justifiable killings have not been included in this diagram.
- 81 B. Mitchell and R. Mackay, “Investigating Involuntary Manslaughter: An Empirical Study of 127 Cases” (2011) 31 O.J.L.S. 165–191, 178.
- 82 Law Commission Paper No.237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996), para.5.15. The Law Commission’s more recent Consultation Paper on homicide does, however, suggest that what is needed is knowledge of a risk of killing (rather than foresight of death or serious injury): Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), para.1.10. The existence of this category of manslaughter was confirmed in Lidar LTL 12 November 1999.
- 83 J. C. Smith, Commentary to Adomako [1994] Crim. L.R. 758, 759.
- 84 Law Commission Paper No.237 (1996), para.2.27.
- 85 See, e.g. R. v Kime (Darren John) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 3. In R. v Coutts (Graham James) [2006] 1 W.L.R. 2154, the House of Lords held that, as a matter of principle, a trial judge in a murder case should always leave an alternative count of manslaughter to the jury, even if the defence case is to rely on a complete defence (such as accident) which, if successful, would lead to complete acquittal.
- 86 See, e.g. R. v Woollin (Stephen Leslie) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 8.
- 87 See, e.g. R. v Jackson (Leslie Joseph) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 77.
- 88 Franklin (1883) 15 Cox C.C. 163.
- 89 R. v Scarlett (John) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 290.
- 90 Andrews v DPP [1937] A.C. 576 at 585.
- 91 R. v Lowe (Robert) [1973] Q.B. 702 at 709. In stating that manslaughter should not be the inevitable consequence Phillimore LJ was presumably conceding that, while an omission will not suffice for constructive manslaughter, it can form the basis of a manslaughter conviction if there has been gross negligence or recklessness as discussed below.
- 92 B. Mitchell and R. Mackay, “Investigating Involuntary Manslaughter: An Empirical Study of 127 Cases” (2011) 31 O.J.L.S. 165–191, 186.
- 93 R. v Larkin (Henry) (1944) 29 Cr. App. R. 18.
- 94 cf. R. v Arobieke [1988] Crim. L.R. 314 where a conviction for manslaughter was quashed on the basis of lack of an unlawful act. The victim, terrified of the defendant, had run away and electrocuted himself. The defendant had, however, done no more than look for the victim which was insufficient to amount to an assault.

- 95 Willoughby [2004] EWCA Crim 3365.
- 96 Contrary to the Criminal Damage Act 1971 ss.1(2) and (3).
- 97 It was held that the defendant did owe the deceased a duty of care. However, this was not because he owned the property in which the deceased died, but because he engaged him to participate in spreading petrol with a view to setting fire to the premises for the defendant's benefit.
- 98 Willoughby [2004] EWCA Crim 3365 at [24].
- 99 R. v Meeking (Caroline) [2013] R.T.R. 4.
- 100 It is not at all clear that it was right to do so. As noted by Ashworth, the unlawful act on which the manslaughter was based is primarily one of negligence, and the case should not have been allowed to go ahead on the basis of unlawful act manslaughter, on the authority of Andrews [1937] A.C. 576: Ashworth, Commentary to R. v Meeking (Caroline) [2013] Crim. L.R. 333.
- 101 R. v Meeking (Caroline) [2013] R.T.R. 4 at [14].
- 102 R. v Jennings [1990] Crim. L.R. 588.
- 103 R. v Cato (Ronald Philip) (1976) 62 Cr. App. R. 41.
- 104 It would appear that the deceased's consent to be injected will not provide a defence. Where the drug injected is not unlawful but a prescription drug under the Medicines Act 1968, it is an offence to administer such a drug under s.67 of that statute unless the person doing so is an appropriate practitioner. It has been held that consent to injection (in this case of insulin) by a non-practitioner is, as a matter of policy, no defence to a charge of manslaughter: R. v Andrews (Christopher Kenneth) [2003] Crim. L.R. 477.
- 105 R. v Kennedy (Simon) [2008] 1 A.C. 269.
- 106 D. Ormerod, Commentary to Kennedy (No.2) [2008] 3 Crim. L.R. 222, 225.
- 107 R. v Burgess (Lee) [2008] EWCA Crim 516.
- 108 There are a number of convictions for manslaughter that have been quashed on this basis since the House of Lords' decision in Kennedy (No.2): e.g. R. v Glover (Peter) [2008] EWCA Crim 1782; Keen [2008] EWCA Crim 1742.
- 109 Although it is not possible for such a supplier to be liable under the heading of constructive manslaughter he might, depending on the circumstances, be liable for gross negligence manslaughter. If he was present when the drugs were taken and assumed responsibility for the deceased by taking action to help him, for example by giving mouth to mouth resuscitation or administering adrenalin, but failed to take further action such as calling for an ambulance when the victim's condition failed to improve, he might be liable for gross negligence manslaughter. These are the circumstances in which the defendant in R. v Phillips (Ben) [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 67 pleaded guilty to gross negligence manslaughter. See also Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10, where the defendant drug supplier was liable for manslaughter, having created a dangerous situation.
- 110 C. Elliott and C. de Than have also suggested that a new statutory homicide offence ought to be created: "Prosecuting the Drug Dealer When a Drug User Dies: R v Kennedy (No.2)" (2006) 69 M.L.R. 986.
- 111 "Drug-induced homicide" is an offence in Wyoming (where the maximum penalty is 20 years' imprisonment: W.S. 6-2-108) and Illinois (where the penalty is 15–30 years' imprisonment: 720 I.L.C.S./5/9-3.3). In Pennsylvania, there exists a homicide offence of “drug delivery resulting in death”. This is punishable by a maximum of 40 years' imprisonment: P.C.S. Title 18 ½2506. In New Jersey, there is an offence of “strict liability for drug-induced death” committed by anyone who “manufactures, distributes or dispenses” controlled drugs that result in death. The New Jersey Code of Criminal Justice, 2C:35–9 states that “it shall not be a defense to a prosecution under this section that the decedent contributed to his own death by his purposeful, knowing, reckless or negligent injection, inhalation or ingestion of the substance, or by his consenting to the administration of the substance by another”.

112 Scarlett (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 290.

113 Above, fn.102.

114 R. v Watson (Clarence Archibald) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 684.

115 R. v Ball [1989] Crim. L.R. 730.

116 R. v Dawson (Brian) (1985) 81 Cr. App. R. 150.

117 R. v Williams (Barry Anthony) [1992] 2 All E.R. 183 at 191.

118 R. v M [2013] 1 Cr. App. R. 10.

119 The approach in R. v Church [1966] 1 Q.B. 59 and DPP v Newbury [1977] A.C. 500 has recently been confirmed yet again in the case of R. v JF and NE [2015] EWCA Crim 351, in which convictions for manslaughter were upheld on proof of mens rea of simple arson (criminal damage), where the defendants had at the same time been acquitted of arson, being reckless as to whether life was endangered. The defendants were found by the jury to have had foresight of the risk of damage to the building by fire, and it was not necessary for them to have foreseen a risk of endangering life in order to be convicted of manslaughter. However, they had foreseen some harm and so even if the Church test had been modified so as to be a subjective test, they would still have been liable.

120 R. v Bristow (Terrence) [2013] EWCA Crim 1540.

121 R. v Bristow (Terrence) [2013] EWCA Crim 1540 at [34].

122 R. v Carey (Claire Anne) [2006] EWCA Crim 17.

123 Carey [2006] Crim. L.R. 842.

124 Ormerod cites Hayward (1908) 21 Cox C.C. 692 in support of this argument.

125 R. v DJ [2007] EWCA Crim 3133.

126 R. v DJ [2007] EWCA Crim 3133 at [33].

127 R. v DJ [2007] EWCA Crim 3133 at [53].

128 R. v Kennedy (Simon) [2008] 1 A.C. 269.

129 R. v Dalby (Derek Shaun) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 348.

130 R. v Mitchell (Ronald James) (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 293.

131 R. v Dalby (Derek Shaun) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 348 was decided before Kennedy No.2. There is now no doubt that the self-injection of the drugs would break the chain of causation.

132 J.C. Smith, [1982] Crim. L.R. 440.

133 In a sample of 127 cases of involuntary manslaughter only one case was identified as having been a clear case of gross negligence manslaughter: B. Mitchell and R. Mackay, “Investigating Involuntary Manslaughter: An Empirical Study of 127

- Cases” (2011) 31 O.J.L.S. 165–191, 171.
- 134 But see R. v Willoughby (Keith Calverley) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 29 where, despite the possibility of proving manslaughter via the unlawful act route, the prosecution chose instead to argue their case based on gross negligence.
- 135 R. v Bateman (Percy) (1927) 19 Cr. App. R. 8 CCA.
- 136 R. v Seymour (Edward John) [1983] 2 A.C. 493.
- 137 J. Herring and E. Palser, “The Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter” [2007] Crim. L.R. 24, 33.
- 138 Herring and Palser, “The Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter” [2007] Crim. L.R. 24, 37.
- 139 Herring and Palser, “The Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter” [2007] Crim. L.R. 24, 39–40.
- 140 Herring and Palser, “The Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter” [2007] Crim. L.R. 24, 32.
- 141 Herring and Palser, “The Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter” [2007] Crim. L.R. 24, 37. Willoughby [2004] EWCA Crim 3365 can be seen as a rejection of this principle in the criminal law.
- 142 Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10.
- 143 Law Commission Paper No.237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996), paras 3.12–3.13. The Law Commission concludes that the language of tort is best avoided.
- 144 Willoughby [2004] EWCA Crim 3365. Whether a duty of care exists under the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 s.2(5), is a question of law. This is discussed in Ch.3.
- 145 Evans [2009] 2 Cr. App. R. 10.
- 146 R. v G [2004] 1 A.C. 1034.
- 147 R. v Mark (Alan James) [2004] EWCA Crim 2490. See also R. v Misra (Amit) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21.
- 148 Per Lord Mackay in Adomako.
- 149 See below, para.8-172 for the effect of Adomako on so-called motor manslaughter.
- 150 C. Smith [1994] Crim. L.R. 758; G. Virgo, “Reconstructing Manslaughter on Defective Foundations” [1995] C.L.J. 14, 15. See also, L. H. Leigh, “Liability for Inadvertance: A Lordly Legacy” [1995] 58 M.L.R. 457; S. Gardner, “Manslaughter by Gross Negligence” (1995) 111 L.Q.R. 22.
- 151 Article 7 provides that “no-one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed”.
- 152 R. v Misra (Amit) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21 at [52]. Previous support for this had been given in the cases of R. v Singh (Gurphal) [1999] Crim. L.R. 582 and Lewin v CPS [2002] EWHC 1049 (Admin).
- 153 R. v Goodfellow (Kevin) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 23.
- 154 In R. v Yaqoob (Mohammed) [2005] EWCA Crim 2169, it was held that a direction to the jury should refer to the risk of death involved and that in a direction incorporating disregard of the life and safety of others the reference to safety was superfluous.

- 155 R. v Stone (John Edward) [1977] Q.B. 354.
- 156 Att-Gen's Reference (No.2 of 1999) [2000] Q.B. 796
- 157 R. v Misra (Amit) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21 at [56].
- 158 R. v Misra (Amit) [2005] 1 Cr. App. R. 21 at [57]. See Ch.2, above.
- 159 See further, S. Gardner, "Manslaughter by Gross Negligence" [1995] 111 L.Q.R. 22 and L.H. Leigh, "Liability for Inadvertance: A Lordly Legacy" [1995] 58 M.L.R. 457.
- 160 O. Quick, "Prosecuting 'Gross' Medical Negligence: Manslaughter, Discretion, and the Crown Prosecution Service" (2006) 33 J. Law and Society 421, 438.
- 161 Griffiths and Sanders suggest that there has been an increase in the number of cases referred to the CPS for a decision on a manslaughter charge in such cases due to an increase in the number of coronial inquests and police investigations of deaths taking in place under medical care, because of the way the "right to life" under the ECHR art.2 has been interpreted to mean that public bodies are obliged to conduct investigations to establish who may be responsible for any deaths: D. Griffiths and A. Sanders, "The Road to the Dock: Prosecution Decision-Making in Medical Manslaughter Cases", in Griffiths and Sanders, Bioethics, Medicine and the Criminal Law, Volume 2, Medicine, Crime and Society (Cambridge: CUP, 2013).
- 162 O. Quick, "Prosecuting 'Gross' Medical Negligence: Manslaughter, Discretion, and the Crown Prosecution Service" (2006) 33 J. Law and Society 421, 448.
- 163 O. Quick, "Medical Killing, Need for a Special Offence?" in C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008).
- 164 D. Griffiths and A. Sanders, "The Road to the Dock: Prosecution Decision-Making in Medical Manslaughter Cases" in Griffiths and Sanders, Bioethics, Medicine and the Criminal Law, Volume 2, Medicine, Crime and Society (Cambridge: CUP, 2013), p.136. 165 D. Griffiths and A. Sanders, "The Road to the Dock: Prosecution Decision-Making in Medical Manslaughter Cases" in Griffiths and Sanders, Bioethics, Medicine and the Criminal Law, Volume 2, Medicine, Crime and Society (Cambridge: CUP, 2013), p.140. 166 D. Griffiths and A. Sanders, "The Road to the Dock: Prosecution Decision-Making in Medical Manslaughter Cases" in Griffiths and Sanders, Bioethics, Medicine and the Criminal Law, Volume 2, Medicine, Crime and Society (Cambridge: CUP, 2013), p.143. 167 D. Griffiths and A. Sanders, "The Road to the Dock: Prosecution Decision-Making in Medical Manslaughter Cases" in Griffiths and Sanders, Bioethics, Medicine and the Criminal Law, Volume 2, Medicine, Crime and Society (Cambridge: CUP, 2013), p.148. 168 Re Att-Gen's Reference (Nos 60, 62 and 63 of 2009) [2010] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 46.
- 169 R. v Coleman (Anthony Neville) (1992) 95 Cr. App. R. 159.
- 170 "In considering the seriousness of any offence, the court must consider the offender's culpability in committing the offence and any harm which the offence caused, was intended to cause or might foreseeably have caused".
- 171 R. v Furby (Andrew) [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 8.
- 172 Att-Gen's Reference (No.16 of 2014) [2014] EWCA Crim 956; R. v Lynch [2015] EWCA Crim 1130.
- 173 R. v Holtom (Colin Charles) [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 18.
- 174 R. v Barrass (John Morris) [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 80.

- 175 R. v Garg (Sudhanshu) [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 30.
- 176 H. Quirk, “Sentencing White Coat Crime: The Need for Guidance in Medical Manslaughter Cases” [2013] Crim. L.R. 871–888, 888.
- 177 It is true that prosecutions for gross negligence manslaughter have been quite rare in the past. However, they are becoming more common. Quick has found that since the mid-1980s the number of investigations of medical gross negligence manslaughter have increased considerably. In the period 1976–1985 only 7 cases were investigated. In the following decade (1986–1995) this number almost doubled (13), whilst in the 10-year period 1996–2005 there were 40 incidents that were investigated: Quick, above, fn.160.
- 178 J. Gardner, “Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences against the Person” (1994) 53 C.L.J. 502.
- 179 B. Mitchell, “More Thoughts about Unlawful and Dangerous Act Manslaughter and the One-punch Killer” [2009] Crim. L.R. 502, 506.
- 180 This is of little surprise, given Horder’s position in the Law Commission at the time of the Law Commission’s report in 2006. For further arguments in support of the Law Commission’s approach, see J. Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (Oxford: OUP, 2012), Ch.5.
- 181 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.135, Involuntary Manslaughter (1994).
- 182 Law Commission Paper No.237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996).
- 183 Law Commission Paper No.237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996), para.4.23, citing J. Austin, “A Plea for Excuses” in Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, New Series, Vol.57 (1956–7), p.1.
- 184 Home Office, Reforming the Law on Involuntary Manslaughter: The Government’s Proposals (2000).
- 185 It should be noted, however, that these proposals form part of a package of reforms to homicide, in which a “ladder” of offences would be created. Whilst “manslaughter” would remain a fairly broad offence at the bottom of the ladder, it would be narrower than the current offence of manslaughter since some reckless killings and those killings which currently fall within the law of voluntary manslaughter would amount to murder in the second degree.
- 186 Homicide Act 1957 s.2.
- 187 Homicide Act 1957 s.4.
- 188 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.56.
- 189 R. v Duffy [1949] 1 All E.R. 932.
- 190 R. v Camplin (Paul) [1978] A.C. 705.
- 191 This was an offence at the time of R. v Camplin (Paul) [1978] A.C. 705. It means anally raped.
- 192 Bedder v DPP (1954) 38 Cr. App. R.133.
- 193 In Marks [1998] Crim. L.R. 676 the Court of Appeal accepted that the defence of provocation was available to an accomplice to murder.
- 194 Law Commission Paper No.290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004).
- 195 Law Commission Paper No.290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004), para.3.35.
- 196 Law Commission Paper No.290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004), para.3.21.

- 197 R. v Smith (Morgan James) [2001] 1 A.C. 146 at 159–160 per Lord Hoffmann, drawing upon the work of J. Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 1992).
- 198 See further, S. Gough, “Taking the Heat out of Provocation” [1999] 19 O.J.L.S. 481.
- 199 See A. Ashworth, “The Doctrine of Provocation” [1976] C.L.J. 292; P. Alldrige, “The Coherence of Defences” [1983] Crim. L.R. 665.
- 200 Smith [2001] 1 A.C. 146 per Lord Hoffmann at 160.
- 201 e.g. Davies [1975] Q.B. 691. The requirement in s.3 that the provocation resulted from “things done or said” does, however, suggest that human activity must have been involved: the defendant could not plead, for example, that he was provoked by bad weather.
- 202 See Alldrige, “The Coherence of Defences” [1983] Crim. L.R. 665.
- 203 As in R. v Doughty (Stephen Clifford) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 319.
- 204 See, generally, on this transmutation of provocation from a partial justification to a partial excuse, Alldrige, “The Coherence of Defences” [1983] Crim. L.R. 665, 669–672.
- 205 Hayward (1908) 21 Cox C.C. 692 at 694, per Lord Tindal CJ.
- 206 See further, A. Ashworth, “The Doctrine of Provocation” [1976] C.L.J. 292; J. Horder, “Autonomy, Provocation and Duress” [1992] Crim. L.R. 706, 707–711; Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (1992).
- 207 Ministry of Justice, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide: Proposals for Reform of the Law, CP 19/08, 2008, para.34.
- 208 In Dawes [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. 3 the Court of Appeal emphasised the need for there to be sufficient evidence of all three elements of the defence (loss of self-control, qualifying trigger and reaction of a person of normal tolerance and self-restraint) before the judge is required to leave the defence to the jury. Further, in Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178, the Court of Appeal stated that “A much more rigorous evaluation of the evidence had to be undertaken before the defence was left to the jury than was required under the law of provocation”.
- 209 As in R. v Cocker [1989] Crim. L.R. 740 where the undeniably provocative behaviour of his terminally-ill wife did not cause the defendant to lose control (as it could have done) but led him calmly to accede to her requests to die.
- 210 For a discussion of the Law Commission’s reasoning, and arguments that the Government was mistaken to reject it, see J. Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (Oxford: OUP, 2012), Ch.8.
- 211 Per Tindal CJ in Hayward (1833) 6 C. & P. 157 at 159, repeated in Ahluwalia (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 133 at 138 by Taylor LCJ.
- 212 J. Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (Oxford: OUP, 1992), p.109; A. Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law, 5th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2006), pp.265–266.
- 213 Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (1992), pp.101–102.
- 214 It has sometimes been claimed (Holmes [1946] A.C. 588) that provocation negates malice aforethought. Both Lee Chun-Chuen [1963] A.C. 220 and the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, Cmnd.8932 (1953), p.51, point out that this is wrong if it means that the prosecution do not have to establish mens rea. If it did, one would not need a special defence of provocation or loss of control. See also J. Horder, “Autonomy, Provocation and Duress” [1992] Crim. L.R.706, 712–715.

- 215 R. v Richens (Andrew Ronald) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 43.
- 216 A. Ashworth, Commentary to Dawes [2013] Crim. L.R. 770, 772.
- 217 R. Holton and S. Shute, “Self-Control in the Modern Provocation Defence” (2007) O.J.L.S. 27(1) 49, 50.
- 218 R. Holton and S. Shute, “Self-Control in the Modern Provocation Defence” (2007) O.J.L.S. 27(1) 49, 54.
- 219 R. Holton and S. Shute, “Self-Control in the Modern Provocation Defence” (2007) O.J.L.S. 27(1) 49, 52.
- 220 R. Holton and S. Shute, “Self-Control in the Modern Provocation Defence” (2007) O.J.L.S. 27(1) 49, 58.
- 221 Duffy [1949] 1 All E.R. 932.
- 222 J. Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992), pp.72–110. The other form Horder identifies is that of “anger as outrage” which has been lost to modern law: see further, pp.59–71.
- 223 Despite the clear over-reaction in this example, it will not necessarily be the case that a hasty reaction is an excessive one. See further, Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (1992), pp.107–109.
- 224 The issue could be withdrawn from the jury if the delay was considerable. See, e.g. R. v Ibrams (James David) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 154 in which the Court of Appeal upheld the withdrawal of the defence from the jury in the case of two appellants who had delayed several days before retaliating.
- 225 R. v Ahluwalia (Kiranjit) (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 133.
- 226 I R. v Ahluwalia (Kiranjit) (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 133 at 139.
- 227 Ministry of Justice, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide: Proposals for Reform of the Law, CP 19/08, 2008, para.37.
- 228 R. v Doughty (Stephen Clifford) (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 319.
- 229 Law Commission Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (LC 304) (2006), para.5.54.
- 230 Ministry of Justice, CP 19/08, para.28.
- 231 R. v Smith (Morgan James) [2001] 1 A.C. 146 at 168.
- 232 A. Howe, “Mastering Emotions or Still Losing Control? Seeking Public Engagement with ‘Sexual Infidelity’ Homicide” (2013) 21 Fem. Leg. Stud. 141–161, 146.
- 233 Duffy (1949) 1 All E.R. 932.
- 234 S. Edwards, “Justice Devlin’s Legacy: Duffy—A Battered Woman ‘Caught’ in Time” [2009] Crim. L.R. 851–869, 869.
- 235 A. Howe, “Mastering Emotions or Still Losing Control? Seeking Public Engagement with ‘Sexual Infidelity’ Homicide” (2013) 21 Fem. Leg. Stud. 141–161, 146.
- 236 S. Edwards, “Loss of Self-Control: When His Anger is Worth More than Her Fear” in Reed and Bohlander, Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (Ashgate, 2011), p.79.
- 237 On this point, see also B. Mitchell, “Loss of Self-control under the Coroners and Justice Act 2009: Oh No!”, in Reed and Bohlander, Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (Ashgate, 2011). See also comments by respondents in the form of policy stakeholders to interview questions in Fitz-Gibbon, “Replacing Provocation in England and Wales: Examining the Partial Defence of Loss of Control” (2013) 40 Journal of Law and

- Soc. 280–305, 291.
- 238 See paras 4-123–4-127. Whilst such a partial defence has not been created, the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s.76(5A) now allows householders, at least, to use force which may be seen to be disproportionate, so long as it is not grossly disproportionate
- 239 J. Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (Oxford: OUP, 2012), p.222.
- 240 Ministry of Justice, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide: Proposals for Reform of the Law: Summary of Responses and Government Position, CP(R) 19/08 (2009), para.28.
- 241 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), para.5.11.
- 242 Ministry of Justice, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide: Proposals for Reform of the Law, CP 19/08 (2008), Annex A.
- 243 Ministry of Justice, CP(R) 19/08, para.40.
- 244 R. v Dawes (Carlos) [2013] EWCA Crim 322 at [60].
- 245 Ministry of Justice, CP(R) 19/08, para.45.
- 246 Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322 at [61].
- 247 Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322 at [65].
- 248 Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322 at [66].
- 249 This example was used in a public opinion survey conducted by Barry Mitchell for the Law Commission: Partial Defences to Murder, Law Com. No.290, Appendix C.
- 250 See also, J. Horder, “Provocation and Loss of Self-Control” (1992) 108 L.Q.R. 191. Here Horder calls for the abolition of the defence. However, he has later put forward proposals for extension of the law: J. Horder, “Reshaping the Subjective Element in the Provocation Defence (2005) 25 O.J.L.S. 123.
- 251 J. Herring, “The Serious Wrong of Domestic Abuse and the Loss of Control Defence”, in Reed and Bohlander, Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2011), p.78.
- 252 Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.79.
- 253 Dawes [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. 3 at [58].
- 254 Hansard, House of Lords, 11 November 2009, col.836.
- 255 Ministry of Justice, CP 19/08, para.32.
- 256 A. Howe, “‘Red Mist’ Homicide: Sexual Infidelity and the English Law of Murder (glossing Titus Andronicus)” (2013) 33 Legal Studies 407–430.
- 257 K. Fitz-Gibbon, “Replacing Provocation in England and Wales: Examining the Partial Defence of Loss of Control” (2013) 40 J. of Law and Society 280–305, 293.
- 258 A. Reed and N. Wake, “Sexual Infidelity Killings: Contemporary Standardisations and Comparative Stereotypes” in Reed and Bohlander, Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2011), p.133.
- 259 Ashworth, Commentary to Clinton [2012] 539, 544.
- 260 “Jon-Jaques Clinton makes U-turn at retrial for wife’s murder” BBC News 3 September 2012 at <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-berkshire-19469372>

[Accessed March 2017].

- 261 K. Fitz-Gibbon, “Replacing Provocation in England and Wales: Examining the Partial Defence of Loss of Control” (2013) 40 J. of Law and Society 280–305, 298.
- 262 Horder gives the example of disqualifying as provocation anything said or done by a child in order to explicitly overrule Doughty: J. Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (Oxford: OUP, 2012), p.211.
- 263 Ministry of Justice, CP(R) 19/08, para.56.
- 264 Att-Gen for Jersey v Holley [2005] 2 A.C. 580.
- 265 R. v Van Dongen (Anthony Gerrard) (Appeal against Conviction) [2005] Crim. L.R. 971.
- 266 A. Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law, 6th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2009), p.259.
- 267 From the dicta of Keating J in Welsh (1869) 11 Cox C.C. 336 at 339 who stated that provocation would be sufficient if it was “something which might naturally cause an ordinary and reasonably minded man to lose his self-control and commit such an act”.
- 268 Bedder [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1119.
- 269 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.249.
- 270 R. v Camplin (Paul) [1978] A.C. 705.
- 271 Morhall [1996] 1 A.C. 90.
- 272 Luc Thiet Thuan v The Queen [1997] A.C. 131.
- 273 Smith (2001) 1 A.C. 146.
- 274 Att-Gen for Jersey v Holley [2005] 2 A.C. 580.
- 275 “The Doctrine of Provocation” [1976] C.L.J. 292, 300.
- 276 Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.11.
- 277 Ministry of Justice, CP(R) 19/08, para.77.
- 278 Ministry of Justice, CP(R) 19/08, para.78.
- 279 See, e.g. S. Edwards, “Anger and Fear as Justifiable Preludes for Loss of Self-Control” (2010) 74 J. of Criminal Law 223 and A. Carline, “Reforming Provocation: Perspectives from the Law Commission and the Government” [2009] 2 Web J. of Current Legal Issues.
- 280 N. Cobb and A. Gausden, “Feminism, ‘Typical’ Women, and Losing Control”, in Reed and Bohlander, Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2011).
- 281 A. Norrie, “From Criminal Law to Legal Theory: The Mysterious Case of the Reasonable Glue Sniffer” [2002] 65 M.L.R. 538.
- 282 Although the appeal was allowed the manslaughter conviction was permitted to stand due to an undertaking given by the Att-Gen not to seek to restore the conviction for murder.
- 283 In R. v James (Leslie) [2006] 1 Cr. App. R. 29 the Court of Appeal endorsed the decision in Att-Gen for Jersey v Holley [2005] 2 A.C. 580 over that of Smith.
- 284 R. D. Mackay, B. Mitchell and W. J. Brookbanks, “Pleading for Provoked Killers: In Defence of Morgan Smith” (2008) 124 L.Q.R. 675.
- 285 R. Holton and S. Shute, “Self-Control in the Modern Provocation Defence” (2007)

- O.J.L.S. 27(1) 49.
- 286 R. v Asmelash (Dawit) [2014] Q.B. 103.
- 287 Directing the Jury (2011), quoted in Asmelash [2014] Q. B. 103 at [17].
- 288 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2011), p.603.
- 289 This was the view of several consultees to the Law Commission's review of partial defences to murder: Law Commission Paper No.290, para.5.18.
- 290 Above, Ch.4.
- 291 R. v Antoine (Pierre Harrison) [2001] 1 A.C. 340 decided that once a defendant has been found unfit to plead they cannot go on to plead diminished responsibility (to avoid indefinite mandatory commitment) because the trial terminates. Since the defendant is no longer liable to be convicted of murder the defence in s.2 cannot arise.
- 292 R. v Lambert (Steven) [2001] 1 Cr. App. R. 14. The subsequent appeal to the House of Lords did not deal with diminished responsibility. The prosecution may raise the plea if the defendant is pleading insanity: R. v Campbell (Colin Frederick) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 255.
- 293 R. v Foye (Lee Robert) [2013] EWCA Crim 475. That art.6 is not breached by the amended version of s.2 was further confirmed in R. v Wilcocks (Callum Paul) [2016] EWCA Crim 2043 (CA (Crim Div)).
- 294 R. v Byrne (Patrick Joseph) (1960) 44 Cr. App. R. 246.
- 295 Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.112.
- 296 As acknowledged by the Law Commission itself: Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.129.
- 297 Ministry of Justice, CP 19/08, para.53.
- 298 Ministry of Justice, CP(R) 19/08, para.98.
- 299 Reference to Byrne is still made in guidance to judges on summing up cases of diminished responsibility: Judicial College, Crown Court Compendium: Part 1: Jury and Trial Management and Summing Up (May 2016) 19-1 at <https://www.judiciary.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/05/crown-court-compedium-part-i-jury-and-trial-management-and-summing-up.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 300 Law Commission Paper No.290, Partial Defences to Murder, para.5.95.
- 301 Ministry of Justice, CP 19/08, para.49. See also R. Mackay, "The Coroners and Justice Act 2009—partial defences to murder (2) the new diminished responsibility plea" [2010] Crim. L.R. 290–302, 294. However, the fact that a condition is listed in such a guide does not in itself, it appears, make it an abnormality of mental functioning for the purposes of s.2(1). See Dowds [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 34.
- 302 Little was said on the meaning of "substantially" impaired under the previous law. It was stated in R. v Ramchurn (Jayant) [2010] 2 Cr. App. R. 3 that "substantially" is an ordinary English word, which imports neither uncertainty nor ambiguity into the statutory language. Lord Judge CJ said the use of "substantially" was "designed to ensure that the murderous activity of a defendant should not result in a conviction for manslaughter rather than murder on account of any impairment of mental responsibility, however trivial and insignificant; but equally that the defence should be available without the defendant having to show that his mental responsibility for his actions was so grossly impaired as to be extinguished" at [23].

- 303 Law Commission Paper No.290 (2004), para.5.51.
- 304 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.5.118.
- 305 Report of the Committee on the Penalty for Homicide (1993), p.33.
- 306 Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.118.
- 307 Mackay, “The Coroners and Justice Act 2009—partial defences to murder (2) the new diminished responsibility plea” [2010] Crim. L.R. 290–302, 295.
- 308 Judicial College, Crown Court Compendium: Part 1: Jury and Trial Management and Summing Up (May 2016) 19-1 [9].
- 309 R. Mackay and B. Mitchell, “The new diminished responsibility plea in operation: some initial findings” [2017] Crim. L.R. 18–35, 33.
- 310 R. v Golds [2015] 1 W.L.R. 1030.
- 311 R. Mackay and B. Mitchell, “The new diminished responsibility plea in operation: some initial findings” [2017] Crim. L.R. 18–35, 33.
- 312 Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.122.
- 313 Mackay, “The Coroners and Justice Act 2009—partial defences to murder (2) the new diminished responsibility plea” [2010] Crim. L.R. 290–302, 300.
- 314 Ministry of Justice, 19/08(R), para.95.
- 315 For arguments as to why the problem with the causation requirement is more apparent than real, see R. Fortson, “The Modern Partial Defence of Diminished Responsibility” in Reed and Bohlander, Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2011), p.35.
- 316 Bunch [2013] EWCA Crim 2498.
- 317 Brennan [2014] EWCA Crim 2387; [2015] 1 Cr. App. R. 14.
- 318 The approach in Brennan [2014] EWCA Crim 2387 was endorsed by the Supreme Court in Golds [2016] UKSC 61 at [51].
- 319 R. Mackay and B. Mitchell, “The new diminished responsibility plea in operation: some initial findings” [2017] Crim. L.R. 18–35, 26.
- 320 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005), para.8.84.
- 321 R. Mackay, Case Comment: R v. Golds 2017 Arch. Rev. 2017, 1, 4–5.
- 322 R. Mackay, “The Diminished Responsibility Plea in Operation—An Empirical Study”, Appendix B to Law Com. No.290 (2004), table 15b.
- 323 R. Mackay and B. Mitchell, “The new diminished responsibility plea in operation: some initial findings” [2017] Crim. L.R. 18–35, 29.
- 324 For a discussion of intoxication and diminished responsibility, see M. Gibson “Intoxicants and Diminished Responsibility” [2011] Crim. L.R. 909–924.
- 325 R. v Tandy (Linda Mary) [1988] Crim. L.R. 308.
- 326 Bunch [2013] EWCA Crim 2498.
- 327 R. v Dietschmann (Anthony) [2003] 1 A.C. 1209.
- 328 R. v Wood (Clive) [2008] 2 Cr. App. R. 34.
- 329 R. v Stewart (James) [2009] EWCA Crim 593.

- 330 Dowds [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 34.
- 331 This has now been updated to the DSM-V. The fact that conditions listed in the DSM do not remain static from edition to edition might in itself prove problematic.
- 332 Law Commission Paper No.304, para.5.100.
- 333 Ahluwalia (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 133.
- 334 See also R. v Hobson (Kathleen) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 31 where the Court of Appeal ordered a retrial on the basis that the issue of “Battered Women’s Syndrome” (added to the British Classification of Mental Diseases after her trial but prior to the appeal) should have been put to the jury.
- 335 See, e.g. K. O’Donovan, “Defences for Battered Women Who Kill” (1991) 18 J.L. and Soc. 219.
- 336 R. Mackay, “The Diminished Responsibility Plea in Operation—An Empirical Study”, Appendix B to Law Com. No.290 (2004). This figure combines both hospital orders and restriction orders. A “restriction order” (Mental Health Act 1983 s.41) is an order that can be attached to the hospital order to prevent the offender being transferred to another hospital, given leave of absence or discharged without the Home Secretary’s consent.
- 337 In his study of 126 convictions for diminished responsibility manslaughter over the years 1997–2001, Mackay found that a discretionary life sentence was imposed in 10 cases. In his more recent study with Mitchell, the proportion of such convictions resulting in a life sentence was higher: R. Mackay and B. Mitchell, “The new diminished responsibility plea in operation: some initial findings” [2017] Crim. L.R. 18–35, 27–28.
- 338 Brown [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 27.
- 339 R. v Brown (Robert) [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 27.
- 340 R. v Welsh (Colin Christopher) [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 68.
- 341 See, e.g. Thompson [2014] EWCA Crim 2892 in which the Court of Appeal concluded that the case would have attracted a sentence of 25 years had it been decided at trial; given a plea of guilty a sentence of 17 years, reduced from 20, was appropriate.
- 342 R. v Blackman (Alexander Wayne) [2017] EWCA Crim 325.
- 343 Butler Committee on Mentally Abnormal Offenders, Cmnd.6244, para.19.7.
- 344 R. v Webb (George Hugh) [2011] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 61.
- 345 In Dunbar v Plant [1997] 3 W.L.R. 1261 it was stated that the public interest does not generally call for the survivor of a suicide pact to be prosecuted.
- 346 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.236.
- 347 See Ch.5 .
- 348 This was confirmed by the then DPP, Kier Starmer QC, in evidence to the House of Commons Public Bill Committee on the Coroners and Justice Bill at its fourth sitting on 5 February 2009 at <https://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200809/cmpublic/coroners/090205/pm/90205s01> [Accessed March 2017].
- 349 M. Hirst, “Assisted Suicide after Purdy: The Unresolved Issue” [2009] Crim. L.R. 870 at 875.
- 350 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP,

- 2015), p. 678.
- 351 Law Commission Paper No.177 (1989), cl.63.
- 352 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.10.32.
- 353 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.7.50.
- 354 Suicide Act 1961 s.2(4).
- 355 R. (on the application of Pretty) v DPP [2002] 1 A.C. 800.
- 356 Mrs Pretty brought her case under a number of the articles of the ECHR: arts 2, 3, 8, 9, 14. It was decided that the Suicide Act 1961 s.2 was not incompatible with the ECHR and thus did not breach the Human Rights Act 1998. See generally, M. D. A. Freeman, "Death, Dying and the Human Rights Act 1998" (1999) 52 C.L.P. 218.
- 357 R. (Purdy) v DPP [2010] 1 Cr. App. R. 1.
- 358 See http://www.cps.gov.uk/publications/prosecution/assisted_suicide_policy.html [Accessed March 2017].
- 359 R. (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38. For more on this case see Ch.4 above.
- 360 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.7.49.
- 361 Howe [2014] EWCA Crim 114.
- 362 The word "if" was substituted for "notwithstanding that" by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.57.
- 363 The words "or manslaughter" were added by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 s.57.
- 364 In Gore [2007] EWCA Crim 2789 the Court of Appeal noted that infanticide is an offence under the Infanticide Act 1938 s.1(1), but a partial defence to murder is provided under the Infanticide Act 1938 s.1(2). Mackay has found that in practice infanticide is charged as an offence rather than being raised as a partial defence at a murder trial. However, of 49 cases prosecuted between 1990 and 2003, 37 were initially charged as murder, with the charge being altered to infanticide following pre-trial negotiations. There was no jury trial in all but 2 of these 49 cases: R. Mackay, "Infanticide and Related Diminished Responsibility Manslaughters: An Empirical Study", Appendix D to Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), paras D17–D.18. It is therefore usually up to the defence to raise the issue, leading the prosecution to alter the charges.
- 365 Ashworth argued that it should be available as both: A. Ashworth, Commentary to Gore [2008] Crim. L.R. 388, 390.
- 366 Gore [2007] EWCA Crim 2789.
- 367 Ministry of Justice CP 19/08, para.122.
- 368 Infanticide Act 1922 s.5(1), first made a finding of manslaughter instead of murder possible if "at the time of the act or omission [in killing her newly-born child] she had not fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to such child".
- 369 Royal Commission on Capital Punishment (1953), Cmnd.8932, p.11.
- 370 It was not until 1922 that infanticide was framed with reference to the medical effects of childbirth; previously it had been more concerned with social conditions and moral values. Originally, for example, infanticide applied only to the killing of illegitimate children and was more concerned with the concealment of death (which acted as a presumption of guilt to murder) rather than the death itself (21 Jac. 1, c.27, 1623). See A. Loughnan, "The 'Strange' Case of the Infanticide Doctrine" (2012) 32

O.J.L.S. 685–711.

- 371 D. Maier-Katkin and R. Ogle, “A Rationale for Infanticide Laws” [1993] Crim. L.R. 903, 906–909.
- 372 D. J. West in Murder followed by Suicide (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1955) found no significant connection between women who killed their children and this period of time. In a survey of cases of infanticide, it was found that psychiatric experts made no reference in their reports to the effects of lactation and often had to be prompted to refer to the effects of childbirth: R. Mackay, “The Consequences of Killing Very Young Children” [1993] Crim. L.R. 21, 29.
- 373 14th Report, Offences against the Person, Cmnd.7844 (1980), para.113.
- 374 R. v Smith (KA) [1983] Crim. L.R. 739.
- 375 See N. Walker, Crime and Insanity in England (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1968).
- 376 Law Commission Paper No.177 (1989), cl.6(2).
- 377 In the past 5 years for which data is available (to 2014/15) there have only been 8 convictions for infanticide: 1 in 2011/12; 2 each in 2010/11 and 2012/13; 3 in 2013/14 and none in 2014/15: ONS, Focus on: Violent Crime and Sexual Offences (2016), table 2.14. at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/compendium/focusonv> [Accessed March 2017].
- 378 Mackay found that of the 49 women convicted of infanticide between 1990 and 2003, 20 were sentenced to probation with treatment and 19 to a probation order alone. Only 3 were sentenced to imprisonment of terms ranging from 3 to 5 years: R. Mackay, Appendix D to Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), table 9. See also A. Wilczynski and A. Morris, “Parents Who Kill Children” [1993] Crim. L.R. 31, 35; Wilczynski, “Images of Women Who Kill Their Infants: The Mad and the Bad” (1991) 2 Women and Criminal Justice 71.
- 379 Although fathers might have been able to plead provocation as in the case of Doughty (1986) 83 Cr. App. R. 319, the defence of loss of control is not available to fathers in the same way.
- 380 R. Mackay, Mental Defence Conditions in the Criminal Law (1995), p.211.
- 381 Mackay, Mental Defence Conditions in the Criminal Law (1995), p.30. However, the position may be somewhat complicated by the fact that the male defendants in the survey tended to have previous convictions whilst female defendants did not.
- 382 R. Mackay, Appendix D to Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), table 3b.
- 383 Mackay, Appendix D to Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), table 12b.
- 384 Cmnd.6244, paras 19.22, 19.26.
- 385 Criminal Law Revision Committee, 14th Report, Offences against the Person, Cmnd.7844 (1980), para.102.
- 386 Criminal Law Revision Committee, 14th Report, Offences against the Person, Cmnd.7844 (1980), para.104.
- 387 Above, fn.372 at 29. See also, R. Mackay, above, fn.380, p.210.
- 388 An alternative possibility is that abolition would bring about an increase in the number of cases in which it is decided not to bring prosecutions. This is already relatively common, for example, where the defendant is very young and the offence is an attempt to conceal the pregnancy and birth: R. Mackay, above, fn.372 at 30. See - also A. Wilczynski and A. Morris, “Parents Who Kill Children” [1993] Crim. L.R. 31.

- 389 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.9.17.
- 390 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.9.18.
- 391 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.9.19.
- 392 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.8.23.
- 393 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.8.25.
- 394 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.8.26.
- 395 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.8.35.
- 396 Ministry of Justice CP 19/08, para.120.
- 397 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.8.46. This provisional proposal is adopted by the Law Commission as a formal recommendation at para.8.58.
- 398 Commentary to Kai-Whitewind [2006] Crim. L.R. 348, 351.
- 399 A. Loughnan, “The ‘Strange’ Case of the Infanticide Doctrine” (2012) 32 O.J.L.S. 685–711, 689.
- 400 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.9.68.
- 401 Lowe [1973] Q.B. 702. See above, para.8-050.
- 402 e.g. Stone and Dobinson [1977] 1 Q.B. 354; Barrass [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 80.
- 403 Adomako [1995] 1 A.C. 171.
- 404 Freer argues that the way in which s.5 is drafted is unsatisfactory, in that it does not allow for the basis upon which the defendant has been convicted to be known. The defendant is convicted of “causing or allowing” V’s death; even where the jury is clear that D has caused V’s death this cannot be reflected in their verdict and, as a result, the judge must sentence D without knowing the basis of the conviction: E. Freer, “‘Causing or allowing the death of a child’: challenges to working out ‘which of you did it?’” [2016] Crim. L.R. 618–626.
- 405 J. Herring, “Mum’s Not the Word: An Analysis of Section 5” in C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008), p.135.
- 406 R. v Khan (Uzma) [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 28 at [32].
- 407 Commentary to Khan [2009] Crim. L.R. 348, 352.
- 408 J. Herring, above fn.X, pp.129–137.
- 409 R. v Stephens (Jerry) [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. 26.
- 410 Khan [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 28 at [28].
- 411 Khan [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 28 at [39].
- 412 “Mother is First to be Found Guilty of Family Homicide” The Times 6 May 2006, p.31.
- 413 Law Commission Paper No.282 Children: Their Non-Accidental Death or Serious Injury (Criminal Trials) (2003), para.2.29, citing Judge Isobel Plumstead, Papers for the NSPCC, “Which of you did it?” Conference in Cambridge, 2 November 2002.
- 414 See S. Laville, “Baby P Case: The final chapter in a story of appalling cruelty and deprivation” The Guardian 22 May 2009.

- 415 R. v Owen (Jason) [2009] EWCA Crim 2259.
- 416 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), Appendix table A4 at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/datasets/crimeinengla> [Accessed March 2017].
- 417 R. v Su Hua Liu [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 12.
- 418 Khan [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 28.
- 419 Commentary to Khan [2009] Crim. L.R. 348, 351.
- 420 Khan [2009] 1 Cr. App. R. 28 at [33].
- 421 A. Ashworth, “Ignorance of the Criminal Law, and Duties to Avoid it” (2011) 74(1) M.L.R. 1, 18.
- 422 S. Morrison, “Should there be a Domestic Violence Defence to the Offence of Familial Homicide?” [2013] Crim. L.R. 826–838, 838.
- 423 In addition to these, there is also the offence of aggravated vehicle taking under Theft Act 1968 s.21A, which carries a maximum sentence of 14 years’ imprisonment where death is caused.
- 424 Government of US v Jennings [1983] 1 A.C. 624.
- 425 The statutory causing death by driving offences are now lesser included offences of manslaughter in cases involving mechanically propelled vehicles, by virtue of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 s.24, amended by the Road Safety Act 2006.
- 426 See, e.g. Ripley [1997] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 19; Att-Gen’s Reference (No.62 of 2001) (David Little) [2002] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 94; Wright [2004] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 4; Franks [2004] EWCA Crim 1241; Clarke [2006] 1 Cr. App. R.(S.) 132; Dudley [2006] 2 Cr. App. R.(S.) 77; Abu Kwaik [2013] EWCA Crim 2397. Constructive manslaughter has also been successful in a case of driving causing death where the unlawful act on which the charge was based was burglary: Bristow [2013] EWCA Crim 1540. Most recently, a number of fraudsters were convicted of manslaughter in relation to a “cash for crash” scheme in which the defendants purposefully collided with a car resulting in the death of its elderly occupant. One passenger pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit fraud and manslaughter and, following a trial unusually tried by judge alone due to jury tampering, the driver and his brother were convicted of the offences. See <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-leeds-39108244> [Accessed March 2017].
- 427 See http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/p_to_r/road_traffic_offences_guidance_on_prosecuting_cases_of_ [Accessed March 2017].
- 428 The penalty was raised from 10 years’ imprisonment by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.285(3). The Criminal Justice Act 1993 had already increased the maximum penalty from 5 to 10 years.
- 429 Criminal Law Act 1977 s.50(1).
- 430 See <https://www.gov.uk/government/consultations/driving-offences-and-penalties-relating-to-causing-death-or-serious-injury> [Accessed March 2016].
- 431 1,732 people were killed on the roads in 2015, a reduction of 45% compared with a decade earlier in 2006: Department for Transport, Reported Road Casualties in Great Britain: Main Results 2015 (2016) at <https://www.gov.uk/government/statistics/reported-road-casualties-in-great-britain-main-results-2015> [Accessed March 2017].
- 432 Department for Transport, Transport Statistics Great Britain (2009), table 8.1.

- 433 Offences relating to motor vehicles, England and Wales 2004 (Supplementary Tables) (2006), table 7. See https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/533293/rrcgb-main-results-2015.pdf [Accessed March 2017].
- 434 Home Office, Review of Road Traffic Offences Involving Bad Driving: A Consultation Paper (2005), para 2.1.
- 435 S. Cunningham, “The Unique Nature of Prosecutions in Cases of Fatal Road Traffic Collisions” [2005] Crim. L.R. 834. Further research conducted since the new offence of causing death by careless driving was introduced again suggests that this is still the case and causing death by dangerous driving is generally charged where appropriate: S. Kyd Cunningham, “Has Law Reform Policy Been Driven in the Right Direction? How the New Causing Death By Driving Offences are Operating in Practice” [2013] Crim. L.R. 711–728.
- 436 Such an approach was adopted in Krawec [1985] 149 J.P. 709 but disapproved in R. v Simmonds (Derek) [1999] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 218. See further, C. M. V. Clarkson, Understanding Criminal Law, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), pp.163–168.
- 437 S. Cunningham, “Taking ‘Causing Serious Injury by Dangerous Driving’ Seriously” [2012] Crim. L.R. 261–274. The consultation conducted by the Government in December 2016 asked for opinions on the creation of an offence of causing serious injury by careless driving. See above, fn.430.
- 438 In Milton v CPS [2007] R.T.R. 43, the High Court used the rule in s.2A(3) to argue that it should be possible to take into account the fact that a driver has special skills when deciding the issue of dangerousness. A police officer’s conviction for dangerous driving was quashed on the basis that the fact that he was a police-trained advanced driver should have been taken into account when deciding whether driving at speeds of up to 148 mph was dangerous. Milton was, however, overruled by the Court of Appeal in Bannister [2010] R.T.R. 4. In this case, involving another police driver, the Court of Appeal noted that to take account of the special skill of a police driver would be to substitute the test of the competent and careful driver in the statute and to re-write the test Parliament had laid down.
- 439 I. D. Brownlee and M. Seneviratne, “Killing with Cars after Adomako: Time for Some Alternatives” [1995] Crim. L.R. 389.
- 440 S. Cunningham, “The Reality of Vehicular Homicide: Convictions for Murder, Manslaughter and Causing Death by Dangerous Driving” [2001] Crim. L.R. 679.
- 441 R. v Cooksley (Robert Charles) [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 1. The guidelines had been reassessed in the case of R. v Richardson (Jack Virgil) [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36 following the increase of the maximum penalty to 14 years following the enactment of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.
- 442 Sentencing Guidelines Council, Causing Death by Driving: Definitive Guideline (2008), p.11.
- 443 See S. Cunningham, “The Reality of Vehicular Homicide: Convictions for Murder, Manslaughter and Causing Death by Dangerous Driving” [2001] Crim. L.R. 679. In recent years, the highest sentence for vehicular manslaughter has been 14 years, as in the case of R. v Dudley (Leayon Davi) [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 77.
- 444 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.111 of 2006) [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 26.
- 445 Further, Hirst has pointed out that the sentence a driver might receive for causing death on the basis of a “grave driving error” may well be greater than that which an individual would get for constructive manslaughter arising from an unprovoked road rage assault: M. Hirst, “Causing Death by Driving and Other Offences: A Question of Balance” [2008] Crim. L.R. 339, 352.

- 446 R. v Kwaik (Abid Abu) [2013] EWCA Crim 2397.
- 447 Simpson v Peat [1952] 2 Q.B. 24. Careless driving is an offence under the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.3.
- 448 Causing death by careless driving.
- 449 Careless driving.
- 450 Causing death by careless driving whilst under the influence of drink or drugs.
- 451 None of the cases in a sample of 79 prosecutions under the Road Traffic Act 1988 s.3 following a fatal road traffic collision were based on inconsiderate, rather than careless, driving: S. Cunningham, Criminal Charges Brought in Cases of Road Death in the East Midlands: Implications for Law Reform, PhD Thesis, University of Leicester, 2004. In a study of the new offence, none of the 22 cases prosecuted under s.2B were based on inconsiderate driving: S. Kyd Cunningham, “Has Law Reform Policy Been Driven in the Right Direction? How the New Causing Death by Driving Offences are Operating in Practice” [2013] Crim. L.R. 711–728.
- 452 Home Office, Review of Road Traffic Offences Involving Bad Driving: A Consultation Paper (2005), para.3.30.
- 453 The one exception to this is possibly the offence of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult, discussed above.
- 454 R. v Richardson (Jack Virgil) [2007] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 36 at [29].
- 455 S. Kyd Cunningham, “Has Law Reform Policy Been Driven in the Right Direction? How the New Causing Death by Driving Offences are Operating in Practice” [2013] Crim. L.R. 711–728.
- 456 This is recognised by lawyers who prosecute and defend such cases. See S. Kyd Cunningham, “Has Law Reform Policy Been Driven in the Right Direction? How the New Causing Death by Driving Offences are Operating in Practice” [2013] Crim. L.R. 711–728, 719.
- 457 Sentencing Guidelines Council, Causing Death by Driving: Definitive Guideline (2008), p.15. The Court of Appeal has stated that it does not find it easy to apply the categories in the sentencing guidelines: Campbell [2009] EWCA Crim 2459 at [31].
- 458 Although victims ‘groups are often reported as being in favour of custodial sentences, this is not necessarily true of the public as a whole. Roberts et al. found that only 17% of the public would expect to see a prison sentence in a case of careless driving causing death. However, it was also found that the public’s expectations did not correlate with their preferred sentence. 38% of respondents endorsed a custodial term for a hypothetical case of careless driving causing death: J. V. Roberts, “Public Attitudes to the Sentencing of Offences Involving Death by Driving” [2008] Crim. L.R. 525, 530–532. For a discussion of when custody is likely to be imposed in cases of causing death by careless driving, see N. Padfield, “Time to Bury the Custody ‘Threshold’?” [2011] Crim. L.R. 593–612.
- 459 Increased from 10 to 14 years by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.285(4). The penalty had already been increased from 5 to 10 years’ imprisonment by the Criminal Justice Act 1993 s.67(1).
- 460 Or, alternatively, in cases based on refusal to submit to a breath test, the deliberate nature or otherwise of such refusal.
- 461 Sir Peter North CBE QC, Report of the Review of Drink and Drug-driving Law

- (2010) at <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20100921035225/http://northreview.independent.gov> [Accessed March 2017]. For an analysis of the report, see S. Cunningham, “The North Review of Drink-Driving: Some Sobering Proposals” [2011] Crim. L.R. 296–310.
- 462 Road Traffic Act 1988 s.5A, inserted by the Crime and Courts Act 2013 s.56.
- 463 The Sentencing Guidelines Council’s guidelines are that a straightforward offence involving an uninsured or unlicensed driver with no aggravating factors should have a sentencing starting point of a community order. Where one aggravating factor is present, the starting point is 26 weeks’ custody. See Sentencing Guidelines Council, Causing Death by Driving: Definitive Guideline (2008), p.17.
- 464 Home Office, Review of Road Traffic Offences Involving Bad Driving: A Consultation Paper (2005), para.4.2.
- 465 R. v Hughes (Michael) [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6.
- 466 R. v Williams (Jason John) [2010] EWCA Crim 2552.
- 467 R. v Hughes (Michael) [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 at [28].
- 468 Hughes [2014] 1 Cr. App. R. 6 at [32].
- 469 S. Kyd Cunningham, “Has Law Reform Policy Been Driven in the Right Direction? How the New Causing Death By Driving Offences are Operating in Practice” [2013] Crim. L.R. 711–728.
- 470 It should be noted that “homicide” within the official statistics refers only to murder, manslaughter and infanticide.
- 471 Referring to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 s.269.
- 472 A. Norrie, “Between Orthodox Subjectivism and Moral Contextualism: Intention and the Consultation Paper” [2006] Crim. L.R. 489–501, 489.
- 473 La Fontaine 11 A.L.R. 507 at 535 per Jacobs J.
- 474 Cross, “Penal Reform in 1965 ...” [1966] Crim. L.R. 184, 189.
- 475 CLRC, Working Paper on Offences against the Person, 1976, para.7.
- 476 CLRC, Working Paper on Offences against the Person, 1976, para.7.
- 477 This and ensuing presumptive penalties are increased where the offender has two or more prior felony convictions or commits the offence with a deadly weapon or dangerous instrument.
- 478 Under ARS 13–710 a person who stands convicted of second degree murder shall be sentenced to a presumptive term of 16 calendar years, with a minimum of 10 calendar years and maximum of 25 calendar years. Where the victim was a child under the age of 15 the presumptive term is 20 years (ARS: 13–705).
- 479 Details of each of these felonies have been omitted.
- 480 Punishable by death or life imprisonment under ARS 1and 13-752.
- 481 Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. ss.18–3–101 to 18–3–106.
- 482 In France, murder committed with premeditation amounts to the separate offence of “assassination”, punished by life imprisonment (French Penal Code art.221–3).
- 483 Bullock v US, 122 F.2d 213 (D.C. Cir. 1941).
- 484 B. Cardozo, “What Medicine Can Do for Law” in Law and Literature and other Essays and Addresses (New York: Harper & Bros, 1930), pp.99–100.

- 485 J. F. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law (1883), p.94.
- 486 Repouille v United States 165 F. 2d 152 (2d Cir. 1947).
- 487 See generally, C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008).
- 488 O. Quick, “Medical Killing, Need for a Special Offence?”, in C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008).
- 489 For arguments in favour of such a move, see C. Elliott and C. de Than, “Prosecuting the Drug Dealer When a Drug User Dies: R v Kennedy (No.2)” (2006) M.L.R. 986; and C. Elliott and C. de Than, “Restructuring the Homicide Offences to Tackle Violence, Discrimination and Drugs in a Modern Society” (2009) 20 K.L.J. 69.
- 490 Wilson, “Dealing with Drug-induced Homicide” in C. M. V. Clarkson and S. Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008).
- 491 The Independent 117 November 2009, p.12
- 492 Dhaliwal [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 24, discussed in Ch.7 above.
- 493 Elliott and de Than argue that liability could arise in such cases under either constructive manslaughter or gross negligence manslaughter but that, given the practical difficulties in proving such cases, a new statutory offence with a maximum term of 10 years’ imprisonment ought to be introduced: C. Elliott and C. de Than, “Restructuring the Homicide Offences to Tackle Violence, Discrimination and Drugs in a Modern Society” (2009) 20 K.L.J. 69, 84.
- 494 Such a proposal was considered and rejected by the Criminal Law Revision Committee in relation to assaults (14th Report, para.162).
- 495 La. Rev. Stat. s.14.30(2).
- 496 N.Y. Penal Law s.125.27(1)(a)(iv).
- 497 La. Rev. Stat. s.14.30(4).
- 498 Idaho Code s.18–4003(a).
- 499 Law Commission Paper No.304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006), paras 2.67–2.169.
- 500 Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21 para.4, amended by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 s.27(2).
- 501 Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sch.21.
- 502 Catherine Elliott and Claire de Than, “Restructuring the Homicide Offences to Tackle Violence, Discrimination and Drugs in a Modern Society” (2009) 20 K.L.J. 69–88, 74.
- 503 For a critique of the recommendations, see A. Ashworth, “Principles, Pragmatism and the Law Commission’s Recommendations on Homicide Law Reform” [2007] Crim. L.R. 333.
- 504 J. Rogers, “The New Homicide Ladder” (2007) 157 N.L.J. 48.
- 505 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005).
- 506 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005).
- 507 A. Norrie, “Between Orthodox Subjectivism and Moral Contextualism: Intention and

- the Consultation Paper” [2006] Crim. L.R. 486–513.
- 508 A. Norrie, “Between Orthodox Subjectivism and Moral Contextualism: Intention and the Consultation Paper” [2006] Crim. L.R. 486–513, 494.
- 509 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.2.102.
- 510 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.2.110.
- 511 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.2.93.
- 512 Cited in Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.2.60.
- 513 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.8.3.
- 514 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), para.6.212. At present duress is not a defence to murder or attempted murder. Some have in the past argued that there are compelling reasons for adding duress to the current group of partial defences: see, e.g. Lacey, “Partial Defences to Homicide: Questions of Power and Principle in Imperfect and Less Imperfect Worlds” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law (Oxford: OUP, 2000), p.107.
- 515 Quick and Wells, “Getting Tough with Defences” [2006] Crim. L.R. 514, 515.
- 516 Law Commission Paper No.304 (2006), paras 2.132–2.145.
- 517 Hyam v DPP [1975] A.C. 55 at 98. A similar proposal was made by the New Zealand Law Reform Committee but has not been implemented (Report on Culpable Homicide, 1976, pp.3–4).
- 518 See extract, above, para.8-206.
- 519 A single homicide offence has also been supported by Victim Support who are concerned that in trying to reduce their crime from murder to manslaughter defendants often attack the character of the victim: Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.2.33.
- 520 The Times 8 May 1981, p.1 col.2.
- 521 The Times 30 April 1981, p.1 col.1.
- 522 An alternative method of avoiding the operation of “jury equity” in this way would be to abolish the mandatory life sentence for murder. During debates in the House of Lords, Lord Lloyd of Berwick tabled an amendment to the Coroners and Justice Bill, at the suggestion of Professor John Spencer, that would have given the jury in a murder trial the option to find “extenuating circumstances” whilst convicting of murder. This in turn would have permitted the judge to impose a sentence other than life imprisonment. This amendment was opposed by the Government on the basis that it would blur the boundary between murder and manslaughter and undermine the mandatory life sentence for murder: Ministry of Justice, Homicide Reform Bulletin No.2, August 2009. See also: I. Dennis, “Reforming Murder: the Coroners and Justice Bill” (Editorial) [2009] Crim. L.R. 687 and above, fn.X.
- 523 Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, Cmnd.8932 (1953), para.27.
- 524 Above, fn.486.
- 525 Of course, it does not follow that these defences would have to be abolished. See R. Mackay, “Diminished Responsibility and Mentally Disordered Offenders” in A. Ashworth and B. Mitchell, Rethinking English Homicide Law (Oxford: OUP, 2000), pp.80–81.
- 526 Similar views were expressed by Lord Hailsham in Cunningham [1982] A.C. 566 at 580.

527 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.177 (2005), para.2.34.

Chapter 9

Offences Against Property

I. Introduction

9–001

There is a wide variety of offences against property in English law, for example, theft, fraud, robbery, burglary, taking a motor vehicle or other conveyance without authority, abstracting electricity, blackmail, handling stolen goods, forgery, criminal damage—and many more.

A. THE LEVEL OF OFFENDING

9–002

So widespread are these offences that people are more likely to be the victim of a property offence than of any other kind of crime. In the year ending September 2016, offences of theft, robbery and fraud accounted for over half of all recorded crime.¹ However, police statistics only deal with those offences which are recorded and thus this source of information about the extent of many forms of property crime is not accurate. The Crime Survey for England and Wales (CSEW), formerly known as the British Crime Surveys (BCS), attempts to shed some light upon the dark figure of crime, by surveying householders in England and Wales asking them whether they have experienced crime in the past year, and inviting them to give details of offences against them.² The 2010/11 BCS illustrates that the public's likelihood of reporting crime varies considerably by the type of offence. For instance, in that year, 96% of vehicle thefts were reported³ (largely for insurance reasons). However, for theft from a person only 29% were reported.⁴

The reasons for the differences between the police and the CSEW figures are not hard to identify. For example, the value of the property involved may be perceived by the victim (and the police) as being too trivial to proceed; the cost and inconvenience of taking action may make some victims reluctant to proceed; it may be viewed as a private matter to be dealt with themselves; it may be impossible to identify offenders (as will be the case with much shoplifting); the behaviour may not be seen by even the victim as truly criminal (as may be the case with the problem of bad cheques), or they may simply feel too foolish or embarrassed at having been “conned” out of their property. In some cases, the victim may never even learn of their loss. When asked why they had not reported a crime to the police in the 2010/11 BCS, 72% of victims gave the reason that they perceived it as too trivial, there was no loss or they believed that the police would or could not do much about it.⁵

The cost of property crime is vast. For instance, Levi and Burrows estimated that fraud in the UK financial community resulted in direct losses of £12.98 billion in 2005, with the total known cost of fraud and dealing with fraud amounting to “at least” £13.9 billion.⁶ However, this appears to be a considerable underestimate of the true loss to the economy, and in 2016, the Centre for Counter Fraud Studies estimated that the overall cost of fraud to both the private and public sector could be as much as £198 billion and that even this huge sum may be a conservative estimate.⁷ Loss through fraud committed with the use of UK-issued plastic payment cards reached £618 million in the UK in the year 2016, of which £432.3 million involved “card-not-present” (CNP) fraud (where a card has been used on the internet, over the phone or by mail order).⁸ These figures represented a rise of 9% on 2015, although this needs to be seen in the context of an increase in card spending over this period of 6%.⁹ In the year ending March 2016, 4.7% of plastic card owners were victims of card fraud.¹⁰ The introduction of chip and pin technology has been heralded as a success in reducing losses in respect of face-to-face fraud, which in 2016 amounted to £62.8 million, down 15% from 2015,¹¹ but such technology cannot be used over the internet. Initiatives such as secure payment systems introduced by card providers are designed to go some way to reducing card fraud on the internet, and a special police unit operated by the Metropolitan Police and City of London Police entitled the Dedicated Cheque and Plastic Crime Unit (DCPCU) has been working alongside banking industry fraud investigators to try to reduce fraud since 2002.¹² In addition to measures being taken by the retail and banking industries to try to reduce this type of fraud, the Government has also reacted by creating agencies and organisations to combat fraud. In 1988, the Serious Fraud Office was established as an independent government organisation to investigate and prosecute serious and complex fraud cases.¹³ In 2006, the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA), was established as a national law enforcement agency, working in close collaboration with UK intelligence and law enforcement partners, to prevent and detect serious organised crime).¹⁴ SOCA has now been abolished,¹⁵ and its operations merged into the National Crime Agency, an intelligence-led organisation, which will provide leadership and collaborate with law enforcement agencies and other agencies in relation to the fight against fraud and cybercrime.¹⁶

9-003

There is a wide diversity of offences thrown together under the umbrella of property offences. The harm done may vary from damage that endangers life, through robbery and “professional” theft to behaviour that lies at the very fringes of criminality. There is no typical offender (although the chances of it being a young male are even higher than for other types of offences). The public imagination may conjure up images of Fagin, Bill Sikes or Ronald Biggs and those large-scale professional crimes that capture the news headlines such the Hatton Garden jewellery heist, allegedly the “largest burglary in legal history”,¹⁷ but, although professional criminals do exist, there also exist a vast army of occasional criminals: the opportunist burglar or mobile phone-snatcher, the shoplifter, the juvenile joy-rider, the naïve passer of dud cheques, and the “respectable” employee who takes advantage of his employer’s trust to embezzle funds. Property offences encompass crime that could be described as violent¹⁸ to crime that could be labelled as white-collar crime.¹⁹

B. THE SOCIOLOGICAL

BACKGROUND

9-004

Given the diversity of property offenders and offences, it is not surprising that there exists a multiplicity of theories attempting to account for such criminality. Some attempts have tried to establish links between economic conditions and the rate of property offending.²⁰ Overall conclusions are difficult to draw and any causal relationship is unlikely to be straightforward. There are many varied explanations as to why people commit property offences, and discussion of these is beyond the scope of this book. However, an understanding of the law is assisted by an appreciation of the context in which such offences occur and the extent to which the law is utilised as a response to offending behaviour.

J. HEPBURN, “OCCASIONAL PROPERTY CRIME” IN R. MEIER (ED),
MAJOR FORMS OF CRIME (1984),
PP.88-89:

9-005

“Among the earliest criminal laws were those pertaining to property. In a highly stratified society, especially one with a capitalistic economy, power and status depend to a large degree on the economic resources a person accumulates. Consequently, there generally is a strong, negative public reaction to property offenses in the United States. The reaction is particularly strong against armed robbery, mugging, and arson, because these offenses combine loss of property with a potential for physical harm to the victim. Residential burglary, which violates the sanctity of the home, also generates a strong condemnation. In contrast, the public outcry against shoplifting, vandalism, and other ‘petty’ forms of property crime is least vocal.

The magnitude of the public’s reaction to property offenses does not seem to be associated with the amount of financial loss involved. Compared to the multimillion-dollar losses which result from corporate crime and organized crime, the losses incurred by occasional property crimes are quite small ...

Armed robbery netted a total of $339 million in property loss, for example, while the total loss due to burglary was $3 billion. According to the FBI, the total cost of all Part I property offenses was slightly over $10 billion. In comparison, the annual cost to the public of faulty goods, monopolistic practices, and other corporate crimes has been estimated at between $174 and $231 billion ... Furthermore, the financial losses due to the criminal activities of organized crime are estimated to be upwards of $50 billion annually ... Despite the greater loss due to corporate and organized crime, these crimes receive less public condemnation than the more traditional property crimes.

The public's reaction to property crimes is reflected in the legal reaction taken by law enforcement agencies. Police agencies are largely reactive; they respond to the crimes that are brought to their attention by citizens. Legislators also are responsive to their constituency's concern with property crimes. As a result, a significant amount of the time, money, and energy of law enforcement agencies is directed toward ordinary property crimes. Increased police patrols are justified on the (false) assumption that they reduce the opportunity for crime and increase the risk of arrest. Merchants and residents are advised by the police of various 'target-hardening' tactics, such as exterior lighting and barred windows, designed to reduce the opportunity for crime. Prosecutors and legislators champion the view that more severe legal penalties are needed to deter crime.

Although the public and legal reaction to property crimes in general is rather severe, the reaction to those who are occasional offenders tends to be more restrained. Compared to other offenders processed routinely by the courts, the occasional offender is (1) less likely to have a criminal record of prior arrests and convictions, (2) more likely to have been charged with a minor offense, (3) more respectable, as defined in terms of employment history, residential stability, and family relationships, and (4) more repentant. As a result of these characteristics of the offender and the offense, the occasional offender is treated less harshly by the criminal justice system. The prosecutor's office is less likely to file initial charges against the offender. If it does, there is a strong probability that the offender will be diverted from prosecution to some special restitution-oriented program or that the charges will be dismissed before trial. Should the offender be convicted, a prison sentence is most unlikely."

The Crime Survey for England and Wales (CSEW) results are a useful source of information about public attitudes towards property offences, in two main contexts. First, such surveys have a great deal to say about the sorts of crime that people are most anxious about and the steps they take to reduce their vulnerability. Fear of being “mugged” is a commonly expressed concern; for some people this may cause them to avoid going out at night at all if it can be avoided; for others it might (especially in the case of women) mean never going out alone. Fear of burglary might cause some to support neighbourhood watch schemes. Fear of having their computers used for fraud might cause executives to spend large amounts of money on security systems and security experts.

Secondly, such surveys are a valuable means of ascertaining what the public thinks about sentencing practices in relation to property offences. Generally, public opinion polls reveal a punitive approach to sentencing²¹ but it appears that “people overestimate the leniency of the courts”.²² Results obtained from the 2010/11 CSEW show that, when asked the question: “Out of every 100 men aged 21 or over who are tried and found guilty of house burglary how many are sent to prison?”, 86% of respondents provided a large under-estimate of the actual custody rate.²³ Research in Victoria, Australia, found that judges are not more lenient than the local community and that the community does not “speak with one voice” on sentencing, meaning that there were huge ranges in opinion as to the appropriate sentences to impose in particular cases.²⁴ The community does not have firm views as to what is an appropriate sentence for a case and those who are more certain they are right are the harsher ones.²⁵

Further, surveys indicate that while members of the public may have a generalised preference for tough sentences, when asked about a specific case study, their attitude is less punitive.²⁶ There is evidence that some victims of crime have similar attitudes, and that their views as to what should happen in their own case may appear lenient in comparison to their general opinion about sentencing.²⁷

C. THE LEGAL BACKGROUND

9-007

Discussion so far makes it clear that the structure of property offences is very different from the offences against the person already covered. With the latter, the seriousness of the injury was critical in the structuring of offences and concomitant levels of punishment: for example, causing death is more serious than causing grievous harm, which in turn is worse than causing actual bodily harm—and so on. Offences against property, however, are not structured in such a clear manner. It is not possible to follow the same pattern in structuring liability because of the difficulty in measuring the “harm” done. One possible method here is by assessing the value of the property involved. English law, however, has eschewed such an approach at a substantive level (although this is an important factor at the sentencing stage) and instead has chosen to distinguish property offences by the method of taking or dealing with the property. According to this approach, deceiving someone into agreeing to part with their property (formerly, the offence of obtaining property by deception) is treated differently from coercing someone with threats into parting with property (blackmail). Whether each grouping is sufficiently precise and/or meaningful is a matter to be returned to after an examination of the offences themselves.

Another distinctive feature of the offences against property is that they are mainly statutory and largely found in modern statutes, in particular, the Theft Act 1968, the Theft Act 1978, the Fraud Act 2006, the Criminal Damage Act 1971, the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 and the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. These statutes are somewhat distinctive in that they are similar to a code. Most English statutes consolidate, amend or add to the pre-existing law. The approach here is different. Take, for instance, the Theft Act 1968. This Act swept away all the previous law on the subject, creating entirely new law dealing with most forms of dishonest dealings with property. As the Law Commission has indicated that the codification of the whole of the criminal law is still a long-term aim,²⁸ it becomes particularly important and interesting to see how our courts have handled these areas of law.

Before examining the property offences themselves two important preliminary points must be made.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee, in putting forward its proposals²⁹ which largely became the Theft Act 1968, wished to avoid the technicality and complexity of the old law under the Larceny Acts and, accordingly, deliberately tried to frame as much of the legislation as possible in ordinary “simple” language capable of being easily understood by the layman. Accordingly, many key concepts (for example, “dishonesty”) were inserted in the legislation without definition. The courts could, of course, have developed their own legal definitions of such concepts but have instead preferred to leave the meaning of such words to the jury, as questions of fact. The jury are ordinary people; they know what ordinary words mean—and do not need judges to explain their meaning to them. This approach, leading to a lack of fixed standards and inconsistency, has proved highly controversial, as will be seen in this chapter.

9–008

The second preliminary issue in some ways completely contradicts the above point. Offences against property deal with interference with other persons’ rights or interests in property. One is free to do as one likes with one’s own property. It is therefore always necessary to ascertain that there is some other person who has some right or interest in the property. For instance, in Corcoran v Whent,³⁰ a defendant ate a meal in a hotel restaurant and left without paying. In order to determine his liability for theft it became necessary to determine whether at the time he decided not to pay (after he had eaten the food), the food (in his stomach) belonged to anyone else! If it belonged to him he could commit no crime as he would not be interfering with anyone else’s rights or interests in property.³¹

However, how is one to determine whether anyone else has such a proprietary right or interest in the property? There is a whole body of law—the law of property, contract and quasi-contract—devoted to answering such questions. The Theft Act 1968, for example, uses many technical legal terms such as “trespasser”,³² “proprietary right or interest”,³³ “trust”,³⁴ etc. As these terms are undefined it would appear reasonable that they be assigned their established civil law meaning. Such an approach would, however, fly in the face of the philosophy that words in such legislation be assigned their ordinary meaning by ordinary people, the jury. There is some force in such an approach. Civil law meanings of words need adaptation to the purposes of the criminal law, for instance, to accommodate the normal requirement of mens rea. Further, the criminal law ought to reflect everyday values and “the way we live”. Who better to reflect such values than those “everyday folk”, the jury? This appears to be the prevailing articulated view. In Morris,³⁵ one of the leading House of Lords’ decisions on theft, Lord Roskill was highly critical of the approach that relied on the civil law meaning of concepts. For instance, whether a contract was void or voidable, was “so far as possible” not a relevant question in relation to the law of theft.³⁶

As will be seen, however, courts are not always prepared to jettison established legal meanings and replace them with “ordinary meanings”. (What is the ordinary meaning of those ordinary words, “trust” or “equitable interest”?) Accordingly, one of the fascinations of this area of law is to observe the lurchings along the tightrope as the English courts try to achieve an impossible balance between these two competing and irreconcilable approaches.

A thorough consideration of all property offences is not possible, even in a book of this size. Accordingly, the enquiry will be limited to those offences that tell us most about the purposes and structures of this area of law. The main offences to be considered will be theft and fraud. Briefer consideration will also be given to the offences of obtaining services dishonestly, robbery, burglary, handling stolen goods and making off without payment.

II. Theft

A. EXTENT AND CONTEXT

Theft offences accounted for approximately 39% of all recorded crime in England and Wales in 2015–2016 (1,784,598 million offences).³⁷ However, as already seen, such official figures do not reveal the dark figure of crime. Many thefts are simply not reported or recorded. Whereas a high proportion of thefts of motor vehicles are reported (because of the value of vehicles and for insurance purposes),³⁸ the picture of theft from vehicles and theft from the person is rather different. In relation to stealth or snatch thefts from the person, the 2015/16 CSEW estimated that only 46% of such offences are reported to the police.³⁹ In relation to shoplifting (a particularly difficult crime to observe) it has been estimated that only 3% of such incidents come to police attention.⁴⁰ Astor’s research concluded, for example, that one in 15 people stole goods from stores with store detectives noticing only about 1% of those.⁴¹ More recently, the 2015 Commercial Victimisation Survey found that only 34% of retailers reported the last incidence of theft by customers that they had experienced to the police.⁴² Such research renders almost meaningless the official figure of recorded thefts from shops of 349,296 in 2015/16.⁴³ This, together with the variable value of goods being taken in shoplifting offences, with a recent average value of £325 per incident of customer theft being estimated,⁴⁴ means that only very rough estimates about overall losses can be given.

Under-reporting occurs, as we have seen, for a variety of reasons, but it does reflect to some extent the degree of seriousness with which the offence is regarded. Vehicle thefts, for instance, are viewed seriously and are almost always reported.⁴⁵ These surveys also enable assessments of seriousness to be made on the basis of the penalties chosen by respondents for a variety of offences. In the second BCS, 23% of respondents thought that prison was the appropriate penalty for a 25-year-old car thief with previous convictions, in comparison with 12% who felt it to be the appropriate penalty for shoplifting.⁴⁶ One might be tempted to conclude from this, and the lower rate of reporting of theft from shops, that this crime is regarded less seriously than other forms of theft. The development of the term “shoplifting” may even be seen as evidence of this, separating this form of activity from “theft”. But any such conclusions would have to be highly qualified. The relationship between reporting and seriousness is by no means a perfect one. Sexual crimes, for example, are rated highly seriously, yet are grossly under-reported. In spite of the apparent under-reporting of shoplifting, figures show that, since 2003, vehicle offences have fallen dramatically, whilst shoplifting figures have remained steady, so that both offences now represent similar proportions of recorded property crime.⁴⁷ In other words, there are other reasons for not reporting an offence other than an attitude as to its seriousness.⁴⁸ Despite this, it is probably the case that shoplifting is regarded as a comparatively minor offence: the amount involved will generally be small; the victim of the offence may be perceived as being a large, impersonal organisation able to absorb the loss; and there may even be at times a “there but for the grace of God ...” sentiment. All this does not, of course, amount to an argument for the decriminalisation of “shoplifting”—but it may well be an argument for the creation of a separate lesser offence.⁴⁹

9–010

A type of theft that is very likely to be reported is theft of a mobile phone, although statistics indicate that such thefts are more likely to be reported to a network service provider than to the police. The 2011/12 CSEW indicated that two-thirds of people who had a mobile phone stolen via robbery or theft from the person (e.g. by pick pocketing) reported the crime to the police, whilst 81% reported it to their network provider.⁵⁰ Around half (52%) of households who experienced theft of a mobile phone in other circumstances in 2011/12 reported it to the police, whilst three-quarters (75%) reported it to their network service provider.⁵¹ This high reporting rate may reflect the relative value of mobile phones compared with other personal possessions typically carried on the person.⁵² In 2015/16, 1% of mobile phone owners experienced theft of a mobile phone,⁵³ a decrease of 1.2% on the previous year. It has been suggested that this may be attributable to the development by phone companies of improved security and anti-theft features on mobile phones.⁵⁴

B. THE LEGAL BACKGROUND

Prior to the Theft Act 1968, what is now the crime of theft was dealt with by three separate offences: larceny, embezzlement and fraudulent conversion. Each of these offences and the distinction between them was technical and highly complex. Further, the offences were felt to be defective in that certain conduct that would ordinarily be regarded as stealing did not come within the definitions of the offences. The CLRC took the view that the offences of larceny, embezzlement and fraudulent conversion should be replaced by a single new offence of theft, with a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment.⁵⁵ This proposal was accepted by the Theft Act 1968 but in 1991 the penalty was reduced to a maximum of seven years' imprisonment.⁵⁶ In addition, low-value shoplifting offences have now effectively been downgraded in seriousness: where the value of the goods allegedly stolen does not exceed £200 and the defendant is 18 or over, the offence is triable only summarily.⁵⁷ Shoplifting offences where the value of the goods stolen is less than £100 may be dealt with by way of a PND (Penalty Notice for Disorder), a £90 fine issued by the police.⁵⁸ In practice, most thieves do not receive sentences approaching the maximum seven year term. In the 12 months ending September 2016, 8,438 PNDs (Penalty Notice for Disorder) were issued for shoplifting.⁵⁹ In the same year, less than 20% of those convicted of theft offences were given absolute or conditional discharges,⁶⁰ 29.5% of those convicted of theft offences were given custodial sentences, and the average length of such sentences was 9.3 months.⁶¹

C. THE LAW

1. Definition

THEFT ACT 1968 s.1(1)

“A person is guilty of theft if he dishonestly appropriates property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it; and ‘thief’ and ‘steal’ shall be construed accordingly.”

The maximum penalty for this offence is seven years' imprisonment.

In Lawrence,⁶² it was stressed by the House of Lords that this definition involves several elements, all of which must be proved to coincide before liability can be imposed. Each of these elements is defined, wholly or partially, in the ensuing sections of the Theft Act 1968 as follows:

- s.2: dishonesty,
- s.3: appropriation,
- s.4: property,
- s.5: belonging to another, and
- s.6: intention of permanent deprivation.

We shall deal first with the actus reus elements, namely, appropriation of property belonging to another—before turning to the mens rea elements, dishonesty and intention of permanent deprivation.

2. Appropriation

THEFT ACT 1968 s.3:

“(1) Any assumption by a person of the rights of an owner amounts to an appropriation, and this includes, where he has come by the property (innocently or not) without stealing it, any later assumption of a right to it by keeping or dealing with it as owner.

(2) Where property or a right or interest in property is or purports to be transferred for value to a person acting in good faith, no later assumption by him of rights which he believed himself to be acquiring shall, by reason of any defect in the transferor's title, amount to theft of the property.”

COMMITTEE, EIGHTH REPORT,
THEFT AND RELATED OFFENCES,
1966, CMND.2977, PARAS 34–35:

9–015

“34. We hope, and believe, that the concept of ‘dishonest appropriation’ will be easily understood even without the aid of further definition. But there is a partial definition of ‘appropriates’ in ... (section) 3(1) ... It seems to us natural to refer to the act of stealing in ordinary cases as ‘appropriation’. We see no reason why the word should seem strange for more than a short time ...

35. There is an argument for keeping the word ‘converts’ because it is well understood. But it is a lawyers’ word, and those not used to legal language might naturally think that it meant changing something or exchanging property for other property. ‘Appropriates’ seems altogether a better word.”

An appropriation is an assumption of the rights of an owner. But what are the rights of an owner?

F.H. LAWSON AND BERNARD RUDDEN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY
(1982), PP.8–9:

“The main elements (of ownership) are (a) the right to make physical use of a thing; (b) the right to the income from it, in money, in kind, or in services; and (c) the power of management, including that of alienation. Thus the owner of a car may drive it, hire it out, or sell it. And of course within these areas he may do the same things more generously: take the children for a drive, lend it to a friend, give it away.”

9–017

In short, as Roman law used to put it, an owner has the right to “use, enjoy and abuse” their property as they see fit.⁶³ An owner of property may keep it, sell it, give it away or destroy it.

Assuming the rights of an owner is laying claim to be in such a position. The method of acquiring the property is not important. There does not have to be a taking or removal, although this is, of course, what occurs in the paradigmatic theft. The second part of s.3(1) makes this clear. If the owner accidentally leaves a book in the defendant's room there can be an appropriation the moment the defendant decides to keep the book. At this point, she will be assuming a right to the book by keeping or dealing with it as owner, despite the fact that she originally came by the property quite innocently.

This last point leads directly to the central problem in the interpretation of an "appropriation". When the book has been accidentally left in the defendant's room she assumes the rights of an owner the moment she decides to keep it. At this point she is exercising one of the rights of ownership. However, if it were held that this amounted to an appropriation this would mean that there could be a theft by a defendant who has done nothing wrong—other than have a blameworthy state of mind. Following this logic, a defendant in a supermarket who places goods in a trolley but who has a secret intention of stealing them will be guilty of theft. She has decided not to pay for the goods and to make off with them as and when she sees fit. The argument runs that this is treating the goods as one's own and is thus an appropriation.

LAWRENCE V MPC [1972] A.C. 626 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

9-018

Occhi, an Italian visitor who spoke little English, arrived in England at Victoria station and asked the defendant, Lawrence, a taxi driver, to take him to an address in Ladbroke Grove. The defendant informed Occhi that it was a long way and would be expensive. (In reality, the correct fare would have been about 10s. 6d. [52½p].) Occhi got into the taxi and offered a £1 note. Lawrence said that this was not enough and, with Occhi holding out his wallet for him, helped himself to a further £6 from the wallet. He then drove Occhi to his destination. The defendant was convicted of the theft of the approximate sum of £6 contrary to the Theft Act 1968 s.1(1) and appealed against his conviction.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE:

“Mr Occhi, when asked whether he had consented to the money being taken, said that he had ‘permitted’ ... It may well be that when he used the word ‘permitted’, he meant no more than that he had allowed the money to be taken. It certainly was not established at the trial that he had agreed to pay to the appellant a sum far in excess of the legal fare for the journey and so had consented to the acquisition by the appellant of the £6.

The main contention of the appellant in this House and in the Court of Appeal was that Mr Occhi had consented to the taking of the £6 and that, consequently, his conviction could not stand. In my opinion, the facts of this case to which I have referred fall far short of establishing that Mr Occhi had so consented.

Prior to the passage of the Theft Act 1968, which made radical changes in and greatly simplified the law relating to theft and some other offences, it was necessary to prove that the property alleged to have been stolen was taken ‘without the consent of the owner’ (Larceny Act 1916, section 1(1)).

These words are not included in section 1(1) of the Theft Act, ...

I see no ground for concluding that the omission of the words ‘without the consent of the owner’ was inadvertent and not deliberate, and to read the subsection as if they were included is, in my opinion, wholly unwarranted. Parliament by the omission of these words has relieved the prosecution of the burden of establishing that the taking was without the owner’s consent. That is no longer an ingredient of the offence ...

That there was an appropriation in this case is clear. Section 3(1) states that any assumption by a person of the rights of an owner amounts to an appropriation. Here there was clearly such an assumption ...

Belief or the absence of belief that the owner had with such knowledge consented to the appropriation is relevant to the issue of dishonesty, not to the question whether or not there has been an appropriation. That may occur even though the owner has permitted or consented to the property being taken. So proof that Mr Occhi had consented to the appropriation of £6 from his wallet without agreeing to paying a sum in excess of the legal fare does not suffice to show that there was not dishonesty in this case. There was ample evidence that there was.”

Appeal dismissed

9-019

Following this decision, the legal position was that there could be an appropriation even though the victim consented to hand over the property. Thus, the shopper who places the goods in the supermarket trolley can be held to appropriate the goods at that stage. The only thing that distinguishes the legitimate shopper from the thief is the mental state of the latter.

In 1984, the House of Lords in Morris cast doubt on this proposition by holding that the defendant must have done something objectively wrong for there to be an appropriation. As we shall see, however, this case (and its progeny) is no longer good authority on this issue.

R. v MORRIS, ANDERTON v BURNSIDE [1984] A.C. 320 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

9-020

Two defendants took goods from a shelf in a supermarket and removed the proper price labels, and replaced them with labels from cheaper goods. The goods, bearing their incorrect price labels were presented at the checkout counter. One defendant was arrested before, and the other after, paying for the goods. The appeals were heard together.

LORD ROSKILL:

“It is to be observed that the definition of ‘appropriation’ in section 3(1) is not exhaustive ...

The starting point ... must, I think, be the decision of this House in R. v Lawrence ... [in which] Viscount Dilhorne also rejected the argument that even if [the] four elements were all present there could not be theft within the section if the owner of the property in question had consented to the acts which were done by the defendant. That there was in that case a dishonest appropriation was beyond question and the House did not have to consider the precise meaning of that word in section 3(1).

Mr Denison [counsel for the defendants] submitted that the phrase in section 3(1) ‘any assumption by a person of the rights’ (my emphasis) ‘of an owner amounts to an appropriation’ must mean any assumption of ‘all the rights of an owner.’ Since neither respondent had at the time of the removal of the goods from the shelves and of the label switching assumed all the rights of the owner, there was no appropriation and therefore no theft. Mr Jeffreys for the prosecution, on the other hand, contended that the rights in this context only meant any of the rights. An owner of goods has many rights—they have been described as ‘a bundle or package of rights’. Mr Jeffreys contended that on a fair reading of the subsection it cannot have been the intention that every one of an owner’s rights had to be assumed by the alleged thief before an appropriation was proved and that essential ingredient of the offence of theft established.

My Lords, if one reads the words ‘the rights’ at the opening of section 3(1) literally and in isolation from the rest of the section, Mr Denison’s submission undoubtedly has force. But the later words ‘any later assumption of a right’ in subsection (1) and the words in subsection (2) ‘no later assumption by him of rights’ seem to me to militate strongly against the correctness of the submission. Moreover the provisions of section 2(1)(a) also seem to point in the same direction. It follows therefore that it is enough for the prosecution if they have proved in these cases the assumption by the respondents of any of the rights of the owner of the goods in question, that is to say, the supermarket concerned, it being common ground in these cases that the other three of the four elements ... [of theft] had been fully established.

My Lords, Mr Jeffreys sought to argue that any removal from the shelves of the supermarket, even if unaccompanied by label switching, was without more an appropriation. In one passage in his judgment in Morris’s case, the learned Lord Chief Justice appears to have accepted the submission, for he said [1983] Q.B. 587, 596: ‘it seems to us that in taking the article from the shelf the customer is indeed assuming one of the rights of the owner—the right to move the article from its position on the shelf to carry it to the check-out.’

With the utmost respect, I cannot accept this statement as correct. If one postulates an honest customer taking goods from a shelf to put in his or her trolley to take to the checkpoint there to pay the proper price, I am unable to see that any of these actions involves any assumption by the shopper of the rights of the supermarket. In the context of section 3(1), the concept of appropriation in my view involves not an act expressly or impliedly authorised by the owner but an act by way of adverse interference with or usurpation of those rights. When the honest shopper acts as I have just described, he or she is acting with the implied authority of the owner of the supermarket to take the goods from the shelf, put them in the trolley, take them to the checkpoint and there pay the correct price, at which moment the property in the goods will pass to the shopper for the first time ...

If, as I understand all your Lordships to agree, the concept of appropriation in section 3(1) involves an element of adverse interference with or usurpation of some right of the owner, it is necessary next to consider whether that requirement is satisfied in either of these cases. As I have already said, in my view mere removal from the shelves without more is not an appropriation. Further, if a shopper with some perverted sense of humour, intending only to create confusion and nothing more both for the supermarket and for other shoppers, switches labels, I do not think that that act of label switching alone is without more an appropriation, though it is not difficult to envisage some cases of dishonest label-switching which could be. In cases such as the present, it is in truth a combination of these actions, the removal from the shelf and the switching of the labels, which evidences adverse interference with or usurpation of the right of the owner. Those acts, therefore, amount to an appropriation and if they are accompanied by proof of the other three elements to which I have referred, the offence of theft is established. Further, if they are accompanied by other acts such as putting the goods so removed and re-labelled into a receptacle, whether a trolley or the shopper's own bag or basket, proof of appropriation within section 3(1) becomes overwhelming ...”

Appeals dismissed

9-021

This requirement that the defendant must do acts objectively inconsistent with the rights of the owner is consistent with what

Fletcher calls the “theory of manifest criminality”. We saw when examining the law of attempts how this theory leads to an “objectivist orientation”, with insistence that the acts must come close to the completed crime so as to be manifestly dangerous and a threat to security. This was the theory endorsed by the House of Lords in *Anderton v Ryan*⁶⁴ where a distinction was drawn between “objectively innocent” acts on the one hand and “criminal” or “guilty” acts on the other.

Fletcher states that “manifestly criminal” activities must exhibit at least the following essential features. First, the criminal act must manifest, on its face, the actor’s criminal purpose. And secondly, the conduct should be “of a type that is unnerving and disturbing to the community as a whole”.

GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING
CRIMINAL LAW (1978), PP.82–89:

9–022

“The principle of manifest criminality supported the expansion of the law to include all acts of taking that conformed to the shared paradigms of stealthful and forcible taking. A guest sneaking out with his host’s dining utensils looked as much like a thief as any then punished. So, too, the customer that runs from the store with the shopkeeper chasing after him ... The purpose of raising an issue of animus was to challenge the authenticity of appearances. Someone who looked like a thief in the act of taking might not have been one in fact ... The primary inquiry was the act of larceny (theft), and only in extraordinary cases might there have been a dispute about whether someone who acted like a thief had the ‘spirit’ or animus of a thief. Thus the law was structured so as to render intent a subsidiary issue. It was a basis for defeating the implications of the primary element of acting manifestly like a thief ... Routine business transactions, deliveries and takings by consent do not bear this imprint of larceny, and therefore ... lack the features of manifest thievery ... The value implicitly protected in the pattern of manifest criminality is the privacy of criminal suspects. Judges may not enquire about the accused’s mental state, self-control and culpability unless they find preliminarily that the accused’s conduct meets an objective standard of liability. The objective standard

The approach adopted in Morris can be seen as consistent with the “harm principle”: conduct should only be criminalised to prevent the causing of harm, albeit of a “second-order” nature,⁶⁵ to others. The defendant by doing something manifestly observable as wrong, for example, switching price labels, is doing something that is a threat to the security of the store; the interests of the store have been violated and they have sustained a “second-order harm”. This approach stands in sharp contrast to “protectionalist criminology”⁶⁶ sustained by the utilitarian philosophies of punishment. Where the main interest is the protection of the property of others, then whatever measures are necessary to effect such protection become acceptable, even if this means imposing liability at an early stage when a defendant has done nothing observably wrong. If an individual has a blameworthy state of mind, then for deterrent, incapacitative and rehabilitative reasons they need punishment.

The operation of the Morris principle can best be seen by applying it to the facts of several cases on theft.

In Eddy v Niman,⁶⁷ the defendant, intending to steal goods from a store, took them from a shelf and placed them in the provided receptacle. He was not liable for theft because he had done nothing manifestly wrong. He was doing precisely what the store expected all its customers to do, namely, place goods in a receptacle provided by the store.

In Skipp,⁶⁸ the defendant, posing as a genuine haulage contractor, obtained instructions and collected two loads of oranges and onions to be delivered from London to Leicester. He had the intention of stealing the goods from the outset but only after loading them did he actually make off with them. It was held that he did not appropriate the goods when he loaded them because at that stage he was not doing anything inconsistent with the owner’s rights. The appropriation occurred when the goods were “diverted from their true destination”. In Fritschy,⁶⁹ the defendant, acting under the instructions of the owner, collected a quantity of krugerrands (South African gold coins) in London to deliver them to Switzerland. All along he had a secret intention to steal the coins, which he did in Switzerland. The Court of Appeal held that there was no appropriation in England because the defendant had acted with the owner's authority at that stage. The coins were only appropriated in Switzerland where the defendant committed the acts that amounted to an adverse interference with the owner's rights.

These cases were, of course, difficult to reconcile with Lawrence. The House of Lords in Gomez strongly confirmed Lawrence, disapproved much of Morris and overruled Skipp and Fritschy. In doing so, much reliance was placed on the following civil decision.

DOBSON V GENERAL ACCIDENT FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE CORP PLC [1989] 3 W.L.R. 1066 (COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION):

9-024

The claimant had a home insurance policy with the defendant which covered him against loss by "theft". He advertised a Rolex watch and diamond ring for sale for £5,950. The goods were purchased by a rogue using a stolen building society cheque which was worthless. The claimant claimed under his insurance policy and the question was whether there had been a "theft".

PARKER LJ:

"On the basis of R. v Lawrence ... the facts of the present case appear to establish that the rogue assumed all the rights of an owner when he took or received the watch and ring from the plaintiff. That he did so dishonestly and with the intention of permanently depriving the plaintiff of it are matters beyond doubt ...

After anxious consideration I have reached the conclusion that whatever R. v Morris did decide it cannot be regarded as having overruled the very plain decision in R. v Lawrence that appropriation can occur even if the owner consents and that R. v Morris itself makes it plain that it is no defence to say that the property passed under a voidable contract ... I would therefore dismiss the appeal.”

BINGHAM LJ:

“I do not find it easy to reconcile ... [Lawrence] with the reasoning of the House in R. v Morris. Since, however, the House in R. v Morris considered that there had plainly been an appropriation in Lawrence's case, this must (I think) have been because the Italian student, although he had permitted or allowed his money to be taken, had not in truth consented to the taxi driver taking anything in excess of the correct fare. This is not a wholly satisfactory reconciliation, since it might be said that a supermarket consents to customers taking goods from its shelves only when they honestly intend to pay and not otherwise. On the facts of the present case, however, it can be said, by analogy with Lawrence's case, that although the plaintiff permitted and allowed his property to be taken by the rogue, he had not in truth consented to the rogue becoming owner without giving a valid draft drawn by the building society for the price. On this basis I conclude that the plaintiff is able to show an appropriation sufficient to satisfy s.1(1) of the 1968 Act when the rogue accepted delivery of the articles.”

Appeal dismissed

R. v GOMEZ [1993] A.C. 442 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

9-025

The appellant, an assistant manager of an electrical goods shop, lied to the manager of the store that two cheques were valid, with the result that £16,000 worth of goods were supplied to a rogue. The appellant and the rogue were convicted of theft. Their appeal was allowed by the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division). The Crown appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD KEITH OF KINKEL (WITH WHOM LORD JAUNCEY OF TULLICHETTL AND LORD SLYNN OF HADLEY AGREED):

“Lord Roskill was undoubtedly right [in Morris] ... that the assumption by the defendant of any of the rights of an owner could amount to an appropriation ... But there are observations [from his speech] ... that I must regard as unnecessary ... and as being incorrect. In the first place, it seems to me that the switching of price labels on the article is in itself an assumption of one of the rights of the owner, whether or not it is accompanied by some other act such as removing the article from the shelf and placing it in a basket or trolley. No one but the owner has the right to remove a price label from an article or to place a price label upon it. If anyone else does so, he does an act, as Lord Roskill puts it, by way of adverse interference with or usurpation of that right. This is no less so in the case of the practical joker figured by Lord Roskill than in the case of one who makes the switch with dishonest intent. The practical joker, of course, is not guilty of theft because he has not acted dishonestly and does not intend to deprive the owner permanently of the article. So the label switching in itself constitutes an appropriation and so to have held would have been sufficient for the dismissal of both appeals. On the facts of [Morris] ... it was unnecessary to decide whether ... the mere taking of the article from the shelf and putting it in a trolley or other receptacle amounted to the assumption of one of the rights of the owner, and hence an appropriation. There was much to be said in favour of the view that it did, in respect that doing so gave the shopper control of the article and the capacity to exclude any other shopper from taking it. However, Lord Roskill expressed the opinion that it did not, on the ground that the concept of appropriation in the context of section 3(1) 'involves not an act expressly or impliedly authorised by the owner but an act by way of adverse interference with or usurpation of those rights'.

While it is correct to say that appropriation for purposes of section 3(1) includes the latter sort of act, it does not necessarily follow that no other act can amount to an appropriation and in particular that no act expressly or impliedly authorised by the owner can in any circumstances do so. Indeed, R. v Lawrence is a clear decision to the contrary since it laid down unequivocally that an act may be an appropriation notwithstanding that it is done with the consent of the owner. It does not appear to me that any sensible distinction can be made in this context between consent and authorisation ...

[His Lordship then cited extensively from Dobson agreeing with Parker LJ but finding Bingham's LJ's suggested reconciliation of Morris with Lawrence to be unsound.]

The actual decision in Morris was correct, but it was erroneous, in addition to being unnecessary for the decision, to indicate that an act expressly or impliedly authorised by the owner could never amount to an appropriation. There is no material distinction between the facts in Dobson and those in the present case. In each case the owner of the goods was induced by fraud to part with them to the rogue. Lawrence makes it clear that consent to or authorisation by the owner of the taking by the rogue is irrelevant. The taking amounted to an appropriation within the meaning of section 1(1) of the Act of 1968. Lawrence also makes it clear that it is no less irrelevant that what happened may also have constituted the offence of obtaining property by deception under section 15(1) of the Act ...

The decision in Lawrence was a clear decision ... which had stood for 12 years when doubt was thrown upon it by obiter dicta in Morris. Lawrence must be regarded as authoritative and correct, and there is no question of it now being right to depart from it ...

In my opinion ... [Skipp and Fritschy] were inconsistent with Lawrence and were wrongly decided.”

9-026

LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON:

“The fact that Parliament used that composite phrase—‘dishonest appropriation’—in my judgment casts light on what is meant by the word ‘appropriation’. The views expressed (obiter) by this House in Morris that ‘appropriation’ involves an act by way of adverse interference with or usurpation of the rights of the owner treats the word appropriation as being tantamount to ‘misappropriation’. The concept of adverse interference with or usurpation of rights introduces into the word appropriation the mental state of both the owner and the accused. So far as concerns the mental state of the owner (did he consent?), the Act of 1968 expressly refers to such consent when it is a material factor: see section 2(1)(b), 11(1), 12(1) and 13. So far as concerns the mental state of the accused, the composite phrase in section 1(1) itself indicates that the requirement is dishonesty.

For myself, therefore, I regard the word ‘appropriation’ in isolation as being an objective description of the act done irrespective of the mental state of either the owner or the accused. It is impossible to reconcile the decision in Lawrence (that the question of consent is irrelevant in considering whether there has been an appropriation) with the views expressed in Morris, which latter views in my judgment were incorrect.”

9-027

LORD LOWRY (DISSENTING):

“The ordinary and natural meaning of ‘appropriate’ is to take for oneself, or to treat as one’s own, property which belongs to someone else. The primary dictionary meaning is ‘to take possession of, take to oneself, especially without authority’, and that is in my opinion the meaning which the word bears in section 1(1). The act of appropriating property is a one-sided act, done without the consent or authority of the owner. And, if the owner consents to transfer property to the offender or to a third party, the offender does not appropriate the property, even if the owner’s consent has been obtained by fraud ...

Coming now to section 3, the primary meaning of ‘assumption’ is ‘taking to oneself’, again a unilateral act, and this meaning is consistent with subsections (1) and (2). To use the word in its secondary, neutral sense would neutralise the word ‘appropriation’, to which assumption is here equated, and would lead to a number of strange results. Incidentally, ... ‘the rights’ may mean ‘all the rights’, which would be the normal grammatical meaning, or (less probably, in my opinion) ‘any rights’ see R. v Morris ...

I would respectfully agree with [Lord Roskill’s description in Morris] ... in relation to dishonest actions, of appropriation as involving an act by way of adverse interference with or usurpation of the owner’s rights, but I believe that the less aggressive definition of appropriation which I have put forward fits the word as used in an honest sense in section 2(1) as well as elsewhere in the Act ... [He then expressly declined to discuss whether Morris itself was really an example of theft.]

[T]here was no theft [in Dobson] because the property passed with the fraudulently obtained consent of the owner and the buyer was guilty of obtaining by deception in the false pretences sense ...

It is true that Morris contains no disapproval or qualification of Lawrence, but, in my view, the main statements of principle in these cases cannot possibly be reconciled and the later case therefore must not be regarded as providing any support for the earlier ...

[In the Court of Appeal in the present case] Lord Lane CJ said:

‘... We therefore conclude that there was a de facto, albeit voidable, contract between the owners and Ballay [one of Gomez’s associates]; that it was by virtue of that contract that Ballay took possession of the goods; that accordingly the transfer of the goods to him was with the consent and express authority of the owner and that accordingly there was no lack of authorisation and no appropriation ...’

I respectfully agree ... [and] would dismiss the Crown’s appeal.”

Appeal allowed

9–028

The decision of the majority of the House of Lords in Gomez may have resolved the conflict between Lawrence and Morris, but in Gomez the defendant had induced the shop manager to part with possession of the electrical equipment by means of a fraudulent deception. This meant that, at common law, the defendant only obtained a voidable title to the goods, and the shop manager had the right to rescind the contract.⁷⁰ It might therefore be argued that Gomez could be distinguished and was not applicable in a case where the original owner of the property parted with all of his rights in the property and the defendant acquired full, indefeasible title. However, this point was firmly resolved in the case of Hinks.

R. v HINKS [2001] 2 A.C. 241 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

9–029

The defendant made friends with a man of limited intelligence. She regularly accompanied him to his building society where he made withdrawals from his account amounting to a total of about £60,000 which was deposited in the defendant’s account. A consultant psychiatrist gave evidence that the man was naïve and trusting and had no idea of the value of his assets or the ability to calculate their value, and that, although he was capable of making the decision to divest himself of money, it was unlikely he could make that decision alone. The defendant was convicted of theft of the money withdrawn from his account. The Court of Appeal dismissed her appeal. She appealed to the House of Lords.

9-030

LORD STEYN:

“The certified question before the House is as follows: ‘Whether the acquisition of an indefeasible title to property is capable of amounting to an appropriation of property belonging to another for the purposes of section 1(1) of the Theft Act 1968.’ In other words, the question is whether a person can ‘appropriate’ property belonging to another where the other person makes him an indefeasible gift of property, retaining no proprietary interest or any right to resume or recover any proprietary interest in the property ...

[I]t is immaterial whether the act was done with the owner’s consent or authority. It is true of course that the certified question in Gomez referred to the situation where consent had been obtained by fraud. But the majority judgments do not differentiate between cases of consent induced by fraud and consent given in any other circumstances. The ratio involves a proposition of general application. Gomez therefore gives effect to section 3(1) of the Act by treating ‘appropriation’ as a neutral word comprehending ‘any assumption by a person of the rights of an owner’. If the law is as held in Gomez, it destroys the argument advanced on the present appeal, namely that an indefeasible gift of property cannot amount to an appropriation.

Counsel for the appellant submitted in the first place that the law as expounded in Gomez and Lawrence must be qualified to say that there can be no appropriation unless the other party (the owner) retains some proprietary interest, or the right to resume or recover some proprietary interest, in the property. Alternatively, counsel argued that ‘appropriates’ should be interpreted as if the word ‘unlawfully’ preceded it. Counsel said that the effect of the decisions in Lawrence and Gomez is to reduce the actus reus of theft to ‘vanishing point’. He argued that the result is to bring the criminal law ‘into conflict’ with the civil law. Moreover, he argued that the decisions in Lawrence and Gomez may produce absurd and grotesque results. He argued that the mental requirements of dishonesty and intention of permanently depriving the owner of property are insufficient to filter out some cases of conduct which should not sensibly be regarded as theft ...

[I]n such cases a prosecution is hardly likely and if mounted, is likely to founder on the basis that the jury will not be persuaded that there was dishonesty in the required sense. And one must retain a sense of perspective ... If the law is restated by adopting a narrower definition of appropriation, the outcome is likely to place beyond the reach of the criminal law dishonest persons who should be found guilty of theft ...

Counsel for the appellant further pointed out that the law as stated in Lawrence and Gomez creates a tension between the civil and the criminal law. In other words, conduct which is not wrongful in a civil law sense may constitute the crime of theft. Undoubtedly, this is so. The question whether the civil claim to title by a convicted thief, who committed no civil wrong, may be defeated by the principle that nobody may benefit from his own civil or criminal wrong does not arise for decision. Nevertheless, there is a more general point, namely that the interaction between criminal law and civil law can cause problems ... The purposes of the civil law and the criminal law are somewhat different. In theory the two systems should be in perfect harmony. In a practical world there will sometimes be some disharmony between the two systems. In any event, it would be wrong to assume on a priori grounds that the criminal law rather than the civil law is defective ... The tension between the civil and the criminal law is therefore not in my view a factor which justifies a departure from the law as stated in Lawrence and Gomez. Moreover, these decisions of the House have a marked beneficial consequence. While in some contexts of the law of theft a judge cannot avoid explaining civil law concepts to a jury (e.g. in respect of section 2(1)(a)), the decisions of the House of Lords eliminate the need for such explanations in respect of appropriation. That is a great advantage in an overly complex corner of the law.

My Lords, if it had been demonstrated that in practice Lawrence and Gomez were calculated to produce injustice that would have been a compelling reason to revisit the merits of the holdings in those decisions. That is, however, not the case. In practice, the mental requirements of theft are an adequate protection against injustice. In these circumstances I would not be willing to depart from the clear decisions of the House in Lawrence and Gomez. This brings me back to counsel's principal submission, namely that a person does not appropriate property unless the other (the owner) retains, beyond the instant of the alleged theft, some proprietary interest or the right to resume or recover some proprietary interest. This submission is directly contrary to the holdings in Lawrence and Gomez. It must be rejected. The alternative submission is that the word 'appropriates' should be interpreted as if the word 'unlawfully' preceded it so that only an act which is unlawful under the general law can be an appropriation. This submission is an invitation to interpolate a word in the carefully crafted language of the 1968 Act. It runs counter to the decisions in Lawrence and Gomez and must also be rejected. It follows that the certified question must be answered in the affirmative ... I would dismiss the appeal to the House."

9-031

LORD HOBHOUSE (DISSENTING):

"The reasoning of the Court of Appeal therefore depends upon the disturbing acceptance that a criminal conviction and the imposition of custodial sanctions may be based upon conduct which involves no inherent illegality and may only be capable of being criticised on grounds of lack of morality. This approach itself raises fundamental questions. An essential function of the criminal law is to define the boundary between what conduct is criminal and what merely immoral. Both are the subject of the disapprobation of ordinary right-thinking citizens and the distinction is liable to be arbitrary or at least strongly influenced by considerations subjective to the individual members of the tribunal. To treat otherwise lawful conduct as criminal merely because it is open to such disapprobation would be contrary to principle and open to the objection that it fails to achieve the objective and transparent certainty required of the criminal law by the principles basic to human rights ...

If one treats the 'acceptance' of the gift as an appropriation, and this was the approach of the judge and is implicit in the judgment of the Court of Appeal (despite their choice of words), there are immediate difficulties with section 2(1)(a). The defendant did have the right to deprive the donor of the property. The donor did consent to the appropriation; indeed, he intended it. There are also difficulties with section 6 as she was not acting regardless of the donor's rights; the donor has already surrendered his rights. The only way that these conclusions can be displaced is by showing that the gift was not valid. There are even difficulties with section 3 itself. The donee is not 'assuming the rights of an owner': she has them already ...

Section 3 does not use any qualitative expression such as 'misappropriates' nor does it repeat the Larceny Act expression 'without the consent of the owner'. It has thus been read by some as if 'appropriates' was a wholly colourless expression. This reading declines to draw any guidance from the context in which the word is used in the definition in section 1(1) and the scheme of sections 2 to 6. It also declines to attach any significance to the use of the word 'assumption'. This led some curious submissions being made to your Lordships.

It was for example suggested that the garage repair mechanic employed to change the oil of a car would have appropriated the car. The reasoning is that only the owner has the right to do this or tell someone to do it therefore to do it is to assume the rights of the owner. This is an absurdity even when one takes into account that some of the absurd results can be avoided by other parts of the definition of theft. The mechanic is not assuming any right; he is merely carrying out the instructions of the owner. The person who accepts a valid gift is simply conforming to the wishes of the owner. The words 'appropriate' (property belonging to another) and 'assume' (the rights of that other) have a useful breadth of meaning but each of them in its natural meaning includes an element of doing something which displaces the rights of that other person. The rights of that other (the owner) include the right to authorise another (the defendant) to do things which would otherwise be an infringement of the rights of the owner ...

My Lords, the relevant law is contained in sections 1 to 6 of the Act. They should be construed as a whole and applied in a manner which presents a consistent scheme both internally and with the remainder of the Act. The phrase 'dishonestly appropriates' should be construed as a composite phrase. It does not include acts done in relation to the relevant property which are done in accordance with the actual wishes or actual authority of the person to whom the property belongs. This is because such acts do not involve any assumption of the rights of that person within section 3(1) or because, by necessary implication from section 2(1), they are not to be regarded as dishonest appropriations of property belonging to another.

Actual authority, wishes, consent (or similar words) mean, both as a matter of language and on the authority of the three House of Lords cases, authorisation not obtained by fraud or misrepresentation. The definition of theft therefore embraces cases where the property has come to the defendant by the mistake of the person to whom it belongs and there would be an obligation to restore it—section 5(4)—or property in which the other still has an equitable proprietary interest—section 5(1). This would also embrace property obtained by undue influence or other cases coming within the classes of invalid transfer ...

In cases of alleged gift, the criteria to be applied are the same. But additional care may need to be taken to see that the transaction is properly explained to the jury. It is unlikely that a charge of theft will be brought where there is not clear evidence of at least some conduct of the defendant which includes an element of fraud or overt dishonesty or some undue influence or knowledge of the deficient capacity of the alleged donor. This was the basis upon which the prosecution of the appellant was originally brought in the present case. On this basis there is no difficulty in explaining to the jury the relevant parts of section 5 and section 2(1) and the effect of the phrase ‘assumption of the rights of an owner’ ...

I would answer the certified question in the negative. But, in any event, I would allow the appeal and quash the conviction because the summing up failed to direct the jury adequately upon the other essential elements of theft, not just appropriation.”

Appeal dismissed

9-032

Certain conclusions can be drawn from Gomez and Hinks as to the present meaning of “appropriation”.

First, an appropriation involves the assumption of any of the rights of the owner. There need not be an assumption of all of the rights of the owner.

Secondly, where the defendant obtains property by deception there is an appropriation: it is irrelevant that the owner of the property “consents” to the transfer. For example, in *Atakpu*⁷¹ the defendants, using false passports and licences, deceived a car-rental firm in Germany into parting with cars to them. They brought the cars to England with a view to selling them here. It was held that the theft had been committed in Germany and therefore there could be no theft in England. This meant that there was an almost⁷² complete overlap between theft and the former offence of obtaining property by deception contrary to the Theft Act 1968 s.15 (now abolished by the Fraud Act 2006). In any case where the defendant deceived the victim into parting with property the prosecution had the choice of charging either offence.⁷³

Thirdly, because the victim’s consent is irrelevant, it is unnecessary for the defendant to do anything involving “adverse interference with or usurpation of” the owner’s rights. For example, in Atakpu the defendants who rented the cars in Germany did nothing beyond what they were permitted to do but were nevertheless held to have stolen the cars in Germany. The method of receiving the property is irrelevant: it can be pursuant to a valid contract or a gift.

Finally, it is irrelevant that the person receiving the property acquires an indefeasible title to the property. On the facts of Hinks itself the woman might only in fact have acquired a voidable title in civil law if there had been undue influence. It was emphasised, however, that the validity of the gift was irrelevant.

The approach adopted by the House of Lords in Lawrence, Gomez and, particularly, Hinks is most unfortunate. First, it is lamentable that leading House of Lords’ decisions on the meaning of “appropriation” such as Gomez and Hinks do not even bother to specify the precise actions that constitute the appropriation. This leads to a failure to consider whether at the time of the appropriation the property still belongs to another. For instance, it is arguable that if the appropriation in Gomez occurred when the goods were physically collected by the rogue, ownership had already passed to him and so there was no appropriation of property belonging to another.⁷⁴

Secondly, the concept of appropriation has become “wholly colourless” (Lord Hobhouse in Hinks); it has been emasculated of any practical meaning and has become no more than a minimal triggering condition for theft with the entire emphasis transferred to whether the conduct was dishonest or not. The absurdity of this approach is revealed in the following examples, considered obiter in Gallasso, a case decided prior to Hinks:

“for example, the shopper carelessly knocks an article off the shelf; if he bends down and replaces it on the shelf nobody could regard that as an act of appropriation. Or suppose a lady drops her purse in the street. If a passer-by picks it up and hands it back there is no appropriation even though the passer-by is in temporary control.”⁷⁵

9-033

As a result of Hinks, these actions, along with those of Lord Hobhouse’s motor mechanic, all now amount to an appropriation. An appropriation has become a neutral, value-free act with the mental element of the defendant being irrelevant. This purely objective description ignores the definition of appropriation in s.3(1) that it must involve an “assumption by a person of the rights of the owner”. As seen above, “assumption” is not a value-free word. It suggests that one is laying claim to rights one does not have over property. There must be an assertion of dominion over the property; it involves a positive decision to treat the property as one’s own.⁷⁶ It has been argued that there should be an element of “proprietary subjectivity” by the defendant towards the property: “a mental connection of the person with the thing, the sense of dominion ... he behaves as if the property were his”.⁷⁷ It is absurd to assert that picking up a dropped purse to hand it back to the owner is assuming the rights of the owner.

For similar reasons, it is objectionable that persons who have done nothing wrong yet, but have secret dishonest intentions, should be liable for theft. As seen above, the defendant in Eddy v Niman took goods from a shelf in a store and, intending not to pay for them, placed them in a trolley. Following Hinks this would now be an appropriation and, because of the mens rea, theft. Again, it is difficult to accept that this is assuming the rights of an owner. One can surely only lay claim to, or assert, the rights of an owner if there is an open representation that one is assuming such a right. In the supermarket situation, as long as the goods are in the trolley the defendant is recognising and respecting the rights of the owner by doing exactly what he is expected to do. It is quite different if the defendant slips the goods into their own pocket. They are thereby laying claim to the goods; they are treating them as owner without any recognition of the rights of another. Using Fletcher's test of "manifest criminality" discussed earlier, the reasonable observer would recognise the theftuous criminality of the defendant's actions.⁷⁸ However, following Hinks, such considerations are irrelevant. This marks an alarming return to "protectionist criminology" whereby liability is imposed primarily on the basis of the defendant's blameworthy state of mind—even if they have done nothing observably wrong.

9-034

A third objection to the ruling in Hinks is that persons can be liable for theft despite committing no civil wrong thus creating a conflict between the civil law and the criminal law: "It is surely intolerable that the performance of a perfectly valid contract should be a crime".⁷⁹ With regard to valid gifts, the recipient acquires an indefeasible title to property and can sue the donor if they take the property back. This amounts to the civil law "assisting [the defendant] to enjoy, or to recover, the fruits of his crime".⁸⁰ It has been argued, however, that congruence between these two areas of law is not possible: criminal courts are not well placed to determine whether a valid title has been acquired; civil courts are unable to determine liability for theft which depends on the establishment of dishonesty (a question of fact for a jury or magistrate). Nor is harmony necessary because the relevant rules of civil and criminal law are not aimed at the same thing: for example, the civil law has an interest, inter alia, in protecting the rights of third parties who subsequently acquire property.⁸¹ The problem with these views is that criminal courts do have to decide questions of civil law⁸² and civil courts do have to decide questions of dishonesty.⁸³ More significantly, this argument misses the central point that the law of theft is there to protect persons' interests in property. These interests can only exist at civil law: “remove dependence on the law of property, and property offences have no rationale”.⁸⁴ A different argument in favour of the Hinks position is that it is legitimate to criminalise conduct that does not breach civil law proprietary rights because such conduct “may nonetheless have a tendency to undermine property rights, either directly by attacking the interests that they protect, or indirectly by weakening an established system of property rights and so threatening the public good that that system represents”.⁸⁵ Of course, it is legitimate to criminalise conduct that threatens security interests—but that is the function of the law of attempt and the other inchoate and endangerment offences. Attempted theft, for example, involves criminalising conduct that threatens the interests protected by the law of theft. The substantive law of theft should, however, be aimed at protecting existing property rights which can only be established by reference to the civil law.

A final objection to the decisions of Lawrence, Gomez and Hinks is that it was quite wrong to have collapsed the distinction between theft and the former offence of obtaining property by deception (now abolished by the Fraud Act 2006). It should be noted that the effect of Gomez and Hinks is that theft became a very broad offence of dishonesty. The general offence of fraud created by the Fraud Act 2006, which replaced the deception offences, is also a very broad offence of dishonesty,⁸⁶ which means that there is considerable overlap between the offences of theft and fraud.

P. R. GLAZEBROOK, “THIEF OR SWINDLER: WHO CARES?” [1991]
C.L.J. 389:

9-035

“Should it matter tuppence whether a crook snatched his victim’s property or tricked him out of it? Parliament evidently thought not [by originally enacting the same penalties for the two offences] ...

In the ensuing 22 years the courts decided accordingly ... [holding] that though property had been, or might have been, obtained by deception the crook could still be convicted of theft for there was nothing in the definition of stealing in section 1 of the 1968 Act that required the courts to make the trivial and morally irrelevant distinction between someone who dishonestly appropriated another's property by stealth, and one who did so by deceit. The crook is as dishonest in the one case as the other, and the gain to him, and the loss to his victim, is exactly the same ... It would certainly be bizarre if a defendant who appropriated property he had received because the transferor had made a mistake to which the defendant had not contributed were guilty of theft (as he is: s.5(4)), but was not guilty if the property had come to him because of a mistake which he had deliberately induced.

What is more, it may be either difficult to decide, or the merest matter of chance, whether the crook had resorted to deception in order to get his sticky mitts on to the property he coveted. In Lawrence it would have been as difficult as it would have been pointless to set about deciding whether the travel-weary and English-less Signor Occhi had been deceived by taxi-driver Lawrence ... or whether Signor Occhi was just too bemused to know what exactly was happening as Lawrence helped himself to the notes in his wallet ... Can it really be that Her Majesty's judges think that they must indulge the sensitivities of a con-man who feels hurt at being called a common thief? Indeed, the decision (the Court of Appeal judgment in Gomez) looks even sillier now that Parliament has decided to reduce the maximum sentence for theft (but not that for obtaining) from 10 years to 7, for it will enable defendants to demand that they should be acquitted of one offence because they are guilty of a more serious one."

STEPHEN SHUTE AND JEREMY HORDER, "THIEVING AND DECEIVING: WHAT IS THE DIFFERENCE?" (1993) 56 M.L.R. 548, 549–553:

9–036

"It has long been recognised that there is some common sense distinction between theft and obtaining property by deception ... The criminal law seeks to find appropriate labels for different kinds of wrongdoers, as part of its 'representative labelling' function. The label 'thief' does not carry the same moral import as the label 'conman' ...

There is in our society a general social practice of uncoerced voluntary transfers ('givings'), even when they are the product of another's advice, influence or persuasion ... [which] serve[s] to enhance the transferor's autonomy ... [T]he nature of the wrongdoing in theft has a separate moral foundation from that of obtaining by deception. The wrongful conduct in obtaining by deception is internal to the practice of voluntary transfer. Its wrongfulness centres on the abuse of what should have been an autonomy enhancing transaction. The fraudster abuses the control that he or she has over the information on which victims make their decisions about an admittedly voluntary transfer: the victim's chances of making an authentic choice are deliberately or recklessly undermined by the fraudster. The wrongful act in theft, however, is external to the legitimate social practice of voluntary transfers of property. Its wrongfulness centres on the fact that the thief bypasses the entire social practice at the victim's expense. Putting it metaphorically, whereas the thief makes war on a social practice from the outside, the deceiver is the traitor within."

9-037

These latter views are surely preferable to those of Glazebrook. Offences should be structured, labelled and punished to reflect the extent of wrongdoing and harm involved. Crimes are generally described in terms of their paradigms. The paradigmatic theft involves a surreptitious or forcible taking while deception offences involved a confrontation and a participation by the victim in the loss of the property.⁸⁷ With theft, the owner is generally helpless against such a taking. If interrupted there is a risk of violence.

As shall be seen later, the Fraud Act 2006 has abolished all the deception offences and replaced them with two new offences: fraud (which can be committed in one of three ways) and obtaining services dishonestly. One of the three ways in which fraud can be committed is through the making of a false representation with a dishonest intention to make a gain or cause a loss. The new offence thus differs significantly from the previous offence of obtaining property by deception. First, there need be no deception. It does not have to be established that the victim believed the false representation and that that caused them to part with property. Secondly, no property need actually be obtained. The new offence adopts an inchoate model. What is criminal is making the false representation with the requisite intent. It can, however, be anticipated that prosecutions will mostly be brought in cases where property has actually been obtained and the victim has sustained a loss. In such cases, there will still be considerable overlap between fraud and theft and the above criticisms of the over-broad interpretation of appropriation will still apply. However, the overlap is no longer nearly so complete. In cases where no property has been obtained there will very seldom be an appropriation and so fraud will be the only available charge. The next section, however, demonstrates that even in such cases there will sometimes be an appropriation.

(i) Appropriation and control

9-038

Another problem that has arisen is whether there can be an appropriation by a defendant who is not in a position to exercise power or control over the property. Can a defendant sitting in a pub in Leicester appropriate the Crown Jewels (situated in the Tower of London) by “selling” them to the mythical, ever-gullible foreign tourist?

R. V PITHAM AND HEHL (1976) 65 CR.
APP. R. 45 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-039

A man called Millman, knowing that his friend McGregor was in prison, decided to take advantage of his friend's hapless plight and steal furniture from his house. He took the two appellants to the house and sold them some furniture. Millman was convicted of burglary on the basis that he had entered the building as a trespasser and committed theft therein, contrary to the Theft Act 1968 s.9(1)(b). The two appellants were convicted of handling stolen goods. They argued that their handling was still “in the course of stealing”; the goods were not yet stolen and therefore they were not handling stolen goods.

LAWTON LJ:

“What was the appropriation in this case? The jury found that the two appellants had handled the property after Millman had stolen it ... What had Millman done? He had assumed the rights of the owner. He had done that when he took the two appellants to 20 Parry Road, showed them the property and invited them to buy what they wanted. He was then acting as the owner. He was then, in the words of the statute, ‘assuming the rights of the owner’. The moment he did that he appropriated McGregor’s goods to himself. The appropriation was complete. After this appropriation had been completed there was no question of these two appellants taking part, in the words of the section 22, in dealing with the goods ‘in the course of the stealing’.”

Appeal dismissed

9-040

It has been argued that there can be no assumption of a right of an owner in such a case because an owner has no general right that others shall not contract to sell or purport to pass ownership in their property: “He does not need such a right, because other people, generally, can do him no harm by offering to sell his goods, and cannot pass ownership without his authority.”⁸⁸ Further, the fact that the owner suffers no harm because ownership cannot be passed is irrelevant. It is only in rare cases that theft deprives the owner of their ownership (as opposed to possession) of the goods⁸⁹ and causing loss of ownership is simply not a prerequisite of the law of theft.

However, while an offer to sell another’s property can probably amount to an appropriation,⁹⁰ this should only be so where the actor is in a position to threaten the owner’s rights.⁹¹ Sitting in a pub offering to sell the Crown Jewels poses no threat whatsoever and therefore does not amount to an assumption of a right of an owner. Indeed, viewed from another perspective, it would not even amount to an attempted theft as the acts would still be preparatory. On the other hand, the rogue Millman in Pitham was in a position to threaten his friend’s rights. His was an act of adverse interference with the rights of owner and was an assumption of the rights of owner.

(ii) Timing of appropriation

9-041

One of the criticisms, mentioned above, of Gomez and the other leading House of Lords' decisions was their failure to consider the precise point in time when the appropriation occurs. This matter has been considered in other cases—mainly ones where an act is done in one place which affects property in another place. Often this property is a thing in action such as a debt owed by a bank to an account holder.⁹² In Chan Man-sin, the Privy Council held that:

“one who draws, presents and negotiates a cheque on a particular bank account is assuming the rights of the owner of the credit in the account or (as the case may be) of the prenegotiated right to draw on the account up to the agreed figure.”⁹³

In Hilton,⁹⁴ it was held that the appropriation occurred when the defendant instructed the bank to make a transfer of funds and the transfer was made. The decision in Chan Man-sin is to be preferred. Presenting a cheque is undoubtedly as clear an assumption of ownership as swapping price labels. Whether the transfer of money is ever made is as irrelevant as whether the shopkeeper is fooled by the switched price labels. In Sui Soi Ngan,⁹⁵ it was held that the drawing and signing of a cheque (in England) were merely preparatory acts and that the appropriation occurred when the cheque was presented to the bank (in Scotland).

In Osman,⁹⁶ the defendant in Hong Kong sent a telex to a New York bank instructing payment from the victim's account into another account. It was held that one of an owner's rights is the right to draw on an account: “It is that right which the defendant assumes by presenting a cheque, or by sending a telex instruction without authority”. Accordingly, the act of sending the telex in Hong Kong was the appropriation.⁹⁷ More usually today, it would be the act of sending an email in these circumstances that would constitute the appropriation.

A somewhat different approach was adopted in Levin.⁹⁸ Using a computer in Russia, the defendant gained unauthorised access to a US bank and diverted funds into false accounts. Beldam LJ favoured the view that a crime could have a dual location: “It seems to us artificial to regard the act as having been done in one rather than the other place”. Nevertheless, he felt that if “having to choose”, the appropriation occurred in the US:

“The fact that the applicant was physically in St Petersburg is of far less significance than the fact that he was looking at and operating on magnetic discs located in Parsipenny. The essence of what he was doing was done there. Until the instruction is recorded on the disc, there is in fact no appropriation.”

(iii) Continuing appropriation

9-042

Is an appropriation complete as soon as there is an assumption of a right of an owner or does it continue for as long as the owner continues to assume that right? This can be important. For example, there can only be liability for handling stolen goods if the handling is “otherwise than in the course of stealing”.⁹⁹

R. V ATAKPU [1994] Q.B. 69 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-043

The defendants hired cars in Germany and Belgium dishonestly intending to sell them in England.

WARD J:

“It would seem that (1) theft can occur in an instant by a single appropriation but it can also involve a course of dealing with property lasting longer and involving several appropriations before the transaction is complete; (2) theft is a finite act—it has a beginning and it has an end; (3) at what point the transaction is complete is a matter for the jury to decide upon the facts of each case; ... In our judgment, if goods have once been stolen, even if stolen abroad, they cannot be stolen again by the same thief exercising the same or other rights of ownership over the property.

We find it more difficult to answer ... whether or not theft is a continuous offence. On a strict reading of Reg. v. Gomez any dishonest assumption of the rights of the owner made with the necessary intention constitutes theft and that leaves little room for a continuous course of action.

We would not wish that to be the law. Such restriction and rigidity may lead to technical anomalies and injustice. We would prefer to leave it for the common sense of the jury to decide that the appropriation can continue for so long as the thief can sensibly be regarded as in the act of stealing or, in more understandable words, so long as he is “on the job”. [However], since the matter is not strictly necessary for our decision we will leave it open for further argument. It is not necessary for us to decide because no jury properly directed could reasonably arrive at a conclusion that the theft of these motor cars was still continuing days after the appellants had first taken them. If the jury had been asked when and where these motor cars were stolen they could only have answered that they were stolen in Frankfurt or Brussels. The theft was complete abroad and the thieves could not steal again in England.”

Appeals allowed

9-044

Inevitably, such a fluid test of whether the defendant is “on the job” raises problems. If a burglar steals valuables from a house and hands them to a “fence” in a car parked outside on the street, is he still “on the job”? The liability of the “fence” for theft or handling will depend upon such a determination.

(iv) No need for loss

9-045

As long as there is an appropriation, accompanied by an intention to permanently deprive someone of property, there is no need for that person actually to sustain any loss. In Wheatley,¹⁰⁰ the case involved a corrupt public official, who awarded a lucrative construction contract to the second appellant, in whose companies he had a public interest. The magistrate had dismissed theft charges against the appellants on the basis that the government had not been adversely affected by their acts, since the construction work had been carried out. The Court of Appeal of the British Virgin Islands entered convictions on these charges of theft, on the basis that consideration of whether there had been loss or gain was irrelevant to the question of whether there had been an “appropriation”. The Privy Council concluded that this approach was correct:

“It is certainly true that in most cases of theft there will be an original owner of money or goods who will be poorer because of the defendant’s conduct. But in one of the two cases in R. v Morris ... the defendant was arrested before paying the reduced price for the goods, so that the supermarket suffered no loss, and in *R. (A) v Crown Court at Snaresbrook*¹⁰¹ ... it was accepted that the alleged theft was carried out for a purpose which could financially benefit the company.”¹⁰²

In Chan Man-sin,¹⁰³ presenting a forged cheque was held to be an appropriation even though the defendant’s actions were legally ineffective as the transaction was a nullity and the bank would have had to repay the money. These decisions reveal the almost inchoate nature of the crime of theft following Gomez and Hinks.

(v) Bona fide purchasers

9–046

Section 3(2) provides a special exemption for the bona fide purchaser for value of stolen goods. If a person bought goods at a reasonable price not knowing they were stolen and then later discovered they were, but decided to keep them, this would (without s.3(2)) come within the latter half of s.3(1), namely, they would have come by the property innocently without stealing it but would be appropriating it when they decided to keep it. The Criminal Law Revision Committee specifically proposed this exception on the ground that while there was a case for the imposition of criminal liability in such cases, “on the whole it seems to us that, whatever view is taken of the buyer’s moral duty, the law would be too strict if it made him guilty of theft”.¹⁰⁴ Accordingly, in Wheeler the defendant innocently purchased some stolen military antiques. He was later informed by the police that the goods were stolen but, nevertheless, sold one of the items. It was held that he could not be guilty of theft if he kept the goods for himself or sold them to another.¹⁰⁵ It is, however, possible that in selling such goods the defendant could be liable for the offence of fraud (if they represented that they had good title) or of aiding and abetting the offence of handling stolen goods by the purchaser (if both knew the goods were stolen).¹⁰⁶

3. Property

THEFT ACT 1968 s.4:

9-047

“(1) ‘Property’ includes money and all other property, real or personal, including things in action and other intangible property.

(2) A person cannot steal land, or things forming part of land and severed from it by him or by his directions, except in the following cases, that is to say—

- (a) when he is a trustee or personal representative, or is authorised by power of attorney, or as liquidator of a company, or otherwise, to sell or dispose of land belonging to another, and he appropriates the land or anything forming part of it by dealing with it in breach of the confidence reposed in him; or
- (b) when he is not in possession of the land and appropriates anything forming part of the land by severing it or causing it to be severed or after it has been severed; or
- (c) when, being in possession of the land under a tenancy, he appropriates the whole or part of any fixture or structure let to be used with the land.

For purposes of this subsection ‘land’ does not include incorporeal hereditaments; ‘tenancy’ means a tenancy for years or any less period and includes an agreement for such a tenancy, but a person who after the end of a tenancy remains in possession as statutory tenant or otherwise is to be treated as having possession under the tenancy, and 'let' shall be construed accordingly.

(3) A person who picks mushrooms growing wild on any land, or who picks flowers, fruit or foliage from a plant growing wild on any land does not (although not in possession of the land) steal what he picks, unless he does it for reward or for sale or other commercial purpose.

For purposes of this subsection 'mushroom' includes any fungus, and 'plant' includes any shrub or tree.

(4) Wild creatures, tamed or untamed, shall be regarded as property; but a person cannot steal a wild creature not tamed nor ordinarily kept in captivity, or the carcass of any such creature, unless either it has been reduced into possession by or on behalf of another person and possession of it has not since been lost or abandoned, or another person is in course of reducing it into possession."

9-048

Theft is an offence against property and inevitably the question arises as to the meaning of "property". Section 4(1) provides an extremely wide definition that property includes:

1. Money: This refers to current coins and bank notes, including foreign ones. Obsolete coins and notes would constitute other personal property. It does not cover money placed in a bank account, which then constitutes a debt owed by the bank to the account holder and is a thing in action (see below).
2. All real property: i.e. land and things attached to the land such as houses. However, the breadth of this provision is greatly limited by ss.4(2), (3) and (4): Section 4(2) isolates the only circumstances in which land and the things attached to the land may be stolen. Where a defendant dishonestly tries to dispose of an interest in another's land, a charge of fraud under the Fraud Act 2006 s.1 is likely to be the most appropriate charge. By virtue of s.4(2)(a), a trustee authorised to sell or dispose of trust land would commit theft if they dishonestly made an unauthorised disposal of the property. Section 4(2)(b) deals with the appropriation by persons not in possession of the land: for example, it is not theft where D moves the fence to his garden so as to annex part of his neighbour's lawn into his own garden. Nor do squatters steal the land that they 'squat' on.¹⁰⁷ However, a person not in possession of land can steal anything forming part of the land by severing it from the land or appropriating it after severance, so it would be theft if D were to remove trees or shrubs planted in his neighbour's garden.¹⁰⁸ Under s.4(2)(c), a tenant may be guilty of theft where he appropriates any fixture or structure let to be used with the land, e.g. removing a bath. This subsection does not require that the thing actually be severed from the land, merely that the fixture be wholly or partly appropriated. So "if the tenant contracted to sell the unsevered fireplace in the house leased by him, he would be guilty of theft".¹⁰⁹ Section 4(3) deals with the circumstances in which things growing wild on land may be stolen. A person is not guilty of theft if they pick wild mushrooms, or "flowers, fruit or foliage from a plant growing wild on any land", unless the picking is done "for reward or sale or other commercial purpose". This exemption would not apply to cultivated flowers or crops, or if the whole plant were taken (except in the case of mushrooms), or if part of the plant was removed by an act which cannot be regarded as "picking" for example, taking cuttings with a knife, cutting grass with a lawnmower or strimmer, or sawing off branches.¹¹⁰ Section 4(4) deals with wild animals. All tame creatures may be stolen. Wild creatures cannot be stolen,¹¹¹ except where (i) the creature has been tamed or is ordinarily kept in captivity (so animals in a circus or the zoo could be stolen), or (ii) the creature either has been reduced into the possession of another person, or is in the course of being reduced into the possession of another person. If, for example, Lord G shoots a grouse on his country estate, and before his dog can retrieve the carcass, a dishonest beater bags the bird for himself, the beater will commit theft.

3. All personal property: i.e. all property that is not real property. Nothing in the Theft Act "suggests that what would otherwise constitute or be regarded as 'property' for the purposes of the Theft Act 1968 ceases to be so because its possession or control is, for whatever reason, unlawful or illegal or prohibited".¹¹² Personal property includes:

4. Things in action: a thing in action is non-physical property; one's rights in it can only be enforced by a legal action. The best example of such a "thing in action" is a debt. We saw above that a bank owns the money in an account but owes a debt to the account holder.¹¹³ This debt is a thing in action; it is property and can be stolen.¹¹⁴ For example, in *Williams*¹¹⁵ the defendant dishonestly overcharged elderly householders for building work; by cashing their cheques he was causing a diminution of their credit balances and so was appropriating their thing in action, namely part of the debt owed to them. Problems have arisen with regard to whether cheques can be stolen in the situation where the defendant induces a victim to draw a cheque in her favour. Following dicta in *Preddy*¹¹⁶ it has been held in *Graham*¹¹⁷ and *Clark*¹¹⁸ that cheques cannot be stolen in such cases. This is because the moment the cheque is written, the thing in action belongs to the defendant. It does not belong to the victim because he cannot sue himself. However, the better view is that the requisite property here is not the thing in action, but the cheque itself which is a valuable security ("any document ... authorising the payment of money"¹¹⁹); it is a piece of paper with special qualities like a key to a safe¹²⁰ and is, therefore, capable of being stolen. Other examples of things in action are a copyright, a trademark and shares in a company.¹²¹
5. Other intangible property: this is also non-physical property in which one can have a legal interest: for example, statute has declared that a patent is intangible property but not a thing in action.¹²² In Nai Keung,¹²³ it was held that export quotas were "other intangible property" and capable of being stolen.

Three areas are of particular interest and deserve consideration.

(i) Electricity

9-049

In Lowe v Blease,¹²⁴ it was held that electricity is not property for the purposes of theft. The Theft Act s.13 creates a special offence of abstracting electricity, carrying a maximum of five years' imprisonment. The s.13 offence has been used to prosecute those who dishonestly bypass the electricity meter to avoid paying for electricity.¹²⁵ Gas, however, is property that can be stolen.¹²⁶

(ii) Confidential information

9–050

In Oxford v Moss,¹²⁷ a university student acquired a proof of one of his examination papers. He read the questions but did not intend to deprive the university of the piece of paper on which the questions were printed. He was charged with theft of intangible property, namely, the confidential information contained in the examination questions. On appeal, it was held that this was not intangible property within the meaning of s.4. Following this, in Absolom,¹²⁸ it was held that a person who obtained valuable trade secrets relating to oil exploration, worth between £50,000 and £100,000, and tried to sell them to a rival oil company could not be guilty of theft as such information did not amount to property. While there are other offences of infringing rights in intellectual property,¹²⁹ counterfeiting registered trade marks,¹³⁰ and gaining unauthorised access to data held on a computer,¹³¹ it is nonetheless “absurd and disgraceful that we should still be making do without any legislation specifically designed to discourage this modern form of commercial piracy”.¹³² On the other hand, it has been argued that:

“misconduct such as exploiting confidential information can raise complex issues of fair competition, access to markets, free movement of employees, and freedom of speech. To the extent that such questions are significantly more complex in the realm of nonproprietary economic value, they may be better mediated by more fine-grained and specific legislation, and not simply overpainted by the broad brush of theft.”¹³³

The Law Commission has investigated this issue and provisionally concluded that confidential information is not “property” and that it “would be a mistake for the criminal law to pretend that it is”.¹³⁴ However, because “there is no distinction in principle between the harm caused by such misuse and the harm caused by theft”¹³⁵ the Commission has proposed a new offence covering the use or disclosure of another’s trade secret where the “owner does not consent to its use or disclosure”.¹³⁶

(iii) The human body and its parts

9–051

Can one steal a human body or any parts thereof? It is often stated that “nobody owns my body, not even me”.¹³⁷ However, in relation to the criminal law the answer may not be that simple and to answer the question, some distinctions need to be drawn.

First, for most practical purposes it seems unlikely that parts of the human body, while still a part of a live person, can be property for purposes of theft. In Bentham,¹³⁸ the House of Lords held that one does not possess one’s hand or any part of the body that is not separate and distinct from oneself:

“A person’s hand or fingers are not a thing. If they were regarded as property ... the court could, theoretically, make an order depriving the offender of his rights to them and they could be taken into the possession of the police.”

However, once a limb, organ or sample has been removed from the body and stored in, say, a sperm or blood bank, it possesses all the attributes of personal property and should fall within s.4(1). In Yearworth,¹³⁹ it was held that semen stored in a hospital’s fertility storage unit was property owned by the men who had provided the samples. Indeed, it has been held that blood¹⁴⁰ and urine¹⁴¹ are property capable of being stolen. In the US, it has been held that a university hospital owned a patient’s spleen and other body substances after they had been removed.¹⁴² Such organs and tissue can be extremely valuable and while, for policy reasons, it might be appropriate to ban the purchase or sale of, say, organs for transplantation,¹⁴³ that should not alter the basic proposition that such organs, once removed, can be property capable of being stolen.¹⁴⁴

Secondly, in relation to corpses there was a commonly accepted view that a corpse was not property and nobody could have a proprietary right or interest in it.¹⁴⁵ For the purposes of the criminal law this is clearly outmoded. Take, for instance, a cadaver “owned” by a University Medical Faculty. If the University does not “own” the cadaver under property law, it does have a bailment of the corpse,¹⁴⁶ or, at least, “possession or control” over it. However, although there might be a “proprietary right or interest” or “possession or control” over a corpse as required by s.5, that does not conclusively establish that the corpse is “property” under s.4. The traditional rule that a corpse, or part of a corpse, is not property was confirmed in Kelly,¹⁴⁷ but it was added that parts of a corpse can become property for the purpose of s.4 if they have “acquired different attributes by virtue of the application of skill, such as dissection or preservation techniques, for exhibition or teaching purposes”. In this case, the defendant was held liable for the theft of some 40 body parts (heads, a part of a brain and an assortment of arms, legs and feet) from the Royal College of Surgeons. These parts were used for the training of surgeons. Rose J did add that in future body parts might be held to be property:

“even without the acquisition of different attributes, if they have a use or significance beyond their mere existence ... if, for example, they are intended for use in an organ transplant operation, for the extraction of DNA, or ... as an exhibit in a trial.”

This was confirmed in Yearworth where it was stated that if an amputated finger was damaged, it should make no difference whether any work or skill had been applied to the finger to change its attributes.

4. Belonging to another

9-052

Theft is an interference with the proprietary rights of another. One of the central problems here has been identifying who has sufficient “rights” in property to be afforded protection by the criminal law. The owner clearly needs protection, but ownership is only one form of proprietary right and others, particularly those with possession of property, need similar protection. Accordingly, the Theft Act 1968 s.5 identifies the situations in which property is regarded as “belonging to another”. It must be stressed that in some of these situations the property does not really (under the civil law) belong to anyone else, but someone else has an interest thought to be worth protecting and, therefore, the property is artificially deemed to belong to that person. Section 5 lays down five situations where property “belongs to another”. There is substantial overlap between some of these situations but they are “essentially intended to be cumulative in effect”.¹⁴⁸ It is convenient to deal with each of them separately.

(i) Possession or control; proprietary right or interest

THEFT ACT 1968 s.5(1):

9-053

“Property shall be regarded as belonging to any person having possession or control of it, or having in it any proprietary right or interest (not being an equitable interest arising only from an agreement to transfer or grant an interest).”

(a) Possession or control

9-054

“Possession” is a complex legal concept which involves both physical control and an intention to possess. “Control,” on the other hand, signifies no more than its literal meaning, namely, physical control—and, therefore, covers many of the cases that could be described as possession, making it unnecessary to draw any distinction between the two concepts. Thus a customer in a shop examining a book has control of the book; a diner in a restaurant has control over the cutlery with which they are eating; a golf club has either possession or control (it does not matter which) over balls lost on its golf course¹⁴⁹; and a person has possession or control over any articles in their house or on their land even if they have forgotten or do not know they are there.¹⁵⁰ Property that has been intentionally abandoned does not belong to anyone and cannot be stolen, but where this issue has arisen in criminal cases, the courts have been reluctant to decide that property has been abandoned. So, for example, it has been decided that a householder who puts rubbish in the dustbin, or leaves bags of clothing outside his home for collection by a charity, does not abandon the property,¹⁵¹ and that property is not abandoned merely because it has been lost by the owner.¹⁵²

9-055

Theft by owner: The law of theft is designed to protect a variety of interests in property. The result is that theft can be committed by a person with an interest in the property against another with an interest (even a lesser interest) in the same property. In particular, this means that the real owner may be guilty of stealing their own property from another who has possession or control of that property. For instance, if a defendant pawns his watch as security for a loan and then surreptitiously takes the watch back, he would be appropriating property (the watch) belonging to another (the pawnbroker who, at a minimum, has possession or control over the watch).

R. v TURNER (NO.2) [1971] 1 W.L.R.
901 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-056

The defendant took his car to a garage to be repaired. The repairs were almost completed and the car parked outside in the road. The defendant, without telling the garage or offering to pay for the repairs, drove his car away. He was convicted of theft and appealed against his conviction.

LORD PARKER CJ:

“[T]he judge directed the jury that they were not concerned in any way with lien and the sole question was whether Mr Brown [the garage proprietor] had possession or control. This court is quite satisfied that there is no ground whatever for qualifying the words ‘possession or control’ in any way. It is sufficient if it is found that the person from whom the property is taken ... was at the time in fact in possession or control. At the trial there was a long argument whether that possession or control must be lawful, it being said that by reason of the fact that this car was subject to a hire-purchase agreement, Mr Brown could never even as against the appellant obtain lawful possession or control ... As I have said, this court is quite satisfied that the judge was quite correct in telling the jury that they need not bother about lien, and that they need not bother about hire-purchase agreements. The only question was: was Mr Brown in fact in possession or control?"

Appeal dismissed

9-057

Glanville Williams described this case as “one of the most extraordinary cases decided under the Theft Act” and stated that “it is hard to believe that the decision represents the law”.¹⁵³ The gist of his argument is that, if one ignores the lien, which the jury were instructed to do, the defendant had a right to repossess his car whenever he liked and one should not be held guilty of theft for doing what one has a right to do. In similar vein, it has been argued that, if a defendant takes back their television set from a thief who has stolen it (but who now has possession), there should be no liability because the thief has “no property right in the television maintainable against D. Vis-à-vis D, the television set belongs to no-one else”.¹⁵⁴

It is submitted that this criticism is misplaced. The Theft Act has chosen to protect a wide range of proprietary interests, including possession and control—irrespective of the rights or interests of the defendant. In Turner (No.2), there can be little doubt that the defendant appropriated property belonging to another (Mr Brown, by virtue of his possession or control). In most cases defendants with greater property rights than their victims, such as rights to repossession of their property, will not be acting dishonestly. Generally, the owner who takes back her own property would not be condemned by ordinary community standards as dishonest and would thus not be convicted of theft. The owner retrieving the stolen television set would argue that she believed that she had a legal right to take the property and so was not dishonest under the Theft Act 1968 s.2(1)(a). But the defendant in Turner (No.2) surreptitiously removed his car without paying for the repairs and without the garage proprietor knowing his name or address so as to be able to send him his bill. In such a case a conviction for theft, based on the ordinary meaning of the words “possession or control”, does seem more appropriate than an acquittal based on a technical analysis of the meaning of a “bailment at will”, which is what Mr Brown had at civil law if he did not have a lien. The short point is that whatever else he might have had at civil law, Mr Brown clearly had possession or control of the car and the defendant acted dishonestly and satisfied the remaining elements of the offence of theft. A conviction was inevitable.¹⁵⁵

(b) Proprietary right or interest

9-058

The most obvious instance of a proprietary right or interest is that of ownership. Ownership is a proprietary right and thus property belongs to an owner. With co-owners of property, each owner has a proprietary right and therefore one co-owner can steal from another.¹⁵⁶

Particular problems have arisen here with regard to the “passing of property”. This phrase is used to signify ownership passing from one person to another. When goods are bought and paid for in a shop “property passes” from the shop to the purchaser. The basic rule at civil law is that property passes when the parties intend it to pass. For example, in a supermarket parties are deemed normally to intend that property should pass only on payment for the goods.¹⁵⁷

In some cases, however, the transaction might be defective because one of the parties has made a mistake. Such a mistake might prevent property passing. The basic rule here is that if one of the parties has made a fundamental mistake,¹⁵⁸ the transaction is rendered void and property does not pass pursuant to a void transaction. On the other hand, a lesser or non-fundamental mistake can render a contract merely voidable and property does pass pursuant to a voidable transaction.¹⁵⁹

The requirement that at the time of the appropriation the property must “belong to another” used to mean that the imposition of criminal liability and punishment could depend entirely on whether property passed pursuant to a transaction. For example, in *Kaur v Chief Constable of Hampshire*¹⁶⁰ the defendant chose a pair of shoes from a rack of shoes marked £6.99 per pair. One shoe was marked at £6.99 and the other at £4.99. The cashier charged her £4.99. On appeal against a conviction for theft, it was held that the appropriation occurred when, having paid, she put the shoes in her bag. The issue was whether property had passed to her when she paid for the goods. If the cashier had made a fundamental mistake, the contract would have been void. As ownership would not then have passed she would have been appropriating property belonging to another. It was held, however, that the cashier had made a mere mistake as to quality, rendering the contract, at most, voidable. Accordingly, the ownership had passed to the defendant and she was not liable as she had not appropriated property belonging to another.

Such cases would be decided differently after Gomez and Hinks because the appropriation would be held to have taken place at the earlier stage when she took the shoes from the rack. At that point, they still belonged to the store. The same would be true of the infamous case of Gilks,¹⁶¹ where a punter at the races was mistakenly paid out £106 even though his horse came nowhere. It was held that the bookmaker, in paying out the money in the mistaken belief that a certain horse had won, was making a fundamental mistake. Accordingly, property did not pass and so when the punter decided to keep the money he was appropriating property that did still belong to another. Again, after Gomez and Hinks the appropriation would be held to occur as the money was handed over and, at that moment (or, at any rate, the split second before) the money would still have belonged to the bookmaker.¹⁶²

9-059

There are interests in property less than ownership that also qualify as “proprietary rights or interests”. These interests may be either legal or equitable. An example of a legal right can be seen in Turner (No.2) where the garage proprietor had a lien on the car (although, as seen, the case was not decided on that basis). An example of an equitable interest is that the beneficiary of a trust has an equitable interest in the trust property.

With regard to equitable interests it is important to note that there have been significant changes in the civil law relating to constructive trusts since the coming into force of the Theft Act 1968. For example, it is now possible that even though property has passed, the person who made a mistake in delivering the goods retains an equitable interest in them¹⁶³ and so the property “belongs” to them by virtue of s.5(1).¹⁶⁴ Whether these developments in the civil law of constructive trusts should be reflected by a corresponding broadening of the law of theft is considered below.

However, s.5(1) specifically excludes “equitable interests arising only from an agreement to transfer or grant an interest”. With some contracts, for example, contracts to buy land or shares, the person contracting to purchase acquires an equitable interest, while the other party retains legal ownership. If that legal owner then sells to a third party they do not commit theft as the original contracting party only has an “equitable interest arising from an agreement” which is not sufficient for the property to be regarded as belonging to them.

It is with regard to this ascertainment of whether a person has a “proprietary right or interest” that we see the sharpest tensions between the criminal law and the civil law because the criminal law, with its traditional emphasis on blame and harm, is having to define part of the harm component in terms of the civil law. We saw in the introduction to this chapter that there is a conflict between two views. On the one hand, there is the view that criminal liability should only be imposed on blameworthy actors who cause harm and that this determination should be divorced from technical analyses of the civil law. This view tends to maintain that words in the Theft Acts be given their “ordinary meanings” by ordinary people, the jury. This was the view adopted in Turner (No.2) where the judge refused to direct the jury in terms of liens. This approach has been supported by the House of Lords where dissatisfaction was expressed at allowing criminal liability to turn on fine points of civil law.

R. v MORRIS, ANDERTON v BURNSIDE
[1984] A.C. 320 (HOUSE OF LORDS):

LORD ROSKILL:

“I respectfully suggest that it is on any view wrong to introduce into this branch of the criminal law questions whether particular contracts are void or voidable on the ground of mistake or fraud or whether any mistake is sufficiently fundamental to vitiate a contract. These difficult questions should so far as possible be confined to those fields of law to which they are immediately relevant and I do not regard them as relevant questions under the Theft Act 1968.”

9-061

Reliance on civil law concepts, particularly whether there is a constructive trust or not, can present extremely complicated questions of civil law and generate uncertainty. For example, in Powell v MacRae,¹⁶⁵ the defendant, a turnstile operator at Wembley Stadium, accepted a bribe and allowed a member of the public to enter the ground without a ticket. On a charge of theft, the justices ruled that as the money had been received in the course of employment it belonged to the employer. On appeal, this view was rejected: there was no constructive trust and so the employer had no fiduciary interest in the property. In Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1985),¹⁶⁶ the defendant was the salaried manager of a “tied” public house. In breach of the terms of his agreement with the brewery, he bought beer from a wholesaler, intending to make a secret profit by selling the beer in his public house. The Court of Appeal, observing that the defendant’s conduct was “so far from the understanding of ordinary people as to what constitutes stealing, it should not amount to stealing”,¹⁶⁷ held that a person in a fiduciary position¹⁶⁸ who uses that position to make a secret profit for which he will be held accountable was not a trustee, and that even if he was, this was not a trust that fell within the terms of s.5(1). The longstanding authority which supported the approach taken in these cases was the case of Lister & Co v Stubbs,¹⁶⁹ in which Stubbs, a foreman employed by the plaintiffs, took substantial sums by way of bribes from a firm which supplied large quantities of goods to the plaintiff company. The Court of Appeal held that the monies paid to Stubbs by way of bribes did not belong to the plaintiffs and were not held by Stubbs as a trustee for the company: the relationship between the foreman and the plaintiffs was one of debtor and creditor, not one of trustee and beneficial owner.

However, in FHR European Ventures v Cedar Capital Partners LLC,¹⁷⁰ the Supreme Court in a unanimous decision overruled Lister v Stubbs and subsequent decisions relying on that case (including Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1985)), holding that a bribe or secret commission accepted by an agent is held on trust for the principal and that the principal has a proprietary claim to it. The position is therefore now clear: where an employee in a fiduciary position enriches himself by taking a bribe, the amount of the bribe is treated as the property of the employer and it is caught by s.5(1). Following this, an employer on facts similar to those in Powell v MacRae would have a proprietary interest in the bribe.¹⁷¹

9-062

It must be questionable whether criminal liability for theft should depend on changes in the law relating to constructive trusts, particularly as the purposes of the law of constructive trusts are very different to those of the criminal law.¹⁷² Further, holding such persons liable for theft raises the risk of false labelling. The essence of the defendant's wrongdoing in Powell v MacRae was that he took a bribe. A defendant in such circumstances should be found liable for that,¹⁷³ rather than for the subsequent theft of the proceeds.

While one can sympathise with the approach adopted in Atty-Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1985), the fact remains that theft is an offence involving interference with the property rights of another and such property rights can only exist at civil law (whether the law of property, contract or quasi-contract). It is not justifiable to convict a defendant of theft if nobody else has any interest in the property because, as seen, an owner is generally free to use, enjoy and abuse their own property as they see fit. Equally, while other charges might be more appropriate, it is not justifiable to acquit a defendant of theft on the ground that the property does not belong to another when, by civil law, it plainly does. If the existence of property rights is not to be ascertained by reference to the civil law, then how are they to be ascertained? As was stressed in Dobson v General Accident, Fire and Life Insurance Corp Plc,¹⁷⁴ the issue of whether goods belong to another “is a question to which the criminal law offers no answer and which can only be answered by reference to civil law principles”. The CPS has advised that:

“The criminal law is not a suitable vehicle to regulate such disputes [over ownership of property]. Before a criminal charge can proceed the ownership of any property must be absolutely clear. If that ownership is in real dispute the criminal law should not be invoked until ownership has been established in the civil courts.”¹⁷⁵

(ii) Trusts

THEFT ACT 1968 s.5(2):

9-063

“Where property is subject to a trust, the persons to whom it belongs shall be regarded as including any person having a right to enforce the trust, and an intention to defeat the trust shall be regarded accordingly as an intention to deprive of the property any person having that right.”

9-064

With most trusts the beneficiary already has a “proprietary right or interest”, making s.5(2) unnecessary.¹⁷⁶ However, with charitable trusts there are no specified beneficiaries having beneficial interests in the trust property. Such trusts are enforced by the Attorney-General¹⁷⁷ and under s.5(2) the trust property is deemed to belong to the Attorney-General.¹⁷⁸

(iii) obligation to deal with property in particular way

THEFT ACT 1968 s.5(3):

9-065

“Where a person receives property from or on account of another, and is under an obligation to the other to retain and deal with that property or its proceeds in a particular way, the property or proceeds shall be regarded (as against him) as belonging to the other.”

9-066

If a person receives property and ownership passes to him then he is generally free to do as he likes with the property. Sometimes, however, even if the recipient has become the “true owner” of the property,¹⁷⁹ he may be obliged to deal with it in a particular way. For instance, a person collecting for charity is obliged to hand over the money to the appropriate charity. When the donor places their coin in the tin can this is the clear understanding between donor and collector. Accordingly, s.5(3) deems that money still belongs to the donor and if the collector makes off with the money he is appropriating money “belonging to” the donor.

In many cases, where s.5(3) could apply, the person to whom the obligation is owed will have a legal or equitable interest in the property and so the property will still belong to that person under s.5(1). Under s.5(3), however, it is not necessary for courts to engage with the intricacies of establishing that a trust has been created and that the person supplying the property retains an equitable interest in it.¹⁸⁰ As said in Klineberg,¹⁸¹ s.5(3):

“is essentially a deeming provision by which property or its proceeds ‘shall be regarded’ as belonging to another, even though, on a strict civil law analysis, it does not.”

Nevertheless, for s.5(3) to apply, there are several conditions that need to be satisfied:

(a) The property must have been received from or on account of another to whom the obligation is owed

9-067

Two alternative situations are covered here. First, as with the charity-collector above, the property is received from the person to whom the obligation is owed. Secondly, it can be received from one person on account of another; in this situation, the obligation must be owed to that other person. On this basis, the charity-collector could also be said to have received the property on account of the charity. The operation of these two principles can be seen in *Floyd v DPP*¹⁸² where the defendant collected money weekly from work colleagues who had ordered goods from Home Farm Hampers Ltd, but failed to pay the money to the company. On these facts, it would be possible to invoke either of the above bases. First, she received money from her colleagues; being under an obligation to pay the money to the company, the money would be regarded as belonging to her colleagues. Secondly, and this was the basis of the actual decision, she received money on account of the company and therefore owed them an obligation to hand over the money,¹⁸³ so the property was regarded as belonging to the company.

(b) There has to be an obligation to deal with that property or its proceeds in a particular way

9-068

Under s.5(3) there has to be a legal obligation to deal with the property handed over or its proceeds in a particular way. If I give my decorator £100 in order to buy paint, an obligation to use that money or its proceeds is imposed. If I give him £100 as a down-payment, no such obligation is imposed. This simple distinction (in theory) has caused problems in practice, particularly in cases where deposits have been paid.

R. v HALL [1973] Q.B. 126 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-069

The defendant was a travel agent who accepted deposits for air trips to the US. The flights never materialised and the money was not refunded. The appellant paid all the monies into the firm's general trading account. He was convicted of theft and appealed on the ground that the monies paid to him became his and therefore did not "belong to another".

EDMUND-DAVIES LJ:

"Counsel for the appellant ... concedes that [by receiving the monies] the travel agent undertakes a contractual obligation in relation to arranging flights ... But what counsel for the appellant resists is that in such circumstances the travel agent 'is under an obligation' to the client 'to retain and deal with ... in a particular way' sums paid to him in such circumstances.

What cannot of itself be decisive of the matter is the fact that the appellant paid the money into the firm's general trading account ...

Nevertheless, when a client goes to a firm carrying on the business of travel agents and pays them money, he expects that in return he will, in due course, receive the tickets and other documents necessary for him to accomplish the trip for which he is paying, and the firm are 'under an obligation' to perform their part to fulfil his expectation and are liable to pay him damages if they do not. But, in our judgment, what was not here established was that these clients expected them 'to retain and deal with that property or its proceeds in a particular way', and that an 'obligation' to do so was undertaken by the appellant. We must make clear, however, that each case turns on its own facts. Cases could, we suppose, conceivably arise where by some special arrangement (preferably evidenced by documents), the client could impose on the travel agent an 'obligation' falling within section 5(3). But no such special arrangement was made in any of the seven cases here being considered. It follows from this that, despite what on any view must be condemned as scandalous conduct by the appellant, in our judgment on this ground alone this appeal must be allowed and the convictions quashed."

Appeal allowed

9-070

In the absence of any legal obligation to deal with the deposits in a particular way, Hall was not guilty of theft, even though he had been found to have acted dishonestly in dealing with the deposit money. By contrast, in Klinesberg and Marsden, the defendants were found to be under an obligation to pay monies paid by timeshare purchasers into a trust company.

R. v KLINEBERG AND MARSDEN [1999] 1 CR. APP. R. 427 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

The appellants sold timeshare apartments in Lanzarote. The purchasers paid money, to be held by a trust company until the apartments were ready to be occupied. Almost none of the money was in fact transmitted to the trust company. The appellants were convicted of theft and appealed.

KAY J:

“The intending purchasers in each case, and prior to the handing over of any money, were made aware by documents and in at least some cases by oral representations that, if they were to enter into an agreement, they would have the security of knowing that any money they handed over would be held in independent trusteeship until the apartment in question was ready for occupation ... One of the pivotal features of the whole scheme was that their money would be safeguarded by trusteeship pending completion. In such circumstances there must have been, at the very least, an implied obligation in favour of each intending purchaser to transfer his money into the appropriate trusteeship without undue delay.”

Appeal allowed in part on other grounds

Similarly, in Re Kumar,¹⁸⁴ a travel agent was held to be under an obligation to use money paid to secure flight tickets because there was an agreed trustee relationship for such money to be transferred into specific bank accounts. In McHugh,¹⁸⁵ it was stressed that both the defendant and the client must “clearly understand” that the client’s money is to be kept separate from the defendant’s business money. In other cases, whether one is under an obligation to keep a separate fund in existence depends entirely on the facts of each case.

DAVIDGE V BUNNETT [1984] CRIM. L.R.
297 (QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISIONAL COURT):

The defendant shared a flat with three other women. When the gas bill arrived the others all gave the defendant their shares in cheques made payable to the defendant's employer. They expected her to pay the bill, either by cashing the cheques with her employer and adding her own share, or, alternatively, that her employer, on receipt of all the monies, would write out a cheque for the Gas Board. Instead, the defendant spent most of the money on her Christmas shopping; the gas bill went unpaid. She was convicted of theft and appealed.

HELD:

“D was under an obligation to use the cheques or their proceeds in whatever way she saw fit so long as they were applied pro tanto to the discharge of the gas bill. This could have been achieved by one cheque from her employer, or a banker's draft, or her own cheque ... Hence the magistrates' finding that she was not obliged to use the actual banknotes. Using the proceeds of the cheque on presents amounted to a very negation of her obligation to discharge the bill. She was under an obligation to deal with the proceeds in a particular way. As against D, the proceeds of the cheques were properly belonging to another within section 5(3) of the Act.”

Appeal dismissed

9-074

This may be compared with the outcome in the case of Huskinson,¹⁸⁶ where the defendant fell into arrears with his rent. He applied for housing benefit and was sent a cheque for £479 to pay off some of the arrears which then amounted to £800. He gave his landlord £200 and spent the remainder on himself. He was acquitted of theft and on appeal the Divisional Court held that, as the relevant regulations did not require him to apply the cheque or proceeds directly in satisfaction of the rent, he was not under a legal obligation to the Housing Services Department to deal with the cheque in a particular way.

Section 5(3) has been applied in cases involving charity sponsorship money. In Lewis v Lethbridge,¹⁸⁷ the defendant collected sponsorship money for a colleague who had entered the London Marathon. He never handed this money over to the charity. The Divisional Court held that the defendant was not under an obligation to keep a separate fund in existence equivalent to the amount of money he had received. The money thus did not “belong to another” under s.5(3). The defendant was “a civil debtor and a naughty one without question, but not a thief”.¹⁸⁸ However, this decision was disapproved in the case of Wain.¹⁸⁹

R. v WAIN [1995] 2 CR. APP. R. 660
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-075

The appellant raised money for a “Telethon” held for charity by Yorkshire Television. He paid the money raised first into a separate bank account and then, with Yorkshire Television’s permission, into his own bank account and then spent it. He was convicted of theft and appealed.

MCCOWAN LJ:

“[Referring to Lewis v Lethbridge] the learned judge was forgetting that section 5(3) of the Theft Act 1968 referred not merely to dealing with that property but also its proceeds ...

Professor Smith ... in his Law of Theft (6th ed.) at p. 39 [states]

‘In Lewis v Lethbridge ... no consideration was given to the question whether any obligation was imposed by the sponsors. Sponsors surely do not give the collector (whether he has a box or not) the money to do as he likes with. Is there not an overwhelming inference ... that the sponsors intend to give the money to the charity, imposing an obligation in the nature of a trust on the collector?’

It seems to us that the approach of the court in the Lethbridge case was a very narrow one based, apparently, on the finding by the justices that there was no requirement of the charity that the appellant hand over the same notes and coins. Neither was there in the present case. But what the Divisional Court does not appear to have considered in that case was the trust aspect ... In our judgment, the criticisms of that case by Professor Smith are fully justified ...

[His Lordship approved Davidge v Bunnnett.]

[I]t seems to us that by virtue of section 5(3), the appellant was plainly under an obligation to retain, if not the actual notes and coins, at least their proceeds, that is to say the money credited in the bank account which he opened for the trust with the actual property. When he took the money credited to that account and moved it over to his own bank account, it was still the proceeds of the notes and coins donated which he proceeded to use for his own purposes, thereby appropriating them.”

Appeal dismissed

(c) The defendant must have direct knowledge of the obligation

9-076

In Wills,¹⁹⁰ the appellant and two assistants operated a business as financial consultants advising clients on investments and loans. The assistants each received money from different clients with instructions to invest the money with an insurance company. Those monies were used for the general purposes of the business and not invested in accordance with the clients' instructions. The appellant was not present when either transaction took place, and there was no evidence that he personally knew of the obligation. The appellant was convicted of theft (as were the assistants). On appeal, it was held that, for s.5(3) to apply, the prosecution must prove that the defendant has knowledge of the nature and extent of the obligation to deal with the property in a particular way. It is not enough merely to show that the property was not dealt with in a manner that conformed with the obligation.

In Wain, it was stated that whether the defendant “is a trustee is to be judged on an objective basis. It is an obligation on him by law. It is not essential that he should have realised that he was a trustee, but of course the question remains as to whether he was acting honestly or dishonestly”.¹⁹¹ Thus the defendant must have knowledge of the facts giving rise to the obligation but need not know that they are under a civil legal obligation.¹⁹² However, if a defendant genuinely believes that they are legally justified in doing what they do with the money, it will be difficult to establish the requisite dishonesty.

(d) The obligation must be a legal one

9-077

It is not enough that the defendant is under a social or moral obligation to deal with the property in a particular way. They must be under a legal obligation. This means that the party imposing the obligation must be able to commence legal proceedings against the defendant at civil law for a failure to perform their obligation. One must be careful here to distinguish a legal obligation to do something (for example, pay one's rent as in Huskinson) from a legal obligation to use particular property or its proceeds in the performance of that obligation (for example, using the housing benefit to pay one's rent). It is only when there is a legal obligation of the latter kind that property is deemed to belong to another for the purposes of the law of theft.

Whether the obligation for the purposes of s.5(3) had to be a "legal" one or not used to be controversial. One school of thought was that "obligation" was an ordinary word—like many of the other "ordinary words" used in the Theft Act. Whether or not an obligation existed was simply a matter of fact to be left to the jury. As the jury know no law, this means that they can only decide on the basis of whether they think the defendant ought to be under an obligation, i.e. whether a moral obligation exists.¹⁹³

However, it was the opposing school of thought that won the day here in the continuing see-saw battle between "ordinary meaning" and "civil law meaning". In Mainwaring,¹⁹⁴ it was held that there must be a legal obligation at civil law for the purposes of s.5(3). This was confirmed in Dubar, where it was stated that it is:

“the trial judge’s function to direct the jury as to matters of law, including the existence of an obligation within s.5(3) if, but only if, he fully and fairly leaves it to the jury to decide the facts which give rise to such an obligation.”¹⁹⁵

While this means, yet again, that criminal liability can depend on highly complex points of civil law,¹⁹⁶ nevertheless such an approach can be supported on the basis that:

“Parliament is not in the habit of legislating about moral obligations as such; and that Parliament should do so without making its meaning plain is inconceivable.”¹⁹⁷

1. Section 5(3) and fair labelling

9-078

A large proportion of reported cases involving s.5(3) involve dishonest business operations by travel agents, estate agents, investment companies and so on. Assuming criminalisation is justified in such cases (as opposed to using civil remedies or administrative disabilities such as disqualification of directors), the question becomes: is s.5(3) so defined as to criminalise behaviour that ought to be subject to criminal sanctions and, if so, is theft the correct label to describe such wrongdoing?

In Hall, the defendant was dishonest (the jury at first instance convicted him) and Edmund-Davies LJ described his conduct as scandalous. Yet he escaped liability. Is it justifiable to draw a moral line between his conduct and that of the applicant in Re Kumar purely because there was an agreed trustee relationship in the latter case? Part of the problem is that s.5(3) is embracing conduct too far removed from the paradigm of theft. This explains the comments in Lewis v Lethbridge that the defendant was a “civil debtor and a naughty one without question, but not a thief”. In Klineberg and Marsden, the essence of the prosecution case was that the appellants “were involved in a timeshare fraud”. Indeed, in many of the above cases the real wrongdoing constituted fraud and not theft. As shall be seen, the Fraud Act 2006 has introduced a new offence of fraud and many of the above defendants would fall within the provisions of this offence. It is thus doubtful whether s.5(3) any longer performs a useful role.

2. Criminalising breach of contract

9-079

In many of the above cases, the defendant was in breach of contract. In some of these cases (for example, Re Kumar) there was liability; in others (for example, Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1985),¹⁹⁸ there was no liability. Whether a dishonest breach of contract should be criminalised has also arisen in cases not turning on s.5(3). For example, in *Clowes (No.2)*¹⁹⁹ a central point on appeal was whether signed agreements were contracts or trust documents. Criminal liability could only be imposed in the latter situation as only then would the property “belong to another”.

Quite apart from the above point concerning the appropriateness of “theft” as the offence label, this raises the broader question whether all dishonest breaches of contract should be criminalised. A breach of contract can have as disastrous an impact upon the innocent party as stealing from them. If accompanied by dishonesty, why should it not be criminalised?

It could be asserted that there is the entire structure of the civil law to provide remedies for breach of contract. Criminalisation is unnecessary. This argument, however, collapses when one recalls that there are similar civil remedies provided for those who “lose” their property wrongfully. The existence of civil remedies is no argument for the decriminalisation of theft. So, the question remains: why is theft a crime but dishonest breach of contract not a crime?

Apart from historical explanations relating to the evolution of the law of larceny and its metamorphosis into theft, an explanation of principle is not easy. It is perhaps best to focus on the paradigmatic instances of theft and breach of contract. A typical theft involves a surreptitious or forceful taking. The victim is helpless against such a taking. If the thief is interrupted there is a risk of violence. Owing to their anonymity there is extra difficulty in identifying and apprehending the thief. With the typical breach of contract, however, one is dealing with two parties, both “free” and “equal” who have both chosen to enter into a contractual nexus. The risk of one party breaching their contract is always there and, in a free market economy, a factor to be assessed at the time of entering into the contract—taking account of the civil remedies available. Bearing in mind the basic proposition that conduct should not be made criminal merely because it is immoral, but that, additionally, criminalisation should be “necessary” and “profitable”²⁰⁰ one should only expand the reaches of the criminal law with the utmost caution. Certain instances of dishonest breach of contract have already been made criminal, particularly where the contract is breached by a false representation, or the defendant is attempting unilaterally to avoid their liability in circumstances where it would be difficult to trace them.²⁰¹ Beyond such cases the criminal law should not go. Section 5(3) does extend the tentacles of the law of theft beyond the paradigmatic instances. Great caution must be exercised to keep some rein over the subsection so that it does not stray too far from ordinary understandings of criminality. In this regard, the CPS has advised that: “Prosecutors should guard against the criminal law being used as a debt collection agency or to protect the commercial interests of companies and organisations”.²⁰²

(iv) Obligation to make restoration

THEFT ACT 1968 s.5(4)

9-080

“Where a person gets property by another’s mistake, and is under an obligation to make restoration (in whole or in part) of the property or its proceeds or of the value thereof, then to the extent of that obligation the property or proceeds shall be regarded (as against him) as belonging to the person entitled to restoration, and an intention not to make restoration shall be regarded accordingly as an intention to deprive that person of the property or proceeds.”

9-081

This subsection was specifically enacted to combat the mischief revealed in the case of *Moynes v Cooper*²⁰³ where an employee was given a pay packet which, owing to a mistake, contained too much money. When he opened the packet and saw the excess he dishonestly kept the whole. He was acquitted of larceny. If these facts were to reoccur, the case could be brought within s.5(4) and, therefore, even though property in the excess money might have passed to the employee when his wages were handed over, he could be liable: on discovering and keeping the excess money there is an appropriation of property (the money) which is deemed to belong to the employer by virtue of s.5(4) because he has got the money by mistake and is under an obligation to make restoration of the excess—or its proceeds or value.

Section 5(4) is in fact of limited use. Where a person receives property by another's mistake, the mistake may be fundamental, in which case property does not pass at all and the property will still belong to the other by virtue of s.5(1) (proprietary right or interest). Section 5(4) is not needed in such cases. On the other hand, where the mistake is not sufficiently fundamental as to prevent property passing, the receiver of the property will not necessarily be under an obligation to make restoration of the property. Whether there is an obligation to make restoration is a complex matter governed by the law of restitution.

Accordingly, the following points can be made about s.5(4):

1. The obligation must be a legal one—i.e. under the civil law of restitution.²⁰⁴
2. The obligation must be to return the property or its proceeds or the value thereof. (Under s.5(3) only the property or its proceeds is specified.)
3. The subsection says “is” under an obligation. The use of the present tense is significant here. If in a supermarket a cashier makes a mistake as a result of which the contract is voidable, property does pass, but the recipient of the property is not there and then under an obligation to make restitution. The obligation to make restitution only comes into existence when the person who made the mistake “avoids” the contract. At that point the recipient will become under an obligation to make restitution and only then does the present tense “is” become applicable. However, as Heaton²⁰⁵ points out, upon rescission ownership in the property will revert to the person who made the mistake and any subsequent “keeping or dealing with it as owner” will be an appropriation of property that belongs to another by virtue of s.5(1).

It ought to be pointed out, however, that courts have not been rigorous in their application of these civil law principles and, while insisting with one breath that the obligation be a legal one, they have at the same time tended to adopt a more cavalier approach.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S REFERENCE
(NO.1 OF 1983) [1985] Q.B. 182
(COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-082

The defendant, a police officer was overpaid her wages. The money was paid by direct debit straight into her bank account. When she realised the mistake she decided to keep the excess. The judge directed an acquittal and the Attorney-General referred a question on a point of law for the court's opinion under the Criminal Justice Act 1972 s.36.

LORD LANE CJ:

“In order to determine the effect of that subsection upon this case one has to take it piece by piece to see what the result is read against the circumstances of this particular prosecution. First of all: ‘Did the respondent get property?’ The word ‘get’ is about as wide a word as could possibly have been adopted by the draftsman of the Act. The answer is ‘Yes’, the respondent in this case did get her chose in action, that is, her right to sue the bank for the debt which they owed her—money which they held in their hands to which she was entitled by virtue of the contract between bank and customer.

Secondly: ‘Did she get it by another's mistake?’ The answer to that is plainly ‘Yes’. The Receiver of the Metropolitan Police made the mistake of thinking she was entitled to £74.74 when she was not entitled to that at all.

‘Was she under an obligation to make restoration of either the property or its proceeds or its value?’ We take each of those in turn. ‘Was she under an obligation to make restoration of the property?’—the chose in action. The answer to that is ‘No’. It was something which could not be restored in the ordinary meaning of the word. ‘Was she under an obligation to make restoration of its proceeds?’ The answer to that is ‘No’. There were no proceeds of the chose in action to restore. ‘Was she under an obligation to make restoration of the value thereof?’—the value of the chose in action. The answer to that seems to us to be ‘Yes’.

I should say here, in parenthesis, that a question was raised during the argument this morning as to whether ‘restoration’ is the same as ‘making restitution’. We think that on the wording of section 5(4) as a whole, the answer to that question is ‘Yes’. One therefore turns to see whether, under the general principles of restitution, this respondent was obliged to restore or pay for the benefit which she received. Generally speaking, the respondent, in these circumstances, is obliged to pay for a benefit received when the benefit has been given under a mistake on the part of the giver as to a material fact. The mistake must be as to a fundamental or essential fact and the payment must have been due to that fundamental or essential fact. The mistake here was that this police officer had been working on a day when she had been at home and not working at all ...

As a result of the provisions of section 5(4) the debt of £74.74 due from the respondent’s bank to the respondent notionally belonged to the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police; therefore the prosecution, up to this point, have succeeded in proving—remarkable though it may seem—that the ‘property’ in this case belonged to another within the meaning of section 1 in the Theft Act 1968 from the moment when the respondent became aware that this mistake had been made and that her account had been credited with the £74.74 and she consequently became obliged to restore the value ...

Before parting with the case we would like to say that it should often be possible to resolve this type of situation without resorting to the criminal law. We do, however, accept that there may be occasions—of which this may have been one—where a prosecution is necessary.”

Opinion accordingly

The defendant here owed a debt and dishonestly tried to avoid paying that debt. This is yet another instance of the grey area of criminality discussed above: when, if ever, should not paying one’s debts or breaching one’s contract be a crime? In one sense the defendant in this case was even more blameless than most debtors because she did not choose to incur the debt. It was thrust upon her by the mistake of another. And again, there were civil remedies available. The money could have been recovered. The court rightly stressed that such cases could usually be dealt with without resort to the criminal law. In Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1983) the amount of the overpayment was some £74. In Shadrokh-Cigari,²⁰⁶ a bank account was credited $286,000 instead of $286. English law does not formally take account of the value of property in assessing criminality, or level thereof. Yet this is surely an instance where the sums involved are so huge that perhaps criminal liability is appropriate. Or is it that the value of the property affects our assessment as to dishonesty? We can conceive of perhaps “turning a blind eye” to an extra £74 credited to our bank account, but when the excess amount is some $286,000, an assessment of dishonesty becomes inevitable.

It was noted earlier that there have been considerable changes in the civil law since the coming into force of the Theft Act 1968. Some of these changes have rendered s.5(4) largely superfluous. In Chase Manhattan Bank v Israel British Bank,²⁰⁷ it was held that a person who pays money to another under a mistake of fact retains an equitable interest in the money. Accordingly, in such cases the money “belongs” to that person by virtue of s.5(1) and s.5(4) is unnecessary. This point was recognised in Shadrokh-Cigari, discussed above, although s.5(4) was used as an alternative basis to establish liability.

5. Dishonesty

9-084

The mens rea of theft is twofold: dishonesty and intention of permanent deprivation. Mens rea is normally taken to refer to a state of mind in relation to consequences or circumstances of a defendant's actions—for example, did they intend, foresee or know of something happening? But, apart from the requirement of intending permanent deprivation, this traditional concept of mens rea fits ill with property offences where, in essence, a judgment is being made about behaviour and the general state of mind of the defendant in relation to their actions. As was said in one of the leading cases, Feely,²⁰⁸ the taking of property must be one to which “moral obloquy can reasonably” be attached.

The interference with property rights must be such that we can blame the defendant for disregarding the value system inherent in the law of theft. The requirement of “dishonesty” is introduced as a mechanism by which moral judgments can be made and blame attributed.

S. P. GREEN, “13 WAYS TO STEAL A BICYCLE: THEFT LAW IN THE INFORMATION AGE” (2012), PP.112–113:

9–085

“Dishonesty connotes some additional moral content. It suggests that the offender lacked integrity or probity. It conveys a moral sense that is independent of the law. To say that a defendant acted honestly or dishonestly is to say something more generally about his character as a person, beyond merely his specific acts ...

In short, the term dishonesty seems a useful one for distinguishing between those appropriations that should count as stealing and those that should not, particularly when the term is compared to the alternatives. Unlike unlawfully, the term dishonesty is not based exclusively on law; and unlike fraudulently, it does not connote any overly narrow sense of deceit or duplicity. Dishonesty connotes a lack of honesty, probity, or integrity; a thievishness. It exists as a free-standing concept of morality. As such, it offers an appropriate label for the wrongful element in stealing.”

9–086

Dishonesty is only partially defined by the Theft Act 1968. Where defined, the meaning of dishonesty is a question of law. Where undefined, it is a question of fact.

(i) Question of Law

THEFT ACT 1968 s.2:

“(1) A person’s appropriation of property belonging to another is not to be regarded as dishonest—

- (a) if he appropriates the property in the belief that he has in law the right to deprive the other of it, on behalf of himself or of a third person; or
- (b) if he appropriates the property in the belief that he would have the other’s consent if the other knew of the appropriation and the circumstances of it; or
- (c) (except where the property came to him as trustee or personal representative) if he appropriates the property in the belief that the person to whom the property belongs cannot be discovered by taking reasonable steps.

(2) A person’s appropriation of property belonging to another may be dishonest notwithstanding that he is willing to pay for the property.”

THEFT ACT 1968 S.1(2):

“It is immaterial whether the appropriation is made with a view to gain, or is made for the thief’s own benefit.”

(a) Belief in legal right

Section 2(1)(a) provides that a person who genuinely believes that they have a legal right to the property is not to be regarded as dishonest—irrespective of the reasonableness or otherwise of the belief.²⁰⁹ There is a well-known maxim that “ignorance of the law is no defence”. This, however, relates to ignorance of the criminal law, for instance, to a defendant who claims that they did not know theft was a crime. Section 2(1)(a) only applies to persons who have made a mistake as to the civil law—believing they have legal rights to property when, perhaps, they have no such rights.

(b) Belief in consent

It will be recalled that, under Gomez, a defendant can appropriate property even though the other has consented to such appropriation. However, if the defendant genuinely believes that she has the other's real consent to deal with the property she cannot be condemned as dishonest. Again, the reasonableness of her belief is irrelevant except in evidential terms.

(c) Belief that property is lost

Lost property continues to belong to the owner and so the finder of lost property is appropriating property belonging to another. However, if she genuinely (again, a subjective test) believe that the owner “cannot be discovered by taking reasonable steps”, she is not to be condemned for deciding to keep the property. Obviously, factors such as the type and value of the property and the location where it was found will be important evidence in assessing the defendant's belief. For example, in 2017 it was reported that a woman had been convicted of stealing a £20 note which she had found on the floor of a convenience store, put in her purse, and kept. Her actions were recorded on CCTV and she presumably pleaded guilty because that showed that she had taken no steps to find the owner.²¹⁰

It should be noted that s.2(1)(c) relates to lost property which does still belong to someone else. It does not concern property which the defendant believes is abandoned. Of course, if property actually is abandoned, it does not belong to another and so the actus reus of theft will not be made out. However, what is the position if property is not abandoned but the defendant believes that it has been abandoned? As a matter of strict interpretation, because this situation is not covered by the exclusions in s.2, whether there is dishonesty should be determined as a matter of fact under the rules about to be examined.²¹¹ However, in Wood,²¹² it was held as a matter of law that if the defendant genuinely believed that the property was abandoned there would be no dishonesty.

(d) Willingness to pay

Section 2(2) makes it clear that a willingness to pay will not necessarily exempt one from a finding of dishonesty. The owner might not wish to sell at whatever price, and it would be unthinkable to allow the unscrupulous to help themselves to other people's property and escape liability simply by being able to pay. In Wheatley,²¹³ it was held that the fact that no loss was suffered was not determinative of dishonesty.

(e) Not for the thief's benefit

Despite dishonesty being a moral concept, s.1(2) makes it clear that, even though the theft is for the good of others, with the thief gaining nothing, they can still be found dishonest.²¹⁴

(ii) Question of Fact

Apart from the above specific instances, the concept of dishonesty was left undefined in the Theft Act 1968 although judges soon began to give the concept a legal meaning.²¹⁵ However, in 1973 the Court of Appeal embarked on a new course.

R. v FEELY [1973] 1 Q.B. 530 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

The defendant was employed by a firm of bookmakers as manager of one of their branches. The employer sent round a circular to all managers stating that the practice of borrowing from tills was to stop. The defendant, knowing this, "borrowed" £30. When the deficiency was discovered (but not yet attributed to him) he immediately offered an IOU. He was owed more than twice that sum by his employers. The trial judge directed the jury that this was dishonest, and he was convicted of theft and appealed on the ground that this question should have been left to the jury.

LAWTON LJ:

“The design of the new Act is clear ... Words in everyday use have replaced legal jargon in many parts of the Act ...

In section 1(1) of the Theft Act 1968 the word ‘dishonesty’ can only relate to the state of mind of the person who does the act which amounts to appropriation. Whether an accused person has a particular state of mind is a question of fact which has to be decided by the jury ... We do not agree that judges should define what ‘dishonesty’ means.

This word is in common use ... Jurors, when deciding whether an appropriation was dishonest can be reasonably expected to, and should, apply the current standards of ordinary decent people. In their own lives they have to decide what is and what is not dishonest. We can see no reason why, when in a jury box, they should require the help of a judge to tell them what amounts to dishonesty.”

Appeal allowed

9-095

It is for the jury (or magistrates) to determine whether the defendant has acted dishonestly by the standards of ordinary and decent people. To do this they must, of course, try to establish what was in the defendant’s mind. For example, in *Price*²¹⁶ the defendant issued cheques, which were later dishonoured, claiming that he was the beneficiary of a £100,000 trust fund. The jury first has to decide whether they believe the defendant’s story, that is, whether they genuinely believed that he was such a beneficiary. Having established the defendant’s state of mind, they must decide, applying their own moral standards,²¹⁷ whether it is dishonest.²¹⁸ In Price, the jury disbelieved the defendant’s story and decided he was dishonest. Thus, using the facts of Feely, the jury might find that the defendant did believe he could, and did intend to, repay the money. The jury, now armed with this knowledge, must make a moral assessment as to whether such conduct, in the circumstances, was dishonest.

However, what of the defendant whose actions might be regarded as dishonest by the jury applying their standards but who insists (and is believed) that, according to his system of values, he was acting honestly? For example, in Gilks,²¹⁹ the defendant claimed that he thought he was honest in keeping money mistakenly paid to him by a bookmaker because he thought bookmakers were “a race apart” and thus fair game.

R. V GHOSH [1982] Q.B. 1053 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-096

The defendant was a consultant who acted as a locum at a hospital. He falsely claimed fees in respect of an operation that he had not carried out. He claimed that he thought he was not dishonest by his standards because the same amount of money was legitimately payable to him for consultation fees. The judge directed the jury that they must simply apply their own standards. He was convicted of an offence contrary to the now-repealed the Theft Act 1968 s.15 (which used the same concept “dishonesty”) and appealed against his conviction.

LORD LANE CJ:

“The sentence [in Feely] requiring the jury to apply current standards leads up to the prohibition on judges from applying their standards. That is the context in which the sentence appears. It seems to be reading too much into that sentence to treat it as authority for the view that ‘dishonesty can be established independently of the knowledge or belief of the defendant’. If it could, then any reference to the state of mind of the defendant would be beside the point.

This brings us to the heart of the problem. Is ‘dishonestly’ in section 1 of the Theft Act 1968 intended to characterise a course of conduct? Or is it intended to describe a state of mind? If the former, then we can well understand that it could be established independently of the knowledge or belief of the accused. But if, as we think, it is the latter, then the knowledge and belief of the accused are at the root of the problem.

Take for example a man who comes from a country where public transport is free. On his first day here he travels on a bus. He gets off without paying. He never had any intention of paying. His mind is clearly honest; but his conduct, judged objectively by what he has done, is dishonest. It seems to us that in using the word ‘dishonestly’ in the Theft Act 1968, Parliament cannot have intended to catch dishonest conduct in that sense, that is to say conduct to which no moral obloquy could possibly attach. This is sufficiently established by the partial definition in section 2 of the Theft Act itself. All the matters covered by section 2(1) relate to the belief of the accused. Section 2(2) relates to his willingness to pay. A man's belief and his willingness to pay are things which can only be established subjectively. It is difficult to see how a partially subjective definition can be made to work in harness with the test which in all other respects is wholly objective.

If we are right that dishonesty is something in the mind of the accused (what Professor Glanville Williams calls 'a special mental state'), then if the mind of the accused is honest, it cannot be deemed dishonest merely because members of the jury would have regarded it as dishonest to embark on that course of conduct.

So we would reject the simple uncomplicated approach that the test is purely objective, however attractive from the practical point of view that solution may be.

There remains the objection that to adopt a subjective test is to abandon all standards but that of the accused himself, and to bring about a state of affairs in which 'Robin Hood would be no robber': R. v Greenstein [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1353. This objection misunderstands the nature of the subjective test. It is no defence for a man to say 'I knew that what I was doing is generally regarded as dishonest; but I do not regard it as dishonest myself. Therefore I am not guilty.' What he is however entitled to say is 'I did not know that anybody would regard what I was doing as dishonest.' He may not be believed; just as he may not be believed if he sets up 'a claim of right' under section 2(1) of the Theft Act 1968, or asserts that he believed in the truth of a misrepresentation under section 15 of the Act of 1968. But if he is believed, or raises a real doubt about the matter, the jury cannot be sure that he was dishonest.

In determining whether the prosecution has proved that the defendant was acting dishonestly, a jury must first of all decide whether according to the ordinary standards of reasonable and honest people what was done was dishonest. If it was not dishonest by those standards, that is the end of the matter and the prosecution fails.

If it was dishonest by those standards, then the jury must consider whether the defendant himself must have realised that what he was doing was by those standards dishonest. In most cases, where the actions are obviously dishonest by ordinary standards, there will be no doubt about it. It will be obvious that the defendant himself knew that he was acting dishonestly. It is dishonest for a defendant to act in a way which he knows ordinary people consider to be dishonest, even if he asserts or genuinely believes that he is morally justified in acting as he did. For example, Robin Hood or those ardent anti-vivisectionists who remove animals from vivisection laboratories are acting dishonestly, even though they may consider themselves to be morally justified in doing what they do, because they know that ordinary people would consider these actions to be dishonest.”

Appeal dismissed

9-097

The enquiry is thus two-fold:

1. The jury, applying their own standards, must judge the defendant's actions and beliefs and decide whether he was honest or dishonest.
2. If the jury find that according to their standards he was dishonest, they must then establish whether the defendant knew that ordinary people would regard such conduct as dishonest.²²⁰

In a number of cases involving fraudulent commercial transactions, the defence have sought to argue that a different standard for dishonesty should apply in such cases, and that the Ghosh test should be modified to take into account the commercial context of the case.²²¹

R. v HAYES (TOM ALEXANDER WILLIAM) [2015] EWCA CRIM 1944:

9-098

The defendant, a banker, was convicted of conspiracy to defraud. He was accused of manipulating the LIBOR rate (the interest rate which banks can charge each other on commercial loans in the London market). The defendant's case at trial was that he had not been acting dishonestly by the ordinary standards of reasonable, honest people, or that, even if his conduct was dishonest by those standards, he had not realised that his conduct was dishonest according to those standards. The trial judge, ruled that the standard for the objective part of the Ghosh test was the same as for any fraud: the jury had to decide whether the defendant was dishonest according to the ordinary standards of reasonable and honest people. This standard did not change by reference to market standards or market ethos, practice in an industry or any common understanding amongst employees. The defendant appealed, arguing that this ruling was wrong.

LORD THOMAS OF CWMGIEDD CJ, SIR BRIAN LEVESON AND GLOSTER LJ:

[29]. The first limb sets out the objective standard or the standards of ordinary and reasonable people. The submission made on behalf of the appellant was that although there was no dispute that an objective standard had to be determined, it was right that it should be determined by taking into account the standards of the market. It is clear therefore in our view that the only purpose of arguing that the evidence to which we have referred was relevant, was that the jury would be asked to set an objective standard for a market or a group of traders (whatever that standard might be) and not the ordinary standards of honest and reasonable people.

...

[32]. Not only is there is no authority for the proposition that objective standards of honesty are to be set by a market, but such a principle would gravely affect the proper conduct of business. The history of the markets have shown that, from time to time, markets adopt patterns of behaviour which are dishonest by the standards of honest and reasonable people; in such cases, the market has simply abandoned ordinary standards of honesty. Each of the members of this court has seen such cases and the damage caused when a market determines its own standards of honesty in this way. Therefore to depart from the view that standards of honesty are determined by the standards of ordinary reasonable and honest people is not only unsupported by authority, but would undermine the maintenance of ordinary standards of honesty and integrity that are essential to the conduct of business and markets.

[33]. Thus although the evidence to which we have referred was irrelevant to the determination of the objective standards of honesty, it was plainly relevant to the second limb subjective limb. The judge expressly directed the jury to have regard to it and summarised the evidence at length. In the circumstances, although in the light of the argument advanced we considered we should grant leave to appeal on this ground, we reject the argument in its entirety as misconceived.

Appeal dismissed

9-099

The Court of Appeal rejected the argument that evidence in relation to the LIBOR market and the ethos and practices at the time was relevant to the first, objective part of the Ghosh test, but appears to have accepted that such evidence was relevant to the subjective, second limb of the test. However, the second limb of the test refers back to the first, objective limb of the test: “whether the defendant himself must have realised that what he was doing was by those standards [the ordinary standards of reasonable and honest people] dishonest”.²²² It may therefore be argued that, If evidence relating to the manipulation of the LIBOR market “was rightly irrelevant to the first limb of Ghosh, then It should not have been admissible at all”.²²³ The full Ghosh direction does not need to be given in every case. In Roberts,²²⁴ it was held that the second limb of the Ghosh direction need only be put to the jury in those cases where the defendant raised the special plea that he did not think he was being dishonest by his own standards.²²⁵ This was confirmed in Wood:

“the Ghosh direction ... is best left only for that kind of case where there is a dispute about whether ordinary people would have different views from a defendant as to whether what he was doing was honest or not.”²²⁶

In Balogun,²²⁷ the Court of Appeal commented on just how infrequently the full direction was given in practice:

“The Ghosh direction in the experience of all members of this constitution is rarely given. For what it is worth none of us as a first instance judge can remember having given it nor, as counsel, having been in any case where it was given.”

The Ghosh test has been the subject of much criticism from commentators, particularly the objective limb of the test, which assumes a community norm in relation to the issue of dishonesty.

EDWARD GRIEW, “DISHONESTY: THE OBJECTIONS TO FEELY AND GHOSH”
[1985] CRIM. L.R. 341:

9–100

“The question tends to increase the number of trials. Whereas a different approach to the dishonesty issue might make it clear that given conduct was dishonest as a matter of law and therefore constituted an offence, the Feely question leaves the issue open. It may be worth a defendant’s while to take his chance with the jury ... [B]efore Feely defendants might have felt constrained to plead guilty.

The question tends to complicate and lengthen contested cases ... [I]t may be in the interests of some defendants to extend and complicate trials in order to obfuscate the issue ...

The Feely question carries an unacceptable risk of inconsistency of decision ...

[It] implies the existence of a relevant community norm. In doing so it glosses over differences of age, class and cultural background ... It is simply naive to suppose ... that there is, in respect of the dishonesty question, any such single thing as ‘the standards of ordinary decent folk ...’

[It is] unsuitable where the context of the case is a specialised one, involving intricate financial activities or dealings in a specialised market. It is neither reasonable nor rational to expect ordinary people to judge as ‘dishonest’ or ‘not dishonest’ conduct of which, for want of relevant experience, they cannot appreciate the contextual flavour ... [O]rdinary people (might) have no standards in relation to the conduct in question ...

A person may defend his attack on another's property by reference to a moral or political conviction so passionately held that he believed (so he claims) that 'ordinary decent' members of society would regard his conduct as proper, even laudable. If the asserted belief is treated as a claim to have been ignorant that the conduct was 'dishonest' by ordinary standards ... and if the jury think (as exceptionally they might) that the belief may have been held, Ghosh produces an acquittal. The result is remarkable. Robin Hood must be a thief even if he thinks the whole of the right-thinking world is on his side.

A person reared or moving in an environment in which it is generally regarded as legitimate to take advantage of certain classes of people—perhaps bookmakers or employers—may plausibly claim that he did not realise that his conduct, of which a member of such a class was a victim, was generally regarded as dishonest. It is not acceptable that a claim of that sort should be capable even of being advanced.”

9–101

These views are supported by research which revealed huge variations in ordinary people's ideas of what constitutes dishonesty. Women are more likely than men, and older people are more likely than younger people, to categorise certain behaviour as dishonest. But, interestingly, men are more likely to convict someone of a dishonesty offence in court.²²⁸ The result is that it becomes a lottery—dependent, inter alia, on the sex and age profile of the jury (or, perhaps of the magistrate)—whether someone will be convicted of an offence of dishonesty. There may also be regional or cultural variations in attitudes towards the relative honesty/dishonesty of conduct. For example, in 2007, the ship MSC Napoli was grounded off the South Devon coast and 37 of its cargo containers were washed up on a nearby beach at Branscombe. Large crowds came to the beach to “salvage” property that had come ashore (including BMW motorbikes). Yet no arrests were made and there were no prosecutions for theft. It has been suggested that at least part of the reason for this was that, because the local West country culture appeared to be tolerant of the looting of wrecks, “the police were not satisfied that a court would regard the ‘salvors’ as dishonest because of the uncertainty surrounding the concept of dishonesty in the offence of theft”.²²⁹ Following press revelations in relation to the inappropriate and excessive claiming of expenses by MPs and peers,²³⁰ over 100 were found to have wrongfully claimed expenses, yet few of these were prosecuted, apparently because it was anticipated that there might be difficulties in proving dishonesty save in the most blatant cases, in circumstances where it was argued that there was a culture amongst MPs and peers of claiming the maximum level of expenses, to compensate for the low salary paid to MPs and the fact that peers were not paid a salary.²³¹

GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, TEXTBOOK OF CRIMINAL LAW, 2ND EDN (1983),
PP.726–730:

9–102

“The practice of leaving the whole matter to the jury might be workable if our society were culturally homogeneous, with known and shared values, as it once very largely was. But the object of the law of theft is to protect property rights; and disrespect for these rights is now widespread. Since the jury are chosen at random, we have no reason to suppose that they will be any more honest and ‘decent’ in their standards than the average person ...

Evidence of the poor level of self-discipline now prevailing abounds—and this without taking any account of tax defaults. Observers agree upon a very large scale of theft: not merely shoplifting and fare bilking but stealing from employers by employees and an assortment of frauds perpetrated upon customers by employees. Great numbers of employed people of all classes believe, or affect to believe, that systematic dishonesty of various kinds is a ‘perk’. It is tolerated by many employers, provided that it does not exceed some ill-defined limit; and some employers even encourage fiddles when they are at the expense of customers, since this is a way of increasing employees’ remuneration without cost to the employers. For the employee, illicit remuneration has the advantage of being untaxed. Fiddling also brings non-material rewards: it is a pleasant departure from routine, a game of chance against the risk of detection, all the better since the consequences of detection are now rarely serious. So highly do some workers value the practice that a change in the system of work threatening to interfere with it, or an attempt by employers to prosecute offenders, is met by strikes. Notable examples were the strike at Heathrow Airport when baggage loaders were arrested for pilferage in 1973 ... If ordinary people in steady employment develop these lax notions about the right of property, it seems from the judgment in Feely that the law of theft is to be automatically adjusted to suit ...

[Commenting on Gilks Professor Williams continues] Subjectivism of this degree gives subjectivism a bad name. The subjective approach to criminal liability, properly understood, looks to the defendant's intention and to the facts as he believed them to be, not to his system of values ...

What must be found is a definition of dishonesty ... I would suggest that the definition should be that dishonesty involves a disregard for rights of property. Professor Smith's suggestion, however, is that a judicial definition of dishonesty might be ...: a person appropriates dishonestly 'where he knows that it will or may be detrimental to the interests of the other in a significant practical way' ([1982] Crim. L.R. 609). We can at least be certain that almost any definition making the position independent of current social attitudes would be better than the rule in Ghosh.²³²

9-103

Williams assumes that because large numbers of employees "fiddle" from their employers, for example, that such employees have lost all standards of knowing right from wrong and therefore, being in a moral vacuum, would be unable to assess "dishonesty" if sitting in a jury box. But surely a plausible explanation is that most such employees know perfectly well that their conduct is dishonest, but have chosen nevertheless to go ahead and do it. Such persons are perfectly capable of sitting on a jury and judging standards of dishonesty. Research has revealed that people are less likely to regard conduct as dishonest if they have done similar things themselves but are still capable of making a judgment of dishonesty. For example, nearly two-thirds of people have taken stationery home from work but 82% thought it was dishonest.²³³ Charges of hypocrisy will not do, otherwise any juror who had ever committed a (relevant) offence would have to be disqualified—an impossible task given the vast unknown figure of unrecorded property crime.

LAW COMMISSION, REPORT NO.276, FRAUD (2002), PARAS 5.9–5.10:

9–104

“5.9 There is some evidence that people’s moral standards are surprisingly flexible. A MORI poll for the Sunday Times in October 1985 found that only 35% of those questioned thought it morally wrong to accept payment in cash in order to evade liability for tax. On the other hand, it does not follow that the other 65%, if sitting on a jury in a case of tax evasion where dishonesty was in issue, would necessarily have acquitted. Indeed, the proportion of those questioned who thought that such conduct was morally acceptable to most people was only 37%. This may suggest that people do not generally assume that their own moral standards are the norm. Indeed it indicates that a majority of respondents thought that their own moral standards fell below those of most others.

5.10 It seems, therefore, that the first stage of the Ghosh test may not necessarily result in the jury simply applying their own standards of honesty. It may, indeed, be quite natural for fact-finders to form a view of what reasonable, honest, people would consider dishonest, as distinct from their decision reflecting their own personal moral view.”

The earlier Glanville Williams extract also challenges the view that the defendant’s system of values are relevant in an assessment of culpability.

C. M. V. CLARKSON,
UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW,
4TH EDN (2005), PP.236–238:

9–105

“The courts were faced with a quandary here. Acceptance of such pleas [viz., that the defendant did not think he was dishonest by his own standards] would undercut the moral imperative laid down by the criminal law. The criminal law largely reflects (and attempts to uphold) community values. The Feely test allows these community values to be enunciated by a so-called representative section of the community, namely, the jury. If the values of the jury and the community are to be ignored and replaced by the values of the defendant (who, for example, might endorse the political ideology that ‘property is theft’), the result would be a complete absence of any objective standard. The door would be open to the ‘Robin Hood defence’. The defendant would effectively become his own judge and jury.

On the other hand, the courts were reluctant to dismiss such pleas totally. The criminal law is based largely on the premise of moral responsibility. We blame those who are morally at fault. If a defendant openly rejects the value system inherent in the law of theft, he can be blamed even if, according to his own values, he thinks his actions are honest. He has knowingly ‘declared war’ on the values of society and can be blamed for doing this. It can never be an excuse in the criminal law that one does not agree with any given law. But what of the defendant who genuinely thinks he is acting honestly according to his values—and who really believes that most other people would agree with him as to the morality of his conduct—and can convince a jury of these beliefs? Such a defendant is not openly defying the law; he believes he is upholding the value system inherent in the law of theft. The case for exempting such a defendant from blame becomes strong.

This latter thinking was endorsed in the leading decision of Ghosh ... The quest throughout the criminal law is for the isolation of the blameworthy. If the jury, reflecting community standards, can attach ‘moral obloquy’ to the defendant’s actions and are satisfied that the defendant knows he is acting contrary to the moral standards of ordinary people, a judgment of blameworthiness is truly appropriate. The test has tried to combine the need to preserve objective standards within the criminal law with the need to maintain the importance of moral fault.”

Such thinking, allowing a context-dependent and individualised assessment of moral blameworthiness, was initially disapproved by the Law Commission.

LAW COMMISSION CONSULTATION PAPER NO.155, FRAUD AND DECEPTION (1999), PARA.7.52:

9-106

“7.52 [W]e are not aware of any other area of criminal law which recognises an open-ended defence that the conduct in question is morally blameless. The general approach in English law is for elements of the offence to spell out the conduct it is sought to criminalise, and similarly to provide defences by specifying excusable forms of conduct which would otherwise be caught. There is no specific requirement of morally blameworthy conduct in the law of (for example) assaults, sexual offences, corruption or criminal damage ... [O]ffences are defined in such a way that conduct which satisfies their requirements (and does not fall within a recognised general defence) will normally be blameworthy; but the element of moral blame is incorporated in the definition of the conduct prohibited, not superimposed upon it. There is always the possibility that blameless conduct may occasionally be caught, but that possibility is dealt with via prosecutorial discretion and sentencing options. It is not clear why theft and deception should be thought unique in this respect.”

However, in its subsequent Report, the Law Commission partially resiled from this position.

LAW COMMISSION, REPORT NO.276, FRAUD (2002), PARAS 5.5-5.8:

9-107

“5.5 It may be that moral elements such as dishonesty can only be defined with reference to the fact-finder’s judgment. Richard Tur argues that ‘what may constitute a just excuse is so context-dependent that exhaustive definition must necessarily limit the range of circumstances which might excuse’ (“Dishonesty and the Jury” in Griffiths (ed), Philosophy and Practice (1985), p.75). Therefore, if an exhaustive definition of ‘just excuse’ or ‘dishonesty’ were incorporated into the law, there would inevitably be examples of behaviour which were legally dishonest, but which the fact-finders would characterise as morally blameless.

5.16 ... We have also concluded that it would not be possible to define dishonesty exhaustively ...

5.17 ... We have come to agree with the argument put forward by Richard Tur ...

5.18 The fact that Ghosh dishonesty leaves open a possibility of variance between cases with essentially similar facts is, in our judgment, a theoretical risk. Many years after its adoption, the Ghosh test remains, in practice, unproblematic. We also recognise the fact that the concept of dishonesty is now required in a very large number of criminal cases, so to reject it at this stage would have a far-reaching effect on the criminal justice system.”

6. Intention of permanent deprivation

9–108

The defendant must intend to permanently deprive the other of the property. If they intend to return the goods, this is not theft. Dishonest borrowings are not theft.

What is required is an intention of permanent deprivation. Whether the victim is actually deprived of the property is irrelevant. This demonstrates again the inchoate nature of the offence of theft.

“Intention of permanently depriving the other of it” (s.1) is not defined by the Theft Act. However, s.6 extends the natural meaning of the phrase and provides that in certain circumstances even though the defendant did not “mean” the other to lose the thing permanently they are “to be regarded” as having an intention of permanent deprivation.

THEFT ACT 1968 s.6:

9–109

“(1) A person appropriating property belonging to another without meaning the other permanently to lose the thing itself is nevertheless to be regarded as having the intention of permanently depriving the other of it if his intention is to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other’s rights; and a borrowing or lending of it may amount to so treating it if, but only if, the borrowing or lending is for a period and in circumstances making it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above, where a person, having possession or control (lawfully or not) of property belonging to another, parts with the property under a condition as to its return which he may not be able to perform, this (if done for purposes of his own and without the other's authority) amounts to treating the property as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights."

9-110

In Lloyd,²³⁴ it was made clear that s.6 should only be referred to in exceptional cases; for most purposes, it would be unnecessary to go beyond s.1(1).²³⁵

Section 6(1) contains two limbs. The first refers to a defendant whose "intention is to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights". The second limb is a specific illustration of this in that certain borrowings "may amount to so treating it" as his own. Section 6(2) provides that the situation covered therein "amounts to treating the property as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights". This is thus just another specific illustration of the principle contained in the first limb of s.6(1).²³⁶ Nevertheless, it is useful to look at the three situations separately.

(i) Section 6(1)

(a) If his intention is to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights

R. V RAPHAEL [2008] EWCA CRIM
1014 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-111

The defendant drove off in a car belonging to Adeosun and then demanded money for its return.

PRESIDENT OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION:

“[T]he section itself demonstrates that the necessary intention may sometimes be established when the person appropriating property belonging to another does not in fact intend that its true owner should be deprived of it permanently. It is properly described as a deeming provision. As Lord Lane LJ ... observed in Lloyd:

‘It must mean, if nothing else, that there are circumstances in which a defendant may be deemed to have the intention permanently to deprive, even though he may intend the owner eventually to get back the object which has been taken. ... The first part of section 6(1) seems to us to be aimed at the sort of case where a defendant takes things and then offers them back to the owner for the owner to buy if he wishes. If the taker intends to return them to the owner only upon such payment, then, on the wording of section 6(1) that is deemed to amount to the necessary intention permanently to deprive ...’

He continued that there were other cases of ‘similar intent’: for instance, ‘I have taken your valuable painting. You can have it back on payment to me of £X000. If you are not prepared to make that payment, then you are not going to get your painting back.’

The express language of section 6 specifies that the subjective element necessary to establish the mens rea for theft includes an intention on the part of the taker ‘to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other’s rights’. In our judgment it is hard to find a better example of such an intention than an offer, not to return Adeosun’s car to him in exactly the same condition it was when it was removed from his possession and control, but to sell his own property back to him, and to make its return subject to a condition or conditions inconsistent with his right to possession of his own property.”

Appeal dismissed

9–112

In Lavender,²³⁷ a defendant removed doors from one council property undergoing repairs and used them to replace damaged doors at another council property. It was held that this was a “disposal” under s.6(1) because the defendant “intended to treat the doors as his own, regardless of the council’s rights”. The problem with this interpretation is that it renders s.6 redundant in that an intention to treat property as one's own is already a necessary requirement for an appropriation.

In Marshall,²³⁸ ticket touts obtained unexpired London Underground tickets and sold them to other potential customers. It was argued that there was no intention of permanent deprivation because the tickets would, in due course, be returned to the possession of London Underground. It was held, however, that the ticket touts had, under s.6(1), an intention to treat the tickets as their own to dispose of regardless of London Underground's rights.

The issue of intention of permanent deprivation needs to be approached with care by a trial judge in cases where goods are taken and abandoned shortly thereafter. Appropriation and intention of permanent deprivation are separate elements of the offence of theft, and it would be wrong for a trial judge in such a case to give the impression that a taking, even if violent, was sufficient in itself to establish an intention permanently to deprive the owner of the property. In Mitchell,²³⁹ the defendant, being pursued by police officers and needing a getaway car, pulled a woman out of her car and drove off in it and abandoned it shortly afterwards. The trial judge ruled that this taking, using and abandoning of the vehicle was sufficient evidence capable of amounting to an intention to dispose of property regardless of the owner's rights. On appeal, this was declared to be wrong. Section 6 was not meant to widen greatly the basic s.1 requirement of an intention of permanent deprivation. It was simply dealing with "a small number of difficult cases". Such a brief use of the car before abandoning it did not come within s.1. The relevance of abandonment must also be properly explained to the jury. In Vinall,²⁴⁰ two cyclists riding along a cycling path were approached by the two defendants and another man. One of the cyclists was punched from his bicycle and chased off, and the three men walked off with his bicycle. The bicycle was found abandoned by a bus stop on a main road 50 yards from where the owner had left it. The trial judge invited the jury to consider whether the fact of the abandonment of the bicycle at the bus stop itself demonstrated: (1) an intention to assume the rights of an owner and, therefore, an appropriation of the bicycle; and (2) a deemed intention permanently to deprive the owner of it. The Court of Appeal held that the judge had allowed the “separate concepts of appropriation and intention permanently to deprive” to become “fatally confused”.²⁴¹ The taking of the bicycle was a sufficient assumption of the rights of the owner to amount to an appropriation, and the abandonment of the bicycle was capable of being additional evidence that by taking the bicycle the appellants were assuming the rights of the owner over it. But the jury had also to be directed that they had to be sure that at the time of taking the bicycle either the appellants had an intention permanently to deprive (s.1) or they intended to treat the bicycle as their own to dispose of regardless of the other’s rights (s.6).²⁴²

9–113

In Raphael,²⁴³ It was held that the defendant’s demand that money be paid before the car was returned amounted to an intention of permanent deprivation, but what of the case where other, non-monetary conditions are attached to the return of property? In R. v Waters (Sian),²⁴⁴ the defendant, who was convicted of robbery, had been involved in a confrontation with a group of young people. and had taken a mobile phone from the complainant, V. There was evidence that the defendant had informed V that the phone would be returned if another individual, H, was persuaded to come and talk to him. The trial judge directed the jury that, even if the defendant made it plain that the phone would be returned if he was able to talk to H, that would still amount to an intention permanently to deprive. The Court of Appeal, allowing the appeal, held that this was not a legally correct direction:

“... if the condition attached to the return of the item is one which would not be fulfilled or not be fulfilled in the foreseeable future, then the circumstances may well amount to an intention permanently to deprive. On the other hand if the condition can readily be fulfilled and may be fulfilled in the near future, the jury may well conclude that intention to deprive has not been made out.”²⁴⁵

(b) Borrowing or lending for a period and in circumstances making it equivalent to an outright

taking or disposal

This makes it clear that certain borrowings are to be treated the same as outright takings. The classic example here is borrowing another's football season ticket and then returning the piece of paper at the end of the season after watching all the matches. At that stage, the ticket has no value and is useless; the "virtue" has gone out of the thing.

R. v LLOYD [1985] Q.B. 829 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9-114

Film reels were removed from a cinema for a few hours and "pirate" copies made of them; the originals were then returned. The defendant appealed against his conviction for conspiracy to steal.

LORD LANE CJ:

"[T]he intention of the appellants could more accurately be described as an intention temporarily to deprive the owner of the film and was indeed the opposite of an intention permanently to deprive ...

Borrowing is ex hypothesi not something which is done with an intention permanently to deprive. This half of the subsection, we believe, is intended to make it clear that a mere borrowing is never enough to constitute the necessary guilty mind unless the intention is to return the 'thing' in such a changed state that it can truly be said that all its goodness or virtue has gone: for example R. v Beecham (1851) 5 Cox C.C. 181, where the defendant stole railway tickets intending that they should be returned to the railway company in the usual way only after the journeys had been completed. He was convicted of larceny ...

That being the case, we turn to inquire whether the feature films in this case can fall within that category. Our view is that they cannot. The goodness, the virtue, the practical value of the films to the owners has not gone out of the article. The film could still be projected to paying audiences ...

Our view is that those particular films which were the subject of this alleged conspiracy had not themselves diminished in value at all. What had happened was that the borrowed film had been used or was going to be used to perpetrate a copyright swindle on the owners whereby their commercial interests were grossly and adversely affected in the way that we have endeavoured to describe at the outset of this judgment. That borrowing, it seems to us, was not for a period, or in such circumstances, as made it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal. There was still virtue in the film.”

Appeals allowed

9–115

Difficult questions of fact will, of course, remain. In Lloyd, Lord Lane spoke of “all” the virtue or goodness being gone. This raises the problem of the football season ticket which is returned after it has been used for 19 matches, but is still valid for one final match. The ticket clearly has some value or virtue left. Presumably, questions such as these, were they to arise, would be left to the jury as questions of fact.

(ii) Section 6(2)

9–116

This deals with the situation of a person who takes unacceptable risks with the property of another. For example, they may pawn such property realising that they may be unable to redeem it. In Fernandes, a solicitor dishonestly made an insecure investment of a client’s money. It was held that:

“section 6 may apply to a person in possession or control of another’s property who, dishonestly and for his own purpose, deals with that property in such a manner that he knows he is risking its loss.”²⁴⁶

It is uncertain whether the defendant must realise that they may be unable to redeem the property or whether it suffices that they “may” objectively be so unable. Griew says: “The former view is doctrinally the purer; the latter is more readily suggested by the terms of the poorlydrafted section”.²⁴⁷ However, in Fernandes it was stated that the defendant must know that they are risking the loss of the property.²⁴⁸

(a) Dishonest borrowings

9-117

Apart from these specific situations where s.6 has deemed dishonest borrowings to be the equivalent of an intention to permanently deprive, the Theft Act 1968 has generally chosen not to punish dishonest borrowings. Why?

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, 8TH REPORT, THEFT
AND RELATED OFFENCES (1966),
CMND.2977, PARA.56:

9-118

“[A]n intention to return the property, even after a long time makes the conduct essentially different from stealing. Apart from this ... [criminalising temporary deprivations] would be a considerable extension of the criminal law, which does not seem to be called for by any existing serious evil. It might moreover have undesirable social consequences. Quarrelling neighbours and families would be able to threaten one another with prosecution. Students and young people sharing accommodation who might be tempted to borrow one another’s property in disregard of a prohibition by the owner would be in danger of acquiring a criminal record. Further, it would be difficult for the police to avoid being involved in wasteful and undesirable investigations into alleged offences which had no social importance.”

GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, “TEMPORARY APPROPRIATION SHOULD BE THEFT”
[1981] CRIM. L.R. 129, 131-132, 135:

9-119

“Suppose that a person removes a small piece of sculpture from a private exhibition, or a valuable book from a University library, and returns it after a year. During that time it has of course been lost to its owner; and both the owner and the police have been put to trouble ...

The taker of the article may use it in such a way as to put it at risk, or he may make a profit from it, or he may return it in an impaired condition; and if he is a person of no substance the owner's civil remedy against him will be insufficient penalty ...

If a person has gone off with the property of another, and upon being apprehended and charged with theft swears that he meant to return it, is his statement to be accepted or not? To accept it too readily gives guilty defendants an easy line of escape; to reject it carries the risk of convicting people who are technically innocent, even though they are morally guilty because they have taken the article dishonestly ... Why should not the dishonest taking be sufficient to constitute the offence of theft, thus relieving the prosecution of a very difficult burden of proof?
...

When an article is unlawfully taken, even if only for a temporary purpose and without substantial risk of permanent loss of the article, the owner suffers an immediate loss, namely in respect of the use of it ... Sometimes the economic loss resulting from the loss of use of an article that is essential to an undertaking can be considerable.

One of the principal arguments for changing the law is that the value of articles lies in their use. More and more things are used by way of hiring ... Many articles of use have comparatively short useful 'lives'. In a few years they wear out or become unfashionable or technically obsolete ... Besides, the owner is in a dilemma of either being without the article for that time or putting himself to the expense of buying another—an expense that may turn out to have been unnecessary if the article is returned.”

9–120

This reasoning was largely accepted by the Law Commission whose provisional view was that temporary deprivation of property is wrong in principle and so should be criminal.²⁴⁹

There are two well-known exceptions to the intention of permanent deprivation rule (apart from the exceptions within s.6 itself).²⁵⁰ Section 11 creates the offence of removing articles from places open to the public, for example, removing works of art from museums or galleries albeit intending to return them at some time. The Theft Act 1968 s.12 creates the second exceptional offence of taking a motor vehicle or other conveyance without authority. This is designed to prevent “joyriding”, where a car is taken and, after being driven around, abandoned. In such cases an intention of permanent deprivation would be difficult to establish.

It is interesting to contrast this last activity of joyriding with the conduct of a person who walks into a bookshop and dishonestly removes a book which they take home and read before returning it to the shop. It appears that the only reasons for the criminalisation of the former but not the latter activity are, first, the prevalence of joyriding²⁵¹ and secondly, the difficulty of proving the necessary intent with taking cars (with the book example, a finding of intention of permanent deprivation would be almost irresistible and thus a conviction for theft would result in fact).

It is worth pausing at this point to reflect whether some insight can be gleaned into the real harm that is sought to be prevented by the crime of theft. When the book is dishonestly taken from the store, the store clearly suffers a harm. First, there is economic harm. The book is removed from their shelves, meaning it cannot be sold to another. The used book that is returned is not the same thing that was taken, which was a new book. The store sustains an economic loss of the difference in value between the new book and the second-hand book.²⁵² Secondly, there is all the non-economic harm associated with most thefts. The shop has had its rights of ownership assaulted. It has lost control of its property, lost the power to make choices and decisions about it. The identity of the borrower is probably unknown and, therefore, there can be no certainty as to when and if the property will be returned. For instance, the Criminal Law Revision Committee considered the striking example of someone who “borrowed” Goya’s portrait of the Duke of Wellington from the National Gallery for four years.²⁵³

It should be repeated at this stage that it is not necessary for a victim to lose her property permanently. What matters is that the defendant, at the time of the appropriation, intends that she shall lose it permanently. Thus, the result may be the same as with cases of borrowing. In our example, the book is ultimately returned. It is the intention of the taker that distinguishes the cases. Is this approach justifiable?

O. W. HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW
(1882), PP.70–72:

9–121

“[In theft] acts are punished which of themselves would not be sufficient to accomplish the evil which the law seeks to prevent, and which are treated as equally criminal, whether the evil has been accomplished or not ...

In larceny the consequences immediately flowing from the act are generally exhausted with little or no harm to the owner. Goods are removed from his possession by trespass, and that is all, when the crime is complete. But they must be permanently kept from him before the harm is done which the law seeks to prevent. A momentary loss of possession is not what has been guarded against with such severe penalties. What the law means to prevent is the loss of it wholly and forever ...

The reason is plain enough. The law cannot wait until the property has been used up or destroyed in other hands than the owner's, or until the owner has died, in order to make sure that the harm which it seeks to prevent has been done ...

There must be an intent to deprive such owner of his ownership ... But why? ... The true answer is, that the intent is an index to the external event which probably would have happened, and that, if the law is to punish at all, it must, in this case, go on probabilities, not on accomplished facts. The analogy to the manner of dealing with attempts is plain. Theft may be called an attempt to permanently deprive a man of his property, which is punished with the same severity whether successful or not. If theft can rightly be considered in this way, intent must play the same part as in other attempts. An act which does not fully accomplish the prohibited result may be made wrongful by evidence that but for some interference it would have been followed by other acts co-ordinated with it to produce that result. This can only be shown by showing intent. In theft the intent to deprive the owner of his property establishes that the thief would have retained, or would not have taken steps to restore, the stolen goods.”

9–122

The real harm in theft is, thus, that when a defendant intends permanent deprivation there is a greater risk to the victim that they will lose their property permanently. (In most cases they will, in fact, have already lost the property.) As with the law of attempt, the threat to the property amounts to a “second order harm”. This, however, only explains why the actual loss of property need not occur—but still does not explain why there must be an intention of permanent deprivation as opposed to an intention to borrow dishonestly.

What is being punished is disapproved-of behaviour which poses an unacceptable risk to the property of another. It is fairly obvious that where there is an intention of permanent deprivation there is a greater risk of actual permanent deprivation occurring (for much the same reason that there is greater danger when a defendant is intending a consequence than when they are being reckless as to it: they are trying to achieve the objective and must, in general, stand more chance of success than if not so trying). So, the question reduces itself to whether permanent deprivation is sufficiently “worse” than temporary deprivation to justify criminalisation of the former but not the latter. Most people would surely agree that, in general, a permanent loss is qualitatively worse than a temporary loss. The owner has been deprived completely and irrevocably of their property. Insurance, if obtainable, will not compensate for such loss of power and control over the property. Whether it is so much worse as to justify the criminalisation line being drawn between the two is uncertain. Perhaps, it is best at this stage to conclude that while a temporary loss caused by dishonest conduct is unfortunate and deserves moral condemnation, one should refrain from expanding the role of the criminal law without clear and strong reasons.

(b) Particular property

9–123

There must be an intention permanently to deprive the other of the particular property alleged to be appropriated. It is no defence that similar property was to be returned. This rule is most often applied to coins and banknotes. It is clear law that if one “borrows” money, intending to repay it the next day, one is not intending to return the same notes or coins; one therefore does have an intention of permanently depriving the other of the particular property alleged to be stolen.²⁵⁴ Of course, actual liability still depends on a finding of dishonesty which, in such cases, may be difficult to establish.

(c) Cheques

9-124

There is a particular problem with cheques in that if a defendant wrongfully obtains and cashes another's cheque, under former banking practices the cheque would often ultimately be returned to that other or be available for their collection and so the defendant could assert that they had no intention of permanently depriving the other of that piece of paper.²⁵⁵ In Duru,²⁵⁶ it was held that in such a case the defendant would have an intention of depriving the other permanently of the thing in action represented by the cheque. Duru was overruled by *Preddy*²⁵⁷ on the ground that the thing in action (the defendant's right to sue the other on the cheque) was not property belonging to another.²⁵⁸ In addition, although the defendant in such circumstances acquires the cheque form, in Preddy, Lord Goff stated (obiter) that, if the defendant intends to present the cheque for payment, he will not be guilty of theft of the cheque form, because he has no intention to deprive the owner of the cheque, since he knows that on presentation to the bank the cheque will be returned to the drawer via the bank.²⁵⁹ Lord Goff's comments in Preddy were followed in *Graham*²⁶⁰ and treated as binding in Clark.²⁶¹ There are two ways of overcoming this problem. First, when the defendant presents the cheque to the bank they are appropriating the other's bank balance—a thing in action. In Hilton,²⁶² it was held that the thing in action (the debt from the bank to the other person) in such cases has been wholly or partially destroyed. An intention to destroy the property of another amounts to an intention to permanently deprive the other of it. Secondly, with regard to the cheque itself, it has been argued by Smith that, when receiving the cheque, the defendant could be regarded as appropriating a piece of paper with special qualities in that it is effectively the key to the drawer's bank account.²⁶³ When that piece of paper is returned to the other (or their bank) it will simply be a worthless piece of paper with all its virtue gone. The defendant therefore had an intention of permanently depriving the other of the piece of paper with special qualities. The problem with this analysis is that these “special qualities” are simply those that render the cheque a thing in action. As demonstrated by Preddy, this thing in action never belonged to another. However, Smith’s analysis could be utilised in cases where the property is deemed to belong to another as in s.5(3). In such a case an intention that “the document should find its way back to the transferor only after all benefit to the transferor has been lost or removed as a result of its use in breach of such obligation”²⁶⁴ can amount to an intention to deprive the other permanently of the cheque.

This problem is likely to become increasingly rare as the use of cheques declines and with the coming into force of the Fraud Act 2006: the defendant in such a case might be charged with fraud by false representation.²⁶⁵ In any event, the problem does not arise if the defendant intends to keep the cheque, and not to present it. In these circumstances, it appears from the case of *Roach*²⁶⁶ that the defendant can be convicted of theft of the cheque form because:

“In such circumstances there is no difference between these cheques and any other form of property. If they were taken dishonestly and there was an intention permanently to deprive the owner of them, they would have been stolen.”

(iii) Conditional intention

R. v EASOM [1971] 2 Q.B. 315:

9–125

The defendant picked up a woman’s handbag in a cinema, rummaged through it and, having taken nothing, put it back near to the owner, who repossessed it. On appeal, Easom’s conviction for stealing the handbag and specified contents (tissues, cosmetics etc) was quashed: the defendant never had intention of permanently depriving the owner of the handbag of any of those things.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ

“In every case of theft the appropriation must be accompanied by the intention of permanently depriving the owner of his property. What may be loosely described as a ‘conditional’ appropriation will not do. If the appropriator has it in mind merely to deprive the owner of such of his property as, on examination, proves worth taking and then, finding that the booty is valueless to the appropriator, leaves it ready to hand to be repossessed by the owner, the appropriator has not stolen. If a dishonest postal sorter picks up a pile of letters, intending to steal any which are registered, but, on finding that none of them are, replaces them, he has stolen nothing, and this is so notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 (1) of the Theft Act 1968.”

9–126

Easom could not be convicted of the theft of the handbag, tissues etc, because he did not intend to keep any of these items. His intention was to steal anything that he found that was worth stealing, and “it cannot be said that one who has it in mind to steal only if what he finds is worth stealing has a present intention to steal”.²⁶⁷ Nor, since he replaced the bag near to the position from which it had been removed, could it be established that he had exercised such dominion over the property that it could be inferred that, at the time of the taking, he intended to treat the bag as his own to dispose of regardless of the owner’s rights.²⁶⁸ The defendant in such circumstances might be convicted of attempted theft if the charge were suitably worded as “attempting to steal from a handbag”.²⁶⁹

III. Fraud

A. THE CRIMINOLOGICAL BACKGROUND

9–127

The terms “theft”, “robbery”, and “burglary” evoke immediate understanding in the hearer (even if that understanding is less than perfect); the same is less true of offences involving fraud.

The behaviour encompassed by fraud may, however, be just as devastating to the victim, or just as close to the fringes of criminality. It may be the classic con-man who tricks an elderly lady into parting with her valuable antique for vastly less than it is worth; it may be the individual passing bad cheques or falsely claiming social security; it may be the employee who abuses their position of trust to defraud their employers; or it may be a company perpetrating a fraud against the public or the state. An increasing threat is perceived in the rise in the use of computers and the internet to commit crime. The use of the internet to shop, manage bank accounts, interact with friends and acquaintances, and even to find a new partner, has become a commonplace feature of modern life. Unfortunately, it has also provided fraudsters with many new opportunities to seek out and take advantage of

JONATHAN CLOUGH, PRINCIPLES OF CYBERCRIME (2010), PP.183–185:

9–128

“The Internet is a paradise for those who prey upon the gullible, the greedy or the vulnerable. First, it provides unprecedented access to victims ... The advent of the Internet has allowed offenders to reach millions of potential victims at virtually no cost. The more people who can be contacted, the greater the chance someone will be taken in by the scam.

Secondly, the Internet is a large marketplace. In 2003, 17.6% of adults in the United States conducted banking online and 32.3% purchased a product or service online. In Canada, 44% of adults had purchased goods or services over the internet in 2003, whilst in the UK the figure in 2009 was 80%, with 55% banking online ...

This increase in commercial and financial transactions conducted online provides an environment where people are less wary of responding to emails or providing information via websites. It also provides opportunities for fraudsters to mimic legitimate organisations ... there is an immediacy about online transactions which is also conducive to fraud ...

Thirdly, it provides anonymity. Offenders are not only able to conceal their real identities, they are able to assume realistic looking alternative identities. Finally, the multi-jurisdictional nature of online fraud makes investigation and prosecution more difficult, particularly if relatively small amounts are involved.”

Computer and internet fraud comes in many forms. For example, “advance fee frauds” (also known as “Nigerian mail frauds” or “419 schemes” (after the provision of the Nigerian Criminal Code criminalising such schemes), frequently target victims via email, suggesting that they may be entitled to obtain a financial or other benefit, but that, in order to receive this benefit, a sum of money has to be paid upfront. The benefit never materialises.²⁷⁰ In the case of online dating “scams”, fraudsters pretend to form romantic attachments and then use the opportunity to defraud their victims of substantial sums of money, causing their victims to suffer what might be seen as a “double hit”: “the loss of money as well as the loss of a relationship”.²⁷¹ Large amounts of money may be stolen through “salami” methods, where by rounding up, or down, small amounts are diverted from accounts into the offender’s account or, for example, by “trojan horse” methods where secret codes are hidden in somebody else’s computer program.²⁷² Such offending may go on for years without detection and then only come to light through accident. To try to prevent or detect computer crime, companies may be told by security specialists to watch for staff living beyond their means, staff having drug or alcohol problems, or staff being unwilling to take holidays, change jobs or be promoted.²⁷³

Certainly, such advice ties in with classic studies on embezzlement such as that by Cressey. He discovered that much embezzlement occurred in situations where a trusted person found themselves with a financial problem which was non-shareable, but was in an occupation where his difficulties could be secretly resolved by violating his position of trust. The offender then felt able to rationalise and justify his behaviour to himself.²⁷⁴

The examples given should indicate two other features of offences involving fraud: that the amount of money involved, as with theft, may vary from small to huge and it is inevitable that much of the offending will remain hidden and not appear in the official statistics. According to CSEW statistics there is rather more offending of this nature than there is of theft. In the year ending September 2016, there were 3.6 million fraud offences in England and Wales,²⁷⁵ compared with 3,552,000 total theft offences.²⁷⁶ This compares with a figure for police recorded fraud of 622,731 offences in 2015/2016, which represents an increase of 3% on the previous year.²⁷⁷ However, the CSEW figures reveal but the “tip of the iceberg” as far as the true amount of fraud crime is concerned, since they only capture fraud committed against individuals. Industry data on fraud for this period, most of which is unreported, showed 1.9 million cases of fraud in relation to UK-Issued cards, cheque fraud and remote banking, an increase of 39% from the previous year.²⁷⁸ Given the secretive nature of fraud (the victim may never learn of the loss), reliable estimates about the level of offending are impossible to come by, although it would seem reasonable to conclude that more is left hidden than is the case with other property offences. Elderly or vulnerable victims may not wish to allow a CSEW interviewer into their home,²⁷⁹ and companies frequently do not report fraud because they see little to be gained from doing so.²⁸⁰ However, the data that is available suggests that: “in purely financial terms losses from fraud dwarf all other types of property crime”.²⁸¹ Estimates suggest that in 2016, an estimated £193 billion was lost to the UK economy from fraud, £37.5 billion to the public sector, and £144 billion to the private sector.²⁸²

9–130

The sheer variety of fraud offences and the increasing prevalence of online fraud means that it is fundamentally flawed to conceive of the “crime problem” in terms of traditional street activities: it does contain within it the stereotypical working-class villain and his species of fraud, but it also contains sophisticated frauds by “respectable”, powerful members of society.²⁸³

From a starting point of not being regarded as warranting criminal status, cases involving fraud may well be regarded more seriously by the courts than those involving theft (perhaps because of the element of rational execution or betrayal of trust), although not as seriously as robbery or burglary. Fraud, for example, bears a higher maximum penalty than theft, i.e. ten years rather than seven years. The Sentencing Council has considered the relative seriousness of different kinds of fraud in preparing its sentencing guideline.²⁸⁴

One form of fraud which has become prevalent in recent years is often referred to as “identity theft”. This involves using the personal information of another person to conduct financial transactions in that person’s name, enabling the fraudster to obtain goods and services at no cost to themselves.²⁸⁵ Other jurisdictions have enacted specific offences to catch such fraudsters, whilst in the UK it remains under the umbrella of the general offence of fraud. In the US, for example, the Identity Theft Assumption and Deterrence Act was passed in 1998 at federal level, criminalising the use of another’s personal data, with sentences ranging from three to 15 years’ imprisonment, depending on the financial extent of the fraud.²⁸⁶ The harm resulting from such offences is obviously financial, but Marron argues that it extends beyond the mere loss of money:

“What the fear or prospect of identity theft appears to strike at is the capacity of individuals to sustain an ability to consume, to create and recreate their lives as a ‘reflexive project of the self’ and so sustain that personal freedom through which they are integrated as subjects and objects of government.”²⁸⁷

It is also seen as a separate phenomenon for the reasons that rather than focusing efforts on finding out who commits these offences, blame is often laid at the door of the victims, who are accused of failing to protect themselves against the threat.²⁸⁸ Whilst many of the “card-not-present” frauds can be classed as instances of identity theft, the actual prevalence of this type of fraud, in the absence of a separate offence, is not measured.

B. THE LAW PRIOR TO THE FRAUD ACT 2006

Whilst the protection of property by means of a law of theft (or larceny) has very early origins in the common law, the emergence of laws protecting those who parted with their property because of fraud or deceit was rather slower. The ruling spirit of “caveat emptor” made it inappropriate to use the criminal law in such instances. “[W]e are not to indict one for making a fool of another”,²⁸⁹ and similarly, “[It is] needless to provide severe laws for such mischiefs, against which common prudence and caution may be a sufficient security”.²⁹⁰

Just as elsewhere in the law, however, the principle of “caveat emptor” was gradually eroded, so that by the time of the Theft Act 1968 distinct offences existed dependent upon the type of title obtained. If ownership passed by means of deception the offence was obtaining by false pretences. If the defendant gained possession only, the offence was larceny by a trick. Not only did this cause difficulties in distinguishing the two but there were other separate offences as well, such as larceny by a servant, fraudulent conversion and embezzlement.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee considered whether to extend the law of theft to cover cases where property was obtained by deception, but concluded that this would not be a satisfactory solution:

“Obtaining by false pretences is ordinarily thought of as different from theft, because in the former the owner in fact consents to part with his ownership; a bogus beggar is regarded as a rogue but not as a thief, and so are his less petty counterparts. To create a new offence of theft to include conduct which ordinary people would find difficult to regard as theft would be a mistake. The unnaturalness of including obtaining by false pretences in theft is emphasised by the difficulty of drafting a satisfactory definition to cover both kinds of conduct.”²⁹¹

Following this, the Theft Acts 1968 and 1978 created eight offences of dishonestly obtaining something by deception:

1. obtaining property²⁹²;
2. obtaining a money transfer²⁹³;
3. obtaining a pecuniary advantage²⁹⁴;

4. procuring the execution of a valuable security²⁹⁵;
5. obtaining services²⁹⁶;
6. securing the remission of liability²⁹⁷;
7. inducing a creditor to wait for or to forgo payment;²⁹⁸ and
8. obtaining an exemption from, or an abatement of, a liability.²⁹⁹

Over time, major problems emerged in relation to these deception offences.

9-132

First, it was necessary to prove that the deception caused the obtaining of the specified commodity. This caused immense difficulties. For instance, in one of the leading House of Lords' decisions, Lambie,³⁰⁰ a defendant, who had exceeded her credit limit and knew the bank was trying to recover the credit card, used the card to purchase goods. It was tolerably clear that the shop assistant who accepted the credit card had little interest in the defendant's relationship with her bank. She knew the transaction would be honoured by the bank. That is the point of credit cards. Accordingly, it was difficult to see that the deception (the representation that the defendant has actual authority to use the card) caused the shop assistant to hand over the property. To prevent such credit card frauds the House of Lords was forced to adopt the tortuous reasoning that the shop assistant was deceived and for that reason handed over the property:

“if she had been asked whether, had she known the respondent was acting dishonestly and, in truth, had no authority whatever from the bank to use the credit card in this way, she would have completed the transaction, only one answer is possible—no.”

It was subsequently stated in the Court of Appeal that the court had “the gravest possible doubt” whether the supplier of goods in a credit card transaction was interested in the authority of the card-user:

“suppliers of goods were generally concerned to ensure that they would receive payment when a credit card was issued, but there was room to doubt whether they were interested in how the holder got the card, provided that the transaction would be honoured.”³⁰¹

The decisions in Lambie and other similar cases generated much debate. A. T. H. Smith argued that their combined effect was to extend:

“the concept of deception beyond what it meant when the Theft Act was framed in 1968, to mean something much more like fraud ... [W]hereas elsewhere in the criminal law the conduct objected to must be an ‘operating and substantial cause’ the courts are now saying that a man has been deceived when he has been told an untruth (verbally or by conduct) and where it may be assumed that he would have done otherwise had he known the truth.”³⁰²

In other words, causation was reduced to the sine qua non level.

9–133

Secondly, the requirement that the deception be operative, that is, deceive someone, meant that machines could not be “deceived”.³⁰³ While this might not have been a particular problem in 1968 (other than in cases relating to vending machines, etc), technological advances in a commercial world now dominated by credit cards, electronic transfers of money and the provision of goods or services through the internet and call centres meant that there were significant gaps in the law in relation to deceiving machines. Accordingly, the Law Commission proposed replacing the concept of deception with the requirement of a misrepresentation.

Under this approach, the focus is on the wrongdoing of the defendant rather than on whether the other person was induced to act in reliance on the misrepresentation. This approach also has the advantage that it makes no difference whether the misrepresentation was directed at a person or a machine.

Thirdly, the various deception offences were over-specific with the result that specific offences were often wrongly charged. There was an enormous overlap between the offences—quite apart from the overlap, already discussed, with theft. Such blurring of offences was morally confusing in fair labelling terms and made it difficult for prosecutors to know which charge to select.

Fourthly, some of the offences were unduly complex: a lawyer's dream or nightmare, depending on one's point of view.

Finally, the sentencing maxima for the deception offences were haphazard. For instance, while s.15 carried a ten-year maximum penalty, s.16 (obtaining a pecuniary advantage by deception—for example, obtaining an overdraft or employment by deception) carried a maximum penalty of five years' imprisonment. Obtaining services by deception and evasion of liability by deception, contrary to the Theft Act 1978 ss.1 and 2 respectively, also carried a five-year maximum penalty. Fair labelling involves encapsulating the wrongdoing involved and reflecting its seriousness by an appropriate level of punishment. The essence of the wrongdoing in all these deception offences was the same: the defendant was acting dishonestly and fraudulently. The particular ways or means of committing each type of fraud should not be relevant.

Accordingly, the Law Commission proposed abolition of all the deception offences and their replacement by a general offence of fraud along with one separate offence of obtaining services dishonestly.

LAW COMMISSION, REPORT NO.276, FRAUD (2002), PARAS 1.6–1.9:

9–134

“1.6 [The issue is] whether the introduction of a general fraud offence would improve the criminal law. We have come to the conclusion that it would ...

- (1) It should make the law more comprehensible to juries, especially in serious fraud trials. The charges which are currently employed in such trials are numerous, and none of them adequately describe or encapsulate the meaning of 'fraud'. The statutory offences are too specific to offer a general description of fraud; while the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud is so wide that it offers little guidance on the difference between fraudulent and lawful conduct ...

- (2) A general offence of fraud would be a useful tool in effective prosecutions. Specific offences are sometimes wrongly charged, in circumstances when another offence would have been more suitable. This can result in unjustified acquittals and costly appeals ...
- (3) Introducing a single crime of fraud would dramatically simplify the law of fraud. Clear, simple law is fairer than complicated, inaccessible law. If a citizen is contemplating activities which could amount to a crime, a clear, simple law gives better guidance on whether the conduct is criminal ...
- (4) A general offence of fraud would be aimed at encompassing fraud in all its forms. It would not focus on particular ways or means of committing frauds. Thus it should be better able to keep pace with developing technology.

1.7 In line with these recommendations, we recommend that the eight offences of deception created by the Theft Acts 1968–96 should be repealed and that the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud should be abolished. In their place we recommend the creation of two new statutory offences—one of fraud, and one of obtaining services dishonestly.”

9–135

Of course, more radical options were possible. The Law Commission’s proposed offences (enacted in the Fraud Act 2006) pre-suppose the existence of the remaining property offences such as theft, handling stolen goods and so on. Reform could have gone further and have introduced an even broader offence, such as a general offence of dishonesty. Such ideas are considered later in this chapter.

C. THE FRAUD ACT 2006

9–136

Following the above recommendations by the Law Commission, the various deception offences cited above were all abolished by the Fraud Act 2006. In their place, there is a new offence of fraud, supported by ancillary offences. There is also an independent offence of obtaining services dishonestly.

1. Fraud

9–137

Section 1 creates a new broad offence of fraud, punishable on conviction on indictment by a maximum of ten years' imprisonment.³⁰⁴ Sentencing guidelines have been issued in respect of this offence.³⁰⁵

FRAUD ACT 2006 s.1:

9–138

“(1) A person is guilty of fraud if he is in breach of any of the sections listed in subsection (2) (which provide for different ways of committing the offence).

(2) The sections are—

- (a) section 2 (fraud by false representation),
- (b) section 3 (fraud by failing to disclose information), and
- (c) section 4 (fraud by abuse of position).”

9–139

Each of these three ways of committing the offence of fraud will be discussed in turn. As fraud by false representation is the broadest of these forms of committing the offence and is the one likely to be most frequently charged, those elements that are common to all three (dishonesty and intent to make a gain or cause loss) will be discussed in relation to this form of the offence.

(i) Fraud by false representation

FRAUD ACT 2006 s.2:

- “(1) A person is in breach of this section if he—
- (a) dishonestly makes a false representation, and
 - (b) intends, by making the representation—
 - (i) to make a gain for himself or another, or
 - (ii) to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss.
- (2) A representation is false if—
- (a) it is untrue or misleading, and
 - (b) the person making it knows that it is, or might be, untrue or misleading.
- (3) ‘Representation’ means any representation as to fact or law, including a representation as to the state of mind of—
- (a) the person making the representation, or
 - (b) any other person.
- (4) A representation may be express or implied.
- (5) For the purposes of this section a representation may be regarded as made if it (or anything implying it) is submitted in any form to any system or device designed to receive, convey or respond to communications (with or without human intervention).”

Under s.5 (discussed later) “gain” and “loss” extend only to gain and loss in money or other property.

The essence of this offence is telling lies for economic purposes. With the abolition of the requirement that there be a deception, there is no need to establish that anyone believed the lies or was induced to act in a certain way because of the lies. There is no need for the defendant to obtain any advantage (economic or otherwise). All that is required is that there is a dishonest intention to secure a gain or cause a loss. The offence thus adopts an inchoate model of liability. The emphasis is on the wrongdoing of the defendant.

DAVID ORMEROD, “THE FRAUD ACT 2006—CRIMINALISING LYING?”
[2007] CRIM. L.R. 193, 196–197:

9–142

“This wholly inchoate offence appears to criminalise lying. Should lying be a sufficient basis for criminal liability? What is the wrong which D performs which warrants the criminal sanction? It is not one derived from intentionally harming V’s interests directly—there need be no such harm. Similarly, it is not one of potentially damaging V’s interests. The wrong seems to be the act of lying or misleading with intent to gain or cause loss; the harm might be construed as one of destabilising society’s processes of property and financial transfers. Even if this is sufficient to warrant criminalisation, is it properly called fraud?”

(a) Actus reus

9–143

The actus reus of this form of the offence requires that there be a representation which is false.

1. Express or implied representations

9–144

Section 2(4) provides that a representation may be express or implied. Express representations are an obvious way of lying: for example, telling a purchaser that one is selling a diamond when it is, in fact, glass. The representation may be written, spoken, posted on a phishing website or sent by email.³⁰⁶ In McDermott,³⁰⁷ the defendant was convicted of fraud when, having stolen clothing from a department store, he then returned the clothes and, representing that he had bought them, sought to recover a refund. In Wenman,³⁰⁸ the defendant told a complainant that his roof was in a poor state of repair and quoted him a total of £25,600 for repair works, in circumstances in which there was nothing basically wrong with the roof. In Formhals,³⁰⁹ the defendant sold items representing that they were signed by Winston Churchill, when in fact he had forged the signatures. In all of these cases there was a clear false representation.

No definition of an implied representation is given. In United Arab Emirates v Allen,³¹⁰ it was suggested that “Implied representations are legal constructs intended to give effect to that which honest parties involved in a transaction would reasonably read into the conduct of the other”. Under the law before the Fraud Act 2006, proof of a deception involved, inter alia, establishing that there was an untrue representation. The courts, after the Fraud Act 2006, have drawn on this established body of law as to the meaning of an implied representation.³¹¹ There are many established instances where the conduct of the defendant will be regarded as amounting to an implied representation³¹²:

- (a) Hotels: If one books into a hotel one is taken to be representing that one intends to pay the bill at the end of one’s stay.³¹³
- (b) Restaurants: Ordering and eating a meal in a restaurant is a representation that one intends to pay for that meal. If during or after the meal one decides not to pay, then remaining at the table thereafter is a false representation that one still intends to pay.³¹⁴
- (c) Quotations.

R. V SILVERMAN (1988) 86 CR. APP.
R. 213 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

9–145

The appellant charged two elderly sisters grossly excessive prices for work done to the central heating and wiring of their flat. They had trusted him to charge a fair price because of previous work done by him for their family. The appellant placed no pressure on them to accept his quotation and there was nothing wrong with the work done. He was charged and convicted under s.15 (the now abolished offence of obtaining property by deception). He appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that an excessively high quotation did not amount to a false representation and that the trial judge had erred in not putting his defence (that the sisters seemed happy with his work) to the jury in express terms.

WATKINS LJ:

“Mr Hopmeier, who appears here for the appellant, has argued, first, that the appellant made no representations to the complainants. He has not shrunk from conceding that the appellant was dishonest. He has submitted that the appellant quoted the sisters for the work to be done but that it was open to them either to accept or reject the quotation upon such advice as they might seek and perhaps in the light of tenders by others, and that the appellant was in much the same position as anyone else who is asked to quote for work to be done. He has argued that it is a dangerous concept to introduce into the criminal law that an excessively high quotation amounts to a false representation under section 15(1) of the Theft Act 1968. In certain circumstances that submission may we think be well founded. But whether a quotation amounts to false representation must depend upon the circumstances.

It seems clear to us that the complainants, far from being worldly wise, were unquestionably gullible. Having left their former home, they relied implicitly upon the word of the appellant about their requirements in their maisonette. In such circumstances of mutual trust, one party depending upon the other for fair and reasonable conduct, the criminal law may apply if one party takes dishonest advantage of the other by representing as a fair charge that which he but not the other knows is dishonestly excessive ...

There was material for a finding that there had been a false representation although it is true that the appellant had said nothing at the time he made his representations to encourage the sisters to accept the quotations. He applied no pressure upon them, and apart from mentioning the actual prices to be charged was silent as to other matters that may have arisen for question in their minds ...

Here the situation has been built up over a long period of time. It was a situation of mutual trust and the appellant's silence on any matter other than the sums to be charged were, we think, as eloquent as if he had said: ‘What is more, I can say to you that we are going to get no more than a modest profit out of this.’

There is, we think, no foundation for the criticism of the judge in the first ground of appeal nor any substance in this ground in law ...’ [However, it was decided that the judge should have included D’s defence ‘worthless though it might have been in the minds of the jury’ in the summing up].”

Appeal allowed

9–146

The implications of this decision are immense. In a free-market economy it is regarded as acceptable to maximise one’s profits—in short, to make as big a profit as possible. Those making grossly inflated quotations had, in the past, only to contend with the risk of their quotation being rejected. Since this case, the risk of criminal prosecution is a possibility. Again, we are dealing with dubious business practice being criminalised. Rather than continually extending the reaches of the criminal law, it would surely be better here for the victim to resort to civil remedies. More recently, in Greig,³¹⁵ the defendant did £300 worth of gardening work for a 77-year-old man with mental health problems. Two cheques for a total of £5,000 signed by the man were paid into the defendant’s bank account. A further cheque for £1,850 made payable to a co-defendant was returned unpaid by the bank. The Court of Appeal upheld the defendant’s conviction for an offence of fraud by false representation under s.2. The amounts charged by Greig were so far removed from a reasonable charge that the jury were entitled to infer that a dishonest false representation had been made

Of course, “there may be different prices for the same type of work”, and the Fraud Act does not criminalize all bad bargains.³¹⁶ It is important to stress that it is necessary to prove dishonesty before an inflated quotation could give rise to liability. It is highly unlikely that any jury would convict in cases of excessive quotations unless there were some very special circumstances as in Silverman (the taking advantage of a relationship of mutual trust) or Greig (the taking advantage of a vulnerable client).

(d) Cheques: Generally, handing over a signed cheque is an implied representation that the existing state of facts is such that, in the ordinary course of events, when the cheque is presented to the bank it will be honoured.³¹⁷ However, in *United Arab Emirates v Allen*³¹⁸ the defendant had obtained a mortgage from a bank, which was repayable by monthly instalments over 20 years. As security for this loan, she had provided the bank with an undated cheque in a sum approximately equal to the loan amount, which was to be presented for payment by the bank if she defaulted on the mortgage repayments. When the loan repayments were not met, the bank presented the cheque for payment, but it was not honoured because there were insufficient funds in the defendant's account. The Administrative Court refused to accept that in this case the defendant, when she provided the cheque, was making an implied representation that her current financial circumstances were such as to be able to say with confidence that, if the cheque was presented at any stage during the lifetime of the mortgage, it would, "in the ordinary course" be met. In this case, the bank had required the cheque to be provided as security for the loan, in case the mortgage payments were not met at any stage during the 20-year lifetime of the loan.

(e) Cheque cards: The nature of the representation changes when one uses a cheque card to support a cheque. This is because the cheque is bound to be honoured by the bank if certain conditions have been fulfilled and, therefore, the representation made with respect to the cheque is in fact true.

The representation thus is not about the cheque but about the cheque card itself. Issuing a cheque supported by a cheque card is an implied representation by conduct that one has actual authority from the bank to use the card and to contract on behalf of the bank that it will honour the cheque.

(f) Credit and debit cards: Acceptance of a credit card gives rise to a contract between the acceptor and the card-issuing company under which the latter must honour the relevant voucher on presentation. Use of a credit card is thus an implied representation that one has actual authority from the card-issuing company:

1. to use the card to make contracts on behalf of that company;
and
2. to bind the card-issuing company to honour the relevant voucher on presentation.

9–147

So, if a defendant uses a credit or debit card to purchase goods knowing that she lacks the authority to do so—because, for example, she has exceeded her credit limit or because the card is not hers—there is a false representation. It is irrelevant that the trader will in fact be paid.³¹⁹

(g) Insurance: “It is elementary law that a person applying for insurance is obliged to disclose all facts material to be known by the insurer”.³²⁰ An omission to disclose material facts on an application for insurance cover may amount to a false representation. For example, in Martin,³²¹ it was held that the defendant’s failure to inform motor insurers that he was a disqualified driver, when he was applying for car insurance, amounted to a false representation.

(h) Change of circumstances: If a representation, which was true when made, becomes untrue, the failure to reveal the change of circumstances may amount to a false representation. In DPP v Ray,³²² the defendant ordered a meal in a restaurant with the intention of paying for it. He subsequently decided not to pay. It was held that by remaining at the table, without notifying the waiter of his changed intention, he was practising a deception that he still intended to pay. This would now be a false representation. In Rai,³²³ the defendant applied for a council grant for a bathroom for his elderly mother. Before the work was done, his mother died. It was held that his failure to inform the council of the change of circumstances amounted to a deception and would now be a false representation. In these cases, involving a change of circumstances, it could well be that there is a legal duty to disclose the change of circumstances. The defendant in Rai would have been under such a duty. In such cases, the prosecution has a choice whether to charge fraud by false representation or fraud by failing to disclose information (s.3).³²⁴

It is interesting to compare the behaviour in all these cases with that required for theft. We saw earlier that the paradigmatic case of theft involves actions which are objectively inconsistent with the rights of the owner and thus accords with Fletcher's theory of manifest criminality.³²⁵ Fraud, on the other hand, is more indicative of a theory of subjective liability: the actions of the defendant will tend to look innocent, but their state of mind renders them criminal.³²⁶ However, as a result of the case of Gomez, this distinction is all but lost in cases where the false representation leads to the obtaining of property. Such cases, that have all the hallmarks of fraud, may be charged as theft under s.1. One suggestion (prior to the Fraud Act 2006) was that we should regard obtaining by deception as an aggravated form of theft in much the same way as robbery, the aggravating feature being "a feeling of intellectual vulnerability".³²⁷ If this translates into a fear of being made a fool of and distrusting one's own judgment, it is hard to see why this particular feature should be singled out. After all, the employer who employs somebody who subsequently steals from them might feel similarly threatened but may not be able to point to any relevant false representation.

The decisions in Rai and Ray may be contrasted with the decision in Allen.³²⁸ Here the Administrative Court rejected an argument that, after the mortgage advance had been made to the defendant she was under a continuing obligation to provide information about any later change in her financial circumstances, or that, by remaining silent about such a change, there was an implied continuing representation that she would be able to meet the mortgage repayments when they fell due.³²⁹ It has been suggested that the outcome of this case might have been different if the loan had been payable by instalments and the defendant had, "like the defendant in Rai", allowed the bank "to confer a benefit on her after she knew that the situation had changed".³³⁰

Of course, the offence of fraud is much broader than the old offence of obtaining property by deception. There will be instances where nothing is obtained—and nothing appropriated—but the fraud offence is committed by an intention to make a gain or cause a loss.³³¹

2. Fact or law including state of mind

9-149

Section 2(3) provides that a representation means:

“any representation as to fact or law, including a representation as to the state of mind of—(a) the person making the representation, or (b) any other person.”

The inclusion of a representation as to a state of mind is appropriate: the implied representation of the restaurant customer that they intend to pay is just as much a representation as the fact that they have sufficient money to pay. Under the old law, a deception was defined to include “the present intentions” of the person making the representation. This gave rise to some controversy as to whether this included statements of opinion. This problem is solved by the broader formulation in s.2(3) that what is required is a representation as to “the state of mind” of the representor or another person. Whether an opinion is held is a “state of mind”. As a matter of logic, “any representation by a person about their state of mind can only be about their present (or past) state of mind. Their state of mind as to the future can only be a current perception”.³³²

What is the position with advertising “puffs”? Some of these will be representations as to fact, for example, “our make-up will last longer than any others”. Others will be representations as to opinion, for example “as good as a Rolex”. Under the old law of deception, it was widely accepted, that advertising “puffs” would not count as deceptions because potential victims, would, not be, fooled by them. However, under the present law, such exaggerated advertising amounts to a representation either as to fact or as to the state of mind of the advertiser. It must be doubted whether such an expansion of the law is warranted. The CPS has stated:

“Prosecutors should bear in mind that the principle of caveat emptor applies and should consider whether civil proceedings or the regulatory regime that applies to advertising and other commercial activities might be more appropriate. Not every advertising puff should lead to criminal conviction but it is also the case that fraudsters prey on the vulnerable.”³³³

3. Representations to machines

9–150

As seen earlier, a major problem with the old law was that because a machine has no mind, it cannot be deceived.³³⁴ Section 2(5) makes it clear that a representation is made if it is “submitted in any form to any system or device designed to receive, convey or respond to communications (with or without human intervention)”. Thus representations can be made to cash machines, internet service providers, automated call centres and so on.³³⁵ For example, in United States v Sarao,³³⁶ the defendant had used modified computer software to manipulate the price for “E-minis” (futures contracts) on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, by placing multiple, large-volume sale orders (to drive the price down) and then modifying and cancelling these orders before they were executed. It was held that a representation was made by making these online orders.

This provision is not unproblematic. It is not entirely clear when a representation is “submitted”. Ormerod argues that a document could be regarded as submitted when the defendant saves typing on to the hard drive of a computer.³³⁷ The alternative view, however (as he concedes),³³⁸ is that, drawing an analogy with business contracts in e-commerce where the communications only have operative effect when received, “the time of acceptance is when the electronic message was received by the ISP’s network”. However, as only “submission” (and not receipt) is required, it would most likely be regarded as submitted as soon as it is sent. The CPS state that it is uncertain when a submission to a machine takes place: it could be when the card is pushed into the card reader, when the PIN number is typed, or when “enter” is pressed. In cases where the last stage has not been reached, they advise charging attempted theft.³³⁹

In many of these cases, however, the false representation made to a machine will result in the provision of a service and the Law Commission envisaged that such cases would usually be prosecuted as obtaining services dishonestly.³⁴⁰ This offence is discussed below.

4. False

9–151

Section 2(2) provides that a representation is false if it is untrue or misleading.

Whether a representation is true or not is a matter of fact. In many situations, however, a person may make a representation that is largely, but not wholly, true. If I say that my car, which I have driven for five years, has “never given me any trouble” when, in fact, I once had to replace a rear brake light, my representation is literally untrue. There is no requirement that the untrue representation be material or significant. However, in some cases a court may need to consider complex issues of civil law in order to determine whether a representation is true or false. In Cornelius,³⁴¹ a solicitor had acted in eight property sale transactions and had provided bridging loans to the purchasers, which had been repaid out of the mortgage advances. As security for the bridging loans, the defendant required each purchaser to execute a declaration of trust in his favour. The issue was whether the defendant had made a false representation when he had provided a Certificate of Title stating that the property was free from “onerous encumbrances” and that he had no interest in the property as mortgagor. The Court of Appeal held that both of these representations were true. First, the trust deeds executed by the purchasers were not expressed to be by way of security or registered with HM Land Registry, and the defendant was not in actual possession of the property. In these circumstances, the mortgages took priority over the interests created by the trust deeds³⁴² and the mortgagee therefore:

“acquired a good and marketable title free from the interest created by the trust. Even if it could be described as an encumbrance (which is itself doubtful) it could not be described as an ‘onerous’ encumbrance.”³⁴³

Secondly, the statement that the defendant had no interest in the property as mortgagor was also true. The word mortgagor was a technical legal term, meaning “the person who grants the mortgage”.³⁴⁴ In this case, the mortgage had been granted not by the defendant, but by the registered proprietor. The Court of Appeal took the view that it would be wrong to interpret this technical term more widely, given that it was included in a standard form of certificate.³⁴⁵ As there was no false representation, the defendant could not be convicted of the s.2 offences.

9–152

It is important to stress that there must be a causative link between the false representation and the defendant’s intention: the defendant must intend “by making the representation” to make a gain or cause loss.³⁴⁶ So, if the untrue part of the representation relates to a peripheral matter which the defendant thinks will be of no importance to the other, they will not be liable. Also, of course, in cases where the untruth is trivial, dishonesty is unlikely to be established.

Whether a misrepresentation is “misleading” is more difficult. The Government, in enacting this legislation, stated that “misleading” meant “less than wholly true and capable of an interpretation to the detriment of the victim”.³⁴⁷ If I have just had my unreliable car serviced so that, for the moment, it is performing well and, on trying to sell it, I say: “This car is a really good runner”, this is not an untrue statement: at the moment, the car is running well. Whether, however, this statement represents that it has always (or usually) performed well or whether my statement is misleading is more difficult. It is unclear whether the representation must be misleading to the person to whom it is made or misleading to reasonable people. With the emphasis in fraud having shifted away from deception and the effect of the representation on the mind of the victim, it seems that what is required is that the representation be objectively misleading.

The fact that misrepresentations need only be misleading, coupled with the fact that the intention need only be to make a gain for another, can potentially lead to extraordinary results. If I write a reference for a student to obtain a job (a gain for them) and I gloss over their weaknesses and exaggerate their strengths thus creating a misleading picture as to their overall abilities, this is (subject to dishonesty) fraud. It is questionable whether it is appropriate that misleading statements should suffice to make a representation false. Arguably there is a moral distinction between the actions of a person who tells a clear lie and one who is “merely economical with the truth, allowing the hearer to infer facts for which he must take some responsibility”.³⁴⁸

STUART P. GREEN, LYING, CHEATING AND STEALING: A MORAL THEORY
OF WHITE-COLLAR CRIME (2006),
PP.78–80:

9–153

“Merely misleading is less wrongful than lying because what I call the principle of caveat auditor, or ‘listener beware’, applies to cases of merely misleading but does not apply to lying. Like the principle of caveat emptor, which says that a buyer is responsible for assessing the quality of a purchase before buying, the principle of caveat auditor says that, in certain circumstances, a listener is responsible, or partly responsible, for ascertaining that a statement is true before believing it.

When A lies to B, A tells B that she herself believes what she is saying. As a result B is justified in putting her faith in A; B need not be on her guard or question A’s veracity. If A is mistaken about her assertion, then she is wholly responsible for B’s false belief. And if A’s untrue statement has been intentional, it is A who is wholly to blame.

Merely misleading involves a very different dynamic. When A misleads B without making an assertion, she has not told B that she believes what she is saying is true (since what she is saying is neither true nor false). There is thus no warranty of truth that B could rely on ...

Lying and merely misleading can also be distinguished on the grounds that each tends to elicit a different set of ‘emotive reactions’, and cause a different set of harms, to its victims. A victim who is deceived by a non-lie feels foolish and embarrassed, presumably because he believes he has contributed to his own harm by drawing unwarranted inferences from misleading premises. By contrast, a victim of lies is much more likely to feel ‘brutalised’ ... by some external force.”

(b) Mens rea

9–154

The mens rea required for this form of the offence is threefold.

1. Knowledge that the representation is, or might be, untrue or misleading

9–155

The offence is committed not only where the defendant knows that they are making a representation that is untrue but also where they know it might be untrue or misleading. Knowledge includes “wilful blindness”.³⁴⁹

R. V AUGUNAS [2013] EWCA CRIM
2046 AT [9]:

9–156

McCOMBE LJ:

“What is required is that the accused person knows that the representation is, or might be, misleading. It is not enough that a reasonable person might have known this; what matters is the accused person’s actual knowledge. In our judgment, it is not good enough for the prosecutor to satisfy the jury that the accused ought to have appreciated that the representation made by him was or might be untrue or misleading, nor is it enough that the circumstances must have given rise to a reasonable suspicion that the representation was, or might be, untrue or misleading. Of course, if an accused person wilfully shuts his eyes to the obvious doubts as to the genuineness of the misrepresentation that he is making, then he knows that it might be untrue or misleading and he would be guilty of the offence.”

Given that “misleading” is a vague and imprecise term, the potential net of criminal liability is being cast wide by requiring only that a defendant know that a representation might be misleading.

2. Dishonesty

As with theft, where the concept of appropriation is broad and colourless, the requirement of dishonesty will play a crucial role in this offence. The slightest lie for economic purposes satisfies the actus reus of the offence. It is left to the concept of dishonesty to determine which lies are criminal.

The partial definition of dishonesty contained in the Theft Act 1968 s.2 does not apply to the offence of fraud. It is assumed that the test of dishonesty established in Ghosh will be applicable.³⁵⁰ The position was the same with the deception offences prior to the Fraud Act 2006. In Woolven,³⁵¹ the defendant claimed that whilst ordinary people might have found his behaviour dishonest he did not think it was because he was trying to get the money for his employer (to whom he thought the money belonged). The Court of Appeal concluded that it was unnecessary to direct the jury in terms similar to those in s.2(1) (a) relating to a claim of right: a direction based on Ghosh was likely to say everything that was needed. This does not mean, however, that a Ghosh direction has to be given in every case. Indeed, in Price, it was held that it was both unnecessary and potentially misleading in the majority of cases to do so.³⁵² The direction must be given where the defendant “might have believed that what he is alleged to have done was in accordance with the ordinary person’s idea of honesty”.³⁵³

The Law Commission in its Consultation Paper³⁵⁴ suggested that there should be a defence along the lines of the Theft Act 1968 s.2(1)(a) where the defendant has, or believes that they have, a legal right to do what they do. In its final Report this recommendation was abandoned.

THE LAW COMMISSION NO.276,
FRAUD (2002), PARAS 7.66, 7.67, 7.69:

“7.66 We do not therefore recommend that a ‘claim of right’ should be a complete defence to the offence of fraud, nor do we recommend that ‘belief in a claim of right’ should be a complete defence. However, we believe that in the vast majority of such cases the requirements of Ghosh dishonesty will suffice to ensure that justice is done, and that the civil and criminal law are kept closely in line with each other.

7.67 The first limb of the Ghosh test requires the jury to consider, on an objective basis, whether the defendant's actions were dishonest. If the defendant may have believed that she had a legal right to act as she did, it will usually follow that the jury will be unable to conclude that they are sure that she was dishonest, on an objective basis ...

7.69 We think it likely that using the Ghosh approach as a means of analysing cases of 'belief in a claim of right' would ensure that defendants who genuinely believe that they have a claim of right will be acquitted. However, it would not operate as an automatic and complete defence as it does to theft by reason of section 2(1)(a) of the Theft Act 1968. We believe that this is right, as a matter of policy, not only because we are seeking to ensure that the criminal law is not tied to the civil law, but also because there may be cases where a belief in a claim of right should not lead to an acquittal. For example a 'Robin Hood' defendant could seek to exploit legal 'loopholes' in order to redistribute property in a way, not amounting to theft, which she believes to be morally right, but which she knows most reasonable, honest people would consider dishonest. She may then argue that she genuinely believed that she had a legal right to act as she did, despite knowing that most reasonable, honest people would categorise her actions as dishonest. If there were a complete 'belief in a claim of right' defence, such a defendant would have to be acquitted. Under the Ghosh test, however, it would be for the jury to decide whether her exploitation of legal loopholes was in fact dishonest, on the ordinary standards of reasonable, honest people."

9-159

It is likely, however, that the concept of dishonesty in fraud will have a more important role than it had in the deception offences. With the deception offences, the defendant had to practice a deception and obtain something as a result. Where a lie led to the obtaining of, say, property, it was difficult for the concept of dishonesty to have any role in cases other than a claim of right. Fraud is, however, a much broader offence. Nothing need be obtained. All that is required is an intention to make a gain (or cause a loss) and, as we shall see, "gain" includes "keeping what one has". So, for example, if one tells a charity collector with a tin on the street, “Sorry, but I have no loose change” (when one does have loose change), this satisfies all the other elements of the offence. It is a false representation made with a view to gain. In such cases, all the real work will be left to the concept of dishonesty to distinguish between harmless lies and the serious offence of fraud. Similarly, an undercover journalist (falsely representing their identity) could act with a view to exposing another and causing them a loss. Commenting on such cases, and rejecting a possible defence of public interest, the Law Commission said: “If no moral obloquy can attach to the defendant’s conduct, the fact-finders are unlikely to be satisfied that it was dishonest”.³⁵⁵

With theft, dishonesty performs a positive role. As seen, particularly after Gomez and Hinks, it is an inculpatory requirement. It is what can render otherwise innocent conduct criminal. With the offence of fraud, however, it has a negative or exculpatory role. As there must be a false representation, it is in fewer cases that the conduct would not automatically be regarded as dishonest. Accordingly, the Law Commission in its Consultation Paper³⁵⁶ recommended abolishing the dishonesty requirement and replacing it with specific defences, for example, that the defendant believed that they were legally entitled to the property. However, in its final Report³⁵⁷ the Law Commission was persuaded by the view of Tur that “what may constitute a just excuse is so context-dependent that exhaustive definition must necessarily limit the range of circumstances which might exist”.³⁵⁸ Accordingly, the requirement of dishonesty as a negative requirement for fraud offences remains.

3. Intention to make gain or cause loss

9–160

For the repealed deception offences, causation had to be established. The deception had to cause the other to part with property, etc. One of the reasons for the enactment of the new offence of fraud was to dispense with this requirement and all its associated problems. Accordingly, it is not necessary that the victim believe the false representation. However, s.2(1) (b) requires that the defendant “intends, by making the representation” to make a gain for themselves or another, to cause a loss to another, or to expose another to a risk of loss.³⁵⁹ So, if a street trader advertises a T-shirt “As worn by Beyoncé” they would not expect anyone actually to believe such a claim which is probably being made simply to attract attention. They would not intend that by making that representation they would make a gain. This provision is the distinguishing feature of the offence of fraud and is what transforms a lie into a criminal offence.

FRAUD ACT 2006 S.5:

9-161

“(1) The references to gain and loss in sections 2 to 4 are to be read in accordance with this section.

(2) ‘Gain’ and ‘loss’—

(a) extend only to gain or loss in money or other property;

(b) include any such gain or loss whether temporary or permanent;

and ‘property’ means any property whether real or personal (including things in action and other intangible property).

(3) ‘Gain’ includes a gain by keeping what one has, as well as a gain by getting what one does not have.

(4) ‘Loss’ includes a loss by not getting what one might get, as well as a loss by parting with what one has.”

9-162

This is extremely broad.³⁶⁰ If a defendant makes a false representation so that a rich person will take them to an expensive restaurant, they intend to make a gain for themselves of the food. It is clear mislabelling to describe such conduct as fraud—and highly dubious whether such actions should be criminalised at all.

In 2009, a defendant was prosecuted for fraud when she used a false address to apply for a place for her son at a popular primary school. The prosecution was abandoned because she had not intended to make a gain or cause a loss in money or other property. A school place is not “money or other property”.³⁶¹

It is not necessary that the defendant intend any gain for themselves. It is enough that they intend a gain for another, intend to cause a loss to another, or to expose another to a risk of loss. For example, if a defendant spreads malicious rumours that their enemy’s company is in dire straits hoping that the value of its shares will fall, they have acted with intent to cause loss—even though they have no intention to buy the shares at the reduced price.

Unlike theft, it is not necessary that the defendant intend to make a permanent gain. So, if a student falsely tells me that this book is currently out-of-stock and not available in the library and asks to borrow the book from me for a few hours, the elements of the offence (subject to dishonesty) are made out. Again, it must be questioned whether such “white lies” deserve criminalisation.

LAW COMMISSION NO.276, FRAUD (2002), PARAS 7.54–7.55:

9–163

“7.54 Arguably the full offence should not be committed unless the defendant has succeeded in actually causing a loss or making a gain: where the defendant has acted with intent to cause loss or make a gain, but that intent has been frustrated, a conviction of attempt would adequately reflect the criminality of the defendant’s conduct. It may sometimes be debatable, however, whether a loss has actually been caused or a gain made, whilst it is clear beyond doubt that the defendant intended to bring about one or both of these outcomes. We think it would be unfortunate if, in such a case, it had to be determined whether there had in fact been gain or loss within the meaning of the Act, when that question had little bearing on the gravity of the defendant’s conduct or the appropriate sentence ... [I]t should be sufficient if the defendant acts with intent to make a gain or to cause a loss.

7.55 In the light of this conclusion we have considered whether it should be possible to prosecute for an attempt to commit the new offence ... Under our recommendations there would be no need to charge an attempt in these cases, because the defendant would be guilty of the full offence.”

9–164

The approach shifts the focus away from the “victim” and effectively adopts an inchoate model of liability with the emphasis on the “anti-social” conduct of the defendant. One way of rationalising this approach is that liability should not depend on whether the so-called victims suffer harm to their “net wealth” but on whether their autonomy to direct their assets, without being influenced by another’s fraud, has been infringed.³⁶² The interest the law is seeking to protect is commercial freedom and the defendant is seen as threatening this interest.

(ii) Fraud by failing to disclose information FRAUD ACT 2006 s.3:

9–165

“A person is in breach of this section if he—

- (a) dishonestly fails to disclose to another person information which he is under a legal duty to disclose, and
- (b) intends, by failing to disclose the information—
 - (i) to make a gain for himself or another, or
 - (ii) to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss.”

9–166

There is a significant overlap between this method of committing fraud and that under s.2. In many cases where a defendant breaches a legal duty to disclose information, they can be regarded as making a false implied representation.

There must be a legal duty to disclose. The Law Commission Report and the Home Office Consultation both proposed that this form of the offence should also extend to cases where there is no legal duty to disclose but where three conditions were satisfied:

“The information is of a kind which the person trusts the defendant to disclose to him;

The defendant knows the other person is trusting him to disclose information or is ‘aware that he might be’; and

Any reasonable person would expect the defendant to disclose the information to the other person.”³⁶³

This additional proposal was eventually abandoned by the Government for the following reasons.

HOME OFFICE, FRAUD LAW REFORM:
GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO CONSULTATIONS (2004), PARAS 22– 25:

9–167

“22. The point of controversy was the proposal that this offence should extend to situations where a person dishonestly fails to disclose information which he is under no legal duty to disclose, but which the other person trusts him to disclose. There was substantial opposition to this proposal. One of the main arguments was that this would intrude on the caveat emptor principle, and create a conflict between civil and criminal law, in that it would become criminal not to provide information which you are entitled to withhold under civil law ... [T]his result would be ‘bizarre’ ...

23. The other main objection was the lack of certainty ... [I]t will be necessary to make a judgement in each cases as to whether the ‘victim’ is trusting the defendant to disclose the information. The example of a person selling a car who does not reveal that he has successfully camouflaged some damage to the bodywork with filler is one example presented to us of a situation where it is arguable that the purchaser trusts a disclosure to be made, but consensus is lacking and it will be hard to say where the line should be drawn. It was pointed out that this is a problem not only for juries but for police in deciding what to investigate. It was argued that the conduct ... may be dishonest and morally reprehensible, but that does not mean it should be criminal.

24. Others argued against this that if the offence is restricted to situations where there is already a legal duty to provide information ... criminal prosecutions may then hinge on civil arguments about whether the duty exists ...

25. ... [It] should not be fraud unless (inter alia) a legal duty is breached. In particular, we share concerns over extending the criminal law into areas where something may be morally dubious, but not clearly seen as criminal.”

(a) Actus reus

9–168

The defendant must fail to disclose to another person information which they are under a legal duty to disclose.

The legal duty may arise from statute, from the express or implied terms of a contract,³⁶⁴ from the custom of a particular trade or market,³⁶⁵ or from the existence of a fiduciary relationship between the parties.³⁶⁶

For example, in Rasoq,³⁶⁷ a hospital doctor had been excluded and suspended from work pending disciplinary proceedings. He then signed up with a number of locum agencies to obtain work as a physician, but did not disclose his exclusion. The Court of Appeal held that the evidence was “overwhelming” that the defendant was legally bound to inform these agencies of his exclusion.³⁶⁸ Section 3 could also have been charged in the case of Twaite,³⁶⁹ where an RAF officer obtained service family accommodation by falsely stating on a form that he was married, and lived there for almost a year, in breach of service regulations and without saying anything to the RAF, before he finally did get married. Whether there is a legal duty to disclose is not always a clear-cut matter and it is likely that the criminal courts will have to grapple with intricate questions of civil law. For example, in certain areas of social security law there has been a dispute as to the nature of any obligation to disclose matters relating to entitlement to benefit, there being controversy over whether certain obligations to disclose are moral or legal obligations.³⁷⁰

As with theft, the relationship between the civil and criminal law can be problematic.

(b) Mens rea

9–169

The defendant must act dishonestly and intend to make a gain for themselves or another, or to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss. These requirements are discussed above.³⁷¹

The section is silent as to whether the defendant must know (or believe or suspect) that they are under a legal duty to disclose. Presumably, if the defendant has no idea that they are under a legal duty to disclose, dishonesty would be unlikely to be established.

(iii) Fraud by Abuse of Position FRAUD ACT 2006 s.4:

9–170

“(1) A person is in breach of this section if he—

- (a) occupies a position in which he is expected to safeguard, or not to act against, the financial interests of another person,
- (b) dishonestly abuses that position, and
- (c) intends, by means of the abuse of that position—
 - (i) to make a gain for himself or another, or
 - (ii) to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss.

(2) A person may be regarded as having abused his position even though his conduct consisted of an omission rather than an act.”

The Law Commission had proposed that secrecy be an element of this offence. This proposal was abandoned by the Government.

HOME OFFICE, FRAUD LAW REFORM:
GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO

CONSULTATIONS (2004), PARA.28:

9–171

“[S]ecrecy is a ‘hallmark’ of fraud, as one of our respondents put it. It was accepted that an open abuse is no less reprehensible than a secret abuse, but while an open abuse might be rightly subject to sanction, the argument was that it should not fall under the criminal law of fraud. A secrecy requirement helps separate fraud from other offences (e.g. blackmail) and matters better dealt with under civil law. However some were concerned that, while secrecy would almost invariably be part of the offending behaviour in practice, it was difficult to define and represented an unnecessary complication, which could lead to technical arguments in court. There could be arguments about whether there had been an intention to disclose in the future, and about whether the employer knew what was going on, if a surveillance operation was in place. It was argued that the mischief lay in the dishonest abuse and that the value-laden concepts of ‘dishonesty’ and ‘abuse’ were sufficient in themselves to set the parameters for the offence.”

(a) Actus reus

9–172

There must be an abuse of a position of trust.

1. Abuse

9–173

No definition of “abuse” is provided other than that the conduct may consist of an omission rather than an act. In Pennock and Pennock, the Court of Appeal stated that:

“A good working meaning might be: ‘uses incorrectly’ or ‘puts to improper use’ the position held in a manner that is contrary to the expectation that arises because of that position.”³⁷²

In that case, the defendants had removed £100,000 from a joint bank account in the names of Mr Pennock and the complainant, without the permission of the complainant. On appeal, the convictions were quashed because Mr Pennock, as one of the joint account holders, had authority to withdraw money from the account. No further permission was required from the other account holder. There had therefore been no abuse of position. There could be an abuse where, for example, an employee passes confidential information about the business of their employer to a commercial rival,³⁷³ or omits to take up a chance of a crucial contract, intending to enable an associate to pick up the contract instead.³⁷⁴ This section has been used to prosecute employees who steal from their employers by writing out company cheques in their own favour,³⁷⁵ or divert money held in client accounts,³⁷⁶ or which is due to their employer³⁷⁷ into their own bank accounts. It may also be used to prosecute company directors or employees who take secret profits at the expense of a company or employer.³⁷⁸ Obviously, the mens rea requirement that the abuse be dishonest and with the intention of making a gain or causing a loss will limit what can count as an abuse. So, the lazy or incompetent employee who abuses their position (in ordinary language terms) by not bothering to make required phone calls to secure customers will not fall within this provision unless the failure to make the calls is considered dishonest and there was the requisite intent to make a gain or cause a loss. It is likely that all the real work here will be done by the mens rea requirement and so, like appropriation, “abuse” will become a neutral or colourless concept always satisfied if the requisite mens rea is present.

2. Position

9–174

The statute does not use the phrase “position of trust”. Instead, the requisite position is defined as existing when a person “occupies a position in which he is expected to safeguard, or not to act against, the financial interests of another person”.

THE LAW COMMISSION NO.276, FRAUD (2002), PARAS 7.37, 7.38:

9–175

“7.37 The essence of the kind of relationship which in our view should be a prerequisite of this form of the offence is that the victim has voluntarily put the defendant in a privileged position, by virtue of which the defendant is expected to safeguard the victim's financial interests or given power to damage those interests. Such an expectation to safeguard or power to damage may arise, for example, because the defendant is given authority to exercise a discretion on the victim's behalf, or is given access to the victim's assets, premises, equipment or customers. In these cases the defendant does not need to enlist the victim's further co-operation in order to secure the desired result, because the necessary cooperation has been given in advance.

7.38 The necessary relationship will be present between trustee and beneficiary, director and company, professional person and client, agent and principal, employee and employer, or between partners. It may arise otherwise, for example within a family, or in the context of voluntary work, or in any context where the parties are not at arm's length. In nearly all cases where it arises, it will be recognised by the civil law as importing fiduciary duties, and any relationship that is so recognised will suffice. We see no reason, however, why the existence of such duties should be essential. This does not of course mean that it would be entirely a matter for the fact-finders whether the necessary relationship exists. The question whether the particular facts alleged can properly be described as giving rise to that relationship will be an issue capable of being ruled upon by the judge and, if the case goes to the jury, of being the subject of directions.”

9–176

Section 4 extends beyond fiduciary duties³⁷⁹ and, as stated in the above extract, may arise in family and other voluntary arrangements. Such matters, extending beyond the ambit of the civil law, will create immense difficulties for judges and juries and “open up the possibility that all sorts of trivial civil law contractual disputes become the subject of prosecution”.³⁸⁰

THE CROWN PROSECUTION SERVICE,
THE FRAUD ACT 2006: LEGAL GUIDANCE (2008), PP.16–17:

9–177

“Examples of the type of conduct that would give rise to a charge under Section 4 are:

- an employee of a software company who uses his position to clone software products with the intention of selling the products on his own behalf;
- where a person is employed to care for an elderly or disabled person and has access to that person’s bank account but abuses that position by removing funds for his own personal use.³⁸¹ (This may also be theft ...)
- an Attorney who removes money from the grantor’s accounts for his own use. The Power of Attorney allows him to do so but when excessive this will be capable of being an offence under Section 4;
- an employee who fails to take up the chance of a crucial contract in order that an associate or rival company can take it up instead;
- an employee who abuses his position in order to grant contracts or discounts to friends, relatives and associates³⁸²;
- a waiter who sells his own bottles of wine passing them off as belonging to the restaurant; ...
- a tradesman who helps an elderly person with odd jobs, gains influence over that person and removes money from their account. (This may also be theft ...)
- the person entrusted to purchase lottery tickets on behalf of others³⁸³ ... , this will probably be theft as well.”

9–178

The position must be one in which the defendant is expected to safeguard, etc the financial interests of another person. Expected by whom? The particular victim? The defendant? The reasonable person? In Valujevs,³⁸⁴ it was alleged that the defendants had abused their position as unlicensed gang-masters by making unwarranted fines and deductions from workers’ legitimate earnings, and by charging grossly excessive rental payments. On appeal, the issue was whether the defendants had a position of trust sufficient to bring their relationship with their workers within s.4. The Court of Appeal took the view that s.4 was not restricted to cases in which a fiduciary duty was owed to the victim:

“It is clear from the wording that Parliament did not intend to restrict the operation of the section to those situations in which the defendant owes a fiduciary duty to the alleged victim, not least because this result could readily have been secured by appropriate drafting.”³⁸⁵

The Court of Appeal ruled that the “expectation” in section 4 of the 2006 Act is an objective one, based on the position of a reasonable person:

“It is for the judge to assess whether the position held by the individual is capable of being one ‘in which he is expected to safeguard, or not to act against, the financial interests of another person’. If it is so capable, it will be for the jury thereafter to determine whether or not they are sure that was the case. It would be untenable to suggest that the expectation should be that of either the potential victim (the test would, in all likelihood, be too low) or the defendant (the test is likely to be set too high). Therefore, this is an objective test based on the position of the reasonable person.”³⁸⁶

In relation to the type of duty that has to be shown by the prosecution, the Court of Appeal stated that they had to:

“demonstrate a breach of a fiduciary duty, or a breach of an obligation that is akin to a fiduciary duty. This can conveniently be described, for instance, as a breach of trust or a breach of a privileged position in relation to the financial interests of another person.”³⁸⁷

However, they made it clear that section 4 should not apply in “the general commercial area where individuals and businesses compete in markets of one kind or another, including labour markets, and are entitled to and expected to look after their own interests”,³⁸⁸ expressing the view that the section does not apply “to those who simply supply accommodation, goods, services or labour, whether on favourable or unfavourable terms and whether or not they have a stronger bargaining position”.³⁸⁹

(b) Mens rea

The defendant must dishonestly abuse the position and must intend, through that abuse, to make a gain for herself or another or to cause a loss to another, or to expose another to a risk of loss. These matters were discussed earlier.³⁹⁰

There is no express requirement that the defendant must know that they occupy a position of trust whereby they are expected to safeguard, etc the financial interests of another person. Liability on this issue would appear to be strict. However, it will be very difficult to establish dishonesty without such knowledge.

2. Offences ancillary to fraud

9–180

The Fraud Act 2006 creates two ancillary offences to fraud. First, there is the offence of possession of articles for use in frauds³⁹¹ (punishable with a maximum of five years' imprisonment). Secondly, there is the offence of making or supplying articles for use in frauds³⁹² (punishable with a maximum of ten years' imprisonment).

3. Obtaining services dishonestly

9–181

Under the Theft Act 1978 s.1, it was an offence to obtain services by deception. This covered situations where someone was deceived into providing a service rather than parting with property. For example, someone could be induced to mow a lawn or provide a ride in a taxi by being falsely told they would be paid. Owing to the problems involved with the concept of "deception", particularly in relation to machines, this offence is now replaced by a new offence of obtaining services dishonestly.

FRAUD ACT 2006 s.11:

9–182

“(1) A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he obtains services for himself or another—

(a) by a dishonest act, and

- (b) in breach of subsection (2).
- (2) A person obtains services in breach of this subsection if—
- (a) they are made available on the basis that payment has been, is being or will be made for or in respect of them,
 - (b) he obtains them without any payment having been made for or in respect of them or without payment having been made in full, and
 - (c) when he obtains them, he knows—
 - (i) that they are being made available on the basis described in paragraph (a), or
 - (ii) that they might be,
- but intends that payment will not be made, or will not be made in full.”

The offence is punishable by a maximum of ten years' imprisonment.³⁹³ The CPS has indicated that on average between 305 and 446 charges per year are brought for this offence.³⁹⁴

THE LAW COMMISSION NO.276, FRAUD (2002), PARAS 8.1–8.2:

9–183

“8.1 Because it requires proof of deception, the offence under section 1 of the 1978 Act fails to catch a person who succeeds in obtaining a service dishonestly but without deceiving anyone. This may happen in various ways ...

(2) The service may not be provided for the defendant personally, but for anyone who is there to receive it. For example, the defendant climbs over the fence of a football ground and watches the match without paying the admission charge.

(3) The service may not be provided directly by people at all, but through a machine. For example, the defendant downloads, via the internet, software or data for which a charge is made, or which is available only to those within a certain category of person who have paid to be included within that category, by giving false credit card or identification details; or receives satellite television transmissions by using an unauthorised validation card in a decoder.³⁹⁵

(4) Some cases are a hybrid of types (2) and (3). For example, the defendant gives false credit card details to an automated booking system, or tenders a forged or stolen credit card to an electronic vending machine, and thus obtains a ticket for a journey or entertainment. There is no deception of the booking system (because it is not a person), nor of the staff who check the tickets of the passengers or audience (because the staff are only interested in whether each person has a ticket, not how they got it).”

9-184

Many of the examples provided in this extract would fall under the new offence of fraud (by false representation). The defendant is making a false representation (for example, false credit card details) and is thereby obtaining a service. The Law Commission felt, however, that the new offence was necessary to cover all such cases of obtaining services whether false information was provided or not.

THE LAW COMMISSION NO.276,
FRAUD (2002), PARAS 8.4–8.5:

9-185

“8.4 ... We are persuaded that we should tackle the problem head on ... [W]here a person dishonestly obtains a service by giving false information to a machine, the gravamen of that person’s conduct is not the provision of the false information but the taking of a valuable benefit without paying for it.

8.5 Suppose, for example, that an internet website offers valuable information to subscribers, who are supposed to gain access to the information by giving their password. If a non-subscriber dishonestly downloads the information, it hardly matters whether she does so by giving the password of a genuine subscriber (and thus impliedly representing herself to be that subscriber) or by somehow bypassing the password screen altogether. To distinguish between these two situations would be like distinguishing between the person who puts a foreign coin into a vending machine and the one who gets at the contents by opening up the machine with a screwdriver, on the basis that the former makes a ‘misrepresentation’ to the machine (that the coin is legal tender) whereas the latter does not. This would be absurd. Both are guilty of stealing the contents. Equally, in our view, a person who ‘steals’ a service should be guilty of an offence, whether it is obtained by providing false information or in any other way.”

9–186

Recognising the overlap with fraud, the Law Commission stated it:

“would expect prosecutors to use [the offence of obtaining services dishonestly] against defendants who have obtained services from machines, even if such defendants have done so by providing false information and might arguably be guilty of the fraud offence as well.”³⁹⁶

(i) Actus reus

(a) Act

9–187

The requirement that there be an “act” is designed to ensure that the offence cannot be committed by omission alone. So, if services were not requested there is no offence to refuse payment.³⁹⁷ The Law Commission give the example of a person who innocently happened to be on a boat and, despite hearing an announcement that anyone who had not paid for the next trip should disembark, remained on the boat and received a free ride. Such a person would not come within the ambit of the offence.³⁹⁸

(b) Obtains

9–188

Unlike the general offence of fraud, this offence is not inchoate in character. An actual obtaining of the service is required. Causation must be established.

(c) Services

9–189

“Services” is undefined other than that it must be something that is made available on the basis that it has been, is being, or will be, paid for. Any act done on the understanding that it will be paid for amounts to a service. For example, in Widdowson,³⁹⁹ it was held that obtaining a van on hire-purchase was obtaining services.

THE CROWN PROSECUTION SERVICE, THE FRAUD ACT 2006 LEGAL GUIDANCE (2008), P.25:

9–190

“Section 11 will cover circumstances where the Defendant:

- obtains chargeable data or software over the internet without paying;
- orders a meal in a restaurant knowing he has no means to pay;
- attaches a decoder to his TV to enable him to access chargeable satellite services without paying;
- uses the services of a members’ club without paying and without being a member.”

9–191

It is irrelevant that the service is obtained pursuant to an illegal or otherwise unenforceable contract. So, for example, a man who, without intending to pay, induces a prostitute to provide sexual services is liable even though the contract is illegal and unenforceable.⁴⁰⁰

What is the position if the services amount to a criminal offence? Under the Theft Act 1978, “services” were defined as involving the conferring of a “benefit”.⁴⁰¹ No such requirement is specified here. Accordingly, it could be argued that if a 17-year-old dishonestly induces another into tattooing them, there would be liability. Under the 1978 Act, it was likely that there would be no liability in such a scenario because the offence in question (under the Tattooing of Minors Act 1969) was designed to protect them and so there would be no benefit to them.⁴⁰² The better view, however, is that there should be no liability in such cases. For example, if a gangster induces a “hit-man” to kill another by falsely promising payment, it would be absurd to assert that the gangster obtained services dishonestly—quite apart from the obvious point that the gangster would be guilty of far more serious offences. The purpose of this offence is to protect persons from wasting their labour which, like property, has intrinsic economic value. It is not the purpose of the law to protect those, like the “hit-man”, who devote their labour and time to the commission of criminal offences.

(d) Without payment

9–192

The section only applies to those services induced on the understanding that they will be paid for. Thus, the more effective one’s lies, the less the chance of liability here. If one’s dishonesty is so convincing that a service is provided free, there is no liability.

What is meant by “paid for” here? One view is that it extends to recompense in forms other than money.⁴⁰³ The better view is that the criminal law should not extend its reach into noncommercial, perhaps purely social, transactions, such as where a person induces another into fixing a broken tap by falsely stating that, in return, dinner will be cooked for the tap-mender.

One of the examples given in the Law Commission extract above of when this offence will apply is where false credit card details are given to an automated booking system. It would appear, however, that the offence will not actually cover such conduct. Provided the card details (PIN and security number, etc) are correct, payment will be made by the bank or issuing company.⁴⁰⁴ Such conduct will, however, be covered by the fraud offence under s.2.

(ii) Mens rea

9–193

The mens rea requirements of s.11 are as follows.

(a) Dishonesty

9–194

The act leading to the obtaining of the services must be dishonest. Again, the partial definition of dishonesty in the Theft Act 1978 s.2 does not apply and whether the act is dishonest will be governed by the Ghosh test.

(b) Knowing payment required

9–195

At the time when the services are obtained, the defendant must know that the services are made available on the basis that payment has been, is being or will be made for or in respect of them or that they might only be available on that basis.

(c) Intention not to pay

9–196

The defendant must intend that payment will not be made, or that it will not be made in full. So, if the defendant is uncertain whether the services have been paid for (say, because they think another person might have already paid for them), there will be no liability. Recklessness will not suffice.

4. Conspiracy to defraud

9–197

The Law Commission proposed abolition of this offence as did the Home Office Consultation Paper on Fraud. This proposal was not, however, implemented on the basis that changing the law could lead to unforeseen circumstances with the developing technologies enabling fraudsters to exploit gaps in the law. Accordingly, to provide a “safety net”,⁴⁰⁵ the rather broad and unsatisfactory offence of conspiracy to defraud still remains. The Government stated that it was committed to a review of the operation of the Fraud Act 2006 three years after its implementation and that it might at that point abolish the offence of conspiracy to defraud.⁴⁰⁶ However, in its 2012 post-legislative assessment of the Fraud Act 2006, the Ministry of Justice concluded that the offence should be retained because it:

“continues to be an effective and essential tool in combating fraud. This is particularly pertinent where there are various levels of criminal activity involved and the court would not otherwise be aware of the full extent of criminality involved.”⁴⁰⁷

This offence was discussed in Ch.5.

IV. Making Off Without Payment

A. INTRODUCTION

9–198

We have already examined the general rule that the criminal law does not punish non-payment of debt even when dishonest, unless there has been a fraud, usually by means of a false representation. It is the dishonest false representation in securing such non-payment that marks conduct out as deserving of criminal liability.

However, in certain situations where debts have been incurred, such as at restaurants, hotels and petrol stations, it has been felt necessary to criminalise dishonest avoidance of payment even in the absence of a false representation. This is because of problems of law enforcement. Normally in contractual situations the identity of the other person is known (or where it is not, as in contracts in shops, a charge of theft will often be possible) and, therefore, it is appropriate to leave remedies to the civil law. However, in restaurants or petrol stations, for example, debts are incurred by anonymous debtors in circumstances where a charge of theft is not possible because property might have passed prior to the appropriation. Accordingly, a special criminal offence has been created to deal with such situations.

B. THE LAW

THEFT ACT 1978 S.3:

9–199

“(1) Subject to subsection (3) below, a person who, knowing that payment on the spot for any goods supplied or service done is required or expected from him, dishonestly makes off without having paid as required or expected and with intent to avoid payment of the amount due shall be guilty of an offence.

(2) For purposes of this section ‘payment on the spot’ includes payment at the time of collecting goods on which work has been done or in respect of which service has been provided.

(3) Subsection (1) above shall not apply where the supply of the goods or the doing of the service is contrary to law, or where the service done is such that payment is not legally enforceable.”

9–200

Strange though it may seem to start with a list of what does not have to be proved under this section, it is, nevertheless, a useful way of proceeding. Thus, one does not need to determine whether or not property has passed; one does not need to establish a false representation at any stage of the conduct and, finally, one does not have to show dishonesty any earlier than at the time of making off.

1. Actus reus

(i) Makes off

9–201

In Brooks,⁴⁰⁸ the court said that making off “may be an exercise accompanied by the sound of trumpets or a silent stealing away after the folding of tents”. In more prosaic words, there is no need for the leaving to be done by stealth. All that making off requires is that the defendant leave the place where payment is required for another place. So, if a dissatisfied diner openly storms out of a restaurant without paying, they clearly “make off”. (Criminal liability in such a case would turn on whether their actions were regarded as dishonest.) It would appear to be irrelevant that the defendant has the victim’s consent to their leaving, whether it is obtained by false representation (for example, pretending that payment has already been made) or not (for example, leaving a name and address). In both cases, the defendant “makes off” but, again, criminal liability will depend on other elements of the crime such as dishonesty or, in the case of the name and address being left, whether payment was expected on the spot.

(ii) The spot

9-202

What constitutes the “spot” is a matter of some importance: it will determine whether the defendant can be charged with the full offence or only with an attempt. If the spot is deemed to be the premises, as is likely, for example, in the case of leaving a restaurant without paying, then the offence is only committed when the defendant has left the premises. So, in McDavitt,⁴⁰⁹ where the spot was held to be the restaurant, the defendant, who was apprehended as he made for the door, could only be convicted of attempting to make off without payment.

(iii) Goods supplied or service done

9-203

In order to understand the phrase “goods supplied” four situations may be compared. In the first, the defendant drives into a petrol station and fills his tank with petrol. He then decides not to pay and makes off. The defendant had “goods supplied” to him and will be liable under s.3. In the second situation, the defendant takes goods from a shelf in a supermarket and then leaves without paying. The supermarket, by displaying the goods, can be regarded as having “supplied” them and, accordingly, the defendant can be liable under s.3.⁴¹⁰ In the third situation, the defendant walks into a non-self-service shop and asks for and receives a pack of cigarettes.

He then walks off without paying and is again liable under s.3 because he has had “goods supplied” to him. In the fourth situation, the defendant leans over the counter and helps himself to the cigarettes. If the defendant makes off without paying he cannot be liable under s.3 because he has not had “goods supplied” to him.

Neither the term “goods” nor “service” is defined by s.3, but it seems unlikely that this omission will lead to practical difficulties. Just as the goods must be “supplied”, so the service must be “done”. Clearest examples of this will be the meal provided in a restaurant or the accommodation provided by a hotel, but it would also seem broad enough to cover the defendant who parks his car in someone's car park, thereby taking up the offer to do so.

(iv) Without having paid

9–204

In practice, the main area likely to cause difficulties here is in relation to payment by dud cheques. The issue is whether such cheques are to be regarded as payment or not. Various views have been expressed about this. On the one hand, it is argued that such payment is not “as required or expected”⁴¹¹ and should not, therefore, be regarded as payment. The other view is that such cheques should be regarded as payment because they conditionally discharge the defendant's liability to pay (although this does not apply to forged cheques because they do not amount to such a conditional discharge of liability).⁴¹²

With payment by improperly-used credit or debit cards, provided the required information (PIN, etc.) has been supplied, the bank or issuing-company is bound to pay the victim and so the defendant cannot be liable for this offence.

(v) As required or expected

9–205

The only situation likely to cause a problem here is where payment is normally required or expected at a certain time but the creditor, because of a deception, agrees to accept payment at a later time. In Vincent,⁴¹³ the proprietors of hotels agreed to accept postponed payment at a time later than normally required or expected. It was held to be irrelevant that they had only agreed to this because of the defendant's dishonest deception. Section 3 creates a “simple and straightforward offence”. Payment was not required or expected at the usual time. The reasons were irrelevant. Where the consent of the supplier to postponement of payment is obtained by deception, then the debtor would be guilty of fraud by misrepresentation (the Fraud Act 2006 s.2) if he was dishonest and intended by making the misrepresentation to gain or to cause loss.

(vi) Unenforceable debts

9–206

Making off without payment will not be an offence where the payment is legally unenforceable or the supply of goods or services is contrary to law. The defendant who leaves a prostitute without paying commits no offence under s.3. In Troughton,⁴¹⁴ a taxi driver had agreed to take the defendant, who was very drunk, to his home in Highbury. The defendant had not told the driver his actual address, and the driver had to stop to obtain directions from him. There was then an argument, and the defendant accused the driver of making an unnecessary diversion. Eventually, as he was unable to obtain an address, the taxi driver drove to the police station. On appeal, it was held that Troughton was not guilty of the s.3 offence because he was never in a situation in which he was bound to pay the money for the taxi fare. By driving to the police station, the driver had breached his contract with the defendant to take him to his home. As a result of this breach of contract, the driver was not lawfully entitled to demand the fare.

2. Mens rea

9–207

The mens rea required under s.3 is: that the defendant must know that payment on the spot is required and must make off dishonestly with intent to avoid payment.

It is clear that there has to be an intention to make permanent default.⁴¹⁵

3. Punishment

9–208

The maximum penalty for an offence under s.3 is two years' imprisonment.⁴¹⁶ A Penalty Notice for Disorder cannot be issued in respect of this offence.⁴¹⁷

V. Other Property Offences

9–209

There are a large number of other property offences, some serious like blackmail, robbery, burglary, criminal damage and handling stolen goods and some not so serious, like taking a conveyance. Whilst it is beyond the scope of this book to deal with all these offences in detail, the chief provisions of some of these offences will be sketched.

A. SOCIOLOGICAL BACKGROUND

9–210

Robbery is regarded as the most serious because it is not only a property offence, but also an offence of violence. Robberies, which account for 3% of recorded crime,⁴¹⁸ range from professional armed robberies on banks and the causing of serious injury to relatively minor street “muggings” where the victim is threatened with a punch if they do not hand over some money or a mobile phone.

In 2015/16, there were 53,245 recorded robbery offences in England and Wales, a decrease of 30% compared with 2010/11.⁴¹⁹ 11,133 of these offences involved a knife or sharp instrument.⁴²⁰ Apart from a rise in the number of robberies in 2005/06 and 2006/07, there has been a general downward trend in recorded robbery offences between 2002 and 2016.⁴²¹ In spite of the seriousness of this offence, the CSEW statistics suggest that less than half of all robberies are reported to the police.⁴²²

The other major property offence that is the subject of much media attention is burglary, which in 2015/16, accounted for 14% of CSEW property crime.⁴²³ This is a crime that has high levels of reporting, because insurance claims cannot be made until the crime has been reported to the police.⁴²⁴

The threat of burglary has been a particular source of anxiety in the past, but the level of worry has reduced considerably over the past decade. In 1998, 19% of adults indicated they had “high levels of worry” about burglary, but by 2012 this had fallen to 12%.⁴²⁵ This drop in anxiety is most likely caused by the fact that people are much less likely to be victims of burglary than they were ten years ago. Between 1995 and 2015/16, for example, burglaries of dwellings fell by 72%.⁴²⁶ The success in tackling this offence may be due to measures taken by householders against burglary. Indeed, a higher proportion of English and Welsh households have taken security measures (such as burglar alarms) to protect their property against the risk of burglary than in other countries.⁴²⁷ Such measures appear to be effective, since it has been found that the level of home security is an important predictor of whether a household will experience burglary or not. In 2012/13, around half of all households that had been the victim of burglary in the past 12 months had no or “less than basic” security at the time of the incident, and households with no security had about twice the level of burglary of those with “at least basic” security.⁴²⁸

Victims of burglary run a greatly increased risk of repeat victimisation. Offenders are likely to return to a property which they have successfully burgled in the past, with two-thirds of burglars claiming that they had returned to a property they had burgled before and taken items from it on a second occasion.⁴²⁹ The types of property most likely to be targeted are rented properties, particularly those inhabited by students.⁴³⁰ It would seem that offenders are most likely to burgle those from a similar socio-economic background to themselves, which is supported by research which has found that offenders tend to know their victims, with over half of burglars saying that they knew who lived in the property they were burgling.⁴³¹

B. THE LEGAL BACKGROUND

9–211

Some of the offences incorporated in the Theft Act of 1968 were already statutory, such as burglary and handling stolen goods under the Larceny Act of 1916. Others were common law offences, such as robbery. There can be no doubt, however, that the reforms introduced were timely. Burglary had become a particularly complex offence, with distinctions having to be drawn between “breaking in the night” and “breaking in the day”. Fletcher makes the point that the insistence upon the requirement of “breaking” in the development of this offence marks an adherence to a theory of manifest liability, where the actions of the defendant had to be manifestly criminal for an offence to be committed.⁴³² What has happened since has been a retreat from that position; the new law not only does away with the archaic distinction between breaking by day and night but does away with the requirement of breaking altogether. The replacement, trespass, however, “retains at least a trace of the traditional rule that the entry must be manifestly suspicious”.⁴³³

The severity with which most of these offences are regarded is indicated not only by the maximum sentences available: robbery and aggravated burglary are punishable by up to life imprisonment and domestic burglary and handling stolen goods by up to 14 years’ imprisonment,⁴³⁴ but also by the sentences actually handed down by the courts. Of those adults convicted of robbery in the 12 months ending September 2016, 70.1% received immediate custodial sentences (average length: 43.8 months).⁴³⁵ The sentencing range for street robbery or “muggings” and robberies of small commercial businesses by adult offenders (which involve the use of minimal force) is a high level community order to three years custody;⁴³⁶ for violent personal robberies in the home it is ten to 16 years⁴³⁷; and for the most serious professional planned commercial armed robberies it is 12–20 years.⁴³⁸ Robbery is a specified violent offence and a serious offence for the purposes of the measures dealing with dangerous offenders under the Criminal Justice 2003.⁴³⁹

The Sentencing Council has also issued a definitive sentencing guideline for burglary offences which indicates that, for a “Category 3” domestic burglary, where there is limited damage or disturbance to property and property of low value is stolen, and where the offence is committed on impulse, the sentencing range is from a low level community order to 26 weeks’ custody.⁴⁴⁰ A court sentencing a defendant for a third qualifying domestic burglary must impose a custodial term of at least three years, unless it is satisfied that there are particular circumstances in relation to the offences or the offender which would make it unjust to do so.⁴⁴¹

C. THE LAW

Only the main features of these offences will be highlighted.

1. Robbery

THEFT ACT 1968 s.8:

“(1) A person is guilty of robbery if he steals, and immediately before or at the time of doing so, and in order to do so, he uses force on any person or puts or seeks to put any person in fear of being then and there subjected to force.

(2) A person guilty of robbery, or of an assault with intent to rob, shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.”

Robbery is theft aggravated by the threat or use of force. The elements of theft must be established if a conviction for robbery is to be obtained. If the defendant believes that they have a legal right to the property they take (even if not to the way they take it) then there can be no theft and, therefore, no robbery.⁴⁴²

The element additional to theft is that of force and a number of points need to be made about this. First, “force” is a question of fact to be determined by a jury, although it would seem that very little force is actually required.⁴⁴³ Wrenching a shopping basket⁴⁴⁴ or handbag⁴⁴⁵ from the owner can suffice, although the mere snatching of a cigarette from between the victim’s fingers will not.⁴⁴⁶ Secondly, the force or threat of force must take place immediately before or at the time of the theft.⁴⁴⁷ Thirdly, the fact that the victim was not put in fear is irrelevant; the issue is whether the defendant sought to put the victim in fear of force.⁴⁴⁸ Lastly, the threat of force must be used in order to steal and not for any other purpose such as rape.⁴⁴⁹ While the mens rea of theft is not spelt out in s.8, it is clear that there must be the mens rea of theft,⁴⁵⁰ and the force or threatened force must be in order to steal; an accidental, negligent or even reckless use of force will not suffice.

Robbery is an extremely broad offence and while some robberies can be extremely serious, others can be relatively minor as where there is no more than a threat of a punch in order to steal a mobile phone. As the threat by itself would amount to no more than an assault (carrying a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment) and the theft, although carrying a maximum penalty of seven years' imprisonment, would not be severely punished, one is forced to question whether the combination of the two elements justifies such a serious offence carrying a maximum penalty of life imprisonment.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, "ROBBERY RE-ASSESSSED" [2002] CRIM. L.R. 851, 871:

9-215

"Violence can be a serious matter, and the law distinguishes serious from less serious degrees. Robbery can also be serious, but the law fails to distinguish very serious from less serious degrees. The result is that the label 'robbery' carries connotations that sometimes grossly misrepresent the seriousness of an offence. A radical approach would be to abolish the offence of robbery, leaving its ingredients to be charged separately. Another approach would be to divide the offence into at least two degrees, using the law of offences against the person as the basis. That would have the procedural benefit of ensuring that lesser offences become triable either way, rather than sending all offenders aged 18 and over to the Crown Court.

One desirable consequence of such a re-assessment would be that sentencing guidance is focused on the amount of the theft and the degree of force used or threatened."

9-216

Recognising the breadth of this offence, sentencing guidelines have been developed for different types of robbery: street robbery (or "mugging") and less sophisticated commercial robberies; professionally planned commercial robberies, and robberies in a dwelling.⁴⁵¹

2. Burglary and aggravated burglary

THEFT ACT 1968 ss.9 AND 10:

9-217

“9.—(1) A person is guilty of burglary if—

- (a) he enters any building or part of a building as a trespasser and with intent to commit any such offence as is mentioned in subsection (2) below; or
- (b) having entered any building or part of a building as a trespasser he steals or attempts to steal anything in the building or that part of it or inflicts or attempts to inflict on any person therein any grievous bodily harm.

(2) The offences referred to in subsection (1)(a) above are offences of stealing anything in the building or part of a building in question, of inflicting on any person therein any grievous bodily harm therein, and of doing unlawful damage to the building or anything therein ...

(3) A person guilty of burglary shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding—

- (a) where the offence was committed in respect of a building or part of a building which is a dwelling, fourteen years;
- (b) in any other case, ten years.

(4) References in subsections (1) and (2) above to a building, and the reference in subsection (3) above to a building which is a dwelling, shall apply also to an inhabited vehicle or vessel, and shall apply to any such vehicle or vessel at times when the person having a habitation in it is not there as well as at times when he is.

10.—(1) A person is guilty of aggravated burglary if he commits any burglary and at the time has with him any firearm or imitation firearm, any weapon of offence, or any explosive; and for this purpose—

- (a) ‘firearm’ includes an airgun or air pistol, and ‘imitation firearm’ means anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether capable of being discharged or not; and

(b) ‘weapon of offence’ means any article made or adapted for use for causing injury to or incapacitating a person, or intended by the person having it with him for such use; and

(c) ‘explosive’ means any article manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or intended by the person having it with him for that purpose.

(2) A person guilty of aggravated burglary shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.”

9–218

The original s.9(2) also included the ulterior offence of rape. As can be seen in the case of Collins below, it would be burglary under the old law if a person entered a building as a trespasser with the intention of raping anyone therein. The Sexual Offences Act 2003 removed rape as an ulterior offence in s.9(2)⁴⁵² and created a new offence of trespass with intention to commit a sexual offence.⁴⁵³ This new offence is much wider than the old provision on burglary in that the person must be a trespasser “on any premises” (which is wider than “building or part of a building”) and there must be an intention to commit “a relevant sexual offence” on the premises (which covers many sexual offences in addition to rape).

There are now four offences of burglary within s.9. Under s.9(1) (a), there are two offences of entering a building as a trespasser with the intention of stealing, inflicting grievous bodily harm, or doing unlawful damage—one committed where the building is a “dwelling” and one where it is not. The former offence is known as “domestic burglary”.⁴⁵⁴ Similarly, under s.9(1)(b) having entered a “dwelling” as a trespasser and then stealing, etc. is distinguished from other buildings or parts thereof. Section 10 creates a more serious offence: burglary aggravated by the presence of weapons.

R. v COLLINS [1973] Q.B. 100 (COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION):

[The facts appear in the judgment]

EDMUND-DAVIES LJ:

“Let me relate the facts. Were they put into a novel or portrayed on the stage, they would be regarded as being so improbable as to be unworthy of serious consideration and as verging at times on farce. At about 2 o’clock in the early morning of Saturday, July 24, 1971, a young lady of 18 went to bed at her mother’s home in Colchester. She had spent the evening with her boyfriend. She had taken a certain amount of drink, and it may be that this fact affords some explanation of her inability to answer satisfactorily certain crucial questions put to her at the trial.

She has the habit of sleeping without wearing night apparel in a bed which is very near the lattice-type window of her room ...

At about 3.30 or 4 o’clock she awoke and she then saw in the moonlight a vague form crouched in the open window. She was unable to remember, and this is important, whether the form was on the outside of the window sill or on that part of the sill which was inside the room, and for reasons which will later become clear, that seemingly narrow point is of crucial importance.

The young lady then realised several things: first of all that the form in the window was that of a male; secondly, that he was a naked male; and thirdly, that he was a naked male with an erect penis. She also saw in the moonlight that his hair was blond. She thereupon leapt to the conclusion that her boyfriend, with whom for some time she had been on terms of regular and frequent sexual intimacy, was paying her an ardent nocturnal visit. She promptly sat up in bed, and the man descended from the sill and joined her in bed and they had full sexual intercourse. But there was something about him which made her think that things were not at as they usually were between her and her boyfriend. The length of his hair, his voice as they had exchanged what was described as ‘love talk’, and other features led her to the conclusion that somehow there was something different. So she turned on the bed-side light, saw that her companion was not her boyfriend and slapped the face of the intruder, who was none other than the defendant. He said to her, ‘Give me a good time tonight’, and got hold of her arm, but she bit him and told him to go.

She then went into the bathroom and he promptly vanished.

The complainant said that she would not have agreed to intercourse if she had known that the person entering her room was not her boyfriend. But there was no suggestion of any force having been used upon her, and the intercourse which took place was undoubtedly effected with no resistance on her part.

The defendant was seen by the police at about 10.30 later that same morning. According to the police, the conversation which took place then elicited these points: He was very lustful the previous night. He had taken a lot of drink ... He went on to say that he knew the complainant because he had worked around her house. On this occasion, desiring sexual intercourse—and according to the police evidence he added that he was determined to have a girl, by force if necessary, although that part of the police evidence he challenged—he went on to say that he walked around the house, saw a light in an upstairs bedroom, and he knew that this was the girl's bedroom. He found a step ladder, leaned it against the wall and climbed up and looked into the bedroom. He could see through the wide-open window a girl who was naked and asleep. So he descended the ladder and stripped off all his clothes, with the exception of his socks, because apparently he took the view that if the girl's mother entered the bedroom it would be easier to effect a rapid escape if he had his socks on than if he was in his bare feet. That is a matter about which we are not called upon to express any view, and would in any event find ourselves unable to express one.

9-220

Having undressed, he then climbed the ladder and pulled himself up on to the window sill. His version of the matter is that he was pulling himself in when she awoke. She then got up and knelt on the bed, she put her arms around his neck and body, and she seemed to pull him into the bed. He went on: 'I was rather dazed because I didn't think she would want to know me. We kissed and cuddled for about 10 or 15 minutes and then I had it away with her but found it hard because I had had so much to drink.' ...

Now, one feature of the case which remained at the conclusion of the evidence in great obscurity is where exactly Collins was at the moment when, according to him, the girl manifested that she was welcoming him. Was he kneeling on the sill outside the window or was he already inside the room, having climbed through the window frame, and kneeling upon the inner sill? It was a crucial matter, for there were certainly three ingredients that it was incumbent upon the Crown to establish. Under section 9 of the Theft Act, 1968, which renders a person guilty of burglary if he enters any building or part of a building as a trespasser and with the intention of committing rape, the entry of the accused into the building must first be proved. Well, there is no doubt about that, for it is common ground that he did enter this girl's bedroom. Secondly, it must be proved that he entered as a trespasser. We will develop that point a little later. Thirdly, it must be proven that he entered as a trespasser with intent at the time of entry to commit rape therein.

The second ingredient of the offence—the entry must be as a trespasser—is one which has not, to the best of our knowledge, been previously canvassed in the courts ...

What does that involve? ...

... In the judgment of this court there cannot be a conviction for entering premises 'as a trespasser' within the meaning of section 9 of the Theft Act unless the person entering does so knowing that he is a trespasser and nevertheless deliberately enters, or, at the very least, is reckless as to whether or not he is entering the premises of another without the other party's consent.

Having so held, the pivotal point of this appeal is whether the Crown established that this defendant at the moment that he entered the bedroom knew perfectly well that he was not welcome there or, being reckless as to whether he was welcome or not, was nevertheless determined to enter. That in turn involves consideration as to where he was at the time that the complainant indicated that she was welcoming him into her bedroom. If, to take an example that was put in the course of argument, her bed had not been near the window but was on the other side of the bedroom, and he (being determined to have her sexually even against her will) climbed through the window and crossed the bedroom to reach her bed, then the offence charged would have been established. But in this case, as we have related, the layout of the room was different, and it became a point of nicety which had to be conclusively established by the Crown as to where he was when the girl made welcoming signs, as she unquestionably at some stage did ...

Unless the jury were entirely satisfied that the defendant made an effective and substantial entry into the bedroom without the complainant doing or saying anything to cause him to believe that she was consenting to his entering it, he ought not to be convicted of the offence charged. The point is a narrow one, as narrow maybe as the window sill which is crucial to this case ...

We have to say that his appeal must be allowed on the basis that the jury were never invited to consider the vital question whether this young man did enter the premises as a trespasser, that is to say knowing perfectly well that he had no invitation to enter or reckless of whether or not his entry was with permission.”

Appeal allowed

(i) Actus reus

9–221

From this case it can be seen that the offence of burglary contrary to s.9(1)(a) involves the following elements.⁴⁵⁵

(a) Enters

9–222

Whether there has been an entry is a question of fact for the jury. In giving them guidance, the court in Collins held that there had been to be an “effective and substantial” entry. In Brown,⁴⁵⁶ the court qualified this approach requiring only an “effective” entry. Thus, it is unnecessary for the entire body of the defendant to be inside the building but minimal intrusions such as a few fingers would be generally insufficient. In Ryan,⁴⁵⁷ it was held that the jury was entitled to consider whether there was an entry in a case where the defendant’s head and arm were inside a window when he became trapped. It is difficult to see how this could amount to an “effective” entry.

(b) As a trespasser

9–223

Reference must be made to the civil law in order to understand the term “trespass”. Under civil law, trespass is entry without the consent of the lawful possessor. No conviction for burglary can be obtained without a finding of civil trespass but, as Collins makes clear, more than this is required: the defendant must enter “knowing that he is a trespasser ... or, at the very least, is reckless whether or not he is entering the premises of another without the other party’s consent”. This was the point at issue in Collins. Had he entered the building prior to being invited in? If so, he was a trespasser.⁴⁵⁸

Even if there is consent, if the defendant acts in a way that goes beyond what the possessor would have consented to, they may be deemed to enter as a trespasser. Thus, in Jones,⁴⁵⁹ the defendant had left his parents’ home but was a frequent, welcome visitor. One night he entered their home and stole two television sets. Despite the father’s loyal statement that his son was welcome at any time, the court held that an inference could be drawn that he would not have consented to entry for the purposes of theft. The son was thus held to have entered as a trespasser.

(c) Any building or part of a building

9–224

Two issues are raised here. First, what constitutes a “building”? Section 9(4) gives an extended meaning to the term by including within it inhabited vehicles and vessels such as caravans and houseboats.⁴⁶⁰ The occupant does not have to be present at the time in order to render it “inhabited” but it would seem that it would have to be lived in.

Little other statutory guidance is given as to the ambit of “building”; generally, it would seem appropriate to take a commonsense view of it. It would be too restrictive to think in terms of just houses, flats, offices and the like. Outbuildings such as garages and sheds must also be included. The courts have tended to regard both a degree of permanence and considerable size as appropriate criteria to determine whether something constitutes a “building”.⁴⁶¹ So, tents and telephone kiosks are, therefore, probably not buildings for the purposes of burglary.⁴⁶²

The second issue relates to “part of a building”. This does not necessarily mean a separate room. It includes areas such as those behind counters in shops from which the defendant is excluded.⁴⁶³

(ii) Dwelling

9–225

The Criminal Justice Act 1991 created a new and more serious offence of domestic burglary in respect of s.9(1)(a) and (b) where the building is a “dwelling”.⁴⁶⁴ As was observed In *Sticklen*⁴⁶⁵:

“... the justification for treating a dwelling as being different from other properties...Is the very fact that It Is someone’s home, occupied, and with personal and sentimental property within It. It Is for that reason that higher sentences are required.”

Dwelling is not defined but presumably means a building (or vessel or vehicle⁴⁶⁶) in which someone lives as their home.⁴⁶⁷

(iii) Mens rea

9–226

The mens rea requirement for burglary under s.9(1)(a) is:

- (i) intention or recklessness as to trespass,
- (ii) intention to commit one of the offences in s.9(2),⁴⁶⁸ and
- (iii) with regard to domestic burglary, it has been argued that because this is an aggravating element it should import a requirement of mens rea; the defendant should only be guilty if they know or foresee that somebody might be living there.⁴⁶⁹

(iv) Aggravated burglary

9–227

If a person “commits any burglary and at the time has with him any firearm or imitation firearm, any weapon of offence, or any explosive”, the offence becomes aggravated burglary.⁴⁷⁰ For the purposes of this offence it does not matter whether the burglary is of a dwelling or not.

For the purposes of s.9(1)(a) (entry with intent), the defendant must have the article of aggravation with him at the time of entry. For the purposes of s.9(1)(b) (having entered), the relevant time is when the specified offence is committed. So, if a defendant, having entered as a trespasser, picks up a kitchen knife and uses it to force the householder to hand over the property, aggravated burglary is committed. In Klass,⁴⁷¹ it was held that the weapon must be carried by the person at the time of entering the building. Although s.10 refers to the person having with him a weapon of offence, “there can be no doubt that the offence of aggravated burglary may be committed by a person who does not have the weapon if he is aiding and abetting the person with him”.⁴⁷² However, the offence is not committed if another party outside the building (e.g. a getaway driver in a car) is in sole possession of a weapon.⁴⁷³ In Chevannes, a case involving a s.9(1)(b) burglary, the alleged weapon of offence (a bottle containing ammonia and water) had been left downstairs whilst two of the burglars stole items upstairs. The Court of Appeal stated that what mattered in such cases was:

“not whether the accused, or one of those with whom he was engaged in a joint enterprise, was actually holding the weapon at the time the theft took place, but whether the weapon was within his control so that it could be taken up and used if necessary.”⁴⁷⁴

(v) Punishment

9–228

A person found guilty of burglary of a dwelling is liable to imprisonment for up to 14 years. In other circumstances, the maximum is now ten years.⁴⁷⁵ If the burglary is aggravated the maximum sentence is life imprisonment.⁴⁷⁶

3. Handling stolen goods

(i) Introduction

9–229

The offence of handling stolen goods is closely related to that of theft and there is a considerable overlap between the two offences. Many thieves literally handle the property they have stolen and so, to prevent such persons being liable for both offences, careful demarcation of the two crimes is necessary. Also, many handlers satisfy the test of appropriation and the other elements in the definition of theft. The Criminal Law Revision Committee was fully aware of this overlap, but saw “no reason in principle or convenience” against it, although circumstances and evidentiary requirements may dictate the more natural charge.⁴⁷⁷ Handling is a very broad offence covering a wide range of circumstances. The handler could be a professional “fence” or an otherwise lawabiding person buying a stolen DVD player at a car-boot sale. It is thought that without professional handlers of stolen goods, so-called “fences” and “placers”, there would be a lot less theft. Handling thus has a higher maximum sentence (of 14 years’ imprisonment) than theft to deal with large-scale handling operations. However, the majority of handlers are not such professional criminals.⁴⁷⁸ Sentencing data provided for the Sentencing Council in 2014 showed that, in 2012, 6,329 handlers were sentenced, 70% of them being dealt with in the magistrates’ courts.⁴⁷⁹ Of these, 35% received a community order, 15% a fine, and 11% a conditional or absolute discharge. The second most common form of disposal was a sentence of immediate imprisonment (24%), but the sentences imposed appear generally to be short: in 2012, the average sentence was six months and three weeks’ imprisonment, and the median term was four months.⁴⁸⁰

(ii) The law

THEFT ACT 1968 s.22:

9–230

“(1) A person handles stolen goods if (otherwise than in the course of the stealing) knowing or believing them to be stolen goods he dishonestly receives the goods, or dishonestly undertakes or assists in their retention, removal, disposal or realisation by or for the benefit of another person, or if he arranges to do so.

(2) A person guilty of handling stolen goods shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years.”

9–231

It should be noted that s.22 creates only one offence, although there are a large number of ways in which this offence can be committed. In fact, it renders culpable almost any way of dealing with stolen goods as long as there is mens rea. So, for example, the person who arranges to handle stolen goods commits the offence under s.22 despite the fact that, but for the provision, they would not even have done enough to be liable for an attempt.

(a) Actus reus

9–232

The elements of the actus reus are as follows.

1. The goods must be stolen at the time of handling

9–233

Section 34(2)(b) defines “goods” as including money and every other description of property, except land. In addition, s.24 defines stolen goods as goods obtained by theft under s.1, by fraud under the Fraud Act 2006, by blackmail under s.21 and money dishonestly withdrawn from a wrongful credit under s.24A(8). Importantly, the goods must remain stolen at the time the handling occurs; so, for example, where the goods have been reduced to police custody and used to bait a trap to catch handlers there can be no conviction under s.22.⁴⁸¹

The handling must be “otherwise than in the course of the stealing”. This provision is necessary to prevent thieves being simultaneously guilty of both theft and handling. This raises the problem of when theft ends which depends upon whether an appropriation can be regarded as a continuing act.⁴⁸² This matter was discussed earlier in relation to the meaning of an appropriation.⁴⁸³

2. There must be a handling of the goods

Although the preferred view, as indicated above, is that there is only one offence, there are 18 ways in which the property may be handled.⁴⁸⁴ The stereotypical case of handling will involve receiving the goods but it will also encompass disposal (even by way of destruction) and assisting another to deal with the stolen goods. A brief look at the interpretation of this latter form of handling reinforces how very wide this offence is. In Kanwar,⁴⁸⁵ the Court of Appeal held that “assistance” requires that something be done to aid the retention, removal, disposal or realisation of the goods but that this was not limited to physical acts. On the facts of the case, lying to protect one’s husband who had brought stolen goods into the house was held to be sufficient.

(b) Mens rea

The mens rea requirement for handling under s.22 is:

1. The defendant must know or believe the goods to be stolen. There seems to be hardly any difference in the meaning of these words in this context. Belief, if anything, falls only just short of knowledge: where no other reasonable conclusion can be drawn by the defendant but that the goods were stolen.⁴⁸⁶ Mere suspicion that the goods could be stolen is, however, not sufficient.
2. There must be dishonesty. Dishonesty here bears the same meaning as for theft. Accordingly, a person could receive stolen goods knowing that they are stolen but intending to return them to the owner. In such a case a finding of dishonesty would be unlikely under the Ghosh test.

(c) Punishment

The maximum penalty for handling stolen goods is 14 years’ imprisonment.⁴⁸⁷

VI. Conclusion

An evaluation of these property offences cannot be undertaken until the underlying elements and rationale of such offences have been exposed. Only then can comment about structure and sentencing levels be made.

A. UNDERLYING RATIONALE

9-237

What do all the different property offences have in common? Clearly, the common denominator in such offences is that they all involve an interference with the property interests of the victim. But what degree of interference is necessary?

We have already seen that the emphasis is not on the actual loss of property. Indeed, there need not be any loss of property. In theft, for example, there need only be an intention of permanent deprivation; there need be no actual deprivation. In burglary, there need only be an entry to a building with one of the specified intents. No property need be taken. It was noted earlier in this chapter when dealing with the non-criminalisation of breach of contract that losses from such a breach can be significant while losses from theft can be minimal, or -non-existent and many losses from theft and other property offences can be made good—either by actions for recovery of the goods or by insurance.

It is thus clear that the emphasis is not on the loss of the property (which could be described as the direct or “first order” harm), but on the quality of the defendant’s actions. The focus is on wrongdoing. The requirement of dishonesty for most property offences underlines this. The defendant’s actions must be such that the community as a whole can reject them as “wrong”. The defendant’s actions pose a threat to the value system inherent in our whole concept of property; it involves an “indirect undermining of the proprietary regime”.⁴⁸⁸ This threat, which raises the risk that there will be actual loss to property, can be seen as the real harm in the property offences. It is not the only harm. Many of the offences have their own special and distinctive harms, but this threat is the harm common to all of them and can be seen as a “second-order” harm analogous to the “second-order” harms encountered in the law of attempt.

B. STRUCTURE OF PROPERTY OFFENCES

9–238

Many of the property offences are so similar that perhaps one ought to consider abolishing most of them and introducing a single broad offence of dishonesty or wrongful interference with property rights. The Law Commission⁴⁸⁹ considered this option and rejected it on the grounds that it could extend the reach of the criminal law too far, would place too much reliance on the elusive concept of “dishonesty” and would probably be incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights arts 5 and 7 which have been interpreted to require that offences be formulated with sufficient precision to enable people to regulate their conduct. Such a broad offence would clearly breach the principle of fair labelling whereby different offences should encapsulate different wrongs in a morally informative manner. It would be unthinkable to conflate all the existing property offences into a single new crime. For example, burglary and robbery involve wrongs quite separate from mere interference with property rights. The same is equally true of other offences such as handling and blackmail. Green argues that the:

“reactive emotions [that the different crimes are] likely to evoke ... will differ depending on which wrong has been committed. That is, such wrongs generally feel different from each other—a significant psychological phenomenon since differences in reactive emotions, though not conclusive, are usually a reliable indicator of differences in moral content.”⁴⁹⁰

An alternative solution could be the introduction of a smaller (than at present) number of more broadly drawn offences. A step in this direction has been taken by the abolition of all the deception offences and their replacement by a single offence of fraud and the new offence of obtaining services dishonestly. Other possibilities remain. For example, the offence of theft could be expanded to encompass the present offence of handling stolen goods. In most cases a person who handles stolen goods is

“assuming the rights of owner” over property and is thereby appropriating it, becoming guilty of theft.⁴⁹¹

It is submitted, however, that such an approach would be misguided. While there is much to be said for the introduction of the new broad offence of fraud, most of the core central property offences should be retained in something like their present form. Criminal offences should describe as accurately as possible the conduct which is prohibited. The moral messages sought to be communicated by the criminal law and by the punishment of offenders become confused if offence categorisations are not clearly understood by the public. There are important moral distinctions between these offences which the public, albeit only intuitively, recognise and which need protecting.

Let us take, for example, the proposal to merge the present offences of theft and handling stolen goods. Apart from the fact that the overlap between these two crimes is not complete, with not all cases of handling amounting to theft, there are important differences between these offences in terms of fair labelling. Handling is a very different offence in terms of public perception (see below) and in terms of the need to be able to impose high deterrent sentences (hence the 14 years maximum). Handlers of stolen goods provide (and arguably create) much of the market for theft; their activities are a significant source of the economic motivation behind much theft.⁴⁹² If the law could stamp out professional handlers much of the incentive to commit theft would be reduced.

Alternatively, we should consider whether the present offences are too broadly drawn. Should there be some further subdivision? This has already been achieved with burglary. Burglary involves a special harm, namely the violation of the security and sanctity of the home. This can cause psychological harm: distress, alarm, and the fear of knowing one is not safe even in one's own home.⁴⁹³ Accordingly, the Criminal Justice Act 1991 drew a distinction between burglaries of dwellings where these harms would be most acutely felt (maximum 14 years' imprisonment) and burglaries of non-dwellings (maximum ten years' imprisonment). Further, the Theft Act 1968 s.10 creates the separate offence of aggravated burglary where there is the extra harm of possession of a weapon of offence at the scene of the burglary. This is not only more frightening but increases the risk of violence actually being used, in that the burglar might be “tempted to use it if challenged”.⁴⁹⁴

C. M. V. CLARKSON,
UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW,
4TH EDN (2005), P.248:

9-239

“Most people today regard handling as a lesser offence in terms of moral stigma; defendants will often plead guilty to handling on condition that all charges of theft are dropped. This attitude has come about because of a growing view that handlers and purchasers of stolen goods are ‘only slightly dishonest people’ (Spencer, 1985) who are not as blameworthy as those who actually steal or burgle. Buying and selling stolen goods are the most common offences amongst young offenders (Graham and Bowling, 1995). Theft and burglary create an immediate sense of danger in the community; there must often be a risk of violence with such activities; the thief or burglar is the primary cause of harm, directly invading the rights of the owner of property. In contrast, the criminal receiver, the ‘fence’, is regarded only as a shady, somewhat disreputable character—and the secondary purchaser as simply someone who has succumbed to the ‘natural temptation’ of buying something very cheap.

The law is accordingly faced with a dilemma. On the one hand, it recognises that the punishment of handlers is crucial if theft and burglary is to be reduced but, on the other hand, it is faced by an apathetic public almost prepared to ‘turn a blind eye’ to handling. A possible way out of this dilemma could be to divide the offence of handling stolen goods into degrees. The more serious offence could be reserved for the professional ‘fence’, the lesser offence covering secondary purchasers. Such a division might be a fairer reflection of the moral stigma felt by most to attach to the two categories of handlers and could have the advantage of underwriting the necessity of enforcement against, and harm caused by, the professional handler. The danger with such an approach, however, could be that even less moral stigma would be attached to secondary purchasers than at present and, after all, it is these purchasers who buy stolen goods from fences who are the ‘key element in the incentive structure that supports property crime.’”

9–240

Another suggestion is that property offences should be subdivided into separate offences based on the value of the property interfered with. In the US, the Model Penal Code states that theft of property worth less than $50 constitutes a petty misdemeanour, theft of property valued at between $50 and $500 constitutes a misdemeanour, and theft of property with a value exceeding $500 constitutes a felony of the third degree.⁴⁹⁵ Each offence category carries its own range of penalties. In England, on the other hand, the same crime of theft is committed whether it is a magazine or a million pounds that is stolen.

CRIMINAL LAW REVISION
COMMITTEE, EIGHTH REPORT,
THEFT AND RELATED OFFENCES,
CMND.2977 (1966), PARA.62:

9–241

“We considered whether instead of a general maximum of 10 years there should be different maximum penalties depending on the value of the property stolen. But although there is a case for specially high penalties for stealing large sums, we are not in favour of such a provision. Apart from the difficulty of laying down a satisfactory scale, the value of the property is only one of the possible aggravating features of theft, and it seems to us wrong to single this out. Besides, the property may be far more or far less valuable than the thief imagined.”

9–242

The value of property is at present taken into account procedurally. For example, criminal damage where the value of the property does not exceed £5,000,⁴⁹⁶ and shoplifting offences where the value is less than £200 and the defendant is an adult,⁴⁹⁷ are summary offences. Mode of Trial Guidelines state that theft, fraud and handling offences should be tried summarily unless the property is of high value. “High value” is defined for this purpose as £10,000 or more.⁴⁹⁸ Further, as we shall see, in cases of shoplifting where the value of the property stolen is less than £100 the police can issue a PND (Penalty Notice for Disorder). The value of property is also an important factor in sentencing. Sentencing guidelines for fraud and theft provide that high value (including sentimental value) of the property to the victim or substantial consequential loss is an aggravating factor. So, for example, the sentencing guideline for confidence fraud (contrary to the Fraud Act 2006 s.1) has five starting points based on the value of the property or consequential loss (less than £5,000; £5,000–£20,000; £20,000–£100,000; £100,000–£500,000; more than £500,000).⁴⁹⁹ The current sentencing penalty in the magistrates’ court for making off without payment depends on whether the goods or services are worth less than £200⁵⁰⁰ and for handling stolen goods whether the property is worth less than £1,000.⁵⁰¹ The sentencing guideline for burglary offences, on the other hand, merely indicates that in domestic burglaries, theft of/damage to property causing a significant degree of economic, sentimental or personal value to the victim is a factor indicating greater harm.⁵⁰² Other particularised guidelines, for example, making off without payment, have been drafted on the assumption that they generally do not involve property of high monetary value.⁵⁰³ Accordingly, the real debate is not as to whether the value of the property should be taken into consideration, but how this should be achieved: whether at the decision to prosecute stage, the mode of trial stage, the substantive level, or the sentencing stage.

The present approach of substantive English law, however, is consistent with the underlying rationale of the property offences that the focus is on the wrongdoing of the defendant and not on the direct harm caused. If it is not necessary that any direct harm be caused, it follows that the extent of that harm is not important and thus the value of the property interfered with should not be taken into account. This accords with the widely held view that the causing of resulting harm (and the extent thereof) is irrelevant as it can be “chance” whether a large or small sum is stolen. It is also argued that the value of property in abstract terms is irrelevant. What matters is the impact on the particular victim. Stealing £20 from an impoverished person is worse than stealing £20 worth of goods from a large supermarket. Further, it is argued that the value of the property is only one way of assessing the extent of the harm and should not be made decisive. Other factors are equally important: the characteristics of the offender (e.g. theft by persons in positions of trust); the characteristics of the victim (e.g. theft from the vulnerable); and the circumstances of the offence (e.g. pick-pocketing, thefts committed jointly with others).

On the other hand, it is interesting to contrast these property offences with offences against the person where the level of harm (physical and psychiatric injury) is crucial in distinguishing offences of different gravity (e.g. actual bodily harm as opposed to grievous bodily harm), whereas the other factors, such as characteristics of the victim, are taken into account at the sentencing stage. There is logic to this. At the substantive stage the law can only deal with standard harms.

ANDREW VON HIRSCH AND NILS JAREBORG, “GAUGING CRIMINAL HARM: A LIVING-STANDARD
ANALYSIS” (1991) 11 OXFORD J. OF LEGAL STUDIES 1, 4–5:

9–243

“Why this emphasis on standard harm? Particular criminal acts are too diverse to be rated on an individualised basis. The analysis is aided when one (1) rates the standard case of an offence, and then (2) addresses unusual cases through principles of aggravation and mitigation ... The standard harm in any given type of criminal conduct is, ordinarily, foreseeable. However, when one is talking about atypical harms, foreseeability diminishes.

The burglar may be expected to understand the typical consequences of a burglary, but not, ordinarily, Mary Smith’s particular situation—e.g. the extraordinary value the vase had for her as a gift from a deceased friend. The rules on aggravation/mitigation will thus have to be more complex, because they need to consider not only the special harm involved in unusual cases, but also ... the foreseeability of such special harm ...

The criminal law is a system of rules, not an arena for personalized judgments. If the law can assess crime-seriousness in the standard case, and then make deviations from that assessment for certain types of special circumstances, this is all one can reasonably hope to accomplish.”

Following this, it is possible to argue that the most appropriate measure of the standard harm (or threat thereof) in property offences is the value of the property which, like the level of personal injury or success or failure in the law of attempt, is critical in our moral assessments of the defendant’s actions. Such an approach might well help to counteract the commonly held view that there is one law for wealthy, white-collar criminals and another for the rest of those who steal. Other factors such as the circumstances of the offence which are simply too diverse to be reduced to substantive rules are best left to the “rules on aggravation/mitigation”, i.e. to the sentencing stage.

The logic of the argument to this point has been that there could be different levels of property offences based purely on the economic value of the goods interfered with. However, an alternative solution could be to subject to separate treatment certain property offences where the economic value of the goods is generally small. Shoplifting might be regarded as a prime candidate for this and, as we shall see, this is to a certain extent already being done. A case can also be made for the decriminalisation of some of the activities presently covered by the Theft Acts—particularly in those areas where civil remedies such as breach of contract seem more appropriate. However, it is highly questionable whether such thinking can or should be applied to shoplifting.

DANIEL J.I. MURPHY, CUSTOMERS AND THIEVES—AN ETHNOGRAPHY OF SHOPLIFTING (1986), P.240:

“[T]here are essentially two methods for controlling shoplifters on the shopfloor: ‘law-enforcement’ and ‘peace-keeping’. It is obvious that the numbers of suspects who are handed to the police differ dramatically according to which model is being pursued. The peace-keeping model is the preferred one of a few retailers who acknowledge the temptation to steal which modern marketing techniques create and they accept the responsibility to convert ordinary shoppers who have succumbed to this temptation. Retailers who pursue the law-enforcement model would criticise the peace-keeping model for being an insufficient deterrent to shoplifters, and the Home Office Standing Committee supports their position: ‘A reminder to pay without fear of penalty is no deterrent, and in effect would mean that the thief could not lose.’ However, the research clearly demonstrates that all stores on occasions use this method to control shoplifting ... The point made here is that there are methods of controlling shoplifting which do not involve the criminal justice system and these should be given more public discussion.”

9–245

Since 2004, the police have been able to issue a penalty notice for disorder (PND) for an offence of retail theft (shoplifting). Originally these could be issued to those 16 or over, where the value of the goods stolen was under £200,⁵⁰⁴ but the age limit for a PND has since been raised to 18, and financial limit decreased to £100. This is an on-the-spot £90 penalty rather like a speeding ticket. In the 12 months ending September 2016, 8,438 PNDs were issued for shoplifting.⁵⁰⁵

This demonstrates that there are alternative ways of dealing with offenders without having to resort to prosecution. This is particularly appropriate for shoplifting which is in most cases:

“a nuisance, particularly to shopkeepers, [but] is not dangerous or frightening, nor does it, particularly when compared to other offences, damage the confidence of the public. Its victims are not usually particularly vulnerable by reason or age or youth.”⁵⁰⁶

It must be stressed that such PNDs are issued within the criminal justice system. The offence has not been decriminalised.

However, a case could be made for treating shoplifting as a separate and lesser offence.

ANDREW ASHWORTH, SENTENCING AND PENAL POLICY (1983), PP.186– 187:

9–246

“[T]here are three major reasons for regarding offences against larger companies, such as Woolworth and Marks and Spencer, as less serious than an offence involving the same amount of property but committed against an individual victim. First, an individual’s possessions are more likely to have a personal (‘sentimental’) value to him which is additional to, and may indeed be more important to him than, the economic value ... Secondly, thefts from individuals are more likely to cause fear and alarm than thefts from companies ... Thirdly, companies would generally be better able than individuals to afford and to off-set any loss through theft.”

9–247

The case for a separate lesser offence is strengthened when one considers that the value of the property stolen in shops is generally small,⁵⁰⁷ such thefts are regarded by the public as the least serious of the various types of theft that can be committed,⁵⁰⁸ and even when shoplifters are detected prosecutions are often not brought⁵⁰⁹:

“in order to avoid ‘image’ problems, because of the claimed risk of false arrest tort actions by innocent customers, and because of the claimed cost of time away from work when security personnel have to testify.”⁵¹⁰

In an attempt to minimise the economic costs of shoplifting, businesses focus upon investing in security measures such as CCTV, security tagging for valuable items, security guards and store detectives,⁵¹¹ and a number of the larger high-street retailers now employ civil recovery agents to recover from shoplifters the alleged costs arising from their actions.⁵¹²

On the other hand, there is the clear view expressed by Lawton LJ, in Wood, that “Shoplifting is stealing and stealing is a serious offence.”⁵¹³ A Home Office Working Party Report on internal shop security was to similar effect:

“We also noted the suggestion ... that shoplifting should be made an administrative offence. This would do nothing to reduce the number of shoplifting offences. Indeed, it might increase it. We see no reason why shoplifting should be treated differently from any other type of crime.”⁵¹⁴

A central problem with this approach, as with all attempts to divide offences into narrower subcategories, is that the subdivision has to be rational and must not miss any important moral distinctions. This raises the question: What is so special about shoplifting? Why not make pick-pocketing or employee theft a separate offence?

L. R. ZEITLIN, “A LITTLE LARCENY CAN DO A LOT FOR EMPLOYEE MORALE,” PSYCHOLOGY TODAY
(JUNE 1974), 22–26, 64:

9–248

“Thefts of merchandise alone amount to approximately five per cent of the yearly sales of American retail establishments, and internal losses outweigh external losses by about three to one. That is, the stores’ own employees steal three times as much as do shoplifters ... [W]ell over 75 per cent of all employees participate to some extent in merchandise shrinkage ... [I]n retail establishments internal theft averages out to an unevenly distributed five per cent to eight per cent of the typical employee’s salary ...

When the average retail employee becomes dissatisfied with his job, if he doesn’t quit, he starts stealing from his employer. He gets back at the system. In a sense, the intellectual and physical challenges provided by opportunities to steal represent a significant enrichment of the individual’s job. He can take matters into his own hands, assume responsibility, make decisions and face challenges ... He is in business for himself ...

The dishonest worker is enriching his own job in a manner that is very satisfactory (for him) ... [and] management gets a bargain. By permitting a controlled amount of theft, management can avoid reorganising jobs and raising wages ...

[M]anagement may decide that the monetary cost of enforcing honesty is too great ... [M]anagement would have to maintain a figurehead security system. After all, the major benefit of employee theft is the job enrichment provided by the individual's attempt to beat the system. If all need for precaution is eliminated, then the employee gets no satisfaction from theft. All he gets is a slight addition to his income in merchandise instead of cash ...

Uncontrolled theft can be disastrous for any business concern but controlled theft can be useful. Employee theft, used as a motivational tool, can be an economic benefit to an organisation, if management finds it too costly to meet its traditional responsibilities to make jobs rewarding and to pay a living wage.”

9-249

In the US, an examination was made into several substantive offences to ascertain whether subcategorisation was feasible.⁵¹⁵ The bulk of the examination was devoted to the crime of armed robbery with the conclusion that armed robbery be divided into six degrees. Yet these six divisions only take account of two variables: the type of weapon used and the extent of physical violence threatened. No account is taken of the numerous other variables that would normally affect the type and length of sentence imposed. Accordingly, it has been pointed out that:

“if the legislature actually tried to anticipate every conceivable offence and offender variation, the result would be a penal law of enormous length and complexity, replete with hair-splitting distinctions. We doubt whether any legislature would be willing or able to spend all its time hammering out a definition of robbery in the 68th degree (and deciding upon the appropriate penalty); but even if it were, it is doubtful whether all offence variations could really be anticipated.”⁵¹⁶

Further:

“excessively specific offences risk clogging the trial process with unmeritorious technical argument, and obfuscating the moral clarity of the law’s communications ... [P]eople ... need to know the law’s requirements in gist and not precisely.”⁵¹⁷

The over-particularisation of offences may lead to a defendant facing “the wrong charge, or too many charges”.⁵¹⁸ It thus seems clear that little can be gained from subdividing the property offences into smaller separate offences such as shoplifting. No area of law can be adequately, and with sufficient specificity, subcategorised to reflect the nuances of situation, blameworthiness and harm that condition the seriousness of particular criminal acts.

9–250

Accordingly, perhaps the best way forward is to build on the approach already being adopted by English law. Some reform of the substantive offence definitions and categories clearly needs to be undertaken. Movement in this direction has already occurred with the abolition of all deception offences and their replacement by a broad offence of fraud. Although minor shoplifting offences have been made summary offences, the effect of this reform is likely to be minimal, given that a defendant may still elect Crown Court trial.⁵¹⁹ At the procedural mode of trial level, more thought should be given to making other offences only triable summarily where the value of the property is low.

The one area where significant steps have already been taken is in relation to the development of sentencing guidelines. In 2008, recognising that some of the property offences such as theft and fraud are too broad for a “one size fits all” sentencing guideline, the Sentencing Guidelines Council issued definitive guidelines for different types of theft: theft in breach of trust; theft in a dwelling; theft from the person; and theft from a shop.⁵²⁰ Unfortunately, in its 2016 Theft Offences: Definitive Guideline, the Sentencing Council appears to have had second thoughts about such an approach in relation to theft, and has instead provided separate guidelines for theft from a shop or stall, and “general theft” (to include theft from the person, theft in breach of trust, theft of and from a motor vehicle and theft of a bicycle),⁵²¹ on the basis that the harm and culpability factors in relation to these offences were very similar and that to issue separate guidelines in respect of each would make the overall guideline very lengthy.⁵²² In spite of the view expressed by the Sentencing Council, theft offences inevitably vary enormously in their seriousness, and it is suggested that a strong argument may be made for reverting to the approach adopted in the previous guidelines, on the basis that these different types of theft are not generally regarded as having equivalent levels of culpability. In particular, thefts from the person and in a dwelling are regarded as being significantly more intrusive and serious than the theft of a bicycle.

Guidelines have also been developed for different types of fraud: fraud under the Fraud Act 2006; possessing, making or supplying articles for use in fraud; benefit fraud; and revenue fraud (against HM Revenue and Customs),⁵²³ and for domestic and non-domestic burglary.⁵²⁴ However, while these developments are to be welcomed, they do not foreclose further consideration of the structure of property offences at the substantive level—for example, whether there should be two categories of robbery and handling stolen goods. But, of course, this whole question of the structure of property offences raises similar issues to those already canvassed with regard to the structure of offences against the person. As suggested there, answers to all such questions depend on the basic philosophy underlying the construction of criminal liability and the criminal justice system.

1 2,460,574 offences out of 4,673,173 total recorded offences. Office for National Statistics, Statistical Bulletin, Crime in England and Wales Year Ending September 2016 (2017), pp.21–22, tables 2 and A1.

2 Available at <http://www.crimesurvey.co.uk/index.html> [Accessed March 2017]. New questions on fraud and computer misuse were introduced into the CSEW from October 2015 and are currently published as experimental statistics.

3 R. Chaplin, J. Flatley and K. Smith, Home Office Statistical Bulletin 2010/2011 (2011), p.37 and table 2.11.

4 Chaplin, Flatley and Smith, Home Office Statistical Bulletin 2010/2011 (2011), p.37 and table 2.11.

5 Chaplin, J. Flatley and K. Smith, Home Office Statistical Bulletin 2010/2011 (2011), p.55 and table 2.12.

- 6 M. Levi and J. Burrows, “Measuring the Impact of Fraud in the UK” (2008) 48 Brit. J. Criminol. 293–318.
- 7 The report estimates that private sector fraud could cost the UK economy £143.6 billion, and public sector fraud £37.5 billion: Centre for Counter Fraud Studies, Annual Fraud Indicator 2016 (2016) at <http://www.port.ac.uk/media/contacts-and-departments/icjs/ccfs/Annual-Fraud-Indicator-2016.pdf> [Accessed March 2017], pp.6–18.
- 8 Financial Fraud Action UK, Year-end 2016 fraud update: Payment cards, remote banking and cheque (30 March 2017) at <https://www.financialfraudaction.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/07/2016-Year-end-fraud-bulletin.pdf> [Accessed March 2017], pp.10–14.
- 9 Financial Fraud Action UK, Year-end 2016 fraud update: Payment cards, remote banking and cheque (30 March 2017), pp.4–5.
- 10 ONS, Overview of fraud statistics: year ending Mar 2016 (2016) at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/articles/overviewoffra> [Accessed March 2017], p.3.
- 11 ONS, Overview of fraud statistics: year ending Mar 2016 (2016), p.8.
- 12 See <https://www.cityoflondon.police.uk/advice-and-support/fraud-and-economic-crime/Pages/DCPCU.aspx> [Accessed March 2017].
- 13 See <http://www.sfo.gov.uk/> [Accessed March 2017]; Criminal Justice Act 1987 s.1.
- 14 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 s.1; Serious Organised Crime Agency, SOCA Annual Plan 2013/14 at <http://www.octf.gov.uk/getattachment/bc73bdfc-9688-43a4-a3b1-897164f3c04b/SOCA-Annual-Plan-2013-14.aspx> [Accessed March 2017].
- 15 Crime and Courts Act 2013 s.15 and Sch.8.
- 16 Crime and Courts Act 2013 Pt 1; National Crime Agency, The NCA Commitment to Working in Partnership with UK Operational Partners (2014) at <http://www.nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/publications/178-the-nca-commitment-to-working-in-partnership-with-uk-operational-partners/file> [Accessed March 2017].
- 17 BBC News website, “Hatton Garden jewellery heist: final three guilty over £14M burglary” 16 January 2016 at <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-35315472> (Accessed March 2017).
- 18 Robbery, although a violent offence, is described here as a property offence because the violence is incidental to the main aim, the acquisition of property.
- 19 This term was invented by E. H. Sutherland in White-Collar Crime (New York: Reinhart and Winston, 1949) to illuminate crime committed not by young working-class males but by persons of apparent respectability in the course of their employment. There now exists a wealth of literature on this subject. See, e.g. D. Nelkin, “White Collar Crime” in M. Maguire, R. Morgan and R. Reiner, The Oxford Handbook of Criminology, 5th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2012), pp.623–659, G. Geis, “The Roots and Variant Definitions of the Concept of ‘White-collar crime’” and H. N. Pontell, “Theoretical, Empirical and Policy Implications of Alternative Definitions of ‘White-collar’ crime: ‘Trivializing the Lunatic Crime Rate’” in S. R. Van Slyke, M. L. Benson and F. T. Cullen, The Oxford Handbook of White-collar Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2016), pp.25–38, and pp.39–56 respectively .
- 20 See, e.g. A. Sidebottom, “Theft in Price Volatile Markets: On the Relationship Between Copper Price and Copper Theft” (2011) 48 J. of Research in Crime and

- Delinquency 396–418 and A. Sidebottom, M. Ashby and S. D. Johnson, “Copper Cable Theft: Revisiting the Price-Theft Hypothesis” (2014) 51 J. of Research in Crime and Delinquency 684–700, which support the hypothesis that there was a link between increases in the price of copper between 2006 and 2012 and a rise in the incidence of copper cable theft.
- 21 P. Mayhew, D. Elliott and L. Dowds, The 1988 British Crime Survey (1989), p.43. See also N. Walker and W. Hough (eds), Public Attitudes to Sentencing (Aldershot: Gower, 1988), pp.203–217. The 2009/10 BCS reported that 11% of people identified that “too lenient sentencing” was the main cause of crime (the third most popular perceived single cause after drugs and lack of discipline from parents), J. Flatley., Home Office Statistical Bulletin 12/10, Crime in England and Wales 2009/10 (2009), table 5a.
 - 22 P. Mayhew, D. Elliott and L. Dowds, The 1988 British Crime Survey (1989), p.43. This finding has been confirmed by numerous studies, including N. Walker and W. Hough (eds), Public Attitudes to Sentencing (Aldershot: Gower, 1988), pp.185–202, and M. Hough, Attitudes to Sentencing and Trust in Justice: Explaining Trends from the Crime Survey for England and Wales (2013), who found that attitudes had changed little over a 25-year period (pp.22–23). Studies of other jurisdictions have indicated similar findings: M. Hough and J. V. Roberts, “Public Opinion, Crime and Criminal Justice” in M. Maguire, R. Morgan and R. Reiner, The Oxford Handbook of Criminology, 5th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2012), p.286.
 - 23 M. Hough, Attitudes to Sentencing and Trust in Justice: Explaining Trends from the Crime Survey for England and Wales (2013), pp.19–20.
 - 24 A. Lovegrove, “Public Opinion, Sentencing and Lenience: An Empirical Study Involving Judges Consulting the Community” [2007] Crim. L.R. 769, 777, and K. Warner, J. Davis, C. Spiranovic, H. Cockburn and A. Frieberg, “Measuring jurors’ views on sentencing: Results from the second Australian jury sentencing study” (2017) 19 Punishment & Society 180.
 - 25 Lovegrove “Public Opinion, Sentencing and Lenience: An Empirical Study Involving Judges Consulting the Community” [2007] Crim. L.R. 769, 778.
 - 26 and M. Hough, Attitudes to Sentencing and Trust in Justice: Explaining Trends from the Crime Survey for England and Wales (2013), p.25; J. V. Roberts and M. Hough, “Custody or Community? Exploring the Boundaries of Public Punitiveness in England and Wales” (2011) 11 Criminology & Criminal Justice 181–197; A. Lovegrove, “Sentencing and Public Opinion: An Empirical Study of Punitiveness and Lenience and its Implications for Penal Moderation” (2013) 46 Australian & New Zealand J. of Criminol. 200–220.
 - 27 J. Shapland, J. Willmore and P. Duff, Victims in the Criminal Justice System (Aldershot: Gower, 1985).
 - 28 The Law Commission demonstrated support for codification of the criminal law in its’ Working Paper No.143, Codification of the Criminal Law (1985). At present, the codification project has been “removed” from the Law Commission’s programme (Law Com. No.311, Tenth Programme of Law Reform (HC 605, 2008)). Although the Law Commission still supports codification as an objective, and will codify the law where possible, it is currently focusing upon the simplification of the criminal law: <http://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/simplification-of-the-criminal-law/> [Accessed March 2017].
 - 29 Criminal Law Revision Committee, Eighth Report, Theft and Related Offences, Cmnd.2977 (1966).
 - 30 Corcoran v Whent [1977] Crim. L.R. 52.

- 31 The defendant's conviction for theft was quashed. Once he had eaten the food he could not "deal with it" and it was no longer property "belonging to another". This would now be dealt with as making off without payment under the Theft Act 1978 s.3.
- 32 Theft Act 1968 s.9.
- 33 Theft Act 1968 s.5(1).
- 34 Theft Act 1968 s.5(2).
- 35 Morris [1984] A.C. 320.
- 36 Morris [1984] A.C. 320 at 334.
- 37 ONS, Statistical Bulletin: Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017) at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/bulletins/crimeinengla> [Accessed March 2017], pp.21–22. This includes burglary, vehicle-related theft, theft from the person and bicycle theft. The statistics show an overall downwards trend in theft offences. The 2015/16 figures show a 9% decrease compared with the previous year and there has been a 45% decrease in volume since 2002/03.
- 38 The 2012/13 CSEW showed that 91% of incidents of theft of a vehicle were reported to the police: ONS, Focus on Property Crime 2012/13 (2013) at <http://www.ons.gov.uk/ons/rel/crime-stats/crime-statistics/focus-on-property-crime-2012-13/rpt-chapter-1.html> [Accessed March 2017], p.22.
- 39 ONS, Focus on Property Crime year ending March 2016 (2016), p.11. In the same period, the CSEW figures indicated that only 9% of attempted snatch or stealth thefts were reported to the police, suggesting that attempted thefts are much less likely to be reported than the completed offence.
- 40 J. Shury, Crime Against Retail and Manufacturing Premises, Home Office Online Report 37/05 (2005).
- 41 S. D. Astor, "Shoplifting Survey", Security World, Vol.8 Pt 3 (1971), pp.3–4; Sentencing Advisory Panel, Sentencing Guidelines for Theft from a Shop: Consultation Paper (2006), para.10.
- 42 Home Office, Crime Against Businesses: Headline findings from the 2015 Commercial Victimisation Survey (2016), p.16. The British Retail Consortium (BRC), Retail Crime Survey 2015 (2016) at <https://www.businesscrime.org.uk/assets/files/BRC-2015-Crime-Survey.pdf> [Accessed March 2017], found that only about half of customer theft was reported to the police, p.17.
- 43 ONS, Statistical Bulletin: Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), p.14.
- 44 ONS, Focus on Property Crime year ending March 2016 (2016), p.39.
- 45 See fn.3 above.
- 46 M. Hough and D. Moxon, "Dealing with Offenders: Popular Opinion and the Views of Victims. Findings from the British Crime Survey" (1985) 24 Howard J. of Crim. Justice 160–175.
- 47 ONS, Focus on Property Crime year ending March 2016 (2016), Figure 2, p.7.
- 48 C. M. V. Clarkson, A. Cretney and G. Davis, "Assaults: the Relationship between Seriousness, Criminalisation and Punishment" [1994] Crim. L.R. 4.
- 49 Below, paras 9-245–9-247.

- 50 ONS, Crime Statistics, Focus on Property Crime 2011/12 (2013), Ch.2: Mobile Phone Theft at http://www.ons.gov.uk/ons/dcp171776_309652.pdf [Accessed March 2017], p.20, Appendix table 2.12. Of course, many such crimes will be reported both to the police and the network service provider. This reporting rate is considerably higher than that for theft from the person overall, where only a third (32%) of incidents were reported to the police.
- 51 ONS, Crime Statistics, Focus on Property Crime 2011/12 (2013).
- 52 ONS, Crime Statistics, Focus on Property Crime 2011/12 (2013) ONS, Crime Statistics, Focus on Property, fn.50 above, p.20. The network service provider would need to be contacted to put a “stop” on the mobile, so that the victim would not be liable for further unauthorised use of the phone. Of those who did not report the theft to the network service provider, the main reason given for not reporting the theft was either that the phone was returned to the owner (43%), or that it was a pay as you go phone (42%).
- 53 ONS, Statistical Bulletin: Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), p.28.
- 54 Home Office, Reducing Mobile Phone Theft and improving Security (2014) at https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/390901/HO_Mob [Accessed March 2017], p.2; ONS, Focus on Property Crime year ending March 2016 (2016), p.28.
- 55 Criminal Law Revision Committee, Eighth Report, Theft and Related Offences, Cmnd.2977 (1966), paras.33,60.
- 56 Theft Act 1968 s.7, as amended by the Criminal Justice Act 1991 s.26. The Sentencing Council has issued definitive sentencing guidelines for theft offences, which are in use from 1 February 2016: Theft Offences: Definitive Guideline (2015) at http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/SC-Theft-Offences-Definitive-Guideline-content_FINAL-web_.pdf [Accessed March 2017].
- 57 Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980 s.22A, as amended by the Anti-Social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 s.176(3) (in force from 13 May 2014). This provision also applies to offences of aiding and abetting low-value shoplifting: s.22A(7). This is subject to an exception: an adult defendant is given the opportunity before summary trial to elect Crown Court trial and, if the defendant so elects, the offence ceases to be summary and will be sent to the Crown Court (the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980 s.22A). The Prisons and Courts Bill 2016–2017 s.28, will, if enacted, allow this election to be made in writing, rather than by attending court. If the case is tried summarily, the maximum penalty is currently 6 months’ imprisonment.
- 58 Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 ss.1–11. Ministry of Justice Guidance, Penalty Notices for Disorder (PNDs) (2014) at https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/403812/penalty-notice-disorder-police-guidance.pdf [Accessed March 2017]. An offender may only receive one PND for shoplifting: paras 3.12–3.13. Such a notice is not regarded as a conviction: Hamer [2010] EWCA Crim 2053.
- 59 Ministry of Justice Statistics Bulletin, Criminal Justice Sentencing Statistics Quarterly Update to September 2016 England and Wales (2017), table Q2.1) at <https://www.gov.uk/government/statistics/criminal-justice-system-statistics-quarterly-september-2016> [Accessed March 2017]. The statistics show a dramatic downward trend in the use of PNDs for shoplifting, from a “highpoint” of 49,903 for the year ending September 2009.
- 60 16,218 out of 85,288 convictions: Ministry of Justice Statistics Bulletin, Criminal Justice Sentencing Statistics Quarterly Update to September 2016 England and

- Wales (2017), table Q5.3.
- 61 Ministry of Justice Statistics Bulletin, Criminal Justice Sentencing Statistics Quarterly Update to September 2016 England and Wales (2017), tables Q5.2a-c.
- 62 Lawrence v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1972] A.C. 626.
- 63 This is subject, of course, to numerous restrictions aimed at protecting the interests of others.
- 64 Anderton v Ryan [1985] A.C. 567.
- 65 Above, paras 1-022–1-026.
- 66 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.101.
- 67 Eddy v Niman (1981) 73 Cr. App. R. 237.
- 68 R. v Skipp [1975] Crim. L.R. 114.
- 69 R. v Fritschy [1985] Crim. L.R. 745.
- 70 H. Beale (ed), Chitty on Contracts, 32nd edn (London, Sweet & Maxwell, 2015), Vol.I paras, 7-111–7-122.
- 71 R. v Atakpu (Austin) [1993] 4 All E.R. 215.
- 72 Certain categories of land, wild flowers and wild animals cannot be stolen (s.4(2)–(4)) but could be obtained by deception as these subsections did not apply to s.15 (s.34(1)). Further, R. Heaton (“Deceiving without Thieving” [2001] Crim. L.R. 712) has argued that there could have been cases where, as a result of the defendant’s deception, ownership passed to the defendant prior to any appropriation so while property had been obtained by deception, there was no theft because the defendant was not appropriating property belonging to another.
- 73 In R. v Briggs (Linda Joan) [2004] 1 Cr. App. R. 34 a narrow interpretation of appropriation was adopted in order to avoid too great an overlap between theft and obtaining by deception. This approach is not consistent with the leading House of Lords’ decisions.
- 74 R. Heaton, “Deceiving without Thieving” [2001] Crim. L.R. 712.
- 75 R. v Gallasso (Lesley Caroline) (1994) 98 Cr. App. R. 284 at 289.
- 76 A. T. H. Smith, Property Offences (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1994), p.163.
- 77 E. Melissaris, “The Concept of Appropriation and the Offence of Theft” [2007] 70 M.L.R. 581, 590–591.
- 78 See also M. Giles and S. Uglow, “Appropriation and Manifest Criminality in Theft” (1992) 56 Jo. C.L. 179. E. Melissaris, “The Concept of Appropriation and the Offence of Theft” [2007] 70 M.L.R. 581 argues that “it is necessary the act [should] be manifested and sensibly identifiable” (p.596). Obviously one could not expressly employ a test of manifest criminality as this would involve asking the jury vague questions such as: does this conduct look like theft to you? What is suggested is that in developing a suitable test of appropriation the courts should have been, and hopefully Parliament will be, guided by this test.
- 79 J. C. Smith [2001] Crim. L.R. 163, 165.
- 80 D. Ormerod, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 13th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2011), p.784.
- 81 S. Gardner, “Property and Theft” [1998] Crim. L.R. 35. See also A. L. Bogg and J. Stanton-Ife, “Protecting the Vulnerable: Legality, Harm and Theft” (2003) 23 Legal Studies 402.
- 82 e.g. in relation to “belonging to another” under s.5.

- 83 See, e.g. Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 All E.R. 376; Starglade Properties Ltd v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314; Vivendi SA v Richards [2013] EWHC 3006 (Ch); Ivey v Genting Casinos UK Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club) [2016] EWCA Civ 1093; [2017] 1 W.L.R. 679.
- 84 J. Beatson and A. P. Simester, “Stealing One’s Own Property” (1999) 115 L.Q.R. 372, 374. cf. A. P. Simester and G. R. Sullivan, “On the Nature and Rationale of Property Offences” in R. A. Duff and S. P. Green (eds), Defining Crimes: Essays on the Criminal Law’s Special Part (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.170–181. cf. S. Green, “Theft and Conversion—Tangibly Different?” (2012) 128 L.Q.R. 564.
- 85 S. Shute, “Appropriation and the Law of Theft” [2002] Crim. L.R. 445, 455.
- 86 Below, paras 9-137–9-179.
- 87 C. M. V. Clarkson, “Theft and Fair Labelling” (1993) 56 M.L.R. 554.
- 88 A. T. H. Smith, Property Offences (1994), p.160.
- 89 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.906.
- 90 On its particular facts, R. v Pitham and Hehl (1976) 65 Cr. App. R. 45 is probably wrong. As all the parties concerned knew that Millman had no authority to sell the property, Millman was not “assuming the rights of owner”; it was a proposal for a joint theft (D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.906).
- 91 E. Melissaris, “The Concept of Appropriation and the Offence of Theft” [2007] 70 M.L.R. 581, states that under present English law: “The greater the proximity, the greater the risk to the owner’s rights” (588).
- 92 When a customer places money in a bank account, the bank owns that money but owes the customer a debt. This debt is a thing in action which is regarded as property under s.4.
- 93 Chan Man-sin v Att-Gen of Hong Kong (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 303 at 306.
- 94 R. v Hilton (Peter Arnold) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 445.
- 95 R. v Ngan (Sui Soi) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 331.
- 96 R. v Governor of Pentonville Prison Ex p. Osman (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 281.
- 97 In Sui Soi Ngan [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 331 the court equated the presenting of a cheque with the sending of a telex.
- 98 R. v Governor of Brixton Prison Ex p. Levin [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 225.
- 99 Theft Act 1968 s.22(1), see below, paras 9-230–9-235.
- 100 Wheatley v Commissioner of Police of the British Virgin Islands [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 21.
- 101 Re (A) v Snaresbrook Crown Court [2001] EWHC Admin 456 at [25].
- 102 Above, fn.100, at [11].
- 103 Chan Man-sin v Att-Gen of Hong Kong (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 303 at 306.
- 104 CLRC, 8th Report, Theft and Related Offences (1966), Cmnd.2977, para.37.
- 105 R. v Wheeler (Stephen Godfrey) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 279 at 283.
- 106 R. v Bloxham (Albert John) [1983] 1 A.C. 109 at 114, approved in Wheeler (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 279 at 284.
- 107 Specific offences have been created to criminalise certain squatters: the Criminal Law

- Act 1977 ss.6–7, Legal Aid; Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 s.144; N. Cobb, “Property’s Outlaws: Squatting, Land Use and Criminal Trespass” [2012] Crim. L.R. 114–127.
- 108 Whether an item “forms part of the land” is a question of land law, depending on the degree of annexation and the object of annexation. For guidance re this, see Elitestone Ltd v Morris [1997] 1 W.L.R. 687 HL; C. Harpum, S. Bridge and M. Dixon, Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property, 8th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2012), paras 23-005–23-010.
- 109 D. Ormerod and D. H. Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, 9th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2007), para.2.139.
- 110 The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 makes it an offence intentionally to pick, uproot or destroy certain wild plants: s.13 and Sch.8. See M. Welstead, “Seasons of Mist and Mellow Fruitfulness” (1995) 145 N.L.J. 1499. In 2006, a businesswoman was prosecuted for picking chanterelle mushrooms to sell to top London hotels and restaurants. The case was halted by the judge, who commented that It was “wholly inappropriate for public money to be spent on criminal proceedings such as these”: C. Milmo, “Mushroompicker wins court battle of the chanterelles” The Independent 17 May 2006, p.17.
- 111 cf. Cresswell v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin). There are, however, a number of statutory provisions which criminalise the poaching of various animals: see D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.915.
- 112 R. v Smith (Michael Andrew) [2011] EWCA Crim 66; [2011] 1 Cr. App. R. 30 at [7] (defendants guilty of robbery when they attacked a drug dealer and stole his heroin). A. T. H. Smith, “Can proscribed drugs be the subject of theft?” (2011) 70(2) C.L.J. 289–291.
- 113 R. v Davenport [1954] 1 W.L.R. 569 per Lord Goddard CJ at 576.
- 114 R. v Kohn (David James) (1979) 69 Cr. App. R. 395; R. v Hilton (Peter Arnold) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 445.
- 115 Williams [2001] 1 Cr. App. R. 362.
- 116 R. v Preddy (John Crawford) [1996] A.C. 815.
- 117 R. v Graham (Hemamali Krishna) [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 302.
- 118 Clark [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 14. This case concerned obtaining property by deception. The same principles, with regard to the meaning of property, apply to theft.
- 119 Theft Act 1968 s.20(3).
- 120 J. C. Smith, “Obtaining Cheques by Deception or Theft” [1997] Crim. L.R. 396, 400.
- 121 If a defendant presents, or intends to present the cheque, problems also arise in relation to the issue of whether he intends to permanently deprive the owner of the cheque: see below at para.9-124.
- 122 Patents Act 1977 s.30.
- 123 Att-Gen of Hong Kong v Nai Keung [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1339. For further analysis, see: S. P. Green, 13 Ways to Steal a Bicycle: Theft law In the Information Age (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2012), pp.234–269; S. P. Green, “Property Offenses” In M. D. Dubber and T. Hörnle (eds), The Oxford Handbook of Criminal Law (Oxford: OUP, 2014), pp.779–781.
- 124 Low v Blease [1975] Crim. L.R. 513.

- 125 R. v Herber (Peter) [2014] EWCA Crim 519. It is not, however, necessary to prove that the meter has been tampered with to prove the s.13 offence: R. v McCreadie (Malcolm) (1993) 96 Cr. App. R. 143.
- 126 Firth (1865–1872) L.R.1 C.C.R. 172; R. v Hughes (Colin David) [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 399.
- 127 Oxford v Moss (1978) 68 Cr. App. R. 183.
- 128 Absolom, The Times, September 14, 1983.
- 129 Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 ss.107, 198.
- 130 Trade Marks Act 1994 s.92.
- 131 Computer Misuse Act 1990 s.1.
- 132 G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 1983), p.739. cf. C. R. Davies, “Protection of Intellectual Property—A Myth?” (2004) J.C.L. 398.
- 133 A. P. Simester and G. R. Sullivan, “On the Nature and Rationale of Property Offences” in R. A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes (Oxford: OUP, 2005), pp.182–183. For further consideration of the issues in relation to the criminalisation of unauthorised access to data, see J. Clough, “Data Theft? Cybercrime and the Increasing Criminalization of Access to Data” (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 145–170.
- 134 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.150, Legislating the Criminal Code: Misuse of Trade Secrets (1997), para.3.26. See J. Hull, “Stealing Secrets: A Review of the Law Commission’s Consultation Paper on the Misuse of Trade Secrets” [1998] Crim. L.R. 246.
- 135 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.150, Legislating the Criminal Code: Misuse of Trade Secrets (1997), para.3.60.
- 136 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.150, Legislating the Criminal Code: Misuse of Trade Secrets (1997), para.1.30.
- 137 J. W. Harris, “Who Owns My Body?” (1996) 16 O.J.L.S. 55. See, generally, A. T. H. Smith, “Stealing the Body and its Parts” [1976] Crim. L.R. 622; J. Herring and P.-L. Chau, “My Body, Your Bodies, Our Bodies” (2007) 15 Med. L. Rev. 34.
- 138 R. v Bentham (Peter) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. 11.
- 139 Yearworth v North Bristol NHS Trust [2010] Q.B. 1. cf. Holdich v Lothian Health Board [2013] CSOH 197.
- 140 R. v Rothery (Henry Michael) [1976] R.T.R. 550. The defendant was charged with theft of the capsule containing the blood, not the actual blood itself. The appellant did not appeal the conviction for theft, but it may be argued that the Court of Appeal (albeit obiter) suggested that blood was property capable of being stolen: P. Matthews, “Whose Body? People as Property” (1983) C.L.P. 193, 224.
- 141 R. v Welsh [1974] R.T.R. 478. In Herbert (1961) 25 Jo. C.L. 163, a defendant was convicted of larceny and common assault by magistrates for cutting a girl’s hair without consent and “taking and carrying away” the hair once it had been cut. No point appears to have been taken as to whether “hair” could amount to “property”, and the case was not appealed. cf. DPP v Smith [2006] EWHC 94 (Admin), above para.7-035.
- 142 Moore v Regents of the University of California [1990] 271 Cal. Rptr 146. In Washington University v Catalona (2006) 437 F. Supp. 2d 985 a US District Court held that the university owned samples provided by participants enrolled in cancer

- research conducted by one of their employees. This was subsequently affirmed on appeal: (2007) 490 F. 3d 667 (8th Circuit Court of Appeals).
- 143 Human Tissue Act 2004 s.32. The prohibition on commercial dealings does not apply to “material which is the subject of property because of an application of human skill”: s.32(9)(c).
- 144 In 2005, Christopher Ibbotson, a laboratory manager, used his position to steal bones from a bone bank at Sheffield Hospital and to sell them to private clinics. He was charged with stealing the bones and with obtaining money by deception. The judge directed the jury to acquit him of the theft charges after Ibbotson pleaded guilty to 10 counts of obtaining money by deception and asked for 34 offences to be taken into consideration: The Guardian 20 January 2005; The Independent 23 December 2005.
- 145 Dr Handyside’s Case (1749) 3 East P.C. 652; Sharpe [1857] Dears & B. 160; Williams v Williams (1852) 20 Ch.D. 657.
- 146 D. Brahams, “Bailment and Donation of Parts of the Human Body” (1989) 139 N.L.J. 803. cf. Yearworth v North Bristol NHS Trust [2010] Q.B. 1.
- 147 R. v Kelly (Anthony Noel) [1999] Q.B. 621. In In the Matter of X [2003] J.C.A. 050, the Jersey Court of Appeal held that an aborted human foetus was incapable of forming the subject of a true property interest.
- 148 R. v Arnold (Lydon Ewart) [1997] 4 All E.R. 1 at 9.
- 149 Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 2 K.B. 142; R. v Rostron (Terry) [2003] EWCA Crim 2206.
- 150 R. v Woodman (George Eli) [1974] Q.B. 754.
- 151 Williams v Phillips (1957) 121 J.P. 163. Under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 s.60 it is an offence to interfere with waste sites and receptacles for waste. For a discussion of the legal issues in relation to “freegans”, who take and make use of discarded items, see S. Thomas, “Do Freegans Commit Theft?” [2010] 30 L.S. 98–125. cf. R. (on the application of Ricketts) v Basildon Magistrates’ Court [2010] EWHC 2358 (Admin): it was open to magistrates to find that bags of donated items left outside a charity shop had not been abandoned. The donors had not intended to abandon the property, but to gift it to the charity. In R. v Toleikis (Donald) [2013] EWCA Crim 600, it was held that clothing placed into a charity’s marked bags outside householders’ homes for the charity to collect had been gifted to the property and were therefore ‘property belonging to another’. Peñalver and Katyal suggest that doctrine of abandonment plays an important role in property law, since it helps to return property into circulation and reduces waste and need: E. M. Peñalver and S. K. Katyal, Property Outlaws: How Squatters, Pirates, and Protestors Improve the Law of Ownership (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2010) pp.202.
- 152 Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 2 K.B. 142; Rostron [2003] EWCA Crim 2206.
- 153 G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 1983), pp.749, 750. See also the criticisms expressed at A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), p.516, and J. Horder, Ashworth’s Principles of Criminal Law 8th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2016), p.395.
- 154 A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), p.515.
- 155 cf. R. v Meredith [1973] Crim. L.R. 253 where a defendant who had had his car towed away to a police yard took his car back without paying any fee. It was held that a charge of theft was improper as “the police had no right, as against the owner to retain it”. This Crown Court decision cannot be accepted. The police had possession or control of the car; it therefore “belonged” to them for the purposes of theft. The only proper route to an acquittal on these facts should have been lack of dishonesty.

- 156 R. v Bonner (George Andrew) [1970] 1 W.L.R. 838.
- 157 For fuller discussion, see fn.70, paras 9-020–9-024, 9-033.
- 158 A mistake is fundamental “if and only if its existence makes it reasonable to say that there is in fact no consent (intention, agreement) on the part of the transferor to transfer this property to this person”, G. Williams, “Mistake in the Law of Theft” (1977) 36 C.L.J. 63, 64.
- 159 A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), pp.519–522.
- 160 Kaur v Chief Constable of Hampshire [1981] 1 W.L.R. 578.
- 161 Gilks [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1371.
- 162 In R. v Goodwin (Phillip) [1996] Crim. L.R. 262, where a defendant inserted foreign money (of less value than the required coin) into a gaming machine, it was held that ownership in any coins paid out would not have passed. Such a ruling was unnecessary. The appropriation would occur as the defendant received each coin. At that moment, the property still belonged to the owner of the machine.
- 163 Chase Manhattan Bank v Israel British Bank [1981] Ch. 105.
- 164 For fuller discussion, see: A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), pp.525–529.
- 165 Powell v MacRae [1977] Crim. L.R. 571; 141 J.P. Jo. 432.
- 166 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.1 of 1985) [1986] Q.B. 491.
- 167 Att-Gen’s Reference (No.1 of 1985) [1986] Q.B. 491 at 507. cf. R. v Shadrokh-Cigari (Hamid) [1988] Crim. L.R. 465, where it was held that an equitable interest arising under a constructive trust was a proprietary interest for the purposes of s.5(1).
- 168 Company directors, agents and partners are in a fiduciary position. Employees may be in a fiduciary position, depending on their position and role within their employer’s organisation. For further discussion, see A. Arlidge, J. Fisher, A. Milne and P. Sprenger, Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, 5th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2016), paras 6-016–6-029; A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), p.528. See A. T. H. Smith, “Constructive Trusts in the Law of Theft” [1977] Crim. L.R. 395, 398, re the argument in favour of there being a fiduciary relationship between employers and employees.
- 169 Lister & Co v Stubbs (1890) 45 Ch.D. 1.
- 170 FHR European Ventures LLP v Cedar Capital Partners LLC [2014] UKSC 45.
- 171 See para.9-061, fn.168.
- 172 A. T. H. Smith, “Constructive Trusts in the Law of Theft” [1977] Crim. L.R. 395.
- 173 Bribery Act 2010 s.2. See A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), p.529. An employee receiving a secret commission or bribe might also be charged with fraud by abuse of position (Fraud Act 2006 ss.1, 4): R. v Knowles (Ross) [2013] EWCA Crim 646 at [14].
- 174 Dobson v General Accident Fire and Life Insurance Corp Plc [1989] 3 All E.R. 929 at 937.

- 175 CPS, The Fraud Act 2006: Legal Guidance (2008) at http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/d_to_g/fraud_act/#a04 (Accessed March 2017).
- 176 Arnold [1997] 4 All E.R. 1 at 9.
- 177 cf. Charities Act 2011 s.115; Halsbury's Law of England Vol.8, Charities, 5th edn (2015), paras 512, 589.
- 178 This obvious point was overlooked in R. v Dyke (Ian James) and Munro (Deborah Betty) [2002] 1 Cr. App. R. 30.
- 179 Arnold [1997] 4 All E.R. 1.
- 180 R. v Klineberg (Jonathan Simon) [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 427; Floyd v DPP [2000] Crim. L.R. 411.
- 181 Klineberg [1999] 1 Cr. App. R. 427; Floyd [2000] Crim. L.R. 411.
- 182 Floyd v DPP [2000] Crim. L.R. 411.
- 183 As there was no evidence of any contract between the defendant and the Home Farm, it is far from clear that she did in fact owe them any obligation. See J. Smith, "Commentary to Floyd v DPP" [2000] Crim. L.R. 412.
- 184 Germany v Kumar (No.1) [2000] Crim. L.R. 504.
- 185 R. v McHugh (Christopher John) (1993) 97 Cr. App. R. 335.
- 186 DPP v Huskinson [1988] Crim. L.R. 620 (QBD).
- 187 Lewis v Lethbridge [1987] Crim. L.R. 59.
- 188 Cited in R. v Wain (Peter) [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 660 at 664.
- 189 R. v Wain (Peter) [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 660
- 190 R. v Wills (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 297.
- 191 Wain [1995] 2 Cr. App. R. 660 at 666.
- 192 See also R. v Dubar (David Nicholas) [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 280 at 287.
- 193 R. v Hayes (John Allan) (1977) 64 Cr. App. R. 82. There are also dicta in Hall [1973] 1 Q.B. 496 to this effect.
- 194 R. v Mainwaring (Paul Rex) (1982) 74 Cr. App. R. 99.
- 195 R. v Dubar (David Nicholas) [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 280 at 287. Approved in Arnold [1997] 4 All E.R. 1 at 10 and Breaks and Huggan [1998] Crim. L.R. 349.
- 196 See, e.g. R. v Williams and Lamb [1995] Crim. L.R. 77. In R. v Hallam and Blackburn [1995] Crim. L.R. 323 the Court of Appeal was highly critical of the civil law technicalities that have been grafted on to s.5.
- 197 G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd edn (London: Stevens & Sons, 1983), p.752.
- 198 Although this case has now been overruled by FHR European Ventures LLP v Cedar Capital Partners LLC [2014] UKSC 45. See above, para.9-061.
- 199 R. v Clowes (Peter) (No.2) [1994] 2 All E.R. 316.
- 200 Above, paras paras 1-035–1-045.
- 201 Making off without payment contrary to the Theft Act 1978 s.3.
- 202 CPS, The Fraud Act 2006: Legal Guidance (2008).
- 203 Moynes v Cooper [1956] 1 Q.B. 439.

- 204 Gilks [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1341.
- 205 “Deceiving without Thieving” [2001] Crim. L.R. 712, 723.
- 206 R. v Shadrokh-Cigari (Hamid) [1988] Crim. L.R. 465.
- 207 Chase Manhattan Bank v Israel British Bank [1981] Ch. 105.
- 208 Feely [1973] 1 Q.B. 530.
- 209 R. v Small (Adrian Anthony) (1988) 86 Cr. App. R. 170; R. v Holden [1991] Crim. L.R. 478.
- 210 L. Bannerman, “Finders weepers: woman who took £20 note guilty of theft” The Times 1 March 2017.
- 211 Also, there could hardly be an intention permanently to deprive another of the property if the defendant believes it has been abandoned.
- 212 R. v Wood (Peter) [2002] EWCA Crim 832.
- 213 Wheatley v Commissioner of Police of the British Virgin Islands [2006] 2 Cr. App. R. 21 PC.
- 214 The Criminal Law Revision Committee gave two more limited instances that s.1(2) was designed to meet, viz., taking property that is either useless to the taker or which they intend to destroy (8th Report, Theft and Related Offences (1966) Cmnd.2977, p.125).
- 215 R. v Rao [1972] Crim. L.R. 451.
- 216 R. v Price (Ronald William) [1990] Crim. L.R. 200.
- 217 It is a misdirection to use a witness reaction (e.g. of shock) as the yardstick for measuring objective standards of dishonesty (R. v Green (Barry Roland) [1992] Crim. L.R. 292).
- 218 The courts sometimes fall into error here. e.g. in R. v Buzalek [1991] Crim. L.R. 115 the defendant admitted he had lied about certain payments. The court concluded for itself that he “was confessing to being dishonest”. This was, in fact, a legal pronouncement and so inconsistent with Feely. Having ascertained he had lied, it should have been for the jury to establish whether he was dishonest. (The defendant claimed these were “white lies” which he believed were justified in the circumstances.)
- 219 Gilks (1972) 56 Cr. App. R. 734.
- 220 When utilising this two-fold test it must be put to the jury in this order (Green [1992] Crim. L.R. 292).
- 221 R v Lockwood (1986) 2 BCC 99333. cf. R v Robertson (Mark) [2006] EWCA Crim 1289.
- 222 R. v Ghosh [1982] Q.B. 1053 per Lord Lane CJ at 1064.
- 223 J. Roberts, “Case comment: Dishonesty In the first LIBOR trial” [2016] 3 Archbold Review 7, 9. cf. N. Dent and A. Kervick, “Ghosh: a change in direction?” [2016] Crim. L.R. 553.
- 224 R. v Roberts (William) (1987) 84 Cr. App. R. 117.
- 225 It has been suggested (A. Halpin, “The Test for Dishonesty” [1996] Crim. L.R. 283) that Roberts allows the second limb of the Ghosh direction to be withheld from the jury in cases of “obvious dishonesty” even if the defendant raises the possibility that he believed others would not regard his conduct as dishonest. This view is not reflected in the practice of the courts. See, e.g. Price [1990] Crim. L.R. 200; Hyam

- [1997] Crim. L.R. 439; R. v Clarke (Victor Edward) [1996] Crim. L.R. 824.
- 226 R. v Wood (Peter) [2002] EWCA Crim 832, and in R. v Jouman (Bibi Shameera) [2012] EWCA Crim 1850 at [22].
- 227 R. v Balogun (Olaleken Tijani Oluranti) [2016] EWCA Crim 174 at [31].
- 228 The “Honesty Lab” study conducted by S. Fafinski and E. Finch: S. Connor, “Sexes Differ Over Dishonesty Says New Study” The Independent 7 September 2009; M. Henderson, “Many Potential Jurors Find it Hard to Tell Right From Wrong” The Times 7 September 2009.
- 229 R. Glover, “Can Dishonesty be Salvaged? Theft and the Grounding of the MCS Napoli” (2010) 74 J.C.L. 53–76, 55.
- 230 See, e.g. M. Wright, “MP’s expenses: how much can you claim? One rule for them, a very different set of rules and restrictions for the rest of us” The Sunday Telegraph 10 May 2009, p.8.
- 231 J. Roberts, above, fn.223, p.8. see, e.g. D. Brown, “Lords regarded expenses as salary” The Times 21 January 2011, p.22; C. Gammell, “Peer ‘thought expenses lie acceptable’” The Daily Telegraph 18 January 2011, pp.1,4.
- 232 Further calls have been made for a comprehensive statutory definition of dishonesty: P. R. Glazebrook, “Revising the Theft Act” (1993) 52 C.L.J. 191; A. Halpin, “The Test for Dishonesty” [1996] Crim. L.R. 283.
- 233 S. Connor, “Sexes Differ Over Dishonesty Says New Study” The Independent 7 September 2009.
- 234 R. v Lloyd (Sidney Douglas) [1985] Q.B. 829.
- 235 Warner (1970) 55 Cr. App. R. 93; R. v Cocks (Eugene George) (1976) 63 Cr. App. R. 79; Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 850.
- 236 R. v Fernandes (Roland Anthony) [1996] 1 Cr. App. R. 175 at 188.
- 237 DPP v Lavender (Melvyn) [1994] Crim. L.R. 297.
- 238 R. v Marshall (Adrian John) [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 282. See J. C. Smith, “Stealing Tickets” [1998] Crim. L.R. 723. See also DPP v SJ (A Juvenile) [2002] EWHC 291 where it was held that an intention to render something useless demonstrated an intention of treating an article as one’s own to dispose of.
- 239 Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 850.
- 240 R. v Vinall (George Alfred) [2011] EWCA Crim 2652; [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 29. L. H. Leigh, “Robbery, Contemporaneity and intent Permanently to Deprive” (2012) 176 J.P.N. 201–202.
- 241 Vinall [2011] EWCA Crim 2652 at [10].
- 242 This case is further discussed below, at para.9-124, in relation to the offence of robbery. See also R. v Zerei (Samuel Michael) [2012] EWCA Crim 1114.
- 243 Raphael [2008] EWCA Crim 1014.
- 244 R. v Waters (Sian) [2015] EWCA Crim 402.
- 245 R. v Waters (Sian) [2015] EWCA Crim 402 at [18]. cf. R v Coffey [1987] Crim. L.R. 498.
- 246 R. v Fernandes (Roland Anthony) [1996] 1 Cr. App. R. 175 at 188.
- 247 E. Griew, The Theft Acts, 7th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995), p.66.
- 248 This view is supported by D. Ormerod and D. Williams, Smith’s The Law of Theft, 9th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2007), pp.123–124.

- 249 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.155, Fraud and Deception (1999), para.19. While this proposal was made in relation to deception offences, the reasoning is equally applicable to theft.
- 250 Section 12A provides for an offence of aggravated vehicle taking to cover instances where a vehicle is taken by D contrary to s.12 and, after it is taken but before it is recovered, damage is caused, or injury inflicted in the circumstances specified in s.12A(2). See D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), pp.979–982. For further exceptions, see, e.g. the Postal Services Act 2000 s.84, and G. Williams, “Temporary Appropriation should be Theft” [1981] Crim. L.R. 129, 130.
- 251 CLRC, 8th Report, Theft and Related Offences (1966), Cmnd.2977, p.788. The offence was first created by the Road Traffic Act 1930 s.28 “to deal with a mischief which had even then become common” (para.82).
- 252 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.48.
- 253 CLRC, 8th Report, Theft and Related Offences (1966), Cmnd.2977, p.788.
- 254 R. v Williams (Hywell Rhys) [1953] 1 Q.B. 660; R. v Velumyl [1989] Crim. L.R. 299.
- 255 A similar argument was advanced in relation to London Underground tickets in Marshall [1998] 2 Cr. App. R. 282.
- 256 Duru (1973) 58 Cr. App. R. 151.
- 257 Preddy [1996] A.C. 815.
- 258 This was followed in Clark [2001] EWCA Crim 884. See the discussion above, para.9-048 regarding cheques as “property”.
- 259 Preddy [1996] A.C. 815 at 836–837. In fact, as the Court of Appeal in Roach acknowledged, “it is not now the practice of the banks in any event to return cheques which have been cashed to the original drawer of the cheque”: R. v Roach (Daniel) [2011] EWCA Crim 918 at [7].
- 260 Graham [1997] 1 Cr. App. R. 302.
- 261 Clark [2001] EWCA Crim 884.
- 262 R. v Hilton (Peter Arnold) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 445, approving Kohn (1979) 69 Cr. App. R. 395.
- 263 J. C. Smith, “Obtaining Cheques by Deception or Theft” [1997] Crim. L.R. 396.
- 264 Arnold [1997] 4 All E.R. 1 at 15.
- 265 See below, para.9-146.
- 266 Roach [2011] EWCA Crim 918 at [8].
- 267 Hussey (1979) 67 Cr. App. R. 131. But cf. the position in relation to s.9(1)(a) burglary: Att-Gen's References (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979) [1980] Q.B. 180. See below, fn.468.
- 268 Vinall [2011] EWCA Crim 2652; [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 29 at [19].
- 269 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.955-956. cf. A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan's Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), pp.550–551.
- 270 Kirwan and Power, Cybercrime: The Psychology of Online Offenders (Cambridge: CUP, 2013), pp.116–118; J. Clough, Principles of Cybercrime (Cambridge: CUP, 2010), pp.187–188; R. G. Smith, M. N. Holmes and P. Kaufman, “Nigerian Advance

- Fee Fraud”, Trends and Issues in Criminal Justice No.121 (Australian Institute of Criminology, 1996).
- 271 M. T. Whitty and T. Buchanan, “The Online Romance Scam: A Serious Cybercrime” (2012) 15 Cyberpsychology, Behavior and Social Networking 181–183, 181.
- 272 A. Bequcai, Computer Crime (Aeco Publishers Inc, 1978); M. Levi, Regulating Fraud (London: Tavistock Publications, 1987), pp.37–41 J. Clough, Principles of Cybercrime (Cambridge: CUP, 2010), pp.192–194.
- 273 R. Doswell and G. L. Simons, Fraud and Abuse of IT Systems (Manchester: National Computing Center, 1986).
- 274 D. R. Cressey, Other People’s Money (Glencoe: Free Press, 1953). Cressey’s explanatory framework for financial fraud is known as the “Fraud Triangle”. For a more recent consideration of the significance of the Fraud Triangle in relation to white-collar crime, see A. Schucter and M. Levi, “The Fraud Triangle Revisited” (2013) Security Journal 1–24. See also: E. C. Tomlinson and A. Pozzuto, “Criminal decision-making in organizational contexts” in S. R. Van Slyke, M. L. Benson and F. T. Cullen, The Oxford Book of White-collar Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2016), Chs 18.
- 275 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending September 2016 (2017) at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/bulletins/crimeinengla> [Accessed March 2017] p.12 It should be noted that this is the first full year that questions about fraud have been included In the CSEW and the results Included in the official statistics: the statistics are currently experimental and no comparison is possible with previous years at this stage.
- 276 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), p.12
- 277 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), pp.2, 40.
- 278 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), p. 40; Financial Fraud Action, Year-end 2016 fraud update: Payment cards, remote banking and cheque (2017).
- 279 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), p.39.
- 280 ONS, Crime in England and Wales, year ending September 2016 (2017), p.40.
- 281 M. Levi, Regulating Fraud (London: Tavistock Publications, 1987), p.23. See, e.g.: Association of Certified Fraud Examiners, Report to the Nations: on Occupational Fraud and Abuse, 2016 Global Fraud Study at <http://www.acfe.com/rtn2016.aspx> (2017) [Accessed March 2017]; Centre for Counter Fraud Studies, Annual Fraud Indicator 2016 (2016) at <http://www.port.ac.uk/media/contacts-and-departments/icjs/ccfs/Annual-Fraud-Indicator-2016.pdf> [Accessed March 2017]; M. Tunley, “Uncovering the Iceberg: Mandating the Measurement of Fraud in the United Kingdom” (2011) 39 Int. J. of Law, Crime & Justice 190–203, M. A. Cohen, “The Costs of White-collar crime” in S. R. Van Slyke, M. L. Benson and F. T. Cullen, The Oxford Handbook of White-collar Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2016), Ch.5.
- 282 Centre for Counter Fraud Studies, Annual Fraud Indicator 2016, p.6 at <http://www.port.ac.uk/media/contacts-and-departments/icjs/ccfs/Annual-Fraud-Indicator-2016.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 283 See, e.g. M. Button, F. Pakes and D. Blackburn, “All walks of life: A profile of household Insurers in the United Kingdom” (2016) 29 Security Journal 50; KPMG, Profiles of the fraudster: technology enables and weak controls fuel the fraud (2016) at <https://assets.kpmg.com/content/dam/kpmg/pdf/2016/05/profiles-of-the-fraudster.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 284 Sentencing Council, Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering: Definitive Guideline

- (2014, revised 2016).
- 285 E. Finch, “What a Tangled Web We Weave: Identity theft and the Internet” in Y. Jewkes (ed), Dot.cons: Crime, Deviance, and Identity on the Internet (Cullompton: Willan, 2003), pp.86–104.
- 286 D. Marron, “Alter Reality: Governing the Risk of Identity Theft” (2008) 48 Brit. J. Criminol. 20–38, 21; J. J. Clough, Principles of Cybercrime (Cambridge: CUP, 2010), pp.207–209.
- 287 D. Marron, “Alter Reality: Governing the Risk of Identity Theft” (2008) 48 Brit. J. Criminol. 20–38, 21; J. J. Clough, Principles of Cybercrime (Cambridge: CUP, 2010), p.23.
- 288 D. Marron, “Alter Reality: Governing the Risk of Identity Theft” (2008) 48 Brit. J. Criminol. 20–38, 21; J. J. Clough, Principles of Cybercrime (Cambridge: CUP, 2010), p.34.
- 289 per Holt CJ in Jones (1703) 91 Eng. Rep. 330.
- 290 W. Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown 344, 6th edn (1788).
- 291 CLRC, Eighth Report, Theft and Related Offences (1966), Cmnd.2977, para.38.
- 292 Theft Act 1968 s.15.
- 293 Theft Act 1968 s.15A, inserted by Theft (Amendment) Act 1996.
- 294 Theft Act 1968 s.16.
- 295 Theft Act 1968 s.20(2).
- 296 Theft Act 1978 s.1.
- 297 Theft Act 1978 s.2(1)(a).
- 298 Theft Act 1978 s.2(1)(b).
- 299 Theft Act 1978 s.2(1)(c).
- 300 R. v Lambie (Shiralee Ann) [1982] A.C. 449.
- 301 Nabina [2000] Crim. L.R. 481.
- 302 “The Idea of Criminal Deception” [1982] Crim. L.R. 721.
- 303 Re Holmes [2004] EWHC 2020; Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWHC 2673 (Admin) at [30]–[32].
- 304 Fraud Act 2006 s.1(3).
- 305 Sentencing Council, Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering: Definitive Guideline (2014, revised 2016)) at <https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-bribery-and-money-laundering-offences-Definitive-guideline2.pdf> [Accessed March 2017].
- 306 CPS, The Fraud Act 2006; Legal Guidance at <http://www.cps.gov.uk> [Accessed March 2017] (2008), p.6.
- 307 R. v McDermott (Joseph Mark) [2008] EWCA Crim 1713.
- 308 R. v Wenman (Joseph William) [2013] EWCA Crim 340. cf. R. v Davies (Tudor) [2008] EWCA Crim 980, where contracts for building work were solicited and cash deposits obtained, but the work was not done.
- 309 R v Formhals (Allen) [2013] EWCA Crim 2624.
- 310 United Arab Emirates v Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3419 at [56].

- 311 e.g. in United Arab Emirates v. Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3419, the court referred to MPS v Charles [1977] A.C. 177, R. v Gilmartin [1983] Q.B. 953 and DPP v Ray [1974] A.C. 370 at [20] and [54].
- 312 See further, A. T. H. Smith, Property Offences (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1994), pp.472–480.
- 313 Harris (1975) 62 Cr. App. R. 28.
- 314 DPP v Ray [1974] A.C. 370.
- 315 R. v Greig (Thomas Andrew) [2010] EWCA Crim 1183.
- 316 This was recognised by the trial judge in Greig [2010] EWCA Crim 1183 at [14].
- 317 R. v Gilmartin (Anthony) [1983] Q.B. 953 at 962. MPC v Charles [1977] A.C. 177 at 182. In R. v Hamilton (Winston) (1991) 92 Cr. App. R. 54 it was held that presenting a signed withdrawal slip at the bank is a representation that the bank is indebted to the person to that amount. cf. R v Choi (Beak) [2015] EWCA Crim 1089; [2015] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 55 (D transferred money from a school’s bank account into his personal bank account without authority).
- 318 Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3419. The defendant’s conduct took place in the United Arab Emirates (UAE), where it is a criminal offence to issue an uncovered cheque and the UAE were seeking her extradition. Under the Extradition Act 2003 she could only be extradited if the conduct amounted to an offence under UK law punishable by 12 months or more detention or imprisonment.
- 319 In R. v Awosika (Oluwabunmi) [2009] EWCA Crim 625 the defendant was convicted of fraud when she tried to purchase a Rolex watch with an unauthorized Amex card. cf. R. v Augunas (Darius) [2013] EWCA Crim 2046, considered below at para.9-156.
- 320 R. v Martin (Derek Paul) [2013] EWCA Crim 1986 at [8].
- 321 Martin [2013] EWCA Crim 1986 at [8].
- 322 DPP v Ray [1974] A.C. 370.
- 323 R. v Rai (Thomas) [2000] 1 Cr. App. R. 242.
- 324 cf. R. v Waas Jay [2015] EWCA Crim 1259 (Failure to disclose work pension when claiming pension credit and housing and council tax benefits); R. v Foxley (Caroline Ann) [2016] EWCA Crim 798 (failing to disclose change of circumstances when claiming benefits).
- 325 Above, para.9-022.
- 326 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), p.118.
- 327 S. Gardiner, “Appropriation in Theft: The Last Word?” (1993) 109 L.Q.R. 194, 198.
- 328 Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3419. cf. R. v Forrest (Nathan) [2014] EWCA Crim 308.
- 329 Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin) at [56].
- 330 A. P. Simester, Simester and Sullivan’s Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 6th edn (Oxford: Hart Publishing, 2016), p.632.
- 331 e.g. in Idrees v DPP [2011] EWHC 624 (Admin) the defendant, who had failed his driving theory test 15 times, procured another person to impersonate him to take the test. That person presented himself at the driving test centre on the relevant day, but was not allowed to take the test because he was identified as an imposter. Mr Idrees was convicted of fraud by false representation and his conviction was upheld by the Administrative Court.

- 332 Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3419 at [49]. cf. Voros v Hungary [2012] EWHC 518 (Admin): in concluding a hire-purchase agreement in respect of a car, the defendant was making a false (and dishonest) representation about his current intentions when he stated that he would pay the instalments as they fell due, when he knew that the car was shortly to be seized to satisfy a debt owed to a third party.
- 333 CPS, The Fraud Act 2006: Legal Guidance (2008), p.11.
- 334 cf. above, para.9-133, Holmes [2004] EWHC 2020 (Admin).
- 335 e.g. R. v Saunders (Gabrielle Yinka) [2012] EWCA Crim 1380; [2012] 2 Cr. App. R. (S) 26: use of a laptop to make fraudulent online applications for credit card accounts.
- 336 United States v Sarao [2016] Lloyds Rep FC 339 (Magistrates' Court). This case was an extradition case: see fn.318 above.
- 337 "The Fraud Act 2006—Criminalising Lying?" [2007] Crim. L.R. 193, 200.
- 338 D. Ormerod, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 13th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2011), p.886.
- 339 CPS, The Fraud Act 2006: Legal Guidance (2008), p.7.
- 340 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002), para.8.2 fn.5.
- 341 R. v Cornelius (Benjamin Jason) [2012] EWCA Crim 500.
- 342 Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500 at [28]–[29]. This is by virtue of the Land Registration Act 2002 s.29 and Sch.3: Halifax plc v Curry Popeck [2008] EWHC 1692 (Ch).
- 343 Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500 at [30].
- 344 Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500 at [33].
- 345 Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500 at [25], relying on Barclays Bank plc v Weeks, Legg and Dean [1999] Q.B. 309 and Midland Bank v Cox McQueen [1999] P.N.L.R. 593. The court refused to substitute a conviction for attempted fraud on the basis that he had dishonestly made a representation which, contrary to his belief, was in fact true.
- 346 R. v Gilbert (Stephanie Rae) [2012] EWCA Crim 2392 at [29].
- 347 Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Government Response to Consultations (2004), para.19.
- 348 D. Ormerod and K. Laird, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 14th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2015), p.1018.
- 349 cf. Taylor's Central Garages (Exeter) v Roper [1951] 2 T.L.R. 284.
- 350 Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Government Response to Consultations (2004), para.10.
- 351 R. v Woolven (Johnathan Robert) (1983) 77 Cr. App. R. 231.
- 352 Price (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 409 at 411. cf. R. v Razoq (Adil) [2012] EWCA Crim 674 at [81].
- 353 Price (1990) 90 Cr. App. R. 409 at 411.
- 354 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.155, Fraud and Deception (1999).
- 355 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002), para.7.77.
- 356 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.155, Fraud and Deception (1999), paras 7.39–7.53.

- 357 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002).
- 358 “Dishonesty and the Jury” in J. Griffiths (ed.), Philosophy and Practice (1985), p.75.
- 359 Gilbert [2012] EWCA Crim 2392.
- 360 See, e.g. Martin [2013] EWCA Crim 1986 (granting of contract of insurance a gain for the purposes of s.5 because it conferred valuable rights which were of monetary value).
- 361 The Guardian 4 July 2009; C. Monaghan, “To Prosecute or Not to Prosecute? A Reconsideration of the Over-zealous Prosecution of Parents under the Fraud Act 2006” (2010) 74 J.C.L. 259–278. The forging of documents (e.g. tenancy agreements) to support school applications may amount to an offence under the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 s.4: C. Monaghan, “School application forms and the criminal law” [2015] Crim LR 270. Similar difficulties appear to arise in relation to the use of s.2 Fraud Act 2006 to prosecute students who use contract cheating services: M.J. Draper, V. Ibezim and P.M. Newton, “Are essay mills committing fraud? An analysis of their behaviours vs. the Fraud Act 2006” [2017] 13(3) International Journal for Educational Integrity, online first edition.
- 362 cf. G.P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: little, Brown, 1978), pp.51–57.
- 363 Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Consultation on Proposals for Legislation (2004), para.20.
- 364 e.g. contracts of insurance are contracts of “utmost good faith” and those taking out insurance must disclose material facts to the insurer (Martin [2013] EWCA Crim 1986); an employee may be contractually required to disclose criminal convictions, or to give an undertaking that they are not working elsewhere (R. v Daley (Patricia Rose) [2010] EWCA Crim 2193).
- 365 cf. Forrest [2014] EWCA Crim 308, where the CA rejected an assertion that it was the usage or custom of the mortgage lending market that applicants for mortgages make full disclosure of matters relevant to the bargain beyond the information sought in the mortgage application form itself. In R. v White (Anthony Alan) [2014] EWCA Crim 714 at [14], it was held that the defendant was not under a duty, for the purposes of s.3, to inform his mortgage lender that he was unemployed when making a mortgage application.
- 366 Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Consultation on Proposals for Legislation (2004), para.20. For examples of cases in which it was held that, on the facts, no legal duty to disclose information arose, see Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin); [2012] 1 W.L.R. 3419 at [58]; Forrest [2014] EWCA Crim 308.
- 367 R. v Razoq (Adil) [2012] EWCA Crim 674. cf. R v Quinn (Phillip) [2015] EWCA Crim 428 (defendant failed to disclose to the Pensions Administrator that his mother had died, and continued to receive her widow’s pension).
- 368 Razoq [2012] EWCA Crim 674 at [83]. The defendant was also convicted of s.2 offences in respect of lies made on application forms.
- 369 R. v Twaite (Timothy) [2010] EWCA Crim 2973; [2011] 1 W.L.R. 1125. The defendant’s conviction for fraud by false representation was quashed because he had been convicted on the wrong basis.
- 370 M. Rowland and R. White, Social Security Legislation 2013. Vol.III, Administration, Adjudication and the European Dimension, 14th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2013), para.1.93. cf. B v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2005] EWCA Civ 929.
- 371 Above, paras 9-154–9-164.

- 372 R. v Pennock (Angela) and Pennock (Richard John) [2014] EWCA Crim 598; [2014] 2 Cr. App. R. 10.
- 373 Sam Theedom v Nourish Trading Ltd t/a CSP Recruitment [2016] EWHC 1364 (QB).
- 374 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002), para.7.39.
- 375 R. v Moss (Pamela Jane) [2013] EWCA Crim 1554.
- 376 R. v Turner (Ruth Louise) [2013] EWCA Crim 1206. cf. R. v Woods (Natalie Frances) [2011] EWCA Crim 1305.
- 377 cf. Knowles [2013] EWCA Crim 646.
- 378 R. v Evans (Eric) (No.2) [2015] EWHC 263 (QB); [2015] 1 W.L.R. 3595. cf. Att-Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1985) [1986] Q.B. 491.
- 379 For further discussion of the circumstances in which a fiduciary relationship arises, see A. Arlidge, A. Milne and P. Springer, Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, 4th edn (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2014), paras 6-009–6-043.
- 380 Ormerod, Smith and Hogan: Criminal Law, 13th edn (2011), p.907. For discussion re the rationale of the s.4 offence, see J. Collins, “Fraud by Abuse of Position: Theorising Section 4 of the Fraud Act 2006” [2011] Crim. L.R. 513–523.
- 381 Marshall [2009] EWCA Crim 2076; R. v Dhupar (Amy) [2015] EWCA Crim 2519.
- 382 cf. R. v Gale (Mark Diego) [2008] EWCA Crim 1344 (defendant used his position as an office manager for DHL to send a large crate from Heathrow to New York, certifying it as “known cargo” so that it avoided airport screening. In fact, the crate contained Khat, an illegal drug in the US.
- 383 cf. R. v Waqanika (Joeli) [2014] EWCA Crim 902 (defendant was the manager of a company engaged in erecting and moving stage scenery and was responsible for distributing payment to his co-workers, but instead of paying the money over, had squandered it).
- 384 R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745. See also: Pennock and Pennock [2014] EWCA Crim 598; [2014] 2 Cr. App. R. 10 at [6].
- 385 R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745 at [34]. See J. Collins, “Fraud by abuse of position and unlicensed gangmasters” [2016] 79 M.L.R. 354.
- 386 R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745 at [41].
- 387 R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745 at [43].
- 388 R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745 at [44].
- 389 R. v Valujevs (Juris) [2014] EWCA Crim 2888; [2015] Q.B. 745 at [43].
- 390 Above, paras 9-154–9-164.
- 391 Fraud Act 2006 s.6.
- 392 Fraud Act 2006 s.7.
- 393 Fraud Act 2006 s.11(3).
- 394 Ministry of Justice, Post-legislative Assessment of the Fraud Act 2006, cm.8372 (2012), para.25.
- 395 cf. Mikolajczak v Poland [2013] EWHC 432 (Admin), where the defendant had used the telephone numbers of 3 other people to obtain credit on his SIM card and had then made calls, which were charged to these three people. The conduct pre-dated the Fraud Act 2006, but the Administrative Court appeared to accept that it would now - amount to an offence under s.11 (at [9]).

- 396 The Law Commission No.276, Fraud (2002), para.8.2 fn.5.
- 397 CPS, The Fraud Act 2006: Legal Guidance (2008), p.24.
- 398 The Law Commission No.276, Fraud (2002), para.8.11. It could, however, be argued that deliberately remaining on someone else's boat after hearing the announcement and thus knowingly choosing to receive a free ride constitutes an "act".
- 399 R. v Widdowson (Stanley) (1986) 82 Cr. App. R. 314.
- 400 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud (2002), para.7.53.
- 401 Theft Act 1978 s.1(2).
- 402 J. C. Smith, The Law of Theft, 8th edn (London: Lexis Nexis, 1997), p.133.
- 403 Ormerod, Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law, 11th edn (2005), p.776 (discussing the 1978 Act).
- 404 Ormerod and Laird, Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law, 14th edn (2015), p.1035.
- 405 Home Office, Regulatory Impact Assessment: Fraud Bill (2006).
- 406 Hansard (HC), 13 March 2006 col.1110.
- 407 Ministry of Justice, Post-legislative Assessment of the Fraud Act 2006, Cm.8372 (2012), para.42.
- 408 R. v Brooks (Edward George) (1983) 76 Cr. App. R. 66 at 69.
- 409 R. v McDavitt [1981] Crim. L.R. 843. See also R. v Aziz [1993] Crim. L.R. 708.
- 410 D. Ormerod and D. Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, 9th edn (Oxford: OUP, 2007), p.230.
- 411 Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, 9th edn (2007), p.233.
- 412 G. Syrota, "Are Cheque Frauds Covered by Section 3 of the Theft Act 1978?" [1981] Crim. L.R. 413 and R. v Hammond [1982] Crim. L.R. 611.
- 413 Vincent [2001] Cr. App. R. 150.
- 414 Troughton v Metropolitan Police [1987] Crim. L.R. 138 (QBD).
- 415 Allen [1985] A.C. 1029.
- 416 The guideline sentence for magistrates where the goods or services are worth less than £200 and there is little or no evidence of pre-planning is a fine (Sentencing Guidelines Council, Magistrates' Court Sentencing Guidelines: Definitive Guideline (2009)), p.79. The Sentencing Council guideline in relation to this offence (2016) suggests a sentence range from a discharge to 36 weeks:
<https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/offences/item/making-off-without-payment-2/>
[Accessed March 2017].
- 417 Ministry of Justice, Penalty Notices for Disorder (PNDs) (2014), para 3.18 at https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/403812/penalty-notice-disorder-police-guidance.pdf [Accessed March 2017].
- 418 ONS, Focus on property crime: year ending March 2016 (2016), p.5.
- 419 ONS, Crime in England and Wales: year ending Sept 2016 (2017), p.21.
- 420 ONS, Crime in England and Wales: year ending Sept 2016 (2017), p.36.
- 421 ONS, Focus on Property Crime: year ending March 2016 (2016), p.11.
- 422 ONS, Crime in England and Wales: year ending Sept 2016 (2017), p.12.

- 423 ONS, Focus on Property Crime 2015/16 (2016), p.5.
- 424 ONS, Focus on Property Crime: year ending March 2016 (2016), p.4.
- 425 CSEW, Perception Measure Tables—Crime in England and Wales, Year Ending December 2012 (2013), table PM1.
- 426 ONS, Crime in England and Wales: year ending Sept 2016 (2017), p.12.
- 427 P. Mayhew and J. J. M. van Dijk, Criminal Victimization in Eleven Industrialised Countries: Key Findings from the International Crime Victims Survey (1997).
- 428 ONS, Focus on Property Crime 2012/13, Chapter 3: Burglary and Home Security (2013), pp.8–9. In 2012/13, the proportions of households burgled once was similar for various levels of house security (from “basic” to “enhanced”), but the proportion of households burgled more than once in the 12-month period was greater for households with no security (3%) than for households with higher levels of home security (0.5%): p.10.
- 429 I. Hearnden and G. Magill, Decision-making by House Burglars: Offenders’ Perspectives, Home Office Research Findings 249 (2004).
- 430 ONS, Crime Statistics—Focus on Property Crime, Chapter 1: Property Crime Overview (2013), Appendix table 1.01. In the 2012/13, CSEW it was found that only half (49%) of student households had “at least basic” security, compared with 80% of rented households: ONS, Focus on Property Crime 2012/13, Chapter 3: Burglary and Home Security (2013), p.6.
- 431 I. Hearnden and G. Magill, Decision-making by House Burglars: Offenders’ Perspectives, Home Office Research Findings 249 (2004).
- 432 G. P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978), pp.124–128.
- 433 Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), p.128.
- 434 Theft Act 1968 ss.8(2), 9(4), 10(2) and 22(2).
- 435 Ministry of Justice Statistics Bulletin, Criminal Justice Statistics, Quarterly Update to September 2016, England and Wales (2017), table Q1.3.
- 436 Sentencing Council, Robbery: Definitive Guideline (2016), p.5.
- 437 Sentencing Council, Robbery: Definitive Guideline (2016), p.17; O’Driscoll (1986) 8 Cr. App. R. (S.) 121.
- 438 Sentencing Council, Robbery: Definitive Guideline [2016], p.11. The Guideline indicated that sentences in excess of 20 years may be appropriate where multiple offences or a single conspiracy to commit multiple offences of particular severity are committed.
- 439 See, e.g. R. v Knight (Neville Wayne) [2010] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 84; CPS, Sentencing Dangerous Offenders http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/s_to_u/sentencing_and_dangerous_offenders/#b01 [Accessed March 2017].
- 440 Sentencing Council, Burglary Offences: Definitive Guidelines (2011), pp.9–10.
- 441 Sentencing Council, Burglary Offences: Definitive Guidelines (2011), pp.9–10; Powers of the Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 s.111.
- 442 R. v Robinson [1977] Crim. L.R. 173.
- 443 Dawson and James (1976) 64 Cr. App. R. 170; R. v Clouden [1987] Crim. L.R. 56.
- 444 Clouden [1987] Crim. L.R. 56.
- 445 Corcoran v Anderton (1980) 71 Cr. App. R. 104.

- 446 P v DPP [2012] EWHC 1657 (Admin); [2013] 1 W.L.R. 2335, discussed by D. Ormerod in the case commentary at [2013] Crim. L.R. 151–152.
- 447 In R. v Atakpu (Austin) [1994] Q.B. 69 the court was of the view that it should be left to the common sense of the jury to decide at what point the theft finished. This will determine whether the force was used at the time of the theft. See para.9-043.
- 448 R. v DPP [2007] EWHC 739 (Admin).
- 449 In a situation such as this the defendant may be convicted of theft or possibly attempted rape.
- 450 Including intention permanently to deprive the owner at the moment of taking the property: Vinall [2011] EWCA Crim 6252; [2012] 1 Cr. App. R. 29 at [12]; R. v Zerei (Samuel Michael) [2012] EWCA Crim 1114; R. v Waters (Sian) [2015] EWCA Crim 402. See above para.9-112.
- 451 Sentencing Council, Robbery: Definitive Guideline (2016).
- 452 Sexual Offences Act 2003 Sch.6 para.17.
- 453 Sexual Offences Act 2003 s.63.
- 454 This is the terminology employed by the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 s.111.
- 455 The same elements are required under s.9(1)(b) subject to the necessary modifications.
- 456 R. v Brown (Vincent) [1985] Crim. L.R. 212.
- 457 R. v Ryan (Lee Bernard) [1996] Crim. L.R. 320.
- 458 Brown [1985] Crim LR 212. cf. R. v McEneff [2014] EWCA Crim 1633, where the Court of Appeal held that the judge was wrong to direct the jury that, If, once the defendants had entered the premises, they had stolen, they would by definition have become trespassers because nobody would have given them permission to steal.
- 459 R. v Jones (John) [1976] 1 W.L.R. 672.
- 460 R. v Coleman (Kenneth) [2013] EWCA Crim 544; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 79: an inhabited narrow boat was held to be a building for the purposes of s.9(4).
- 461 Stevens v Gorley (1859) 7 C.B.(N.S.) 99.
- 462 Ormerod and Williams, Smith's The Law of Theft, 9th edn (2007), pp.257–258.
- 463 Either expressly or impliedly: R. v Walkington (Terence John) [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1169.
- 464 The indictment must specify that the property is a dwelling, and where this is disputed there should be alternative counts on the indictment, one specifying that the property is a dwelling and one charging non-domestic burglary, and the jury should determine the issue: R. v Flack (Perry) [2013] EWCA Crim 115; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 56. In Flack, the Court of Appeal declined to provide guidance as to how the Issue of whether property was a dwelling was to be determined (at [8]).
- 465 R. v Sticklen (Daniel John Lee) [2013] EWCA Crim 615 at [10].
- 466 An inhabited houseboat or caravan is a “dwelling”: Coleman [2013] EWCA Crim 544; [2013] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 79. See the case commentary by D. Thomas at [2013] Crim. L.R. 694–696.
- 467 Ormerod and Williams, Smith's The Law of Theft, 9th edn (2007), p.266; K. Laird, “Conceptualising the Interpretation of ‘Dwelling’ in Section 9 of the Theft Act 1968” [2013] Crim. L.R. 656–673.
- 468 A defendant who enters a building as a trespasser intending to steal only if he finds

- items worth stealing has sufficient mens rea for the purposes of s.9(1)(a) burglary: Att-Gen's References (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979) [1980] Q.B. 180; Ormerod and Williams, Smith's The Law of Theft, 9th edn (2007), p.263. cf. The position in relation to conditional intention and theft, above para.9-125.
- 469 Ormerod and Williams, Smith's The Law of Theft, 9th edn (2007), p.266. cf. Collins [1973] Q.B. 100 at 107, where It was held that the defendant must either know or be recklessness as to whether his entry on to the premises was with permission.
- 470 Theft Act 1968 s.10.
- 471 R. v Klass (Kennedy Francis) [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 453. Followed in R. v Wiggins (Zaro Pierre) [2012] EWCA Crim 885.
- 472 Klass [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 453 at 456.
- 473 Klass [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 453 at 456.
- 474 R. v Chevannes (Justin Lee) [2009] EWCA Crim 2725 per Moore-Bick J at [20]. This is a matter of fact for the jury.
- 475 For sentencing guidelines, see above, para.9-212.
- 476 Theft Act 1968 s.10(2).
- 477 Criminal Law Revision Committee, Eighth Report (1966), Cmnd.2977, para.132.
- 478 Mode of trial guidelines state that handling cases should be tried summarily unless the handler commissioned the theft, the offence has professional hallmarks or the property is of high value (the Consolidated Practice Direction—Criminal Procedure Rules (2013), para. V51.8 at <http://www.justice.gov.uk/courts/procedure-rules/criminal/practice-direction/part5#id6205904> [Accessed March 2017]).
- 479 Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Sentencing Data (2014), pp.14–17 at http://sentencingcouncil.judiciary.gov.uk/docs/Theft_offences_bulletin_-_FINAL.pdf [Accessed March 2017], p.51. This data was obtained prior to the publication of new sentencing guidance in respect of offences of handling stolen goods: Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Definitive Guideline (2016), pp.15-20.
- 480 Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Sentencing Data (2014).
- 481 See Theft Act 1968 s.24(2) and (3) and Att-Gen's Reference (No.1 of 1974) [1974] 2 All E.R. 899. The exception will be where it is possible to establish arranging to handle at some earlier time. Alternatively, a charge of attempting to handle stolen goods may be possible.
- 482 See R. v Hale (Robert Angus) (1979) 68 Cr. App. R. 415; Lockley [1995] Crim. L.R. 656.
- 483 At paras 9-042-9-044.
- 484 R. v Nicklin (David John) [1977] 1 W.L.R. 403 at 407.
- 485 R. v Kanwar (Rena Louise) [1982] 1 W.L.R. 845.
- 486 In directing the jury, the judge should avoid trying to distinguish the two terms: R. v Forsyth (Elizabeth) [1997] 2 Cr. App. R. 299 at 321.
- 487 Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Definitive Guidance (2016), http://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/SC-Theft-Offences-Definitive-Guideline-content_FINAL-web_.pdf [Accessed March 2017], pp.15–19.
- 488 A. P. Simester and G. R. Sullivan, “On the Nature and Rationale of Property Offences” in R. A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes (Oxford: OUP, 2005). See also, S. P. Green, 13 Ways to Steal a Bicycle: Theft Law in the Information Age

- (Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 2012), p.141.
- 489 Law Commission Consultation Paper No.155, Fraud and Deception (1999).
- 490 S. P. Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing: A Moral Theory of White-Collar Crime (Oxford: OUP, 2006), p.128.
- 491 cf. S. P. Green, 13 Ways to Steal a Bicycle: Theft Law in the Information Age (Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 2012), pp.187–189.
- 492 S. P. Green, 13 Ways to Steal a Bicycle: Theft Law in the Information Age (Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 2012), p.188.
- 493 The lives of a large majority of victims of burglary are affected for some weeks after a burglary, and over a quarter of such victims suffer serious shock (M. Maguire, “The Impact of Burglary upon Victims” (1980) 20 Brit. J. Criminol. 261). See also: R. I. Mawby, Burglary (London: Routledge, 2012), Ch.3.
- 494 R. v Stones (James) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 156. cf. M. De Lisi, E. Beauregard and H. Mosley, “Armed burglary: a marker for extreme Instrumental violence” (2017) 7 Journal of Criminal Psychology 3.
- 495 Model Penal Code s.223.1(2). For further discussion in relation to the MPC consolidation of theft and the effects of this in practice, see S.P. Green, fn.490, pp.20–23.
- 496 Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980 s.22.
- 497 Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980 s.22A (Inserted by the Anti-social Behaviour Crime and Policing Act 2014 s.176(3)). Since the defendant may still elect Crown Court trial, it is unlikely that this provision will significantly decrease the number of Crown Court shoplifting trials.
- 498 The Consolidated Practice Direction—Criminal Procedure Rules (2015), paras V.51.4–V.51.8.
- 499 Sentencing Council, Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offence: Definitive Guideline (2014), p.7.
- 500 Sentencing Council, Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines: Making off without payment: Definitive Guideline (2016) at <https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/offences/item/making-off-without-payment-2/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 501 Sentencing Council, Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines: Handling Stolen Goods: Definitive Guideline (2016) at <https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/offences/item/handling-stolen-goods-2/> [Accessed March 2017].
- 502 Sentencing Council, Burglary Offences: Definitive Guideline (2016), p.12. Or “economic, commercial or personal value” in the case of non-domestic burglaries, p.9.
- 503 Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Definitive Guideline (2015), pp.30–34.
- 504 Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 ss.1–11 (as amended by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012); Ministry of Justice Guidance, Penalty Notices for Disorder (PNDs) (2013).
- 505 Ministry of Justice Statistics Bulletin, Criminal Justice Sentencing Statistics Quarterly Update to September 2016 England and Wales (2017), table Q2.11.6(1) at <https://www.gov.uk/government/statistics/criminal-justice-system-statistics-quarterly-september-2016> [Accessed March 2017].

- 506 R. v Page (Cyril Edward) [2005] 2 Cr. App. R. (S.) 37 at [3].
- 507 The British Retail Consortium (BRC) estimated that, for the year ending March 2015, the average value of shoplifting per incident was £ per theft: ONS, Focus on property crime: year ending March 2016 (2016) at <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/bulletins/focusonprop> [Accessed March 2017], p.19.
- 508 R. F. Sparks, H. G. Genn and D. J. Dodd, Surveying Victims (Chichester: John Wiley, 1977).
- 509 The British Retail Consortium estimated that in 2015 only approximately 15% of customer thefts were reported to police: BRC, 2015 Retail Crime Survey (2016), p.10.
- 510 C. Foote and R. J. Levy, Criminal Law: Cases and Materials (Kingston: Wolters Kluwer, 1981), p.757.
- 511 S. P. Green, fn.488, pp.167-168.
- 512 Citizens Advice, CAB Evidence Briefing: Uncivil Recovery (2010).
- 513 R. v Wood (Maurice) (1979) 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 34.
- 514 Home Office, Shoplifting, and Theft by Shop Staff (1973), para.6.16.
- 515 Report of the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Criminal Sentencing, Fair and Certain Punishment (1976), p.18.
- 516 Executive Advisory Committee on Sentencing in New York, Crime and Punishment in New York (1979), p.220.
- 517 A. P. Simester and G. R. Sullivan, "On the Nature and Rationale of Property Offences" in R. A. Duff and S. Green (eds), Defining Crimes (Oxford: OUP, 2005), p.187. cf. J. Chalmers and F. Leverick, "Fair Labelling in Criminal Law" (2008) 71 M.L.R. 217, 239.
- 518 Law Commission Paper No.276, Fraud, Cm.5560 (2002), para.3.20.
- 519 Above, para.9-011.
- 520 Sentencing Guidelines Council, Theft and Burglary in a Building Other than a Dwelling: Definitive Guideline (2008).
- 521 Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Definitive Guideline (2015).
- 522 Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Guideline Consultation (2014).
- 523 Sentencing Council, Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences: Definitive Guideline (2016).
- 524 Sentencing Council, Burglary Offences: Definitive Guideline (2011).

INDEX

This index has been prepared using Sweet and Maxwell's Legal Taxonomy. Main index entries conform to keywords provided by the Legal Taxonomy except where references to specific documents or non-standard terms (denoted by quotation marks) have been included. These keywords provide a means of identifying similar concepts in other Sweet & Maxwell publications and online services to which keywords from the Legal Taxonomy have been applied. Readers may find some minor differences between terms used in the text and those which appear in the index. Suggestions to sweetandmaxwell.taxonomy@thomson.com.

(All references are to paragraph number)

Abandonment

attempts, 5-042—5-048

Abetting

See also Secondary parties

introduction, 6-008

Abnormality of mind

See Diminished responsibility

Accessories

'abet', 6-008—6-009

'aid', 6-008—6-009

assistance and encouragement

counselling, 6-017

failure to exercise control, 6-016

introduction, 6-013

joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021

reform proposals, 6-044—6-045

unplanned presence at crime, 6-014—6-015

blameworthiness, 6-078

causation, 6-010—6-012

conclusion

blameworthiness, 6-078

causing harm, 6-079—6-085

introduction, 6-077

lesser liability, 6-086—6-088

'counsel', 6-008—6-009

counselling

generally, 6-022—6-037

introduction, 6-017

‘derivative liability’, 6-003

encouragement

counselling, 6-017

failure to exercise control, 6-016

introduction, 6-013

joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021

reform proposals, 6-044—6-045

unplanned presence at crime, 6-014—6-015

failure to exercise control, 6-016

guilty of graver offence than one committed, 6-058—6-060

harm, 6-079—6-085

introduction, 6-001—6-005

joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021

liability, 6-008—6-009

limits of liability

graver offence than one committed, 6-058—6-060

no principal offender, 6-050—6-057

victims, 6-067

withdrawal from criminal enterprise, 6-061—6-066

mens rea

act of assisting or encouraging principal offender, 6-023

introduction, 6-022

offence committed by principal offender, 6-024—6-037

no fault offence, and; 6-048—6-049

participating in joint criminal venture, 6-046—6-047

principal offenders, and, 6-006—6-007

‘procure’, 6-008—6-009

procuring, 6-038—6-040

punishment, 6-086—6-088

reform proposals, 6-041—6-049

transferred malice, 6-073—6-076

unplanned presence at crime, 6-014—6-015

victims, and, 6-067—6-072

withdrawal from criminal enterprise, 6-061—6-066

Actual bodily harm

actus reus, 7-033—7-039 consent, and, 4-069
introduction, 7-032
meaning, 7-034—7-036
mens rea, 7-040—7-042
psychiatric harm, 7-037—7-039
punishment, 7-043

Actus reus

actual bodily harm, 7-033—7-039
assault, 7-006—7-018
assault by penetration, 7-149
attempts abandonment, 5-042—5-048
 act more than merely preparatory, 5-024—5-040
 reform, 5-041
battery, 7-021—7-026
burglary, 9-221—9-224
causation approaches, 2-074—2-079
 conclusion, 2-119
 factual causation, 2-084
 general principles, 2-080—2-082
 intervening events, 2-088—2-118
 introduction, 2-071—2-074
 legal causation, 2-085—2-118 mens rea approach, 2-078—2-079
 natural events, 2-089
 policy approach, 2-075—2-077
 third party acts, 2-091—2-102
 victims' acts, 2-103—2-118
conduct crimes
 generally, 2-006—2-007
 omissions, 2-029
elements
 causation, 2-071—2-119
 introduction, 2-006—2-007
 legally relevant circumstances, 2-070 voluntary act, 2-008—2-069

encouraging or assisting crime

encouraging or assisting an offence believing it will be committed, 5-135

encouraging or assisting offences believing one or more will be committed, 5-139

intentionally encouraging or assisting, 5-130

punishment, 5-151

fraud by abuse of position, 9-172—9-178

fraud by failing to disclose information, 9-168

fraud by false representation, 9-143—9-151

generally, 2-001—2-002

grievous bodily harm, 7-045—7-052

grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-058

handling stolen goods, 9-232—9-233

introduction, 2-003—2-005

legally relevant circumstances, 2-070

making off without payment, 9-201—9-206

mistake, and, 2-258—2-262

murder, 8-006—8-007

obtaining services dishonestly, 9-187—9-192

offences against the person

actual bodily harm, 7-033—7-039

assault, 7-006—7-018

battery, 7-021—7-026

grievous bodily harm, 7-045—7-052

grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-058

unlawful wounding, 7-045—7-052

wounding with intent, 7-058

offences against property

burglary, 9-221—9-224

handling stolen goods, 9-232—9-233

omissions

causation, and, 2-051—2-053

conduct crimes, 2-029

distinguishing positive acts, 2-050

general duty to act, 2-054—2-068

introduction, 2-029

legal duty to act, 2-030—2-045

performance of duty, 2-046—2-049

punishment, 2-069

- result crimes, 2-029
- rape, 7-139
- relationship with mens rea
 - generally, 2-237—2-248
 - introduction, 2-236
 - mistake, 2-257—2-282
 - transferred malice, 2-249—2-256
- result crimes
 - generally, 2-006—2-007
 - omissions, 2-029
- sexual assault, 7-150—7-154
- sexual offences
 - assault by penetration, 7-149
 - rape, 7-139
 - sexual assault, 7-150—7-154
- ‘situational liability’, 2-015
- status offences, 2-015—2-028
- unlawful wounding, 7-045—7-052
- voluntary act, 2-008—2-014
- wounding with intent, 7-058

Age

- defences, and
 - below the age of 10, 4-363
 - from the age of 10, 4-364
 - introduction, 4-361—4-362
 - overview, 4-033

Aggravated assault

- actual bodily harm
 - actus reus, 7-033—7-039
 - introduction, 7-032
 - meaning, 7-034—7-036
 - mens rea, 7-040—7-042
 - psychiatric harm, 7-037—7-039
 - punishment, 7-043
- grievous bodily harm
 - actus reus, 7-045—7-052
 - generally, 7-044
 - mens rea, 7-053—7-055

- punishment, 7-056
- grievous bodily harm with intent
 - actus reus, 7-058
 - generally, 7-057
 - intent, 7-061
 - maliciously, 7-060
 - mens rea, 7-059—7-061
 - punishment, 7-062
- introduction, 7-031
- racially aggravated offences
 - generally, 7-063—7-065
 - immediately before or after the commission of the offence, 7-072—7-073
 - meaning, 7-066—7-071
 - punishment, 7-074
 - racial group, 7-071
- religiously aggravated offences
 - generally, 7-063—7-065
 - immediately before or after the commission of the offence, 7-072—7-073
 - meaning, 7-066—7-071
 - punishment, 7-074
 - religious group, 7-071
- unlawful wounding
 - actus reus, 7-045—7-052
 - generally, 7-044
 - mens rea, 7-053—7-055
 - punishment, 7-056
- wounding with intent
 - actus reus, 7-058
 - generally, 7-057
 - intent, 7-061
 - maliciously, 7-060
 - mens rea, 7-059—7-061
 - punishment, 7-062

Aggravated vehicle-taking

- generally, 8-202

Aggravating factors

- See* Sentencing

Aiding and abetting

See also Secondary parties
introduction, 6-008

Aggregation doctrine

See Corporate liability

Appropriation

See also Theft

bona fide purchasers, 9-046 continuing appropriation, 9-042—9-044
control, 9-038—9-040
generally, 9-014—9-037
no need for loss, 9-045
timing, 9-041

Assault

actual bodily harm
 actus reus, 7-033—7-039
 introduction, 7-032
 meaning, 7-034—7-036
 mens rea, 7-040—7-042
 punishment, 7-043
 psychiatric harm, 7-037—7-039
actus reus, 7-006—7-018 conditional threats, 7-010 empty threats, 7-010
generally, 7-005
immediacy of threat, 7-011—7-013
intoxication, and, 4-326
introduction, 7-004
mens rea, 7-019
punishment, 7-030
stalking, 7-014—7-018
words, 7-007—7-009

Assault by penetration

actus reus, 7-149
child sex offences, 7-159
generally, 7-149
mens rea, 7-149
sentencing, 7-165

Assisted suicide encouraging or assisting, 8-153—8-155

Attempts

abandonment, 5-042—5-048

act more than merely preparatory common law, 5-028

conclusion, 5-040

‘equivocality test’, 5-028

introduction, 5-024—5-026

‘proximity test’, 5-028

‘Rubicon test’, 5-028

‘series of acts test’, 5-028

statute, under, 5-029—5-039

‘substantial step test’, 5-028

actus reus

abandonment, 5-042—5-048

act more than merely preparatory, 5-024—5-040

reform, 5-041

criminology, 5-002

impossibility common law, at, 5-068—5-071

ineptitude, 5-071

introduction, 5-067

legal impossibility, 5-069

physical impossibility, 5-070

statute, under, 5-072—5-083

intoxication, and, 4-325

mens rea, 5-049—5-066

preparatory acts

common law, 5-028

conclusion, 5-040

‘equivocality test’, 5-028

introduction, 5-024—5-026

‘proximity test’, 5-028

‘Rubicon test’, 5-028

‘series of acts test’, 5-028

statute, under, 5-029—5-039

‘substantial step test’, 5-028

punishment, 5-006—5-023

purpose, 5-002—5-005

reform, 5-041

Automatism

generally, 4-292—4-293

overview, 4-032

psychiatry's view, 4-294—4-295

public interest, 4-296—4-298

Bank accounts

property, 9-048

Battery

actus reus, 7-021—7-026

force, 7-021

generally, 7-020

indirect force, 7-024—7-026

introduction, 7-004

mens rea, 7-027—7-029

punishment, 7-030

Belonging to another

See Theft

Blame

See Mens rea

Body parts

theft, 9-051

Burglary

actus reus, 9-221—9-224

aggravated offence, 9-227

'building or part of a building', 9-224

dwelling, 9-225

'enters', 9-222

generally, 9-217—9-220

intoxication, and, 4-323

legal background, 9-211

mens rea, 9-226

punishment, 9-228

sociological background, 9-210

'trespasser', 9-223

“But for test”

factual causation, 2-084

generally, 2-078

legal causation, 2-085—2-086

Caldwell recklessness

See Recklessness

Capacity theory

See Mens rea

Careless driving

causing death

generally, 8-188—8-193

when under the influence, 8-194—8-196

Causation

act of victim

drugs supplied, 2-107—2-111

escape, 2-103—2-106

other action/inaction/condition, 2-112—2-118

approaches

introduction, 2-074

mens rea approach, 2-078—2-079

policy approach, 2-075—2-077

'but for' test

factual causation, 2-084

generally, 2-073

legal causation, 2-085—2-086

conclusion, 2-119

drugs supplied to victim, 2-107—2-111

escape of victim, 2-103—2-106

factual causation, 2-084

general principles, 2-080—2-082

intervening events

human intervention, 2-090—2-118

introduction, 2-088

natural events, 2-089

third party acts, 2-091—2-102

victims' acts, 2-103—2-118

introduction, 2-071—2-074

legal causation

general propositions, 2-087

intervening events, 2-088—2-118

- introduction, 2-085—2-086
- mens rea approach, 2-078—2-079
- novus actus interveniens
 - human intervention, 2-090—2-118
 - introduction, 2-088
 - natural events, 2-089
 - third party acts, 2-091—2-102
 - victims' acts, 2-103—2-118
- omissions, and, 2-051—2-053
- policy approach, 2-075—2-077
- secondary parties, and, 6-010—6-012
- third party acts, 2-091—2-102

Causing death by aggravated vehicle-taking

See Aggravated vehicle-taking

Causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving

- careless driving, 8-188—8-193
- generally, 8-188—8-193
- when under the influence, 8-194—8-196

Causing death by dangerous driving

- current law, 8-184—8-186
- 'dangerous driving', 8-187
- introduction, 8-174
- rationale, 8-175—8-183
- sentencing, 8-187

Causing death by driving

- generally, 8-197—8-202

Causing death by unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured driving

See Causing death by driving

Causing death of children or vulnerable adults

- generally, 8-164—8-171

Causing death when under the influence

- generally, 8-194—8-196

Causing serious injury by dangerous driving

- generally, 7-075—7-077
- punishment, 7-078

Causing sexual activity without consent

- generally, 7-155—7-156

Caveat emptor

fraud, 9-131

Censure

See Sentencing

“Character theory”

excusatory defences, and, 4-015—4-016

mens rea, and, 2-128

Chastisement

See Reasonable chastisement

Cheque cards

fraud by false representation, 9-146

Cheques

fraud by false representation, 9-146

Child sex offences

generally, 7-157—7-164

Cognition

See Mens rea

Community service orders

corporate liability, and, 3-145

Conduct

See also Actus reus

elements, 2-006—2-007

generally, 2-001—2-002

introduction, 2-003—2-005

omissions, 2-030—2-069

relationship with mens rea, 2-237—2-248

status offences, 2-015—2-028

statutory conspiracy, and, 5-103—5-108

voluntary act, 2-008—2-014

Conduct crimes

See Actus reus

Consent

actual bodily harm, 4-069

degree of harm, 4-051—4-069

employment injury, 4-066

‘horseplay’, 4-068

introduction, 4-044

nature of harm, 4-051—4-069

overview, 4-013

rationale, 4-070—4-073
reality of, 4-045—4-050
reform proposals, 4-074—4-076
ritualistic procedures, 4-067 serious injury, 4-055—4-064
sexual offences
 ‘active’ deceptions, 7-123—7-126
 capacity, 7-115—7-118
 conclusive presumptions, 7-129—7-129
 definition, 7-111—7-118
 evidential presumptions, 7-129
 failure to disclose information, 7-128
 freedom, 7-112—7-114
 generally, 7-105—7-109
 impersonation, 7-121
 nature or purpose of act, 7-122—7-126
 precondition deceptions, 7-127
 presumptions, 7-119—7-129
 relationship between definition and presumptions, 7-130—7-131
 statutory provisions, 7-110
sporting injuries, 4-065
surgical procedures, 4-067

Consequentialist theories

See Sentencing

Conspiracy

common law, at, 5-096—5-099 corrupt public morals, to, 5-099 defraud, to
 introduction, 5-094
 scope of offence, 5-096—5-098
 statutory conspiracy, and, 5-095
introduction, 5-084
outrage public decency, to, 5-099
punishment, 5-090—5-092
purpose, 5-085—5-089
statutory conspiracy agreement between persons, 5-101 carried out in accordance with intentions, 5-109—5-116

- course of conduct, 5-103—5-108
- definition, 5-100
- impossibility, 5-118
- jurisdiction, 5-120
- necessarily amount to crime, 5-117
- object of agreement, 5-102—5-119
- repentance, 5-119

types, 5-093

Conspiracy to defraud

- generally, 9-197
- introduction, 5-094
- scope of offence, 5-096—5-098
- statutory conspiracy, and, 5-095

Constructive manslaughter

See Unlawful act manslaughter

Corporate culture

See Corporate liability

Corporate liability

- adverse publicity advertisements, 3-146
- aggregation doctrine, 3-078
- community service orders, 3-145
- corporate culture doctrine
 - corporate manslaughter, 3-117
 - generally, 3-082—3-086
- corporate manslaughter
 - ‘any other relevant matters’, 3-118
 - causing death, 3-119—3-121
 - common law, and, 3-125—3-126
 - core elements, 3-096—3-098
 - corporate culture, 3-117
 - duty of care, 3-102—3-104
 - exemption of individuals, 3-127—3-129
 - failure to comply with health and safety legislation, 3-115
 - gross breach of duty, 3-112—3-118
 - homicide, and, 8-203
 - individuals, and, 3-127—3-129
 - introduction, 3-096—3-098
 - need for offence, 3-130—3-132

- ‘organisation’, 3-099—3-101
- relationship to health and safety legislation, 3-122—3-124
- senior management failure, 3-105—3-111
- sentencing, 3-138—3-141
- corporate probation, 3-146
- corporate rehabilitation orders, 3-147
- current law
 - direct liability, 3-070—3-076
 - introduction, 3-062
 - vicarious liability, 3-063—3-069
- death at work, for
 - corporate manslaughter, 3-096—3-132
 - failings of identification doctrine, 3-092—3-095
 - introduction, 3-088
 - law in action, 3-089—3-091
- deferred prosecution agreements, 3-148—3-149
- deterrence, and, 3-058
- direct liability, 3-070—3-076
- ‘equity fines’, 3-145
- fatal accidents, for
 - corporate manslaughter, 3-096—3-132
 - failings of identification doctrine, 3-092—3-095
 - introduction, 3-088
 - law in action, 3-089—3-091
- fines
 - corporate manslaughter, 3-138—3-141
 - health and safety offences, 3-138—3-141
 - other corporate offences, 3-138—3-141
- function, 3-058—3-061
- identification doctrine
 - failings of, 3-092—3-095
 - generally, 3-070—3-076
- injury at work, for
 - corporate manslaughter, 3-096—3-132
 - failings of identification doctrine, 3-092—3-095
 - introduction, 3-088
 - law in action, 3-089—3-091
- internal restructuring orders, 3-146

- introduction, 3-054—3-057
- legal personality of company, 3-054
- manslaughter, 3-096—3-132
- non-fatal injuries, for, 3-133—3-136
- profit orders, 3-147
- publicity orders, 3-142—3-144
- punishment
 - adverse publicity advertisements, 3-146
 - community service orders, 3-145
 - corporate probation, 3-146
 - corporate rehabilitation orders, 3-147
 - deferred prosecution agreements, 3-148—3-149
 - ‘equity fines’, 3-145
 - finances, 3-138—3-141
 - internal restructuring orders, 3-146
 - introduction, 3-137
 - profit orders, 3-147
 - publicity orders, 3-142—3-144
 - remedial orders, 3-142—3-144
- purpose, 3-058—3-061
- reactive corporate fault, 3-079—3-081
- remedial orders, 3-142—3-144
- restructuring
 - aggregation doctrine, 3-078
 - corporate culture doctrine, 3-082—3-086
 - introduction, 3-077
 - reactive corporate fault, 3-079—3-081
- sentencing
 - adverse publicity advertisements, 3-146
 - community service orders, 3-145
 - corporate probation, 3-146
 - corporate rehabilitation orders, 3-147
 - deferred prosecution agreements, 3-148—3-149
 - ‘equity fines’, 3-145
 - finances, 3-138—3-141
 - internal restructuring orders, 3-146
 - introduction, 3-137
 - profit orders, 3-147

- publicity orders, 3-142—3-144
- remedial orders, 3-142—3-144
- serious injuries, for, 3-133—3-136
- vicarious liability, 3-063—3-069

Corporate manslaughter

- ‘any other relevant matters’, 3-118
- causing death, 3-119—3-121
- common law, and, 3-125—3-126
- core elements, 3-096—3-098
- corporate culture, 3-117
- duty of care, 3-102—3-104
- exemption of individuals, 3-127—3-129
- failure to comply with health and safety legislation, 3-115
- gross breach of duty, 3-112—3-118
- homicide, and, 8-203
- individuals, and, 3-127—3-129
- introduction, 3-096—3-098
- need for offence, 3-130—3-132
- ‘organisation’, 3-099—3-101
- relationship to health and safety legislation, 3-122—3-124
- senior management failure, 3-105—3-111
- sentencing, 3-138—3-141

Corruption of public morals

- conspiracy, 5-099

Counselling and procuring

- See also* Secondary parties
- generally, 6-008
- meaning, 6-009
- mens rea
 - generally, 6-022—6-037
 - introduction, 6-017

Credit cards

- fraud by false representation, 9-146

Crime reduction

- punishment, and, 1-053

Criminal conduct

- criteria
 - conditions, 1-004

- introduction, 1-004
- necessary to employ criminal law, 1-035—1-045
- permissible to criminalise, 1-046—1-052
- wrongful conduct, 1-005—1-034
- human rights, and, 1-046—1-052
- introduction, 1-003
- necessary to employ criminal law, 1-035—1-045
- permissible to criminalise, 1-046—1-052
- wrongful conduct
 - generally, 1-005
 - harm and offence principle, 1-019—1-029
 - legal moralism, 1-006—1-018
 - legal paternalism, 1-030—1-034

Criminal law

- function, 1-001
- introduction, 1-001—1-002
- operation, 1-001
- rationale, 1-002
- sanctions, 1-002

Criminal liability

- actus reus
 - elements, 2-006—2-007
 - generally, 2-001—2-002
 - introduction, 2-003—2-002
 - omissions, 2-030—2-005
 - relationship with mens rea, 2-237—2-248
 - status offences, 2-015—2-028
 - voluntary act, 2-008—2-014
- blame, 2-001—2-002
- causation
 - approaches, 2-074—2-118
 - conclusion, 2-119
 - introduction, 2-071—2-073
- conduct, 2-001—2-002
- corporate liability
 - aggregation doctrine, 3-078
 - corporate culture doctrine, 3-082—3-086
 - current law, 3-062

- death and injury at work, 3-089—3-136
- direct liability, 3-070—3-076
- function, 3-058—3-061
- identification doctrine, 3-070—3-076
- introduction, 3-054—3-057
- manslaughter, 3-096—3-132
- non-fatal injuries, 3-133—3-136
- punishment, 3-137—3-149
- reactive corporate fault, 3-079—3-081
- restructuring, 3-077—3-086
- vicarious liability, 3-063—3-069

harmful conduct, 2-001

introduction, 2-001—2-002

mens rea

- blame, 2-120—2-136
- capacity theory, 2-120—2-127
- character theory, 2-128
- cognitive, 2-137—2-140
- culpability, 2-226—2-235
- generally, 2-001—2-002
- intention, 2-141—2-184
- negligence, 2-216—2-224
- recklessness, 2-185—2-215
- relationship with actus reus, 2-237—2-248
- responsibility, 2-120—2-128

mistake, 2-257—2-282

strict liability

- civil sanctions, 3-050—3-051
- conclusion, 3-052—3-053
- current law, 3-002
- defences, 3-021—3-024
- enforcement, 3-046
- human rights, and, 3-025—3-030
- introduction, 3-001
- justification, 3-031—3-045
- mens rea, 3-003—3-020
- sentencing, 3-047—3-049

transferred malice, 2-249—2-256

Culpability

See Mens rea

Cunningham recklessness

See Recklessness

Dangerous driving

causing death

current law, 8-184—8-186

‘dangerous driving’, 8-187

introduction, 8-174

rationale, 8-175—8-183

sentencing, 8-187

causing serious injury

generally, 7-075—7-077

punishment, 7-078

Date rape

See Rape

Defences

age

below the age of 10, 4-363

from the age of 10, 4-364

introduction, 4-361—4-362

overview, 4-033

automatism

generally, 4-292—4-293

overview, 4-032

psychiatry’s view, 4-294—4-295

public interest, 4-296—4-298

chastisement

generally, 4-128—4-130

overview, 4-012

consent

degree of harm, 4-051—4-069

introduction, 4-044

nature of harm, 4-051—4-069

overview, 4-013

rationale, 4-070—4-073

reality of, 4-045—4-050

reform proposals, 4-074—4-076

diminished responsibility

intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349

overview, 4-031

discipline

generally, 4-128—4-130

overview, 4-012

due diligence, 3-022—3-024

duress

circumstances, of, 4-200—4-204

introduction, 4-131—4-135

Modern Slavery Act 2015, and, 4-205—4-211

overview, 4-024

threats, by, 4-131—4-199

duress by threats

belief in threat, 4-171

deterrence, 4-141—4-143

generally, 4-136

imminence of threat, 4-177—4-182

indirectly relayed threat, 4-158—4-159

introduction, 4-131—4-135

length of time after threats, 4-189

moral blameworthiness, 4-144—4-150 multiple threats, 4-160

murder, and, 4-190—4-199

parameters of defence, 4-151—4-199

placing in position where might be open to threats, 4-183—4-188

rationale as defence, 4-137—4-140

relevant crimes, 4-190—4-199

steadfastness, 4-171—4-176

stipulated crime, 4-165

threat of death or serious harm, 4-154—4-157

threats to others, 4-161—4-170

treason, and, 4-190—4-199

duress of circumstances, 4-200—4-204

‘Dutch courage’ intoxication, 4-343—4-344

encouraging or assisting crime

acting reasonably, 5-145—5-146

introduction, 5-144

- victim assister, for, 5-147—5-148
- excusatory defences
 - duress, 4-024
 - generally, 4-014—4-022
 - intoxication, 4-026
 - loss of control, 4-025
 - mistake, 4-023
 - necessity, 4-027
 - provocation, 4-025
 - superior orders, 4-028
- exemptions
 - automatism, 4-032
 - diminished responsibility, 4-031
 - insanity, 4-030
 - introduction, 4-029
 - lack of age, 4-033
- insanity
 - defence, as, 4-260
 - denial of responsibility, 4-286—4-291
 - fitness to plead, 4-249—4-259
 - intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349
 - introduction, 4-245—4-248
 - mental health powers, 4-282—4-285
 - M’Naghten rules, 4-261—4-272
 - overview, 4-030
 - procedural criticisms, 4-280
 - reform proposals, 4-274—4-278
 - relevant issues, 4-247—4-248
 - retention of defence, 4-279—4-291
 - statutory provisions, 4-273
 - therapeutic criticisms, 4-281
- intoxication
 - background, 4-299—4-302
 - defence, as, 4-304—4-306
 - diminished responsibility, and, 4-345—4-349
 - drunken intent, 4-303
 - ‘Dutch courage’ intoxication, 4-343—4-344
 - insanity, and, 4-345—4-349

- involuntary intoxication, 4-339—4-342
 - overview, 4-026
 - reform proposals, 4-350—4-360
 - voluntary intoxication, 4-307—4-338
- introduction, 4-001—4-004
- involuntary conduct
 - actus reus, and, 4-238
 - automatism, 4-292—4-295
 - cause of involuntariness, 4-244
 - insanity, 4-245—4-291
 - introduction, 4-238
 - involuntariness, 4-239—4-241
 - preceding fault, 4-242—4-243
- involuntary intoxication, 4-339—4-342
- justificatory defences
 - chastisement, 4-012
 - consent, 4-013
 - discipline, 4-012
 - generally, 4-005—4-008
 - necessity, 4-010
 - public authority, 4-011
 - self-defence, 4-009
- lack of age
 - below the age of 10, 4-363
 - from the age of 10, 4-364
 - introduction, 4-361—4-362
 - overview, 4-033
- lawful authority, 4-365
- loss of control, 4-025
- M’Naghten rules
 - defect of reason, 4-270
 - disease of the mind, 4-263—4-269
 - generally, 4-261—4-262
 - knowledge of wrong, 4-271
 - medical evidence, and, 4-272
 - nature and quality of act, 4-271
- mistake, 4-023
- necessity

- conjoined twins, and, 4-224—4-230
- distinction from duress of circumstances, 4-213
- excusatory defences, 4-027
- generally, 4-212
- homicide, and, 4-218—4-223
- introduction, 4-131—4-135
- medical treatment, 4-216
- overview, 4-010
- statutory defences, and, 4-217
- traditional approach, 4-214—4-223
- parental discipline, 4-012
- provocation, 4-027
- public authority, 4-011
- reasonable excuse, 4-365
- reasonable force, 4-365
- self-defence
 - defendant characteristics, 4-108—4-110
 - duty to retreat, 4-111—4-114
 - elements, 4-079—4-110
 - excessive self-defence, 4-120—4-127
 - human rights, 4-087—4-090
 - imminence of threatened attack, 4-115—4-119
 - innocent third parties, 4-083—4-085
 - introduction, 4-077—4-078
 - necessity for defensive action, 4-091—4-094
 - overview, 4-009
 - perception of danger, 4-108—4-110
 - permitted response, 4-087—4-090
 - protected interest, 4-086
 - responsive force to be used, 4-095—4-110
 - threat of unjustified harm, 4-080—4-085
- significance of distinctions, 4-034—4-043
- strict liability
 - due diligence, 3-022—3-024
 - general, 3-021
- sundry, 4-365
- superior orders
 - generally, 4-231—4-237

overview, 4-028

voluntary intoxication

basic intent, 4-311—4-333

drunken mistake, 4-335—4-338

effect on punishment, 4-334

meaning, 4-307—4-310

specific intent, 4-311—4-333

Deferred prosecution agreements

corporate liability, and, 3-148—3-149

Denunciation

See Sentencing

Derivative liability

See Secondary parties

Deterrence

See also Sentencing

corporate liability, and, 3-058

educative deterrence, 1-083—1-087

general deterrence, 1-076—1-082

individual deterrence, 1-075

introduction, 1-074

Diminished responsibility

current law, 8-137—8-150

generally, 8-134

intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349

introduction, 8-135—8-136

overview, 4-031

Direct liability

See Corporate liability

Discipline

See Reasonable chastisement

Dishonesty

See also Theft

belief in consent, 9-089

belief in legal right, 9-088

belief that property is lost, 9-090

fraud by false representation, 9-157—9-159

generally, 9-084—9-086

not for thief's benefit, 9-092

question of fact, 9-093—9-107

question of law, 9-087—9-092

willingness to pay, 9-091

Double liability

inchoate offences, 5-153

Driving offences inchoate offences, 5-155—5-156

Drunkenness

See Intoxication

Duress

belief in threat, 4-166—4-170

circumstances, of,

 distinction from necessity, 4-213

 generally, 4-200—4-204

deterrence, 4-141—4-143

generally, 4-136

imminence of threat, 4-177—4-182

indirectly relayed threat, 4-158—4-159

introduction, 4-131—4-135

length of time after threats, 4-189

Modern Slavery Act 2015, and,

 adults, for, 4-208

 exempt offences, 4-207

 generally, 4-205—4-206

 level of fortitude required, 4-210

 retrospective effect, and; 4-211

 under 18s, for, 4-209

moral blameworthiness, 4-144—4-150 multiple threats, 4-160

murder, and, 4-190—4-199

overview, 4-024

parameters of defence, 4-151—4-199

placing in position where might be open to threats, 4-183—4-188

rationale as defence, 4-137—4-140

relevant crimes, 4-190—4-199

steadfastness, 4-171—4-176

stipulated crime, 4-165

threat indirectly relayed, 4-158—4-159

threat of death or serious harm, 4-154—4-157 threat to others, 4-161—4-170

treason, and, 4-190—4-199

Duress of circumstances

distinction from necessity, 4-213

generally, 4-200—4-204

Dutch courage

See Intoxication

Duty of care

corporate manslaughter, 3-102—3-104

Duty to act

general duty, 2-054—2-068

introduction, 2-029

legal duty to act

assumption of responsibility, 2-033—2-039

contractual duty, 2-040

dangerous situations, 2-042—2-045

duty assumed by contract, 2-040

duty imposed by statute, 2-041

introduction, 2-030—2-031

special relationships, 2-032

statutory duty, 2-041

performance, 2-046—2-049

Electricity

theft, 9-049

Employment

consent to injury, and, 4-066

Encouraging or assisting crime

common elements, 5-128

conclusion, 5-152

defences

acting reasonably, 5-145—5-146

introduction, 5-144

victim assister, for, 5-147—5-148

encouraging or assisting an offence believing it will be committed

actus reus, 5-135

generally, 5-134

mens rea, 5-136

encouraging or assisting offences believing one or more will be committed

- actus reus, 5-139
- generally, 5-137—5-138
- mens rea, 5-140—5-143
- impossibility, 5-149
- incitement, and, 5-127
- intentionally encouraging or assisting
 - actus reus, 5-130
 - generally, 5-129
 - mens rea, 5-131—5-133
- introduction, 5-121
- jurisdiction, 5-150
- offences, 5-127
- punishment, 5-151
- rationale of liability, 5-122—5-126
- terminology, 5-128

Encouraging or assisting suicide

See Assisted suicide

“Endangerment offences”

- generally, 5-154—5-157
- meaning, 5-155—5-156

Enforcement

- strict liability, 3-046

“Equity fines”

- corporate liability, 3-145

Equivocality test

See Attempts

Expiation

See Sentencing

Factual causation

See Causation

Felony-murder rule

See Murder

Fines

- corporate liability, 3-138—3-141

Fitness to plead

- insanity, 4-249—4-259

Force

See Use of force

Fraud

- abuse of position, by, 9-170—9-179
- ancillary offences, 9-180
- background, 9-127—9-130
- caveat emptor, 9-131
- conspiracy to defraud, 9-197
- failing to disclose information, by, 9-165—9-169
- false representation, by, 9-140—9-164
- general offence, 9-137—9-139
- Fraud Act 2006
 - abuse of position, by, 9-170—9-179
 - ancillary offences, 9-180
 - conspiracy to defraud, 9-197
 - failing to disclose information, by, 9-165—9-169
 - mens rea, 9-169
 - false representation, by, 9-140—9-164
 - general offence, 9-137—9-139
 - introduction, 9-136
 - obtaining services dishonestly, 9-181—9-196
- obtaining services dishonestly, 9-181—9-196
- pre-Fraud Act 2006, 9-131—9-135

Fraud by abuse of position

- ‘abuse’, 9-173
- actus reus, 9-172—9-178
- generally, 9-170—9-171
- mens rea, 9-179
- ‘position of trust’, 9-174—9-178

Fraud by failing to disclose information

- actus reus, 9-168
- generally, 9-165—9-167
- mens rea, 9-169

Fraud by false representation

- actus reus, 9-143—9-151
- change of circumstances, 9-147—9-148
- cheque cards, 9-146
- cheques, 9-146
- credit cards, 9-146
- debit cards, 9-146

dishonesty, 9-157—9-159 express representation, 9-144—9-148
'false', 9-151—9-153
generally, 9-140—9-142
hotels, 9-144
implied representation, 9-144—9-148 insurance, 9-147
intention to make gain or cause loss, 9-160—9-164 knowledge that representation is untrue, 9-155—9-156 machines, to, 9-150
mens rea, 9-154—9-164
quotations, 9-145—9-146
restaurants, 9-144
state of mind, 9-149

Grievous bodily harm

actus reus, 7-045—7-052
generally, 7-044
intent, with
 actus reus, 7-058
 generally, 7-057
 intent, 7-061
 maliciously, 7-060
 mens rea, 7-059—7-061
 punishment, 7-062
intoxication, and, 4-320
mens rea, 7-053—7-055
punishment, 7-056

Gross negligence manslaughter

See Manslaughter

Handling stolen goods

actus reus, 9-232—9-233
elements, 9-230—9-235
goods stolen at time of handling, 9-232 handling, 9-233
intoxication, and, 4-324
introduction, 9-229
law, 9-230—9-235
mens rea, 9-234

punishment, 9-235

“Harm”

criminal conduct, and, 1-019—1-029

criminal liability, and, 2-001

secondary parties, 6-079—6-085

Health and safety offences

aggregation doctrine, 3-078

corporate culture doctrine, 3-082—3-086

current law, 3-062

death and injury at work, 3-089—3-136

direct liability, 3-070—3-076

function, 3-058—3-061

identification doctrine, 3-070—3-076

introduction, 3-054—3-057

manslaughter, 3-096—3-132

punishment, 3-138—3-141

reactive corporate fault, 3-079—3-081

restructuring, 3-077—3-086

sentencing, 3-138—3-141

vicarious liability, 3-063—3-069

Homicide

causing death by aggravated vehicle-taking, 8-202

causing death by careless driving

careless driving, 8-188—8-193

generally, 8-188—8-193

when under the influence, 8-194—8-196

causing death by dangerous driving

current law, 8-184—8-186

‘dangerous driving’, 8-187

introduction, 8-174

rationale, 8-175—8-183

sentencing, 8-187

causing death by unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured driving, 8-197—8-202

causing death of children or vulnerable adults, 8-164—8-171

causing death when under the influence, 8-194—8-196

constructive manslaughter

dangerous unlawful act, 8-058—8-062

directing unlawful act as victim, 8-064—8-066

- introduction, 8-048
- unlawful act, 8-049—8-057
- unlawful act must cause death of victim, 8-063
- context, 8-002—8-005
- diminished responsibility
 - current law, 8-137—8-150
 - generally, 8-134
 - intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349
 - introduction, 8-135—8-136
 - overview, 4-031
- encouraging or assisting suicide, 8-153—8-155
- gross negligence manslaughter
 - breach must amount to gross negligence, 8-077—8-080
 - breach of duty, 8-076
 - duty of care, 8-072—8-075
 - introduction, 8-067—8-071
- infanticide, 8-156—8-163
- involuntary manslaughter
 - constructive manslaughter, 8-048—8-066
 - generally, 8-045—8-046
 - gross negligence manslaughter, 8-067—8-080
 - introduction, 8-044
 - rationale, 8-083—8-094
 - reckless manslaughter, 8-047
 - sentencing, 8-081—8-082
 - unlawful act manslaughter, 8-048—8-066
- ‘killing’, 8-007
- level of offending, 8-001
- loss of control
 - circumstances of extremely grave character, etc, 8-111—8-112
 - current law, 8-102—8-121
 - fear of serious violence, 8-109—8-110
 - generally, 8-104—8-106
 - introduction, 8-096—8-098
 - justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, 8-113—8-115
 - meaning, 8-104—8-106
 - objective test, 8-122—8-133
 - overview, 4-025

- qualifying trigger, 8-107—8-121
- rationale, 8-099—8-101
- manslaughter
 - actus reus, 8-006—8-007
 - generally, 8-044
 - involuntary manslaughter, 8-045—8-094
 - voluntary manslaughter, 8-095—8-152
- murder
 - actus reus, 8-006—8-007
 - background, 8-009
 - conclusion, 8-043
 - constructive malice, 8-012
 - evaluation, 8-022—8-042
 - ‘felony-murder rule’, 8-012
 - generally, 8-008
 - ‘grievous bodily harm rule’, 8-023—8-030
 - intent to cause grievous bodily harm, 8-011
 - intent to kill, 8-010
 - mens rea, 8-013—8-015
 - present law, 8-013—8-015
 - punishment, 8-016—8-021
 - Woollin test of intention, 8-031—8-042
- provocation, 8-095
- ‘reasonable person who is in being’, 8-007
- reckless manslaughter, 8-047
- road traffic offences
 - causing death by aggravated vehicle-taking, 8-202
 - causing death by careless driving, 8-188—8-196
 - causing death by dangerous driving, 8-174—8-187
 - causing death by unlicensed, etc, driving, 8-197—8-202
 - introduction, 8-172—8-173
- structure of offences
 - basis of distinctions, 8-216—8-223
 - greater specificity, 8-209—8-215
 - introduction, 8-204
 - rationale of distinction between categories, 8-205—8-208
 - reform proposals, 8-224—8-228
- suicide pacts, 8-151—8-152

'under the King's Peace', 8-007

unlawful act manslaughter

dangerous unlawful act, 8-058—8-062

directing unlawful act as victim, 8-064—8-066

introduction, 8-048

unlawful act, 8-049—8-057

unlawful act must cause death of victim, 8-063

'unlawfully', 8-007

voluntary manslaughter

diminished responsibility, 8-134—8-150

generally, 8-095

loss of control, 8-096—8-133

introduction, 8-044

provocation, 8-095

suicide pacts, 8-151—8-152

Horseplay

See Consent

Hotels

fraud by false representation, 9-144

Human body

See Body parts

Human rights

criminal conduct, 1-046—1-052

strict liability, 3-025—3-030

Human trafficking

duress

adults, for, 4-208

exempt offences, 4-207

generally, 4-205—4-206

level of fortitude required, 4-210

retrospective effect, and; 4-211

under 18s, for, 4-209

“Identification doctrine”

failings of, 3-092—3-095

generally, 3-070—3-076

Impossibility

attempts

common law, at, 5-068—5-071

- ineptitude, 5-071
- introduction, 5-067
- legal impossibility, 5-069
- physical impossibility, 5-070
- statute, under, 5-072—5-083
- encouraging or assisting crime, 5-149
- statutory conspiracy, 5-118

Incapacitation

See Punishment

Inchoate offences

attempts

- abandonment, 5-042—5-048
- act more than merely preparatory, 5-024—5-040
- actus reus, 5-024—5-048
- criminology, 5-002
- impossibility, 5-068—5-083
- mens rea, 5-049—5-066
- punishment, 5-006—5-023
- purpose, 5-002—5-005

conspiracy

- common law, at, 5-096—5-099
- corrupt public morals, to, 5-099
- defraud, to, 5-096—5-099
- introduction, 5-084
- outrage public decency, to, 5-099
- punishment, 5-090—5-092
- purpose, 5-085—5-089
- statutory, 5-100—5-120
- types, 5-093

double liability, 5-153

driving offences, 5-155—5-156

encouraging or assisting crime

- common elements, 5-128

- conclusion, 5-152

- defences, 5-144—5-146

- encouraging or assisting an offence believing it will be committed, 5-134—5-136

- encouraging or assisting offences believing one or more will be committed, 5-137—5-143

- impossibility, 5-149

- incitement, and, 5-127
- intentionally encouraging or assisting, 5-129—5-133
- introduction, 5-121
- jurisdiction, 5-150
- offences, 5-127
- punishment, 5-151
- rationale of liability, 5-122—5-126
- terminology, 5-128
- endangerment
 - generally, 5-154—5-157
 - meaning, 5-155—5-156
- incitement, 5-121
- introduction, 5-001
- meaning, 5-001
- possessing prohibited articles, 5-155—5-156
- sexual offences, 5-155—5-156
- terrorism, 5-155—5-156

Incitement

See also Encouraging or assisting crime
generally, 5-121

Infanticide

generally, 8-156—8-163

Insanity

defence, as,

- denial of responsibility, 4-286—4-291
- introduction, 4-260
- M’Naghten rules, 4-261—4-272
- reform proposals, 4-274—4-278
- retention, 4-279—4-291
- statutory provisions, 4-273

denial of responsibility, 4-286—4-291

fitness to plead, 4-249—4-259

intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349

introduction, 4-245—4-248

mental health powers, 4-282—4-285

M’Naghten rules

- defect of reason, 4-270
- disease of the mind, 4-263—4-269

- generally, 4-261—4-262
- knowledge of wrong, 4-271
- medical evidence, and, 4-272
- nature and quality of act, 4-271
- overview, 4-030
- procedural criticisms, 4-280
- reform proposals, 4-274—4-278
- relevant issues, 4-247—4-248
- retention of defence
 - denial of responsibility, 4-286—4-291
 - introduction, 4-279
 - mental health powers, 4-282—4-285
 - procedural criticisms, 4-280
 - therapeutic criticisms, 4-281
- statutory provisions, 4-273
- therapeutic criticisms, 4-281

Intangible property

- theft, 9-048

Intention

- See also* Mens rea
- capable of proof, 2-170—2-171
- conditional, 9-125—9-126
- current law
 - ‘exceptional’ cases, 2-151—2-165
 - introduction, 2-142—2-146
 - question of fact for jury, 2-150
 - variability of meaning, 2-166
 - ‘wanting result’, 2-147—2-149
- ‘direct’ intention, 2-142
- evaluation
 - capable of proof, 2-170—2-171
 - introduction, 2-167
 - moral content, 2-173—2-184
 - recklessness, and, 2-172
 - semantic precision, 2-168—2-169
- ‘exceptional’ cases, 2-151—2-165
- fraud by false representation, 9-160—9-164
- grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-061

introduction, 2-141
moral content, 2-173—2-184
'oblique' intention
 generally, 2-151—2-165
 introduction, 2-142
obtaining services dishonestly, 9-196 permanently deprive, to borrowing for a period, 9-114—9-115
 cheques, 9-124
 dishonest borrowings, 9-117—9-122
 generally, 9-108—9-110
 lending for a period, 9-114—9-115
 particular property, 9-123
 treating the thing as his own to dispose of, 9-111—9-113
question of fact for jury, 2-150
recklessness, and, 2-172
semantic precision, 2-168—2-169
variability of meaning, 2-166
'wanting result', 2-147—2-149
wounding with intent, 7-061

Intervening events

act of victim
 drugs supplied, 2-107—2-111
 escape, 2-103—2-106
 other action/inaction/condition, 2-112—2-118
'but for' test, 2-085—2-086
drugs supplied to victim, 2-107—2-111 escape of victim, 2-103—2-106
human intervention
 introduction, 2-090
 third party acts, 2-091—2-102
 victims' acts, 2-103—2-118
introduction, 2-088
natural events, 2-089
third party acts, 2-091—2-102

Intoxication

background, 4-299—4-302
defence, as, 4-304—4-306

diminished responsibility, and, 4-345—4-349
drunken intent, 4-303
'Dutch courage', 4-343—4-344
insanity, and, 4-345—4-349
involuntary intoxication, 4-339—4-342
overview, 4-026
reform proposals, 4-350—4-360
voluntary intoxication
 basic intent, 4-311—4-333
 drunken mistake, 4-335—4-338
 effect on punishment, 4-334
 meaning, 4-307—4-310
 specific intent, 4-311—4-333

Involuntary conduct

actus reus, and, 4-238
automatism, 4-292—4-295
cause of involuntariness, 4-244
insanity
 defence, as, 4-260
 denial of responsibility, 4-286—4-291
 fitness to plead, 4-249—4-259
 intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349
 introduction, 4-245—4-248
 mental health powers, 4-282—4-285
 M’Naghten rules, 4-261—4-272
 overview, 4-030
 procedural criticisms, 4-280
 reform proposals, 4-274—4-278
 relevant issues, 4-247—4-248
 retention of defence, 4-279—4-291
 statutory provisions, 4-273
 therapeutic criticisms, 4-281
introduction, 4-238
involuntariness, 4-239—4-241
preceding fault, 4-242—4-243

Involuntary intoxication

See also Intoxication
generally, 4-339—4-342

Joint enterprise

See also Secondary parties

generally, 6-018—6-021

reforms, 6-046—6-047

Jurisdiction

encouraging or assisting crime, 5-150

statutory conspiracy, 5-120

Just deserts

See Sentencing

Justification (defences)

consent

degree of harm, 4-051—4-069

introduction, 4-044

nature of harm, 4-051—4-069

overview, 4-013

rationale, 4-070—4-073

reality of, 4-045—4-050

reform proposals, 4-074—4-076

discipline

generally, 4-128—4-130

overview, 4-012

generally, 4-005—4-008

necessity

conjoined twins, and, 4-224—4-230

distinction from duress of circumstances, 4-213

excusatory defences, 4-027

generally, 4-212

homicide, and, 4-218—4-223

introduction, 4-131—4-135

medical treatment, 4-216

overview, 4-010

statutory defences, and, 4-217

traditional approach, 4-214—4-223

public authority, 4-011

self-defence

defendant characteristics, 4-108—4-110

duty to retreat, 4-111—4-114

elements, 4-079—4-110

excessive self-defence, 4-120—4-127
human rights, 4-087—4-090
imminence of threatened attack, 4-115—4-119
innocent third parties, 4-083—4-085
introduction, 4-077—4-078
necessity for defensive action, 4-091—4-094
overview, 4-009
perception of danger, 4-108—4-110
permitted response, 4-087—4-090 protected interest, 4-086
responsive force to be used, 4-095—4-110
threat of unjustified harm, 4-080—4-085

Knowledge

fraud by false representation, 9-155—9-156

Lack of age

See Defences

Lawful authority

defences, and, 4-365

Lawrence recklessness

See Recklessness

Legal causation

See Causation

Legal duty to act

See Duty to act

Limit of liability

secondary parties

graver offence than one committed, 6-058—6-060

no principal offender, 6-050—6-057

victims, 6-067

withdrawal from criminal enterprise, 6-061—6-066

Loss of control

circumstances of extremely grave character, etc, 8-111—8-112

current law, 8-102—8-121

fear of serious violence, 8-109—8-110

generally, 8-104—8-106

introduction, 8-096—8-098

justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, 8-113—8-115

meaning, 8-104—8-106

objective test, 8-122—8-133
overview, 4-025
qualifying trigger circumstances of extremely grave character, 8-111—8-112 exclusions, 8-116—8-121
 fear of serious violence, 8-109—8-110
 generally, 8-107—8-121
 justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, 8-113—8-115
rationale, 8-099—8-101

Making off without payment

actus reus, 9-201—9-206
‘as required or expected’, 9-205
generally, 9-199—9-200 goods supplied or service done, 9-203
introduction, 9-198
‘makes off’, 9-201
mens rea, 9-207
punishment, 9-208
‘spot’, 9-202
unenforceable debts, 9-206
‘without having paid’, 9-204

Male rape

See Rape

Malice

generally, 2-249—2-256

Manslaughter

actus reus, 8-006—8-007
constructive manslaughter
 dangerous unlawful act, 8-058—8-062
 directing unlawful act as victim, 8-064—8-066
 introduction, 8-048
 unlawful act, 8-049—8-057
 unlawful act must cause death of victim, 8-063
diminished responsibility
 current law, 8-137—8-150
 generally, 8-134
 intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349
 introduction, 8-135—8-136

- overview, 4-031
- generally, 8-044
- gross negligence manslaughter
 - breach must amount to gross negligence, 8-077—8-080
 - breach of duty, 8-076
 - duty of care, 8-072—8-075
 - introduction, 8-067—8-071
- involuntary manslaughter
 - constructive manslaughter, 8-048—8-066
 - generally, 8-045—8-046
 - gross negligence manslaughter, 8-067—8-080
 - introduction, 8-044
 - rationale, 8-083—8-094
 - reckless manslaughter, 8-047
 - sentencing, 8-081—8-082
 - unlawful act manslaughter, 8-048—8-066
- loss of control
 - circumstances of extremely grave character, etc, 8-111—8-112
 - current law, 8-102—8-121
 - fear of serious violence, 8-109—8-110
 - generally, 8-104—8-106
 - introduction, 8-096—8-098
 - justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, 8-113—8-115
 - meaning, 8-104—8-106
 - objective test, 8-122—8-133
 - overview, 4-025
 - qualifying trigger, 8-107—8-121
 - rationale, 8-099—8-101
- provocation, 8-095
- sentencing, 8-081—8-082
- suicide pacts, 8-151—8-152
- voluntary manslaughter
 - diminished responsibility, 8-134—8-150
 - generally, 8-095
 - loss of control, 8-096—8-133
 - introduction, 8-044
 - provocation, 8-095
 - suicide pacts, 8-151—8-152

Manslaughter by gross negligence

- breach must amount to gross negligence, 8-077—8-080
- breach of duty, 8-076
- duty of care, 8-072—8-075
- introduction, 8-067—8-071

Medical treatment

- consent to injury, and, 4-067

Mens rea

- actual bodily harm, 7-040—7-042
- assault, 7-019
- assault by penetration, 7-149
- attempts, 5-049—5-066
- battery, 7-027—7-029
- blame
 - generally, 2-129—2-136
 - responsibility, and, 2-120—2-128
 - secondary parties, 6-078
- burglary, 9-226
- Caldwell* recklessness
 - creating obvious risk, 2-197—2-199
 - distinction from negligence, 2-200
 - generally, 2-190—2-194
 - implications, 2-195—2-201
 - ruling out risk, 2-196
 - variability of meaning, 2-201
- capacity theory, 2-120—2-127
- causation, and, 2-078—2-079
- character theory, 2-128
- cognitive mens rea, 2-137—2-140
- counselling, 6-022—6-037
- culpability, 2-226—2-235
- Cunningham* recklessness, 2-187—2-189
- encouraging or assisting crime
 - encouraging or assisting an offence believing it will be committed, 5-136
 - encouraging or assisting offences believing one or more will be committed, 5-140—5-143
 - intentionally encouraging or assisting, 5-131—5-133
 - punishment, 5-151

fraud

- abuse of position, 9-179
- failing to disclose information, 9-169
- false representation, 9-154—9-164
- fraud by false representation, 9-154—9-164
- generally, 2-001—2-002
- grievous bodily harm, 7-053—7-055
- grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
- handling stolen goods, 9-234
- intention
 - capable of proof, 2-170—2-171
 - current law, 2-142—163
 - ‘direct’ intention, 2-142
 - evaluation, 2-167—2-184
 - ‘exceptional’ cases, 2-151—2-165
 - introduction, 2-141
 - moral content, 2-173—2-184
 - ‘oblique’ intention, 2-151—2-165
 - question of fact for jury, 2-150
 - recklessness, and, 2-170—2-171
 - semantic precision, 2-168—2-169
 - variability of meaning, 2-166
 - ‘wanting result’, 2-147—2-149
- joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021
- Lawrence* recklessness
 - creating obvious risk, 2-197—2-199
 - distinction from negligence, 2-200
 - generally, 2-190—2-194
 - implications, 2-195—2-201
 - ruling out risk, 2-196
 - variability of meaning, 2-201
- making off without payment, 9-207
- murder, 8-013—8-015
- negligence
 - attribution of criminal responsibility, 2-222—2-224
 - basis of liability, as, 2-217—2-218
 - capacity, and, 2-219—2-221
 - conclusion, 2-225
 - introduction, 2-216

- Lawrence* recklessness, and, 2-200
- ‘oblique’ intention
 - generally, 2-151—2-165
 - introduction, 2-142
- obtaining services dishonestly, 9-193—9-196
- offences against the person
 - actual bodily harm, 7-040—7-042
 - assault, 7-019
 - battery, 7-027—7-029
 - grievous bodily harm, 7-053—7-055
 - grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
 - unlawful wounding, 7-053—7-055
 - wounding with intent, 7-062
- rape, 7-140—7-148
- recklessness
 - background, 2-185
 - Caldwell* recklessness, 2-190—2-201
 - Cunningham* recklessness, 2-187—2-189
 - current law, 2-202—2-206
 - evaluation, 2-207—2-215
 - G and Another* decision, 2-202—2-206
 - intention, 2-172
 - Lawrence* recklessness, 2-190—2-201
 - old law, 2-186—2-201
- relationship with actus reus
 - generally, 2-237—2-248
 - introduction, 2-236
 - mistake, 2-257—2-282
 - transferred malice, 2-249—2-256
- responsibility, 2-120—2-128
- secondary parties
 - assistance and encouragement, 6-013—6-017
 - causation, 6-010—6-012
 - counselling, 6-022—6-037
 - introduction, 6-001—6-005
 - joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021
 - liability, 6-008—6-009
- sexual assault, , 7-154

- sexual offences
 - assault by penetration, 7-149
 - rape, 7-140—7-148
 - sexual assault, , 7-154
- strict liability, and
 - displacing, 3-006—3-020
 - generally, 3-004—3-005
 - introduction, 3-001
 - promotion of statute, 3-019—3-020
 - statutory context, 3-016—3-018
 - types of offence, 3-008—3-015
- unlawful wounding, 7-053—7-055
- wounding with intent, 7-062

Mental health

- insanity, 4-282—4-285

Mercy-killing

See Assisted suicide

Mistake

- actus reus, as to, 2-258—2-262
- civil law, as to, 2-275
- criminal law, as to, 2-276—2-282
- defence element, as to
 - evaluation of law, 2-269—2-273
 - generally, 2-263—2-268
- defences, and, 4-023
- generally, 2-257
- law, as to, 2-274—2-282

Mitigating factors

See Sentencing

M’Naghten rules

See also Insanity

- defect of reason, 4-270
- disease of the mind, 4-263—4-269
- generally, 4-261—4-262
- knowledge of wrong, 4-271
- medical evidence, and, 4-272
- nature and quality of act, 4-271

Modern Slavery Act 2015

duress

- adults, for, 4-208
- exempt offences, 4-207
- generally, 4-205—4-206
- level of fortitude required, 4-210
- retrospective effect, and; 4-211
- under 18s, for, 4-209

Money

- theft, 9-048

Morals and law

- wrongful conduct, 1-006—1-018

Murder

- actus reus, 8-006—8-007
- background, 8-009
- conclusion, 8-043
- constructive malice, 8-012
- evaluation,
 - ‘grievous bodily harm rule’, 8-023—8-030
 - introduction, 8-022
 - Woollin test of intention, 8-031—8-042
- ‘felony-murder rule’, 8-012
- generally, 8-008
- ‘grievous bodily harm rule’, 8-023—8-030
- intent to cause grievous bodily harm, 8-011
- intent to kill, 8-010
- intoxication, and, 4-319
- mens rea, 8-013—8-015
- present law, 8-013—8-015
- sentencing, 8-016—8-021
- Woollin test of intention, 8-031—8-042

Necessity

- conjoined twins, and, 4-224—4-230
- distinction from duress of circumstances, 4-213
- generally, 4-212
- homicide, and, 4-218—4-223
- introduction, 4-131—4-135
- medical treatment, 4-216
- overview

- excusatory defences, 4-027
- justificatory defences, 4-010
- statutory defences, and, 4-217
- traditional approach, 4-214—4-223

Negligence

mens rea

- attribution of criminal responsibility, 2-222—2-224
- basis of liability, as, 2-217—2-218
- capacity, and, 2-219—2-221
- conclusion, 2-225
- introduction, 2-216
- Lawrence* recklessness, and, 2-200

Non-fatal offences

offences against the person

- aggravated assaults, 7-031—7-062
- assault, 7-004—7-019
- battery, 7-020—7-030
- causing serious injury by dangerous driving, 7-075—7-077
- context of violence, 7-001—7-002
- evaluation, 7-079—7-087
- extent of violence, 7-001—7-002
- introduction, 7-003
- racially aggravated offences, 7-063—7-074
- religiously aggravated offences, 7-063—7-074

sexual offences

- child sexual offences, 7-157—7-164
- consent, 7-105—7-131
- current law, 7-105—7-164
- evaluation, 7-167—7-169
- introduction, 7-088—7-104
- other non-consensual offences, 7-150—7-154
- rape, 7-132—7-148
- sentencing, 7-165

Novus actus interveniens

See Intervening events

Oblique intention

See Intention

Obtaining services dishonestly

'act', 9-187
actus reus, 9-187—9-192
dishonesty, 9-194
generally, 9-181—9-186
intention not to pay, 9-196
knowing no payment, 9-195
mens rea, 9-193—9-196
'obtains', 9-188
punishment, 9-181
'services', 9-189—9-191
'without payment', 9-192

Offences against property

burglary
 actus reus, 9-221—9-224
 aggravated offence, 9-227
 'building or part of a building', 9-224
 dwelling, 9-225
 'enters', 9-222
 generally, 9-217—9-220
 legal background, 9-211
 mens rea, 9-226
 punishment, 9-228
 sociological background, 9-210
 'trespasser', 9-223
conclusion, 9-236—9-250
conspiracy to defraud, 9-197
fraud
 abuse of position, by, 9-170—9-179
 ancillary offences, 9-180
 background, 9-127—9-130
 caveat emptor, 9-131
 conspiracy to defraud, 9-197
 failing to disclose information, by, 9-165—9-169
 false representation, by, 9-140—9-164
 general offence, 9-137—9-139
 Fraud Act 2006, 9-136—9-196
 obtaining services dishonestly, 9-181—9-196
 pre-Fraud Act 2006, 9-131—9-135

handling stolen goods

actus reus, 9-232—9-233

elements, 9-230—9-235

goods stolen at time of handling, 9-232

handling, 9-233

introduction, 9-229

law, 9-230—9-235

mens rea, 9-234

punishment, 9-235

introduction, 9-001

legal background, 9-007—9-008

level of offending, 9-002—9-003

making off without payment

actus reus, 9-201—9-206

‘as required or expected’, 9-205

generally, 9-199—9-200

goods supplied or service done, 9-203

introduction, 9-198

‘makes off’, 9-201

mens rea, 9-207

punishment, 9-208

‘spot’, 9-202

unenforceable debts, 9-206

‘without having paid’, 9-204

obtaining services dishonestly

‘act’, 9-187

actus reus, 9-187—9-192

dishonesty, 9-194

generally, 9-181—9-186

intention not to pay, 9-196

knowing no payment, 9-195

mens rea, 9-193—9-196

‘obtains’, 9-188

punishment, 9-181

‘services’, 9-189—9-191

‘without payment’, 9-192

rationale, 9-237

robbery

- generally, 9-213—9-226
- legal background, 9-211
- sociological background, 9-210
- sociological background
 - burglary, 9-210
 - generally, 9-004—9-006
 - robbery, 9-210
- structure, 9-238—9-250
- theft
 - appropriation, 9-011—9-046
 - belonging to another, 9-052—9-083
 - context, 9-009—9-010
 - definition, 9-012—9-013
 - dishonesty, 9-084—9-107
 - generally, 9-009—9-010
 - intention of permanent deprivation, 9-108—9-123
 - legal background, 9-011
 - property, 9-047—9-051
 - punishment, 9-011

Offences against the person

- actual bodily harm
 - actus reus, 7-033—7-039
 - introduction, 7-032
 - meaning, 7-034—7-036
 - mens rea, 7-040—7-042
 - psychiatric harm, 7-037—7-039
 - punishment, 7-043
- aggravated assaults
 - actual bodily harm, 7-032—7-043
 - grievous bodily harm, 7-057—7-062
 - grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
 - introduction, 7-031
 - unlawful wounding, 7-044—7-056
 - wounding with intent, 7-057—7-062
- assault
 - actus reus, 7-006—7-018
 - generally, 7-005
 - introduction, 7-004

- mens rea, 7-019
 - punishment, 7-030
- battery
 - actus reus, 7-021—7-026
 - force, 7-021
 - generally, 7-020
 - introduction, 7-004
 - mens rea, 7-027—7-029
 - punishment, 7-030
- causing serious injury by dangerous driving
 - generally, 7-075—7-077
 - punishment, 7-078
- context of violence, 7-001—7-002
- evaluation, 7-079—7-087
- extent of violence, 7-001—7-002
- grievous bodily harm
 - actus reus, 7-045—7-052
 - generally, 7-044
 - mens rea, 7-053—7-055
 - punishment, 7-056
- grievous bodily harm with intent
 - actus reus, 7-058
 - generally, 7-057
 - intent, 7-061
 - maliciously, 7-060
 - mens rea, 7-059—7-061
 - punishment, 7-062
- introduction, 7-003
- racially aggravated offences
 - generally, 7-063—7-065
 - immediately before or after the commission of the offence, 7-072—7-073
 - meaning, 7-066—7-071
 - punishment, 7-074
 - racial group, 7-071
- religiously aggravated offences
 - generally, 7-063—7-065
 - immediately before or after the commission of the offence, 7-072—7-073
 - meaning, 7-066—7-071

- punishment, 7-074
- religious group, 7-071
- statistics, 7-001—7-002
- unlawful wounding
 - actus reus, 7-045—7-052
 - generally, 7-044
 - mens rea, 7-053—7-055
 - punishment, 7-056
- wounding with intent
 - actus reus, 7-058
 - generally, 7-057
 - intent, 7-061
 - maliciously, 7-060
 - mens rea, 7-059—7-061
 - punishment, 7-062

Omissions

- causation, and, 2-051—2-053
- conduct crimes, 2-029
- distinguishing positive acts, 2-050
- duty to act
 - general duty, 2-054—2-068
 - introduction, 2-029
 - legal duty to act, 2-030—2-045
 - performance, 2-046—2-049
- general duty to act, 2-054—2-068
- introduction, 2-029
- legal duty to act
 - assumption of responsibility, 2-033—2-039
 - contractual duty, 2-040
 - dangerous situations, 2-042—2-045
 - duty assumed by contract, 2-040
 - duty imposed by statute, 2-041
 - introduction, 2-030—2-031
 - special relationships, 2-032
 - statutory duty, 2-041
- performance of duty, 2-046—2-049
- positive acts, 2-050
- punishment, 2-069

result crimes, 2-029

Outraging public decency

conspiracy, 5-099

Parental discipline

See Reasonable chastisement

Participation in crime

See Secondary parties

Paternalism

wrongful conduct, 1-030—1-034

Performance

duty to act, 2-045—2-049

Personal property

theft, 9-048

Possession of offensive weapons

inchoate offences, 5-155—5-156

Preparatory acts

See also Attempts

Procuring

See also Secondary parties

generally, 6-008

meaning, 6-009

mens rea of accessories, 6-038—6-040

Profits

corporate liability, and, 3-147

Property

See also Theft

body parts, 9-051

confidential information, 9-050

electricity, 9-049

generally, 9-047—9-048

human body, 9-051

intangible property, 9-048

money, 9-048

personal property, 9-048

real property, 9-048

things in action, 9-048

Proprietary rights

theft, 9-058—9-062

Provocation

See also Loss of control
generally, 8-095

Proximity

attempts, 5-028

Psychiatric harm

actual bodily harm, 7-037—7-039

Publicity orders

corporate liability, 3-142—3-144

Punishment

actual bodily harm, 7-043

assault, 7-030

assault by penetration, 7-165

attempts, 5-006—5-023

battery, 7-030

burglary, 9-228

causing death by dangerous driving, 8-187

causing serious injury by dangerous driving, 7-078

censure, 1-068—1-073

consequentialist theories, and, 1-053

conspiracy, 5-090—5-092

corporate liability

adverse publicity advertisements, 3-146

community service orders, 3-145

corporate probation, 3-146

corporate rehabilitation orders, 3-147

deferred prosecution agreements, 3-148—3-149

‘equity fines’, 3-145

finances, 3-138—3-141

internal restructuring orders, 3-146

introduction, 3-137

profit orders, 3-147

publicity orders, 3-142—3-144

remedial orders, 3-142—3-144

crime reduction, and, 1-053

denunciation, 1-068—1-073

deterrence

educative deterrence, 1-083—1-087

- general deterrence, 1-076—1-082
- individual deterrence, 1-075
- introduction, 1-074
- eliminating unfair advantage, 1-063—1-067
- encouraging or assisting crime, 5-151
- expiation, 1-057—1-059
- grievous bodily harm, 7-056
- grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
- handling stolen goods, 9-235
- incapacitation, 1-088—1-100
- introduction, 1-053
- just deserts
 - censure, 1-068—1-073
 - denunciation, 1-068—1-073
 - eliminating unfair advantage, 1-063—1-067
 - generally, 1-060—1-062
- murder, 8-016—8-021
- obtaining services dishonestly, 9-181
- offences against the person
 - actual bodily harm, 7-043
 - assault, 7-030
 - battery, 7-030
 - grievous bodily harm, 7-056
 - grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
 - unlawful wounding, 7-056
 - wounding with intent, 7-062
- omissions, 2-069
- person subject to punishment, 1-119—1-121
- purpose, 1-116—1-118
- racially aggravated offences, 7-074
- rape, 7-165
- rehabilitation, 1-101—1-110
- religiously aggravated offences, 7-074
- reparation, 1-111—1-115
- retribution
 - expiation, 1-057—1-059
 - introduction, 1-054
 - just deserts, 1-060—1-073

vengeance, 1-055—1-056
secondary parties, 6-086—6-088
Sentencing Advisory Panel, 1-147
sentencing guidelines
 England & Wales, 1-147—1-153
 introduction, 1-139—1-141
 United States, 1-142—1-146
Sentencing Guidelines Council, 1-147—1-153 severity, 1-122—1-135
sexual assault, 7-166
sexual offences
 assault by penetration, 7-166
 rape, 7-165
 sexual assault, 7-166
strict liability, 3-047—3-049
theft, 9-011
theories combination of, 1-116—1-138
 deterrence, 1-074—1-087
 incapacitation, 1-088—1-100
 introduction, 1-053
 rehabilitation, 1-101—1-110
 reparation, 1-111—1-115
 retribution, 1-054—1-073
types, 1-136—1-138
unlawful wounding, 7-056
utilitarian theories, and, 1-053
wounding with intent, 7-062

Quotations

fraud by false representation, 9-145—9-146

Racially aggravated offences

generally, 7-063—7-065
immediately before or after the commission of the offence, 7-072—7-073
meaning, 7-066—7-071
punishment, 7-074
racial group, 7-071

Rape

actus reus, 7-139

child sex offences, 7-159

consent

‘active’ deceptions, 7-123—7-126

capacity, 7-115—7-118

conclusive presumptions, 7-129—7-129

definition, 7-111—7-118

evidential presumptions, 7-129

failure to disclose information, 7-128

freedom, 7-112—7-114

generally, 7-105—7-109

impersonation, 7-121

nature or purpose of act, 7-122—7-126

precondition deceptions, 7-127

presumptions, 7-119—7-129

reasonable belief, and, 7-142—7-148

relationship between definition and presumptions, 7-130—7-131

statutory provisions, 7-110

context, 7-095—7-099

‘date rape’, 7-099

evaluation, 7-167—7-169

generally, 7-132

introduction, 7-133—7-135

meaning, 7-100—7-104

level of offending, 7-089—7-094

male rape, 7-136—7-138

marital rape, 7-134—7-135

mens rea, 7-140—7-148

‘relationship rape’, 7-098

sentencing, 7-165

statutory provision, 7-132

‘stranger rape’, 7-095

Real property

theft, 9-048

Reasonable chastisement

generally, 4-128—4-130

overview, 4-012

Reasonable excuse

generally, 4-365

Reasonable force

generally, 4-365

Reckless manslaughter

See Manslaughter

Recklessness

background, 2-185

Caldwell recklessness

creating obvious risk, 2-197—2-199

distinction from negligence, 2-200

generally, 2-190—2-194

implications, 2-195—2-201

ruling out risk, 2-196

variability of meaning, 2-201

Cunningham recklessness, 2-187—2-189

current law, 2-202—2-206

evaluation, 2-207—2-215

intention, 2-172

Lawrence recklessness

creating obvious risk, 2-197—2-199

distinction from negligence, 2-200

generally, 2-190—2-194

implications, 2-195—2-201

ruling out risk, 2-196

variability of meaning, 2-201

old law, 2-186—2-201

R. v G decision, 2-202—2-206

Rehabilitation

punishment, and, 1-101—1-110

Rehabilitation orders

corporate liability, and, 3-147

Relationship rape

See Rape

Religiously aggravated offences

generally, 7-063—7-065

immediately before or after the commission of the offence, 7-072—7-073

meaning, 7-066—7-071

punishment, 7-074

religious group, 7-071

Remedial orders

corporate liability, 3-142—3-144

Reparation

punishment, and, 1-111—1-115

Repentance

See Conspiracy

Resisting arrest

intoxication, and, 4-326

Restaurants

fraud by false representation, 9-144

Result crimes

See Actus reus

Retribution

See also Sentencing

expiation, 1-057—1-059

introduction, 1-054

just deserts, 1-060—1-073

vengeance, 1-055—1-056

Rituals

See Consent

Road traffic offences

causing death by aggravated vehicle-taking, 8-202

causing death by careless driving

careless driving, 8-188—8-193

generally, 8-188—8-193

when under the influence, 8-194—8-196

causing death by dangerous driving

current law, 8-184—8-186

‘dangerous driving’, 8-187

introduction, 8-174

rationale, 8-175—8-183

sentencing, 8-187

causing death by unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured driving, 8-197—8-202

causing death when under the influence, 8-194—8-196

introduction, 8-172—8-173

Robbery

generally, 9-213—9-216

legal background, 9-211

sociological background, 9-210

Rubicon test

See Attempts

Secondary parties

'abet', 6-008—6-009

'aid', 6-008—6-009

assistance and encouragement

counselling, 6-017

failure to exercise control, 6-016

introduction, 6-013

joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021

reform proposals, 6-044—6-045

unplanned presence at crime, 6-014—6-015

blameworthiness, 6-078

causation, 6-010—6-012

conclusion

blameworthiness, 6-078

causing harm, 6-079—6-085

introduction, 6-077

lesser liability, 6-086—6-088

'counsel', 6-008—6-009

counselling

generally, 6-022—6-037

introduction, 6-017

'derivative liability', 6-003

encouragement

counselling, 6-017

failure to exercise control, 6-016

introduction, 6-013

joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021

reform proposals, 6-044—6-045

unplanned presence at crime, 6-014—6-015

failure to exercise control, 6-016

guilty of graver offence than one committed, 6-058—6-060

harm, 6-079—6-085

introduction, 6-001—6-005

joint enterprise, 6-018—6-021

liability, 6-008—6-009

limits of liability

- graver offence than one committed, 6-058—6-060
- no principal offender, 6-050—6-057
- victims, 6-067
- withdrawal from criminal enterprise, 6-061—6-066

mens rea

- act of assisting or encouraging principal offender, 6-023
- introduction, 6-022
- offence committed by principal offender, 6-024—6-037
- no fault offence, and; 6-048—6-049
- participating in joint criminal venture, 6-046—6-047
- principal offenders, and, 6-006—6-007
- ‘procure’, 6-008—6-009
- procuring, 6-038—6-040
- punishment, 6-086—6-088
- reform proposals, 6-041—6-049
- transferred malice, 6-073—6-076
- unplanned presence at crime, 6-014—6-015
- victims, and, 6-067—6-072
- withdrawal from criminal enterprise, 6-061—6-066

Self-defence

- defendant characteristics, 4-108—4-110
- duty to retreat, 4-111—4-114
- elements
 - human rights, 4-087—4-090
 - innocent third parties, 4-083—4-085
 - introduction, 4-079
 - protected interest, 4-086
 - threat of unjustified harm, 4-080—4-085
- excessive self-defence, 4-120—4-127
- human rights, 4-087—4-090
- imminence of threatened attack, 4-115—4-119
- innocent third parties, 4-083—4-085
- introduction, 4-077—4-078
- necessity for defensive action, 4-091—4-094
- overview, 4-009
- perception of danger, 4-108—4-110
- permitted response, 4-087—4-090

- protected interest, 4-086
- responsive force to be used
 - defendant characteristics, 4-108—4-110
 - generally, 4-095—4-098
 - householder cases, 4-105—4-107
 - non-householder cases, 4-099—4-104
 - perception of danger, 4-108—4-110
- threat of unjustified harm
 - generally, 4-080—4-085
 - innocent third parties, 4-083—4-085

Sentencing

- actual bodily harm, 7-043
- assault, 7-030
- assault by penetration, 7-166
- attempts, 5-006—5-023
- battery, 7-030
- causing death by dangerous driving, 8-187
- causing serious injury by dangerous driving, 7-078
- censure, 1-068—1-073
- consequentialist theories, and, 1-053
- conspiracy, 5-090—5-092
- corporate liability
 - adverse publicity advertisements, 3-146
 - community service orders, 3-145
 - corporate probation, 3-146
 - corporate rehabilitation orders, 3-147
 - deferred prosecution agreements, 3-148—3-149
 - ‘equity fines’, 3-145
 - finances, 3-138—3-141
 - internal restructuring orders, 3-146
 - introduction, 3-137
 - profit orders, 3-147
 - publicity orders, 3-142—3-144
 - remedial orders, 3-142—3-144
- crime reduction, and, 1-053
- denunciation, 1-068—1-073
- deterrence
 - educative deterrence, 1-083—1-087

- general deterrence, 1-076—1-082
- individual deterrence, 1-075
- introduction, 1-074
- eliminating unfair advantage, 1-063—1-067
- encouraging or assisting crime, 5-151
- expiation, 1-057—1-059
- grievous bodily harm, 7-056
- grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
- incapacitation, 1-088—1-100
- introduction, 1-053
- just deserts
 - censure, 1-068—1-073
 - denunciation, 1-068—1-073
 - eliminating unfair advantage, 1-063—1-067
 - generally, 1-060—1-062
- murder, 8-016—8-021
- obtaining services dishonestly, 9-181
- offences against the person
 - actual bodily harm, 7-043
 - assault, 7-030
 - battery, 7-030
 - grievous bodily harm, 7-056
 - grievous bodily harm with intent, 7-062
 - unlawful wounding, 7-056
 - wounding with intent, 7-062
- omissions, 2-069
- person subject to punishment, 1-119—1-121
- purpose, 1-116—1-118
- racially aggravated offences, 7-074
- rape, 7-165
- rehabilitation, 1-101—1-110
- religiously aggravated offences, 7-074
- reparation, 1-111—1-115
- retribution
 - expiation, 1-057—1-059
 - introduction, 1-054
 - just deserts, 1-060—1-073
 - vengeance, 1-055—1-056

secondary parties, 6-086—6-088
Sentencing Advisory Panel, 1-147
sentencing guidelines
 England & Wales, 1-147—1-153
 introduction, 1-139—1-141
 United States, 1-142—1-146
Sentencing Guidelines Council, 1-147—1-153
severity, 1-122—1-135
sexual assault, 7-166
sexual offences
 assault by penetration, 7-166
 rape, 7-165
 sexual assault, 7-166
strict liability, 3-047—3-049
theft, 9-011
theories combination of, 1-116—1-138
 deterrence, 1-074—1-087
 incapacitation, 1-088—1-100
 introduction, 1-053
 rehabilitation, 1-101—1-110
 reparation, 1-111—1-115
 retribution, 1-054—1-073
types, 1-136—1-138
unlawful wounding, 7-056
utilitarian theories, and, 1-053
wounding with intent, 7-062

Sentencing Advisory Panel

See also Sentencing
generally, 1-147

Sentencing guidelines

punishment
 England & Wales, 1-147—1-153
 introduction, 1-139—1-141
 United States, 1-142—1-146

Sentencing Guidelines Council

See also Sentencing
generally, 1-147—1-153

Series of acts test

See Attempts

Serious injury

See Consent

Severity

See Sentencing

Sexual assault

actus reus, 7-150—7-154

child sex offences, 7-159

generally, 7-150—7-154

mens rea, , 7-154

sentencing, 7-150, 7-166

sexual, 7-152—7-153

Sexual offences

assault by penetration

actus reus, 7-149

child sex offences, 7-159

generally, 7-149

mens rea, 7-149

sentencing, 7-166

causing sexual activity without consent, 7-155—7-156

child sex offences, 7-157—7-164

consent

‘active’ deceptions, 7-123—7-126

capacity, 7-115—7-118

conclusive presumptions, 7-129—7-129

definition, 7-111—7-118

evidential presumptions, 7-129

failure to disclose information, 7-128

freedom, 7-112—7-114

generally, 7-105—7-109

impersonation, 7-121

nature or purpose of act, 7-122—7-126

precondition deceptions, 7-127

presumptions, 7-119—7-129

relationship between definition and presumptions, 7-130—7-131

statutory provisions, 7-110

current law, 7-105—7-164

- 'date rape', 7-099
- evaluation, 7-167—7-169
- inchoate offences, and, 5-155—5-156
- introduction, 7-088
- level of offending, 7-089—7-094
- other non-consensual offences, 7-150—7-154
- rape
 - actus reus, 7-139
 - child sex offences, 7-159
 - consent, 7-105—7-131
 - context, 7-095—7-099
 - generally, 7-132
 - introduction, 7-133—7-135
 - meaning, 7-100—7-104
 - level of offending, 7-089—7-094
 - male rape, 7-136—7-138
 - marital rape, 7-134—7-135
 - mens rea, 7-140—7-148
 - reasonable belief, and, 7-142—7-148
 - sentencing, 7-165
 - statutory provision, 7-132
- relationship rape, 7-098
- sentencing
 - assault by penetration, 7-166
 - rape, 7-165
 - sexual assault, 7-166
- sexual assault
 - actus reus, 7-150—7-154
 - child sex offences, 7-159
 - generally, 7-150—7-154
 - mens rea, , 7-154
 - sentencing, 7-150, 7-166
 - sexual, 7-152—7-153
- sexual gratification, 7-098
- 'stranger rape', 7-095

Situational liability

See Actus reus

Sports

consent to injury, and, 4-065

Stalking

assault, 7-014—7-018

Status offences

See Actus reus

Statutory conspiracy

See Conspiracy

Stranger rape

See Rape

Strict liability

civil sanctions, 3-050—3-051

conclusion, 3-052—3-053

current law, 3-002

defences

 due diligence, 3-022—3-024

 general, 3-021

enforcement, 3-046

human rights, and, 3-025—3-030

introduction, 3-001

justification

 instrument argument, 3-039—3-042

 introduction, 3-031—3-032

 moral, 3-043—3-045

 utilitarian argument, 3-033—3-038 presumption of mens rea

 displacing, 3-006—3-020

 generally, 3-004—3-005

 introduction, 3-002

 promotion of statute, 3-019—3-020

 statutory context, 3-016—3-018

 types of offence, 3-008—3-015

sentencing, 3-047—3-049

types of offence, 3-008—3-015

Substantial step test

See Attempts

Suicide

encouraging or assisting, 8-153—8-155

Suicide pacts

generally, 8-151—8-152

Superior orders

generally, 4-231—4-237

overview, 4-028

Surgical procedures consent to injury, and, 4-067

Terrorism

inchoate offences, 5-155—5-156

Theft

appropriation

bona fide purchasers, 9-046

continuing appropriation, 9-042—9-044

control, 9-038—9-040

generally, 9-014—9-037

no need for loss, 9-045

timing, 9-041

bank accounts, 9-048

belief in consent, 9-089

belief in legal right, 9-088

belief that property is lost, 9-090

belonging to another

criminalising breach of contract, 9-079

direct knowledge of obligation, 9-076

fair labelling, 9-078

generally, 9-052

obligation must be legal, 9-077—9-079

obligation to deal in particular way, 9-068—9-074

obligation to retain and deal with property, 9-065—9-075

owner, by, 9-055—9-057

possession or control, 9-053—9-057

proprietary right or interest, 9-058—9-062

receipt of property, 9-067

restoration of property, 9-080—9-083

trusts, 9-063—9-064

body parts, 9-051

bona fide purchasers, 9-046

confidential information, 9-050

context, 9-009—9-010

- criminalising breach of contract, 9-079
- definition, 9-012—9-013
- direct knowledge of obligation, 9-076
- dishonesty
 - belief in consent, 9-089
 - belief in legal right, 9-088
 - belief that property is lost, 9-090
 - generally, 9-084—9-086
 - not for thief's benefit, 9-092
 - question of fact, 9-093—9-107
 - question of law, 9-087—9-092
 - willingness to pay, 9-091
- electricity, 9-049
- fair labelling, 9-078
- generally, 9-009—9-010
- human body, 9-051
- intangible property, 9-048
- intention to permanently deprive
 - borrowing for a period, 9-114—9-115
 - cheques, 9-124
 - dishonest borrowings, 9-117—9-122
 - generally, 9-108—9-110
 - lending for a period, 9-114—9-115
 - particular property, 9-123
 - treating the thing as his own to dispose of, 9-111—9-113
- intoxication, and, 4-321
- legal background, 9-011
- money, 9-048
- not for thief's benefit, 9-092
- obligation to retain and deal with property
 - criminalising breach of contract, 9-079
 - direct knowledge of obligation, 9-076
 - fair labelling, 9-078
 - generally, 9-065—9-066
 - obligation to deal in particular way, 9-068—9-074
 - receipt of property, 9-067
- owner, by, 9-055—9-057
- personal property, 9-048 possession or control, 9-053—9-057

property

body parts, 9-051

confidential information, 9-050

electricity, 9-049

generally, 9-047—9-048

human body, 9-051

intangible property, 9-048

money, 9-048

personal property, 9-048

real property, 9-048

things in action, 9-048

proprietary right or interest, 9-058—9-062

punishment, 9-011

real property, 9-048

receipt of property, 9-067

restoration of property, 9-080—9-083

things in action, 9-048

willingness to pay, 9-091

Things in action

See Theft

Transferred malice

generally, 2-249—2-256

secondary parties, 6-073—6-076

Trespassers

burglary, 9-223

Trusts

theft, 9-063—9-064

Unfair advantage

punishment, and, 1-063—1-067

Unlawful act manslaughter

dangerous unlawful act, 8-058—8-062

directing unlawful act as victim, 8-064—8-066

introduction, 8-048

unlawful act, 8-049—8-057

unlawful act must cause death of victim, 8-063

Unlawful wounding

actus reus, 7-045—7-052

generally, 7-044
mens rea, 7-053—7-055
punishment, 7-056

Unplanned presence at crime

See Accomplices

Use of force

battery, 7-021

Utilitarianism

sentencing, and, 1-053

Vicarious liability

corporate liability, 3-063—3-069

Victims

causation, and drugs supplied, 2-107—2-111
 escape, 2-103—2-106
 other action/inaction/condition, 2-112—2-118
secondary parties, 6-067

Voluntary act

See Actus reus

Voluntary intoxication

basic intent, 4-311—4-333
drunken mistake, 4-335—4-338
effect on punishment, 4-334
meaning, 4-307—4-310
specific intent, 4-311—4-333

Voluntary manslaughter

diminished responsibility
 current law, 8-137—8-150
 generally, 8-134
 intoxication, and, 4-345—4-349
 introduction, 8-135—8-136
 overview, 4-031
generally, 8-095
introduction, 8-044
loss of control
 circumstances of extremely grave character, etc, 8-111—8-112
 current law, 8-102—8-121
 fear of serious violence, 8-109—8-110

generally, 8-104—8-106
introduction, 8-096—8-098
justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, 8-113—8-115
meaning, 8-104—8-106
objective test, 8-122—8-133
overview, 4-025
qualifying trigger, 8-107—8-121
rationale, 8-099—8-101
provocation, 8-095
suicide pacts, 8-151—8-152

Wounding

actus reus, 7-045—7-052
generally, 7-044
intoxication, and, 4-320
mens rea, 7-053—7-055
punishment, 7-056

Wounding with intent

actus reus, 7-058
generally, 7-057
intent, 7-061
intoxication, and, 4-320
maliciously, 7-060
mens rea, 7-059—7-061
punishment, 7-062

Wrongful conduct

generally, 4
harm and offence principle, 1-019—1-029
legal moralism, 1-006—1-018
legal paternalism, 1-030—1-034

SWEET & MAXWELL TEXTBOOKS NOW AVAILABLE ON ProView™

A FREE, PROFESSIONAL-GRADE PLATFORM

THAT ALLOWS YOU TO INTERACT WITH YOUR eBOOKS IN ENTIRELY NEW WAYS.

ProView enables you to bookmark pages and highlight passages, as well as create notes, search across your library and more.

Available on iPad, Android tablets or computers, ProView enables you to access your Thomson Reuters eBooks online and offline, wherever you are.

FOR MORE INFORMATION

VISIT thomsonreuters.com/site/proview

THOMSON REUTERS™